The first 12 hours of the program will be a solute to music of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops.

Mrs. Charles R. Prichard Jr., of 43 Berkeley St., here, has sent letters to about 30 Nashua "Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," advising them of the approaching event.

HERALD
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 7,200

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Friday On WCRB

Belmontians To Man Phones For BSO Musical Marathon

Mrs. August R. Meyer of Prospect street, chairman of the Belmont Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leads the group who will man the phones at WCRB for four hours Friday afternoon, March 3, for the Symphony's second Musical Marathon.

The phone number is 891-1234; the goal is $50,000.

This popular fund-raising event will be non-stop on WCRB AM and FM from 7 P.M. March 2 through 1 A.M. March 6. It works this way; music lovers phone in their choice, for music from actual POPs and BSO concerts, paying, say, $15 for the privilege of hearing a favorite overture.

Mrs. Paul M. Jacob of Pinehurst road will also be minding the phone for Belmont, along with Mrs. Herbert C. Lee of Juniper road, Mrs. George H. Simonds of Kenmore road, Mrs. Robinson Murray, Jr., and Mrs. Clark Byse of Garfield road, Mrs. John M. Head of Lincoln street and Mrs. Kernan Chobanian of Rutledge road.

Interspersed with the musical selections during this Marathon will be interviews with the conductors, musicians, some surprises and some exciting premiums. They vary from a Chinese dinner for two cooked and served in his apartment by horn player David Ohanian (for $100 subscription) to Roger Voisin, principal trumpet, playing before and after a wedding ceremony in May, June or July ($200).

NEWS TRIBUNE
WALTHAM, MASS.
D. 16,641

FEB 29 1972 New England Newsclip

MUSICAL MARATHON — Weston Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who will be among those working to help raise funds this week include Mrs. Richard F. Schanzle. Mrs. Lynclall F. Carter, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. James T. Mountz.

Westonites Assisting Symphony

This week is Boston Symphony Orchestra Week and radio station WCRB in Waltham will participate in the Musical Marathon by playing unreleased recordings of the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops performances from March 2-6.

During the Marathon, listeners may call in pledges to support the B.S.O. The pledges will be matched by a variety of premiums offered by members of the orchestra.

There will also be interviews with the conductor and members of the orchestra during the Marathon.

Assisting celebrities in manning the telephones at WCRB will be Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas W. Danforth, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. James T. Mountz, Mrs. Richard F. Schanzle, and Mrs. Arthur S. Spangler, all of Weston.

SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
D. 20,300

FEB 28 1972 New England Newsclip

About Town —

Soiree Francaise

By KAY TOBIN

Fracon-American organizations and The Friends of the Fitchburg Public Library will sponsor a French Cultural Soiree Tuesday night in the Fitchburg Youth Library Auditorium.

There will be a film showing at 7.30 p.m. entitled, "Ma Province, Mes Chansons," and other short films portraying the beauty and cultural heritage of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces.

There will be a few words of welcome at 8 p.m.

L'Equipe Du Bon Vieux Temps will present "Un Reveillon," at 8.15 p.m. with music, songs, dances, fun and frolic. A recreation of the traditional Franco-American 'family gala' that dates back to the arrival of French culture on this continent will be performed by a talented group of 15 from Lowell.

A quadrilles for everyone in the youth library is scheduled at 9.45 p.m. Wine and cheese will be served.

* * *

Scholarships, contests, and prizes.

The Carol Nashe School, Inc., talent and model agency at 480 Commonwealth Ave., Boston, is offering $2,500 worth of scholarships to prospective actors, actresses, singers, and models. Applications for the scholarships through the Carol Nashe Alumni Association are available by contacting Miss Catherine Sughrue, director of admissions.

The New England Regional Auditions Committee of the Metropolitan Opera National Council announces that the semifinals will be held March 4 and 5 in Boston. Judges are Judith Raskin, Gabor Carelli and Mary Davenport. The public is invited to enjoy the finals at Jordan Hall, Boston, beginning at 2 p.m., March 5. Mary Davenport has sung here.

This week has been designated as Boston Symphony Orchestra Week by Boston Mayor Kevin White.

Unusual and intriguing premiums are listed, depending on the size of one's donations. For a $25 donation one may go surf fishing with bass player Bela Wurtzler. For $50 another bass player, John Salkowski, offers a Sunday afternoon cruise of Boston Harbor and a lobster dinner selected from his own pots.

Bigger donations include a Chinese dinner for two cooked by David Ohanian, French horn player. Roger Voisin, principal trumpet player, will play before and after the ceremony if one is planning a Spring or Summer wedding, and cellist Jules Eskin will give a recital with his wife Virginia at the piano, for one of the top prizes. Everyone is invited to participate in this marathon.

* * *

TOWN CRIER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
W. 9,900

MAR 1 1972 New England Newsclip

Entertainment

MUSCIAL MARATHON — Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music. Well, you can! This music will be brought to the Greater Boston area by WCRB from 7 p.m. March 2, to 1 a.m. March 6, when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second sale of time to play special selections that are unavailable anywhere. You have the opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of $1 per minute of music with a minimum of $10. The catalogue may be obtained by calling 891-1234. All donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, marathon bumper stickers, music lessons, to dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given in your home. The opening hours will be devoted to the Boston Pops; then on March 3 at 8 a.m., the time will be devoted to the Symphony Ochestra.

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

MAR 4 1972 New England Newsclip

TOWN CRIER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
W. 9,900

FEB 9 1972 New England Newsclip

Musical Marathon

Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music? Well, you can!

Ninety years of excellence have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performances by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras that is unsurpassed anywhere in the world. Many of these concerts will be brought to the listeners of the Greater Boston Community by WCRB from 7:00 p.m., Thursday, March 2 through 1:00 a.m., Monday, March 6 when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second exciting sale of time to play special selections that are unavailable anywhere. You will have the rare opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of one dollar per minute of music with a minimum of ten dollars. Copies of the catalogue may be obtained by anyone calling the Marathon Telephone number, 891-1234.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, to music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given by members for you in your own home. The vision and encouragement needed to execute this exciting undertaking have been supplied by the distinguished members of the Executive Committee of the Musical Marathon.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Then, beginning at 8 a.m., Friday, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for sixty-five non-stop hours. In addition, listeners will have the rare opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the Orchestra and other exciting, well-known national celebrities. The telephone at WCRB will be manned by well-known and distinguished personalities.

Musical Marathon was so popular last year that the available time for the Marathon has been increased so that all who wish may have the opportunity to participate.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

FEB 29 1972 New England Newsclip

The number one event in the lives of the members of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the Musical Marathon due to start on Thursday evening at 7:05 P.M. over radio station WCRB. Here a group of committee members from Wellesley gather under a large sign advertising the fund raising event for the B.S.O. They are (left to right) Mrs. Robert G. Wiese, Mrs. Thomas E. Franks, Mrs. Fredrick Stare, Mrs. Murray Harvey, Mrs. Edward S. Stimpson Jr. and area chairman, Mrs. Howard E. Hansen. (Photography Inc.)

The Musical Marathon catalog lists the selections of recordings unavailable commercially that may be purchased for listening time at one dollar a minute over WCRB and played by the B.S.O. Mrs. George Parson (left) chairman of volunteers hands out catalogs to the Musical Marathon chairman, Mrs. John Bradley, Mrs. Thomas D. Perry of Boston, formerly of Hingham and Mrs. Frederick A. Ritchie of Wellesley Hills.

SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
D. 20,300

FEB 28 1972 New England Newsclip

About Town —

Soiree Francaise

By KAY TOBIN

Fracon-American organizations and The Friends of the Fitchburg Public Library will sponsor a French Cultural Soiree Tuesday night in the Fitchburg Youth Library Auditorium.

There will be a film showing at 7.30 p.m. entitled, "Ma Province, Mes Chansons," and other short films portraying the beauty and cultural heritage of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces.

There will be a few words of welcome at 8 p.m.

L'Equipe Du Bon Vieux Temps will present "Un Reveillon," at 8.15 p.m. with music, songs, dances, fun and frolic. A recreation of the traditional Franco-American 'family gala' that dates back to the arrival of French culture on this continent will be performed by a talented group of 15 from Lowell.

A quadrilles for everyone in the youth library is scheduled at 9.45 p.m. Wine and cheese will be served.

* * *

Scholarships, contests, and prizes.

The Carol Nashe School, Inc., talent and model agency at 480 Commonwealth Ave., Boston, is offering $2,500 worth of scholarships to prospective actors, actresses, singers, and models. Applications for the scholarships through the Carol Nashe Alumni Association are available by contacting Miss Catherine Sughrue, director of admissions.

The New England Regional Auditions Committee of the Metropolitan Opera National Council announces that the semifinals will be held March 4 and 5 in Boston. Judges are Judith Raskin, Gabor Carelli and Mary Davenport. The public is invited to enjoy the finals at Jordan Hall, Boston, beginning at 2 p.m., March 5. Mary Davenport has sung here.

This week has been designated as Boston Symphony Orchestra Week by Boston Mayor Kevin White.

Unusual and intriguing premiums are listed, depending on the size of one's donations. For a $25 donation one may go surf fishing with bass player Bela Wurtzler. For $50 another bass player, John Salkowski, offers a Sunday afternoon cruise of Boston Harbor and a lobster dinner selected from his own pots.

Bigger donations include a Chinese dinner for two cooked by David Ohanian, French horn player. Roger Voisin, principal trumpet player, will play before and after the ceremony if one is planning a Spring or Summer wedding, and cellist Jules Eskin will give a recital with his wife Virginia at the piano, for one of the top prizes. Everyone is invited to participate in this marathon.

* * *

TOWN CRIER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
W. 9,000

MAR 1 1972 New England Newsclip

TOWN CRIER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
W. 9,000

FEB 9 1972 New England Newsclip

Musical Marathon

Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music? Well, you can!

Ninety years of excellence have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performances by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras that is unsurpassed anywhere in the world. Many of these concerts will be brought to the listeners of the Greater Boston Community by WCRB from 7:00 p.m., Thursday, March 2 through 1:00 a.m., Monday, March 6 when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second exciting sale of time to play special selections that are unavailable anywhere. You will have the rare opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of one dollar per minute of music with a minimum of ten dollars. Copies of the catalogue may be obtained by anyone calling the Marathon Telephone number, 891-1234.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, to music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given by members for you in your own home. The vision and encouragement needed to execute this exciting undertaking have been supplied by the distinguished members of the Executive Committee of the Musical Marathon.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Then, beginning at 8 a.m., Friday, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for sixty-five non-stop hours. In addition, listeners will have the rare opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the Orchestra and other exciting, well-known national celebrities. The telephone at WCRB will be manned by well-known and distinguished personalities.

Musical Marathon was so popular last year that the available time for the Marathon has been increased so that all who wish may have the opportunity to participate.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

FEB 29 1972 New England Newsclip

Entertainment

MUSCIAL MARATHON — Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music. Well, you can! This music will be brought to the Greater Boston area by WCRB from 7 p.m. March 2, to 1 a.m. March 6, when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second sale of time to play special selections that are unavailable anywhere. You have the opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of $1 per minute of music with a minimum of $10. The catalogue may be obtained by calling 891-1234. All donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, marathon bumper stickers, music lessons, to dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given in your home. The opening hours will be devoted to the Boston Pops; then on March 3 at 8 a.m., the time will be devoted to the Symphony Ochestra.

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

MAR 4 1972 New England Newsclip

The number one event in the lives of the members of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the Musical Marathon due to start on Thursday evening at 7:05 P.M. over radio station WCRB. Here a group of committee members from Wellesley gather under a large sign advertising the fund raising event for the B.S.O. They are (left to right) Mrs. Robert G. Wiese, Mrs. Thomas E. Franks, Mrs. Fredrick Stare, Mrs. Murray Harvey, Mrs. Edward S. Stimpson Jr. and area chairman, Mrs. Howard E. Hansen. (Photography Inc.)

The Musical Marathon catalog lists the selections of recordings unavailable commercially that may be purchased for listening time at one dollar a minute over WCRB and played by the B.S.O. Mrs. George Parson (left) chairman of volunteers hands out catalogs to the Musical Marathon chairman, Mrs. John Bradley, Mrs. Thomas D. Perry of Boston, formerly of Hingham and Mrs. Frederick A. Ritchie of Wellesley Hills.

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,358

FEB 26 1972

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

FEB 26 1972 New Englan Newscl

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 11,500

MAR 1972 New Eng and Newsclip

FEB 26 1972

MUSCIAL MARATHON — Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music. Well, you can! This music will be brought to the Greater Boston area by WCRB from 7 p.m. March 2, to 1 a.m. March 6, when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second sale of time to play special selections that are unavailable anywhere. You have the opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of $1 per miute of music with a minimum of $10. The catalogue may be obtained by calling 891-1234. All donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, marathon bumper stickers, music lessons, to dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given in your home. The opening hours will be devoted to the Boston Pops; then on March 3 at 8 a.m., the time will be devoted to the Symphony Ochestra.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS
W. 2,993

FEB 24 1972 New England Newsclip

FEB 24 1972

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

Musical Marathon For Boston Pops BSO Begins Wed.

FEB 24 1972

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS
W. 7,200

A Musical Marathon to benefit the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestra, will be telecast non-stop, on WCRB, 1330 AM and 102.5 FM, beginning at 7 p.m., March 2, through 1 a.m. March 6.

Music from actual Pops and BSO concerts in Symphony Hall and interviews with players of the Orchestra will be featured.

Local members of the committee working for the success of this venture include Mr. and Mrs. Robert Hargrove, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Mead, Mrs. P. Adams Colony, chairmen, all of Lexington; also Mr. and Mrs. John Boeing and Peter Boeing, of Bedford.

FEB 24 1972

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

FEB 24 1972

CRICKET
MANCHESTER, MASS.
W. 1,598

FEB 18 1972 New England Newsclip

8 A SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER, JANUARY 23, 1972

MUSIC

Charles Munch, BSO music director from 1949 to 1962, is one of many conductors whose recorded but unreleased performances with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops orchestras may be heard during the Musical Marathon, March 2 through 5, on Radio Station WCRB. Catalogues for this fund-raising event may be obtained by calling 617-891-1234.

CHRONICLE
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
W. 13,735

FEB 24 1972 New England Newsclip

CHRONICLE
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
W. 13,735

MAR 2 1972

CAMBRIDGE CHRONICLE

A HAND FOR THE BSO — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducting a Musical Marathon on WCRB AM and FM to benefit the Boston Pops and the BSO from March 2 - 6. Two members of the Cambridge committee of the council of friends of the BSO are Mrs. David Bird, left, and Mrs. Addison Closson.

Half Steps

Rock Rap Line. If you call 395-3746 any time, day or night, you'll hear a three-minute voice talk about rock, pop, jazz, soul, Muzak and folk: new record releases, artists, record specials and performers coming to town. Often, at the sound of the bleeper, that mysterious voice of the sponsor, Warner-Elektra-Atlantic Distributing Corporation, will ask for your opinion on those records and artists.

Fetal Facts. Two attorneys and two doctors discuss Massachusetts' birth control and abortion laws in a panel on March 20 at 8. One-half of each pair is against any reform. Union Building at BU, 755 Commonwealth Avenue. Free. Sponsored by the League of Women Voters.

Music for Hire. WCRB's starting gun for the second annual Boston Symphony Musical Marathon will be fired at 7 p.m. March 2 for 13 hours of the Pops. Then, until March 5 at 1 a.m., the Symphony's famed recordings of rare greats will be played—for a price. The smallest pledge, $10, fetches 10 minutes of music, and each additional dollar brings an extra minute—up to $50 that buys anything without a special price tag. Get your catalog by calling the Marathon number, 891-1234, so you can cross the finish line with the rest of the gang.

Looking at selections in the Musical Marathon catalogue are, l. to r.: Mrs. F. Corning Kenly of Manchester, Mrs. James Peabody of Boston and Mrs. Thomas Gardiner of Manchester.

Musical Marathon To Benefit Boston Symphony

Interest in the second Musical Marathon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is running high this week. To emphasize this widespread enthusiasm of music lovers of the Greater Boston Community, Mayor Kevin White has declared the week beginning February 28th as Boston Symphony Orchestra Week. At the end of the week, from March 2 through March 6, the Musical Marathon will provide the rare opportunity for listeners to hear their favorite music, unreleased recordings of Boston Symphony and Boston Pops performances, broadcast on radio station WCRB, 1330 AM and 102.5 FM.

Listeners may make pledges by calling WCRB at 891-1234 or using the form in the Musical Marathon catalogue. They will receive a variety of premiums depending upon the size of their donations. The premiums, listed in the catalogue, are unusual and intriguing.

Others who are collaborating with Mrs. John Bradley, Chairman of the Musical Marathon Committee, are Mrs. William V. Ellis of Gloucester, Mrs. Josiah Spaulding of Manchester, Musical Marathon Treasurer, Mrs. John Jeppson III of Cambridge, Mrs. Stephen Kunian of Boston and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry, Jr.

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,358

FEB 26 1972

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

FEB 26 1972 New England Newscl

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 11,500

MAR 1972 New England Newsclip

FEB 26 1972

MUSCIAL MARATHON — Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music. Well, you can! This music will be brought to the Greater Boston area by WCRB from 7 p.m. March 2, to 1 a.m. March 6, when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second sale of time to play special selections that are unavailable anywhere. You have the opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of $1 per minute of music with a minimum of $10. The catalogue may be obtained by calling 891-1234. All donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, marathon bumper stickers, music lessons, to dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given in your home. The opening hours will be devoted to the Boston Pops; then on March 3 at 8 a.m., the time will be devoted to the Symphony Ochestra.

CRICKET
MANCHESTER, MASS.
W. 1,598

FEB 18 1972 New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS
W. 2,993

FEB 24 1972 New England Newsclip

FEB 24 1972

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

FEB 24 1972

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS
W. 7,200

FEB 24 1972

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

FEB 24 1972

Musical Marathon For Boston Pops BSO Begins Wed.

A Musical Marathon to benefit the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestra, will be telecast non-stop, on WCRB, 1330 AM and 102.5 FM, beginning at 7 p.m., March 2, through 1 a.m. March 6.

Music from actual Pops and BSO concerts in Symphony Hall and interviews with players of the Orchestra will be featured.

Local members of the committee working for the success of this venture include Mr. and Mrs. Robert Hargrove, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Mead, Mrs. P. Adams Colony, chairmen, all of Lexington; also Mr. and Mrs. John Boeing and Peter Boeing, of Bedford.

MUSIC

Charles Munch, BSO music director from 1949 to 1962, is one of many conductors whose recorded but unreleased performances with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops orchestras may be heard during the Musical Marathon, March 2 through 5, on Radio Station WCRB. Catalogues for this fund-raising event may be obtained by calling 617-891-1234.

CHRONICLE
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
W. 13,735

FEB 24 1972

CHRONICLE
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
W. 13,735

MAR 2 1972

CAMBRIDGE CHRONICLE

A HAND FOR THE BSO — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducting a Musical Marathon on WCRB AM and FM to benefit the Boston Pops and the BSO from March 2 - 6. Two members of the Cambridge committee of the council of friends of the BSO are Mrs. David Bird, left, and Mrs. Addison Closson.

Half Steps

Rock Rap Line. If you call 395-3746 any time, day or night, you'll hear a three-minute voice talk about rock, pop, jazz, soul, Muzak and folk: new record releases, artists, record specials and performers coming to town. Often, at the sound of the bleeper, that mysterious voice of the sponsor, Warner-Elektra-Atlantic Distributing Corporation, will ask for your opinion on those records and artists.

Fetal Facts. Two attorneys and two doctors discuss Massachusetts' birth control and abortion laws in a panel on March 20 at 8. One-half of each pair is against any reform. Union Building at BU, 755 Commonwealth Avenue. Free. Sponsored by the League of Women Voters.

Music for Hire. WCRB's starting gun for the second annual Boston Symphony Musical Marathon will be fired at 7 p.m. March 2 for 13 hours of the Pops. Then, until March 5 at 1 a.m., the Symphony's famed recordings of rare greats will be played—for a price. The smallest pledge, $10, fetches 10 minutes of music, and each additional dollar brings an extra minute—up to $50 that buys anything without a special price tag. Get your catalog by calling the Marathon number, 891-1234, so you can cross the finish line with the rest of the gang.

Looking at selections in the Musical Marathon catalogue are, l. to r.: Mrs. F. Corning Kenly of Manchester, Mrs. James Peabody of Boston and Mrs. Thomas Gardiner of Manchester.

Musical Marathon To Benefit Boston Symphony

Interest in the second Musical Marathon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is running high this week. To emphasize this widespread enthusiasm of music lovers of the Greater Boston Community, Mayor Kevin White has declared the week beginning February 28th as Boston Symphony Orchestra Week. At the end of the week, from March 2 through March 6, the Musical Marathon will provide the rare opportunity for listeners to hear their favorite music, unreleased recordings of Boston Symphony and Boston Pops performances, broadcast on radio station WCRB, 1330 AM and 102.5 FM.

Listeners may make pledges by calling WCRB at 891-1234 or using the form in the Musical Marathon catalogue. They will receive a variety of premiums depending upon the size of their donations. The premiums, listed in the catalogue, are unusual and intriguing.

Others who are collaborating with Mrs. John Bradley, Chairman of the Musical Marathon Committee, are Mrs. William V. Ellis of Gloucester, Mrs. Josiah Spaulding of Manchester, Musical Marathon Treasurer, Mrs. John Jeppson III of Cambridge, Mrs. Stephen Kunian of Boston and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry, Jr.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,003

FEB 12 1972

New England Newsclip

Weekend Scene • Movies • Drama • Records

BSO Marathon: Chasing Fires or Fiedler's Baton?

Want to own your very own Arthur Fiedler baton?

Or would you prefer, instead, to spend two hours chasing fires through the streets of Boston with the Maestro?

A ride on a BMW motorcycle with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's principal bassoonist, Sherman Walt, is up for grabs; so is a delectable Chinese dinner for two, cooked up by David Ohanian, the BSO's French horn player.

You can get any of these by contributing to the Boston Symphony during the second annual Musical Marathon, coming to radio station WCRB, March 2-5. The all-out effort on the part of members of the BSO and Pops Orchestra, along with the aid from the Council of Friends, is geared to raising money to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., going its great guns.

★

Fervent Symphony and Pops fans can find out what's "for sale" in the Musical Marathon catalog—available at Symphony Hall, or by phoning in a request for one at 891-1234. Recorded BSO performances from Bach and Bartok to Verdi and Xenakis, can be requested for broadcast.

"Requests for music are based on $1 per minute of music, starting at $10," explained Mrs. John Bradley, chairman of the Musical Marathon. "Each pledge entitles donors to a musical request and a premium like the Fiedler baton, or the Ohanian Chinese dinner for two, listed in the catalog according to the amount of the pledge."

"Last year we raised $39,000. This year we hope to raise $50,000," said Mrs. Bradley. Ten percent of the net proceeds go into the Symphony pension fund; the remainder will go toward Symphony operating costs.

"We wanted something that would be fun and amusing that would involve all of us with the community. Then we heard that the Buffalo Symphony had done this kind of Musical Marathon thing and so had the Cleveland Orchestra, with much success. WCRB was very cooperative when we approached them. Then we went to the orchestra members and we asked to use the tapes of the actual concerts recorded at Symphony Hall and Tanglewood. None of the selections listed in the catalog are available commercially," Mrs. Bradley explained.

"Well, everybody agreed." Some orchestra members were interviewed on WCRB, and most of the musicians glued themselves to their radios to hear performances—some taped 35 years ago.

★

"Everybody loved it. But it never occurred to us to ask members of the orchestra to donate premiums." Then Mary Lou Speaker, BSO violinist mentioned during an interview that she'd donate violin lessons for one year to the highest bidder." It was inevitably the making of a trend. Everyone began offering goodies. "The orchestra was 100 percent behind the whole thing," according to Mrs. Bradley. And of course, last year's results were sensational—auguring well for this year's Marathon.

Arthur Fiedler's Baton is "for sale!"

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

FEB 10 1972

New England Newsclip

QUODLIBET

For $2000, your own BSO recital

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

For a $25 contribution to the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its Musical Marathon, March 2-5, you can win 25 minutes of unreleased taped performances by the orchestra. You can also take your choice of a tennis game with orchestra musicians, a bassoon lesson with Richard Plaster, an autographed Arthur Fiedler baton, or an illustrated ghost-written limerick for a special occasion created by David and Sydney Rockefeller.

For $50, you may have 50 minutes of radio music plus a premium of a tape-recording of "Background Music for Family Arguments" by percussionist Charles Smith. For $200, taped music plus processional, recessional and a half-hour recital of trumpet music at your summer wedding performed in person by Roger Voisin.

For a whopping contribution of $2000, you could win a live recital by concert-master Joseph Silverstein to benefit your favorite charity. And you would be entitled to select an entire evening, on radio, of P.D.Q. Bach works, a complete performance of "Lohengrin" with Leinsdorf conducting, the complete Smetana "Ma Vlast" conducted by Kubelik, and the complete "Magic Flute" with Beverly Sills.

The Marathon is, of course, an encore of last year's fund-raising scheme co-sponsored by the Friends of the Boston Symphony and radio station WCRB, and directed by Mrs. John Bradley. For 78 consecutive hours, unreleased taped concerts will be broadcast over WCRB at the request of BSO-fans who will contribute $1 a minute with a minimum of 10 minutes playing time. Contributors will also be eligible for the premiums, including those listed above.

The procedure is to obtain a Marathon Catalogue which lists musical selections available, all premiums, and gives complete directions. Then, make selections, choose premiums, complete the order form and send in your checks. At 9 a.m. and 8 p.m. every day of the Marathon, performance times of requests will be announced. Tune in and enjoy.

For a copy of the Catalogue, call 891-1234.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,530 S. 310,961

FEB 5 1972

New England Newsclip

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

Musical Marathon Theme Adds Bright Note to Symphony Luncheon

THE SUN SHONE brightly yesterday — although a wild wind blew—and Symphony-goers made their usual Friday afternoon trek to Symphony Hall. So all was right with the world of Boston's Four Hundred. Many of them went to Horticultural Hall for the Pre-Symphony Luncheon before braving the traffic to cross the street for the concert.

The theme of the luncheon was the Musical Marathon being planned by the Friends of the orchestra from March 2 to 6. Brightly colored musical notes were used as decorations and in the center of the huge hall was a mobile of musical notes.

During the Marathon, recorded but unreleased performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Pops Orchestra will be brought to the listeners of Greater Boston by WCRB from 7 o'clock, Thursday evening, March 2, through 1 o'clock on the morning of Monday, March 6.

Listeners can request any music in the Musical Marathon catalog for a fee of $1 per minute of music with a minimum of $10. All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. Last year's Marathon was so successful that it will be repeated this year.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

JAN 19 1972

New England Newsclip

SOCIETY
by Miriam Tod

In these days of computerized living there is a great longing in all of us to feel a personal identification with others. No longer are we happy to just sit and watch a performance, we want to get to know the players as people and personalities.

The granting of this desire is just part of a three-fold experience for those playing the Musical Marathon game with the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A bigger and better repeat of last year's "first" to raise funds for the orchestra the Marathon will take place March 2, 3, 4, and 5 over Station WCRB 1330 am/102.5 fm.

This is the way it will happen. Experience number one. For the pledge of a dollar a minute—minimum $10—the listener can call the special Musical Marathon number—891-1234—and request any recording listed in the Musical catalogue to be played for his or her enjoyment during the four days of the event. This catalogue, which will be mailed to anyone calling the special Marathon number, lists by alphabetical order of composers all the recordings made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra which have never been released and so therefore are not available to purchase. The conductor, the date the recording was made and the length of time of the performance are listed clearly and concisely.

Experience number two. Every penny donated by listeners goes to the orchestra so the pleasure of helping a good cause is a part of the bargain. Station WCRB has generously given their facilities, advertising agencies and printers have cooperated and the members of the Council of Friends are volunteering their time and efforts to run the entire event.

Experience number three. A chance to know the orchestra members as people. Premiums will be given for every donation over $25, each getting more elaborate as the sum goes up. For the $25 price there is a chance to surf-fish on the South Shore with bass player Bela Wuntzler, or play tennis with violinist Sheldon Rotenberg, horn player Ralph Pottle and tuba player Chester Schmitz, or squash with Robert Karol, viola, Ralph Gomberg principal oboe, and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster. $50 brings you a cruise of Boston Harbor with bass player John Salkowski or an hour's "hang on" on the back of principal bassoonist Sherman Walt's BMW motorcycle. The premiums Silverstein will give a recital to benefit your favorite charity.

The 30 page catalogue, compiled by Mrs. John H. Knowles, which lists all these premiums, the complete list of recordings available, and instructions on exactly how to be a part of this exciting event, is being mailed to every Friend of the B.S.O. and to all subscribers, and is also available to anyone who wishes a copy. The members of the Friends of the orchestra have been hard at work addressing the booklet under the direction of Mrs. F. Corning Kenly and Mrs. Thomas D. Gardiner of Manchester and Mrs. James Peabody of Boston. Among those taking their turn addressing at Symphony Hall last week were Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard of Newton Center, Mrs. C. Russell Eddy of Duxbury, Mrs. Richard R. Higgins and Mrs. Thomas E. Jansen of Dedham, Mrs. Howard E. Hansen of Wellesley, Mrs. Edward Cole of Lincoln and Mrs. Raymond C. Gordon of Framingham.

Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover, chairman of the Council of Friends, Mrs. Frank G. Allen of Boston, treasurer of the group and Mrs. John Bradley of Manchester, chairman of the Musical Marathon are among those whose enthusiasm and vision have made this huge project possible. They have arranged for well-known personalties to man the telephones at WCRB, and have lined up interviews with the conductors and members of the orchestra to take place during the 65 hours of non-stop Boston Symphony time over the air.

Make a note of the dates—March 2, 3, 4, and 5, save those pennies and get prepared for four exciting days that will bring a three-fold experience not often available in these days of impersonal, cut-and-dried living.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.

FEB 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Social Atmosphere Caps Opera Debut

Much social activity went along with the exciting opening of the 1972 season of the Opera Co. of Boston—the American premiere of BerlioZ' complete "The Trojans" —which filled the Aquarius Theatre on Thursday and Friday evenings, and yesterday afternoon and evening. Artistic director Sarah Caldwell made it a spectacular production.

The Ladies Committee, under the direction of Swiss Consul Dr. Freddy Homburger, provided the social atmosphere. Before the opening Thursday evening, many of the operagoers enjoyed a gourmet dinner, arranged by Mrs. James C. Munro, preceded by cocktails at the new French restaurant, Maison Robert in Od City Hall.

French Consul-General and Mrs. Daniel Oriez dined with Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Stare, Mr. and Mrs. MacMorgan (she set the tone for the opera with program notes of "The Sacking of Troy") and the Homburgers.

The Thomas Cabots and the Robert Cabots joined the David Blacks, the Everett Grossmans and Mr. and Mrs. Allen Latham, Jr. for dinner.

The Frederick Heffenreffers (he is chairman of the Development Committee) and John Haffenreffers, the Phillip K. Allens, the George Hibbards, the Robert Rileys, Dr. John Beakie (who drove up from Hartford, Ct.); the John Latshaws, Bertram Druker, the Alfred Willmanns, Mrs. Mathilde Bird, Martin Slobodkin, the Donald Babsons, Mrs. Sherrer Welles, Paul Beeman, and Mr. and Mrs. S. Baring-Gould were among others talking opera over dinner.

Yesterday between the two sessions of the "The Trojans," afternoon and evening, some 200 of the Series B subscribers strolled over to the Parker House for a buffet supper sponsored by the Guild of the Opera Co., whose members include Mrs. Charles H. Hood, Mrs. Gilbert Peakes, Mrs. Laszlo J. Bonis (husband is president of the Opera Co.), Mrs. Dean Edmonds, Jr., Mrs. Milton Grahm and Mrs. Paul D. Kaneb.

At Friday's Pre-Symphony Luncheon in Horticultural Hall, conversation centered on the excitement of the 78-hour Musical Marathon that will begin at 7:30 p. m. Thursday, March 2, and continue until 1 a. m. March 6.

This will be the second such annual event benefiting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Council of Friends of the BSO. Participants will have a chance to request unreleased performances ($1 a minute of music starting at $10) by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras from the special Second Edition Musical Marathon Catalogue.

Luncheon hostesses from Weston, Wayland, Wellesley and Winchester areas, keeping the Marathon very much in mind, had decorated the hall with psychedelic large red Ms attached to black musical notes.

Included in the hostess corps were Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Allan R. Finlay, Mrs. John T. Griffin, Mrs. Robert J. Caldwell, Mrs. Thomas E. Franks, Mrs. Robert C. Wiese, Mrs. Edward S. Stimpson, Mrs. Lyndall F. Carter, Mrs. Charles L. Moore, Mrs. George A. Marks, among several others.

★

Mrs. Richard Thompson and Mrs. Albert Goodhue reminded the luncheoners of another forthcoming, very special BSO event, the April 6 Mini-Tour with the Orchestra to New York, to celebrate Carnegie Hall's 80th anniversary.

It will be the first time Arthur Fiedler will conduct his own Pops Orchestra in a concert outside of Boston, and that will take place on the first evening.

The three-day tour, limited to 100 friends of the BSO, is highlighted with festive private hospitalities and great music. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Thompson and Mrs. Goodhue are the enthusiastic chairmen.

SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
D. 20,300

FEB 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Musical Marathon

Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music? Well, you can!

Ninety years of excellence have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performances by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras that is unsurpassed anywhere in the world. Many of these concerts will be brought to the listeners of the Greater Boston Community by WCRB from 7:00 p.m., Thursday, March 2 through 1:00 a.m., Monday, March 6 when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second exciting sale of time to play special selections that are unavailable anywhere. You will have the rare opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of one dollar per minute of music with a minimum of ten dollars. Compiling this varied and extensive catalogue of musical masterpieces has been directed by Mrs. John H. Knowles. It was mailed in January to Friends and subscribers of the Boston Symphony; copies may be obtained by anyone calling the Marathon Telephone number, 891-1234.

All Marathon donors will receive premiums depending on their donations. These range from Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, Musical Marathon bumper stickers, to music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given by members for you in your own home. The vision and encouragement needed to execute this exciting undertaking have been supplied by the distinguished members of the Executive Committee of the Musical Marathon.

The opening hours of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Then beginning at 8:00 a.m. Friday, March 3, the time will be devoted to the Boston Symphony for sixty-five non-stop hours. In addition, listeners will have the rare opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the Orchestra and other exciting, well-known national celebrities. The telephone at WCRB will be manned by well-known and distinguished personalities.

Musical Marathon was so popular last year that the available time for the Marathon has been increased so that all who wish may have the opportunity to participate.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

FEB 1 1972 New England Newsclip

Second Marathon

The Musical Marathon, initiated last year by the Friends of the Boston Symphony, will be held again this year in expanded form from 7 p.m. March 2 through 1 a.m. March 6.

The fund raising activity allows donors to request by telephone that WCRB play any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of $1 per minute of music with the minimum donation $10. The catalogue, available through Symphony Hall, lists an extensive library of recorded but unreleased performances by the BSO and the Boston Pops.

The opening hour of the Marathon will be devoted to the Boston Pops. Then, beginning at 8 a.m. March 3, 65 non-stop hours will be devoted to the BSO. In addition, listeners will have the opportunity to hear interviews with conductors and members of the orchestra.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

FEB 7 1972 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

There's a helpful husband in Wellesley who really should take the credit for the novel decorations seen on Friday at the Pre-Symphony Luncheon at Horticultural Hall. Thomas Franks had the idea of projecting a pattern of a stylized double M on his kitchen door so that his wife could draw around the letters to make the original of these M's that were Friday's central theme.

The occasion was the third in the series of these luncheons given before the Friday afternoon Symphony concerts and sponsored by the Council of Friends of the orchestra. The theme of the day was the upcoming Musical Marathon, hence the double M's that were all over the bare walls of Horticultural Hall in every possible psychedelic color and were hung from the center of the room in the form of a huge black mobile.

The dates of the Musical Marathon are March 2, 3, 4, 5, and already many of the premiums that are part of the four day musical event have been snapped up. The event will be held continously over Radio Station WCRB 1330 a.m./102.5 f.m. and for a dollar a minute, minimum $10, you can request any recording made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra or the Boston Pops in the special Musical Marathon catalogue that is available by calling the Marathon number 891-1234.

The list of recordings available is endless and the selection varied indeed. There are five versions of Beethoven's Emperor Piano Concerto, each with a different conductor. There are seven of the Leonore Overture, with six conductors — Leinsdorf recorded it twice, once in 1963 in 13.53 minutes and again in 1966 in 14.37. "Rhapsody in Blue" by the Boston Pops — in three versions — is available, and "Hey, Look Me Over' from "Wildcat" that the Pops played on June 22, 1963. None of the music is available commercially, and the selections run into the thousands.

At Friday's luncheon the chairman of this huge undertaking that hopes to raise $50,000 for the orchestra, Mrs. John Bradley of Manchester, was seated with several of her committee. She has been spending four days a week at Symphony Hall since the start of work on the project, as have many of the committee. Mrs. John H. Knowles, who compliled the catalogue, was one seated with her as were Mrs. Jack Parker of Wellesley, who has done a great job on publicity for the event. Also seated with them was Mrs. James Perkins of Westwood, one of the two lady trustees of the orchestra.

Others at the luncheon which was under the auspices of the Weston, Winchester, Wayland and Wellesley areas which were responsible for the imaginative decorations, were Mrs. Frederick Stare of Wellesley, Mrs. Miles Clair, Mrs. Richard Ely of Weston, Mrs. Howard Hansen of Wellesley and Mrs. Alfred Willmann of Belmont.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.
D. 24,000

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Musical Marathon Aims At $5,000 for BSO

BOSTON — The second annual Musical Marathon, which hopes to raise $5,000 for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gets underway Thursday at 7 p.m on radio station WCRB and will continue through 1 a.m. Monday, March 6.

Thursday's opening will be highlighted with a Salute to Maestro Arthur Fiedler. For 13 consecutive hours, the music of Fiedler and the Boston Pops will be heard.

Music by the Symphony Orchestra will follow from 8 a.m. Friday, March 3 until Monday's early-morning closing.

Radio listeners will have an opportunity to telephone their music requests to WCRB. None of these performances are available commercially. All of the music is taped from live performances by the Boston Pops at Symphony Hall, at Tanglewood in the Berkshires and from several of the Orchestra's recent tours.

Catalogues of all of the music played by the Symphony and Pops, led by many guest conductors, list the music which will be available at this time. Locally, catalogues have been placed in the Framingham Center Library, the Merriam Library in downtown Framingham and at the reception desk at the South Middlesex News .

The musical selections may be requested on the basis of $1 per minute, starting at $10. In return for donations to the Orchestra, valuable premiums may be obtained such as the chance to chase fires for two hours with Arthur Fiedler.

Area residents who are working in behalf of the Musical Marathon as members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony include: Mrs. William O. Clark, Framingham, Mrs. Raymond C. Gordon, Sherborn, formerly of Framingham, Mrs. George Naylor, Framingham, Mrs. Robert J. Caldwell, Sudbury, Mrs. C. George Tedeschi, Framingham, Mrs. Waite Watkins, Framingham and Mrs. George Willis, Framingham.

CHRONICLE
NEEDHAM, MASS.
W. 6,500

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

"Musical Marathon" This Week For Boston Symphony

Interest among local residents is high this week—named Boston Symphony Orchestra Week by Mayor Kevin White of Boston—in the second Musical Marathon being conducted in support of this orchestra.

Needham and Dover listeners, among those in other towns, will have the rare opportunity to hear their favorite music, unreleased recordings of Boston Symphony and Boston Pops performances broadcast on the radio today (March 2) through Monday (March 6), for a donation made by calling Station WCRB or using the form in the free Musical Marathon catalogue, which may be obtained at the Music Center in Needham.

Assisting celebrities in manning the telephones at the station during the Marathon will be members of the Needham - Wellesley Council of the Friends of the Boston Symphony.

Needham area council members working on this project are Mrs. Roger Hunt, Mrs. Frederick Stare, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. Alvar Polk, Jr., and Mrs. Mark Wheeler.

PLAN MUSICAL MARATHON — In charge of the Needham-Wellesley section of the Musical Marathon in support of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are, left to right, Mrs. Frederick Stare, Needham; Mrs. Murray Harvey, Mrs. Edward Stimpson and Mrs. Howard E. Hansen, Wellesley Hills. The Marathon will continue through the weekend in this Boston Symphony Week, with supporters able to hear their favorite pieces broadcast on radio station WCRB.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

There certainly seems to be a magic about the basement of Symphony Hall. No matter what kind of event is held there it is inevitably successful, outdoing all others held in far more glamorous surroundings. Glamor is certainly not the word one would apply to the bare room below the stage of Symphony Hall. Heating ducts, plain walls, and brick supporting columns are all very much in evidence, yet the charm of the place lies in the feeling that is is imbued with the very heart of all the music that is made in this home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On Tuesday evening, it was the Tuesday concert subscribers' turn to gather in the basement for an event planned especially for them by the Council of Friends of the BSO. This was the second of the Table Talk suppers, a series of three events held during January, February and March before a Tuesday evening concert. Very much like the Stage Door Lectures planned for the Friday afternoon concertgoers and held in the same basement, the Table Talk suppers also have a speaker, either one of the BSO players or someone connected with the orchestra.

The decorations depicting the Musical Marathon for the benefit of the orchestra, due to start over radio station WCRB tonight at 7:05 p.m. were still in place from last Friday's Stage Door Lecture. The guests, both men and women, unlike the Friday affairs which are almost entirely female, gathered first for cocktails before lining up at the long buffet for beef stroganoff, green salad and crusty French garlic bread. The name "Table Talk Suppers" comes from the pies donated for the event by the company of that name and on Tuesday evening the choice was custard.

The cochairmen of the evening were Mrs. John Thorndike, of Brookline, whose husband is treasurer and a trustee of the orchestra, and Mrs. Samuel Ryburn of Dover. Both excellent hostesses they were greeting the guests, each of whom wore a name tag to promote the essentially friendly atmosphere of these affairs.

Among those enjoying this second event for Tuesday concertgoers and listening to Tom Mowrey of Deutsche Grammophon which records the BSO were Mr. and Mrs. Robert H. Gardiner of Milton, representing the trustees of the orchestra; Miss Jane Sears; Mrs. Atherton Loring of Duxbury who was joined by her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Atherton Loring Jr. of Carlisle; Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Holmes of Weymouth; the Russell Eddys of Duxbury; Mr. and Mrs. Robert G. Wiese of Wellesley, and Mr. and Mrs. Donald A. Haire of Needham.

REPORTER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
W. 7,400

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

LOCAL WOMEN WORK FOR B.S.O. MARATHON

Ninety years of excellence have produced a library of recorded but unreleased performances by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras that is unsurpassed anywhere in the world. Many of these concerts will be brought to the listeners of the Greater Boston Community by WCRB from 7:00 p.m., Thursday, March 2 through 1:00 a.m., Monday, March 6 when Musical Marathon, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stages its second sale of time to play special selections that are not available elsewhere. Listeners will have the opportunity to request any music listed in the Musical Marathon Catalogue for a fee of one dollar per minute of music with a minimum of ten dollars.

Local people who have been working on this project are Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead and Mrs. Nelson Darling of Swampscott, co-chairman of the North Shore Council of Friends.

Assisting them in the mailing of the brochures have been Mrs. Garrett Bowne and Mrs. Raymond Ellis of Marblehead, Mrs. Frederick Mayo and Mrs. Charles Erving of Swampscott, and Mrs. David Little of Salem.

Mrs. Nelson Aldrich and Mrs. James Marsh both of Marblehead, are on the Marathon Committee in charge of "paperwork".

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Marathon To Aid B.S.O.

The second Musical Marathon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted from March 2 through March 6. It will provide the rare opportunity for listeners to hear their favorite music, unreleased recordings of Boston Symphony and Boston Pops performances, broadcast on radio station WCRB, 1330 AM and 102.5 FM.

Listeners may make pledges by calling WCRB at 891-1234 or using the form in the Musical Marathon catalogue. They will receive a variety of premiums depending upon the size of their donations.

The premiums, listed in the catalogue, are unusual and intriguing. One of the many $25 premiums is the opportunity to go surf fishing with bass player Bela Wurtzler. One of the exciting $500 premiums is the recital that will be given by superb principal cellist, Jules Eskin, with his wife Virginia at the piano. There are other rare musical performances offered and, during the Marathon, surprise premiums will be announced.

Listed in the catalogue are the fascinating premiums that will be auctioned on WCRB during the Marathon; but you don't need to wait for March 2nd to make your bid. The volunteer committee urges you to write in now to place your bid.

During the Musical Marathon there will be stimulating interviews with the conductors and members of the Orchestra as well as other well-known people. These notables will remain at WCRB to take phone calls, so that when you telephone your requests and pledges, you may be answered by a famous voice. Governor Sargent will be interviewed on Friday, March 3. During the evening of Thursday, March 2, Mayor White will be heard.

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
W. 8,234

MAR 2 1972

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000

MAR 2 1972

NEWS
SALEM, MASS.
D. 29,244

MAR 1 1972 New England Newsclip

The tea leaves

SEVERAL NORTH SHORE RESIDENTS are among the Friends of the Boston Symphony aiding in the promotion of the week-long Musical Marathon over WCRB (1330 AM and 102.5 FM) from 7 p.m. to 1 a.m. which will continue daily through Sunday night. They are Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead, a BSO trustee, Mrs. John Bradley of Manchester, chairman of the Musical Marathon Committee; Mrs. William V. Ellis of Gloucester, Mrs. Josiah Spaulding of Manchester and Mrs. George R. Poor of Marblehead.

JOURNAL
REVERE, MASS.
W. 9,000

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Musical Marathon

A Musical Marathon benefit for the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops orchestras will be held non-stop on WCRB 1330 AM and 102.5 FM from 7 p.m. to 1 a.m. on (today) Thursday.

Music from actual Pops and BSO concerts in Symphony Hall and interviews with players of the orchestra.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

MAR 4 1972 New England Newsclip

It's Musical Marathon weekend for the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras over radio station WCRB. The annual marathon to benefit the BSO is continuing through 1 a.m. Monday with listeners buying unreleased Symphony and Pops performances for one dollar per minutes. Donors are receiving prizes from bumper stickers and autographed batons to music lessons and dinenrs given by orchestra members. The telephones at WCRB are manned by well-known personalities on the Boston music scene.

TOWN CRIER
WAYLAND, MASS.
W. 4,652

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

Music for money

Wayland and Weston residents (Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas W. Danforth, Mr. and Mrs. Richard B. Ely, Mrs. James T. Mountz, Mrs. Richard F. Schapzle, and Mrs. Arthur S. Spangler of Weston; Mrs. Francis Devlin, Mrs. Thomas B. Gannett, Mrs. William Moyer, Mrs. Henry M. Parker, Mrs. M. Allen Powning of Wayland) will be helping to man the telephones in the upcoming musical marathon benefit for the Boston Symphony Orchestra on WCRB.

During the three day marathon, from March 2 at 7 p.m. through March 6 at 1 a.m., listeners can call the station (891-1234) and hear their favorite classical musical selections in return for pledges. The music will be served up at a cost of $1 per minute. Thus, a 45 minute symphony will cost $45.

Members of the BSO will entertain people who make substantial contributions. For instance, for someone donating $50 a bass player, John Salkowski, offers a Sunday afternoon cruise in the Boston Harbor and a lobster dinner selected from his own pots.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

MAR 4 1972 New England Newsclip

ON THE AIR at the opening of WCRB's Boston Symphony Orchestra's Musical Marathon benefit are, from left, Gov. Francis Sargent, Boston Mayor Kevin White and Waltham Mayor Arthur Clark. By calling 891-1234 listeners can pledge support to the orchestra.

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
W. 8,500

MAR 2 1972 New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WORKING FOR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S MUSICAL MARATHON ... are these Wellesley members of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left to right: Mrs. Robert Weise, Mrs. Thomas Franks, Mrs. Frederick Stare, Mrs. Murray Harvey, Mrs. Edward Stimpson and Mrs. Howard Hansen, Wellesley area chairman. The Musical Marathon on WCRB starts tonight and continues through Sunday, March 5. To request a musical selection, telephone 891-1234.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

FEB 12 1972

New England Newsclip

The PERFORMING ARTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's unreleased performances can be yours for a dollar a minute via radio station WCRB in March when the orchestra presents its Musical Marathon.

Boston Pops Concerts will be included in the five-day marathon beginning Thursday, March 2, through Monday, March 6, at 1 a.m. You can request any music listed in the marathon catalogue with a minimum of ten minutes of music for 10 dollars. Marathon donors will receive premiums ranging from bumper stickers to music lessons and dinners given by orchestra members, or special concerts given in your home.

The Marathon will feature interviews with conductors and orchestra members along with world-renowned musical celebrities.

North Shore Friends of the BSO working on the event include Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead and Mrs. Nelson Darling of Swampscott, co-chairmen. Also Mrs. Garrett Browne and Nelson Aldrich and Mrs. James Marsh, and Mrs. Raymond Ellis of Marblehead, Mrs. Frederick Mayo and Mrs. Charles Ewing of Swampscott with Mrs. David Little of Salem.

Haven't you always wanted to ask the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops to play your favorite music ?

Now You Can!

MUSICAL MARATHON

a benefit for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. Music at Your Request by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras on Radio Station WCRB 1330AM/102.5FM

March 2-March 5, 1972 7:00 P.M. Thursday through 1:00 A.M. Monday

Non-Stop

Telephone: (617)891-1234

24 Hours A Day!

Join In Boston's Most Exciting Musical Event

Your Participation in the Marathon will... provide you with the rare opportunity to select exciting taped performances of actual concerts by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras in Symphony Hall, at Tanglewood, and on tour all to be broadcast on radio station WCRB. None of this music is available commercially!

This year's Musical Marathon will:
*raise money for this great orchestra *entitle you to unique and exciting premiums *introduce you to members of the Orchestra family through live interviews on WCRB

Our Goal Is $50,000 For The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc.

You Can Help Each pledge entitles the donor to one musical request

TRI TOWN TRANSCRIPT
TOPSFIELD, MASS.
W. 4,500

FEB 9 1972

785

New Englar Newsc

Musical marathon to aid Boston Symphony

A musical marathon is being planned by Friends of the Boston Symphony to raise money for the orchestra. Listeners in the Boston area will be able to call WCRB between 7 p.m. March 2 and 1 a.m. March 6 and ask for their favorite selections recorded by the Boston Symphony to be played.

Music available is listed in the Musical Marathon catalogue, which may be obtained by calling the Marathon telephone number 891-1234. The cost is $1 per minute of music with a minimum of $10.

Listeners will also receive, depending on their donations, such things as Arthur Fiedler autographed batons, music lessons and dinners given by Orchestra members, and special concerts given by members at the listener's home

NEWS
AMESBURY, MASS.
W. 4,400

FEB 10 1972

THE NEWS, February 24, 1972

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEEDS HELP

Have you ever wanted an authentic Arthur Fiedler autographed baton? Or coveted a private Chinese dinner for two cooked by Boston Symphony French hornist David Ohanian?

You can have these and other goodies if you support the Second Annual Musical Marathon sponsored by the Friends of Boston Symphony with the cooperation of WCBR FM radio on March 2-5.

If you pledge $10 to the Symphony you get 10 minutes of air time in which to play your choice of music by the Boston Pops or the Boston Symphony. None of the music is available commercially. You may choose selections by anyone in the Marathon catalog from Serge Koussevitzsky to Seiji Ozawa.

The more money you give, the more music of your choice you may hear. If you give $5 or more, you select from the premiums in the Marathon catalog. The authentic Arthur Fiedler baton goes for a $25 pledge.

If you cannot afford $25, and contribute three dollars you will receive by mail a special edition Musical Marathon bumper sticker and a copy of the Orchestra's European Tour Book.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is trying to raise $50,000 this year with the help of college students from the Greater Boston area. The Symphony is a community organization and needs the help of the community. It cannot survive by itself.

Boston After Dark, Section Two, February 29, 1972.

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1972

EYE

BOSTON SYMPHONY: The Boston Pops will play this season's first New York concert at Lincoln Center April 6, and the faithful Friends of the BSO have arranged a minitour to hear them. Meanwhile, the Friends are also working to get the second BSO Musical Marathon underway for March 2-6. The marathon, held to raise money for the symphony, runs on radio station WCRB in Boston, and listeners can call in and "buy" a chance to hear their favorite Pops selections.

GRAPHIC
NEWTON, MASS.
W. 10,000

MAR 2 1972

New England Newsclip

MUSIC MARATHONERS — In charge of the Newton section of the Musical Marathon in support of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are, left to right: Mrs. Charles V. Hovey, Area Chairman of Friends; Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Chairman of Friends of Newton; Mrs. John Bradley, Chairman of the Musical Marathon and Mrs. Jack S. Parker, Chairman of Publicity. The Marathon will continue through the weekend in this, Boston Symphony Week, with supporters able to hear their favorite pieces broadcast on radio station WCRB.

Musical Marathon On This Week for Boston Symphony

Interest is high this week — declared Boston Symphony Orchestra Week by Mayor Kevin White of Boston — in the second Musical Marathon being conducted in support of the orchestra.

Listeners will have the rare opportunity to hear their favorite music, unreleased recordings of Boston Symphony and Boston Pops performances, broadcast on the radio today (March 2) through Monday, for a donation made by calling the station or using the form in the Musical Marathon catalogue.

During the Musical Marathan there will be stimulating interviews with the conductors and members of the Orchestra as well as other well - known people. These notables will remain at WCRB to take phone calls, so that when you telephone your requests and pledges, you may be answered by a famous voice. Governor Sargent will be interviewed on Friday, March 3.

During the evening of Thursday, March 2, Mayor White will be heard. Mrs. David Bird, in charge of interviews, assures us that there will be unexpected surprises among those to be interviewed.

Assisting celebrities in manning the telephones at WCRB during the Marathon will be Friends of the Boston Symphony, organized and coordinated by Mrs. George Parson of Louisburg Square.

Listeners may make pledges by calling WCRB at 891-1234 or using the form in the catalogue. They will receive a variety of premiums depending upon the size of their donations.

The premiums, listed in the catalogue, are unusual and intriguing. One of the many $25 premiums is the opportunity to go surf fishing with bass player Bela Wurtzler. In the $50 category, another bass player, John Salkowski, offers a Sunday afternoon cruise of Boston Harbor and a lobster dinner selected from his own pots.

Boston Symphony French horn player David Ohanian will cook and serve in his apartment a Chinese dinner for two to the person who pledges $100. For the family planning a May, June or July wedding, there is the enticing offer of Roger Voisin, principal trumpet player of the Boston Pops, to play before and after the ceremony. All this if you subscribe $200.

One of the exciting $500 premiums is the recital that will be given by superb principal cellist, Jules Eskin, with his wife Virginia at the piano. There are other rare musical performances offered, and, during the Marathon, surprise premiums will be announced.

MARATHON WINNER! 1972

Boston Symphony

INDEPENDENT
WESTBORO, MASS.
W. 2,000

MAR 16 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony's Musical Marathon

Raises $59,011 Goal Of $50,000 Surpassed!

WALTHAM — Mrs. John M. Bradley, Chairman of the Boston Symphoty Orchestra's 1972 Musical Marathon, announced at 1:00 this morning that a total of $59,011 was raised this past weekend to benefit the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras and the Players' Pension Fund. The Marathon, held at Radio Station WCRB in Waltham, opened Thursday evening, March 2nd, at 7:00 p.m. with a 13-hour salute to Arthur Fiedler. The Marathon continued non-stop with music by the Boston Symphony from 8:00 Friday morning, March 3rd, until 1:00 Monday morning, March 6th.

The Marathon weekend was sponsored and organized by the Boston Symphony's Council of Friends and Radio Station WCRB. Over 250 volunteers came to Waltham to answer telephones and record pledges made to the Oechestra as well as run the adding machines and manage the clerical work. Richard L. Kaye, Executive Vice-President of WCRB, was the principal radio host during the Marathon weekend.

Requests for over 300 performances of music by the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops were accepted for braodcast. The most frequently requested piece of music by the Boston Symphony was Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; and by the Boston Pops, Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 conducted by Arthur Fiedler with soloist Phyllis Moss, and Wagner's "Overture" to Die Meistersinger conducted by Leonard Bernstein on June 8, 1969, at his 25th class reunion at Harvard Night at Pops. The most requested conductor of the Boston Symphony was Erich Leinsdorf with Serge Koussevitzky a close second.

The official kick-off of the Marathon occurred at 7:00 p.m. Thursday, March 2nd, with the appearance at WCRB of Francis W. Sergent, Governor of Massachusetts; Kevin H. White, Mayor of Boston; and Arthur Clark, Mayor of Waltham. Later that evening a four-way telephone call was placed to Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler in Tokyo, Japan, where Mr. Fiedler is currently conducting the Japan Philharmonic Orchestra. Speaking to Mr. Fiedler from Waltham were David Mugar, Chairman of the Pops Night at the Marathon; Jeremiah Sullivan, Superintendent of the Boston Police Department; and Mr. Fiedler's son, Peter. Mr. Fiedler wished the Marathon great success and hoped everyone would give their total support to the Marathon. Following the telepbone call a WCRB listener made a pledge to help defray the cost of the telephone call to Japan. Other guests interviewed on the air included Massachusetts, Congressman Robert Drinan, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and trustees and overseers of the Orchestra.

Highlights of the Marathon weekend included a generous pledge at 4:00 Saturday morning from a taxicab driver who donated one-half of his day's profits. Laurie Gilbert, sister of WCRB announced Steve Gilbert, collected $42.10 from students in the music department at the Newton South High School.

Another pledge was received early Saturday morning from a lady who had just been mugged on the street! Her comment to the telephone volunteer, a student from Wellesley College, was "Music is a better solution to mugging than law and order."

There were two long-distance telephone calls bringing pledges to the Orchestra from California, one from the future mother-in-law of a Boston Symphony staff member. There was also a mailed-in request from a woman in Kansas.

The most controversial piece of music broadcast was Steve Reich's Four Organs, performed during a Spectrim Concert in Symphony Hall on October 8, 1971. During the broadcast, over 25 telephone calls were made to the station from listeners thinking the needle was stuck on the record. The announcer, Richard L. Kaye, interrupted the performance to say that the needle was not stuck, but that this was the way this contemporary piece of music was written. One irate man called in to cancel his previously made pledge of $50 because this unconvential piece was played. The cancellation of the pledge was announced on the radio, and another listener immediately called in to pledge $100 to make up for the $50 loss, and finally, the person who originally requested Four Organs called to say that because the announcer had interrupted the performance, the tape he was making had been ruined!

Mrs. George Lee Sargent, Chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony, commented, "to me, first and foremost was the extraordinary rapport between the Players, Friends, Council members, and the staff of WCRB. The latter let us make shambles of their tightly organized studio; their extreme good nature, hospitality, and countless hours of volunteering for the benefit of the Boston Symphony will not soon be forgotten. Of course, all of us are forever grateful to the magnificent leadership of Jane Bradley, who, as Chairman of the Musical Marathon, spent almost four months of dedicated unselfish work. The Council of Friends thanks her and salutes her."

Commenting on the success of the weekend, Talcott M. Banks, President of the Trustees of the Symphony, said, "This weekend was not only a superb sporting way to obtain support for the Orchestra, but also an extraordinary opportunity for participation of the whole community in the Orchestra's work and life. The personal qualities of the Players, their warmth, humanity, and dedication, became evident to everyone. We can all appreciate as never before why Boston has such enormous pride in its Orchestra, not only as a world leader in music but as an human institution."

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 97,539

MAR 6 1972 New England Newsc

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 38,127

MAR 6 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Raises $59,011 By Music Marathon

BOSTON (UPI)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 in a music marathon to apply toward operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon, which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous taped symphony and Boston Pops music played on WRCB-AM, FM in Waltham.

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 149,649

MAR 6 1972 New England Newscl

$59,011 Raised For Hub Symphony

Boston — (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 in a music marathon to use for operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon, which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous taped symphony played on WRCB-AM, FM in Waltham.

Symphony Marathon Nets $59,011

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 through its music marathon to apply toward operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon, which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous taped symphony and Boston Pops music played on a local radio station. Listeners pledged $1 for each minute their request was played.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786

MAR 7 1972

Musicthon Nets 59G

Boston, March 6 (UPI)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that it has raised $59,011 for operating expenses through its music marathon. The marathon, which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous taped symphony and Boston Pops music played on a local radio station. Listeners pledged $1 for each minute their request was played.

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
D. 13,000

MAR 6 1972 New England Newscl

Marathon Aiding Boston Symphony

BOSTON (UPI)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 through its music marathon to apply toward operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon, which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous music play-

Boston Symphony Raises $59,001

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 through its music marathon to apply toward operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon, which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous music played on WRCB-AM, FM in Waltham.

GAZETTE
HAVERHILL, MASS.
D. 24,900

MAR 6 1972 New England Newsc

A review

Globe 3/6/72

Music marathon raises $59,011

A total of $59,011 was raised during this weekend's Musical Marathon to benefit the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras and the Players' Pension Fund, it was announced early today.

Mrs. John M. Bradley, chairman of the marathon, said more than 250 volunteers answered telephones and recorded pledges in Waltham while WCRB radio broadcast three consecutive days of music by the Pops and the Symphony.

The marathon began Thursday night with a 13-hour salute to Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler and continued with music by the Symphony from 8 a.m. Friday to 1 a.m. today. Listener requests were accepted throughout the weekend, with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and his Piano Concerto No. 5 drawing the largest number of requests.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

MAR 7 1972 New Engla Newsc

Musical Marathon Passes $50,000 Goal for BSO

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 197 2 Musical Marathon surpassed its goal with contributions totaling $59,011.

The marathon, held over the weekend on radio station WCRB in Waltham and with a goal of $50,000, featured nonstop music by the Boston Symphony. A special feature of the program was a 13-hour salute to conductor Arthur Fiedler.

Proceeds of the drive will benefit the Symphony and Pops Orchestras and the Players' Pension Fund.

Sponsor of the program were the radio station and the Boston Symphony's Council of Friends.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

MAR 8 1972

B$Overtop

The $50,000 goal set by Boston Symphony and station WCRB for the orchestra's second Musical Marathon was exceeded at 1 a.m. Monday morning by $9,011. Over a nonstop four day period, contributors heard choices from a collection of more than 1,000 BSO performances not available commercially.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 72,971

MAR 6 1972 New Englan Newscl

BSO RAISES $59,011

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has raised $59,011 through its music marathon to apply toward operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon consisted of 78 hours of continuous, taped music played on WRCB-AM, FM.

INDEPENDENT
WESTBORO, MASS.
W. 2,000

MAR 16 1972 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony's Musical Marathon

Raises $59,011 Goal Of $50,000 Surpassed!

WALTHAM — Mrs. John M. Bradley, Chairman of the Boston Symphoty Orchestra's 1972 Musical Marathon, announced at 1:00 this morning that a total of $59,011 was raised this past weekend to benefit the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras and the Players' Pension Fund. The Marathon, held at Radio Station WCRB in Waltham, opened Thursday evening, March 2nd, at 7:00 p.m. with a 13-hour salute to Arthur Fiedler. The Marathon continued non-stop with music by the Boston Symphony from 8:00 Friday morning, March 3rd, until 1:00 Monday morning, March 6th.

The Marathon weekend was sponsored and organized by the Boston Symphony's Council of Friends and Radio Station WCRB. Over 250 volunteers came to Waltham to answer telephones and record pledges made to the Oechestra as well as run the adding machines and manage the clerical work. Richard L. Kaye, Executive Vice-President of WCRB, was the principal radio host during the Marathon weekend.

Requests for over 300 performances of music by the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops were accepted for braodcast. The most frequently requested piece of music by the Boston Symphony was Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; and by the Boston Pops, Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 conducted by Arthur Fiedler with soloist Phyllis Moss, and Wagner's "Overture" to Die Meistersinger conducted by Leonard Bernstein on June 8, 1969, at his 25th class reunion at Harvard Night at Pops. The most requested conductor of the Boston Symphony was Erich Leinsdorf with Serge Koussevitzky a close second.

The official kick-off of the Marathon occurred at 7:00 p.m. Thursday, March 2nd, with the appearance at WCRB of Francis W. Sergent, Governor of Massachusetts; Kevin H. White, Mayor of Boston; and Arthur Clark, Mayor of Waltham. Later that evening a four-way telephone call was placed to Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler in Tokyo, Japan, where Mr. Fiedler is currently conducting the Japan Philharmonic Orchestra. Speaking to Mr. Fiedler from Waltham were David Mugar, Chairman of the Pops Night at the Marathon; Jeremiah Sullivan, Superintendent of the Boston Police Department; and Mr. Fiedler's son, Peter. Mr. Fiedler wished the Marathon great success and hoped everyone would give their total support to the Marathon. Following the telepbone call a WCRB listener made a pledge to help defray the cost of the telephone call to Japan. Other guests interviewed on the air included Massachusetts, Congressman Robert Drinan, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and trustees and overseers of the Orchestra.

Highlights of the Marathon weekend included a generous pledge at 4:00 Saturday morning from a taxicab driver who donated one-half of his day's profits. Laurie Gilbert, sister of WCRB announced Steve Gilbert, collected $42.10 from students in the music department at the Newton South High School.

Another pledge was received early Saturday morning from a lady who had just been mugged on the street! Her comment to the telephone volunteer, a student from Wellesley College, was "Music is a better solution to mugging than law and order."

There were two long-distance telephone calls bringing pledges to the Orchestra from California, one from the future mother-in-law of a Boston Symphony staff member. There was also a mailed-in request from a woman in Kansas.

The most controversial piece of music broadcast was Steve Reich's Four Organs, performed during a Spectrim Concert in Symphony Hall on October 8, 1971. During the broadcast, over 25 telephone calls were made to the station from listeners thinking the needle was stuck on the record. The announcer, Richard L. Kaye, interrupted the performance to say that the needle was not stuck, but that this was the way this contemporary piece of music was written. One irate man called in to cancel his previously made pledge of $50 because this unconvential piece was played. The cancellation of the pledge was announced on the radio, and another listener immediately called in to pledge $100 to make up for the $50 loss, and finally, the person who originally requested Four Organs called to say that because the announcer had interrupted the performance, the tape he was making had been ruined!

Mrs. George Lee Sargent, Chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony, commented, "to me, first and foremost was the extraordinary rapport between the Players, Friends, Council members, and the staff of WCRB. The latter let us make shambles of their tightly organized studio; their extreme good nature, hospitality, and countless hours of volunteering for the benefit of the Boston Symphony will not soon be forgotten. Of course, all of us are forever grateful to the magnificent leadership of Jane Bradley, who, as Chairman of the Musical Marathon, spent almost four months of dedicated unselfish work. The Council of Friends thanks her and salutes her."

Commenting on the success of the weekend, Talcott M. Banks, President of the Trustees of the Symphony, said, "This weekend was not only a superb sporting way to obtain support for the Orchestra, but also an extraordinary opportunity for participation of the whole community in the Orchestra's work and life. The personal qualities of the Players, their warmth, humanity, and dedication, became evident to everyone. We can all appreciate as never before why Boston has such enormous pride in its Orchestra, not only as a world leader in music but as an human institution."

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 97,539

MAR 6 1972 New England Newsc

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
D. 13,000

MAR 6 1972 New England Newsclip

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 38,127

MAR 6 1972 New England Newsclip

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 149,849

MAR 6 1972 New England Newsc

GAZETTE
HAVERHILL, MASS.
D. 21,000

MAR 6 1972 New England Newsc

Symphony Marathon Nets $59,011

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 through its music marathon to apply toward operating expenses for the coming season.

Boston Symphony Raises $59,011 By Music Marathon

BOSTON (UPI)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 through its music marathon to apply toward operating expenses for the coming season.

Marathon Aiding Boston Symphony

BOSTON (UPI)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 through its music marathon to apply toward operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon, which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous music play- ed on WRCB-AM, FM in Waltham. The Sym-

Boston Symphony Raises $59,001

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 through its music marathon to apply toward operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon, which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous music play- ed on WRCB-AM, FM in Waltham. The Sym-

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786

MAR 7 1972

$59,011 Raised For Hub Symphony

Boston — (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 in a music marathon to use for operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon, which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous played on WRCB-AM, FM in Waltham.

Musicthon Nets 59G

Boston, March 6 (UPI)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that it has raised $59,011 for operating expenses through its music marathon. The marathon, which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous taped symphony and Boston Pops music played on a local radio station. Listeners pledged $1 for each minute their request was played.

A review

Globe 3/6/72

Music marathon raises $59,011

A total of $59,011 was raised during this weekend's Musical Marathon to benefit the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras and the Players' Pension Fund, it was announced early today.

Mrs. John M. Bradley, chairman of the marathon, said more than 250 volunteers answered telephones and recorded pledges in Waltham while WCRB radio broadcast three consecutive days of music by the Pops and the Symphony.

The marathon began Thursday night with a 13-hour salute to Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler and continued with music by the Symphony from 8 a.m. Friday to 1 a.m. today. Listener requests were accepted throughout the weekend, with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and his Piano Concerto No. 5 drawing the largest number of requests.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 212,264

MAR 8 1972 New England Newsclip

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 72,977

MAR 6 1972 New England Newsclip

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

MAR 7 1972 New England Newsc

B$Overtop

The $50,000 goal set by Boston Symphony and station WCRB for the orchestra's second Musical Marathon was exceeded at 1 a.m. Monday morning by $9,011. Over a nonstop four day period, contributors heard choices from a collection of more than 1,000 BSO performances not available commercially.

BSO RAISES $59,011

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has raised $59,011 through its music marathon to apply toward operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon consisted of 78 hours of continuous taped music played on WRCB-AM, FM.

Musical Marathon Passes $50,000 Goal for BSO

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 197 2 Musical Marathon surpassed its goal with contributions totaling $59,011.

The marathon, held over the weekend on radio station WCRB in Waltham and with a goal of $50,000, featured nonstop music by the Boston Symphony. A special feature of the program was a 13-hour salute to conductor Arthur Fiedler.

Proceeds of the drive will benefit the Symphony and Pops Orchestras and the Players' Pension Fund.

Sponsor of the program were the radio station and the Boston Symphony's Council of Friends.

MARATHONERS — Massachusetts Gov. Sargent, Boston's Mayor White and Waltham Mayor Arthur Clark (left to right) are interviewed by WCRB manager Richard Kaye on musical marathon to aid Boston Symphony Orchestra.

No, it's not stuck, it sounds that way

★ SYMPHONY
Continued from Page 1

protest the playing of Reich's piece. When the cancellation was announced on the air, another listener called in to pledge $100 to make up for the $50 loss.

Finally, the listener who had originally requested "Four Organs" called in to complain that the announcer's interruption of the performance had ruined a tape he was making of the broadcast.

Some people feel that if WCRB's Musical Marathon were a film, it would probably be British and it would almost certainly feature Alec Guinness in a prominent role.

The marathon, which ran from 7 p.m. last Thursday to 1 a.m. this Monday, is two years old now and is becoming a must for anyone who thinks that there is not much originality on Boston radio. It also gives an intriguing glimpse into the psyche of the lover of serious music in Boston.

Approximately $600 of the $59,011 raised from some 3000 telephone callers during the marathon was raised on behalf of pets. Pledges were made on behalf of cats and dogs. Individual donations were made for baby chicks, four cockroaches, canaries, gerbils and a praying mantis.

A listener who called in to pledge $25 at 3 a.m. one morning was asked what he was doing up at the hour. "I dreamed I was hearing Brahms's 'Fourth' and when I woke up, I was," he answered.

An opportunity to conduct the Boston Pops Orchestra in the "Stars and Stripes Forever" in June was won by a woman who pledged $500. A Worcester dentist then called with a pledge of $1000 for the opportunity to conduct anything but "Stars and Stripes Forever."

A woman called in with a pledge in exchange for a copy of conductor Harry Ellis Dickson's book, referred to her by title as "Gentlemen, More Dolce Vita, Please."

A Worcester listener called in with a promise to round off the pledge total to the next highest dollar whenever the sum included cents. This triggered a number of pledges with cents, like $12.80 or $7.54.

A pledge was received early one morning from a woman who said she had just been mugged. She said she was making her pledge because "music is a better solution to mugging than law-and-order."

Just how off-hand it all was is by what happened at 7:30 p.m. last Sunday.

Steve Solomon, a young Symphony publicist who is to be married in August, was hanging around WCRB's Waltham studio when he was advised that a dedication to him from a friend — Bach's "Wedding Contata" — would have to be scrubbed to allow the station to catch up on its programming.

Solomon's face fell, prompting the announce to say over the air:

"Don't worry about i Steve, she'll marry yo anyway."

Biggest snap-ups on record were this past week's "premiums" offered by the fantastic men who can be seen almost daily in those famous chairs on stage at Symphony Hall.

Come-ons for the annual BSO Musical Marathon (you can get the rarest recording, minutes or hours of anything the Orchestra has ever played, for a price) the premiums were goodies like a Chinese dinner cooked by horn player David Ohanian. Allen Scovell of Boston bought that one. Or three hours of flying with violinist William Waterhouse in his own plane — and Col. and Mrs. Philip Sherwood of Milton, who've angeled so many Boston good causes, bought that.

Trumpeter Roger Voisin put up wedding music, and Mrs. Richard Lee of Brookline was so anxious to keep this treat in the family that she put it on a layaway basis, ready for the first wedding or anniversary at her house.

Symphony's three-figure offer to let the first bidder conduct the Stars and Stripes at Pops, went too fast to suit Dr. Paul Shannon of Worcester. He offered double the price to wave the baton over an Esplanade concert by the BSO. He'll be on. Bass player Bella Wurtzler sold his surf-fishing angle to Rexford Wilson of Wellesley Hills, who's taking along his son and daughter.

Robert Gardiner, a trustee of Symphony, made the top bid for the harp and flute concert which Mr. and Mrs. James Pappoutsakis will play as a birthday present for Mrs. Gardiner, who in turn is giving it as a present by sharing it with Milton Academy.

Nice touch — the taxi driver who likes to beam in on the BSO broadcasts, sorry for the Wellesley College gals who were trying to get Marathon bids on the 4 a.m. shift, came in with a contribution. It was half his night's earnings, and won a choice of premiums. Selected seats for the orchestra's rehearsal sessions.

PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES
WEST WARWICK, R. I.
D. 10,160

MAR 24 1972 New England Newsclip

WIN SOME, LOSE SOME

Radio station WCRB in Waltham, Mass., recently conducted a marathon weekend to raise $50,000 for the Boston Symphony and surpassed the goal by $9,000.

But the successful drive wasn't without its troubles.

The station broadcast Steve Reich's "Four Organs" and over 25 telephone calls were made to the station from listeners who thought the needle was stuck on the record. The announcer, Richard L. Kaye, interrupted the performance to say the needle wasn't stuck, it was the way the music was written.

One irate listener called to cancel his previous pledge of $50 because the unconventional piece was played, another called to pledge $100 to make up fo rthe loss, and finally, the person who originally requested "Four Organs" called to complain that because the announcer had interrupted the performance, the tape he was was ruined.

PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES
WEST WARWICK, R. I.
D. 10,160

MAR 20 1972 New England Newsclip

WIN SOME, LOSE SOME

Radio station WCRB in Waltham, Mass., recently conducted a marathon weekend to raise $50,000 for the Boston Symphony and surpossed the goal by $9,000.

But the successful drive wasn't without its troubles.

The station broadcast Steve Reich's "Four Organs" and over 25 telephone calls were made to the station from listeners who thought the needle was stuck on the record. The announcer, Richard L. Kaye, interrupted the performance to say the needle wasn't stuck, it was the way the music was written.

IN THIS CORNER Boston Globe March 8, 1972 Page 1

No, the record's not stuck, it's supposed to sound that way

By Bruce McCabe
Globe Staff

During the broadcast of Steve Reich's "Four Organs" on WCRB's Musical Marathon to raise money for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., 25 listeners called the station to express the belief the needle was stuck on the record.

The announcer, Richard L. Kaye, who is WCRB's general manager and executive vice president, interrupted the performance to say that the needle wasn't stuck, that this was the way this contemporary piece of music was written.

An irate man then called in to cancel his previous pledge of $50 to

SYMPHONY, Page 48

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,358

MAR 6 1972 New England Newsclip

State

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 through its music marathon to supply toward operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon, which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous music played on WRCB-AM, FM in Waltham.

THE MUSIC BY the Symphony and Boston Pops was on tape and listeners could make requests by pledging $1 for each minute their request was played.

The Boston Symphony's recent "Music marathon" in conjunction with Waltham radio station WCRB netted the orchestra's player pension fund a total of $59,011. Most frequently requested music during the marathon was Beethoven's 9th Symphony by the Boston Symphony and Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 by the Boston Pops and Arthur Fiedler. The most requested conductor was Erich Leinsdorf with Serge Koussevitzky a close second. Incidentally, Arthur Fiedler is in Japan for a series of concerts with the Japan Philharmonic.

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900

MAR 16 1972

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

MAR 19 1972 New Engl

MARATHONERS — Massachusetts Gov. Sargent, Boston's Mayor White and Waltham Mayor Arthur Clark (left to right) are interviewed by WCRB manager Richard Kaye on musical marathon to aid Boston Symphony Orchestra.

No, it's not stuck, it sounds that way

★ SYMPHONY
Continued from Page 1

protest the playing of Reich's piece. When the cancellation was announced on the air, another listener called in to pledge $100 to make up for the $50 loss.

Finally, the listener who had originally requested "Four Organs" called in to complain that the announcer's interruption of the performance had ruined a tape he was making of the broadcast.

Some people feel that if WCRB's Musical Marathon were a film, it would probably be British and it would almost certainly feature Alec Guinness in a prominent role.

The marathon, which ran from 7 p.m. last Thursday to 1 a.m. this Monday, is two years old now and is becoming a must for anyone who thinks that there is not much originality on Boston radio. It also gives an intriguing glimpse into the psyche of the lover of serious music in Boston.

Approximately $600 of the $59,011 raised from some 3000 telephone callers during the marathon was raised on behalf of pets. Pledges were made on behalf of cats and dogs. Individual donations were made for baby chicks, four cockroaches, canaries, gerbils and a praying mantis.

A listener who called in to pledge $25 at 3 a.m. one morning was asked what he was doing up at the hour. "I dreamed I was hearing Brahms's 'Fourth' and when I woke up, I was," he answered.

An opportunity to conduct the Boston Pops Orchestra in the "Stars and Stripes Forever" in June was won by a woman who pledged $500. A Worcester dentist then called with a pledge of $1000 for the opportunity to conduct anything but "Stars and Stripes Forever."

A woman called in with a pledge in exchange for a copy of conductor Harry Ellis Dickson's book, referred to her by title as "Gentlemen, More Dolce Vita, Please."

A Worcester listener called in with a promise to round off the pledge total to the next highest dollar whenever the sum included cents. This triggered a number of pledges with cents, like $12.80 or $7.54.

A pledge was received early one morning from a woman who said she had just been mugged. She said she was making her pledge because "music is a better solution to mugging than law-and-order."

Just how off-hand it all was is by what happened at 7:30 p.m. last Sunday.

Steve Solomon, a young Symphony publicist who is to be married in August, was hanging around WCRB's Waltham studio when he was advised that a dedication to him from a friend — Bach's "Wedding Contata" — would have to be scrubbed to allow the station to catch up on its programming.

Solomon's face fell, prompting the announce to say over the air:

"Don't worry about i Steve, she'll marry yo anyway."

PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES
WEST WARWICK, R. I.
D. 10,160

MAR 24 1972 New England Newsclip

WIN SOME, LOSE SOME

Radio station WCRB in Waltham, Mass., recently conducted a marathon weekend to raise $50,000 for the Boston Symphony and surpassed the goal by $9,000.

But the successful drive wasn't without its troubles.

The station broadcast Steve Reich's "Four Organs" and over 25 telephone calls were made to the station from listeners who thought the needle was stuck on the record. The announcer, Richard L. Kaye, interrupted the performance to say the needle wasn't stuck, it was the way the music was written.

One irate listener called to cancel his previous pledge of $50 because the unconventional piece was played, another called to pledge $100 to make up fo rthe loss, and finally, the person who originally requested "Four Organs" called to complain that because the announcer had interrupted the performance, the tape he was making was ruined.

PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES
WEST WARWICK, R. I.
D. 10,160

MAR 20 1972 New England Newsclip

WIN SOME, LOSE SOME

Radio station WCRB in Waltham, Mass., recently conducted a marathon weekend to raise $50,000 for the Boston Symphony and surpossed the goal by $9,000.

But the successful drive wasn't without its troubles.

The station broadcast Steve Reich's "Four Organs" and over 25 telephone calls were made to the station from listeners who thought the needle was stuck on the record. The announcer, Richard L. Kaye, interrupted the performance to say the needle wasn't stuck, it was the way the music was written.

IN THIS CORNER Boston Globe March 8, 1972

No, the record's not stuck, it's supposed to sound that way

Page 1

By Bruce McCabe
Globe Staff

During the broadcast of Steve Reich's "Four Organs" on WCRB's Musical Marathon to raise money for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., 25 listeners called the station to express the belief the needle was stuck on the record.

The announcer, Richard L. Kaye, who is WCRB's general manager and executive vice president, interrupted the performance to say that the needle wasn't stuck, that this was the way this contemporary piece of music was written.

An irate man then called in to cancel his previous pledge of $50 to

SYMPHONY, Page 48

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
D. 7,358

MAR 5 1972 New England Newsclip

State

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 through its music marathon to supply toward operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon, which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous music played on WRCB-AM, FM in Waltham.

THE MUSIC BY the Symphony and Boston Pops was on tape and listeners could make requests by pledging $1 for each minute their request was played.

The Boston Symphony's recent "Music marathon" in conjunction with Waltham radio station WCRB netted the orchestra's player pension fund a total of $59,011. Most frequently requested music during the marathon was Beethoven's 9th Symphony by the Boston Symphony and Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 by the Boston Pops and Arthur Fiedler. The most requested conductor was Erich Leinsdorf with Serge Koussevitzky a close second. Incidentally, Arthur Fiedler is in Japan for a series of concerts with the Japan Philharmonic.

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900

MAR 16 1972

Biggest snap-ups on record were this past week's "premiums" offered by the fantastic men who can be seen almost daily in those famous chairs on stage at Symphony Hall.

Come-ons for the annual BSO Musical Marathon (you can get the rarest recording, minutes or hours of anything the Orchestra has ever played, for a price) the premiums were goodies like a Chinese dinner cooked by horn player David Ohanian. Allen Scovell of Boston bought that one. Or three hours of flying with violinist William Waterhouse in his own plane — and Col. and Mrs. Philip Sherwood of Milton, who've angeled so many Boston good causes, bought that.

Trumpeter Roger Voisin put up wedding music, and Mrs. Richard Lee of Brookline was so anxious to keep this treat in the family that she put it on a layaway basis, ready for the first wedding or anniversary at her house.

Symphony's three-figure offer to let the first bidder conduct the Stars and Stripes at Pops, went too fast to suit Dr. Paul Shannon of Worcester. He offered double the price to wave the baton over an Esplanade concert by the BSO. He'll be on. Bass player Bella Wurtzler sold his surf-fishing angle to Rexford Wilson of Wellesley Hills, who's taking along his son and daughter.

Robert Gardiner, a trustee of Symphony, made the top bid for the harp and flute concert which Mr. and Mrs. James Pappoutsakis will play as a birthday present for Mrs. Gardiner, who in turn is giving it as a present by sharing it with Milton Academy.

Nice touch —the taxi driver who likes to beam in on the BSO broadcasts, sorry for the Wellesley College gals who were trying to get Marathon bids on the 4 a.m. shift, came in with a contribution. It was half his night's earnings, and won a choice of premiums. Selected seats for the orchestra's rehearsal sessions.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

MAR 19 1972 New England

POST GAZETTE
(ANGLO-ITALIAN)
BOSTON, MASS
14,900

MAR 24 1972

New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY - ORCHESTRA'S 1972 MUSICAL MARATHON

Mrs. John M. Bradley, Chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1972 Musical Marathon, announced recently that a total of $59,011 was raised last weekend to benefit the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras and the Players' Pension Fund. The Marathon, held at Radio Station WCRD in Waltham, opened Thursday evening, March 2nd, at 7:00 p.m. with a 13 hour salute to Arthur Fiedler. The Marathon continued non-stop with music by the Boston Symphony from 8:00 Friday morning, March 3rd, until 1:00 Monday morning, March 6th.

The Marathon weekend was sponsored and organized by the Boston Symphony's Council of Friends and Radio Station WCRB. Over 250 volunteers came to Waltham to answer telephones and record pledges made to the Orchestra as well as run the adding machines and manage the clerical work. Richard L. Kaye, Executive Vice-President of WCRB, was the principal radio host during the Marathon weekend.

Requests for over 300 performances of music by the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops were accepted for broadcast. The most frequently requested piece of music by the Boston Symphony was Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; and, by the Boston Pops, Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 conducted by Arthur Fiedler with soloist Phyllis Moss, and Wagner's "Overture" to Die Meistersinger conducted by Leonard Bernstein on June 8, 1969, at his 25th class reunion at Harvard Night at Pops. The most requested conductor of the Boston Symphony was Erich Leinsdorf with Serge Koussevitzky a close second.

The official kick-off of the Marathon occurred at 7:00 p.m. Thursday March 2nd, with the appearance at WCRB of Francis W. Sargent, Governor of Massachusetts; Kevin H. White, Mayor of Boston; and Arthur Clark, Mayor of Waltham. Later that evening a four-way telephone call was placed to Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler in Tokyo, Japan, where Mr. Fiedler is currently conducting the Japan Philharmonic Orchestra. Speaking to Mr. Fiedler from Waltham were David Mugar, Chairman of the Pops Night at the Marathon; Jeremiah Sullivan, Superintendent of the Boston Police Department; and Mr. Fiedler's son, Peter. Mr. Fiedler wished the Marathon great success and hoped everyone would give their total support to the Marathon. Following the telephone call a WCRB listener made a pledge to help defray the cost of the telephone call to Japan. Other guests interviewed on the air included Massachusetts Senator Edward Brooke, Congressman Robert Drinan, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and trustees and overseers of the Orchestra.

Highlights of the Marathon weekend included a generous pledge at 4:00 Saturday morning from a taxicab driver who donated one-half of his day's profits. Laurie Gilbert, sister of WCRB announcer, Steve Gilbert, collected $42.10 from students in the music department at the Newton South High School.

Another pledge was received early Saturday morning from a lady who had just been mugged on the street! Her commet to the telephone volunteer, a student from Wellesley College, was "Music is a better solution to mugging than law and order."

There were two long-distance telephone calls bringing pledges to the Orchestra from California, one from the future mother - in-law of a Boston Symphony staff member. There was also a mailed-in request from a woman in Kansas.

The most controversial piece of music broadcast was Steve Reich's Four Organs, performed during a Spectrum Concert in Symphony Hall on October 8, 1971. During the broadcast, over 25 telephone calls were made to the station from listeners thinking the needle was stuck on the record. The announcer, Richard L. Kaye, interrupted the performance to say that the needle was not stuck, but that this was the way this contemporary piece of music was written. One irate man called in to cancel his previously made pledge of $50 because this unconventional piece was played. The cancellation of the pledge was announced on the radio, and another listener immediately called in to pledge $100 to make up for the $50 loss, and finally, the person who originally requested Four Organs called to say that because the announcer had interrupted the performance, the tape he was making had been ruined!

Mrs. George Lee Sargent, Chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony, commented, "To me, first and foremost was the extraordinary rapport between the Players, Friends, Council members and the staff of WCRB. The latter let us make shambles of their tightly organized studio; their extreme good nature, hospitality, and countless hours of volunteering for the benefit of the Boston Symphony will not soon be forgotten. Of course, all of us are forever grateful to the magnificent leadership of Jane Bradley, who, as Chairman of the Musical Marathon, spent almost four months of dedicated unselfish work. The Council of Friends thanks her and salutes her."

Commenting on the success of the weekend, Talcott M. Banks, President of the Trustees of the Symphony, said, "This weekend was not only a superb sporting way to obtain support for the Orchestra, but also an extraordinary opportunity for the participation of the whole community in the Orchestra's work and life. The personal qualities of the Players, their warmth, humanity, and dedication became evident to everyone. We can all appreciate as never before why Boston has such enormous pride in its Orchestra, not only as a world leader in music but as a human institution."

GRAPHIC
NEWTON, MASS.
W. 10,000

MAR 9 1972

New England Newsclip

Marathon Tops Goal of $50,000 For Symphony

A four-way phone call was placed to Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler in Toyko, Japan, Saturday evening where he is currently conducting the Japan Philharmonic Orchestra, announcing the success of the four-day Musical Marathon conducted by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony.

Speaking to the Maestro were David Mugar of Newton, Chairman of the Pops Night at the Marathon, Jeremiah Sullivan, of the Boston Police Department and Mr. Fiedler's son, Peter.

The 1971 goal of $50,000 was exceeded during the four-day Marathon which was concluded at 1 a.m. Monday (March 6th) with a total of $59,011.00 raised.

Mayor Theodore Mann of Newton, along with Mayor Kevin White of Boston, Senator Edward Brooke, Governor Francis Sargent and other dignitaries participated in this annual fund-raising event for the Symphony, according to Mrs. John M. Bradley, chairman of the Musical Marathon for 1972. Mrs. Robert Kennard chaired the Newton area Marathon group.

TELEGRAPH
NASHUA, N. H.
D. 69,493

MAR 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Music Marathon Brings Funds To Boston Symphony

WALTHAM, Mass. — Mrs. John M. Bradley, chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1972 musical marathon, has announced that a total of $59,011 was raised to benefit the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras and the Players' Pension Fund.

The marathon, held at radio station WCRB in Waltham, was sponsored and organized by the Symphony's Council of Friends and the radio station. More than 250 volunteers staffed the station's telephones to accept pledges during the four-day event. The goal of the marathon was $50,000.

CRICKET
MANCHESTER, MASS.
W. 1,598

MAR 17 1972

New England Newsclip

Goal of $50,000. Surpassed

Mrs. John M. Bradley of Manchester, Chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1972 Musical Marathon, announced at 1:00 a.m. Monday morning that a total of $59,011 was raised over the weekend to benefit the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras and the Players' Pension Fund. The Marathon, held at Radio Station WCRB in Waltham, opened Thursday evening, March 2nd at 7:00 p.m. with a 13-hour salute to Arthur Fiedler. The Marathon continued non-stop with music by the Boston Symphony from 8:00 a.m. Friday morning, March 3rd until 1:00 a.m. Monday morning, March 6th.

The Marathon weekend was sponsored and organized by the Boston Symphony's Council of Friends and Radio Station WCRB.

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
D. 14,019

MAR 13 1972

New England Newsclip

This and That

Boston's Symphony and the Boston Pops Orchestras and the Players Pension Fund received a nice comfortable $59,011 in a Musical Marathon held on the weekend a week ago over a Waltham radio station. The 13-hour salute to Arthur Fiedler went nearly ten thousand dollars over its $50,000 goal.

Beethoven was a program favorite. Requests for over 300 performances of music by the two orchestras were accepted with Bethoven's Ninth the most frequently requested Symphony performance and Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, the most frequently requested by the Pops Orchestra.

Third runner up was Wagner's Overturn to Die Meistersinger as conducted by Leonard Bernstein on June 8, 1969 at his 25th class reunion at Harvard Night at Pops.

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,988

MAR 12 1972

New England Newsclip

Outstanding Success of BSO Marathon Due to 'Joint Effort

The country's fund raisers have something to learn from the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

That group of women—in one weekend—raised $59,011 for their Symphony, more than $9,000 over the goal they had set when they launched their fund-raising marathon over WCRV.

What can account for success like that in tight money times like these?

Mrs. John M. Bradley, chairman of the marathon, thinks she knows:

"It was because it was a joint effort," she said. "The members of the orchestra themselves were so enthusiastic. They came to the studio to help during the Marathon and brought their wives.

"People like Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, who dropped in and started answering phones and cancelled an engagement for the evening so he could stay and help . . . and Harry Ellis Dickson of the orchestra . . . and Mrs. George Sargent, president of The Council of Friends; when she saw it was snowing early in the morning she put a snow shovel in her car and drove to the studio. Volunteers who came early found her shoveling the driveway so cars could get in!"

Distinguished trustees of the BSO turned out, too.

"Mrs. Harris Fahnestock brought a basket of cold chicken and other goodies to feed volunteers during the storm," Mrs. Bradley recalled.

Some 250 volunteers took 2500 pledges between 7 p.m. Thursday and 1 a.m. Monday. Some of the volunteers were WCRV staff members who spent their weekend in the station, giving their time to the marathon.

So fund raisers from throughout the country have the formula, now. If they can only round up the same components the Boston Symphony had going for it.

And not the least of these is the symphony itself, according to Mrs. Bradley, who cited the number of modest donations that helped push the tally so far over the marathon goal.

"Pledges of one dollar, two dollars, three dollars. It was a chance for people to say 'thank you.' Because everybody in the community really does appreciate the Boston Symphony," she pointed out.

BSO Raises $59,000 in Music Marathon

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today it had raised $59,011 through its music marathon to apply toward operating expenses for the coming season. The marathon which ended at 1 a.m. today, consisted of 78 hours of continuous music played on WRCB-AM, FM in Waltham. The music by the Symphony and Boston Pops was on tape and listeners could make requests by pledging $1 for each minute their request was played.

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, MAINE.
D. 29,772

MAR 6 1972

Musical Marathon Runs Over the Top

A total of $59,011 was raised early this month to benefit the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras and the Players' Pension Fund. The 1972 Musical Marathon week-end was sponsored and organized by the Boston Symphony's Council of Friends and Radio Station WCRB in Waltham, where over 250 volunteers answered telephones, recorded the pledges, ran the adding machines and did the clerical work. The goal was $50,000.

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
W. 8,500

MAR 16 1972

[177]

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
S. 207,211

MAY 7 1972

New England
Newsclip

Ancient brass horns are played by William Gibson (right), principal trombone player with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and John Corley, director of musical activities at the Devotion School in Brookline, during a lecture demonstration on brass instruments given to more than 100 children as part of the Symphony's Musical Marathon yesterday at the school. —UPI Telephoto

NEWS-TIMES
DANBURY, CONN.
D. 31,285

APR 1 1972

New England Newsclip

UPI

Giant gong

Largest gong in the U.S. draws interest of Frank Epstein, left, of the Boston Symphony's percussion section and Tom Morris, assistant treasurer, at Symphony Hall in Boston. It will be used by the symphony during the Spectrum Concerts tonight and tomorrow evening. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct. This is the same gong used in the Mr. Clean ads and at the end of the Mark VII productions.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

APR 4 1972

New England Newsclip

In Concert

Religious Spectrum Finale to Series

By Peter M. Knapp

"Four Religious Ceremonies" formed the theme for the third and last set of the innovative Spectrum concerts planned, hosted and conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with the Boston Symphony.

The pre-Easter program Friday and Saturday evenings at Symphony Hall (I attended the latter) covered a wide "spectrum" of religious compositions, opening with an unscheduled illustration of the wellsprings of religious music, the medieval plainsong "sequence," "Victimae Paschali," sung by the men of the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum from a balcony corridor.

From other ages there were Johann Sebastian Bach's Cantata No. 4, "Christ lag in Todesbanden," and Josquin des Prez' tribute to his teacher, "La deploration de Jehan Okeghem," music from the baroque and renaissance periods, respectively. From our time, there were the first performance of the revised version of David Del Tredici's "Poppourri" (1968), and the first Boston performance of Oilvier Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum" "And I look for the resurrection of the dead," composed in 1964.

Stronger Music Than Words

The Bach and the Des Prez used the Harvard-Radcliffe choristers, who have been well schooled in part-singing by F. John Adams. They sang with notable articulation of the notes, though less so of the text, particularly in the overlapping polyphony of the a capella Des Prez work in which words are difficult to project in any case — even with the amount of head-bobbing they use as a kinesthetic aid to singing.

The Bach performance was on the romantic side, with full soprano and alto choirs used instead of solo voices. A full violin section was used in the background to the solo tenor verse, making the texture somewhat heavy. The soloists were tenor Mallory Walker, who has quite a dark, rich voice for a tenor, and baritone Leslie Guinn, who sang without much expression or personality.

Del Tredici's composition is a curious mixture of the sacred and the silly-secular. The 35-year-old American composer is on an "Alice in Wonderland" kick, setting the Lewis Carroll verses to music. Two of the verses are employed in "Pop-purri" — the Mock Turtle's song in two versions, and the marvellous Jabberwocky piece, which Del Tredici has set as a melodrama (signs giving the essence of the action as in silent movies were displayed during the performance).

These episodes, linked by spoken narration by amplified soprano, are joined by fragments from Bach's chorale, "Es ist genug," the fragments being enlarged each time and the work is concluded with the statement of the full chorale with echoes of the "Turtle Soup" song in the background. At the midpoint of the piece is the Litany of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Added Sounds

Del Tredici uses a huge conventional orchestra (adding anvil, wind machine and electric bull horn), and for the "Alice" scenes there is a solo rock group, purple-lit, of electric guitars, and saxophones. Certainly, it's a mixed soup, as the title indicates. But I doubt that we're supposed to derive much liturgical significance from this juxtaposition which may be more mock turtle than anything else.

The piece, however, is entertaining. Del Tredici has a vivid pictorial imagination and if one can appreciate the inspired nonsense of Lewis Carroll, he ought to enjoy the saxophone in the Turtle Soup songs, and the witty depictions of the Jabberwocky — noodling woodwinds for "the slithy toves did gyre and gimble in the wabe" and the sonic recreation of the beast himself, galumphing in on snarling brass (he must have been a cousin of Fafner). The audience seemed to like it, and there was considerable applause for the composer and for the personality-filled soprano, Phyllis Bryn-Julson.

The Messiaen work takes one on a sonic, mystical trip, one in which time and space are awesomely employed. (Thomas had slides of the visual influences on Messaien flashed on a screen to reinforce the music.) In five sections, "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum" employs a stringless orchestra of woodwind, brass and metallic percussion instruments (perhaps denoting the Trinity, there is much musical and numerical symbolism in the French composer's works).

It is a piece of enormous diversity and scope, employing exotic bird calls, Asian rhythms, great dynamic ranges, from pure silence (an important factor in Messiaen) to shatteringly loud song rolls and the decay of gong resonance. Some of the work's mystical-symbolic quality is conveyed by the composer's program notes:

"The song of the Short-toed lark, a bird of Greece and Spain, given to the flutes, oboes, clarinets and bassoons, symbolizes joy. The angels and stars and all the themes . . . join in acclaiming the Risen in their glory — by superimposing four musical strains, four variations of color, and four complexes of sonority."

Cosmic stuff, which at times sounds like a celebration of the Chinese New Year in Hong Kong with all the gong and tam tam work, and ending in a section of one gradually climbing crescendo, driven by a slow, relentless rhythm (a super "Bolero"?). An impressive piece impressively played, even if its mystical associations are not always evident and given its ritualistic repetitions and length.

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON
HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500

MAR 30 1972

New England Newsclip

Symphony plays final series of Spectrum Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of The Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the final series of this season's Spectrum Concerts Friday evening, March 31, and Saturday evening, April 1. Both concerts begin at 8:30 p.m.

Entitled "Four Religious Ceremonies," the concert opens with a performances of Bach's Contata no. 4, "Christ lag in Todesbanden" with soloists tenor Mallory Walker, baritone Leslie Guinn, and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, F. John Adams, director. Next is the first performance in this version of David Del Tredici's "Pop-pourri" with soprano soloist Phyllis Bryn-Julson, and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum. Following intermission, Thomas, conducts the first performance at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of Des Prez' "La deploration de Jehan Okeghem" with the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum. The concert concludes with the first Boston performance of Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum."

Formed in the fall of 1971, the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum is a new mixed chorus at Harvard University. Its director is F. John Adams, a doctoral candidate in music at Harvard. Their concerts this year have included a Debut concert at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge this fall, and a recent tour to Montreal. They will perform Mozart's "Requiem" this spring in St. Paul's Church in Cambridge, as well as several other concerts of varied repetoire.

Phyllis Bryn-Julson, who appeared with the Boston Symphony during the fall of 1966 in a performance of Berg's Suite from "Lulu," conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, attended the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood for four summers, winning a Fromm Fellowship, a High Fidelity Magazine prize, and a Composition-performance award. A specialist in contemporary music, her recent appearances have included performances with the Louisville Symphony, the Aspen Festival, and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London.

Leslie Guinn, who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts, was a student at the Berkshire Music Center in 1968. A native of Texas, he began his formal vocal studies at Northwestern University. There, he was heard by Lottie Lehman, who invited him to study with her in Santa Barbara. He has received the Martha Baird Rockefeller Grant on 3 occasions, and from 1969 to 1971 was the Affiliate Artist at the Council of the Arts in Westchester County, New York, in an experimental program designed to build audiences outside the traditional concert setting. Guinn now teaches at the University of Michigan.

Also making his debut with the Boston Symphony is Mallory Walker. A native of New Orleans, he earned his BA degree in history at Occidental College in Los Angeles. After serving in the US Army Chorus, he joined the Metropolitan Opera Studio. and subsequently launched his career in Europe as the leading Mozart tenor of the Cologne and Stuttgart Operas.

Other Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts during the week of March 27 include Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the Orchestra with piano soloist Malcolm Frager at the Ninth Concert of the Tuesday "A" series, Tuesday evening, March 28 at 8:30 p.m., and at the sixth and final concert of the Thursday "A" series, Thursday evening, March 30 at 8:30 p.m. The concert includes Glinka's Polonaise and Krakoviak from "A life for the Tsar." Borodin's Symphony no. 2, and Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2.

SUBURBAN PRESS AND RECORDER
NATICK, MASS.
W. 5,300

MAR 30 1972 New England Newsclip

Nothing to do?

Try these...

MUSIC LOVERS CAN CATCH the last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of "Spectrum" concerts this Friday and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the orchestra in a concert entitled "Four Religious Ceremonies," featuring joint performances with the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum of Bach's Cantata no. 4 and the BSO's first performance of Des Prez' "La deploration de Jehan Okeghem." The Collegium Musicum is a new mixed chorus at Harvard University and has just returned from a tour to Montreal. The Bach Cantata also marks the BSO debut of Mallory Walker, a leading Mozart tenor in European opera companies, and baritone Leslie Gunn, a native of Texas and a teacher at the University of Michigan. All in all, a promising program of music for the [illegible] season, but be sure to phone ahead for [illegible] about tickets.

CRIMES AGAINST WOMEN is the topic of a panel slated for April 3 in Dwight Auditorium, Framingham State College. Sponsored by West Suburban Women's Abortion Coalition, panel will feature discussions of rape, forced sterilization, anti-lesbianism, women in prison and forced motherhood. Panel starts at 8 p.m.

LOOKING AHEAD a few weeks, there will be another old book lover's extravaganza beginning April 12 when the Women's Committee of the Children's Hospital Medical Center opens its 18th Yankee Bookstall at Horticultural Hall. Hours are 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. daily, and 1 to 5 p.m. on Sundays through April 17. Selections, completely unpredictable, run from aardvarks through Zen, with prices as low as a nickle. Horticultural Hall is at the corner of Huntington and Mass. avenues in Boston.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 75,000

APR 11 1972 New England Newsclip

Tilson Thomas

Refracting The Musical Spectrum

BY RICHARD BUELL

After just one season the BSO "Spectrum" concerts have become an indispensable part of the local musical scene. Perhaps "indispensable part" is a misleading way of putting it: the last thing we would want to suggest about Mr. Thomas's brainchild was that it was an institutional good gray conscience of any kind. On the contrary: frivolity, didacticism, innovation, a sense of mission and what have you have all been present at each event, and we can't imagine that such a heady mixture of ingredients will ever be quite stabilized. Blessings be for that!

"Four Religious Ceremonies" was the heading for the recent program, which had J.S. Bach, David del Tredici, Josquin des Prez and Olivier Messiaen wedged into queasy proximity. As usual, there was a bonus at the beginning: the ancient "troped Gregorian chant" that Bach used as the cantus firmus in his Cantata (BWV 4) "Christ lag in Todesbanden," which was played immediately afterwards. The offstage performance of the brief chant was a kind of living footnote to music history, and as such was valuable to hear, but there was an onstage happening at the same time that might have struck the credulous as evidence of divine intervention: very slowly, and very steadily, a large cluster of speakers made its way from the ceiling to a point just above and behind the podium. If ever there was a time for a pronouncement, here it was; after all, this is Massachusetts, and there are laws against blasphemy on the books.

Fortunately, there was nothing to report on that score. But if Jehovah was not angry, Johann Sebastian Bach might have been. This "Christ lag in Todesbanden" was the weirdest Bach performance I have experienced since the days of Hermann Scherchen, who was noted for subjecting the Leipzig master to a good deal of reembalming, tattooing and amputation. This rendition was one conceived for a big hall, with strings giving off their fruitiest utmost, the big house organ gooing everything up, and the chorus encouraged to aspirate drawn out vowels in the hallowed German tradition ("ah-ha-ha-ha-ha-men"). It wasn't consistently like that; "Es war ein wunderlicher Kreig" had its moments of unexpected daintiness, and the thing was certainly not deficient in effect. Mallory Walker, tenor, and Leslie Guinn, baritone, were in vocal quality several cuts above the average, and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum threw themselves into the fray with great enthusiasm. There was not one second of boredom.

Next came "Pop Pourri," by David del Tredici, another eschewer of boredom. This piece employs episodes from "Alice in Wonderland" and the Litany of the Blessed Virgin Mary, with the Bach chorale "Es ist genug" ("I've had it") as interstitial mucilage. What can one say of Mr. del Tredici's several tonal idioms? In "Turtle Soup" those two slurpy saxes just might have dropped in out of a dance orchestra of the 1930's; and the "Litany" contained an accurate simulation of Roman Catholic devotional music at its most glutinous, with sarcastic blib-blibs from plucked strings adding to the general glut and satiety of it all. Phyllis Bryn-Julson is one of your phenomenally accurate new music canaries; and though in amplification her soprano had a metallic, boxy quality, as if it were coming from a huge, but still very cheap, transistor radio, nothing that Mr. del Tredici confronted her with could fluster her. The Jabberwock episode was simply horrific, and very funny, too. The arraying of dense, gritty sonorities here was little short of diabolical, and the Jabberwock died his definitive, high-decibel death in such a way that I wondered what the composer had been doing in the golden period of Japanese horror movies. It should also be noted that Alice, as depicted here, is a singularly unpleasant child, the kind, so prevalent today, that you would suspect of shooting up Pepsodent and SaniFlush.

This was pretty exhausting, and Olivier Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorem," which was rendered after the intermission, provided anything but relief. The composer writes that "its instrumentation intends it for vast spaces: churches, cathedrals and even performances in the open air and on mountain heights . . ." It may be that Messiaen has rediscovered massive simplicity and that the color slides of Chichen Itza, India and Egypt brought some listeners close to the composer's visions at the time of this work's creation. But somehow or other it didn't work. All those brasses and gongs made an impressive din, not much below the pain threshold, and the views were lovely, but it was more like kindergarten rhythm play on a cosmic scale. By far the eeriest effect was unintentional: the shadows of conductor Thomas's arms and shoulders, thrown some sixty feet across the ceiling of Symphony Hall.

This hardly displayed all the facets of Messiaen's capacious and original mind, a mind that has at various times explored the music of the East, Gregorian chant and ornithology. "Oiseaux exotiques," recently conducted by Gunther Schuller at the New England Conservatory, is a strong example of the latter. In comparing it with "Et exspecto," it may be fair to say that the composer's imagination is more profitably involved with birds than with the monuments they deface.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,012 SUN. 566,377

MAR 29 1972 New England Newsclip

QUODLIBET / By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Del Tredici's 'Pop-pourri' mixes 'Alice' and Bach

DAVID DEL TREDICI
. . . Tweedledee setting

I asked David Del Tredici, whose "Pop-pourri" is getting its real premiere at the Boston Symphony Spectrum concerts this Friday and Saturday fits for the news about himself first.

The 35-year-old, Berkeley- and Princeton-trained composer, pupil of Milhaud (who encouraged him at Aspen to switch from pianist to composer), Sessions, and Kim, said that he had spent the last six months writing at the artists' colony at Yaddo, Saratoga Springs, and that after his current sabbatical, he will not return to Harvard, where he began to teach five years ago.

"It feels marvelous to have quit, also to have quit rather than get fired, which seems to be more the tradition there. Of course, I haven't really faced it yet, and it meant giving up an awful lot of security." For a while, Del Tredici says, he can afford to be unemployed (or self-employed), but he expects eventually to return to teaching. "What I'll want is something part-time, which Harvard is not particularly sympathetic to." What got him down was meetings, committees, departmental politics, so what he hopes to find is a series of visiting appointments "where you teach but aren't really part of the department. Besides, you can try more things because if they don't like you, they know that you're going away at the end of the year anyhow."

At Yaddo, he was working on "Vintage Alice," a piece for soprano and what he calls a "bursting chamber group," 20 instruments including a folk group ("but it's hell to find accordion players who can count"), and mandolin, commissioned for the Music in the Vineyard concerts of the Paul Masson company in the hills South of San Francisco. It is songs and scenes from "Alice in Wonderland," it includes the originals of the poems Lewis Carroll parodies, for example "Speak gently! it is better far/To rule by love than fear" together with "Speak roughly to your little boy/yAnd beat him when he sneezes." "The Mouse's Tale" is composed so that the pages of score look like the downward-twisting and diminishing tail in "Alice," though it was hard figuring out the music whose notation would produce that shape ("I like restrictions"). He has just finished the "Mad Tea-Party" and was pleased to learn of the "Alice" touch at the outdoor Vineyard concerts where on arrival you are given stiff paper which you fold into a hat that says "Paul Masson."

Del Tredici describes himself as "addicted" to vocal music — "I don't know what I would do without a text"—and particularly to sopranos "because I've crossed paths with so many really good ones like Phyllis (Bryn-Julson) and Benita (Valente)." Ms. Bryn-Julson, amplified, will take part in the "Pop-pourri" performance along with the Boston Symphony the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, and an unnamed rock group, all under the direction of Michael Tison Thomas.

"I had a Joyce period," says Del Tredici, "but now it's all 'Alice.'" His "Alice" period began with the first version of "Pop-pourri" in 1968 — he hesitated, "or does the score say '69? Sometimes when I have a bad year, I move a date up one." "Pop-pourri" was twice performed incomplete and is now about to be heard for the first time in much revised form. There has since been a "Lobster Quadrille," and, thanks to Paul Masson, the "Alice" period continues.

"Pop-pourri" mixes "Alice" with the Litany of the Blessed Virgin Mary and Bach's chorale, "Es ist genug" (It is enough), the one quoted by Berg in his Violin Concerto. The common ground between "Alice" and the Litany is "non-sense," with hypen for the Litany ("It's hypnotic, a hum of words") and without hyphen for "Alice." He quotes: "Somehow it seems to fill my head with ideas, only I don't know exactly what they are!"

The ground plan for "Pop-pourris" is something like this: first "Turtle Soup" ("Alice in Wonderland" for soprano with rock group, which by the way does not play rock music) "but I love using instruments which have no tradition in orchestral music"); then "Jabberwocky" for soprano with rock group and orchestra ("a big, programmatic tone-poem"); the Litany for chorus and orchestra; a second setting of "Turtle Soup," in which soprano and rock group do the first setting backwards, while the newly added orchestra does it in the original direction ("it's a Tweedledum and Tweedledee setting"). The Bach chorale is something like the "Promenade" in Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition": it begins the piece, links sections, increasingly longer fragments are heard on each appearance, and in full form it ends "Pop-pourri."

Had he lived long in "Alice?" "Well, when I was 12, I was the White Rabbit in a production. Actually I shouldn't tell you this: I've never read 'Alice.'"

'Greatest living composer'?

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

WASHINGTON — As long as Stravinsky was alive, it was clear that there was such a thing as the the "greatest living composer." When Stravinsky died last April 6, though music was not about to stop, it was also clear that no one comparable was left, so much so that I stopped thinking about the "greatest living composer" category at all. And I remember how during the summer, Michael Tilson Thomas, then preparing a performance of "Colors of the Celestial City," surprised me by saying in conversation that Olivier Messiaen was now the most likely claimant to that quotation-mark-surrounded title. "Think about it," he said.

I have, off and on. There are composers whose music interests, also moves or excites me more than most of Messiaen's — Elliott Carter is at the top of that list — but now, some months after Thomas's challenge to think about who Messiaen is, I see him as a composer whose best music has tremendous force, a man of sharply defined artistic profile, an incalculably influential teacher (Boulez and Stockhausen being the most famous of his pupils), a man who is grandly, resolutely himself. He, more than anyone else living, is the figure without whom I cannot imagine the recent history of Western music.

On several occasions, Messiaen has given performances in this country of his two-piano music with his wife, Yvonne Loriod. As a performer, he is, however, most renowned as an organist, and last Tuesday he played his first organ concert in America, in the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, Washington. Whatever one's evaluation of the new piece Messiaen composed for that concert — "Meditations on the Mystery of the Holy Trinity," whose 86 minutes made up the whole program — there was no mistaking the sense of occasion that marked the evening. The National Shrine is the largest Catholic church in this country and the seventh-largest church of any denomination anywhere in the world, and long before the concert began, it was filled by an audience of just under 3000, representing at least 30 of the United States (there was, for example, a busload of 50 organ students from the University of Michigan). During the 40-minute intermission, you could at long distance watch the shirt-sleeved Messiaen setting up the pistons for the second half, with Mme. Loriod peering over the ledge of the organ loft from time to time to report on the progress of the audience as it made its way back into the pews.

There were nine Meditations. The components of Messiaen's musical language have been fixed for some time: the rhythmic patterns he has learned from Indian music, the complex pitch and rhythmic shapes of birdcalls from all over the world, and Gregorian chant. To these he has added something new in the Trinity Meditations, something he calls "communicable language," which I understand as an attempt to find a musical analog for the language of angels as described by St. Thomas Aquinas in the "Summa Theologica": "If the angel, through his will, directs his mental concept in order to communicate it to another, immediately the latter perceives it: in this way the angel speaks to another angel."

MUSIC, Page B-16

97

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
MAR 26 1972
New England Newscap

Messiaen composes A to Z music alphabet

97

★ MUSIC
Continued from Page B-13

Messiaen has constructed a musical alphabet in which each letter from a to z has a pitch and duration assigned to it. He has devised special formulas to indicate grammatical cases, and two more for the verb "to be" (a descending figure "because all that exists comes from God, the Being par excellence, the One Who is") and "to have" (the transposed inversion of the former, an ascending figure "because we can always have more by raising ourselves to God"). Through this "communicable language," Messiaen puts into three of his Meditations quotations in French from the "Summa Theologica."

All that was contained in the composer's copiously illustrated 400-word program note, which also provided a theological analysis of each movement as well as a detailed point-to-point description of the musical procedures. Messiaen's associations of colors with music play their part, too, so that he speaks of "the white and gold light of the 6th chord of C major" or of the chosen registration (Swell reeds 16, 8, 4, plus cymbal) as giving "a brilliant golden yellow color, with some violet glint, silver grey, a little tint of brown, of red, and pale green."

It is complicated and naive, as indeed Messiaen's music is altogether a mixture — really and amazingly a mixture, not just a collision — of heterogeneous and even opposite elements and qualities. Among exceedingly expansive movements, he has put as the third section a meditation on "The true relation in God is really identical to the essence," which is over before we are ready for it to have properly begun (of. the Intermezzo in the "Quartet for the End of Time"). The harmony ranges from violently dislocated chord sequences to material that sounds like the organ music in the Saint-Sulpice scene of "Manon" by Massenet (a composer Messiaen admires).

His play with time, rhythm, and form is like that, too: there is the really marvellous freshness, the metric looseness of his birds and Indians and chanting monks, but he is capable as well of squarely mechanical symmetries and given to ponderous repetitions of huge sections ("lest you should think he never could recapture-The first fine careless rapture"). Where, when, how Messiaen's results will be interesting is not always foreseeable. The key to the Meditations on the Mystery of the Holy Trinity is Messiaen's subtext for his 8th Meditation, "God is simple." In the whole work, which seems to me uneven mainly in so far as it is sometimes unconcentrated, the most boldly simple moments are the ones that speak most eloquently, the tender, exceedingly quiet meditation on the Alleluia for All Saints (Messiaen here was thinking about "My yoke is easy and my burden is light"), and many of his birds, the wild shriek of the black woodpecker, instantly contrasted with the muted mm-mm-mm-mm-mm of the owl of Tengmalm, and the call of the yellowhammer (seven times C sharp and one longer D sharp) which ends three of the movements and in fact the whole composition.

And there is in Messiaen the composer always Messiaen the virtuoso, the man capable of enormous delight in how instruments speak. As writing for organ, the Trinity Meditations are brilliant in the extended Liszt-Franck language he has evolved over the years. The National Shrine has a superb Moller organ of the Romantic cathedral type, and Messiaen had spent about ten days there preparing his performance, often beginning practice at 6:30 in the morning. He is an organist whose playing has astonishing rhythmic life, vividness and clarity of color, and dramatic presence — several of his recordings of earlier works of his own are available on imported Ducretet-Thomson records — and he gave a stunning performance here.

OLIVIER MESSIAEN'S musical alphabet.

Just now is a time that provides many opportunities to hear and evaluate Messiaen's music. His recent oratorio, "The Transfiguration," has its United States premiere in Washington the day after tomorrow, and on Easter Sunday Antal Dorati and his forces will take it to Carnegie Hall. Soon after, Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the rare and huge "Turangalila" Symphony in Buffalo, and hope that since both he and Seiji Ozawa know the piece (Ozawa has recorded it for RCA) we can before long have it in Boston, where it has not been heard since Bernstein did it as a very new piece in 1949. As for Boston, two events are worth noting. At the Boston Symphony Spectrum concerts of March 31 and April 1, Thomas will conduct "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum," five meditations on biblical texts for woodwind, brass, and metal percussion, composed 1964, and a super example of Messiaen's visionary, apocalyptic manner. On Sunday afternoon, April 16, the Boston Symphony Chamb r Players' program will include the "Quartet for the End of Time" (the reference is to Revelation 10, 6), written in 1941 while Messiaen was a prisoner-of-war in Germany.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 264,961

APR 1 1972 New England Newsclip

'Extra' Marks Final Concert in BSO Spectrum Series

By HARRY NEVILLE

"Four Religious Ceremonies" is the title of the final concert of this season's Boston Symphony "Spectrum" series. Actually, the program which Michael Tilson Thomas conducted last night included five works for, as has been customary at these concerts, an extra work was performed: an anonymous Renaissance setting of a brief section of the Easter liturgy.

A good thing, too, for otherwise one might have quibbled about the accuracy of title as applied to the announced program, which contained three religious works and one extravagant and elephantine joke. Indisputedly religious were Bach's Cantata No. 4 ("Christ lag in Todesbanden"), Des Prez' "La Deploration de Jehan Okeghem" and Messiaen's "Et Exspecto Resurrectionem Mortuorum." The joke (and I assume the composer's intent was humorous) was David Del Tredici's "Pop-pourri."

"POP-POURRI" is a setting for soprano (Phyllis Bryn-Julson), chorus (Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum), rock group and orchestra of poems from "Alice in Wonderland" and of the Litany of the Blessed Virgin Mary. The work involves two settings of "Turtle Soup" (the second involves the first being played backwards) and one of "Jabberwocky." These and the litany are connected, preceded and concluded by fragments and, finally, the complete version of the Bach chorale "Es ist genug" ("It is enough").

By the time it was over it had, in fact, been quite a bit more than enough. But that too, I suppose, was part of the composer's joke. The setting of the text was so inept that hardly a syllable of Lewis Carroll's poetry was audible. And the orchestral writing was so clumsy and the musical ideas so banal that one supposed, desperately, that Del Tredici must have meant them to be so. A laborious and expensive joke which the audience ate up. It was enough to encourage anyone to become a composer.

THE PERFORMANCE of the cantata was disappointing: an over-large orchestra playing molto vibrato, murky diction from the chorus, and a failure to project the joyousness that is in much of the music. The chorus came back to do some exquisite work in Des Prez' "Deploration," however, and the wind and percussion sections of the orchestra gave a magnificent account of the Messiaen work. The latter was marred only by some very distracting, very unnecessary slide projections. The whole thing will be repeated tonight.

April 3, '72

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR Arts-entertainment 7

Spectrum finale

Rectangular reaches of Symphony Hall could hardly contain the sonority

A troped Gregorian chant for monks that gave ideas to Bach, a "pop-pourri" which scrambled Roman Catholic litanies with Lewis Carroll, a 15th-century lament of a pupil for his teacher, and an expression of faith in man's resurrection gauged for all outdoors — all these on one program. It was called "Four Religious Ceremonies" and it was the third and last, performed on Friday and Saturday evenings at Symphony Hall, of the inventive Boston Symphony Spectrum series, brain-child of conductor Michael Tilson Thomas.

Regrettably, the university holidays in Boston cut down the youthful audience that has swelled previous concerts in this series, although the balconies were full. And while the tremendous enthusiasm that these Spectrum concerts have generated hasn't been limited exclusively to the young, it has drawn and visibly converted a new set of customers to Symphony Hall. Too bad to have timing deprive them of this last special opportunity for this season. However, another year of Spectra under Mr. Thomas is promised for 1972-73.

Very much involved in the proceedings (in three out of four programmed pieces) was the new and excellent Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, directed by F. John Adams. Its male segment opened the concert with a bonus-extra Gregorian chant, introduced by Mr. Thomas as a predecessor to Bach's "Christ lag in Todesbanden." Sung unaccompanied from the right balcony level, it floated etherally through the hall to set the stage for the Bach cantata, performed by chamber orchestra, full chorus, and two soloists — tenor Mallory Walker and baritone Leslie Guinn.

"Christ lag" is in reality an Easter celebration with its stirring message of life's victory over death, and Bach's joyous Easter verses were handsomely conveyed. Singers and instrumentalists were judiciously balanced. The two soloists sang admirably.

The logical designation of David Del Tredici's "Pop-pourri" as a "religious ceremony" is arguable, even though it does contain a setting (quite beautiful) of the Litany of the Blessed Virgin Mary, with bows to Bach. However, its alternation with texts from "Alice in Wonderland" — "Beautiful Soup" and "Jabberwocky" — as cleverly and artfully as they are scored, finally expands the piece's shock value and the wryness of its self-parody and trails off into dullness.

"Pop-pourri" was beautifully performed, first and foremost by soprano-speaker Phyllis Bryn-Julson, the Collegium, the orchestra, and a formidable standup quartet — Felix Viscuglia (soprano saxophone), Francis Nizzari (soprano and tenor sax), Robert Karol (electric guitar), and William Rhein (bass guitar). Mr. Del Tredici has come up with some intriguing sounds for all of them, even though his reasons for doing so are scarcely well documented, as his program note admits.

Nothing uncertain about the heart-rending "Déploration de Jehan Okeghem," sung by the Collegium, and composed by Josquin Des Prez upon the departure of his mentor, Okeghem. Although following the eulogistic custom of the time, Josquin nevertheless has translated his feeling of loss into rich and moving musical terms. It was beautifully shaped by Mr. Thomas and performed by the singers.

Last but not least, the first Boston performance of Olivier Messiaen's "Et Exspecto Resurrectionem Mortuorum," composed for "vast spaces: churches, cathedrals, and even performances in the open air and on mountain heights . . ."

On Friday, the rectangular reaches of Symphony Hall could hardly contain the tremendous spine-shattering sonority of this noble, awe-inspiring testament of faith, told in terms of woodwind, brass, but principally percussion. Bells, gongs, and the largest tam tam ever to shiver Symphony Hall's timbers reverberated eloquently and continually through the work's five parts in a language more outspoken and overwhelming than anything one has heard from Messiaen before. It was the kind of all-enveloping rhythmic clamor to make the longest hair stand on end, but all those decibels still conveyed the Messiaen spirit of wonder and belief.

Shifting color slides of vast and unusual architectural forms accompanied the playing, but nothing was needed really to abet the visceral impact of this music. Several fled the hall. But the majority stayed to cheer the orchestra and particularly Mr. Thomas, whose creativity has its greatest monument so far in this exciting Spectrum series.

L. Sn.

BSO premieres 'Pop-pourri'

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The best thing by far to come out of the Boston Symphony Spectrum concert Michael Tilson Thomas conducted in Symphony Hall last night was the premiere of "Pop-pourri" by David Del Tredici.

"Pop-Pourri" is a big piece for amplified soprano, mixed chorus, amplified rock group, and orchestra. It is built about an "Alice in Wonderland" triptych: two settings of "Turtle Soup," the second being simultaneously a straight repeat and a repeat back-to-front of the first, the two enclosing "Jabberwocky" as center panel. Between the first serving of "Soup" and "Jabberwocky," however, there comes the Litany of the Blessed Virgin Mary. To that you add one more element, Bach's choral, "Es ist genug," whose first phrase begins the whole work. The sections of "Pop-pourri" are separated (or linked?) by increasingly longer quotations of the chorale until the piece is brought to an end by its first and only full statement.

These things live more comfortably together than you might think: the "verbal hum," as Del Tredici calls it, of the hypnotically repetitious, catalogue-like Litany and the Lewis Carroll nonsense, for example; or, on another level, the "oooooo" of "Turtle Soup" and Bach's chorale text. More effectively, though, they are unified by their music, that surprising whole-tone sequence at the beginning of the chorale tune which so fascinated Alban-Berg, who used it in his Violin Concerto, being the key. All of it, in the end, makes a piece.

I found "Pop-pourri" calculations in balance, the it made a big hit with the audience. My reservations have to do with verbal intelligibility, close to zero except during Bach or when the soprano was speaking. Some of the extremes of register and speed suggest that Del Tredici meant a non-intelligible setting (for still another sort of non-sense?). In part, I think, the performance suffered from miscalculations in blance, the soprano, though amplified, being badly battered by the even more amplified rock group.

The soprano was Phyllis Bryn-Julson. Her singing was absolutely astounding, most so with respect to her cool negotiation of a bizarrely ornate line; her speaking, with its flat mid-Western vowels and unpleasantries like "Turdle Soup" was jarring for "Alice." The Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum, prepared by F. John Adams, ably sang the choral parts.

With Harvard-Radcliffe a cappella, Thomas conducted a slightly sentimentalized performance of the Lamentation written about 1495 by Josquin Des Prez on the death of his teacher, Okeghem. The Collegium Musicum also provided slender-voiced, but clean singing in Bach's Easter Cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden" (Christ lay in the bonds of death), though Thomas's interpretation was capricious and silly in the extreme, and at times insultingly thoughtless. Mallory Walker was a competent tenor soloist; the verse for solo bass, however, was sung by a person who repeatedly had to rewrite Bach's music because the notes were not in his voice.

In Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum" (not a first Boston performance as claimed in the program; it was done four years ago by Frederik Prausnitz at the New England Conservatory), Thomas decided that a slide show was necessary. The projector was noisy as hell, which was annihilating to a piece of such magnificent silences, and beyond that it was a painful exhibition of vulgarity of concept, bad judgement, and clumsy execution. I think the music was well played, though Thomas choose to make it difficult to pay much attention.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 381,012 SUN. 566,377

APR 1 1972 New England Newsclip

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 210,003

MAR 16 1972 New England Newsclip

★

Members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who are going on the mini tour to New York with the orchestra over April 6-9 weekend will have a chance for leisurely discussion on many subjects with the musicians. They will be having cocktails and lunch together on the special train taking them to the Penn Station and will be meeting at the New York hospitalities arranged for them.

At Monday afternoon's cocktail party given by Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb in her spacious, cheery Beacon st. apartment, Talcott Banks, president of the trustees of the BSO, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock and Mrs. Richard Thompson, who inaugurated the trip, talked over the four-day schedule.

There will be a reception in honor of Arthur Fiedler following his Boston Pops concert (first time he has played in New York City) celebrating the anninversary of Carnegie Hall. Another reception in honor of the BSO and New York "Friends" will follow a concert conducted by William Steinberg at Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center.

The John H. Stookeys are hosting a cocktail party at their Fifth ave. home and on the return trip to Boston on the ninth, there will be gaiety aplenty. Tab for the "Mini" is $350 of which $75 will benefit the BSO, the "Friends" top project. They just finished raising $59,011 last weekend with the amazing Musical Marathon that brought requests for over 300 performances of music by the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

MAR 18 1972 New England Newsclip

MEDLEY/BILL FRIPP

. . . The trustees and council of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take a mini-trip to New York April 6-9, hear Arthur Fiedler conduct the Pops at Carnegie and William Steinberg conduct Symphony at Philharmonic, returning by Amtrak.

H.T.
SAT, APRIL 15, 1972

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

Boston Symphony's Mini-Tour Adventure Highlights Recounted

PRIVATE RAILROAD CARS are nearly as extinct as the buffalo. However, three of them were attached to the regularly scheduled Southern Crescent when it left the South Station, April 6.

On both sides of the three cars were banners proclaiming: "Boston Symphony Orchestra Special," and although the occupants of the three cars disembarked in New York, the three cars, complete with banners, continued all the way to Alabama and Florida.

This was the Mini-Tour of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and since none of them wanted it known that they were away, because of possible burglaries, they asked that their names be left secret until they returned safely home. Now it can be told.

Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, one of the Symphony's two women trustees, and the guiding light of the Symphony's European tour last spring, was at the helm again. She says: "This trip again pointed out the extraordinary rapport that exists between the orchestra and across the footlights, the Friends, trustees and management." Other stars of the trip were Mrs. George Lee Sargent, Mrs. William K. Russell and Mrs. Frank G. Allen.

MOTOR COACHES met the train at Penn Station in New York and deposited the travelers at the New York Sheraton, where they spent three days. That evening, Arthur Fiedler conducted the first Boston Pops concert at Carnegie Hall.

Friday was reserved for shopping in the rain until a reception at the John Hoyt Stookeys' apartment before William Steinberg's concert at Philharmonic Hall. Afterwards a reception was held on the Promenade Level.

On Saturday, 178 orchestra members and their wives joined Boston and New York Friends at luncheon at the Colony Club, and in the evening, William Steinberg conducted Bruckner's 8th Symphony at Carnegie Hall.

Fran Fahnestock tells us: "The real highlight was their return trip to Boston on our own private Amtrak train. The cars were named William Steinberg, Arthur Fiedler and Romeo and Juliet, and the diner was called Gaite Parisienne." (Although the luncheon menu featured breast of Cornish hen "a la Kiev.")

She continued: "All the Friends and about half the members of the orchestra, their wives and many children boarded the train at Penn Station. There was plenty of liquid refreshment and everyone played belotte, the 'official card game' of the Boston Symphony."

"BUT," SHE ADDED, the trip was not without disasters. Lois Schaefer, flute player of the orchestra, got locked in the ladies' room! She was finally rescued by a trainman."

The train made a stop at New Haven and the travelers stepped outside to stretch their legs to the tune of Purcell's "Trumpet Voluntary" played by Roger Voisin, to the amazement of passengers waiting for other trains. Then back in the train, luncheon was served and gypsy strolling music was supplied by BSO violinist William Waterhouse.

Among those enjoying this weekend of togetherness were Mr. and Mrs. Philip K. Allen of Andover, Talcott Banks and Mrs. Donald Brown of Lincoln, and Mrs. Charles P. Howard, Mrs. George Sherman, Mrs. J. Denny May, Miss Dorothy Seccomb, Mrs. Richard Cary Curtis, Dr. Kenneth Graham, Miss Mildred Bixby, Mrs. William K. Walters and Miss Wanda C. Gray of Boston.

Also, Mr. and Mrs. Chase Kimball of Milton, Mrs. Alfred Willmann of Belmont, Mrs. K. Peabody Brewster of Chestnut Hill, Mrs. Gardner G. Emmons and Mrs. George A. Foster of Concord, N.H., Mr. and Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray and Mrs. Victor Jones of Cambridge, Mrs. Royal Leith of Dedham, Mrs. Samuel A. Levine of Newton Centre, Mrs. Nancy Carter of Weston and Mrs. Seymour Gray of Brookline.

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER, JANUARY 16, 1972

Rose Walsh

'Mini-Tour' to Manhattan Shining Junket With BSO

Last summer's maxi-tour through Europe of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the world-famous BSO was a once in a lifetime event, and, according to the group who made the thrilling safari, something to be long remembered. As a result the clever entrepreneurs, who always come up with great ideas to financially help the Orchestra, were besieged with queries on "What can we do this year?"

The indomitable ladies, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Trustee and Friend extraordinaire of the BSO; Mrs. Richard Thompson and Mrs. Albert Goodhue, put their heads together, did a bit of magic wand-waving; consulted their various contacts, and whipped up a "Mini-Tour" to New York—they call it "a shining weekend to share with the orchestra"—for April 6, 7, 8 and 9.

•

Invitations with the complete itinerary are in the mail for The Friends (only members of the Council of Friends are eligible) and the acceptances are limited to 100.

Rose Walsh

The tour-goers will leave Boston for New York on a private train Thursday morning April 6, luncheon aboard. That evening Arthur Fiedler and the Pops will commemorate the anniversary of Carnegie Hall with a fabulous concert, followed by a reception for orchestra and Friends.

Part of the next day is free for shopping, theater, or whatever pleases the tourists. But prior to a concert at Lincoln Center, with William Steinberg conducting the BSO, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Stookey (he is an overseer of the BSO) will host a party at their Fifth Avenue house.

The "Promenade" of Philharmonic Hall will be the setting of a large reception in honor of the Symphony and its New York friends of the BSO, as weil as all the "Mini-Tour" guests.

Saturday, April 8, a gala luncheon is scheduled at the Colony Club. In the evening Mr. Steinberg will conduct the BSO at Carnegie Hall. Other parties along the way also have been planned.

Sunday is home-going day on the BSO train with cars named for musical directors, composers and symphonies.

All this is offered for $350, of which $75 will be a gift to the orchestra.

•

Among the dedicated Friends who shared the work of sending out invitations were Mrs. Garrett Bowne, Mrs. Raymond Ellis, Mrs. John T. G. Nichols, Mrs. Nelson Darling, Mrs. Frederic B. Mayo, Mrs. Walter McKim, Mrs. Fairfield Raymond, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Walter Watson II and Mrs. Edward L. Francis.

Along with Mrs. W. Russell Peabody, Mrs. William J. Mixter, Jr. (chairman of the Council Areas); Mrs. Edward L. Bond, Mrs. T. Mitchell Hastings, Mrs. Robert Miller, Mrs. Robert F. Daley, Mrs. John Mecham, Mrs. Richard Banks, Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb, Miss Constance Learned, Mrs. Vernon Alden, Mrs. Robert T. Hamlin, Mrs. Robert H. Hopkins, Mrs. Victor Jones, Mrs. William D. Manice and Mrs. Robert G. Weise.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

APR 18 1972 New England Newsclip

MEDLEY / By BILL FRIPP

The recent Friends of the Boston Symphony mini-tour to New York was not without its anxious moments: Flautist Lois Schaefer got locked in the ladies' room and had to be reseued by a trainman.

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,818

APR 11 1972

Photos by Pierre Scherman

From the left: Annette and Herbert Weissenstein, Kay Peabody Brewster, Phyllis Levine, Angelica Russell with Forester Smith, Hessie Sargent, Frances Fahnestock.

TOGETHERNESS, BOSTON STYLE: "We're kind of like the groupies," laughed Frances Fahnestock, who arranged that when the Boston Pops Orchestra played in New York for the first time last week, the faithful Friends of the Symphony could go along for the four days of fun.

The round of parties and receptions were arranged with one thing in mind: To help "build rapport across the footlights" between the orchestra and its supporters.

The highlight of the "togetherness" thing was a "Some-Like-It-Hot" type ride back to Boston early Sunday morning via a plush appointed five-car party train with a bar in each car. "My father was a railroad man," explained Fran (her grandfather was president of the old Denver Rio Grande and Illinois Central back in Jay Gould days) and, "we did it for nostalgia and the grand old manner of symphony touring."

Transportation Secretary John Volpe, who helped Fran get the train idea together didn't come on the tour, and neither did David Rockefeller, Jr., assistant BSO manager, who was "too tired from the Chaplin party to leave Boston." But some 48 of the city's most prominent old guard did, including Hessie Sargent, Angelica Russell, and Kay Peabody Brewster.

The Ladies remained staunchly Bostonian in their white pearls, little daytime suits, sometimes topped with hats, and enjoyed New York. But said one who hadn't left Boston in years: "It's like Paris ... all the good places are gone, and it's just a big dirty, dangerous city."

AT LINCOLN CENTER—BSO musical director William Steinberg and Frances Fahnstock, head of Friends of the Boston Symphony, are at bottom of photo in this view of the buffet held at Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center, after the concert Friday evening in New York.

MEMBERS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ENTERTAIN DURING A STOP AT THE NEW HAVEN RAILROAD STATION (Ed Fitzgerald photos)

Train adds extra touch to BSO mini-tour

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

There is something very human about passenger trains which, for all their sky-coach and first-class lounges, the airlines continue to design out of planes.

It has to do with seats big enough to be comfortable (and only two across), windows you can see out of, full-size dinner ware, dining tables with clean linen and chairs facing each other (which encourages conversation), china plates, and food more substantial than liliputian filet mignon.

Yes, for all my impatience to "get there," I have to admit that four hours on Amtrack's Boston Symphony Orchestra Special yesterday was far more pleasant than the four-hour flight I took recently on one of those super-luxurious 747s.

The BSO Friends chose the train for its mini-tour to New York this weekend (actually Thursday through Sunday) for just these features of congenial travel. "The big pitch" was the special rapport that exists between musicians, trustees, and patrons, and the train provided the occasion for one more round of partying.

The Friends' tour centered around two performances by the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall and Carnegie Hall and by the New York debut (can you believe it?) of the Pops with Arthur Fiedler. It served as a modified reprise of the European tour last April in which Friends accompanied the Orchestra.

"There is no other orchestra in the country that has this kind of relationship with its supporters," said Mrs. Harris Fahnestock who organized the itinerary of receptions, dinners and concert performances attended by 48 Friends.

"You take an orchestra like the New York Philharmonic — there's almost always a pitched battle running between players and trustees and the symphony society," agreed violinist Michel Sasson who was trying to break up a wrestling match between two of his three sons who came along on the trip.

The train, rented entirely for the return trip from Amtrak, did not, in fact, prove to be the new, refurbished model advertised. Only one of the three cars had been redone, but it had attractive, comfortable blue chairs, carpeting and a red-blazered stewardess (who however didn't seem to do much but walk up and down the aisles and smile a lot.)

Like the train food I remember from childhood, this was very good. The menu, included asparagus vinaigrette, chicken kiev, beans almandine, there seems to be no other way to fix them, and excellent cheesecake. This was accompanied by gypsy violin music by William Waterhouse.

There were, of course, the usual musicians' stories. One of the more usual sorts dealing with a performance Wednesday night of Berlioz's "Romeo et Juliette" which the musicians described as "a new drw" and "Chaos" which was praised by the New York critics.

Another told by Sasson described an evening in Philadelphia's Chinatown during Chinese New Year. The BSO music director designate "carries this shoulder bag and on this particular night it was stuffed with big red firecrackers. After dinner, we started lighting the firecrackers and tossing them in the street until a policeman came along and almost arrested Seigi."

Or the story attributed to Erich Leinsdorf about Lorin Maazel, the new conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra. Before he was named to the post, Maazel was voted as one of the conductors the orchestra would least like to see given the position. So, according to the Leinsdorf story, Maazel will try to seek some unanimity in the orchestra when he takes over next year. He'll probably fire the two musicians who voted for him.

"Seriously, though, that kind of thing would never happen in the BSO," Sasson said of the Cleveland situation. "At least we can talk to the trustees and management — even about selecting conductors. And we can drink and party together too, and that is very rare. It really gives you a good feeling."

MUSICAL DISCUSSION — Arthur Fiedler (left) talks with Mr. and Mrs. Philip Allen of Andover after the first Pops Concert ever in New York City.

NEW YORK HOSTS—The New York Friends of the Boston Symphony held a buffet for their Boston counterparts at the home of Mr. and Mrs. John Stookey.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,012 SUN. 566,377
APR 10 1972 New

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

April 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Steinberg, Leading Bostonians, Offers a 'Romeo' With Reserve

By DONAL HENAHAN

Few important composers offer a performer more tempting opportunities to wallow in vulgarity than does Berlioz. There is, even his warmest partisans might admit, a streak of show business in him that must be treated warily.

Perhaps it was some such caution that ruled William Steinberg's approach to Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette" at Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night. Mr. Steinberg conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which for many years under Charles Munch virtually owned this magnificent score, with extraordinary reserve, refusing the theatrical gambits presented in such profusion by the work.

Mr. Steinberg, while perhaps going too far in his effort to make Berlioz into a solid citizen, nevertheless drew many dreamlike scenes ,and the orchestra stressed the score's pervasive delicacy in one magnificently played page after another.

Flow, but Little Contrast

The performance of so rarely heard a masterpiece, complete to the last note, was welcome and then some. But, for all its good grooming, Mr. Steinberg's reading lacked many of the qualities that can make this "Dramatic Symphony" (Berlioz's own subtitle) an indelible experience. There was a steady expertly regulated flow, but little contrast between sections; sonority and sobriety, but not nearly enough rhythmic impulse or imagination. It was as if Mr. Steinberg were determined to transform the Berlioz into a Mendelssohn oratorio.

For the occasion, the New England Conservatory Chorus came in two sizes—Bach-size before Juliet's funeral procession, and 100-strong after. Both sang more than acceptably.

The vocal soloists were Joanna Simon, mezzo-soprano; Kenneth Riegel, tenor, and Ara Berberian, bass, and they too served ably. Mr. Berberian, assigned the task of bringing life to Friar Laurence's final sermon, adopted an ecclesiastical tone that entirely matched Mr. Steinberg's idea of Berlioz.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

APR 5 1972

Music & Dance Today

Metropolitan Opera: "Salome," with Leonie Rysanek, Mignon Dunn, Gerhard Stolze, Thomas Stewart, John Macurdy; Karl Boehm, conductor; 8.

New York City Opera: "Rigoletto," with Patricia Wise, Syble Young, Richard Fredricks, Michele Molese, William Ledbetter; Giuseppe Morelli, conductor; 8.

Netherlands Dance Theater: "Situation," "Concerto Grosso," "Grosse Fugue"; Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8.

Pennsylvania Ballet: "Bagatelles" (N. Y. premiere), "Pas de Trois," "Carmina Burana"; City Center, 7:30. Opening two-week engagement.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: William Steinberg, conductor; Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," with Joanna Simon, Kenneth Riegel, Ara Berberian; New England Conservatory Chorus; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

APR 15 1972

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY—At Philharmonic Hall. William Steinberg, that solid and reasonable conductor, turned into a man of mystery when he led the Bostonians, soloists (Joanna Simon, Kenneth Riegel, Ara Berberian), and the New England Conservatory Chorus in a disquietingly unsuccessful performance of Berlioz' passionate "Roméo et Juliette." Why was a carefully-subtitled "Dramatic Symphony" turned into a pallid and anemic fragmented cantata? Why were singers directed to take bows and to file off-stage between related sections? Why a mood-destroying intermission for an integrated work requiring about 95 minutes of playing time? Passing, surpassing strange. —G.J.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

MAR 31 1972

Boston at Philharmonic

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts a complete concert performance of Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet at the fifth and final pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall Wednesday and next Friday. Both concerts begin at 8:30 p.m.

Soloists are mezzo-soprano Joanna Simon, tenor Kenneth Riegel, and bass Ara Berberian with the New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke de Varon, conductor.

Saturday evening, April 8 at 8, Steinberg conducts the fourth and final concert of this season at Carnegie Hall. The concert is devoted to a performance of Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

Thursday evening at 8, Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Orchestra in Carnegie Hall in a special retrospective program in conjunction with the celebration of the 80th Anniversay Season of Carnegie Hall. This concert marks the first time Fiedler has conducted the Boston Pops in Carnegie Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY—At Philharmonic Hall. William Steinberg, that solid and reasonable conductor, turned into a man of mystery when he led the Bostonians, soloists (Joanna Simon, Kenneth Riegel, Ara Berberian), and the New England Conservatory Chorus in a disquietingly unsuccessful performance of Berlioz' passionate "Roméo et Juliette." Why was a carefully-subtitled "Dramatic Symphony" turned into a pallid and anemic fragmented cantata? Why were singers directed to take bows and to file off-stage between related sections? Why a mood-destroying intermission for an integrated work requiring about 95 minutes of playing time? Passing, surpassing strange. —G.J.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

APR 15 1972

MUSIC

JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT
FRANKLIN, N. H.
W. 3,302

APR 18 1972 New England Newsclip

Donald M. Hovey, a student at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, is also a member of the N.E. Conservatory Chorus. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was in New York recently and gave two performances of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliette" Dramatic Symphony in which the Chorus has an important role. While in the city Mr. Hovey was the luncheon guest of Ben Stinchfield, who had attended one of the performances of the Symphony.

HOUSE AND GARDEN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,253,000

APR 1972

April around New York

Apr. 1-9. International Automobile Show. The annual four-wheel spectacular. N. Y. Coliseum.

Apr. 2, 3. Antiques Show. YWCA, 515 North St., White Plains, New York.

Apr. 5. Milwaukee Symphony Orchestra, Schermerhorn conducting; Eileen Farrell, soprano. Carnegie Hall.

Apr. 5, 7. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Steinberg conducting Berlioz's Romeo and Juliet with soloists. Philharmonic Hall.

Apr. 6. Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting. Believe it or not, the first time in New York. Carnegie Hall.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 816,132 S. 1,407,549

April 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Steinberg, Leading Bostonians, Offers a 'Romeo' With Reserve

By DONAL HENAHAN

Few important composers offer a performer more tempting opportunities to wallow in vulgarity than does Berlioz. There is, even his warmest partisans might admit, a streak of show business in him that must be treated warily.

Perhaps it was some such caution that ruled William Steinberg's approach to Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette" at Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night. Mr. Steinberg conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which for many years under Charles Munch virtually owned this magnificent score, with extraordinary reserve, refusing the theatrical gambits presented in such profusion by the work.

Mr. Steinberg, while perhaps going too far in his effort to make Berlioz into a solid citizen, nevertheless drew many dreamlike scenes ,and the orchestra stressed the score's pervasive delicacy in one magnificently played page after another.

Flow, but Little Contrast

The performance of so rarely heard a masterpiece, complete to the last note, was welcome and then some. But, for all its good grooming, Mr. Steinberg's reading lacked many of the qualities that can make this "Dramatic Symphony" (Berlioz's own subtitle) an indelible experience. There was a steady expertly regulated flow, but little contrast between sections; sonority and sobriety, but not nearly enough rhythmic impulse or imagination. It was as if Mr. Steinberg were determined to transform the Berlioz into a Mendelssohn oratorio.

For the occasion, the New England Conservatory Chorus came in two sizes—Bach-size before Juliet's funeral procession, and 100-strong after. Both sang more than acceptably.

The vocal soloists were Joanna Simon, mezzo-soprano; Kenneth Riegel, tenor, and Ara Berberian, bass, and they too served ably. Mr. Berberian, assigned the task of bringing life to Friar Laurence's final sermon, adopted an ecclesiastical tone that entirely matched Mr. Steinberg's idea of Berlioz.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

APR 5 1972

Music & Dance Today

Metropolitan Opera: "Salome," with Leonie Rysanek, Mignon Dunn, Gerhard Stolze, Thomas Stewart, John Macurdy; Karl Boehm, conductor; 8.

New York City Opera: "Rigoletto," with Patricia Wise, Syble Young, Richard Fredricks, Michele Molese, William Ledbetter; Giuseppe Morelli, conductor; 8.

Netherlands Dance Theater: "Situation," "Concerto Grosso," "Grosse Fugue"; Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8.

Pennsylvania Ballet: "Bagatelles" (N. Y. premiere), "Pas de Trois," "Carmina Burana"; City Center, 7:30. Opening two-week engagement.

Boston Symphony Orchestra: William Steinberg, conductor; Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," with Joanna Simon, Kenneth Riegel, Ara Berberian; New England Conservatory Chorus; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

APR 15 1972

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY—At Philharmonic Hall. William Steinberg, that solid and reasonable conductor, turned into a man of mystery when he led the Bostonians, soloists (Joanna Simon, Kenneth Riegel, Ara Berberian), and the New England Conservatory Chorus in a disquietingly unsuccessful performance of Berlioz' passionate "Roméo et Juliette." Why was a carefully-subtitled "Dramatic Symphony" turned into a pallid and anemic fragmented cantata? Why were singers directed to take bows and to file off-stage between related sections? Why a mood-destroying intermission for an integrated work requiring about 95 minutes of playing time? Passing, surpassing strange. —G.J.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

MAR 31 1972

Boston at Philharmonic

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts a complete concert performance of Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet at the fifth and final pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall Wednesday and next Friday. Both concerts begin at 8:30 p.m.

Soloists are mezzo-soprano Joanna Simon, tenor Kenneth Riegel, and bass Ara Berberian with the New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke de Varon, conductor.

Saturday evening, April 8 at 8, Steinberg conducts the fourth and final concert of this season at Carnegie Hall. The concert is devoted to a performance of Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

Thursday evening at 8, Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Orchestra in Carnegie Hall in a special retrospective program in conjunction with the celebration of the 80th Anniversay Season of Carnegie Hall. This concert marks the first time Fiedler has conducted the Boston Pops in Carnegie Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY—At Philharmonic Hall. William Steinberg, that solid and reasonable conductor, turned into a man of mystery when he led the Bostonians, soloists (Joanna Simon, Kenneth Riegel, Ara Berberian), and the New England Conservatory Chorus in a disquietingly unsuccessful performance of Berlioz' passionate "Roméo et Juliette." Why was a carefully-subtitled "Dramatic Symphony" turned into a pallid and anemic fragmented cantata? Why were singers directed to take bows and to file off-stage between related sections? Why a mood-destroying intermission for an integrated work requiring about 95 minutes of playing time? Passing, surpassing strange. —G.J.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

APR 15 1972

MUSIC

JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT
FRANKLIN, N. H.
W. 3,302

APR 18 1972 New England Newsclip

Donald M. Hovey, a student at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, is also a member of the N.E. Conservatory Chorus. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was in New York recently and gave two performances of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliette" Dramatic Symphony in which the Chorus has an important role. While in the city Mr. Hovey was the luncheon guest of Ben Stinchfield, who had attended one of the performances of the Symphony.

HOUSE AND GARDEN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,253,000

APR 1972

April around New York

Apr. 1-9. International Automobile Show. The annual four-wheel spectacular. N. Y. Coliseum.

Apr. 2, 3. Antiques Show. YWCA, 515 North St., White Plains, New York.

Apr. 5. Milwaukee Symphony Orchestra, Schermerhorn conducting; Eileen Farrell, soprano. Carnegie Hall.

Apr. 5, 7. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Steinberg conducting Berlioz's Romeo and Juliet with soloists. Philharmonic Hall.

Apr. 6. Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting. Believe it or not, the first time in New York. Carnegie Hall.

FM GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

APR 1972

During April...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at Carnegie Hall, on the 8th. William Steinberg's entire program is given to Bruckner's Eighth Symphony

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

APR 10 1972

Critic-at-Large

By BYRON BELT

Saturday night William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony filled Carnegie Hall with the splendors of Anton Bruckner's great Eighth Symphony. Although the conductor elected to split the work with an intermission, the cumlative effect was still overwhelming. The performance was perhaps less sublime then one Steinberg led of the Bruckner Seventh a season back, but the mobility of conception and excellence of execution were welcome reminders of the unique quality of composer, conductor and ensemble.

TRAVEL
FLORAL PARK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 279,000

APR 1972

New York

Her Royal Highness Princess Alexandra of Great Britain will be guest of honor at the 45th Anniversary Variety Clubs International Convention at the Hotel Americana April 24. Variety Clubs throughout the world raise funds for underprivileged children, some $10,000,000 annually . . . Arthur Fielder and the Boston Pops Orchestra make their debut at Carnegie Hall April 6 in honor of the 80th anniversary of "the world's greatest concert hall" . .

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

APR 8 1972

Entertainment Events Today

Operas

METROPOLITAN OPERA, Verdi's "Otello," 2; Weber's "Der Freischuetz," 8.
NEW YORK CITY OPERA, New York State Theater, Puccini's "Madama Butterfly," 2; Puccini's "Tosca," 8.
LIGHT OPERA OF MANHATTAN, Jan Hus Playhouse, Gilbert and Sullivan's "Iolanthe," 4 and 8:30.
BEL CANTO OPERA, Madison Avenue Baptist Church, 30 East 31st Street, Bellini's "I Capuletti ed I Montecchi," 7:30.
MANHATTAN SCHOOL OF MUSIC, 120 Claremont Avenue, Kodaly's "Hary Janos," 8.
CHINESE OPERA CLUB, Fashion Institute Theater, 227 West 27th Street, "Lady Precious Stream," "Three Kingdoms" and "The Prime Minister's Daughter," 8.
AMATO OPERA, 319 Bowery, Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor," 8:15.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Carnegie Hall, William Steinberg, conducting, 8.

THE JERSEY JOURNAL
JERSEY CITY, N. J.
D. 86,224 SAT. 79,666

APR 10 1972

Critic-at-Large

By Byron Belt

Saturday night William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony filled Carnegie Hall with the splendors of Anton Bruckner's great Eighth Symphony. Although the conductor elected to split the work with an intermission, the cumulative effect was still overwhelming. The performance was perhaps less sublime than one Steinberg led of the Bruckner Seventh a season back, but the mobility of conception and excellence of execution were welcome reminders of the unique quality of composer, conductor and ensemble.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGER
W. 27,000

APR 20 1972

MUSIC

Mozart At First Presbyterian

5454

By JACK DIETHER

An interesting program by Baird Hastings' Mozart Festival Orchestra, at the First Presbyterian Church on Fifth Avenue, featured the first New York performance of a Violin Concerto in A by Jean-Marie Leclair. It was a work well worth hearing, though the performance sorely lacked a keyboard continuo, and the soloist was distressingly off-pitch at times. But the dozen-odd strings of the orchestra were nearly ideal for Mozart's Divertimento in F, K.138.

Five strings made up the conclusion of the current Schubert cycle at the New School: Alexander Schneider, Annie Kavafian, Walter Trampler, Leslie Parnas, and Laurence Lesser in a rapturous performance of the great Quintet in C. The New School has not only some of the best events, but also some of the best audiences in town. The seats are unreserved, and a good ten minutes before the start every seat is assiduously taken care of by the ushers. Once it starts, everyone remains riveted to the end.

William Steinberg, leading the Boston Symphony, is hardly to be complimented for putting an intermission in the middle of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony (at Philharmonic Hall) and in the middle of Bruckner's Eighth (at Carnegie Hall). The Bruckner symphony, I am told, was performed earlier in Boston by the same conductor without an intermission, and with a concerto before the break. New York audiences are grown-up too, Mr. Steinberg.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

APR 8 1972

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

APR 2 1972

Weekend Music & Dance

TODAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra: William Steinberg, conductor; Bruckner's "Symphony No. 8 in C minor"; Carnegie Hall, 8.

The Classical Scene
by Robert Jacobson

April in New York may not exactly be April in Paris, but there's a hell of a lot more music. And this month you can catch up with a slew of visiting orchestras, North American style. At Carnegie Hall on the 5th, the Milwaukee Symphony, under the guiding hand of Kenneth Schermerhorn, comes to town with Eileen Farrell in Wagner's Wesendonck Songs and "Liebestod" from Tristan. Stravinsky and Strauss complete the program. The next night, the Boston "Pops' makes its first local appearance (!) with Arthur Fiedler and Earl Wild commemorating Carnegie's 80th anniversary season. On the 8th William Steinburg brings in his Pittsburghers for the Bruckner Eighth Symphony, and on the 14th the Toronto Symphony journeys south for the premiere of Morawetz' From the Diary of Anne Frank with the superb Lois Marshall as soloist. Karel Ancerl conducts. Back for its annual visit on the 17th is the Minnesota Symphony with Stanislaw Skrowaczewski leading Mahler's Das Klagende Lied and Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet Suite. His singers are Sheila Armstrong, Maureen Forrester, John Stewart and Brent Ellis. On the 19th and 22nd the brilliant Chicago Symphony is back with Georg Solti. The first night he has Shirley Verrett and Stuart Burrows in Mahler's Das Lied von der Erde, while the second night it's all orchestral with Elliott Carter's Variations for Orchestra, Berlioz' Symphonie fantastique and Strauss' Don Juan. Over at Philharmonic Hall, the Boston Symphony plus Joanna Simon, Kenneth Riegel and Ara Berberian offer the complete Berlioz Romeo and Juliet with Steinberg conducting (5th to 7th).

AFTER DARK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

APR 1972

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,165 SUN. 311,112

APR 6 1972

Boston Orchestra At Carnegie Hall

BOSTON (AP) — After 87 years, the Boston Pops Orchestra is scheduled to play for the first time in New York.

The debut of the orchestra, founded in 1885, is scheduled for today at Carnegie Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its debut in 1887 when it was six years old.

FM GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

APR 1972

During April...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at Carnegie Hall, on the 8th. William Steinberg's entire program is given to Bruckner's Eighth Symphony

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

APR 10 1972

Critic-at-Large

By BYRON BELT

Saturday night William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony filled Carnegie Hall with the splendors of Anton Bruckner's great Eighth Symphony. Although the conductor elected to split the work with an intermission, the cumlative effect was still overwhelming. The performance was perhaps less sublime then one Steinberg led of the Bruckner Seventh a season back, but the mobility of conception and excellence of execution were welcome reminders of the unique quality of composer, conductor and ensemble.

TRAVEL
FLORAL PARK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 279,000

APR 1972

New York

Her Royal Highness Princess Alexandra of Great Britain will be guest of honor at the 45th Anniversary Variety Clubs International Convention at the Hotel Americana April 24. Variety Clubs throughout the world raise funds for underprivileged children, some $10,000,000 annually . . . Arthur Fielder and the Boston Pops Orchestra make their debut at Carnegie Hall April 6 in honor of the 80th anniversary of "the world's greatest concert hall" . .

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

APR 8 1972

Entertainment Events Today

Operas

METROPOLITAN OPERA, Verdi's "Otello," 2; Weber's "Der Freischuetz," 8.
NEW YORK CITY OPERA, New York State Theater, Puccini's "Madama Butterfly," 2; Puccini's "Tosca," 8.
LIGHT OPERA OF MANHATTAN, Jan Hus Playhouse, Gilbert and Sullivan's "Iolanthe," 4 and 8:30.
BEL CANTO OPERA, Madison Avenue Baptist Church, 30 East 31st Street, Bellini's "I Capuletti ed I Montecchi," 7:30.
MANHATTAN SCHOOL OF MUSIC, 120 Claremont Avenue, Kodaly's "Hary Janos," 8.
CHINESE OPERA CLUB, Fashion Institute Theater, 227 West 27th Street, "Lady Precious Stream," "Three Kingdoms" and "The Prime Minister's Daughter," 8.
AMATO OPERA, 319 Bowery, Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor," 8:15.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Carnegie Hall, William Steinberg, conducting, 8.

THE JERSEY JOURNAL
JERSEY CITY, N. J.
D. 86,224 SAT. 79,666

APR 10 1972

Critic-at-Large

By Byron Belt

Saturday night William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony filled Carnegie Hall with the splendors of Anton Bruckner's great Eighth Symphony. Although the conductor elected to split the work with an intermission, the cumulative effect was still overwhelming. The performance was perhaps less sublime than one Steinberg led of the Bruckner Seventh a season back, but the mobility of conception and excellence of execution were welcome reminders of the unique quality of composer, conductor and ensemble.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGER
W. 27,000

APR 20 1972

MUSIC

Mozart At First Presbyterian

By JACK DIETHER

An interesting program by Baird-Hastings' Mozart Festival Orchestra, at the First Presbyterian Church on Fifth Avenue, featured the first New York performance of a Violin Concerto in A by Jean-Marie Leclair. It was a work well worth hearing, though the performance sorely lacked a keyboard continuo, and the soloist was distressingly off-pitch at times. But the dozen-odd strings of the orchestra were nearly ideal for Mozart's Divertimento in F, K.138.

Five strings made up the conclusion of the current Schubert cycle at the New School: Alexander Schneider, Annie Kavafian, Walter Trampler, Leslie Parnas, and Laurence Lesser in a rapturous performance of the great Quintet in C. The New School has not only some of the best events, but also some of the best audiences in town. The seats are unreserved, and a good ten minutes before the start every seat is assiduously taken care of by the ushers. Once it starts, everyone remains riveted to the end.

William Steinberg, leading the Boston Symphony, is hardly to be complimented for putting an intermission in the middle of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony (at Philharmonic Hall) and in the middle of Bruckner's Eighth (at Carnegie Hall). The Bruckner symphony, I am told, was performed earlier in Boston by the same conductor without an intermission, and with a concerto before the break. New York audiences are grown-up too, Mr. Steinberg.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

APR 8 1972

The Classical Scene
by Robert Jacobson

April in New York may not exactly be April in Paris, but there's a hell of a lot more music. And this month you can catch up with a slew of visiting orchestras, North American style. At Carnegie Hall on the 5th, the Milwaukee Symphony, under the guiding hand of Kenneth Schermerhorn, comes to town with Eileen Farrell in Wagner's Wesendonck Songs and "Liebestod" from Tristan. Stravinsky and Strauss complete the program. The next night, the Boston "Pops' makes its first local appearance (!) with Arthur Fiedler and Earl Wild commemorating Carnegie's 80th anniversary season. On the 8th William Steinburg brings in his Pittsburghers for the Bruckner Eighth Symphony, and on the 14th the Toronto Symphony journeys south for the premiere of Morawetz' From the Diary of Anne Frank with the superb Lois Marshall as soloist. Karel Ancerl conducts. Back for its annual visit on the 17th is the Minnesota Symphony with Stanislaw Skrowaczewski leading Mahler's Das Klagende Lied and Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet Suite. His singers are Sheila Armstrong, Maureen Forrester, John Stewart and Brent Ellis. On the 19th and 22nd the brilliant Chicago Symphony is back with Georg Solti. The first night he has Shirley Verrett and Stuart Burrows in Mahler's Das Lied von der Erde, while the second night it's all orchestral with Elliott Carter's Variations for Orchestra, Berlioz' Symphonie fantastique and Strauss' Don Juan. Over at Philharmonic Hall, the Boston Symphony plus Joanna Simon, Kenneth Riegel and Ara Berberian offer the complete Berlioz Romeo and Juliet with Steinberg conducting (5th to 7th).

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

APR 2 1972

Weekend Music & Dance

TODAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra: William Steinberg, conductor; Bruckner's "Symphony No. 8 in C minor"; Carnegie Hall, 8.

AFTER DARK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

APR 1972

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,165 SUN. 311,112

APR 6 1972

Boston Orchestra At Carnegie Hall

BOSTON (AP) — After 87 years, the Boston Pops Orchestra is scheduled to play for the first time in New York.

The debut of the orchestra, founded in 1885, is scheduled for today at Carnegie Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its debut in 1887 when it was six years old.

National/London editions

'Zing, zoom and zip' ... were ingredients when Arthur Fiedler led the first New York concert ever by the Boston Pops in Carnegie Hall recently. This event and other appearances by the Boston Symphony and the Milwaukee Symphony are reviewed elsewhere on this page.

Bostonians in N.Y.

A belated debut for Pops

By Miles Kastendieck

New York

That extraordinary musical phenomenon known as the Boston Pops crashlanded in Carnegie Hall April 6 for a debut in this city which a crowded house will long remember. Though the Boston Symphony had played here every year since 1893, its alter ego was making its very first appearance on this occasion. Credit for this belongs to the Carnegie Hall Corporation as part of its 80th anniversary celebration of the historic concert hall.

The program followed Arthur Fiedler's familiar formula, that is, the discreet infiltration of popular with classical music. "America" opened the evening, for he chose to salute the hall with the work that opened it in 1891. Interestingly, he included the infrequently heard Paderewski Piano Concerto in A Minor, Op. 17, which also recalled the performance that first year by the famous pianist. Having preceded this with Berlioz's Rakoczy March, he followed through with the Offenbach Suite from "Gaité Parisienne," Mason's arrangement of old popular melodies called "Berlin Bouquet," and such items as Lennon & McCartney's "Hey, Jude," Melanie's "Look What They've Done to My Song," and Garland's "In the Mood."

All the zing, zoom, and zip that "the old maestro" has been contributing to Boston Pops performances since 1930 created characteristic exhilaration. Whether brash or bumptious, nostalgically corny, or outspokenly virtuosic, the music received full-hearted execution from the bluecoated musicians. Earl Wild played the Concerto with the special romantic flair that has identified his espousal of similar works recently. And there were, of course, the usual encores. New Yorkers will undoubtedly fill Carnegie Hall again whenever the Boston Pops chooses to return.

Wisconsin visitors

Four consecutive appearances by the Bostonians set some kind of precedent. The Boston Symphony concluded its Philharmonic Hall series with two performances of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," and offered Bruckner's Symphony No. 8 in Carnegie Hall, all these under the direction of William Steinberg. Exemplary presentations of both works may have missed the full flush of the romantic impulse that prompted them but nevertheless left a degree of satisfaction which paid tribute to Steinberg's superb musicianship. The Bruckner, particularly, reconfirmed a desire for more frequent hearings of such a masterpiece as this symphony, given such authoritative treatment. That all these performances glorified the orchestra probably qualifies as redundant comment.

The debut appearance of the Milwaukee Symphony as part of Carnegie Hall's International Festival of Visiting Orchestras accentuated appreciation of the high caliber of native organizations. This is a first-class performing group, ably led by Kenneth Schermerhorn, who assumed its leadership in 1968. He has developed a responsive, well-disciplined, orchestra which acquitted itself admirably in a challenging program.

Such familiar works as Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," Wagner's Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan und Isolde," Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" showed off both musicians and conductor in rhythmic precision and lyric expressivity, dominated mostly by a fine violin section. Mr. Schermerhorn tended toward black-and-white treatment with a leaning toward effectiveness for its own sake, but also conducted with spontaneous enthusiasm. He approached the Stravinsky somewhat curiously; that is, unstylistically because of extremes in accent.

Eileen Farrell made an infrequent appearance to sing Wagner's "Five Wesendonck Songs" and Isolde's "Love Death." The strength of her enormous voice imparted a certain grandeur to her performance but inhibited the lyric beauty this music demands. As always, it was an experience to hear her and the audience accorded her an ovation.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 418,[illegible]

APR 8 1972 New England Newsclip

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 38,127

APR 7 1972 New England

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
D. 41,749

APR 10 1972 New England

EAGLE TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
D. 40,[illegible]

APR 7 1972 New England

NEWS
GARDNER, MASS.
D. 8,061

APR 8 1972 New England

Getting an introduction to Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler was easy for Benjamin Monves of New York City. Ben just walked into the maestro's dressing room during intermission at New York's Carnegie Hall with a bouquet of roses and asked Fiedler to autograph his program. It was the orchestra's first appearance, not only at the hall, but in New York City. AP Photo

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
D. 84,000

APR 5 1972

TELEGRAPH
NASHUA, N. H.
D. 69,493

APR 6 1972

Boston Pops Makes New York Debut Tonight

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Pops Orchestra is scheduled to make its debut in New York tonight with a concert at Carnegie Hall.

It will be the first time in its 87-year history that the Pops has played in New York. The orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, is the Boston Symphony Orchestra minus the principal players in most sections.

"Pops" is short for popular concerts. The Boston Symphony debuted in New York in 1887, when it was six years old.

During Pops concerts at Symphony Hall here, persons in the audience can eat and drink at tables. This aspect will be missing from the New York performance, because the architecture of Carnegi Hall will not permit it.

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, MAINE.
D. 29,772

APR 5 1972

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

APR 6 1972

SOUTH MIDDLESEX DAILY NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MA.

APR 6 1972

CALL
WOONSOCKET, R. I.

APR 5 1972

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
D. 14,019

APR 5 1972

AMERICAN
WATERBURY CONN.
D. 40,675

APR 5 1972

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

APR 6 1972

You Look Down Your Nose at the Boston Pops? Don't

Tony Esparza

Arthur Fiedler, who will lead the Boston Pops at Carnegie Hall Thursday
Will they love him on 57th Street as they do on Main Street, U.S.A.?

By STEPHEN E. RUBIN

SYRACUSE, N. Y.

ARTHUR FIEDLER is on the run. The 77-year-old Pops Potentate is tough to pin down. Recently, Fiedler returned from a month of guest conducting in Japan just in time to inaugurate a Boston Pops tour in Ames, Iowa. Then, he squeezed in two concerts with the Memphis Symphony before whizzing off for eight concerts in 12 days with the Syracuse Symphony. In the midst of the latter expedition, he disappeared for a night to rejoin the Pops in Chicago. Thursday, they will be reunited again, this time at Carnegie Hall—the first time the Boston Pops will play New York in its 87-year history.

I manage to catch up with Fiedler in Syracuse, and he looks none the worse for his travels as he ushers me into his hotel suite. "Excuse the wallpaper," he smiles, motioning to a blinding psychedelic affair of salmon, blue and gray on silver which is wildly incongruous with his own Very Fifties Brooks Brothers conservative getup. The white-haired and moustached Fiedler looks like an aging Ivy Leaguer—the Big Man on Campus—in his cordovan shoes, gray slacks, greenish sports coat, oxford-striped shirt and dark tie. Add to this a cultivated New England accent and you've got, at least initially, an Old Guard Bostonian.

In the morning, Fiedler is fresh and alert, jumping up every few minutes to answer an incessantly ringing telephone. His propulsive manner in no way suggests the senior citizen. After lunch and perhaps too many drinks, he seems tired and grumpy, groaning as he can barely raise himself off the couch to get to the phone, which he curses mightily. Then, he is very much 77. Worn out or otherwise, he is never at a loss for words. When he lets loose with a sort of dirty-old-man-out-of-the-side-of-his-mouth throaty chuckle, the ivy is gone, and all he needs is a cigar and a bottle of booze to put him in the league of rake who has, indeed, progressed.

"Something is driving me," Fiedler says, referring to his desire for excitement and his habit of overbooking himself and scheduling concerts one after another. "But I don't know what it is. I have that kind of nature. I just can't sit and twiddle my thumbs. I don't enjoy vacations because I don't know what to do with myself. I don't want to lie on the beach and get sunburned, I've tried that. If I hear a band concert or a fire engine [he is a devoted fire buff], I go. I don't like to unwind too much either because it's hard for me to get back into the run again.

"I don't know what I would do if I retired. I'd probably just be hanging around waiting to go to the dentist or the doctor or the undertaker. I might for a while enjoy a dolce far niente, taking it easy. I'd like to test it out sometime, yet I'm scared to do it."

You'd think Fiedler would welcome the change. He has been leading the Boston Pops since 1930. This makes him, believe it or not, the longest reigning permanent conductor of a major American orchestra. The Boston Pops, you see, is really the Boston Symphony, minus its principal players. That's right: the same longhairs who harmonize to Bach, Beethoven and Brahms also take on the Beatles when Fiedler sends them romping through a symphonic synthesis of "I Wanna Hold Your Hand."

The real Boston Pops was, until the spring of 1971 when the orchestra visited Europe, exclusively Boston's. What you may have heard elsewhere was the tour orchestra, which is nothing but a pickup group. The current tour involves the real Pops. Why has it taken so long for the Pops to travel? That's what Fiedler would like to know.

"They treat us like second-class citizens," he snaps. "They have finally learned, however, that there's money in them thar hills, and money talks, you know." Fiedler is referring to both the poorly received European tour in 1971 and the current American one in which the Pops consistently outsold the Boston's regular concerts. In Ames, for example, 16,000 tickets were grabbed up five weeks before the orchestra got there, and there are reports that another 7,000 could easily have been sold.

He is also referring to the Pops' record sales. Since 1935, when he began recording, Fiedler has sold close to 50 million disks. Today, despite a switch in labels from RCA to Polydor, a German-based company, his records are still best sellers. Fiedler believes that, currently, young people are his biggest followers. "My records bring a lot of them to the concerts," he says, "and from this type of music they advance to better music." The conductor may soon be recording a series of popular symphonies, aimed at the youth market. "You become a sort of Pied Piper of Hamelin," Fiedler explains. "Kids follow your name. They think, if Fiedler's doing it, it may be good."

*

His earning power notwithstanding, the septuagenarian is used to being treated as a Philistine. Serious music lovers frown upon him as a vulgar popularizer. Critics are often venomous in their distaste. But the black sheep's greatest enemies have come from within the BSO itself. His fellow conductors gave Arthur the cold shoulder. He has either outlived or outlasted most of them since 1930, and has little that is nice to say about any of them except Charles Munch. For Serge Koussevitzky, the wildly emotional and highly egocentric Russian who led the Boston from 1924-1949, Fiedler reserves his greatest animosity.

"Koussevitzky once invited me to conduct a regular subscription concert," he recalls with a wicked grin. "Then he found out I was conducting a concert for Frank Sinatra and wrote me a letter disinviting me. He was a very peculiar man. Mrs. Fiedler and I were at his last concert with the BSO. Though he had been very small and nasty to me, I said I'm going up to congratulate him. How can you do that for a man who was always stepping on you, Mrs. Fiedler asked? I'm just being honest, I told her, 25 years is a landmark. So we went up to his room and the place was jammed with adoring old gals kissing him.

"I was at the threshold, and all of a sudden he spied me. He had an overabundance of blood and he just got beet red and blue when he saw me. He made a beeline for me—guilty conscience, you know—and shook my hand and embraced me. He was very touched.

"Subsequently, after he had left the orchestra and was getting very ill, he called me up. With a weak voice, he said [Fiedler mimics Koussevitzky's Russian accent], 'Arthur, would you do me a favor?' I was in no great mood to do him any favors, but I said yes, if I could. He asked me to replace him in a concert because he didn't feel well enough to do it. It was the Pops season, and I didn't want to make it too easy for him. Call the manager, I said. If he'll release me, I'll do it. He did; I did it; and the next thing I knew I was at his funeral."

Fiedler has met with resistance from instrumentalists in orchestras as well. "I've come up against a few cases of snobbism — the oh, how - dare - you - come - in - here - and - do - this - sort - of - thing approach. If I catch them not giving what they should, I tell them, 'Please, we're in America, we're playing American music, you're making American money, and we're going to play to an American audience.'"

Fiedler is also aware of the members of the public who dismiss him as a charlatan, hooting at his souped-up symphonic versions of Broadway and Tin Pan Alley tunes. He calls these people "culture-vultures" and returns the disdain. "Take a man like Lawrence Welk," he says. "You've got to give him credit. I may not like him, but he's got something that people want to buy. Why shouldn't people (Continued on Page 32)

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

APR 2 1972

Look Down Your Nose at the Boston Pops?

Continued from Page 13

have what they want? I think we're on a terrible culture binge in this country. We're trying to stuff culture down people's throats. You can't. It has to be done gradually. The snobs talk Stravinsky, John Cage and so forth. They don't know it, they don't like it, they don't understand it. A lot of this music I, as a professional musician, have great difficulty understanding."

Fiedler's musical training goes back to around the turn of the century in his native Boston when his Austrian-born father, a first violinist with the BSO, forced him to take up the fiddle. "It was just a chore," he recalls brusquely, "something I had to do, like brushing my teeth." He never really got to enjoy music until years later when he decided, after a brief venture into the business field, that he had better do something, and something turned out to be conducting. Initially, however, he had to settle for the life of an orchestra musician, and he played violin, viola, piano, organ, percussion and celeste with the BSO, which he joined when he was 20. When, about six years later, the post of conductor of the Pops became vacant, Fiedler applied for the job—the only such application he has ever made—and was turned down. He then organized the Arthur Fiedler Sinfonietta, proved his stuff, and got the post four years later.

To this day, Fiedler does not romanticize about music. He is serious about his profession, but more in the manner of a businessman than a creative artist. Like the personal aspects of his existence—his marriage and family—Fiedler seems to approach his career as something that has to be done —and the quicker the better. There is a breathlessness about him, from the staccato of his speech, to the way he runs himself ragged, to his conducting style which is, by his own description, on the fast, unsentimental side.

*

Fiedler finally succumbed to marriage 27 years ago. "I had a very charming bachelorhood for about 50 years," he smiles. "I knew Mrs. Fiedler, who came from a very fine Boston family by the name of Bottomley, since she was six. She was a very cute little girl. Then I sort of lost track of her. It wasn't until she came out that I met her again at a party. I was quite attracted by her. She was charming, young and vivacious. I went to her house and tried to take her out, but her mother wouldn't allow it. I had the kind of reputation that any woman Fiedler was seen with must just have gotten out of his bed—which was true in many cases."

Eventually Fiedler won out, and the couple was married in 1942. "I like married life," he says. "People are always saying, 'how do you manage it? You're hardly ever home. What does your family say?' I tell them that my family got used to it. It's a way of life. My children (two girls, aged 26 and 24, and a boy, aged 20) don't miss me, Mrs. Fiedler gets along without me, and I get along without them very well. Mrs. Fiedler only travels with me to the few and faraway places, like Japan. The last people children want to be with are their parents. They want their friends, people their own age.

"I've never been an extraordinary family man. I like my home, I like the comforts of it, I like good food, I like good companionship, I love women, I like to drink—I think it's very healthy, up to a certain point. It never interferes with my work."

Nothing does. Fiedler is, in a curious way, protective of himself. "I purposely avoid talking to audiences," he says. "First of all, I think that's very folksy. Second, I think there's a certain mysteriousness about silence. People wonder, what does he talk like? Does he have an accent? This is good. I learned it from a very famous actress who is a dear friend of mine. Of course, if you allow it, the public will take your last drop of blood, sap your vitality completely. This is why some people think I'm rather cold and distant. But you've got to keep people away from you. If you let them come to you, they'll devour you. I mean with favors, with talking, with autographs, with this and that. You make yourself not so easy to approach and people think it's standoffish. It isn't. It's just sheerly self-preservation."

This point of view may seem a bit odd coming from a man whose name is a household word, but Fiedler himself is not quite sure how he acquired superstar status. "I'm sometimes very mystified that so many people know about me and recognize me. It comes so gradually you're not aware of it, and you wonder how it happened. The only reason is exposure. As conductors get older, and if they're active, by the sheer number of years that they've been before the public they gain in popularity. You don't become popular just because you're old."

*

Fiedler fails to mention another factor, his personal charisma. Frequently he is greeted with a howling ovation just for walking on stage. "People have told me that. I'm not conscious of it. They also say I look like a conductor. Well, I can't help that. I'm not trying to look like a conductor. It's stupid, but that's the way it is."

The way it is is strange indeed. So much of what has happened to Fiedler has, it seems, occurred by chance, by circumstance. Didn't he ever have any specific ambitions, secret or otherwise? "There was a period in my life, when I first started, that I thought of going into the very serious side of conducting. Then I felt that, well, there are trials and tribulations. You go to a town and you have a second or third rate orchestra, or there's a faction that likes you and a faction that hates you. In Boston, I had the advantage of a marvelous orchestra at the tip of my fingers. I don't know. I just chose. I always said, if I'm going into this type of music, I want to do it as well as I can. I also felt that much of this music needed somebody to love and caress it, to fondle and perform it, not to look down their noses at it like a dirty thing. This has kept me alive musically."

Is Fiedler ever sorry that he made the choice, that he can't perform the kind of music he dreamed of conducting as a young man? "I am cursed that wherever I'm engaged they want a program like the Pops," he says with a hint of regret. "It's rare that they want a real symphony program. And perhaps they're right. But every clown wants to play Hamlet."

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
D. 16,095

APR 7 1972

New England Newsclip

Bos. Symphony

Fiedler Debut at Carnegie

Conductor Arthur Fiedler leads his Boston Pops Orchestra in New York debut at Carnegie. (AP photo)

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,988

APR 16 1972

New England Newsclip

Conducting of Ravel's Work Fine

Symphony Excels in 'Pictures'

By JOHN RICHARDSON

Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's piano pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition" is a crowd pleaser and a fine vehicle for virtuoso orchestra. Though one could have wished for something a little more unusual, it proved an excellent choice for James Levine, principal conductor-elect of the Metropolitan Opera, who made his Boston Symphony debut Friday afternoon.

"Pictures" is a program piece inspired by the work of Victor Alexandrovich Hartmann, a painter and friend of Moussorgsky. The piano pieces are wonderfully evocative and varied, but of the numerous orchestrations attempted only Ravel's has gained wide acceptance.

Despite some less than top-form orchestra playing (some of the brass intonation was a little schizophrenic), the performance was most absorbing and very exciting. Mr. Levine has a sure, no-nonsense stick technique, a fine feel for orchestral sound and a marvelous sense of timing. His interpretation captured the full range of expression, from the terrifying Catacomb movement to the glorious Russian blast of the Great Gate of Kiev.

• Music Review

The program opened with a brisk reading of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony highlighted by some breathtaking string playing in one particularly tortuous transition passage in the last movement.

★

The second piece was the Mendelssohn Violin concerto with Yuoko Shiokawa the violin soloist. She is a careful, somewhat lacklustre player. After some nice phrasing in the first movement she had trouble keeping tempo and could not produce the necessary combination of lightness and brilliance needed for this piece.

A final word about Mr. Levine. He seems to possess those necessary qualities that separate the exceptional conductor from the run-of-the-mill: the kinesthetic feel for the music, the wonderfully dramatic sense of pacing and the ability to bring goosebumps to an audience, all generated by a solid and secure musicianship. It is to be hoped he will return to Boston often.

GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
POST-STAR AND TIMES
D. 18,500

APR 10 1972

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

APR 20 1972

New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

JAMES LEVINE LEADS BSO

It partook a little of Youth's Night at Symphony last week. Twenty-eight year-old James Levine appeared here on the podium for the first time, in place of the ailing Rafael Kubelik, and the twenty-five year-old Japanese violinist, Yuuko Shiokawa, was making her American debut.

The program — Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and the Ravel transcription of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" — was scarcely one to put a listener's absorptive capacity upon its mettle. It served, though, to provide a fair measure of the capacities of Mr. Levine. A year ago the mention of that name would have provoked a James Who? After Kubelik named him as principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company a good deal began to be known of his history: the infant piano prodigy, the student of Jean Morel, the six years' apprenticeship with Szell in Cleveland and so on. The word began emphatically to get about that James Levine was not a comer but an arrivee.

For all his youth he looks rather like that famous silhouette of Johannes Brahms minus beard and cigar. His baton technique is not extravagant; it is precise and clear. His performance left little doubt that he is first-rate.

The "Haffner" was almost arch in the opening of the first movement, then moved along with extraordinary crispness. The deliberateness in the trio of an otherwise brisk minuette verged on the flamboyant, though it made interesting good sense in an over-all sensitive and expressive whole.

Familiarity does not stale the excitement and fascination of the "Pictures at an Exhibition". Whether it was my own mood, or whether the conductor managed to bring out hitherto hidden facets, I do not know, but the reading seemed as singularly rich in detail as superbly kinetic throughout. Few scores offer such opportunity for solo instrumental and choir display. And there was plenty of high quality. The price of such opportunity is exposure to faulty intonation and I am afraid that there was plenty of that too among the brass. But oh what a musician is Chester Schmitz, whose magnificent tuba playing somehow suffused the entire traversal.

Would that such superlatives could be written of Yuuko Shiokawa. She looked so small and vulnerable on that immense stage, her tone was so big, her bow arm so secure, her instrument so ravishing, her mentors so committed, the Mendelssohn so ready-to-serve. How then could she miss? (She played the piece on three successive evenings and this is a review of the Saturday evening concert. They say that she did not do as well as on Friday, which in turn fared less well than Thursday's performance.) She missed because the whole was less than the sum of the parts. She dug in on the first note and never ceased pulsating until the last, somehow bypassing the heart of the music en route. The Mendelssohn is a work that cries for nuance and modality, but none ever came.

Mr. Steinberg returns this weekend to wrap up the season with an all-Wagner program that includes Tristan and Isolde Act 2, Wotan's farewell and magic fire music from "die Walkure:, and the Immolation scene from "die Gotterdammerung". The soloists include Eileen Farrell, James King, Nell Rankin, Robert Hale, John Davies and Dean Wilder.

The final program of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players' Sunday afternoon Sanders Theatre Series concluded with a spate of offerings that were off-beat, even for a group whose stock in trade is that. Presented were Michael Haydn's Divrertimento in B flat for violin, viola, bass, bassoon and oboe; Boris Blacher's Trio for Trumpet, Trombone and Piano; Ingolf Dahl's Duettino concertante for flute and percussion; and Oliver Messiaen's Quartet for the end of Time. What all these numbers had in common was the effort of the composers—sometimes effective, sometimes almost desperate—to extract from each ensemble a section for every instrument or conceivable combination of instruments.

The first three compositions were on the fluff side. Michael Haydn is neither his brother Josef nor his friend Wolfgang, but the wooden tunes and stiff structure did set well in the pleasant timbre of this peculiar grouping. Blacher came on as a sort of academic Gershwin with about as many tricks as the combo produce. Dahl's piece, written for these artists, if aurally absurd, was certainly a visual spectacular. The always masterly Mr. Firth covered his array of battery with the style of a squash champion.

The piece-de-resistance, of course, was the Messiaen work. It is simply gigantic, lasting as it does about an hour. And it is vintage Messiaen, which means, among other things, much Catholic mysticism elements of bird-song and plainsong, lots of Debussy-like impressionism, evocations of organ sounds, pregnant silences and ostinati passages in which the music seems to stand still for minutes. These ingredients turn off, nay infuriate, a good many listeners. Others, like me, find in them rich veins in which there is much to mine.

The End of Time quartet was written when Messiaen was a German prisoner of war in Silesia, in 1942. It is a powerful statement and a performance of it is something of an event which, one would think, would have attracted far more attention than it seems to have. The long section for unaccompanied clarinet is an incredible piece of writing, in itself well worth the price of admission. Harold Wright's rendering thereof said just about everything there is to say about the art of playing the instrument. Whether the musical ideas and resources of the Quartet could sustain a full hour is questionable, and despite the many insistently compelling passages here is one who toward the end began to seek surcease.

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
D. 16,095
APR 7 1972
New England Newsclip

GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
POST-STAR AND TIMES
D. 18,500
APR 10 1972

Bos Sunday Adv

Fiedler Debut at Carnegie

Conductor Arthur Fiedler leads his Boston Pops Orchestra in New York debut at Carnegie. (AP photo)

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 41,000
APR 16 1972
New England Newsclip

Conducting of Ravel's Work Fine

Symphony Excels in 'Pictures'

By JOHN RICHARDSON

Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's piano pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition" is a crowd pleaser and a fine vehicle for virtuoso orchestra. Though one could have wished for something a little more unusual, it proved an excellent choice for James Levine, principal conductor-elect of the Metropolitan Opera, who made his Boston Symphony debut Friday afternoon.

"Pictures" is a program piece inspired by the work of Victor Alexandrovich Hartmann, a painter and friend of Moussorgsky. The piano pieces are wonderfully evocative and varied, but of the numerous orchestrations attempted only Ravel's has gained wide acceptance.

Despite some less than top-form orchestra playing (some of the brass intonation was a little schizophrenic), the performance was most absorbing and very exciting. Mr. Levine has a sure, no-nonsense stick technique, a fine feel for orchestral sound and a marvelous sense of timing. His interpretation captured the full range of expression, from the terrifying Catacomb movement to the glorious Russian blast of the Great Gate of Kiev.

• Music Review

The program opened with a brisk reading of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony highlighted by some breathtaking string playing in one particularly tortuous transition passage in the last movement.

★

The second piece was the Mendelssohn Violin concerto with Yuoko Shiokawa the violin soloist. She is a careful, somewhat lacklustre player. After some nice phrasing in the first movement she had trouble keeping tempo and could not produce the necessary combination of lightness and brilliance needed for this piece.

A final word about Mr. Levine. He seems to possess those necessary qualities that separate the exceptional conductor from the run-of-the-mill: the kinesthetic feel for the music, the wonderfully dramatic sense of pacing and the ability to bring goosebumps to an audience, all generated by a solid and secure musicianship. It is to be hoped he will return to Boston often.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
21,500
APR 20 1972
New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

JAMES LEVINE LEADS BSO

It partook a little of Youth's Night at Symphony last week. Twenty-eight year-old James Levine appeared here on the podium for the first time, in place of the ailing Rafael Kubelik, and the twenty-five year-old Japanese violinist, Yuuko Shiokawa, was making her American debut.

The program — Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and the Ravel transcription of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" — was scarcely one to put a listener's absorptive capacity upon its mettle. It served, though, to provide a fair measure of the capacities of Mr. Levine. A year ago the mention of that name would have provoked a James Who? After Kubelik named him as principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company a good deal began to be known of his history: the infant piano prodigy, the student of Jean Morel, the six years' apprenticeship with Szell in Cleveland and so on. The word began emphatically to get about that James Levine was not a comer but an arrivee.

For all his youth he looks rather like that famous silhouette of Johannes Brahms minus beard and cigar. His baton technique is not extravagant; it is precise and clear. His performance left little doubt that he is first-rate.

The "Haffner" was almost arch in the opening of the first movement, then moved along with extraordinary crispness. The deliberateness in the trio of an otherwise brisk minuette verged on the flamboyant, though it made interesting good sense in an over-all sensitive and expressive whole.

Familiarity does not stale the excitement and fascination of the "Pictures at an Exhibition". Whether it was my own mood, or whether the conductor managed to bring out hitherto hidden facets, I do not know, but the reading seemed as singularly rich in detail as superbly kinetic throughout. Few scores offer such opportunity for solo instrumental and choir display. And there was plenty of high quality. The price of such opportunity is exposure to faulty intonation and I am afraid that there was plenty of that too among the brass. But oh what a musician is Chester Schmitz, whose magnificent tuba playing somehow suffused the entire traversal.

Would that such superlatives could be written of Yuuko Shiokawa. She looked so small and vulnerable on that immense stage, her tone was so big, her bow arm so secure, her instrument so ravishing, her mentors so committed, the Mendelssohn so ready-to-serve. How then could she miss? (She played the piece on three successive evenings and this is a review of the Saturday evening concert. They say that she did not do as well as on Friday, which in turn fared less well than Thursday's performance.) She missed because the whole was less than the sum of the parts. She dug in on the first note and never ceased pulsating until the last, somehow bypassing the heart of the music en route. The Mendelssohn is a work that cries for nuance and modality, but none ever came.

Mr. Steinberg returns this weekend to wrap up the season with an all-Wagner program that includes Tristan and Isolde Act 2, Wotan's farewell and magic fire music from "die Walkure:, and the Immolation scene from "die Gotterdammerung". The soloists include Eileen Farrell, James King, Nell Rankin, Robert Hale, John Davies and Dean Wilder.

The final program of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players' Sunday afternoon Sanders Theatre Series concluded with a spate of offerings that were off-beat, even for a group whose stock in trade is that. Presented were Michael Haydn's Divrertimento in B flat for violin, viola, bass, bassoon and oboe; Boris Blacher's Trio for Trumpet, Trombone and Piano; Ingolf Dahl's Duettino concertante for flute and percussion; and Oliver Messiaen's Quartet for the end of Time. What all these numbers had in common was the erfort of the composers—sometimes effective, sometimes almost desperate—to extract from each ensemble a section for every instrument or conceivable combination of instruments.

The first three compositions were on the fluff side. Michael Haydn is neither his brother Josef nor his friend Wolfgang, but the wooden tunes and stiff structure did set well in the pleasant timbre of this peculiar grouping. Blacher came on as a sort of academic Gershwin with about as many tricks as the combo produce. Dahl's piece, written for these artists, if aurally absurd, was certainly a visual spectacular. The always masterly Mr. Firth covered his array of battery with the style of a squash champion.

The piece-de-resistance, of course, was the Messiaen work. It is simply gigantic, lasting as it does about an hour. And it is vintage Messiaen, which means, among other things, much Catholic mysticism elements of bird-song and plainsong, lots of Debussy-like impressionism, evocations of organ sounds, pregnant silences and ostinati passages in which the music seems to stand still for minutes. These ingredients turn off, nay infuriate, a good many listeners. Others, like me, find in them rich veins in which there is much to mine.

The End of Time quartet was written when Messiaen was a German prisoner of war in Silesia, in 1942. It is a powerful statement and a performance of it is something of an event which, one would think, would have attracted far more attention than it seems to have. The long section for unaccompanied clarinet is an incredible piece of writing, in itself well worth the price of admission. Harold Wright's rendering thereof said just about everything there is to say about the art of playing the instrument. Whether the musical ideas and resources of the Quartet could sustain a full hour is questionable, and despite the many insistently compelling passages here is one who toward the end began to seek surcease.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 201,042 SUN. 566,377
APR 14 1972
New England Newsclip

A WORKOUT — Guest conductor James Levine and violin soloist Yuuko Shiokawa complete what appears to be strenuous rehearsal yesterday in preparation for BSO performance today. (Globe photo, Ted Dully)

Met's Levine interviewer's paragon

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

James Levine, the young Principal Conductor-elect of the Metropolitan Opera and guest conductor with the BSO this week, is the kind of talker an interviewer is always hoping for. No yes — no — maybe answers but paragraph, dissertation-length answers because he explains, he is wary of getting burned, of being misquoted, misrepresented.

Even so, very few interviews ever picture him to be the person he really is, he says. "Sometimes I'll think, 'Well, if that's the way I'm supposed to be, that's great, but . . .'"

Levine, 28, had just finished his fourth rehearsal with the BSO of a very conventional "summer festival" kind of program including the Mozart "Haffner," the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, and Ravel-Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." ("It's great to get that much time to spend on these pieces.") He declined lunch ("I'll eat in the hotel later while I'm making phone calls), settled his frankly overweight body into a chair in the so-called Green Room, and propped a foot on an armrest. We talked, illogically enough, considering his BSO engagement, mostly about opera.

In brief, Levine has had what you might call (and what he might disclaim) a wunderkind's career. He began piano study at the age of four; at ten, he made his debut with the Cincinnati Symphony; at 13, he was studying with "Rudi" Serkin at Marlboro, later with Rosina Lhevinne at Juilliard and Aspen. At 20, he was selected by George Szell to join the conducting staff of the Cleveland Orchestra where he stayed for six years.

He made his debut with the Met last summer and will conduct three operas there next season. He begins the Principal Conductor job in 1973-74 during which time he will devote seven months to the company, and take charge of four operas including a new production.

Although he has knocked many Met productions and procedures, Levine rather surprisingly

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON
HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500
APR 13 1972
New England Newsclip

PEDDLER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
13,000
APR 15 1972
New Engle

Met's Levine in Symphony debut today

James Levine, principal conductor-elect of the Metropolitan Opera, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at the third and final concert of the Thursday "B" series, today (Thursday, April 13) at 8:30 p.m., and at the nineteenth pair of Friday, Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, April 14 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, April 15 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist for these concerts is Yuuko Shiokawa, violinist. Levine replaces the ailing Rafael Kubelik who was scheduled to conduct.

Levine's concert includes Mozart's Symphony no. 35, Mendelssohn's Violin concerto with soloist Yuuko Shiokawa, and to conclude the program, Ravel's orchestration of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an exhibition."

Born in Cincinnati twenty-eight years ago, James Levine was soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony at age ten. He then continued his studies with Walter Levin of the LaSalle Quartet, attended the Juilliard School where his teachers were Rosina Lhevinne and Jean Morel and later began studying conducting under the auspices of the Ford Foundation's American Conductors Project with Max Rudolf, Alfred Wallenstein, and Fausto Cleva. At the Marlboro Festival he studied piano with Rudolf Serkin, and then spent nine summers at the Aspen Music Festival, first as a student, and then as a member of the faculty. Mr. Levine joined the conducting staff of the Cleveland Orchestra at the invitation of George Szell, and remained there for six years. Since 1965 he has been Music Director of the University Circle Orchestra at the Cleveland Institute of Music. Last June he made his debut at the Metropolitan Opera, conducting Tosca, while this season he has conducted both Tosca and Luisa Miller. He has conducted most of the major American orchestras, and this season travels to Europe to conduct in England and Italy. He also will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this summer at Tanglewood.

Yuuko Shiokawa, who makes her American debut at these concerts, was born in Tokyo in 1946. Beginning violin studies at age five, she won first prize in the International Music Competition at Yokohama only two years later. Her early music studies included travel to Peru where she studied with Eugen Cremer, and Germany where she studied with Wilhelm Stross.

For the past nine years Rafael Kubelik has been her mentor, and she has appeared at many of his concerts in England, Denmark and Germany. She uses the famous "Emperor Stradivarius" which Mr. Kubelik inherited from his father.

Conductor Levine reporter's dream

★ LEVINE
Continued from Page 33

came to the company's defense when I criticized some of the tour and New York performances.

"I know," he said, "I used to wonder why some of the conductors and productions were so bad when I attended three times a week as a student at Juilliard. Now I know." He listed problems like popular Italian operas strung out through a whole season with multiple cast changes, new conductors, and no rehearsal time. "Can you name a conductor who is going to give you, say, September through January for a series of 'Butterflies'?"

When it comes to repertory, he added, there's no competition for audiences between, for instance, a beautifully staged "Pelleas and Melisande" and the shabbiest "Forza" with Leontyne (Price) and Placido (Domingo).

"The Met did 'Pelleas' this year, and it's a beautiful work, one that ought to be done, but you could have shot deer in the theater every performance, However, you could get Joan Sutherland and Marilyn Horne on a bare stage singing the multiplication tables and fill the house.

"People are less interested in the art that emanates from the composer than the art that emanates from the artists. That is becuase they're not a group of score-readers."

The Met tour, according to Levine, is still something that helps the opera scene in general. Audiences invariably fill up enormous theaters, "and that's got to be a good thing even if the quality is going to irritate certain listeners."

TIMES-UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
W. 7,200
APR 13 1972
New England Newsclip

B.S.O. Concerts

James Levine, Principal Conductor elect of the Metropolitan Opera makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at the third and final concert of the Thursday "B" series, Thursday evening, April 13 at 8:30 p.m., and at the nineteenth pair of Friday, Saturday concerts by the Orchestra, Friday afternoon, April 14 at 2 p.m., and Saturday evening, April 15 at 8:30 p.m.

Soloist for these concerts is Yuuko Shiokawa, violinist. Mr. Levine replaces the ailing Rafael Kubelik who was scheduled to conduct.

Mr. Levine's concert includes Mozart's Symphony no. 35, Mendelssohn's Violin concerto with soloist Yuuko Shiokawa, and to conclude the program, Ravel's orchestration of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an exhibition.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 4,350
APR 13 1972

MINUTE MAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
W. 2,923
APR 13 1972
New England

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
W. 6,000
APR 13 1972

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
W. 3,000
APR 13 1972
New England

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

APR 17 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO's 'new sonority'

By Louis Snyder

Whatever a conductor possesses that brings out the best in an orchestra, James Levine seems to be blessed with. On Friday afternoon, in the second of three weekend debut appearances (replacing Rafael Kubelik) with the Boston Symphony, he and the musicians made music of tonal quality alone that one searches the immediate past here to equal. Cool, clear sonority, which has hardly been a characteristic of even the best of recent concerts, all of a sudden filled Symphony Hall, and there was a strong definition in the choirs that betokened a welcome, unfettered "speaking out."

From the first notes of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony (No. 35 in D), which opened the afternoon—as specified, "Allegro con spirito"—to the towering impact of "The Great Gate of Kiev," last of the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," which closed it, conductor and orchestra produced performances that turned concert-going from a routine affair (which it shouldn't be) into something special (which it should be) in terms of excitement and spontaneity.

Joyful Mozart

The Mozart was crisp and clean, but still witty and malleable—certainly the best playing of this composer by the BSO in some time. Here, as elsewhere during the program, Mr. Levine's beat was clear and unobtrusive — no acrobatics — with the result that the Symphony, not scaled down instrumentally, emerged with rich, joyful amplitude.

Yuuko Shiokawa, who at 26 is two years younger than the conductor of the day, made her American debut at these concerts in the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in E minor. A protégé of Mr. Kubelik, Miss Shiokawa is equipped with a strong, warm tone and technique to spare. She launched into the intricacies as well as the lyric passages of the work with a total involvement that served to minimize the breakneck speed at which some sections were taken, and even if there were a few notes that got away from her, this could still be rated a most auspicious introduction. Mr. Levine and the orchestra gave her abundant support, and the audience cheered her accomplishments, effected, incidentally, on the "Emperor Stradivarius," inherited by Mr. Kubelik from his renowned father, the violinist Jan.

Dynamic 'Pictures'

Mussorgsky's "Pictures" was very much with us several seasons ago when it seemed to have been played on almost everything but glass harmonicas. So, after a hiatus, it was good to have it back in a dynamic, full-blooded performance which further demonstrated, on a higher decible level, Mr. Levine's particular gifts for articulation and making old works sound like new through tonal color and stringent contrast. There was some notable individual playing by Sherman Walt (bassoon) and Chester Schmitz (tuba), among others, and a spectacularly "vocal" passage in the "Goldenberg-Schmuyle" dialogue by a trumpeter (unfortunately) invisible to this reviewer.

All that the score contains of exoticism and grotesquerie (Gnomus, the Tuileries, the Ballet of Chicks in their Shells—a laugh producer — and Baba Yaga) stood out in brilliant, shining relief, strikingly pictorial. The finale—an all-out effort—deserved the tumultous reception it aroused for Mr. Levine and a stageful of regenerated musicians.

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000

APR 15 1972 New England Newsclip

Lookout / Paul Kenyon

Startling experience at the BSO

Yuuko Shiokawa

One of the great things about the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the occasional startlingly beautiful experience it provides for concert goers.

The third and last in the 1971-72 "Romantic Series" of three Thursday evening concerts demonstrated this quality of unexpected beauty.

Tokyo-born (in 1946) violinist Yuuko Shiokawa gave an electrifying performance as soloist in Mendelssohn's Violin concerto in E minor, opus 64.

Her sounds soared and penetrated in an extravaganza of violin music, eye-misting and breathtaking.

Her small yellow-gowned figure swayed to the rhythms and her center-parted black-haired head turned upward in appropriate expression of the "appasionato" direction for the first movement.

Her motions were dramatic in the extreme but they were not showy; they seemed genuinely attuned to her feeling.

Listeners watched with their eyes brightened by this artistic tour de force. And their applause indicated their enjoyment.

Her instrument was a famous Emperor Stradivarius, inherited by her mentor for the last nine years, Rafael Kubelik. She has appeared at many of the concerts he has conducted in England, Denmark and Germany. She made her American debut at this week's Boston Symphony concerts.

Beginning violin studies at the age of five, she won first prize at the International Music Competition in Yokohama two years later. She lived in Peru for a few years, studying there with the German violinist Eugen Cremer. In 1961 she went with her teacher to Germany, where Hans Rosbaud, conductor, heard her and Wilhelm Stross devoted much of his time to her work. In 1965 she won the Mendelssohn Prize, and in 1966 she performed and recorded the Violin concerto of Max Reger.

For my part, Mendelssohn will never be the same for hearing Yuuko Shiokawa's playing of the E minor concerto: superb!

A remarkably appropriate contrast visually to the dynamic Japanese soloist was the guest conductor at Thursday's concert, James Levine, principal conductor-elect of the Metropolitan Opera. Born in Cincinnati 28 years ago, he was piano soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony at the age of 10.

His engagements during the coming months include the New York Philharmonic, Los Angeles Philharmonic at the Hollywood Bowl, and the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood; we'll be hearing more from him.

The very figure of an orchestra conductor with his mop of bushy hair, his expressive face reflecting understanding and enjoyment of the music, and his figure portly but trim in tails, Levine seemed to have a remarkable rapport with the musicians and the audience.

For some unrealized reason we smiled with anticipation when he made his first entrance. Later we smiled with enthusiasm and clapped till our hands smarted, thanking him and the players for their performance of Mozart's Symphony no. 35 (the "Haffner") and

James Levine

Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition, arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. My, but those percussions really gave out in the Pictures! So did the brasses and the wonderful B. S. O. . . . and the woodwinds . . . and the rest.

WGBH-FM and public television broadcasts are enjoyable but once in a while it's worth the trip to Boston to sense the excitement and unexpected beauties that the old BSO produces, year after year.

Paul Kenyon

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,012 SUN. 566,377

APR 15 1972 New England Newsclip

Formidably gifted

Met's Levine Conducts BSO

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

Rafael Kubelik was to have been guest conductor for this weekend's Boston Symphony concerts. He is ill, though, and so the orchestra was conducted by James Levine, who, as Principal Conductor, will be working closely with Kubelik at the Metropolitan Opera when Kubelik takes over as Music Director. Levine, whose Boston Symphony debut was scheduled for this summer at Tanglewood — he will do the Mahler then — he is 28. His rise to visibility went by less spectacular steps than that of his slightly younger colleague, Michael Tilson Thomas, but after thorough preparation as a pianist with Rosina Lhevinne and Ruddolf Serkin and as a conductor first with Jean Morel, then in a six-year apprenticeship with George Szell in Cleveland, he has in the last couple of years arrived at the same sort of prominence.

Levine is formidably gifted, and his personality is of a warmth that says a lot and very directly to audiences and apparently to orchestras as well. Yesterday afternoon, his musical gifts, vitality, and experience were most obviously in evidence in Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, with which he began. It was a performance musical character, for example in the extreme quiet, slower pace, and almost exaggerated pointed phrasing of the sixth through twelfth measures of the fifth movement — an effect that all but screamed "Szell" — or the equally vivid contrast, far bolder than most conductors would dare make it, of the rugged Minuet and the much slower, softer, rounder Trio.

It's a risky approach, particularly that touch at the beginning of the symphony, which is fascinating when it first happens but not nearly so convincing when it has to come again in the recapitulation, but Levine made a convincing case for it. It was altogether a vividly inflected, highly detailed performance, full of life in the inner voices, and beautifully played by the orchestra. And for sure, it has been a long time since a Boston Symphony audience has been offered such opinionated Mozart conducting.

The rest of the concert was disappointing. The soloist was a 26-year-old protegee of Kubelik's, Yuuko Shiokawa, a highly competent but uninteresting violinist. She played the Mendelssohn concerto, which needs lightness, urgency, a kind of elegant facsimile of passion, rather than the thumpy beatiness with which it was done yesterday.

After intermission, Levine dug into the Ravel orchestration of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." That is one of the most super-insured pieces in the repertory: on a certain level it always goes. "Everything is written in; all you have to do is to tune," said a musician yesterday. But then tuning is what the Boston Symphony isn't very good at, or at least is not terribly careful about, and the sourly pitched, carelessly voiced wind cords, made the performance fairly undistinguished. It had good moments — the superbly caught double characterization of "Goldenberg and Schmuyle" and the sheer angry energy of "Baba Yaga's Hut" — but there was not enough virtuosity and sensuous beauty for apiece so exuberantly written to sound brilliant. The Boston Synphony can play it superbly — I can still remember how spectacularly they did it for Giulini in 1969 — but Levine couldn't draw it from them yesterday.

Conductor career on the upbeat

By Louis Snyder

Deputizing for an ailing Rafael Kubelik (his boss two years hence at the Metropolitan Opera), James Levine arrived in Boston at short notice to conduct a first rehearsal for three concerts this weekend with the Boston Symphony. That was on Tuesday. But on Tuesday evening he had an obligation in Cleveland, so he flew there to preside over a concert of student soloists at the Cleveland Institute of Music, from 8:30 to 11:15, then returned to Boston for a full day of BSO rehearsals on Wednesday.

Looking deceivingly rosy and vigorous at the end of this taxing two-day marathon, the stocky 28-year-old maestro was all apologies late Wednesday afternoon.

"Please," he said, "don't think I'm one of these jet-age conductors. I've never had to do anything like this before and I don't approve of it. But when Mr. Kubelik became ill, this was the only week I could fill — it anticipates my debut with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood this summer — and I didn't have it in my heart to cancel out with the kids in Cleveland. . . ."

Mr. Levine (it's vine rather than veen) has a musical heart which seems to have left its mark almost everywhere he's ever been. He loves Cincinnati where he was born, heard the best music from "as far back as I can remember" via a "full-time symphony orchestra" and warm-weather opera at the Zoo. There he studied piano and made a youthful debut with the Cincinnati Symphony, and until he went off to Marlboro and Aspen in his later teens, "camped" at rehearsals and performances of the summer opera which had recruited him irrevocably with a "Carmen" at the age of eight.

Years with Szell

Then there is Cleveland, where he spent most of six years as assistant to the formidable George Szell, late music director of the Cleveland Orchestra. Mr. Szell had spotted him in Baltimore as a member of the Ford Foundation's American Conductors Project, and imported him to Cleveland to work and observe under his direction.

"He used to test me in his special way," Mr. Levine recalled. "I would stand in a room alone, facing him, and he'd ask me to conduct such and such a piece and sing along with it. 'All right,' he'd say, 'that's the first flute part, now let's have the second clarinet. And what about the accelerando in this passage . . .?' It was really something, being an orchestra of one before this great fearsome man and going through one's paces. But I came there expecting that, and the result was that we got along well together and he continued to give me all kinds of encouragement and recommendations.

"When the late Victor Babin asked me to work with students at the Cleveland Institute of Music, five or six years ago, Mr. Szell approved it, and would come to rehearsals of the University Circle Orchestra that I formed and make suggestions and comments. The institute is small enough so that everyone has a chance to rotate within the orchestra — they're all fine. I hate to leave, but now I'm too committed to the Met and guest conducting to do it full justice."

Committed Mr. Levine is. Not only does he have a contract as guest conductor with the Metropolitan Opera for a second season in 1972-73 — he'll do a total of about 25 performances of "Otello," "Rigoletto" and "Barber of Seville" — but in 1973-74, he will assume a Metropolitan role that no one has ever had before — that of Principal Conductor. This means that he will spend six or seven months a year at the Met, and conduct from 35 to 40 performances of four to five operas — a new concept of the manager-designate, Goeran Gentele, and his music director, Mr. Kubelik.

Thinking it over

"When they approached me about this job," Mr. Levine said, "I took six months to think about it. It was very flattering. Imagine! 'What repertory do you want to do?' they asked. 'Why, any opera I love, that's well cast, and is sufficiently rehearsed, and that I feel a real affinity for' was what I answered. But there was more to it than that. After all, I'm 28, and I need a place to do what I can do at my present level. And a place to learn things that I don't know. My only qualm was whether I was good enough to work in an opera house with one of the best reputations in the world. And could I could do things as well as they were being done there at the moment . . .?"

Mr. Levine shook his massive curly head. "I'm a kind of a nut on one subject," he said, "and that is that certain elements of musical performances in this country — operatic and symphonic — aren't as good as they were 20 or so years ago. The sense of style that characterized the music of the '40's isn't as strong now. And when I have a free hour I put on a recording or preferably a live tape from that time to reinforce my feeling. It bothers me. Why is this so?

"Perhaps my decision had something to do with this," he said. "I felt I could learn apart from the notes and the musicianly contacts, where the grounds for compromise lie, and from the administrative problems and the technical aspects that conductors who come and go never really have to face — why great performances are so few and far between these days.

"And as far as conducting is concerned, I don't say that what I do at 28 is as good as it will be at 50, but I still know what I am doing at 28."

'They look at you'

Mr. Levine, happily, is not just one jump ahead of his next performance. "I don't feel that it's honest," he said," to stand up in front of the finest musicians in the land, after three weeks' study, and conduct a piece they've probably played under not one but many of the greatest conductors. I think you must be steeped in a piece, stewed in it, to qualify as the composer's representative. In the opera house—the Met, San Francisco—you meet the chorus, the orchestra, and the principals, and they look at you, not at the music because it's already part of them. So you'd better know it equally well. But they still rely on you, so that's a major responsibility."

Mr. Levine recalled conducting "Traviata" not too long ago in Hollywood Bowl with several famous stars. The soprano was very pleased — "How long have you known it?" she asked. Mr. Levine confesses that he was at a loss to answer. Indeed this was his first performance, but "La Traviata," like many other works in his recognized large repertory of both operatic and symphonic works, has been under consideration and study for years. Since the operatic weekends at the old Met during his Juilliard studies, the Carnegie Hall concerts, and of course the Cincinnati days, all of this music has, he feels, belonged to him, and activating it is a natural step forward.

What's ahead

This summer, Mr. Levine will be conductor of 13 entirely different programs — the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, the Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga, the Chicago Symphony at Ravinia, and the Los Angeles Philharmonic at Hollywood Bowl — no repetitions, no quick studies. In between there will be a concert with the RAI Orchestra of Italian television in Rome, and a recording, not yet announced, for Angel in London. Next winter he'll conduct the New Philarmonia and London Symphony, returning to the British Isles where he made his European debut two years ago directing "Aïda" and "The Barber" for the "exciting" Welsh Opera.

For Mr. Levine the end is not in sight. Already, he admits with a certain surprise, he is being given a choice of programs and soloists instead of having them handed to him. He is fond of more music in the operatic and symphonic repertory than he dislikes, and he isn't about to sacrifice his pianistic abilities (learned from Rosina Lhevinne and Rudolf Serkin) entirely to the baton. He hopes his new job at the Met will give him valuable insights if, in the future, an orchestral or operatic directorship "should be offered to me."

But best of all is his unmitigated enthusiasm. With 12 hours of sleep to make up, and three debut performances ahead with one of the world's great orchestras, he can still say "I love what I'm doing."

James Levine

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,254

APR 14 1972 New England Newsclip

Cincinnati Protege at BSO

The most common criticism leveled at retiring Metropolitan Opera general manager Rudolf Bing through the years has been the mediocrity of his conducting staff. And there were many raised eyebrows when, earlier this year, Bing announced that James Levine, a 28-year-old native of Cincinnati, would be the Met's new principal conductor.

Last weekend Levine conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time, replacing Rafael Kubelik, who was forced to cancel because of illness.

This was no program to test the range of a conductor's abilities. The Mussorgsky-Ravel Pictures at an Exhibition makes its appeal by bright colors and vivid orchestration. It requires from a conductor organization rather than probings for profundity. Levine's Pictures was a little garish and brassy, though the music can take it, and it was exciting without being frenetic. Pictures is, of course, a textbook of orchestration techniques and calls for some virtuoso playing. The brass found themselves in fine form.

Levine began his program with Mozart's Haffner Symphony, which Mozart wrote when he was two years younger than Levine. I liked best the deliberateness of his tempi, the stateliness of his conception of the piece. What I missed were some of the inner voices. Levine captured some of the bigness of the work but missed a lot of its charm. More attention to dynamic contrast would help.

Violin soloist Yuuoko Shiokawa, a Kubelik protege, played before intermission – the popular Mendelssohn concerto which, surprisingly had not been heard at a BSO concert for 12 years. i would like to hear Miss Shiokawa again. Maybe nerves, but her playing Saturday night was consistently flat and anything but elfin, to use the word more commonly associated with this most elfin of concerti. We'll see next time.

– L. P. KATZENSTEIN

TIME OUT
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
W. 50,000

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 531,042 SUN. 566,377

APR 19 1972 New England Newsclip

APR 14 1972 New England Newsclip

INTERLUDE—Yuuko Shikawa, soloist at today's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, gives both herself and her Emperor Stradivarius a rest during the orchestra's rehearsal yesterday at Symphony Hall. Related story, other photo, Page 33. (Globe photo by Ted Dully)

[193]

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

APR 13 1972 New England Newsclip

In Concert

One Long Dose

By Peter M. Knapp

William Steinberg is conducting his final winter-season concerts as music director of the Boston Symphony, and to close the Tuesday A series this week he chose a suitably grand finale — Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 8 in c minor.

From Memory

It took Bruckner three years, from 1884-1887, to compose this massive symphonic statement, and sometimes it sounds that long during performance. The piece imposes great demands upon audience and players — even with an intermission between the second and third movements, a break that may be merciful but does disturb concentration. Steinberg conducted it from memory, a redoubtable feat.

By any measure, this huge composition is a masterpiece of musical architecture, in many ways the summation of the great Austrian symphonist's intuitive grasp of structure, relationships and counterpoint. Inexorably, the building blocks are laid from its opening germinal motifs to the massive summing up of the finale in which all the major themes of the symphony combine in a radiant c major.

But it's a long way to C major, and impressive as this symphony is with its grand utterances and brass tuba-reinforced choirs, its harmonic restlessness and masterly counterpoint, its lyric grandeur and mystic, visionary nature — it is still a symphony ever-lasting with a rhetoric that often sounds pompous in the outer movements.

Adding Machine

Personally, I much prefer the Bruckner who could write such crisp, rhythmic scherzi and sublime slow movements — as in this symphony — to the cosmic Bruckner striving, like some musical Robert Hutchins, to put together the summation of man's struggles with nature into one Great Book. One can respect that kind of heft and sobriety, provided he does not have to read each sentence at a sitting, punctuated at each paragraph with string tremolandi and brass profundities.

Steinberg did conduct a generally impressive performance. It had admirable coherence in its outline and tempo relationships, massive weighting and solemnity of statement, spacious and expansive.

The scherzo was pungent and finely executed and the adagio — though occasionally stern and with some steely violin tone — was intense and eloquent. In the first movement, though, there were instances of rather coarse, unblended sound — and one "pop" not in the score when a second violinist snapped a string.

The Boston Sunday Advertiser
SUN. 413,988

APR 16 1972 New Englan Newsc

Steinberg Plans Final Hub Concert

William Steinberg makes his last appearance in Boston as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concerts Friday afternoon at 2 and Saturday evening at 8:30.

He will open the program with the second act of "Tristan und Isolde" with soloists James King, Eileen Farrell, Nell Rankin, Robert Hale, John Davies and Dean Wilder. This is the first performance of this work by the BSO.

In the second half of the program Steinberg will conduct Wotan's farewell and the magic fire music from "Die Walkure" with Hale as Wotan. The concert will close with Brunnhilde's death from "Die Gotterammerung" with Miss Farrell.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 10,200

APR 20 1972

PEDDLER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
13,000

APR 22 1972 New England Newsclip

Steinberg finale for BSO

On Friday afternoon at 2 and Saturday evening at 8:30, April 21 and 22, William Steinberg will make his last appearances in Boston as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Steinberg opens the program with the second act of "Tristan und Isolde" with soloists James King as Tristan, Eileen Farrell as Isolde, Nell Rankin as Brangane, Robert Hale as King Marke, John Davies as Kurwenal and Dean Wilder as Melot.

Following intermission, Steinberg conducts Wotan's farewell and the magic fire music from "Die Walkure" with Robert Hale as Wotan and, to close the concert, Brunnhilde's immolation

ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
CITIZEN ITEM
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 8,900

APR 20 1972

BACK BAY LEDGER-BEACON
HILL TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
W. 8,500

APR 20 1972 New

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

APR 24 1972 New England Newsclip

BSO: farewells—and a hail or two

By Louis Snyder

There was an evening of farewells at Symphony Hall on Saturday. The Boston Symphony played the last concert of its regular season; William Steinberg, its music director for the past three years, stepped down from that post (although he'll be back to conduct the orchestra next season); Alfred Krips, assistant concertmaster for 25 years and a member of the BSO for 39, retired permanently with a handsome spoken tribute from Mr. Steinberg and rounds of applause from the audience and his colleagues; and Wotan's Farewell from "Die Walküre," which hasn't been performed on a BSO subscription series since 1937, was back long enough to say farewell again.

It wasn't all good-bye, however. Mr. Steinberg had chosen an all-Wagner program which included the orchestra's first performance ever of the second act of "Tristan und Isolde," with Eileen Farrell returning to sing the heroine, and Robert Hale (King Marke) appearing in Boston for the first time with the orchestra after singing with it elsewhere. Tenor James King (Tristan), contralto Nell Rankin (Brangaene), tenor Dean Wilder (Melot), and baritone John Davies (Kurvenal) all made BSO debuts in the two weekend concerts.

Memorable singing

Mr. Steinberg, who had a considerable reputation as a Wagnerian conductor when he was spending more time in opera houses, reaffirmed it with a stirring account of the love duet and what precedes and follows it in Act 2. And the singing was of a standard to reawaken the most exalted memories.

Miss Farrell, in sumptuous voice, sang Isolde's music with caressing beauty of tone and phrase, and with the effortless ease of a Flagstad. Mr. King's vocal strength was a match for hers, his warm baritonal quality blending ideally with Miss Farrell's rich soprano, and on its own terms creating a declarative and virile character.

Miss Rankin used her opulent voice to great advantage, particularly in the "Warning," sung from the second balcony near the stage — a "tower" from which Brangaene's admonitions floated down dramatically. With the lengthy King Marke monologue which comes near the end of the act, Mr. Hale accomplished the impossible: He made it absorbing. His bass is of sterling quality, his diction particularly clear, and through his voice alone he made a pitiable character out of one of opera's potential bores. Mr. Wilder and Mr. Davies handled lesser assignments well.

Virtuosos at work

To hear the BSO play Wagner is an experience in itself, and on this occasion it was at its best. From the night sounds that begin the "Tristan" scene to the crashing chords which conclude it, there was virtuoso playing in all sections. Similarly in the "Walküre" excerpt, with Mr. Hale as a sonorous Wotan, and in the "Meistersinger" Prelude which ended the concert and the season, the orchestra gave voice to Mr. Steinberg's expansive, authoritative readings.

The audience was enthralled with the "Tristan" singers, with Mr. Steinberg, and with the musicians, and expressed its own good-byes with standing ovations and ringing "auf Wiedersehen" applause.

OPERA NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
23 TI. A YEAR 73,000

APR 8 1972

NAMES, DATES AND PLACES

Nell Rankin, honored last month by the Birmingham Arts Festival, is currently in Edmonton, Canada, to sing Amneris in Aida. On April 21 and 22 the mezzo joins Eileen Farrell and James King for concert performances of Tristan und Isolde with the Boston Symphony, William Steinberg conducting. Early May takes Miss Rankin to San Antonio for Verdi's Messa da Requiem under the baton of Victor Alessandro. In the fall she will give her first New York recital in many years, at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D 281,042 SUN. 566,377

APR 22 1972 New England Newsclip

Departure in grand C major

Steinberg's BSO farewell

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

William Steinberg's concerts with the Boston Symphony this weekend end his term as the orchestra's Music Director. He will, however, be back next season for five Friday-Saturday pairs plus some Tuesdays and Thursdays, with repertory including the Verdi Requiem and Mahler's Second Symphony.

Yesterday he took his leave from the Friday afternoon audience, going out, as he had come in two and a half years ago, in grand C major. Then it was Beethoven's "Consecration of the House," this time Wagner's "Meistersinger" which wound up an all-Wagner program that also included an almost complete second act of "Tristan and Isolde" and Wotan's Farewell to Bruennhilde from the "Die Walkuere."

"Meistersinger" was terrific. Suddenly it was a party. A sense of occasion got into everybody. Steinberg conducted with a physical energy and visual clarity to which he has seldom had access these past few years, and he paid attention to absolutely everything, so that the orchestra produced a performance which was animated in every strand of texture, with each figure in sharpest focus. I am not forgetting that it is a piece the orchestra knows much better than "Walkuere" and "Tristan" but this was an extraordinary response to Steinberg's sudden determination to show what mastery as a conductor is all about. And I must say that when it is played at the top of its form, I love the Boston Symphony as a Wagner orchestra, with that sonority which is festive but not fat.

In popular operatic lore, King Mark is considered the arch bore in literature. Conductors and wobbly basses seem often to have gone out of their way to bolster that not very perceptive view of Wagner's telling of the Tristan story, but yesterday we had the startling and interesting novelty of a performance of Act Two of "Tristan" that really came to life only with the entrance of Mark. The part was sung with intensity, passion, but without a trace of lacrymose self pity and, after perhaps a minute of roughness at the beginning, with handsome sound by Robert Hale. He was superbly supported and paced by Steinberg, though the crucial bass clarinet solos that run through Mark's music were crudely played, and the whole performance, which had tended to be quite inert up to that point, took on a vitality that stayed with it until the imagined curtain fall.

James King, an interesting, even compelling, though vocally often uneasy Tristan, did his most beautiful singing in the address to Isolde that follows his brief reply to Mark, and Eileen Farrell the splendidly sonorous Isolde, replied with singing that was in its own way a marvel of lovely sound and musical sensibility. Farrell did not attempt the two high C's, though the high B was attacked and taken with what seemed like limitless and justified vocal confidence.

The Brangaene was Nell Rankin: some temperament and a large and beautiful voice in bad condition, producing more shake than pitch. Dean Wilder had only a brief contribution to make as Melot, and did it well, John Davies as Kurwenal having an even briefer one (three words: "Save yourself, Tristan"). The orchestral playing tended to be muddily unbeautiful and lacking in atmosphere. As for the long cut just after Tristan's entrance, I know it is standard in the theater, but it is bad just the same.

Wotan's Farewell is so much the finale of the finale, something very much emphasized by Steinberg's concentrated pacing of it, that it does not live quite happily without the antecedent three or four hours of "Walkuere." Aside from that, the performance was very up and down. Steinberg did some of his most attentive conducting, but also some of his least helpful. The orchestra did some beautifully evocative playing, for example at the first leaping up of flames around Bruennhilde, but also some that was fairly shabby, not always its fault where the problem was one of percision, though the bad intonation was another matter. Robert Hale now reappered as Wotan, sounding superb, excellent when imperious, much less convincing in tenderness: the cellos, as Steinberg made them sing the melody of "Zum letzten Mal," did it better with a certain reigned-in quality that was touching as Hale's more open projection of those lines had not been.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D 67,117

APR 22 1972 New England Newsclip

Singers Occupy Center Stage In Boston Symphony Concert

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Singers occupied an important part of yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, the final program of the season and William Steinberg's last as music director. Knowing the fare served up was all Wagner and that one of the voices belonged to Eileen Farrell, you might assume singers not only occupied but took possession of the occasion.

Partly you would be right. It was vocal work which gave the concert luster, and not just Miss Farrell's contribution, either. Besides Miss Farrell, mezzo-soprano Nell Rankin, tenor James King and bass Robert Hale had principal assignments.

It was a quite peculiar piece of programming Steinberg offered. On the first half was the second act from "Tristan and Isolde," followed by Wotan's farewell from "Die Walkuere" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The "Tristan" excerpt was the big attraction, naturally, what with Miss Farrell singing Isolde. To hear her sing any Wagner is a treat. But Isolde is a supreme role, one for which her vocal strength is aptly suited.

Steinberg kept the orchestral dynamic level down, rather too much at certain points. This, after all, is the most erotic act in opera, depicting one way and another the consummation of a love affair. Perhaps to allow voices greater opportunities the conductor purposely read the score more quietly than others do.

Yet the enormous sensual effect aroused by this music was lost to a marked degree. And probably the result had a further end. Miss Farrell, too, restricted her production somewhat to an intimate scale, thus losing a bit in the way of characterization.

Nevertheless, when she did let go with her big, gleaming high register her singing was gorgeous. Also, and this is something she always has been mistress of, the legato phrasing was as outstanding as the dead-on accuracy of her attacks.

James King's Tristan lacked that kind of easy control a bit. The line, "O sink' hernieder, Nacht der Liebe," for example, was not all connected as it can be. Still, the tenor had a ring at the top and a generous sound to fill the hall with.

As Brangaene, Nell Rankin sang a superb warning from high in the top balcony. And for once King Mark was not a wobbly bore. Young, slim Robert Hale's imposingly dark bass was beautifully flexible. He was equally at home in Wotan's farewell.

For briefer assignments there were Dean Wilder's Melot and John Davies' quick glimpse of Kurwenal. This was a concert performance, of course, using music stands and scores. Miss Farrell wore her reading glasses.

So the thing to do was close your eyes and conjure up your x-rated images. Well, you have to close your eyes during many productions of "Tristan" (except the Met's new one, according to report) for complete credulity.

Although the program was William Steinberg's last as the orchestra's music director, he will be back in guest conductor capacities. The galleries, especially, gave him and the singers a cheering reception.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.

APR 22 1972 New England Newsclip

Music Review

Steinberg Exits With Perfect Choice

By JOHN RICHARDSON

William Steinberg conducted his last afternoon concert as music director of the Boston Symphony yesterday. For his farewell he chose an all-Wagner program, music he feels deeply and conducted beautifully.

The concert opened with a somewhat cut performance of the second act of "Tristan und Isolde." This was the first time the orchestra had played anything from the opera besides the Prelude and Liebestod and the first time many of the singers had sung these roles. James King sang Tristan with a wonderful sense of lyricism coupled with the requisite strength; well-known already for his singing of other Wagner roles, Tristan will be a fine part for him.

Eileen Farrell's Isolde was quite extraordinary. While she did not sing the two viciously difficult high C's, she managed the rest of her music with great ease, fine musicianship and wonderfully sensuous singing. Nell Rankin's call to the lovers from the watchtower (sung from the hallway behind the balcony in Symphony Hall) was most moving and was sung with better intonation than is usually heard in this section. Robert Hale's King Mark was appropriately dignified.

It was quite a treat to hear at least this much of Tristan, for it has an impact when heard live that never can be matched on recordings. The incredible richness of Wagner's imagination, his harmonic mastery and inventiveness, and his sense of drama are made much more real emanating from real flesh and blood rather than a disembodied speaker.

Mr. Steinberg's conducting was most passionate and beautifully paced. The buildup to Tristan's entrance was most exciting, the Liebesnacht tender, restrained and touching. The orchestra played with vigor and commitment a piece that most opera orchestras work on for years to play this well.

The program continued with a virtuoso reading of Wotan's Farewell from "Die Walkure," beautifully sung by Robert Hale, and finished with an all-stops-out performance of the Meistersinger Prelude.

It was a perfect choice of music for Mr. Steinberg's last concert, for it showed his best qualities: a fine sense of pacing and color, an admirable sobriety, and a self-effacing sort of conducting that allows the music to speak with force and clarity.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

APR 27 1972 New England Newsclip

In Farewell

Steinberg Closes Symphony Season

They applauded and cheered long and loud at the close of Saturday night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Symphony Hall. Very likely some of the enthusiasm was occasioned by the all-Wagner program chosen by William Steinberg for the season's final pair of regular concerts. But more of it, no doubt, was the farewell tribute to Mr. Steinberg as musical director of the Orchestra. For the weekend's program marked the end of the three-year Steinberg regime in Boston. Although he will return next year for five pairs, he will appear as a guest conductor under the new era of Seiji Ozawa.

It would be nice to be able to say that Mr. Steinberg went out in glory. The ovation might have suggested as much. And certainly the playing of the Meistersinger Prelude which closed the program made it seem that way. It was a massive, driving performance with everything in proper scale. The strings glistened, the brass chords were clean and firm indeed brilliant; the inner voices were clearly articulated, and the rhythm was crisp. It was a fast-moving reading, perhaps a shade or two faster than usual, but the quickened pace added true excitement to the great Prelude.

Mr. Steinberg seemed to save it for the end. Earlier, the evening plodded along heavy handed through Act II of Tristan and Isolde and Wotan's Farewell and the Magic Fire Music from Die Walkuere. The difference in performances was almost unbelievable. The same orchestra, the same conductor, the same evening, the same hall — and yet it was all so unlike.

Even with Eileen Farrell as Isolde, singing with all the splendor that has always come from her voice, Tristan's Second act fell flat. This is music of exotic beauty and the magic pulse of poetry and passionate love. The act occurs in the opera in a garden on a summer night. The music is Languorous and the scene is enchanting although foreboding of doom. Little of this web of ecstasy was present on Saturday night. The horns had trouble with intonation, the pacing seemed sluggish and the other singers were no match for Miss Farrell.

James King's Tristan was forced, far from the helden tenor quality Wagner calls for. In the shadow of Miss Farrell's power, he may have had a harder than necessary time of it. But the lack of balance between the voices of the lovers deprived the love duet of its eloquence and sensuousness.

Of the other soloists, Nell Rankin's Branganene was the most persuasive performance. Mr. Steinberg had her move from stage center to the second balcony tier where she sang impressively to simulate some of the movement in a fully staged presentation of the opera. Robert Hale's King Marke and Dean Wilder's Melot were wrought carefully but without drama or conviction. John Davies sounded Kurvenal's three-word warning that the lovers have been trapped.

Mr. Hale appeared again in the Wotan episode. Here his voice seemed fuller than in Tristan. It got into the music more successfully and conveyed the moving emotion of the father taking leave of his favorite child. But what the soloist accomplished, the Orchestra did not. The playing lacked suppleness and refinement. Wagner, with the exception of the Meistersinger music, has fared better on other occasions.

Since it was an evening of farewells, Mr. Steinberg added a charming note by asking Alfred Krips, the assistant concertmaster, to rise for a special bow. Mr. Krips, the conductor told the audience, had been a member of the Orchestra for 39 years, occupying the assistant concertmaster's chair for the last 25 of them. He had earned, said Mr. Steinberg, a happy retirement in which all wished him well. Everyone joyously agreed.

H.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

APR 22 1972 New England Newsclip

Steinberg Leads Boston Symphony in All-Wagner Program

By HARRY NEVILLE

William Steinberg will be very much a part of the Boston Symphony's musical activities next season, but the concerts he is conducting this week with the orchestra mark his final local appearances as music director. Consequently, there was a sense of occasion about yesterday's concert, and when Steinberg appeared on stage most of the audience rose to pay tribute to a man who had spent three years with the orchestra, helping it to weather a rather difficult period in its history.

His all-Wagner program consisted of Act Two of "Tristan und Isolde"—the act which portrays the bliss of the lovers and ends with their discovery by Melot and King Marke—as well as Wotan's Farewell and the Magic Fire Music from "Die Walkuere," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

WOTAN'S FAREWELL, one of Wagner's most touching scenes, might have been taken as symbolizing Steinberg's farewell to the orchestra. One didn't dare carry the symbolism too far, however, for Wotan has just put Bruennhilde to sleep until the right man comes along. And Seiji Ozawa isn't scheduled to come along until 1973-74.

The veteran Eileen Farrell sang Isolde, and it can be reported that her voice retains much of its richness and bigness of tone, though there were a few times when it did not come through the orchestral fabric with sufficient strength. The real problem was that she didn't seem really to feel the character, didn't seem responsive enough to the text—partly, no doubt, because it's difficult for any singer to simulate in a concert performance the passions of a stage performance.

THIS PROVED to be less of a problem for James King, who gave a fine characterization of Tristan. His voice does not have the penetrating, ringing quality of the Heldentenor. It's powerful nonetheless, though its power is tempered by a lyric sweetness that seemed quite appropriate to the love-music of Act Two.

Nell Rankin made a rich, dark-voiced Brangaene. Other roles were very capably filled by Robert Hale (King Marke), John Davies (Kurwenal) and Dean Wilder (Melot). Hale returned after intermission to give an exceptionally good account—magisterial yet tender—of Wotan's farewell to his daughter.

STEINBERG'S conducting had all the dignity and breadth one expects of him. Tempos were measured but never too slow, the rhythms were vital and onward-going. For some reason, the playing in "Tristan"—particularly that of the strings—lacked tonal richness, yet it became quite lovely and rich in the excerpt from "Die Walkuere." The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Notes for Next Season

The coming season will be an interim period for the Boston Symphony, with music director William Steinberg having returned to Pittsburgh and his announced successor, Seiji Ozawa, not scheduled to take over until the following year. Instead of a music director, there will be nine guest conductors, among them Mr. Ozawa who will bear the title of music advisor, Mr. Steinberg, and Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas, principal guest conductors. Other conductors will be Claudio Abbado, Daniel Barenboim, Leonard Bernstein, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink.

Among the highlights for the season will be Mr. Steinberg conducting Mahler's Symphony No. 2 and the Verdi "Requiem," Mr. Davis conducting Berlioz' "Te Deum" and Elgar's Violin Concerto with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein soloist, and Lorin Maazel conducting the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 4 with soloist Vladimir Ashkenazy. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the world premiere of a flute concerto written by Walter Piston for the orchestra's principal flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, and Mr. Barenboim will conduct Bruckner's Symphony No. 9.

New Series Selections

There will be nine different series of concerts available by subscription: the full 20-concert Friday afternoon and Saturday night series, a new division of the Saturday night series into two 10-concert, "odd" and "even" series, the 10-concert Tuesday "A" series, the six-concert Tuesday "B" series, and the six-concert Tuesday "C" Cambridge) series, which is also performed in Symphony Hall, Boston. There will be a six-concert Thursday "A" and a three-concert Thursday "B" (Romantic Music) series. In addition, Michael Tilson Thomas will return for a three-concert "Spectrum" series, and there will be a series of eight open rehearsals.

Information on which conductors will conduct on which dates is available from Symphony Hall, Boston. Programs and soloists will be announced later.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

MAY 13 1972 New England Newsclip

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,818

MAY 1 1972

THE BSO LINE-UP: With the Boston Symphony Orchestra entering a year of transition between William Steinberg's departure as music director and Seiji Ozawa's assumption of the job, Beantown music lovers will be treated to something of a course in comparative conducting next season. Nine men will share the BSO baton, including Leonard Bernstein, who'll be living in Boston much of the year as a visiting professor at Harvard, and will conduct the BSO for seven performances between November and April. Along with Bernstein, Ozawa and Steinberg, other conductors will be Michael Tilson Thomas and Colin Davis, named the BSO's "principal guest conductors," and Claudio Abbado, Daniel Barenboim, Lorin Maazel and Bernard Haitink.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

APR 30 1972 New England Newsclip

The Boston years of William Steinberg

by Harry Neville

"It wasn't easy for me to lay down my job as music director. I love the orchestra and it seems to me the love is mutual. But the heavy hand of Pittsburgh, with whom I have a life-time contract, has become heavier, and I must yield to the wishes of my friends there." The man speaking was, of course, William Steinberg, who, after a three-year tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony, steps down from that position this summer in order to devote his full energies to the Pittsburgh Symphony, of which he is also music director.

He had given us a few minutes of his time on a recent Saturday morning so that we could ask a few questions about his years with the BSO. Our interview took place in the Ritz-Carlton, in a 15th floor room with a splendid view of Boston Garden. The Maestro, as he was introduced to us, seemed in a genial mood. The picture of Middle-European civility, he offered us mints from San Francisco, whiskey from Scotland, and encouraged us to smoke. "The doctors say it is as bad for me as if I did it myself, but I love it all the same. I sometimes say to my driver, 'Paul, will you smoke for me, please?' "

Only on the subject of reporters was he a bit dour and forbidding. "I have so many times been misquoted," he said, "so many times quoted out of context." Our reporter's pad and pencil seemed not to encourage him to think that things would be different this time, but he returned to his subject nevertheless: "I am, so I think, not entirely severed from the orchestra. I have in my pocket a contract for eight weeks with the Boston Symphony next year. What happens after next year I do not know. I want to cut down on my plans, and my children want me to, but I have no choice. I feel that, regardless of my age, I have something to offer and that I am, therefore, morally obliged to give it. If I did not I would be a scoundrel. That may sound inflated, but it is not."

Asked about important changes that had taken place in the orchestra during his tenure, he cited new personnel in several departments: violins, trombones, clarinets and oboes. Also a new principal horn, who will be joining the orchestra presently. One departure gave him particular satisfaction, that of a person he identified as the head of the "senza sordino" movement, "a plot to set everyone against everyone." He seemed pleased with the growing number of female players in the orchestra, and he summed the entire matter up by saying: "The changes I made were so basic that we don't need more. There is no doubt now that this will remain one of the great orchestras of the world."

Asked which performances he was particularly proud of, he replied: "My memory for performances goes back only to the bad ones, to the mistakes, and since there were so few mistakes, I must assume that most of the performances were very good. If I named certain ones, then I would wrong other ones." He went on, however, to say that he thought the Beethoven, Brahms, Bruckner, Mahler and Wagner performances had been outstanding.

On the subject of guest conductors and the problems they encounter, he used the example of Pittsburgh, which he described as a terribly aggressive orchestra. "When guest conductors come, I warn them, 'This is an orchestra that sometimes plays the way it is conducted.' Boston is the same way. But every orchestra is always interested in playing its best. There is no reason why they should play against a conductor."

Of conductors in general, he labeled them a necessary evil—"sometimes more necessary, sometimes more evil. How does it happen that conductors are so conceited? Many of them have nothing else to offer."

Unlike many others, Steinberg is not pessimistic about the future of the orchestral concert. Neither is he pessimistic about the future of the standard program. "The interest of the young in Beethoven, Brahms, Bruckner and Mahler is astounding. You don't attract the young with wrong notes but with good music. By wrong notes I mean a certain kind of contemporary music. There seems to be an assumption on the part of some people that the wronger the note the louder the cheers will be."

For audiences he had this advice: "We are so well-educated that we don't like applause after the first movement of a work. I believe this is contrary to the wishes of many of the great composers. In Pittsburgh I once conducted a Bach violin concerto during which the audience broke into applause after each movement. They forgot about their good education, and I loved it, I was touched. If you like a thing, then by all means show that you like it."

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,510 S. 260,961

MAY 12 1972

New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

AN UNIQUE PROJECT will be introduced to the Friends of the Boston Symphony at their annual meeting, Friday, May 19. Needlepoint kits, incorporating original designs by the Women's Educational and Industrial Union, will be on display and for sale only to Friends.

The kits for pillows, slippers, door-stops, coasters and glasses cases will feature the colophon, symbol of the BSO, in luscious shades of beige, green and rusty-rose. Orders placed the day of the meeting will be received in plenty of time for summer vacation needlepointing and the prices are reasonable.

This idea to benefit the Friends was originally organized by Mrs. John H. Knowles and Mrs. Robert Kistner. Mrs. John T. G. Nichols 3d and Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr. are continuing the enterprise as cochairmen and will be on hand to answer questions and take orders.

The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have invited the Friends to "A Special Programme" on the occasion of the 38th annual meeting of the Friends of the Orchestra. Arthur Fiedler will rehearse the Boston Pops when Friends will be seated between 11:30 and 11:45 during the intermission. The rehearsal will end at 12:30 and will be followed by brief remarks from Talcott M. Banks, president of the Board of Trustees.

Special recognition will be given to Arthur Fiedler and members of the orchestra and staff who have been with the Boston Symphony 25 years or more. An informal box luncheon will follow the rehearsal and annual meeting. Chairman of the meeting are Mrs. Norman L. Cahners and Mrs. Louis W. Cabot, assisted by vice chairmen Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. Karl Riemer.

Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends, has announced that the Friends have been invited to "A Day at Tanglewood," July 6. The day will include the premiere of "Tanglewood Talks and Walks" with Phyllis Curtin as guest speaker. Luncheon and a guided tour of the grounds will follow. Those interested may sign up at the annual meeting, May 19.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,093

JUN 2 1972

New England Newsclip

Arthur Fiedler was honored by the Friends of the BSO recently for having given 25 years or more service to the Orchestra. Others honored were, left to right, John Barwicki, bass player for 34 years, Katherine Whitty, executive secretary of the Council for 28 years, James Brosnahan, assistant manager for business affairs for 48 years and currently consultant to the Orchestra; Fiedler, Dorothy Sullivan, assistant treasurer for 29 years, and Thomas Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony for 26 years.

Friends' Needlepoint Project To Benefit Boston Symphony

Rose Walsh

Needlework to Benefit BSO

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.

MAY 12 1972

New England Newsclip

Now it's a needlework project that the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is promoting to benefit their work for the BSO. Mrs. John H. Knowles, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. John T. G. Nichols, III and Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow will introduce the idea to members of the Friends at their annual meeting on May 19.

Needlepoint kits, incorporating original designs by the Women's Educational & Industrial Union will be on display and for sale only to members of the Friends. The kits for pillows, slippers, door-stops, coasters and glass cases will feature the colophon, symbol of the BSO in beige, green and rusty rose.

Orders placed on the day of the 38th annual meeting will be received in plenty of time for summer vacation needlepointing, and the prices are reasonable.

The meeting for which the trustees of the BSO have arranged a special program—Arthur Fiedler rehearsing the Boston Pops between 11:30 and 12:30—will be followed by brief remarks from Talcott M. Banks, president of the board of trustees. An informal box luncheon is planned.

Mrs. Norman L. Cahners and Mrs. Louis W. Cabot are co-chairmen of this annual Friends Meeting, assisted by Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. Karl Riemer.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,510 S. 260,961

MAY 22 1972

New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

Awards to BSO Members

THERE'S NO DOUBT about the "rapport" between the members and staff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its Council of Friends. At the 38th annual meeting of the Friends, Friday, in Symphony Hall, there were cheers and applause when Talcott Banks, president of the trustees, presented awards to 21 members of the orchestra and 4 staff members who have been with the orchestra 25 years or more.

When Arthur Fiedler, who has been with the orchestra 58 years, received his citation, there was a standing ovation. At 11:30 he conducted the Pops Orchestra in its program for the Lerner and Loewe Evening, that night, and everyone enjoyed selections from "Camelot," "My Fair Lady," "Brigadoon" and "Gi Gi." Ranny Weeks, who has played at many deb parties and weddings, conducted the orchestra in a group of Boston University songs.

Talcott Banks spoke of the deep financial trouble most organizations face these days and thanked the Friends for all their help. He also pointed out that the world will have to change its traditional image of the BSO now that the gifted young conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, has opened Symphony Hall to the younger generation.

Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends, was in Atlanta at an Episcopal conference, but sent greetings. Mrs. Norman L. Cahners and Mrs. Louis W. Cabot were co-chairman of the meeting with Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. Karl Riemer as vice-chairmen.

Among the many others enjoying the program and box luncheons were Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. George Bates, Mrs. Lewis Clark, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. Jack Parker, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Donald Sinclair, Mrs. Edwin Green, Mrs. Richard Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Harold Hodgkinson and Mrs. Richard Ely.

Also, Mrs. Ducey Ryerson, Mrs. Joseph W. Lund, Mr. and Mrs. E. Morton Jennings Jr., Mrs. William J. Mixter Jr., Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mrs. Thomas Franks, Mrs. Albert Pagliarulo, Mrs. John T. G. Nichols, and Mrs. Alfred Willmann.

JOURNAL
REVERE, MASS.
W. 9,000

MAY 18 1972

New England Newsclip

MUSIC APPRECIATION — The Council of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently held a luncheon at the Fernwood Restaurant, Pictured here, left to right, Leonard D'Orlando, owner of the Fernwood; Mrs. Theresa Pagliarulo, area chairman of the group; guest speaker Harry Ellis Dickson, assistant conductor for the Boston Pops and music director of the youth concerts at Symphony Hall; and Mrs. George L. Sargent, chairman of the Council and sister-in-law of Gov. Francis W. Sargent.

Hold Luncheon For Benefit Of Symphony

Mrs. Albert Pagliarulo of Revere, area chairman in Revere, Winthrop and Malden for the Council of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, welcomed approximately 45 ladies and gentlemen recently at the Fernwood Restaurant.

Harry Ellis Dickson, assistant conductor for the Boston Pops and music director for the youth concerts at Symphony Hall, was the guest speaker. Mrs. George L. Sargent, chairman, spoke of the advantages of becoming a "friend" while Mrs. William Mixter spoke on the duties of area chairmen.

Among those present were:

Mrs. Margaret Bly, Mrs. Vincent Murray, Mrs. Peter Jordan, Mrs. Peg McCarthy, Mrs. George Colella, Mrs. Rita Averill, Mrs. James Weeder, Mrs. Carl Marino, Mrs. Gabriel Mattera, Mrs. Alice Clarke, Mrs. James Sarno, Mrs. Nellie DiMattia and Mrs. Parker Brown.

Also, Mrs. William Smith, Mrs. Edward Cerulli, Mrs. Yolanda D'Eramo, Mrs. Leonard D'Orlando, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Marra, Mrs. Robert Rossetti, Mrs. John Doherty, Mrs. John Gillis, Mrs. Marguerite DeStefano, Miss Mary Wall, Mrs. William Petrilli, Mrs. Harold Turiello, Mrs. Madge Toomey and Mrs. Angelo Longo.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,003

JUN 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Good News Abounds Among BSO's Council

There was nothing dull about the annual meeting of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held Monday at a sherry-buffet luncheon at Symphony Hall. Around tables centered with pots of brilliant red geraniums members enjoyed listening to the officers' reports — all good news — and then had the pleasure of having Henry B. Cabot, BSO trustee emeritus, reveal some of his reminiscences.

Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the congenial organization, "touched bases" (her expression) with recently instigated projects and announced that the Friends have begun a production liaison with both the Youth Concerts (founded by first violinist, Harry Ellis Dickson) and Tanglewood Friends.

She paid special tribute to the Press for their generous support, all through the years, of the Friends' varied activities benefiting the orchestra.

The Council numbers 4263. Total contributions, including pledges, have amounted to $452,694, Mrs. Frank G. Allen's treasurer's report revealed a net profit of $8,045.79 from the Pre-Symphony suppers, luncheons and Stage Door lectures.

Kudos went to "quietly spectacular" Mrs. John M. Bradley, reporting on the fantastic Musical Marathon, which she chaired, that raised $59,011 in a non-stop four-day and night period. Report of the nominating committee was Mrs. Harris Fahnestock's (a BSO trustee) responsibility.

Among others participating in the meeting were Mrs. John Grandin, Mrs. William J. Mixter, Jr., Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. Ducey Ryerson, Mrs. Frank Whitty, Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mrs. George Parson, Mrs. Jack Parker, Mrs. Robert W. Kistner, Talcott Banks, president of the BSO board of trustees; Thomas D. Perry, BSO manager; David Rockefeller (made a brief appearance) and Harry Ellis Dickson.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

JUN 6 1972 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

Three ladies were suitably rewarded yesterday at the final event of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season. They were rewarded for the hard work they had done in gathering the greatest number of new Friends for the orchestra this year.

New Hampshire must be a fertile field in which to search for new music lovers, for two of the three ladies who recruited the largest number of Friends came from that state. Mrs. Charles Gallagher and Mrs. Charles Terry III both hail from Exeter and both were at the luncheon and annual meeting yesterday. The third lady who tied with Mrs. Terry for first place was unable to be there as she was holding a party for her first grader's class. She is Mrs. Edward Gleason of Dedham, wife of the headmaster of Noble and Greenough School.

The meeting was held in the marble foyer of Symphony Hall with the stern countenance of the founder of the BSO, Henry Lee Higginson, looking down on the proceedings. The long tables held pots of gay red geraniums which were for sale for the benefit of the organization.

Mrs. George Lee Sargent

A lady who must be one of the most enthusiastic and certainly one of the most energetic chairmen of any organization in Boston, Mrs. George Lee Sargent of Dover, conducted the meeting after the luncheon of chicken salad and tiny sandwiches. Her easy manner and obvious delight at the success of the various projects of the Symphony Friends during the year made the routine business pass quickly.

Among the many at the final affair were several members of the orchestra including Harry Ellis Dickson and Armando Ghitalla who made a special presentation to the chairman of the extremely successful 1972 Musical Marathon, Mrs. John M. Bradley.

Others glimpsed in the large group were Mrs. Thomas Franks, Mrs. Fredrick Stare and Mrs. Gilman Conent, all of Wellesley and Mrs. Robert Kistner of Needham, all seated together; Mrs. Richard Ely of Weston; Mrs. A. Lloyd Russell; Mrs. Francis de Marneffe; Mrs. C. Russell Eddy of Duxbury; Mrs. Jack Parker of Wellesley; Mrs. Alfred Willman of Belmont; Mrs. Ducey Ryerson of Chestnut Hill, and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 410,003

MAY 22 1972 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh

Symphony Friends Give Some Awards

So many anniversaries were taking place at Friday's 38th annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall that Talcott M. Banks, president of the Board of Trustees, thought it was a fitting time to make some well deserved awards.

Arthur Fiedler, who has been with the Orchestra 58 years, topped the list. Harry Ellis Dickson, Roger Voisin, Patsy Cardillo, Roland Tapley, Bernard Zighera, Charles Smith and several others who have been with the BSO 25 or more years were cheered as they stepped on to the stage to receive their honors.

Then members of the staff like Thomas D. Perry, Jr., James J. Brosnahan, Dorothy Sullivan and prodigious Kay Whitty (Mrs. Frank) 25-year stalwarts, were duly recognized.

Council of Friends of BSO, whose chairman is Mrs. George Lee Sargent, planned the special event featuring a rehearsal of the Boston Pops (Fiedler conducting) followed by cocktails and an attractive box luncheon leisurely enjoyed at the Pops round tables.

Over 700 Friends (including scores of men) attended the meeting co-chaired by Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, Mrs. Louis Cabot, Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. Karl Riemer. Helping with details were Mrs. George E. Bates, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Edwin T. Green, Mrs. Bela T. Kalman, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. William Jason Mixter, Jr., Mrs. Jack S. Parker, Mrs. M. Ducey Ryerson, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Albert Pagliarulo, and Mrs. Harold H. Blanchard among others.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

JUN 7 1972 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

by Alison Arnold

Henry Cabot Gets Big Ovation At Symphony Friends Luncheon

WOMEN ARE INDISPENSABLE to fund-raising, according to Henry B. Cabot, trustee emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He received a rising ovation as he spoke at the annual meeting and luncheon of the Council of Friends of the orchestra, Monday, in Symphony Hall.

At the head table with him were Edward A. Taft, Mrs. Cabot, Mrs. George Lee Sargent, Mrs. John Bradley and Mrs. John Knowles.

A bronze bust of Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, presided silently at the meeting in the front lobby of Symphony Hall. After sherry, the many Friends sat at luncheon tables that were gay with pots of scarlet geraniums.

Mrs. Sargent, chairman of the Council of Friends, announced that because of the popularity of the Stage Door Lectures, there will be two series next season. These lectures by members of the orchestra in the basement of Symphony Hall with box luncheons, give subscribers a feeling of being behind-the-scenes and have proved a greater attraction than the more formal buffet luncheons in Horticultural Hall that have been cancelled.

Also cancelled next season are the Pre-Symphony Suppers at the Sheraton-Boston, of which Mrs. Howard Davis and Mrs. Samuel A. Levine were cochairmen. But again, the basement of Symphony Hall seems to hold more lure, as the Table Talk Dinners there, with Table Talk pies for dessert, were well attended.

Mrs. Bradley, chairman of the successful Musical Marathon that exceeded its goal of $50,000, was extolled for being "quietly spectacular." Incidentally, the fact that Beethoven's Ninth was the orchestra's most requested selection in the Marathon proves undisputedly that Beethoven is Boston's favorite.

The two women trustees of the orchestra, Mrs. James Perkins, and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, who shepherded the Mini Tour to New York, were at the luncheon. Sitting beside the latter was Harry Ellis Dickson.

The annual meeting seemed also the best possible time to pay tribute to the 25-year members of the orchestra and staff and to those 500 Friends who have for so long supported their great orchestra. Cochairmen of the luncheon were Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld, Mrs. Karl Riemer, Mrs. Louis Cabot and Mrs. Norman Cahners.

The big excitement this year is that the Friends are opening two new areas—one in Revere, Winthrop and Malden, with Mrs. Albert Pagliarulo as chairman, and the other in Roxbury and Dorchester, with Mrs. Jim Lee Hunt in charge.

In May, Mrs. Pagliarulo had a luncheon for 40 women at her house in Revere to hear about the Friends and Council. Mrs. Sargent, Mrs. William J. Mixter Jr. and Mrs. Frank Whitty answered questions and many volunteered help.

In addition to the Revere luncheon, Mrs. Thomas Gardner had a chowder lunch party for members of the Beverly Farms-Manchester area in January, Mrs. Erick Kauders gave a successful "Sip and Sup" party in Marblehead last fall, and Mrs. C. Russell Eddy held a barn sale at her home in Duxbury last summer that netted more than $2,000 for the Friends.

Among others at the meeting were Mrs. Richard Thompson, Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., Mrs. Charles P. Howard, Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb, Mrs. S. Abbot Smith, Mrs. Thomas Franks, Mrs. George Parson, Mrs. Robert Hopkins, Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mrs. Jack Parker, Mrs. Donald Sinclair, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr., Mrs. M. Ducey Ryerson, Mrs. William Manice, Mrs. George Bates, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. Robert Daley, Robert Millar and Mrs. Frederick Whiskin

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,012 SUN. 566,377

APR 9 1972

New England Newsclip

Packaging music for a new market

BSO's Spectrum: How was it?

MICHAEL STEINBERG

The first season of the Boston Symphony's new Spectrum concert with Michael Tilson Thomas is over, and the orchestra plans a similar series next year. Let's see what we have had so far.

Mostly packaging. I don't mean to minimize the musical values of Spectrum. It is a service to offer a series whose subscribers can be sure that they will not be served "Daphnis et Chloe" or Brahms in B flat. Better, Thomas is an imaginative program-builder with a wide range of interests, and in Spectrum he walked into some interesting territory. He is also an extremely good conductor, and more often than not the orchestra responds to him with beautiful playing.

To begin with what I feel most positive about. Spectrum included two strong, individual pieces by young American composers, Steve Reich's "Four Organs" and David Del Tredici's "Pop-pourri." It allowed us to hear one of the landmarks of Romantic camp, the "Hexameron" for six pianos and orchestra by Liszt, Chopin, Czerny, Herz, Pixis, and Thalberg, though one might argue that to make it really worth while, you would want to begin putting together your cast by engaging Brendel, Horowitz, and Watts (plus Frager, Michelangeli, Rubinstein?). The two Stravinsky evenings brought a couple of still little-known late works, "Introitus — T.S. Eliot in memoriam" and "Requiem Canticles," and performance standards were at their least on a considerable level of competence and ranged in "Rite of Spring" and particularly the Symphony of Psalms (New England Conservatory Chorus) to the superb. There was also one absolutely extraordinary performance of standard repertory, the one of Bartok's Music for strings, percussion, and celesta.

But what was really new in Spectrum was the packaging. Other than "Hexameron," which required a stage extension, nothing on Spectrum would by virtue of its substance have been unmanageable at an ordinary subscription concert. There was a high proportion of off-the-beaten-track music, but not wildly so. What remains as different is that the conductor talks, that each program has included from one to three unannounced extra pieces, and the costuming.

About talking conductors in general and talking Michael Thomas in particular, I blow hot and cold. How do you talk to an audience that includes Michael Steinberg, who is supposed to know everything, and his eight-year old neighbor, who lives in a house full of good records but who has heard rather fewer concerts and knows damned little musical terminology, and a pair of bright college students whom attractive advertising has seduced into their first tentative contact with a symphony orchestra?

Thomas knows a lot, he is articulate, and he has a sense of humor. He is a little showy, too, and given to saying things like Messiaen is "the greatest living syncretist" as though he didn't really know that three quarters of his audience doesn't have the slightest idea what that is. It was good that Thomas reduced the amount of talk as the season went on—Spectrum concerts have tended to be awfully long anyway—and even better that he redistributed it so as to have it occur just a few times per concert rather than before each piece.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,012 SUN. 566,377

DEC 1 1971

New England Newsclip

QUODLIBET

Radcliffe hits a clear note

By Ellen Pfeifer, Globe Staff

Separate-and-supposedly-equal opportunities have not proved a success in the recent history of Harvard-Radcliffe choral organizations. Last year, the situation came to a head with women from the Radcliffe Choral Society protesting the more frequent public appearances by the Harvard Glee Club and demanding more joint concerts with the all-male group. The result: a new, smaller, select, mixed society which replaces the Radcliffe Choral Society and which is called the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum.

Not only did the creation of this 55-voice chorus clear up the intra-group tensions, but it has given conductor F. John Adams a chance to perform early music with historically authentic performing resources — probably, the group's most important contribution.

'When the two choral societies used to get togeher, it meant a group of 120 or so," explained Adams over lunch Monday at Ferdinand's. "You just can't get good clear singing with that many voices."

"Basically, the Collegium Musicum is the Radcliffe Choral Society with men admitted — a distinction which the women are particularly aware of. This should be the group, I think, which represents Harvard on tours," Adams added.

About repertoire. The music usually programmed on joint Harvard-Radcliffe concerts was "light things like Offenbach or Gilbert and Sullivan choruses. With the Collegium Musicum, I intend to do only serious music, both secular and sacred," Adams said. At the first concert this season, Friday night at 8:30 in Sanders Theatre, Adams will present something of a survey with works by Byrd, Bach, Purcell, Vecchi, de Sermisy, Lassus, Brahms and Debussy.

Later this year, the Collegium Musicum will have a spectacular coming-out in a performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Michael Tilson Thomas in Thomas' Spectrum Series. Music will include the Bach cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden"; Josquin des Pres' "Deploration on the Death of Gehan Okeghem"; and David del Tredici's "Potpourri."

"We may even do a program of chansons and madrigals on the banks of the Charles sometime in May," Adams said. "It would be simply for our own amusement."

The Opera Company of Boston will hold auditions for boy sopranos for the productions of "The Trojans" and "Tosca", Dec. 4 and 11 from 9 a.m. to noon in the Bay State Room of the Statler-Hilton Hotel.

Roman Totenberg, violinist and chairman of the B.U. String Department, has been awarded the Medal of Honor by the Eugene Ysaye Foundation for distinction in the arts and for promoting the music of Ysaye. Other recipients included Ivon Galamian and Ruggerio Ricci.

You still have a chance to join the Handel and Haydn Society, its conductor Thomas Dunn, and soloists at a New Year's Eve performance of Haydn's "Creation" and at the post-concert dress-as-you-dare bash in Horticultural Hall. For information, call 536-2951.

BSO's new spectrum Series may affect regular programs

★ MUSIC
Continued from Page A-8

I really question the whole idea of such talk. If you provide musical examples at the piano or with the orchestra, as the First Stravinsky concert, then you are doing something that cannot be done through printed program notes, and that can be valuable. Otherwise, the limited time makes it unlikely that anything substantial will be said, and Thomas, though he said many things nicely, offered little to sharpen perception.

Presumably the talk was really in honor of something else, namely a more informal, comfortable atmosphere — packaging again. That is a big subject, in any case one difficult for me, not all uncomfortable at concerts unless from causes not to be cured by talk, to deal with. I am really doubtful, though. What, besides musical substance, is persuasive at concerts and can make magic is a quality of concentration, of conviction in the performer. I think the idea that an audience will respond better to a performer for knowing that he is a human being as well as a professional, and knowing that because he talks as well as performs, is rubbish.

Imagining myself in a setting like Fenway Park which I have entered reluctantly because I fear both boredom and the constant putdown which I hear in all the knowing talk of the aficionados, I see myself not at all led toward pleasure by the counterpart of a conductor's once-over-very-lightly introduction. Of course to see a ball game in the company, and so partly through the eyes of, a knowing, intelligent, critical friend is quite a different matter, and it is not a situation that can be translated to the concert hall.

The extra pieces have sometimes added something pleasingly festive and theatrical (the Gabrieli Canzona, Stravinsky's Fanfare) or have come in the form of a useful aural program note (Bach's "Christ lag" preceded by the Gregorian sequence from which the hymn-tune is derived); at other times the device has seemed pointless and has flirted a bit with the cute. Either way no cause for great stir.

The question of clothes speaks to something important. No one likes stuffiness, and the discrepancy of the audience's and the performers' dress is absurd and uncomfortable. Musicians should not look like waiters — I could also write a whole article about what restaurants make their employees wear — and I shall not mourn the disappearance of white or black tie from the concert platform. I do think musicians should look good, and the present Spectrum uniform is hideous. The men look as though they had meant to dress more or less formally, some with blue shirts for TV, but someone had come along and hidden their coats and ties. Shirt-sleeves are another token of "Gemuetlichkeit," one that is, however, negated by being merely the substitution of one uniform for another (one, moreover, not flattering to men in so sedentary a profession), and with any well-intended statement about its being a pleasant, warm, non-stuffy occasion being totally cancelled by the sheer ugliness of that blue-and-white, drip-dry sea. Go peacock, go penguin if you like, go Easter egg, but if some measure of elegance and dash are too much to ask, at least go for dignity.

Public response to Spectrum has been good, but less good than I had hoped. The two Stravinsky programs, which were given once each, were sold out, but there was not nearly enough audience to fill Symphony Hall twice for the other two programs. Next year, the concerts will again be Fridays and Saturdays at 8:30, and I wonder if another hour, certainly one earlier to make it more feasible to take kids and the other series perhaps later, would tap a bit more of a new audience. My informally arrived at impression is that there is little overlap between Spectrum-goers and regular subscribers, though wherther there will be a substantial flow from Spectrum to the other series, which is of course the hope and the idea, depends on what character the other series will assume.

So we come to the real question: why do we need Spectrum anyway? Can't the regular programs be as lively and as interesting? No reason, was Thomas's answer in effect, and some of the programs he has offered his Buffalo Philharmonic subscribers say the same thing. With Seiji Ozawa not taking over as BSO Music Director until fall 1973, the situation here is a big question mark. My impression of Ozawa is of a man committed to traditional ways, one whose progressivism may to some extent be illusory, more in evidence in than in his musical conviction.

The news from San Francisco, where Ozawa has been running the Symphony since 1970, is that the programs have been very conservative; many are disappointed and distressed, but box office has been tremendous. That may say nothing at all about Ozawa's plans for Boston, but if the Music Director is not inclined thoroughly to rethink the whole question of program policy, then the need for Spectrum is clear. Myself, I should love to see Spectrum as an institution which, through the force of example, would make itself unnecessary because all concerts have become so interesting. Meanwhile, with the hope that never again will we have a piece of music obliterated by a corny slide-show (as was done to Messiaen's "Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum" last weekend), many thanks.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

MAR 29 1972

Spectrum Fianle

This Friday and Saturday, the last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Spectrum Concerts will have Michael Tilson Thomas conduct "four religious ceremonies" at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall. The two concerts will feature Bach, Cantata No. 4; Del Tredici, "pop-pourri"; Des Prez, Deploration de Jehan Okeghem, and Messiaen, Et exspecto resurrectionem mortuorum. The Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum and soloists Phyllis Bryn-Julson, Leslie Guinn and Mallory Walker will appear with the orchestra.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 72,971

APR 6 1972

New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias review

BSO's final concert in series a resounding success

Michael Tilson Thomas was on the podium for the final concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series in a program featuring the Polonaise and Krakoviak from Glinka's "A Life for the Tsar," Borodin's "Symphony No. 2," and Brahms' "Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat," with Malcolm Frager as soloist.

For sheer lushness of sound, this was perhaps the most thoroughly enjoyable concert of this season's series. The Glinka, for example, although hardly music that makes many intellectual demands on the listener, is highly rhythmic and decidedly Russian in flavor — two qualities that one expects from the composer who was perhaps the first to recognize that imparable legacy that Russia boasts in her folk and liturgical music.

As for the Borodin "Symphony No. 2," it is always a welcome addition to any program. Strongly vocative and crisply conducted by the youthful Thomas, it is basically a musical portrait of feudal Russia. Especially effective is the remarkable slow movement with its beautiful themes that, according to Borodin himself, recall the songs of the Slav troubadours. The first movement, epicting the gatherings of ancient Russian princes, and the stirring finale, with its musical setting for the banquets of medieval heroes, also have glorious moments. The entire work was flawlessly played by the orchestra, its members obviously in fine fettle.

Pianist Frager is a frail-looking young man, but his appearance is deceptive, for he plays with both power and passion. The Brahms concerto is a king of its genre, with a vast range of mood.

An acid test not only of virtuoso technique but also of depth of interpretation, it moves from the serene majesty and fiery exuberance of the opening movements to the soaring midnight poetry of the andante and the almost Mozartian lightness of the glittering finale.

The piano and orchestra are subtly integrated, and when the musicians and the soloist are well-balanced, as they were last night, the result is a highly rewarding musical experience — one that is genuinely epic in breadth.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

MAR 30 1972

New England Newsclip

PHOENIX
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 25,000

APR 12 1972

New England Newsclip

Laying an Easter Egg

By John Robinson

BOSTON SYMPHONY
At Symphony Hall

For his last Spectrum concert of the current season at Symphony Hall Michael Tilson Thomas tried to combine Bach, Josquin Des Prez, David Del Tredici and Olivier Messiaen into a religious ceremony and possibly a contemporary statement on Easter. It was like mating Christ with the Easter Bunny and expecting them to lay the golden egg. There is a universe between Bach's cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and David Del Tredici's "Pop-pourri;" but despite merits in both pieces and because of Thomas's eclectic method of selection, the only thing that was laid at Symphony Hall was a raspberry.

Usually I like Thomas's concerts — they are always alive and dramatic. And most important, the orchestra plays better for him than anyone else, even though they seem to have little respect for him. (I saw some woodwind players bring their instrument cases on stage for the last piece, ready to split as soon as the long concert was over.)

But this time Thomas went a little too far, both in selection of pieces and the frosting that has been a trademark of the series. Maybe it would have come off had he put the Bach and the Josquin in one half of the concert and the Del Tredici and Messiaen in the other. But he alternated them — Bach, Del Tredici, Josquin, Messiaen — which made me wonder how the Finns can jump out of a sauna into the snow.

Traditionally, of course the big, loud, impressive piece always comes at the end in almost any conductor's book, and Olivier Messiaen's "Et exspecto ressurrectionem mortuorum" more than fills the bill. If the uproarious sound is an indication of greatness in composition, then Messiaen's name belongs on the scroll over the stage, not Beethoven's. For this piece the hall was darker then I've ever seen it. The musicians all had lights on their stands because slides of Mayan ruins were being projected overhead. Thomas had a light on his stand too. But shining up from the floor was a large lamp which didn't seem to be serving any function at all, until I realized that its purpose was to project a mammoth shadow of Thomas conducting on the ceiling. What was meant to be grandiose was a mite too precious.

Why can't a conductor have enough faith in the public to program a soft piece last for a change? I'm getting tired of leaving concerts blown out of shape all the time. A wind-up unWagnerian, unMahlerian, unMessiaenian — something short and soft, something that can stand firm on its own slender semiquavers and in the hearts and minds of the listeners. To program "Et exspecto" after Josquin is to desecrate the latter; whereas to do it in reverse order would enhance both.

To do justice to the music, however, is to consider it apart from what comes before or after it. In that light both Thomas and the music make out better. If you have ever heard Herbert Von Karajan play Bach's Brandenburg Concertos literally bowed to death by the entire Berlin Philharmonic and the Maestro's glossy egotistical sound, you know how terrible Bach can be. Thomas managed to play the cantata well with a bigger-than-it-should-be orchestra. It was very fine if you don't mind your Bach a little romanticized. Mallory Walker (tenor), Leslie Guinn (baritone) and the Harvard-Radcliffe Collegium Musicum sang with all the crispness you could ask for. The orchestra sounded like it would rather have been playing Brahms.

David Del Tredici's "Pop-pourri" was primarily "Alice in Wonderland" set to music with excursions into a Bach chorale "Er ist genug" and the Litany of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Complete with amplified soprano and saxophones, the piece insulted the Bach that preceded it. The cantata takes its religion seriously and quietly, while Alice and the Turtle, true to his name, mock the Christianity of Bach's world. The "message" of either piece would be valid alone but together they cancel each other out. It'd be really hard to get into an Easter egg hunt in church.

The Collegium's rendition of Josquin's a capella tribute to De Jehan Okeghem was beautiful and serene. It should have ended the evening. Messiaen's mammoth mother followed, however. Author Herbert Roscol says of Messiaen's music, "bird calls, more bird calls." I didn't realize he was talking about the proverbial 500-pound canary. ■

In Concert

The Unfamiliar, the Unexpected

By Peter M. Knapp

Tuesday night's concert by the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, fell into two distinct sections: 19th-century Russian music before intermission, and the Brahms Piano Concerto No.2 in B-flat after the pause.

The Russian segment was unusual, resurrecting the Polonaise and Krakoviak from Mikhail Glinka's "A Life for the Tsar," and Alexander Borodin's Symphony No. 2 in B minor — the former introduced to the Boston Symphony by Thomas last fall, the latter apparently not played by the BSO since 1912.

"A Life for the Tsar" (1836) had an enormous influence upon Russian composers as the first "Russian" opera, and though the work is in eclipse nowadays, the work has its attractions, including a juicy final scene for the bass-hero of the plot, Ivan Susanin, a legendary peasant who sacrificed himself to the invading Poles in order to permit the escape of the Tsar.

Polish Pops

The Polonaise and Krakoviak are taken from the lighter weight second act — the "Polish act" which became something of a precedent in Russian opera (e.g., the Polish act with similar nationalist dances in "Boris Godunov"). These are spirited, attractive dances with robust, occasionally thick, scoring. Perhaps more like Pops than Symphony music, but an entertaining and different opening performed with flair and strongly marked rhythms.

The Borodin symphony dates from 1876, being premiered the following year in St. Petersburg, the Russian center of culture. It is nationalist to be sure — though with an arm in the orient and a leg in central Europe — and conventional in form.

The middle movements are the most original, after a somber colored, strongly accented opening movement. And the brass writing with its echoing spatial effects (for horns) and ostinato staccato in the scherzo is ingenious. The trio of the scherzo blooms into one of those exotic, sweeping, bittersweet melodies characteristic of the doctor-composer, and the andante movement is a kind of atmospheric "night music," misty and perfumed, introduced and concluded by solo clarinet and horn backed by harp.

It's not an astonishing symphony, but one with certain interests and listenable. Thomas seems to have empathy for these lush Russian scores, drawing out their colors and lyricism balanced with the drama.

Overpowering Brahms

The Brahms concerto, though, had too much contrast between its big dramatic statements and its reflective episodes in both dynamics and tempo, making its structure imbalanced. Especially in the first two movements, the performance seemed to veer from fortissimo hard-driving climaxes (at the sacrifice of violin tone) to quite relaxed passages — a case, perhaps, of overpowering Brahms, then letting him rest.

The soloist was the admirable American pianist Malcolm Frager, who emphasized the work's huge, craggy contours. It was an unexpected interpretation, for Frager usually has been a cooler, subtler performer. This is the "heaviest" concerto I have heard him perform, and it seemed to cost him considerable emotional and physical strain, particularly in the weightier passages. The pianist also has developed some mannerisms at the keyboard.

With these reservations, Frager played with impeccable clarity—he rarely smudges anything, even when the slope gets steep and covered by those Brahmsian clumps of chords — and often he played eloquently. As pianism, the performance certainly was impressive. The andante was particularly expressive with some fine tonal effects and shadings, and the finale was light, clear and rhythmically propelled.

[200]

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

APR 27 1972

New England Newsclip Agcy.
5 Auburn Street
Framingham, MA. 01701

Berkshire Museum Hosts Hub Players

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, the 12 first-desk members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a concert Monday at 8 p.m. in Pittsfield's Berkshire Museum.

The concert includes Villa Lobos' Quartet, Blacher's Trio, Dahl's Duo, and, to conclude the concert, Schubert's "Trout" quintet.

The Chamber Players will also give master classes and a concert at Taconic High School Monday morning, May 8. The concert at 10:30 a.m. features a performance of Stravinsky's 'L'Histoire du Soldat" (A Soldier's Tale), followed by master classes with the four basic instrument groups. The concert and master classes are under the direction of Dr. Morton Wayne of Taconic High School.

SILVER LAKE NEWS
PEMBROKE, MASS.
W. 4,300

APR 27 1972

New England Newsclip

ARTS CENTER—View of how the proposed South Shore Center for the Performing Arts will look when building is erected next to the swim and tennis club facing Oak street at Route 139 in North Pembroke. Sketch is by artist Donald Brebner of Hanson.

BSO chamber players perform for Pembroke's planned arts center

A concert in Marshfield next Monday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players will launch the building fund drive for the proposed $4 million South Shore Center for the Performing Arts in Pembroke.

Announcement that the famed BSO group, which includes a dozen of the orchestra's string, woodwind and brass principals, will play at 8 p.m. at the Marshfield Junior High School on Forest street was made at a kick-off luncheon attended by 50 area civic leaders yesterday at Justin's Hearthside Restaurant in Hanover.

Appearing at the luncheon were the four members of the center's board of governors: Jess Cain, WHDH radio personality; Harry Ellis Dickson, first violinst of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Theodore Lutz, musical director for the Boston Schubert Theater and John Bassett, general manager of WBSM radio in New Bedford.

A spokesman for the project, Marc Valentine of Halifax, had announced earlier that the non-profit complex would be supported both by government grant and private subscription.

It is planned to build the 2,500 seat facility on 15 acres of land on Route 139 next to the South Shore Swim and Tennis Club next to the expressway in Pembroke.

Resident theater, ballet and music companies plus performances by touring groups and workshops for the arts are planned as part of the complex.

Tickets for Monday's concert are available from Mrs. Howard C. Dodge, High street, Pembroke; Mrs. Frank Valentine, Dwight street, Halifax; Mary Breen, Plymouth street, Pembroke and at the Creative Center, Ocean street, Marshfield.

Turn to the back page for a picture of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players.

SILVER LAKE NEWS
PEMBROKE, MASS.
W. 4,300

APR 27 1972

New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra Chamber Players who will perform Monday evening (May 1) at Marshfield Junior High are, from left, front, Joseph Silverstein, Ralph Gomberg, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Jules Eskin, Burton Fine. Back, William Gibson, Sherman Walt, James Stagliano, Everett Firth, Armando Ghitalla, Harold Wright, Henry Portnoi.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 6 1972

New England Newsclip

'Double Reed' wins for Ch. 2

WGBH-TV (Ch. 2), won a first-of-its-kind award from the Corporation of Public Broadcasting today for the program "The Double Reed" which highlighted the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

The award is the first to be announced in a new competition honoring excellence in local PTV programming for 1971.

Former MIT President Dr. James Killian made the presentation for CPB.

"The Double Reed" concentrated on the oboe and bassoon, showing how reeds are made, and examined some rare old instruments.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

APR 28 1972

New England News

Ensemble To Perform At Fitchburg

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will give a concert in Weston Auditorium, Fitchburg State College, at 8 p.m. Tuesday, May 2.

Sponsors are the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities, Montachusett Community Concert Association, Fitchburg State College and Montachusett Association for the Performing Arts.

Tickets are $2 for adults and 50 cents for students and senior citizens. Patron tickets are available at $5.

Proceeds will benefit scholarships for a Montachusett youth to attend the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this summer.

Tickets are available at Fitchburg Music Store, Corner Book Shop, Westside Pharmacy in Leominister and at the door the evening of the concert.

The 12 first-chair members of the Boston Symphony will perform.

Program will include two works by Mozart, Divertimento for two winds and strings with contrabass by Haydn, and Stravinsky's "A Soldier's Tale."

The Fitchburg concert is part of the tour of Massachusetts by the Chamber Players, sponsored by a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

APR 27 1972

New Englar
Newsc

Berkshire Museum Hosts Hub Players

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, the 12 first-desk members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a concert Monday at 8 p.m. in Pittsfield's Berkshire Museum.

The concert includes Villa Lobos' Quartet, Blacher's Trio, Dahl's Duo, and, to conclude the concert, Schubert's "Trout" quintet.

The Chamber Players will also give master classes and a concert at Taconic High School Monday morning, May 8. The concert at 10:30 a.m. features a performance of Stravinsky's 'L'Histoire du Soldat" (A Soldier's Tale), followed by master classes with the four basic instrument groups. The concert and master classes are under the direction of Dr. Morton Wayne of Taconic High School.

SILVER LAKE NEWS
PEMBROKE, MASS.
W. 4,300

APR 27 1972

New England
Newsclip

ARTS CENTER—View of how the proposed South Shore Center for the Performing Arts will look when building is erected next to the swim and tennis club facing Oak street at Route 139 in North Pembroke. Sketch is by artist Donald Brebner of Hanson.

BSO chamber players perform for Pembroke's planned arts center

A concert in Marshfield next Monday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players will launch the building fund drive for the proposed $4 million South Shore Center for the Performing Arts in Pembroke.

Announcement that the famed BSO group, which includes a dozen of the orchestra's string, woodwind and brass principals, will play at 8 p.m. at the Marshfield Junior High School on Forest street was made at a kick-off luncheon attended by 50 area civic leaders yesterday at Justin's Hearthside Restaurant in Hanover.

Appearing at the luncheon were the four members of the center's board of governors: Jess Cain, WHDH radio personality; Harry Ellis Dickson, first violinst of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Theodore Lutz, musical director for the Boston Schubert Theater and John Bassett, general manager of WBSN radio in New Bedford.

A spokesman for the project, Marc Valentine of Halifax, had announced earlier that the non-profit complex would be supported both by government grant and private subscription.

It is planned to build the 2,500 seat facility on 15 acres of land on Route 139 next to the South Shore Swim and Tennis Club next to the expressway in Pembroke.

Resident theater, ballet and music companies plus performances by touring groups and workshops for the arts are planned as part of the complex.

Tickets for Monday's concert are available from Mrs. Howard C. Dodge, High street, Pembroke; Mrs. Frank Valentine, Dwight street, Halifax; Mary Breen, Plymouth street, Pembroke and at the Creative Center, Ocean street, Marshfield.

Turn to the back page for a picture of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players.

New England Newsclip Agcy.
5 Auburn Street
Framingham, MA. 01701

SILVER LAKE NEWS
PEMBROKE, MASS.
W. 4,300

APR 27 1972

New England
Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra Chamber Players who will perform Monday evening (May 1) at Marshfield Junior High are, from left, front, Joseph Silverstein, Ralph Gomberg, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Jules Eskin, Burton Fine. Back, William Gibson, Sherman Walt, James Stagliano, Everett Firth, Armando Ghitalla, Harold Wright, Henry Portnoi.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 261,042 SUN. 566,377

JAN 6 1972

En
Ne

'Double Reed' wins for Ch. 2

WGBH-TV (Ch. 2), won a first-of-its-kind award from the Corporation of Public Broadcasting today for the program "The Double Reed" which highlighted the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

The award is the first to be announced in a new competition honoring excellence in local PTV programming for 1971.

Former MIT President Dr. James Killian made the presentation for CPB.

"The Double Reed" concentrated on the oboe and bassoon, showing how reeds are made, and examined some rare old instruments.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

APR 28 1972

Ne
Engl
News

Ensemble To Perform At Fitchburg

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will give a concert in Weston Auditorium, Fitchburg State College, at 8 p.m. Tuesday, May 2.

Sponsors are the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities, Montachusett Community Concert Association, Fitchburg State College and Montachusett Association for the Performing Arts.

Tickets are $2 for adults and 50 cents for students and senior citizens. Patron tickets are available at $5.

Proceeds will benefit scholarships for a Montachusett youth to attend the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this summer.

Tickets are available at Fitchburg Music Store, Corner Book Shop, Westside Pharmacy in Leominister and at the door the evening of the concert.

The 12 first-chair members of the Boston Symphony will perform.

Program will include two works by Mozart, Divertimento for two winds and strings with contrabass by Haydn, and Stravinsky's "A Soldier's Tale."

The Fitchburg concert is part of the tour of Massachusetts by the Chamber Players, sponsored by a grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities.

ENTERPRISE
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
D. 5,003

APR 28 1972

New England Newsclip

May 2 concert reminder

An unusual program featuring all the instruments of the orchestra will be presented by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players May 2 at 8 p.m. in Weston Auditorium at Fitchburg State College. The Chamber Players are the twelve first-chair members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tickets to the May 2 concert are $2.00 for adults and $.50 for students and senior citizens. They are available at W.F.G.L., Fitchburg Music Store, the Corner Book Shop, the Book Shop, and at the door the evening of the concert. In Leominster tickets are available at West Side Pharmacy.

The concert will feature a performance of A SOLDIER'S TALE by Igor Stravinsky, for violin, bass, clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, trombone and percussion. One of the most popular works written in this century, A SOLDIER'S TALE was originally written as a dance work with pantomime, with a spoken part written by the French poet Ramuz. The Chamber Players will perform it as a concert suite without a conductor.

ENTERPRISE
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
D. 5,003

APR 25 1972

New England Newsclip

Orchestra to play at FSC

BOSTON — The entire ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players will perform in Weston Auditorium at Fitchburg State College Tuesday evening, May 2 at 8:00 p.m. The concert, featuring music for brass and percussion, as well as woodwinds and strings, will demonstrate the full range and variety of the twelve first - chair members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tickets for the concert are $2.00 for adults and 50 cents for students and senior citizens. Patron tickets are available at $5.00. Proceeds from the sale of tickets will benefit a scholarship for a Montachusett youth to attend the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the Orchestra's summer music academy in the Berkshires.

Tickets are available at: Fitchburg Music Store, The Corner Book Shop, the Book Shop, and at the door the evening of the concert. In Leominster tickets are available at Westside Pharmacy.

JENNIS-YARMOUTH
REGISTER
YARMOUTH PORT, MASS.
W. 3,312

APR 27 1972

New England Newsclip

Best of BSO plays here Saturday, May 6

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will give two performances on Cape Cod, the Cape Cod Conservatory announced this week. The twelve first-chair members will perform Friday, May 5 at the new Nauset Regional High School in North Eastham, and on Saturday, May 6 at the Mattacheese Middle School in West Yarmouth. Both performances will begin at 8 pm.

For the third year in a row, the Cape Cod Conservatory has been able to present this ensemble through special assistance from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities. This assistance has made it possible not only to bring the Boston Symphony Chamber Players to the Cape, but to make the concerts available to the public at tne lowest possible admission charges.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performances are on sale in the following locations: In Orleans at H.H. Snow's; in Chatham at Chatham Jewelers; in the Cape Cod Mall at the Paperback Booksmith; in Barnstable at the Cape Cod Conservatory, and in Falmouth at Putnam's Book Shop. Student tickets are also available.

Patrons receptions will be held immediately following each concert. Anyone wishing to become a patron is asked to contact the Cape Cod Conservatory at 362-3258.

SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
D. 20,300

MAY 4 1972

New England Newsclip

Concert Here –

Symphony Group Pleases Again

When the Boston Symphony Chamber Players were here last year, several of us expressed the hope that they might come back. They did.

They appeared at Weston Auditorium, with their number expanded and their joy in intimate music-making intact. Again the Massachusetts Council for the Arts and Humanities, which does a lot with a little money, was primarily responsible, with three local groups helping to sponsor the event. These were: the Montachusett Community Concert Association, the Montachusett Association for the Performing Arts, and Fitchburg State College. A local student musician, or perhaps two, will benefit by a summer's residence at Tanglewood.

The first half offered two Mozart numbers — the early Flute Quartet, featuring Doriot Anthony Dwyer, and a mature piece, the Duo (K. 424) for violin and viola. One might think the prospects for making much out of so skimpy a combination were dim, but not so. It is a beautiful work, with much Mozartean inventiveness lavished upon it. Mozart, who even wrote for such gadgets as Ben Franklin's glass harmonica, could make music out of anything.

Also there was a Divertimento for violin, viola, oboe, bassoon, and double bass by Michael Haydn. This is not the famous Haydn, Joseph, but his brother, who lived and worked in Salzburg during the period when Mozart was growing up there. His music is Italianate and a little lacking in personality.

The second half was given over to Stravinsky's "Soldier Tale," written in 1918. The work was given without the narration that helps explain the music. The spiky harmonies and off-beat rhythms still sound fresh, two generations later, and these superb musicians accomplished marvels of articulation in sections like "The Devil's Dance." The "Chorale" was like Bach seen through a cracked mirror, with "wrong note" harmony which hides the fact that this is still tonal music, in the tradition of Mozart and the rest.

To give everybody his due, we must mention that the musicians were Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Henry Portnoi, bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; William Gibson, trombone; and Everett Firth, timpani. Ralph Gomberg was listed as the oboist, but I think someone was standing in for him.

—Richard Kent

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

APR 28 1972

New England News

Symphony Concert Set May 8

PITTSFIELD — The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, the 12 first-desk members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a concert in Pittsfield's Berkshire Museum May 8 at 8 p.m. The concert includes Villa Lobos' Quartet, Blacher's Trio, Dahl's Duo, and, to conclude the concert, Schubert's "Trout" quintet.

Tickets are priced at $1.50 for adults, and 50 cents for students.

This is the second year the appearance in Pittsfield has been sponsored jointly by the Tanglewood Council of Friends, and the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities.

The chamber players will also give master classes and a concert at Taconic High School the morning of May 8. The concert at 10.30 a.m. features a performance of Stravinsky's L'Histoire du Soldat (A Soldier's Tale), followed by master casses with the four basic instrument groups.

The concert and master classes are under the direction of Dr. Morton Wayne of Taconic High School.

[202]

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
BURTON FINE viola
JULES ESKIN cello
HENRY PORTNOI double bass
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
HAROLD WRIGHT clarinet
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
JAMES STAGLIANO horn
ARMANDO GHITALLA trumpet
WILLIAM GIBSON trombone
EVERETT FIRTH percussion

October 31 – Virginia Museum Theatre, Richmond, Virginia
with Gilbert Kalish guest pianist

MAZELLIER	Fugues 4 and 5, from Dix Fugues for flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon
BRIDGE	Divertimenti for flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon (1940)
PISTON	Three pieces for flute, clarinet and bassoon (1926)
PROKOFIEV	Sonata for flute and piano op. 94 (1943)
POULENC	Trio for oboe, bassoon and piano (1926)

November 1 – Harvard Musical Association
with Gilbert Kalish guest pianist

MAZELLIER	Fugues 4 and 5, from Dix Fugues for flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon
BRIDGE	Divertimenti for flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon (1940)
PISTON	Three pieces for flute, clarinet and bassoon (1926)
POULENC	Trio for oboe, bassoon and piano (1926)

November 7 – Sanders Theatre series (I)
with Gilbert Kalish guest pianist

MOZART	Duo in B flat for violin and viola K. 424
BERGER	Quartet in C for woodwinds (1946)
POWELL	Divertimento for five winds (1957)
BRAHMS	Piano quartet in C minor op. 60

November 10 – St Botolph Club, Boston

BERGER	Quartet in C for woodwinds (1946)
POWELL	Divertimento for five winds (1957)
MAZELLIER	Fugue no. 4 from Dix Fugues
BRIDGE	Prelude and Bagetelle from 'Divertimenti' for flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon

February 6 – Hopkins Center, Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire

HAYDN	Sonata in C for violin and viola
PISTON	Three pieces for flute, clarinet and bassoon
BEETHOVEN	Serenade in D for flute, violin and viola op. 25
MOZART	Duo in B flat for violin and viola K. 424
VILLA-LOBOS	Quatuor for woodwinds

February 27 – Sanders Theatre series (II)
with Gilbert Kalish guest pianist

MOZART	Trio in E flat for clarinet, viola and piano K. 498
ERB	Diversion for two, for trumpet and percussion
VILLA-LOBOS	Quatuor for woodwinds
SCHUBERT	Piano quintet in A D. 667 'Trout'

OLD COLONY
MEMORIAL
PLYMOUTH, MASS.
W. 9,500

APR 27 1972

New England
Newsclip

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Chamber Players will present a concert at Marshfield Junior High School next Monday at 8 p.m. The program is being sponsored to raise money for the South Shore Center for the Performing Arts which is to be built near the Marshfield-Pembroke line by the Rte. 3 exit. The cost of the concert will be kept low because the ultimate aim of the arts center foundation is to bring first class entertainment to the area at tourist class rates.

March 14 – Rackham Auditorium, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor

DANZI	Quartet for bassoon and strings in B flat op. 40
SCHOENBERG	String trio op. 45 (1946)
BEETHOVEN	String trio in C minor op. 9 no. 3
VILLA-LOBOS	Quatuor for woodwinds

March 22 – St Botolph Club, Boston

DANZI	Quartet for bassoon and strings in B flat op. 40
MOZART	Divertimento in E flat for string trio K. 563

April 12 – St Botolph Club, Boston

MOZART	Oboe quartet in F K. 370
DAHL	Duettino concertante for flute and percussion
BEETHOVEN	String trio in C minor op. 9 no. 3

April 16 – Sanders Theatre series (III)
with Gilbert Kalish guest pianist

M. HAYDN	Divertimento in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin, viola and double bass
BLACHER	Trio for trumpet, trombone and piano op. 31
DAHL	Duettino concertante for flute and percussion
MESSIAEN	Quartet for the end of time, for clarinet, violin, cello and piano

April 30 – Theresa Kaufman Auditorium, New York City

SCHUBERT	String trio no. 2 in B flat D. 581
BEETHOVEN	String trio in C minor op. 9 no. 3
MOZART	Divertimento in E flat K. 563

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
BURTON FINE viola
JULES ESKIN cello
HENRY PORTNOI double bass
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
HAROLD WRIGHT clarinet
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
JAMES STAGLIANO horn
ARMANDO GHITALLA trumpet
WILLIAM GIBSON trombone
EVERETT FIRTH percussion

October 31 – Virginia Museum Theatre, Richmond, Virginia
with Gilbert Kalish guest pianist

MAZELLIER	Fugues 4 and 5, from Dix Fugues for flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon
BRIDGE	Divertimenti for flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon (1940)
PISTON	Three pieces for flute, clarinet and bassoon (1926)
PROKOFIEV	Sonata for flute and piano op. 94 (1943)
POULENC	Trio for oboe, bassoon and piano (1926)

November 1 – Harvard Musical Association
with Gilbert Kalish guest pianist

MAZELLIER	Fugues 4 and 5, from Dix Fugues for flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon
BRIDGE	Divertimenti for flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon (1940)
PISTON	Three pieces for flute, clarinet and bassoon (1926)
POULENC	Trio for oboe, bassoon and piano (1926)

November 7 – Sanders Theatre series (I)
with Gilbert Kalish guest pianist

MOZART	Duo in B flat for violin and viola K. 424
BERGER	Quartet in C for woodwinds (1946)
POWELL	Divertimento for five winds (1957)
BRAHMS	Piano quartet in C minor op. 60

November 10 – St Botolph Club, Boston

BERGER	Quartet in C for woodwinds (1946)
POWELL	Divertimento for five winds (1957)
MAZELLIER	Fugue no. 4 from Dix Fugues
BRIDGE	Prelude and Bagetelle from 'Divertimenti' for flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon

February 6 – Hopkins Center, Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire

HAYDN	Sonata in C for violin and viola
PISTON	Three pieces for flute, clarinet and bassoon
BEETHOVEN	Serenade in D for flute, violin and viola op. 25
MOZART	Duo in B flat for violin and viola K. 424
VILLA-LOBOS	Quatuor for woodwinds

February 27 – Sanders Theatre series (II)
with Gilbert Kalish guest pianist

MOZART	Trio in E flat for clarinet, viola and piano K. 498
ERB	Diversion for two, for trumpet and percussion
VILLA-LOBOS	Quatuor for woodwinds
SCHUBERT	Piano quintet in A D. 667 'Trout'

OLD COLONY
MEMORIAL
PLYMOUTH MASS.

APR 27 1972 New England Newsclip

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Chamber Players will present a concert at Marshfield Junior High School next Monday at 8 p.m. The program is being sponsored to raise money for the South Shore Center for the Performing Arts which is to be built near the Marshfield-Pembroke line by the Rte. 3 exit. The cost of the concert will be kept low because the ultimate aim of the arts center foundation is to bring first class entertainment to the area at tourist class rates.

March 14 – Rackham Auditorium, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor

DANZI	Quartet for bassoon and strings in B flat op. 40
SCHOENBERG	String trio op. 45 (1946)
BEETHOVEN	String trio in C minor op. 9 no. 3
VILLA-LOBOS	Quatuor for woodwinds

March 22 – St Botolph Club, Boston

DANZI	Quartet for bassoon and strings in B flat op. 40
MOZART	Divertimento in E flat for string trio K. 563

April 12 – St Botolph Club, Boston

MOZART	Oboe quartet in F K. 370
DAHL	Duettino concertante for flute and percussion
BEETHOVEN	String trio in C minor op. 9 no. 3

April 16 – Sanders Theatre series (III)
with Gilbert Kalish guest pianist

M. HAYDN	Divertimento in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin, viola and double bass
BLACHER	Trio for trumpet, trombone and piano op. 31
DAHL	Duettino concertante for flute and percussion
MESSIAEN	Quartet for the end of time, for clarinet, violin, cello and piano

April 30 – Theresa Kaufman Auditorium, New York City

SCHUBERT	String trio no. 2 in B flat D. 581
BEETHOVEN	String trio in C minor op. 9 no. 3
MOZART	Divertimento in E flat K. 563

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 127

European Tour

1970 - 1971

THE EUROPEAN TOUR - 1971
TABLE OF CONTENTS

NEWS COVERAGE APPEARING IN AMERICAN PUBLICATIONS . . . . . pages 1-57

Pre-tour publicity pages 1-9
- BSO Friends go on tour page 5
- Logan Airport send-off pages 6-7
- Financial sponsors page 8

London concerts pages 9-16
- The Pops concert pages 10-13
- BSO concert pages 14-16

Stuttgart and Wuppertal appearances pages 17-19

Berlin concert pages 20-22

Bonn Pops concert pages 23-28
- Pre-concert publicity pages 23-25
- Concert coverage pages 26-28

UPI wire story quotes Fiedler on tour page 29

Vienna concert page 31

Rome concert page 32

Barcelona concert page 33

Paris concert page 34

General coverage of the tour, features, reviews pages 35-50

Press coverage of the Kennedys on the tour pages 51-57

NEWS COVERAGE APPEARING IN EUROPEAN PUBLICATIONS pages 59-241

London pages 59-68
- Pre-concert publicity pages 59-60
- Reviews of the Pops concert pages 61
- Reviews of the BSO performance pages 62-63
- London interviews with Fiedler and Thomas pages 64-65
- B.B.C. program announcements page 66
- The Kennedys in London pages 67-68

Germany pages 69-186
- Stuttgart pages 69-78
  - Pre-concert publicity pages 69-70
  - Reviews pages 71-78
- Wuppertal pages 79-83
- Berlin pages 84-88
- Hannover pages 89-94

rt publicity pages 95-102
- pages 95-96
- pages 97-102

pages 103-111

t publicity pages 112-184
- verage pages 112-128
- pages 129-162, 178-184

ys in Bonn pages 163-177
- German stories pages 185-186

pages 187-200

blicity pages 187-188
- pages 203-214

pages 205-210

pages 211-224

blicity pages 211-218
- pages 219- 224

Tour pages 225-230

pages 225
- page 226
- pages 227-230

iews pages 231-241

Vol. 1

Hamburg	pages 95-102
Pre- concert publicity	pages 95-96
Reviews	pages 97-102
Frankfurt	pages 103-111
Bonn	pages 112-184
Pre-concert publicity	pages 112-128
Concert coverage	pages 129-162 178-184
The Kennedys in Bonn	pages 163-177
Miscellaneous German stories	pages 185-186
Vienna	pages 187-200
Pre-concert publicity	pages 187-188
Reviews	pages 203-214
Barcelona	pages 205-210
Paris	pages 211-224
Pre-concert publicity	pages 211-218
Reviews	pages 219- 224
Chamber Players on Tour	pages 225-230
London	page 225
Munich	page 226
Paris	pages 227-230
European Record Reviews	pages 231-241

Vol. 1

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
MAR 28 1971
New England Newsclip

Pre-Tour Publicity

Boston Symphony readies for Grand Tour

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

This week, Friday afternoon Boston Symphony subscribers will get their concert Thursday at 2, and the Saturday evening people will go Wednesday. At the usual Friday hour, the orchestra will be somewhere over the Atlantic; Saturday it will be in London, a few hours away from a Sunday morning rehearsal with Arthur Fiedler in the Royal Albert Hall.

Friday morning, April 2, the Boston Symphony leaves on its first international tour since going to the Far East ten years ago and on its first trip to Europe in 15 years. Most of the players will return Sunday, April 25, to begin the Pops season here, but the principals will stay until May 10 giving concerts as the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. The working part of the main tour consists of 14 Boston Symphony concerts, two Boston Pops concerts (it is the first time for the Pops to play abroad), and one by the Chamber Players. Fiedler, of course, conducts both Pops concerts, which are in London and Bonn, and the Symphony concerts are divided between Music Director William Steinberg (9) and Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas (5).

Soloists include the pianist Christoph Eschenbach, who will play the Schumann Concerto in Hannover, and three members of the orchestra, concertmaster Joseph Silverstein (Tchaikovsky in Frankfurt), flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer (Bach in Paris), and bassoonist Sherman Walt (Mozart in Wuppertal, Hannover, Rome, and Barcelona). For the Pops, Earl Wild will play the Tchaikovsky 1st Piano Concerto in London, and Joan Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn.

The tour begins in London, where there is a Pops, a Symphony, and a Chamber Players concert. Then comes quite a long stretch in Germany: Stuttgart, Wuppertal, two concerts in Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn. After that, two concerts in Vienna, one in Rome, two in Barcelona, and a final one in Paris. It adds up to about 12,000 miles. The Atlantic crossings will be done on two chartered Pan Am 707s, the Clipper Boston Symphony and the Clipper Boston Pops, transportation within Europe being arranged on a combination of charters, scheduled flights, and trains. Orchestra personnel will be divided as evenly as possible between the two planes —

MUSIC, Page A-43 H 1

BSO prepares $250,000 tour

★ MUSIC Continued from Page A-41 H 1

"so that there'll be half to play the memorial service," explained a ghoulish Symphony Hall spokesman. There is also 14 tons of luggage, including instruments in their cases, 25 wardrobe trunks, music, and so forth, some of which will go in a special jet freighter.

About 200 people will be going altogether, with players, conductors and Symphony staff accounting for 120. Then there are orchestra players' wives (and one mother-in-law), press (nine plus one wife), and a group listed on the BSO's fact sheet as "etc." A group of somewhere between 40 and 50 members of the Friends of the Boston Smphony will be accompanying part of the tour and more about them in a moment.

Such a tour by a major symphony orchestra is a prestige venture. Associate Manager Harry J. Kraut says that the Boston Symphony commands fees in Europe as high as any such orchestra, but income will not come near covering the estimated $250,000 cost of the tour. Some of the expense can be viewed as investment in future record sales and presumably the emphasis on Germany in the itinerary reflects a special interest in the tour on the part of Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft, with which the orchestra now has an exclusive recording contract.

Some sort of financial first aid is provided by corporate sponsorship that has been obtained from three American firms. Gillette sponsors both concerts in Berlin. The Massachusetts Port Authority, interested in getting European companies to ship through Boston, sponsors the Symphony concert in London and the Bonn Pops. Stanley Home Products, through its European counterpart, Stanhome, sponsors the Rome concert and the first of the two in Barcelona.

Money is where the Friends come in, too. Each pays $3000, of which $1000 is an outright gift to the orchestra, so that the Friends will in effect be underwriting the tour to the tune of not quite one fifth. The Friends' itinerary dips in and out of the orchestra's. They will stay in London longer, then rejoin the orchestra in Berlin, having skipped Stuttgart and Wuppertal. They skip Hannover and Frankfurt, rejoining the orchestra in Bonn for the remainder of the tour except Barcelona. Even when the Friends are in the same city as the orchestra, they will not necessarily go to the concerts. Tours always involve lots of repeats of programs, and in order to avoid surfeits of the Mozart Bassoon Concerto, the Mahler 7th, and Ravel's "La Valse," which are the most-played pieces on the trip, Friends will sometimes take off for the opera, "Ballo in maschera" in London, "Parsifal" in West Berlin, "Love of Three Oranges" in East Berlin, "Matrimonio segreto" in Hamburg, "Figaro" in Vienna, and "Tosca" in Rome. In addition to all that, Friends get 33 receptions, cocktail parties, or special lunches and dinners, including four ambassadorial receptions, a tour of the Hamburg port on a German naval vessel, and the presentation of the keys to the city of paris.

There is talk that this may be the Boston Symphony's last overseas trip. The economics of it are after all murderous. Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees, said recently that he thought touring patterns of the future would have more of the lavishly state-subsidized European orchestras travel to America than American orchestras going to Europe. Translated with due allowance for Banksian verbal caution, that probably means "no more as long as I am president." So the big departure scene at Logan Friday morning — VIPs, a fire engine for Fiedler, and all that — may mark the passing into history, at least for our orchestra, of that cultural-economic dinosaur, the Grand Tour.

MUSIC

'This Is for You'

For the next three weeks concert audiences all over Western Europe will have a rare opportunity to sample the musical virtuosity of one of the finest and most versatile orchestras of the United States. Starting out in London this Sunday, the venerable Boston Symphony Orchestra will travel to six German cities, and to Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris, proudly displaying all three of its varied faces: the brilliant, 106-member BSO itself, its lighthearted alter ego the Boston Pops Orchestra and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, made up of the full orchestra's leading chairs.

It has been fifteen years since the Boston Symphony last toured Europe, and for the members of the orchestra it is a matter of pride and reputation to play before the European arbiters of musical taste. Says concertmaster Joseph Silverstein: "It's exciting to go into the musical strongholds of the world—the cities with a long musical tradition—and play better than the hometown band. I hate to slight any city but there is a particular challenge to playing well in London, Berlin and Vienna."

Whitestone

Fiedler: Carefree in Boston

According to conductor William Steinberg, who became musical director of the 90-year-old orchestra in 1969, European audiences are likely to be struck by what he calls "American orchestral culture," a term in which he includes virtuosity, flexibility and shadings. More specifically, 26-year-old associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas (NEWSWEEK, March 1), points out that the BSO is more articulate than European orchestras. "If there is a series of crescendi, for example, Europeans play each one as a minor event within a general situation. We are more interested in differences in articulation. It's an ideological argument. Critics will say it's American obsessiveness. But it's really dealing with a piece from the smallest level of detail to the biggest level of architecture."

Such technical distinctions aside, it may well be the Boston Pops Orchestra that presents Europe with the biggest surprise of the tour. The Pops is merely the full BSO minus its eleven principal players. But although the BSO has toured abroad before, this Sunday's concert at London's Royal Albert Hall will mark the first time that the Pops has played officially outside of Boston. Serving up a mixed and carefree program of lilting waltzes, stirring marches, romantic tunes of the day and the better-known classical numbers, the Pops has been enlivening the Boston springtime for 85 years—and has sold 47 million records. When it's Pops time in Boston, the regular seats come out of Symphony Hall, green and gold chairs and tables come in, and the audience sips wine and beer while listening to a light and tuneful program. Says Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler: "A Strauss waltz is as good a thing of its kind as a Beethoven symphony. It's nice to eat a chunk of beef, but you want a slice of light dessert, too."

Rock: For some recent desserts, Fiedler has brought the "mersey sound" of the Beatles and the rock music of "Hair" into the Pops menu. At Albert Hall—which is celebrating its 100th anniversary—he will play "St. Louis Blues," and Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance." And in Bonn's Beethovenhalle, the 76-year-old Fiedler will lead the Pops in Beethoven's Egmont Overture ("to play a tribute to him in my small way"), Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto and "Peter and the Wolf," narrated by another Bostonian, Mrs. Edward Kennedy.

Eight of the BSO's sixteen concerts this trip will be played in Germany. In Berlin, Steinberg will conduct an all-Beethoven program as the Berlin promoters requested. "Despite all the Beethoven last year for the 200th anniversary," says Steinberg, "they are still celebrating. They are still not sick of it, thank goodness." In Wuppertal, Thomas will conduct Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. "This is my great challenge," says the enthusiastic and energetic young conductor. "To do it and not be thought a barbarian. The audience will know the piece backward and forward, but you can't get hung up on how the audience will react. You've got to go out and do it, play it the way you want to." His way will probably be faster and more vigorous than the usual German interpretation.

Both Steinberg and Thomas are acutely aware of the national tastes in music they will encounter on the tour. "Mahler," according to Steinberg, "has become a fad in Europe. I admire my own courage," he says with a grin, "in playing Mahler in Paris . . . The Germans think they know it all—and they do . . . The French were rather slow in taking to contemporary music and the last time I conducted there I didn't dare play anything contemporary. In Germany there are some who base their opinions on things from the past and those who are open to new things."

Explorer: For Thomas, who has never conducted on the Continent before, this trip is an opportunity to learn all this for himself. "I'm curious and interested to see how different places receive different music. It will be like a sociological experiment. Someone should put enjoyment meters or endocrinological meters on selected members of the audience." If anyone were to install enjoyment meters on the members of the orchestra, Thomas would undoubtedly register the highest score. Says he: "I feel like an African explorer, at least on the Continent, traveling with faithful colleagues into uncharted regions. And as head guide on the expedition will be maestro Steinberg, who is very knowledgeable about these paths. Maestro Fiedler too. Between the two of them, they not only know every great theater, but every great restaurant. You know, a tremendous preoccupation on a tour is where everyone will stay and where they will eat. Our orchestra loves to eat. There are many gourmets in it; they are already thinking about the food and wine."

Fred Fehl

Steinberg: Courage in Paris

Thomas is also thinking about architecture, which he relates to music, and he intends to spend all his time—when not conducting or eating—absorbing architectural impressions. "I hope to taste enough of each city to really know what it's like, so I can go out and play and say to my audience, 'this is for you'." When the European tour is over, Thomas will immediately set off to taste an entirely different country, Japan, where he has been invited to appear as guest conductor with the Japan Philharmonic.

circulation 2,350,000

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377
(E) 194,700
MAR 28 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony readies for Grand Tour

Pre-Tour Publicity

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

This week, Friday afternoon Boston Symphony subscribers will get their concert Thursday at 2, and the Saturday evening people will go Wednesday. At the usual Friday hour, the orchestra will be somewhere over the Atlantic; Saturday it will be in London, a few hours away from a Sunday morning rehearsal with Arthur Fiedler in the Royal Albert Hall.

Friday morning, April 2, the Boston Symphony leaves on its first international tour since going to the Far East ten years ago and on its first trip to Europe in 15 years. Most of the players will return Sunday, April 25, to begin the Pops season here, but the principals will stay until May 10 giving concerts as the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. The working part of the main tour consists of 14 Boston Symphony concerts, two Boston Pops concerts (it is the first time for the Pops to play abroad), and one by the Chamber Players. Fiedler, of course, conducts both Pops concerts, which are in London and Bonn, and the Symphony concerts are divided between Music Director William Steinberg (9) and Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas (5).

Soloists include the pianist Christoph Eschenbach, who will play the Schumann Concerto in Hannover, and three members of the orchestra, concertmaster Joseph Silverstein (Tchaikovsky in Frankfurt), flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer (Bach in Paris), and bassoonist Sherman Walt (Mozart in Wuppertal, Hannover, Rome, and Barcelona). For the Pops, Earl Wild will play the Tchaikovsky 1st Piano Concerto in London, and Joan Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn.

The tour begins in London, where there is a Pops, a Symphony, and a Chamber Players concert. Then comes quite a long stretch in Germany: Stuttgart, Wuppertal, two concerts in Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn. After that, two concerts in Vienna, one in Rome, two in Barcelona, and a final one in Paris. It adds up to about 12,000 miles. The Atlantic crossings will be done on two chartered Pan Am 707s, the Clipper Boston Symphony and the Clipper Boston Pops, transportation within Europe being arranged on a combination of charters, scheduled flights, and trains. Orchestra personnel will be divided as evenly as possible between the two planes —

MUSIC, Page A-43 4 1

BSO prepares $250,000 tour

★MUSIC Continued from Page A-41 4 1

"so that there'll be half to play the memorial service," explained a ghoulish Symphony Hall spokesman. There is also 14 tons of luggage, including instruments in their cases, 25 wardrobe trunks, music, and so forth, some of which will go in a special jet freighter.

About 200 people will be going altogether, with players, conductors and Symphony staff accounting for 120. Then there are orchestra players' wives (and one mother-in-law), press (nine plus one wife), and a group listed on the BSO's fact sheet as "etc." A group of somewhere between 40 and 50 members of the Friends of the Boston Smphony will be accompanying part of the tour and more about them in a moment.

Such a tour by a major symphony orchestra is a prestige venture. Associate Manager Harry J. Kraut says that the Boston Symphony commands fees in Europe as high as any such orchestra, but income will not come near covering the estimated $250,000 cost of the tour. Some of the expense can be viewed as investment in future record sales and presumably the emphasis on Germany in the itinerary reflects a special interest in the tour on the part of Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft, with which the orchestra now has an exclusive recording contract.

Some sort of financial first aid is provided by corporate sponsorship that has been obtained from three American firms. Gillette sponsors both concerts in Berlin. The Massachusetts Port Authority, interested in getting European companies to ship through Boston, sponsors the Symphony concert in London and the Bonn Pops. Stanley Home Products, through its European counterpart, Stanhome, sponsors the Rome concert and the first of the two in Barcelona.

Money is where the Friends come in, too. Each pays $3000, of which $1000 is an outright gift to the orchestra, so that the Friends will in effect be underwriting the tour to the tune of not quite one fifth. The Friends' itinerary dips in and out of the orchestra's. They will stay in London longer, then rejoin the orchestra in Berlin, having skipped Stuttgart and Wuppertal. They skip Hannover and Frankfurt, rejoining the orchestra in Bonn for the remainder of the tour except Barcelona. Even when the Friends are in the same city as the orchestra, they will not necessarily go to the concerts. Tours always involve lots of repeats of programs, and in order to avoid surfeits of the Mozart Bassoon Concerto, the Mahler 7th, and Ravel's "La Valse," which are the most-played pieces on the trip, Friends will sometimes take off for the opera, "Ballo in maschera" in London, "Parsifal" in West Berlin, "Love of Three Oranges" in East Berlin, "Matrimonio segreto" in Hamburg, "Figaro" in Vienna, and "Tosca" in Rome. In addition to all that, Friends get 33 receptions, cocktail parties, or special lunches and dinners, including four ambassadorial receptions, a tour of the Hamburg port on a German naval vessel, and the presentation of the keys to the city of paris.

There is talk that this may be the Boston Symphony's last overseas trip. The economics of it are after all murderous. Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees, said recently that he thought touring patterns of the future would have more of the lavishly state-subsidized European orchestras travel to America than American orchestras going to Europe. Translated with due allowance for Banksian verbal caution, that probably means "no more as long as I am president." So the big departure scene at Logan Friday morning — VIPs, a fire engine for Fiedler, and all that — may mark the passing into history, at least for our orchestra, of that cultural-economic dinosaur, the Grand Tour.

MUSIC

'This Is for You'

For the next three weeks concert audiences all over Western Europe will have a rare opportunity to sample the musical virtuosity of one of the finest and most versatile orchestras of the United States. Starting out in London this Sunday, the venerable Boston Symphony Orchestra will travel to six German cities, and to Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris, proudly displaying all three of its varied faces: the brilliant, 106-member BSO itself, its lighthearted alter ego the Boston Pops Orchestra and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, made up of the full orchestra's leading chairs.

It has been fifteen years since the Boston Symphony last toured Europe, and for the members of the orchestra it is a matter of pride and reputation to play before the European arbiters of musical taste. Says concertmaster Joseph Silverstein: "It's exciting to go into the musical strongholds of the world—the cities with a long musical tradition—and play better than the hometown band. I hate to slight any city but there is a particular challenge to playing well in London, Berlin and Vienna."

Whitestone

Fiedler: Carefree in Boston

According to conductor William Steinberg, who became musical director of the 90-year-old orchestra in 1969, European audiences are likely to be struck by what he calls "American orchestral culture," a term in which he includes virtuosity, flexibility and shadings. More specifically, 26-year-old associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas (NEWSWEEK, March 1), points out that the BSO is more articulate than European orchestras. "If there is a series of crescendi, for example, Europeans play each one as a minor event within a general situation. We are more interested in differences in articulation. It's an ideological argument. Critics will say it's American obsessiveness. But it's really dealing with a piece from the smallest level of detail to the biggest level of architecture."

Such technical distinctions aside, it may well be the Boston Pops Orchestra that presents Europe with the biggest surprise of the tour. The Pops is merely the full BSO minus its eleven principal players. But although the BSO has toured abroad before, this Sunday's concert at London's Royal Albert Hall will mark the first time that the Pops has played officially outside of Boston. Serving up a mixed and carefree program of lilting waltzes, stirring marches, romantic tunes of the day and the better-known classical numbers, the Pops has been enlivening the Boston springtime for 85 years—and has sold 47 million records. When it's Pops time in Boston, the regular seats come out of Symphony Hall, green and gold chairs and tables come in, and the audience sips wine and beer while listening to a light and tuneful program. Says Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler: "A Strauss waltz is as good a thing of its kind as a Beethoven symphony. It's nice to eat a chunk of beef, but you want a slice of light dessert, too."

Rock: For some recent desserts, Fiedler has brought the "mersey sound" of the Beatles and the rock music of "Hair" into the Pops menu. At Albert Hall—which is celebrating its 100th anniversary—he will play "St. Louis Blues," and Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance." And in Bonn's Beethovenhalle, the 76-year-old Fiedler will lead the Pops in Beethoven's Egmont Overture ("to play a tribute to him in my small way"), Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto and "Peter and the Wolf," narrated by another Bostonian, Mrs. Edward Kennedy.

Eight of the BSO's sixteen concerts this trip will be played in Germany. In Berlin, Steinberg will conduct an all-Beethoven program as the Berlin promoters requested. "Despite all the Beethoven last year for the 200th anniversary," says Steinberg, "they are still celebrating. They are still not sick of it, thank goodness." In Wuppertal, Thomas will conduct Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. "This is my great challenge," says the enthusiastic and energetic young conductor. "To do it and not be thought a barbarian. The audience will know the piece backward and forward, but you can't get hung up on how the audience will react. You've got to go out and do it, play it the way you want to." His way will probably be faster and more vigorous than the usual German interpretation.

Both Steinberg and Thomas are acutely aware of the national tastes in music they will encounter on the tour. "Mahler," according to Steinberg, "has become a fad in Europe. I admire my own courage," he says with a grin, "in playing Mahler in Paris . . . The Germans think they know it all—and they do . . . The French were rather slow in taking to contemporary music and the last time I conducted there I didn't dare play anything contemporary. In Germany there are some who base their opinions on things from the past and those who are open to new things."

Explorer: For Thomas, who has never conducted on the Continent before, this trip is an opportunity to learn all this for himself. "I'm curious and interested to see how different places receive different music. It will be like a sociological experiment. Someone should put enjoyment meters or endocrinological meters on selected members of the audience." If anyone were to install enjoyment meters on the members of the orchestra, Thomas would undoubtedly register the highest score. Says he: "I feel like an African explorer, at least on the Continent, traveling with faithful colleagues into uncharted regions. And as head guide on the expedition will be maestro Steinberg, who is very knowledgeable about these paths. Maestro Fiedler too. Between the two of them, they not only know every great theater, but every great restaurant. You know, a tremendous preoccupation on a tour is where everyone will stay and where they will eat. Our orchestra loves to eat. There are many gourmets in it; they are already thinking about the food and wine."

Fred Fehl

Steinberg: Courage in Paris

Thomas is also thinking about architecture, which he relates to music, and he intends to spend all his time—when not conducting or eating—absorbing architectural impressions. "I hope to taste enough of each city to really know what it's like, so I can go out and play and say to my audience, 'this is for you'." When the European tour is over, Thomas will immediately set off to taste an entirely different country, Japan, where he has been invited to appear as guest conductor with the Japan Philharmonic.

circulation 2,350,000

2

Boston goes to Europe

If all goes as planned, the Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players (and this writer) will be in London by the time this article appears in print. The occasion will be the Symphony's first international tour in ten years and the first ever for the Pops. The only sad note in an otherwise bright pictures is that because of the cost of mounting such a tour (roughly, a quarter-million dollars) this might well be the last time the orchestra goes abroad.

The trip will last 24 days during which the orchestra will visit 12 cities in six different countries. Things will get under way today when Arthur Fiedler conducts a Pops concert in London's Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts after which the Boston series is modeled. As in Symphony Hall. Pops-style tables and chairs will be set up on the main floor, and lending further Boston color to the event will be a Symphony Hall-style food and drink list. Fiedler will salute England with one of Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" marches, and part of the program will be televised by the BBC.

Tomorrow evening William Steinberg will conduct a Mozart-Mahler program in Royal Festival Hall, and then after a day's rest the orchestra takes off for Germany, where the itinerary includes concerts at Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn and Berlin. The Berlin concerts are scheduled for April 10 and 11 in Philharmonic Hall, where Steinberg will conduct first an all-Beethoven program and then a concert of works by Wagner, Hindemith, Brahms and Schuller.

Michael Tilson Thomas will be in charge of the concerts in Wuppertal, Hannover and Frankfurt. Fiedler will conduct the tour's second and final Pops concert April 16 in the Beethovenhalle, Bonn. Earl Wild will appear as soloist in the First Piano Concerto of Tchaikovsky, and Joan Kennedy will narrate Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf"

From Germany the orchestra goes to Austria for concerts in the Musikvereinsaal, Vienna, April 17 and 18, and then to Rome for an April 20 concert in the Accademia Santa Cecilia. Appropriately, the Vienna concerts are devoted to Mozart and Mahler, with Steinberg conducting. Thomas will conduct in Rome, where Sherman Walt will be featured in the Mozart Bassoon Concerto.

Concluding the tour will be two concerts, April 21 and 22, in the Palacio de la Musica, Barcelona, and two in the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on April 23 and 24. By the time the group returns to Boston it is estimated that it will have logged some 12,000 miles.

Transatlantic transportation has been arranged on two specially-named Pan Am 707's, the Clipper Boston Symphony and the Clipper Boston Pops, with half the orchestra on each flight. Jet freighter will carry some three and half tons of freight, including instruments and instrument cases, music and 25 wardrobe trunks.

The touring party will consist of approximately 220 people: 108 musicians, 3 conductors, 2 soloists, a staff of 30, plus musician's families, press representatives and about 40 members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood. The Friends have each paid $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

The Friends have arranged a total of 33 receptions, cocktail parties and gala dinners and luncheons, many or most of which are activities in which the orchestra will join. A few highlights are receptions by Ambassador Annenberg in London, by Lord Mayor Schuetz and the Senat in Berlin, by Ambassador Ernst in Hamburg, by Ambassador Humes in Vienna, and by Ambassador Watson in Paris. In addition to reporting on these activities and on the European critical reception of the BSO, this writer hopes to report on operatic activities in Berlin, Frankfurt, Vienna and perhaps a few other cities.

Immediately after the tour the Boston Pops nine-week season gets under way April 26, with concerts Monday through Saturday until June 26. Then, after a brief respite, Tanglewoods opens July 2, and the season there will include eight weekend (Friday and Saturday evenings, Sunday afternoon) concerts, the final one of which takes place August 22. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa will conduct the opening Friday and Saturday concerts; Associate Conductor Thomas will take over Sunday afternoon.

William Steinberg will direct all-Brahms programs July 16 and 17, all-Beethoven programs July 23 and 24. He will also conduct an exchange concert in Saratoga August 7, when Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra will appear at Tanglewood. Other conductors will be Daniel Barenboim, Leonard Bernstein, Colin Davis, Leon Fleisher, Bruno Maderna, and Arthur Fiedler, who will lead the annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood concert on August 3.

Soloists will include pianists Vladimir Ashkenazy, Stephen Bishop, Christoph Eschenbach, Ruth Laredo, Garrick Ohlsson, Alexis Weissenberg and Earl Wild; violinists Itzhak Perlman, Joseph Silverstein and Pinchas Zukerman; cellists Zara Nelsov and Jules Eskin; flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer; and percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta, soloist in a new composition by Takemitsu.

Major choral works to be performed are Bach's Magnificat, conducted by Ozawa; Monteverdi's Vespers of 1610, conducted by Thomas; Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, conducted by Bernstein (in memory of Serge Koussevitzky); and Mozart's Kryie and Requiem, conducted by Colin Davis. The festival closes with a performance of Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," led by Ozawa.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 292,...
APR 4 1971 New England Newsclip

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000
APR 16 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony's "Grand Tour" Route

On April 2 the Boston Symphony Orchestra departed for London, England, for the first stop of its 23-day European Tour. Conductors for the 16 concerts to be played in England, Germany, Austria, Italy and France are William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Pops.

This is the Boston Symphony's first European tour in 15 years. The tour opened Sunday evening, April 4, at Royal Albert Hall, London, with Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra. Pianist Earl Wild played Tchaikovsky's Piano concerto no. 1. This is the first time the Pops has ever played abroad. Since the Boston Pops concerts were modeled after the London Prom concerts, the Boston Pops Orchestra will participate in the 100th Anniversary Season celebration of London's Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. Pops-style tables and chairs were set up in the pit so that the Boston atmosphere, complete with food and drink during the concert, was recreated.

Monday evening, April 5, Music Director William Steinberg conducted the first Boston Symphony concert of the tour in Royal Festival Hall, London. The program was Mozart's Symphony no. 36 and Mahler's Seventh symphony. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, the principal members of the Boston Symphony, performed Tuesday evening, April 6, at 8 pm at Banqueting House, Whitehall Union.

The first Boston Symphony concert on the Continent took place Wednesday evening, April 7, in Stuttgart at the Beethovensaal der Leiderhalle, conducted by William Steinberg. Concerts to be performed in other cities include Bonn on April 16 with Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra with soloists Earl Wild performing Tchaikovsky's Piano concerto no. 1 and Joan Kennedy narrating Prokofiev's Peter and the Wolf.

Social highlights of the Friends tour include diplomatic receptions by the United States Ambassadors to England, France, Austria, Germany and Italy. Cocktail parties at the House of Lords and the Garrick Club in London, and at the German Imperial Hunting Lodge "Bahnhof Rolandseck" near Bonn. Other events include Matins with Choir at Westminster Abbey, receptions by the English Speaking Union, the Lord Mayors of Berlin and Hamburg, and presentation of the keys to the City of Paris at the Hotel de Ville. The Lord Mayor of Boston England was the Orchestra's guest at the opening concert in London.

The Orchestra and Friends traveled to London from Boston's Logan International Airport on two specially named Pan Am 707's, "Clipper Boston Symphony" and "Clipper Boston Pops." In Europe, the Orchestra travels by chartered and scheduled flights as well as by train. The eight and one-half tons of baggage, including instrument cases, music, luggage and wardrobe trunks is transported by jet freighter in seven Pan Am freight modules.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
MAR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO: Ready for Take Off

By Peter M. Knapp

On April 2, two Pan American 707s are scheduled to lift off from Logan Airport, carrying the Boston Symphony, members of the musicians' families, the BSO staff, and a group of the Friends of the Boston Symphony for the orchestra's first European tour in 15 years.

The Clipper Boston Symphony and the Clipper Boston Pops, as the 707s have been named, will carry the orchestra in two sections, about 230 people in all, and about 14 tons of baggage. By April 25, the touring Symphony will have covered 12,000 miles, and will have presented 16 concerts and four rehearsals in 12 cities in six countries.

It is a kind of "show the BSO flag" tour, to show off the orchestra and its various groups, and doubtless to promote the orchestra's new recording liaison with the German firm of Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft.

Concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Music Director William Steinberg and Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas; the Boston Pops under Arthur Fiedler; and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

The Pops, which will present concerts in London April 4 and Bonn April 16, will take along Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., as narrator in Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," and pianist Earl Wild as soloists. (In London, the Pops will participate in the hundredth anniversary season celebration of London's Royal Albert Hall, home of the London Prom concerts after which the Boston Pops were modeled.) The Pops is playing abroad for the first time.

Pianist Christoph Eschenbach, who has performed with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood and in Symphony Hall, will appear with the orchestra in Hannover, Germany.

The Chamber Players will perform April 6 in London's Banqueting Hall and then proceed on their own European tour, April 26 to May 10.

The Boston Symphony will perform in London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin (two concerts), Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Vienna (two concerts), Rome, Barcelona (two concerts) and Paris.

Corporate sponsors are picking up some of the approximate $250,000 cost of the tour. The Gillette Corp. is sponsoring both concerts in Berlin; the Massachusetts Port Authority, as a promotion of Boston's trade and cultural attractions, is sponsoring the concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn; Stanley Home Products of Westfield is sponsoring concerts in Rome and Barcelona.

And as part of the musical touring adventure, more than 40 members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and the Friends of Music at Tanglewood (paying $3,000 apiece for their tour with $1,000 representing a donation to the orchestra) will have a sumptuous round of parties, receptions and concerts.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100
MAR 1971

TOURS 5454

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves on April 2 for London on its first European tour since 1956. It will play seventeen concerts in twenty-three days in six European countries: England, France, Spain, Italy, Germany and Austria. Music director William Steinberg and associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Orchestra in the first concerts it has ever played abroad.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000
MAR 20 1971

Boston Symphony In European Tour

5454

PARIS—The Boston Symphony Orchestra (DGG) starts an eight-city, European tour under conductors William Steinberg and Michael Tilson-Thomas April 4, concluding with a first visit to Paris since 1956, on April 24.

The orchestra will start the tour in London, also taking in Berlin, Hamburg, Bonn, Vienna, Madrid and Venice. The Boston Chamber Players are also due to give separate concerts.

The Bonn performance will include Sergei Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," with Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy as narrator.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,70...
(S) 566,377
MAR 12 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony to play 22 European cities in 22 days

By James H. Hammond, Globe Staff

At 4 p.m. on April 1, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor William Steinberg will signal the end of the season's last concert at Symphony Hall.

Before the last note has died, Al Robison, the orchestra's stage manager, and his staff will be packing the more than 100 boxes containing the priceless instruments and the formal attire of the musicians in the 106-piece orchestra.

Within 30 minutes the first trucks will transfer the crates to Logan International for a departure that night on a Pan Am jetfreighter to London, England.

The next day, and hours before the scheduled 10 a.m. takeoff of the orchestra, the freighter will touch down at Heathrow Airport, outside of London, and begin the discharge of its valuable cargo.

While the 250-person symphony entourage is jetting across the Atlantic on Pan Am clippers another BSO stage hand crew will be readying the Royal Albert Hall in London for the orchestra's first rehearsal.

And, this is the way it will go for the next 22 days as the musicians perform in 22 cities, in the great concert halls of Europe, under a detailed itinerary that covers 12 pages.

Nothing has been left to chance. There's a timetable, to the minute, for the buses which will transport the musicians to and from rehearsal halls.

In all, 20 jetliners, three trains and more than 72 large buses will be required to carry out the logistical mission of moving the Boston Symphony; the Boston Pops, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, and the Symphony Chamber Music unit, throughout the Continent.

The trip, more than 18 months in the planning, already has amounted to more than a quarter of a ton of paper work.

The BSO will be split into two separate and independent musical units while in transit throughout the entire trip, so in case of delay concerts can be held. In addition, the smokers must be separated from non-smokers during ground travel.

The group will travel 10,225 miles by air, 395 miles by rail and another 500 miles by motor and bus.

The entire undertaking, including salaries, represents a $225,000 investment.

The tour was the idea of the orchestra's trustees, its management and Deutsche Grammphon, the symphony's recording company. Corporate sponsors of the trip are Gillette Company, Massachusetts Port Authority and Stanley Home Products Co.

In the final stages of planning the trip, one of the problems was the recent British mailmen's strike, which prevented the completion of necessary correspondence.

Friends of the BSO overcame that one, through the generosity of the Gillette Company, which had established its own pickup and delivery service in England. The Friends sent their mail via Gillette pouch.

Once the tentative trip had been laid out, Fred Doran of Milton, of Moran Travel Bureau, Boston, took off from Boston to make a last minute check. It took him two weeks to complete the run-through on the Continent.

Concerts will be given in Britain, Germany, Austria, and Spain.

2

Boston goes to Europe

If all goes as planned, the Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players (and this writer) will be in London by the time this article appears in print. The occasion will be the Symphony's first international tour in ten years and the first ever for the Pops. The only sad note in an otherwise bright pictures is that because of the cost of mounting such a tour (roughly, a quarter-million dollars) this might well be the last time the orchestra goes abroad.

The trip will last 24 days during which the orchestra will visit 12 cities in six different countries. Things will get under way today when Arthur Fiedler conducts a Pops concert in London's Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts after which the Boston series is modeled. As in Symphony Hall. Pops-style tables and chairs will be set up on the main floor, and lending further Boston color to the event will be a Symphony Hall-style food and drink list. Fiedler will salute England with one of Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" marches, and part of the program will be televised by the BBC.

Tomorrow evening William Steinberg will conduct a Mozart-Mahler program in Royal Festival Hall, and then after a day's rest the orchestra takes off for Germany, where the itinerary includes concerts at Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn and Berlin. The Berlin concerts are scheduled for April 10 and 11 in Philharmonic Hall, where Steinberg will conduct first an all-Beethoven program and then a concert of works by Wagner, Hindemith, Brahms and Schuller.

Michael Tilson Thomas will be in charge of the concerts in Wuppertal, Hannover and Frankfurt. Fiedler will conduct the tour's second and final Pops concert April 16 in the Beethovenhalle, Bonn. Earl Wild will appear as soloist in the First Piano Concerto of Tchaikovsky, and Joan Kennedy will narrate Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf"

From Germany the orchestra goes to Austria for concerts in the Musikvereinsaal, Vienna, April 17 and 18, and then to Rome for an April 20 concert in the Accademia Santa Cecilia. Appropriately, the Vienna concerts are devoted to Mozart and Mahler, with Steinberg conducting. Thomas will conduct in Rome, where Sherman Walt will be featured in the Mozart Bassoon Concerto.

Concluding the tour will be two concerts, April 21 and 22, in the Palacio de la Musica, Barcelona, and two in the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on April 23 and 24. By the time the group returns to Boston it is estimated that it will have logged some 12,000 miles.

Transatlantic transportation has been arranged on two specially-named Pan Am 707's, the Clipper Boston Symphony and the Clipper Boston Pops, with half the orchestra on each flight. Jet freighter will carry some three and half tons of freight, including instruments and instrument cases, music and 25 wardrobe trunks.

The touring party will consist of approximately 220 people: 108 musicians, 3 conductors, 2 soloists, a staff of 30, plus musician's families, press representatives and about 40 members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood. The Friends have each paid $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

The Friends have arranged a total of 33 receptions, cocktail parties and gala dinners and luncheons, many or most of which are activities in which the orchestra will join. A few highlights are receptions by Ambassador Annenberg in London, by Lord Mayor Schuetz and the Senat in Berlin, by Ambassador Ernst in Hamburg, by Ambassador Humes in Vienna, and by Ambassador Watson in Paris. In addition to reporting on these activities and on the European critical reception of the BSO, this writer hopes to report on operatic activities in Berlin, Frankfurt, Vienna and perhaps a few other cities.

Immediately after the tour the Boston Pops nine-week season gets under way April 26, with concerts Monday through Saturday until June 26. Then, after a brief respite, Tanglewoods opens July 2, and the season there will include eight weekend (Friday and Saturday evenings, Sunday afternoon) concerts, the final one of which takes place August 22. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa will conduct the opening Friday and Saturday concerts; Associate Conductor Thomas will take over Sunday afternoon.

William Steinberg will direct all-Brahms programs July 16 and 17, all-Beethoven programs July 23 and 24. He will also conduct an exchange concert in Saratoga August 7, when Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra will appear at Tanglewood. Other conductors will be Daniel Barenboim, Leonard Bernstein, Colin Davis, Leon Fleisher, Bruno Maderna, and Arthur Fiedler, who will lead the annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood concert on August 3.

Soloists will include pianists Vladimir Ashkenazy, Stephen Bishop, Christoph Eschenbach, Ruth Laredo, Garrick Ohlsson, Alexis Weissenberg and Earl Wild; violinists Itzhak Perlman, Joseph Silverstein and Pinchas Zukerman; cellists Zara Nelsov and Jules Eskin; flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer; and percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta, soloist in a new composition by Takemitsu.

Major choral works to be performed are Bach's Magnificat, conducted by Ozawa; Monteverdi's Vespers of 1610, conducted by Thomas; Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, conducted by Bernstein (in memory of Serge Koussevitzky); and Mozart's Kyrie and Requiem, conducted by Colin Davis. The festival closes with a performance of Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," led by Ozawa.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
MAR 17 1971
New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305
New England Newsclip

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100
MAR 1971

TOURS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves on April 2 for London on its first European tour since 1956. It will play seventeen concerts in twenty-three days in six European countries: England, France, Spain, Italy, Germany and Austria. Music director William Steinberg and associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Orchestra in the first concerts it has ever played abroad.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000
APR 16 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony's "Grand Tour" Route

On April 2 the Boston Symphony Orchestra departed for London, England, for the first stop of its 23-day European Tour. Conductors for the 16 concerts to be played in England, Germany, Austria, Italy and France are William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Pops.

This is the Boston Symphony's first European tour in 15 years. The tour opened Sunday evening, April 4, at Royal Albert Hall, London, with Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra. Pianist Earl Wild played Tchaikovsky's Piano concerto no. 1. This is the first time the Pops has ever played abroad. Since the Boston Pops concerts were modeled after the London Prom concerts, the Boston Pops Orchestra will participate in the 100th Anniversary Season celebration of London's Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. Pops-style tables and chairs were set up in the pit so that the Boston atmosphere, complete with food and drink during the concert, was recreated.

Monday evening, April 5, Music Director William Steinberg conducted the first Boston Symphony concert of the tour in Royal Festival Hall, London. The program was Mozart's Symphony no. 36 and Mahler's Seventh symphony. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, the principal members of the Boston Symphony, performed Tuesday evening, April 6, at 8 pm at Banqueting House, Whitehall Union.

The first Boston Symphony concert on the Continent took place Wednesday evening, April 7, in Stuttgart at the Beethovensaal der Leiderhalle, conducted by William Steinberg. Concerts to be performed in other cities include Bonn on April 16 with Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra with soloists Earl Wild performing Tchaikovsky's Piano concerto no. 1 and Joan Kennedy narrating Prokofiev's Peter and the Wolf.

Social highlights of the Friends tour include diplomatic receptions by the United States Ambassadors to England, France, Austria, Germany and Italy. Cocktail parties at the House of Lords and the Garrick Club in London, and at the German Imperial Hunting Lodge "Bahnhof Rolandseck" near Bonn. Other events include Matins with Choir at Westminster Abbey, receptions by the English Speaking Union, the Lord Mayors of Berlin and Hamburg, and presentation of the keys to the City of Paris at the Hotel de Ville. The Lord Mayor of Boston England was the Orchestra's guest at the opening concert in London.

The Orchestra and Friends traveled to London from Boston's Logan International Airport on two specially named Pan Am 707's, "Clipper Boston Symphony" and "Clipper Boston Pops." In Europe, the Orchestra travels by chartered and scheduled flights as well as by train. The eight and one-half tons of baggage, including instrument cases, music, luggage and wardrobe trunks is transported by jet freighter in seven Pan Am freight modules.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000
MAR 20 1971

Boston Symphony In European Tour

PARIS—The Boston Symphony Orchestra (DGG) starts an eight-city, European tour under conductors William Steinberg and Michael Tilson-Thomas April 4, concluding with a first visit to Paris since 1956, on April 24.

The orchestra will start the tour in London, also taking in Berlin, Hamburg, Bonn, Vienna, Madrid and Venice. The Boston Chamber Players are also due to give separate concerts.

The Bonn performance will include Sergei Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," with Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy as narrator.

BSO: Ready for Take Off

By Peter M. Knapp

On April 2, two Pan American 707s are scheduled to lift off from Logan Airport, carrying the Boston Symphony, members of the musicians' families, the BSO staff, and a group of the Friends of the Boston Symphony for the orchestra's first European tour in 15 years.

The Clipper Boston Symphony and the Clipper Boston Pops, as the 707s have been named, will carry the orchestra in two sections, about 230 people in all, and about 14 tons of baggage. By April 25, the touring Symphony will have covered 12,000 miles, and will have presented 16 concerts and four rehearsals in 12 cities in six countries.

It is a kind of "show the BSO flag" tour, to show off the orchestra and its various groups, and doubtless to promote the orchestra's new recording liaison with the German firm of Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft.

Concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Music Director William Steinberg and Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas; the Boston Pops under Arthur Fiedler; and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

The Pops, which will present concerts in London April 4 and Bonn April 16, will take along Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., as narrator in Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," and pianist Earl Wild as soloists. (In London, the Pops will participate in the hundredth anniversary season celebration of London's Royal Albert Hall, home of the London Prom concerts after which the Boston Pops were modeled.) The Pops is playing abroad for the first time.

Pianist Christoph Eschenbach, who has performed with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood and in Symphony Hall, will appear with the orchestra in Hannover, Germany.

The Chamber Players will perform April 6 in London's Banqueting Hall and then proceed on their own European tour, April 26 to May 10.

The Boston Symphony will perform in London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin (two concerts), Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Vienna (two concerts), Rome, Barcelona (two concerts) and Paris.

Corporate sponsors are picking up some of the approximate $250,000 cost of the tour. The Gillette Corp. is sponsoring both concerts in Berlin; the Massachusetts Port Authority, as a promotion of Boston's trade and cultural attractions, is sponsoring the concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn; Stanley Home Products of Westfield is sponsoring concerts in Rome and Barcelona.

And as part of the musical touring adventure, more than 40 members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and the Friends of Music at Tanglewood (paying $3,000 apiece for their tour with $1,000 representing a donation to the orchestra) will have a sumptuous round of parties, receptions and concerts.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,76
(S) 566,377
MAR 12 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony to play 22 European cities in 22 days

By James H. Hammond, Globe Staff

At 4 p.m. on April 1, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor William Steinberg will signal the end of the season's last concert at Symphony Hall.

Before the last note has died, Al Robison, the orchestra's stage manager, and his staff will be packing the more than 100 boxes containing the priceless instruments and the formal attire of the musicians in the 106-piece orchestra.

Within 30 minutes the first trucks will transfer the crates to Logan International for a departure that night on a Pan Am jetfreighter to London, England.

The next day, and hours before the scheduled 10 a.m. takeoff of the orchestra, the freighter will touch down at Heathrow Airport, outside of London, and begin the discharge of its valuable cargo.

While the 250-person symphony entourage is jetting across the Atlantic on Pan Am clippers another BSO stage hand crew will be readying the Royal Albert Hall in London for the orchestra's first rehearsal.

And, this is the way it will go for the next 22 days as the musicians perform in 22 cities, in the great concert halls of Europe, under a detailed itinerary that covers 12 pages.

Nothing has been left to chance. There's a timetable, to the minute, for the buses which will transport the musicians to and from rehearsal halls.

In all, 20 jetliners, three trains and more than 72 large buses will be required to carry out the logistical mission of moving the Boston Symphony; the Boston Pops, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, and the Symphony Chamber Music unit, throughout the Continent.

The trip, more than 18 months in the planning, already has amounted to more than a quarter of a ton of paper work.

The BSO will be split into two separate and independent musical units while in transit throughout the entire trip, so in case of delay concerts can be held. In addition, the smokers must be separated from non-smokers during ground travel.

The group will travel 10,225 miles by air, 395 miles by rail and another 500 miles by motor and bus.

The entire undertaking, including salaries, represents a $225,000 investment.

The tour was the idea of the orchestra's trustees, its management and Deutsche Grammphon, the symphony's recording company. Corporate sponsors of the trip are Gillette Company, Massachusetts Port Authority and Stanley Home Products Co.

In the final stages of planning the trip, one of the problems was the recent British mailmen's strike, which prevented the completion of necessary correspondence.

Friends of the BSO overcame that one, through the generosity of the Gillette Company, which had established its own pickup and delivery service in England. The Friends sent their mail via Gillette pouch.

Once the tentative trip had been laid out, Fred Doran of Milton, of Moran Travel Bureau, Boston, took off from Boston to make a last minute check. It took him two weeks to complete the run-through on the Continent.

Concerts will be given in Britain, Germany, Austria, and Spain.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MUSIC WORLD — Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops, and Joan Kennedy, who narrated "Peter and the Wolf" with the orchestra.

Boston Musicians Prepared For 12-city Tour of Europe

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make a 12-city European tour in April that will cost about $250,000.

This is the Boston Symphony's first international tour in 10 years, the first ever for the Boston Pops.

Mrs. Ted Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn. Pianist Earl Wild will play with the Pops in London and Bonn, and pianist Christoph Eschenbach will play in Hannover.

Freight, weighing 3½ tons, includes 25 wardrobe trunks, dozens of instrument cases and music.

The group of 220 will travel on two planes. There will be 120 orchestra and staff, 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood, plus orchestra wives and press.

The Friends each pay $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

Six concerts are sponsored by American organizations. Gillette sponsors two concerts in Berlin, the Massachusetts Port Authority sponsors the symphony concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn. Stanley Home Products sponsors a concert in Rome and in Barcelona.

In London, the Boston Pops, whose concerts were modeled somewhat after the London Prom concerts, will help in the 100th anniversary celebration of Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. All seats in the pit will be removed and Pops-style tables and chairs set up. The Boston Pops atmosphere, complete with food and drink during intermissions, will be created. This also will be done in Bonn at the Beethovenhalle.

Conductors on the tour will be William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops.

Cities to be visited are London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

SUN
WESTERLY, R. I.
(E) 9,900 (S) 9,950
MAR 22 1971
New England Newsclip

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
MAR 23 1971

Mrs. Ted Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, look over the musical program for an upcoming European tour by the orchestra. Mrs. Kennedy will narrate the orchestra's production of "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn, West Germany. Associated Press Photo

A HOT MINI — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, wife of the Massachusetts senator, wears a brocade minidress over matching bikini hot pants while chatting with conductor Michael Tilson Thomas at a party at the Kennedy home in McLean, Va. (AP Wirephoto)

Jamestown Post-Journal
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
D. 29,489
MAR 29 1971

Europe Set By Music

By MAR
BOSTON
Symphony,
Boston Sy Players wil ropean tou cost about
This is th first inter years, the Boston Po
Mrs Te rate "Pet
Bonn. Pi play with and Bonn Eschenba
nover.
Freight cludes 25
ens of
music.
The g on two 120 • orc
Friends and Fri
wood, p press.
The
for the a dona
Six c Ameri sponso the Music.

Staten STA
D.
MAR 2

Bo
to #6
By BOSTO Symphon
Boston Players ropean cost ab
This first i years, ton Po Mrs. rate "
Bonn. play wi and Bo toph E
Hannov
Frei
Frei includ
dozens and r
The
on tw 120 Frien
phon

Bo
BOS ton S and F ber P city that w
This phony tour in for the
Mrs. T rate "P Bonn. F play wi and Bo
toph E
Hannov
Frei
Frei includ
dozens and r
The
on tw 120 Frien
phon

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000
APR 4 1971
New England Newsclip

Europe on Tap For Boston's Musicians

785
BOS
Sympho
Bosto Playe ropea cost Thi first year otn
Mr rate Bon play and Esc nov

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
MAR 25 1971

BSO, Pops Slate Tour Of Europe

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make a 12-city European tour in April that will cost about

en Years
Boston Syminternational s, the first on Pops.

April Symphony
ean cities

oncerts. All seats in the pit will be emoved and Pops-style tables and conductor

d are Lon-Wuppertal,
Hamburg,
Vienna,
and Paris.

New England Newsclip

s.
Lon-
, Ber-nburg,
Rome,

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
MAR 28 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony starts Europe tour next month

Boston Musicians to Visit Europe

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make a 12-city European tour in April that will cost about $250,000.

This is the Boston Symphony's first international tour in 10 years, the first ever for the Boston Pops.

Mrs. Ted Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn. Pianist Earl Wild will play with the Pops in London and Bonn, and pianist Christoph Eschenbach will play in Hannover.

Freight, weighing 3½ tons, includes 25 wardrobe trunks, dozens of instrument cases and music.

The group of 220 will travel on two planes. There will be 120 orchestra and staff, 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood, plus orchestra wives and press.

The Friends each pay $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

Six concerts are sponsored by American organizations. Gillette sponsors two concerts in Berlin, the Massachusetts Port Authority sponsors the symphony concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn. Stanley Home Products sponsors a concert in Rome and in Barcelona.

In London, the Boston Pops, whose concerts were modeled somewhat after the London Prom concerts, will help in the 100th anniversary celebration of Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. All seats in the pit will be removed and Pops-style tables and chairs set up. The Boston Pops atmosphere, complete with food and drink during intermissions, will be created. This also will be done in Bonn at the Beethovenhalle.

Conductors on the tour will be William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops.

Cities to be visited are London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

Fort Myers Free Press March 20, 1971

Associated Press Story

INFORMATION OBSCURED

3

MUSIC WORLD — Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops, and Joan Kennedy, who narrated "Peter and the Wolf" with the orchestra.

Boston Musicians Prepared For 12-city Tour of Europe

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make a 12-city European tour in April that will cost about $250,000.

This is the Boston Symphony's first international tour in 10 years, the first ever for the Boston Pops.

Mrs. Ted Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn. Pianist Earl Wild will play with the Pops in London and Bonn, and pianist Christoph Eschenbach will play in Hannover.

Freight, weighing 3½ tons, includes 25 wardrobe trunks, dozens of instrument cases and music.

The group of 220 will travel on two planes. There will be 120 orchestra and staff, 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood, plus orchestra wives and press.

The Friends each pay $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

Six concerts are sponsored by American organizations. Gillette sponsors two concerts in Berlin, the Massachusetts Port Authority sponsors the symphony concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn. Stanley Home Products sponsors a concert in Rome and in Barcelona.

In London, the Boston Pops, whose concerts were modeled somewhat after the London Prom concerts, will help in the 100th anniversary celebration of Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. All seats in the pit will be removed and Pops-style tables and chairs set up. The Boston Pops atmosphere, complete with food and drink during intermissions, will be created. This also will be done in Bonn at the Beethovenhalle.

Conductors on the tour will be William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops.

Cities to be visited are London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

SUN
WESTERLY, R. I.
(E) 9,900 (S) 9,950
MAR 22 1971
New England Newsclip

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
MAR 23 1971

Mrs. Ted Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, look over the musical program for an upcoming European tour by the orchestra. Mrs. Kennedy will narrate the orchestra's production of "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn, West Germany. Associated Press Photo

A HOT MINI — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, wife of the Massachusetts senator, wears a brocade minidress over matching bikini hot pants while chatting with conductor Michael Tilson Thomas at a party at the Kennedy home in McLean, Va. (AP Wirephoto)

Jamestown Post-Journal
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
D. 29,489
MAR 29 1971

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

NEWS-TIMES
DANBURY, CONN.
(E) 29,870
MAR 29 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Pops, Symphony to tour European cities

By MARY CAMPBELL

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make a European tour in April that will cost about concerts. All seats in the pit will be removed and Pops-style tables and

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
MAR 28 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony starts Europe tour next month

Boston Musicians to Visit Europe

narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn. Pianist Earl Wild will play with the Pops in London and Bonn, and pianist Christoph Eschenbach will play in Hannover.

Freight, weighing 3½ tons, includes 25 wardrobe trunks, dozens of instrument cases and music.

The group of 220 will travel on two planes. There will be 120 orchestra and staff, 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood, plus orchestra wives and press.

The Friends each pay $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

Six concerts are sponsored by American organizations. Gillette sponsors two concerts in Berlin, the Massachusetts Port Authority sponsors the symphony concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn. Stanley Home Products sponsors a concert in Rome and in Barcelona.

In London, the Boston Pops, whose concerts were modeled somewhat after the London Prom concerts, will help in the 100th anniversary celebration of Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. All seats in the pit will be removed and Pops-style tables and chairs set up. The Boston Pops atmosphere, complete with food and drink during intermissions, will be created. This also will be done in Bonn at the Beethovenhalle.

Conductors on the tour will be William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops.

Cities to be visited are London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

Fort Myers Free Press March 20, 1971

Associated Press Story

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MUSIC WORLD — Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops, and Joan Kennedy, who narrated "Peter and the Wolf" with the orchestra.

Boston Musicians Prepared For 12-city Tour of Europe

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make a 12-city European tour in April that will cost about $250,000.

This is the Boston Symphony's first international tour in 10 years, the first ever for the Boston Pops.

Mrs. Ted Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn. Pianist Earl Wild will play with the Pops in London and Bonn, and pianist Christoph Eschenbach will play in Hannover.

Freight, weighing 3½ tons, includes 25 wardrobe trunks, dozens of instrument cases and music.

The group of 220 will travel on two planes. There will be 120 orchestra and staff, 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood, plus orchestra wives and press.

The Friends each pay $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

Six concerts are sponsored by American organizations. Gillette sponsors two concerts in Berlin, the Massachusetts Port Authority sponsors the symphony concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn. Stanley Home Products sponsors a concert in Rome and in Barcelona.

In London, the Boston Pops, whose concerts were modeled somewhat after the London Prom concerts, will help in the 100th anniversary celebration of Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. All seats in the pit will be removed and Pops-style tables and chairs set up. The Boston Pops atmosphere, complete with food and drink during intermissions, will be created. This also will be done in Bonn at the Beethovenhalle.

Conductors on the tour will be William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops.

Cities to be visited are London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

SUN
WESTERLY, R. I.
(E) 9,900 (S) 9,950
MAR 22 1971
New England Newsclip

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
MAR 23 1971

Mrs. Ted Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, look over the musical program for an upcoming European tour by the orchestra. Mrs. Kennedy will narrate the orchestra's production of "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn, West Germany. Associated Press Photo

A HOT MINI — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, wife of the Massachusetts senator, wears a brocade minidress over matching bikini hot pants while chatting with conductor Michael Tilson Thomas at a party at the Kennedy home in McLean, Va. (AP Wirephoto)

Jamestown Post-Journal
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
D. 29,489
MAR 29 1971

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
MAR 22 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Pops to Tour Europe in April

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
MAR 28 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony starts Europe tour next month

Boston Musicians to Visit Europe

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make a 12-city European tour in April that will cost about $250,000.

This is the Boston Symphony's first international tour in 10 years, the first ever for the Boston Pops.

Mrs. Ted Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn. Pianist Earl Wild will play with the Pops in London and Bonn, and pianist Christoph Eschenbach will play in Hannover.

Freight, weighing 3½ tons, includes 25 wardrobe trunks, dozens of instrument cases and music.

The group of 220 will travel on two planes. There will be 120 orchestra and staff, 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood, plus orchestra wives and press.

The Friends each pay $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

Six concerts are sponsored by American organizations. Gillette sponsors two concerts in Berlin, the Massachusetts Port Authority sponsors the symphony concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn. Stanley Home Products sponsors a concert in Rome and in Barcelona.

In London, the Boston Pops, whose concerts were modeled somewhat after the London Prom concerts, will help in the 100th anniversary celebration of Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. All seats in the pit will be removed and Pops-style tables and chairs set up. The Boston Pops atmosphere, complete with food and drink during intermissions, will be created. This also will be done in Bonn at the Beethovenhalle.

Conductors on the tour will be William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops.

Cities to be visited are London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

Fort Myers Free Press March 20, 1971

Associated Press Story

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MUSIC WORLD — Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops, and Joan Kennedy, who narrated "Peter and the Wolf" with the orchestra.

Boston Musicians Prepared For 12-city Tour of Europe

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make a 12-city European tour in April that will cost about $250,000.

This is the Boston Symphony's first international tour in 10 years, the first ever for the Boston Pops.

Mrs. Ted Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn. Pianist Earl Wild will play with the Pops in London and Bonn, and pianist Christoph Eschenbach will play in Hannover.

Freight, weighing 3½ tons, includes 25 wardrobe trunks, dozens of instrument cases and music.

The group of 220 will travel on two planes. There will be 120 orchestra and staff, 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood, plus orchestra wives and press.

The Friends each pay $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

Six concerts are sponsored by American organizations. Gillette sponsors two concerts in Berlin, the Massachusetts Port Authority sponsors the symphony concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn. Stanley Home Products sponsors a concert in Rome and in Barcelona.

In London, the Boston Pops, whose concerts were modeled somewhat after the London Prom concerts, will help in the 100th anniversary celebration of Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. All seats in the pit will be removed and Pops-style tables and chairs set up. The Boston Pops atmosphere, complete with food and drink during intermissions, will be created. This also will be done in Bonn at the Beethovenhalle.

Conductors on the tour will be William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops.

Cities to be visited are London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

SUN
WESTERLY, R. I.
(E) 9,900 (S) 9,950
MAR 22 1971
New England Newsclip

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
MAR 23 1971

Mrs. Ted Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, look over the musical program for an upcoming European tour by the orchestra. Mrs. Kennedy will narrate the orchestra's production of "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn, West Germany. Associated Press Photo

A HOT MINI — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, wife of the Massachusetts senator, wears a brocade minidress over matching bikini hot pants while chatting with conductor Michael Tilson Thomas at a party at the Kennedy home in McLean, Va. (AP Wirephoto)

Jamestown Post-Journal
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
D. 29,489
MAR 29 1971

Europe Set By Music

By MAR
BOSTON
Symphony,
Boston Sy Players wil ropean tou cost about
This is th first inter years, the Boston Po
Mrs Te rate "Pet
Bonn. Pi play with and Bonn Eschenba
nover.
Freight cludes 25
ens of
music.
The g on two 120 orc
Friends and Fri
wood, p press.
The
for the a dona
Six c Ameri
sponsc
the Music.

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
MAR 23 1971

Boston groups to tour Europe

#6

By MARY CAMPBELL

BOSTON (AP)

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
MAR 28 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony starts Europe tour next month

Boston Musicians to Visit Europe

Bos
Pops
Cham
12-city that wil
This i phony's tour in 10 for the Bost
Mrs. Ted narrate "Pete in Bonn. Pia will play with London and Bon Christoph Esche play in Hannover.
Freight, weighing 3½ tons, includes 25 wardrobe trunks,

Thailand
45 Hammer head
47 Green (her.)
48 Arrow poison
49 One who (suffix)
51 Marriage

The Bos on Pops
phony make in will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn. Pianist Earl Wild will play with the Pops in London and Bonn, and pianist Christoph Eschenbach will play in Hannover.

Freight, weighing 3½ tons, includes 25 wardrobe trunks, dozens of instrument cases and music.

The group of 220 will travel on two planes. There will be 120 orchestra and staff, 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood, plus orchestra wives and press.

The Friends each pay $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

Six concerts are sponsored by American organizations. Gillette sponsors two concerts in Berlin, the Massachusetts Port Authority sponsors the symphony concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn. Stanley Home Products sponsors a concert in Rome and in Barcelona.

In London, the Boston Pops, whose concerts were modeled somewhat after the London Prom concerts, will help in the 100th anniversary celebration of Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. All seats in the pit will be removed and Pops-style tables and chairs set up. The Boston Pops atmosphere, complete with food and drink during intermissions, will be created. This also will be done in Bonn at the Beethovenhalle.

Conductors on the tour will be William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops.

Cities to be visited are London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

Fort Myers Free Press March 20, 1971

Associated Press Story

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MUSIC WORLD — Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops, and Joan Kennedy, who narrated "Peter and the Wolf" with the orchestra.

Boston Musicians Prepared For 12-city Tour of Europe

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make a 12-city European tour in April that will cost about $250,000.

This is the Boston Symphony's first international tour in 10 years, the first ever for the Boston Pops.

Mrs. Ted Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn. Pianist Earl Wild will play with the Pops in London and Bonn, and pianist Christoph Eschenbach will play in Hannover.

Freight, weighing 3½ tons, includes 25 wardrobe trunks, dozens of instrument cases and music.

The group of 220 will travel on two planes. There will be 120 orchestra and staff, 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood, plus orchestra wives and press.

The Friends each pay $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

Six concerts are sponsored by American organizations. Gillette sponsors two concerts in Berlin, the Massachusetts Port Authority sponsors the symphony concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn. Stanley Home Products sponsors a concert in Rome and in Barcelona.

In London, the Boston Pops, whose concerts were modeled somewhat after the London Prom concerts, will help in the 100th anniversary celebration of Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. All seats in the pit will be removed and Pops-style tables and chairs set up. The Boston Pops atmosphere, complete with food and drink during intermissions, will be created. This also will be done in Bonn at the Beethovenhalle.

Conductors on the tour will be William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops.

Cities to be visited are London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

SUN
WESTERLY, R. I.
(E) 9,900 (S) 9,950
MAR 22 1971
New England Newsclip

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
MAR 23 1971

Mrs. Ted Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, look over the musical program for an upcoming European tour by the orchestra. Mrs. Kennedy will narrate the orchestra's production of "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn, West Germany. Associated Press Photo

A HOT MINI — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, wife of the Massachusetts senator, wears a brocade minidress over matching bikini hot pants while chatting with conductor Michael Tilson Thomas at a party at the Kennedy home in McLean, Va. (AP Wirephoto)

Jamestown Post-Journal
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
D. 29,489
MAR 29 1971

European Tour Set By Boston Music Groups

By MARY CAMPBELL

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make a 12-city European tour in April that will cost about $250,000.

This is the Boston Symphony's first international tour in 10 years, the first ever for the Boston Pops.

Mrs. Ted Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn. Pianist Earl Wild will play with the Pops in London and Bonn, and pianist Christoph Eschenbach will play in Hannover.

Freight, weighing 3½ tons, includes 25 wardrobe trunks, dozens of instrument cases and music.

The group of 220 will travel on two planes. There will be 120 orchestra and staff, 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood, plus orchestra wives and press.

The Friends each pay $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

Six concerts are sponsored by American organizations. Gillette sponsors two concerts in Berlin, the Massachusetts Port Authority sponsors the symphony concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn. Stanley Home Products sponsors a concert in Rome and in Barcelona.

In London, the Boston Pops, whose concerts were modeled somewhat after the London Prom concerts, will help in the 100th anniversary celebration of Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. All seats in the pit will be removed and Pops-style tables and chairs set up. The Boston Pops atmosphere, complete with food and drink during intermissions, will be created. This also will be done in Bonn at the Beethovenhalle.

Conductors on the tour will be William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops.

Cities to be visited are London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
MAR 28 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony starts Europe tour next month

Boston Musicians to Visit Europe

By MARY CAMPBELL

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make a 12-city European tour in April that will cost about $250,000.

This is the Boston Symphony's first international tour in 10 years, the first ever for the Boston Pops.

Mrs. Ted Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn. Pianist Earl Wild will play with the Pops in London and Bonn, and pianist Christoph Eschenbach will play in Hannover.

Freight, weighing 3½ tons, includes 25 wardrobe trunks, dozens of instrument cases and music.

The group of 220 will travel on two planes. There will be 120 orchestra and staff, 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood, plus orchestra wives and press.

The Friends each pay $3,000 for the tour, $1,000 of which is a donation to the orchestra.

Six concerts are sponsored by American organizations. Gillette sponsors two concerts in Berlin, the Massachusetts Port Authority sponsors the symphony concert in London and the Pops concert in Bonn. Stanley Home Products sponsors a concert in Rome and in Barcelona.

In London, the Boston Pops, whose concerts were modeled somewhat after the London Prom concerts, will help in the 100th anniversary celebration of Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. All seats in the pit will be removed and Pops-style tables and chairs set up. The Boston Pops atmosphere, complete with food and drink during intermissions, will be created. This also will be done in Bonn at the Beethovenhalle.

Conductors on the tour will be William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops.

Cities to be visited are London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

Fort Myers Free Press March 20, 1971

Associated Press Story

4

ENTERPRISE & TIMES
BROCKTON, MASS.
(E) 53,254

APR 1 1971 New England Newsclip

MUSICIANS ON TOUR

MERCURY
MEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 8,900

MAR 31 1971 New England Newsclip

MUSICIANS ON TOUR

SENTINEL
KEENE, N. H.
(E) 9,318

APR 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Musicians Tour

REFORMER
BRATTLEBORO, VERMONT
(E) 8,[illegible]00

APR 1 1971 New England Newsclip

MUSICIANS ON TOUR

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
(E) 41,946

MAR 31 1971 New England Newsclip

MUSICIANS ON TOUR
BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the

UPI Wire Story

NEWS
MILFORD, MASS.
(E) 10,250

APR 1 1971 New England Newsclip

MUSICIANS ON TOUR

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
(E) 11,496

MAR 31 1971 New England Newsclip

MUSICIANS ON TOUR 785

EVE. NEWS
MELROSE, MASS.
(E) 9,800

MAR 31 1971 New England Newsclip

MUSICIANS ON TOUR

NEWS
MALDEN, MASS.
(E) 11,000

MAR 31 1971 New England Newsclip

MUSICIANS ON TOUR

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

APR 1 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO, POPS TOUR SET

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003

MAR 31 1971 New England Newsclip

Musicians Tour

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops leave Friday morning aboart two chartered planes for a 23-day tour of England, Germany, Austria, Spain, Italy and France.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950

APR 18 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Takes Its Friends Along on Tour

MARVIN SCHOFER
(Special to Sunday Advertiser)

(The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now touring Europe. This is the second of a series of articles by a member of the Symphony party.

With a little help from its friends, as the Beatles song puts it, th Boston Symphony Orchestra is mid-way through its European tour, hopping on and off trains and buses, trying to remember what tonight's hotel room number is, and wondering from time to time what city they are in.

The Friends—those 40 enthusiastic fans traveling with the orchestra—have all paid a princely sum for their trip and they've each topped it off with a $1000 contribution toward the cost of the orchestra's tour.

In return, they're having a ball. And a bundle of cocktail parties, a batch of concerts, an assortment of receptions, and the opportunity hasn't been without incident. There was the lady who got on the wrong plane in Boston—Clipper Boston Pops instead of Clipper Boston Symphony. "I knew they were plained, "so I couldn't imagine what difference it made which one I got on."

★

On the way over, the Pan Am stewardesses passed champagne and the planes became swinging get-acquainted parties organized by Fran Fahnestock, the BSO's swinging trustee who organized the entire Friends tour (with more than a little help from 'her' friends Persis Morris and Barbara Thompson, she's quick to say).

Daimler limousines met the planes in London. Very fancy cars, Daimler limousines, with lamb's fleece rugs in the back seat and enough room for six people to hold a poker game on the way in from Heathrow Airport.

The limousines carried the conductors and a few other lucky passengers. The Friends travelled to the Savoy Hotel in a purring Mercedes bus. After a night's sleep the London whirl began.

There was a Saturday afternoon cocktail party at the Garrick Club, to get things moving.

Next morning the Friends went to morning service at Westminster Abbey as the Boston Pops began its marathon rehearsal and performance day in Royal Albert Hall.

Fiedler had been in England 48 hours and already had appeared on television, held a press conference, talked to reporters, rehearsed

Extra 'Lawrence'

the Pops, conducted the performance and taped radio interviews in his dressing room. "Aren't you tired?" somebody asked. "I was born tired," he answered. "What am I doing tomorrow?"

"Lunch with J. Paul Getty," Fran Fahnestock answered.

"Fine," said Fiedler. "I use his gas in my fire engine, I'll be happy to meet him."

★

Getty entertained the Friends at his house which was built in the 1520s for Sir Richard Weston, a friend of King Henry VIII.

The rooms are so large they can barely be heated. But it's good for the tapestries, explained Getty's secretary, it preserves them and the paintings would be the envy of art museums. But she said the really good ones are away—he's building an art gallery in California and he's lent some others to the National gallery.

The dining room table seats a hundred or so without adding the leaves. Fresh flowers decorated it: bowls of camellias, vases of jonquils and tulips, small red pots of azaleas, mounds of tea roses in silver bowls and plastic place mats just like mine, exclaimed one happy friend.

As the friends got ready to leave, Getty came out to say goodbye, affable, smiling, asking to be remembered to friends of the friends.

Then it was back on the bus, past the stoplight, and back to the night activity, the Boston Symphony's first concert in Royal Festival Hall, followed by the most lavish reception of the trip so far, given by American Amb. Annenberg, hosted by Deputy Amb. Scott.

Still to come was the Boston Symphony Chamber Players concert at Banqueting Hall, the English Speaking Union's reception, a day in the country, and cocktails at the House of Lords, hosted by Lord Stowehil.

And then Berlin, Hamburg, Bonn, Vienna, Rome and Paris.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 293,[illegible]

APR 2 1971 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

Friends of Symphony Orchestra Feted at Gay Bon Voyage Party

FLYING TO EUROPE today, forty Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will travel with the orchestra on its 23-day European concert tour. Yesterday, before the final concert of the season in Symphony Hall, they were feted at a luncheon in Horticultural Hall. 785

There were spring flowers on the tables and in the center of each bouquet was a tiny gilded airplane made by the 5-year-old son of Mrs. Thomas Otis, a member of the luncheon committee.

There was a flutter of excitement as prospects of the glamorous trip to Europe were discussed and bon voyage wishes were exchanged. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, one of the two women trustees of the orchestra, has charge of the entertainments and arrangements for this unique tour.

Sitting at the table with her yesterday were her co-chairmen, Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris, Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., co-chairmen of the Council of Friends, Mrs. Richard Thompson and Mrs. George Sargent, who said she hadn't packed a thing. Mrs. Thompson wore jonquil yellow with a necklace of gold leaves and Mrs. Sargent's dress was petal pink.

There were many pastel dresses. Mrs. Alfred Willmann wore pale blue with a matching brimmed hat, and Mrs. Charles P. Howard's tiny hat was fashioned of pink flowers. Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld wore springlike navy blue trimmed with white.

The luncheon was under the auspices of the Belmont and Cambridge area of The Friends, among them being Mrs. Willmann, Mrs. David Pokross, Mrs. Charles Coolidge, Mrs. John Cancian, Mrs. Robinson Murray and Mrs. Herbert Lee of Belmont, and Mrs. B. Gring Wallace, Mrs. Edmond F. Wright, Mrs. Paul Dodson and Mrs. Edwin T. Green of Cambridge.

Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich and Mrs. George A. Parson are co-chairmen of the luncheon series. Among others there yesterday were Mrs. Ducey Ryerson, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Weston Adams, Mrs. Sheldon Wardwell, Mrs. A. Turner Wells, Miss Dorothy Seccomb, Miss Constance Learned, Mrs. William J. Mixter Jr., Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Miles N. Clair, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Jack Parker, Mr. and Mrs. John McAndrew, Mrs. Frederick Whiskin and Mrs. Freeman Davison.

* * *

Social News
The Patriot Ledger, Mon., April 12, 1971 Page 16

by Miriam Tod

The reports are winging their way back from Europe and it sounds to envious stay-at-homes as if everything is coming up roses for the lucky Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra accompanying the orchestra their fantastic three week tour of five countries.

If the quality of entertainment of the first four days, stays with them throughout the rest of the tour there is going to be some strenuous dieting undertaken when the travelers return as the price they will have to pay for their good time. From all reports the food served to them at all the different receptions and parties has been fabulous, with sturgeon, shrimp wrapped in fresh salmon with homemade mayonnaise, cream puffs, endless champagne, boned chicken and every other imaginable delicacy pressed upon them by their hospitable hosts.

London turned itself inside out to give the Friends a welcome other cities on the tour will find hard to emulate. The day after the 40 Friends in the group arrived they were entertained at a huge cocktail party at the famed Garrick Club. Named after the noted 17th century English actor, David Garrick, the club is affiliated with Boston's St. Botolph Club and contains much of the actor's stage props and memorabilia.

Trustee of the B.S.O. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, who together with Mrs. Stephen Morris of the Tanglewood Friends of the orchestra, is leader of the group traveling with the orchestra, gave a champagne reception in her suite at the Savoy Hotel overlooking the Thames following the opening concert at Royal Albert Hall given by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops.

The guest of honor at Mrs. Fahnestock's party was the Lord Mayor of Boston who, with other prominent citizens of that small Lincolnshire town, came down to London especially to attend the concert given by the world-famous orchestra from their town's American namesake. Also at the party were the Thomas Perrys Mr. and Mrs. David Rockefeller, Jr., the Stephen Morris', and president of the trustees of the B.S.O., Talcott Banks of Lincoln.

Talcott Banks

The following day was one the Friends will long remember. They were the guests of billionaire John Paul Getty at his 15th century Tudor house outside London. Originally the country estate of the Dukes of Sutherland it is set in a huge park with beautiful gardens and tall hedges surrounding it. The group had a conducted tour of the vast house including a close look at the priceless antiques and paintings, but the highlight of the day for one of the Friends was the discovery of a set of plastic place mats on the 160 foot long dining room table that were duplicates of ones that she had back home.

That evening the group was entertained by Deputy Ambassador from the United States Robert Montgomery Scott deputising for Ambassador Walter Annenberg who was in this country on business. The official group was joined by two members of the B.S.O. Friends who had flown over to join their husbands in London and to attend the opening concert of the Boston orchestra, Mrs. Howard Davis and Mrs. Donald Sinclair left the next day for Monaco where they were to be the special guests of Princess Grace during Easter. From there they plan to rejoin the Friends and the orchestra in Paris for the final festivities before the group heads back for Boston on April 25.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 423,300

APR 14 1971 New England Newsclip

Harold Banks

Oil Baron Wants a Bargain, Too

At least one member of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has the same kind of place mats that oil baron J. Paul Getty uses on that 100-foot dining room table in his ducal estate in England. And Getty may be amused, if this story reaches him. From 10 feet away, the unidentified Friend of the BSO thought the place mats looked familiar. So she stepped right up, took a close look, and then said, "Why, they're the sime kind I bought at Woolworth's — three for a dollar or something like that." That's how a man gets to be a billionaire — by saving a few pennies here and there . . . John Larner of Boston College tells this one on his wife — and their 14-year-old son, Jimmy. Jimmy asked her to do something for him. "In a minute," she said. "In a minute? You just blew the Mother of the Year Award," he said. "And, furthermore, that's no way to treat a tax deduction."

★

B.S.O. FRIENDS ON TOUR

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,818

APR 13 1971

BOSTON SOUND: The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, making a European tour, performed at London's Banqueting House in Whitehall. Nearly 500 guests made it to the concert, including 50 of the orchestra's supporters from the U.S. Later, over 100 guests headed toward Dartmouth House, headquarters of the English-Speaking Union, for a champagne supper. The Union benefited from the concert.

Fashions were strictly Civilized with floor-length evening dresses in chiffons and floral prints ... Midi coats ... and a few knickersuits popping up. Making the scene. Lady Rayleigh, Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees, with Mrs. C. Pertzoff, Lady Eccles, wife of the Minister of Arts, the William E. Channings ... and more.

* * *

BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 20 1971 New England Newsclip

MARJORIE SHERMAN

★

Touring Europe with the Boston Symphony is bringing wails from les girls because the hors d'oeuvres come by the hour and every concert has a supper party afterwards. Fran Fahnestock writes that the only saving grace is that all scales are in kilos or other unreadable weights.

6

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377 (E) 194,700

APR 2 1971 New England Newsclip

Big Toot for Symphony

SENDOFF—Joseph Lanza (left) and the rest of the Boston Fire Department band joined well-wishers at Logan Airport as the Boston Symphony Orchestra left on European tour. At right, Symphony manager Thomas Perry (left in photo) speaks with Arthur Fiedler as conductor William Steinberg stands in background. Story on Page 3. (Frank Wing photos)

Take off on 22-day European tour

BSO swinging on a star

Jetplane hanger was converted into a passenger facility today to handle the departure of the 106-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra on its European tour.

Two chartered jets took off with the orchestra after a sendoff ceremony outside the American Airlines hangar in which elected state affiicials and civic leaders participated.

The morning departure was necessary to permit the two chartered jetliners to arrive in London before the nightly curfew on jet landings, and to enable the orchestra to prepare for its first concert in London.

Nearly 250 persons were on the transports, with the orchestra divided equally in each jet.

Among the passengers were more than 40 members of The Friends of Boston Symphony Orchestra, a financial support organization.

In the next 22 days the symphony will perform in the great concert halls of Europe. There will be separate appearances of the symphony, under the direction of William Steinberg, conductor; the Boston Pops, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler and the Symphony Chamber Music unit.

Performances will be given in London, Germany, Austria, Italy, France and Spain.

The concerts are being underwritten by Gillette Company, Stanley Home Products and Massachusetts Port Authority.

A large number of jets, trains and buses will be used to transport the symphony on the tour.

For the transatlantic hop today, Pan Am rechristened its two craft "Boston Symphony" and "Boston Pops."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377 (E) 194,700

APR 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Limelight
...focus on the arts

The Patriot Ledger, Sat., April 3, 1971 Page 8

BOSTON SYMPHONY MEMBERS listen to remarks by Talcott M. Banks, chairman of the BSO's Board of Trustees, on the occasion of their departure yesterday for the Symphony's first European tour in 15 years. Limelight Page Editor Jon Lehman is accompanying the orchestra to London, where he will report next week on the first leg of the 23-day, six-nation tour.

ADVOCATE
STAMFORD, CONN.
(E) 32,000

APR 3 1971 New England Newsclip

UNDER NEW DIRECTION—Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, tries his hand at directing the Boston Fire Dept. Band at Logan International Airport Friday morning. The band was on hand to give a musical sendoff to the Boston Symphony, the Boston Pops and the Boston Symphony Chamber orchestras leaving on a 23-day tour of Europe. Fiedler is a fire buff and often shows up at Boston fires with his own fireman's helmet and coat. (AP Wirephoto)

Symphony
BSO will ald photo)

CITY RECORD
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,200

APR 12 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO TOURS EUROPE

Hundreds of music lovers of all ages attended a "musical send-off" ceremony at Logan Airport on April 2, when Arthur Fiedler, popular conductor of the famous Boston "Pops" Orchestra, joining with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, enplaned for a three-week musical tour of Europe.

Two hundred persons, including musicians, members of the staff, and friends will tour five countries, namely: Austria, England, France, Germany, and Italy. BSO director William Steinberg told the attending well-wishers "It is a great honor to take American culture to Europe."

Deputy Mayor Edward T. Sullivan, representing Mayor White, commented "that it was deplorable that urban problems often overshadow the cultural institutions that Boston has to offer, such as the Symphony Orchestra."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377 (E) 194,700

APR 2 1971 New England Newsclip

SOUTH SHORE MIRROR
SCITUATE, MASS.
WEEKLY 9,500

APR 8 1971 New England Newsclip

* * * *

Last Friday, April 2nd, the Boston Symphony Orchestra accompanied by members of their families and a group of the Friends of the Boston Symphony, took off on two 7-7 Jet Airliners for a tour of Europe. By April 25th, the orchestra will have covered 12,000 miles and will have presented 16 concerts and 4 rehearsals in 12 cities in 6 countries.

* * * *

BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
(M) 31,475 (S) 28,895

APR 3 1971 New England Newsclip

6

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377 (E) 194,700

APR 2 1971 New England Newsclip

Big Toot for Symphony

SENDOFF—Joseph Lanza (left) and the rest of the Boston Fire Department band joined well-wishers at Logan Airport as the Boston Symphony Orchestra left on European tour. At right, Symphony manager Thomas Perry (left in photo) speaks with Arthur Fiedler as conductor William Steinberg stands in background. Story on Page 3. (Frank Wing photos)

Limelight
...focus on the arts

The Patriot Ledger, Sat., April 3, 1971 Page 8

BOSTON SYMPHONY MEMBERS listen to remarks by Talcott M. Banks, chairman of the BSO's Board of Trustees, on the occasion of their departure yesterday for the Symphony's first European tour in 15 years. Limelight Page Editor Jon Lehman is accompanying the orchestra to London, where he will report next week on the first leg of the 23-day, six-nation tour.

Take off on 22-day European tour

BSO swinging on a star

Jetplane hanger was converted into a passenger facility today to handle the departure of the 106-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra on its European tour.

Two chartered jets took off with the orchestra after a sendoff ceremony outside the American Airlines hangar in which elected state afficials and civic leaders participated.

The morning departure was necessary to permit the two chartered jetliners to arrive in London before the nightly curfew on jet landings, and to enable the orchestra to prepare for its first concert in London.

Nearly 250 persons were on the transports, with the orchestra divided equally in each jet.

Among the passengers were more than 40 members of The Friends of Boston Symphony Orchestra, a financial support organization.

In the next 22 days the symphony will perform in the great concert halls of Europe. There will be separate appearances of the symphony, under the direction of William Steinberg, conductor; the Boston Pops, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler and the Symphony Chamber Music unit.

Performances will be given in London, Germany, Austria, Italy, France and Spain.

The concerts are being underwritten by Gillette Company, Stanley Home Products and Massachusetts Port Authority.

A large number of jets, trains and buses will be used to transport the symphony on the tour.

For the transatlantic hop today, Pan Am rechristened its two craft "Boston Symphony" and "Boston Pops."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377 (E) 194,700

APR 3 1971 New England Newsclip

ADVOCATE
STAMFORD, CONN.
(E) 32,000

APR 3 1971 New England Newsclip

UNDER NEW DIRECTION—Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, tries his hand at directing the Boston Fire Dept. Band at Logan International Airport Friday morning. The band was on hand to give a musical sendoff to the Boston Symphony, the Boston Pops and the Boston Symphony Chamber orchestras leaving on a 23-day tour of Europe. Fiedler is a fire buff and often shows up at Boston fires with his own fireman's helmet and coat. (AP Wirephoto)

CITY RECORD
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,200

APR 12 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO TOURS EUROPE

Hundreds of music lovers of all ages attended a "musical send-off" ceremony at Logan Airport on April 2, when Arthur Fiedler, popular conductor of the famous Boston "Pops" Orchestra, joining with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, enplaned for a three-week musical tour of Europe.

Two hundred persons, including musicians, members of the staff, and friends will tour five countries, namely: Austria, England, France, Germany, and Italy. BSO director William Steinberg told the attending well-wishers "It is a great honor to take American culture to Europe."

Deputy Mayor Edward T. Sullivan, representing Mayor White, commented "that it was deplorable that urban problems often overshadow the cultural institutions that Boston has to offer, such as the Symphony Orchestra."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377 (E) 194,700

APR 2 1971 New England Newsclip

SOUTH SHORE MIRROR
SCITUATE, MASS.
WEEKLY 9,500

APR 8 1971 New England Newsclip

* * * *

Last Friday, April 2nd, the Boston Symphony Orchestra accompanied by members of their families and a group of the Friends of the Boston Symphony, took off on two 7-7 Jet Airliners for a tour of Europe. By April 25th, the orchestra will have covered 12,000 miles and will have presented 16 concerts and 4 rehearsals in 12 cities in 6 countries.

* * * *

BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
(E) 31,475 (S) 28,895

APR 3 1971 New England Newsclip

785

Symphony BSO will ald photo)

6

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 2 1971 New England Newsclip

Big Toot for Symphony

SENDOFF—Joseph Lanza (left) and the rest of the Boston Fire Department band joined well-wishers at Logan Airport as the Boston Symphony Orchestra left on European tour. At right, Symphony manager Thomas Perry (left in photo) speaks with Arthur Fiedler as conductor William Steinberg stands in background. Story on Page 3. (Frank Wing photos)

Take off on 22-day European tour

BSO swinging on a star

Jetplane hanger was converted into a passenger facility today to handle the departure of the 106-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra on its European tour.

Two chartered jets took off with the orchestra after a sendoff ceremony outside the American Airlines hangar in which elected state afficials and civic leaders participated.

The morning departure was necessary to permit the two chartered jetliners to arrive in London before the nightly curfew on jet landings, and to enable the orchestra to prepare for its first concert in London.

Nearly 250 persons were on the transports, with the orchestra divided equally in each jet.

Among the passengers were more than 40 members of The Friends of Boston Symphony Orchestra, a financial support organization.

In the next 22 days the symphony will perform in the great concert halls of Europe. There will be separate appearances of the symphony, under the direction of William Steinberg, conductor; the Boston Pops, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler and the Symphony Chamber Music unit.

Performances will be given in London, Germany, Austria, Italy, France and Spain.

The concerts are being underwritten by Gillette Company, Stanley Home Products and Massachusetts Port Authority.

A large number of jets, trains and buses will be used to transport the symphony on the tour.

For the transatlantic hop today, Pan Am rechristened its two craft "Boston Symphony" and "Boston Pops."

CITY RECORD
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,200
APR 12 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO TOURS EUROPE

Hundreds of music lovers of all ages attended a "musical send-off" ceremony at Logan Airport on April 2, when Arthur Fiedler, popular conductor of the famous Boston "Pops" Orchestra, joining with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, enplaned for a three-week musical tour of Europe.

Two hundred persons, including musicians, members of the staff, and friends will tour five countries, namely: Austria, England, France, Germany, and Italy. BSO director William Steinberg told the attending well-wishers "It is a great honor to take American culture to Europe."

Deputy Mayor Edward T. Sullivan, representing Mayor White, commented "that it was deplorable that urban problems often overshadow the cultural institutions that Boston has to offer, such as the Symphony Orchestra."

Obituary

MRS. VASIL BLASZCZUK

Mrs. Anna Karawan Blaszczuk, 76, of 35 Soundview Ave., died Friday at Stamford Hospital.

Mrs. Blaszczuk was born in Sokal, Austria, Dec. 22, 1894, the daughter of Jacob and Mary Karawan. She was a resident of Stamford for 55 years and was employed as a seamstress at the United Cloak Manufacturing Co.

Mrs. Blaszczuk was a member of UNA Branch 350, ILGWU 147 and the Royal Neighbors of America.

She is survived by her husband, Vasil Blaszczuk of Stamford; a son, Myron W. Blaszczuk of Stamford; two brothers, Alex Karawan of Florida and Joseph Karawan of Long Island; and one grandson.

The funeral will be from the Bosak Funeral Home, 641 Atlantic St., Monday at 11 a.m., then to St. Vladimir's Church for the celebration of a Requiem Mass at 11:30 with the Rev. Stephen Chrepta officiating. Interment will be in St. John's R.C. Cemetery, Springdale.

The family will receive friends at the Bosak Funeral Home Saturday from 7 to 9 p.m. and Sunday from 3 to 5 and 7 to 9 p.m. Parastas service will be celebrated Sunday at 8 p.m.

NICHOLAS M. LUCAS

MILFORD — Nicholas M. Lucas (Lukach), 78, 191 Seaside Ave., died Friday at Milford Hospital.

He was born in Brlog, Yugoslavia, November 4, 1892, and was a resident of Stamford for 50 years.

He was a retired foreman of the Atlas Powder Co. of Stamford.

Mr. Lucas served in the U.S. Army's Yankee Division as a sergeant during World War I. He was a member of the Croatian Fraternal Union, St. Mary's Holy Name Society and the American Legion.

Mr. Lucas is survived by his widow, Mrs. Anna Lucas of Stamford; three daughters, Mrs. Emanual C. Russo of Milford, Mrs. J.R. Kenna Jr. of Stamford, and Miss Florence Lucas of Stamford; one son, Edward J. Lucas of Norwalk; five grandchildren and two great grandchildren.

Funeral services are being handled by the Bosak Funeral Home.

PAWLOWSKI

Mrs. Josephine Pawlowski, 73, of 150 Little Hill Dr., died Friday at Stamford Hospital.

She was born in Wilkes Barre, Pa., Aug. 2, 1897, the daughter of the late Ignatius and Victoria Dzeimeika. She was a resident of Stamford for about 20 years.

She was a member of the Rosary Society of Holy Name Church and a communicant of that church.

She is predeceased by her husband, the late Teofil Pawlowski.

Mrs. Pawlowski is survived by one daughter, Mrs. Frank

RUBEN

West Have Waverly, 39, died Thursd Hospital.

He was bo
Vancetown N
Nannie Taylo
the late Will

Mr. Waver for a short was an Arm
Korean War War, and Smith House

In addition is survived b Charlie Mae bus, Ga.;
Gloria, Elize
Waverly of C sons, Micha
Waverly of C
sister, Mrs. I Stamford;

Hearing Set To Establish Wetland Line

A public hearing to establish Calling Hours.

COS COB — A funeral service

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Limelight ...focus on the arts

The Patriot Ledger, Sat., April 3, 1971 Page 8

BOSTON SYMPHONY MEMBERS listen to remarks by Talcott M. Banks, chairman of the BSO's Board of Trustees, on the occasion of their departure yesterday for the Symphony's first European tour in 15 years. Limelight Page Editor Jon Lehman is accompanying the orchestra to London, where he will report next week on the first leg of the 23-day, six-nation tour.

SENDOFF SERENADE — Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Fire Dept. band which joined scores of other well wishers at Logan Airport yesterday to watch Fiedler and other members of tthe Boston Symphony Orchestra depart on a European tour. The BSO will perform in six countries. (Ed Fitzgerald photo)

Fiedler Leads Own Sendoff as Pops, BSO Go on Tour

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 293

By PAUL ROWELL

Arthur Fiedler took over the Boston Fire Department Band in one section of the vast American Airlines hangar at Logan Airport yesterday.

Your Father's Mustache Band took over the other section.

And the crowd loved it.

THE BANDS were giving a musical sendoff to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops Orchestra before the musicians boarded two separate Pan American jets for a three-week tour of Europe.

Also accompanying the two famed orchestras were the Boston Symphony Chamber Players; Friends of the Boston Symphony and the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

Boston Symphony Director William Steinberg told scores of relatives and friends who had come to see the departing groups off: "It is a great honor to take American culture to Europe . . . we will succeed in convincing the Europeans that Americans are no naked savages jumping out of the bush."

Talbot Banks, president of the Boston Symphony, introduced Deputy Mayor Edward T. Sullivan, who said he was appearing on behalf of Mayor White.

SULLIVAN said that it was deplorable that urban problems often overshadow the cultural institutions that Boston has to offer such as the Symphony Orchestra.

The trip will be the Boston Symphony's first international tour in 10 years, when the orchestra went to the Far East, and the first European tour in 15 years.

It will be the first time the Boston Pops has ever played abroad.

Approximately 200 will be on a five-country tour, including the musicians, staff members and friends. Countries to be visited are England, Germany, Austria, Italy and France.

Conductor Fiedler arrived at Logan on a flight from Chicago. He was driven by a state trooper to his Brookline residence, where he prepared for the transatlantic flight.

THE COLORFUL, 75-year-old leader of the Pops, said that he gave the trooper "some breakfast" and then packed.

"I don't want anybody to pack for me," he said.

After the packing was finished, Fiedler was driven back to the airport to join the pre-flight festivities.

BOSTON POPS conductor Arthur Fiedler directs Boston Fire Department Band at Logan Airport yesterday as part of musical sendoff to Boston Symphony, the Boston Symphony Chamber and the Boston Pops leaving on 23-day tour of Europe. (AP)

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
APR 1 1971 New England Newsclip

Harold Banks

★

Fiedler will probably steal the show. For the airport festivities before the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes off for its European tour Friday, Duncan Smith of the Antique Auto Museum in Brookline has obtained a 1941 Lincoln and a 1930 Model A roadster. BSO conductor William Steinberg will be driven from a point on the airport to the waiting Pan Am planes in the Lincoln. Associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas will be chauffered in the roadster — maybe even in its rumble seat, if the weather permits. But Arthur Fiedler, who'll be returning by plane at 5:30 that morning from one of his multitudinous swings with one orchestra or another, will be whisked to his Brookline home in a State Police cruiser so he can refresh and repack — and isn't expected to get back to the airport until the last minute — with those sirens clearing the way . . . The pertinent question being asked by some critics of a bill that would permit conjugal visits for certain convicts — a departure on which Middlesex County Sheriff John J. Buckley is embarking without waiting for legislative approval — is whether such brief family interludes won't lead to the birth of more children—to be supported by welfare funds.

★

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 293
APR 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Sound of Music

PAGE ONE

Page 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops receive a musical sendoff at Logan Airport, beginning a three-week tour of Europe. This is the first foreign tour for The Pops and its conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
APR 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston's best-known fire buff, Arthur Fiedler, can't resist conuducting the Fire Dept. Band as he and other Boston Symphony Orchestra members are serenaded at Logan Airport prior to departure on a European tour. Below, violinist Ayrton Pinto says goodbye to his wife and children, Andre, 7, Marcos, 5, and Monica, 2. For tuba player Chester Schmitz departure is the time (at right) to get a kiss goodbye from his fiancee, Girls Latin School teacher Ellen Moloney. —Record American Photos, Carroll Myett and AP Photo

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
APR 3 1971 New England

BSO Lifts Off for 6-Nation Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays music like it is, hit the high seas Friday on its annual European tour.

And because it's spring, there was more than music in the air—there was romance.

Two jets, appropriately rechristened "Boston Symphony" and "Boston Pops," lifted the 106 artists off the runway for London, the first concert stop.

Left behind was the Firefighter's Band that had serenaded the voyagers before takeoff and a lady who shares her love of music with Chester Schmitz of Marblehead, a gifted tuba member with the orchestra.

She is Ellen Moloney, French teacher at Girls' Latin and herself an accomplished violinist. They met at a Tanglewood concert and are engaged to be wed in June.

The Firefighter's Band was adequately led by Mr. Pops himself, Arthur Fielder, an honorary red-helmeted fire chief.

Other performances in the 22-day tour will be given in Germany, Austria, Italy, France and Spain.

The trip is co-sponsored by Gillette, Stanley Home Products and the Massachusetts Port Authority.

Financial Sponsors

8

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
DEC 18 1970
New England Newsclip

Business backs BSO tour

In anticipation of its forthcoming European tour in April, the Boston Symphony has announced, jointly with representatives of the three organizations, the first three sponsors of concerts abroad by the orchestra—the Gillette Company, Massachusetts Port Authority (MASSPORT), and Stanley Home Products. Contributions from each of these companies, with others to be announced later, will make possible the series of 17 appearances by the BSO and Boston Pops, in 6 countries between April 4 and 24, 1971. Musical director William Steinberg and associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the BSO concerts, with Arthur Fiedler leading the first Boston Pops concerts to be heard in Europe.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 18 1970
New England Newsclip

2 firms, Port Authority help sponsor BSO tour

Talcott M. Banks, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced yesterday that the Gillette Co., the Massachusetts Port Authority and Stanley Home Products will sponsor six of the orchestra's 17 concerts on its European tour, April 2-24.

Gillette will sponsor two concerts in Berlin, April 11 and 12. Both will be conducted by Music Director William Steinberg.

Massport will sponsor a concert in London April 5 with Steinberg conducting and in Frankfurt on April 15 with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting.

Stanley Home Products will sponsor the Orchestra's concerts in Rome, April 20 and in Madrid, April 21 with Thomas and Steinberg conducting.

In acknowledging the sponsorship of the six concerts, Banks noted the diversity of the companies — two corporations and a quasi-governmental agency — and termed corporate support "The great white hope of the arts."

The tour, which will involve 120 people and 10 tons of baggage, will cover thirteen cities and six countries. In addition to the BSO concerts, the Boston Pops Orchestra and Arthur Fiedler will present two programs in London and Bonn.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900
DEC 21 1970
New England Newsclip

Stanley To Sponsor Symphony Concerts

EASTHAMPTON — Stanley Home Products Inc., headquartered here, will sponsor two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Rome on April 20 and in Madrid on April 21.

The sponsorship is part of a program of industry support for the Boston Symphony's 1971 European tour which will include six countries between April 1 and April 25.

"Our sponsorship of symphony performances in Italy and Spain emphasized the affinity that exists between Stanley, Stanley dealers and their customers around the world" explained Robert F. Lally, president of Stanhome International, a Stanley Home Products division.

"This is the orchestra of Stanley's home state and we are honored to have this opportunity to present the Boston Symphony to our friends on behalf of our Spanish and Italian Subsidiaries."

Stanhome International is also active in eight other countries in Europe, Latin America and the Far East.

Stanley Home Products, which is celebrating its 40th anniversary year, is a regular supporter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer music festival at Tanglewood.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
DEC 23 1970
New England Newsclip

NEWS-ADVERTISER
WESTFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,000
DEC 30 1970
New England Newsclip

In Rome And Madrid

Stanley Sponsoring Overseas Concerts By Boston Symphony

Stanley Home Products, Inc., of Westfield, will sponsor two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Rome on April 20, and in Madrid on April 21. The sponsorship is part of a program of industry support for the Boston Symphony's 1971 European Tour, which will take it to six countries between April 1 and April 25, which will take it to six countries between April 1 and 25.

"Our sponsorship of symphony performances in Italy and Spain emphasizes the affinity that exists between Stanley, Stanley dealers and their customers around the world," explained Robert F. Lally, president, Stanhome International, a Stanley Home Products Division. "This is the Orchestra of Stanley's home state and we are honored to have this opportunity to present the Boston Symphony to our friends on behalf of our Spanish and Italian subsidiaries."

Stanhome International is also active in eight other countries in Europe, Latin America and the Far East.

Stanley Home Products is also a regular supporter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer music festival at Tanglewood.

BSO Announces Sponsors of European Tours

The Boston Symphony last week announced the names of three corporations which will act as sponsors of six of the Orchestra's 17 concerts during its European tour this coming April. The Gillette Compnay will sponsor the Berlin concerts of April 11 and 12; the Massachusetts Port Authority will sponsor concerts in London, April 5, and Frankfurt, April 15; and the Rome and Madrid concerts, April 20 and 21, will be sponsored by Stanley Home Products of Westfield, Mass.

In making the announcement, Talcott M. Banks, president of the Symphony's board of trustees, commented: "Not only do we receive substantial and generous financial support for the Boston Symphony's most interesting and important tour of six European countries, but it comes from three diverse sources — two corporations and a quasi governmental agency, all with roots in New England and interests throughout the world. We hope that others will shortly follow the leadership of Gillette, Stanley Home Products and the Massachusetts Port Authority in this farsighted act of public service."

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260
JAN 6 1971
New England Newsclip

(Sp

SPRING
—Stanley
Westfield concerts
Boston Sym
in Rome o
Madrid on A

The spons program of for the S European to take it to six countries.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
DEC 23 1970
New England Newsclip

The breakthrough that the Boston Symphony Orchestra scored last week is broadening. Shortly after the turn of the year, two more corporations are expected to join the three — Gillette, Stanley Home Products and the Massachusetts Port Authority — in helping to defray the $250,000 it'll cost to send the orchestra, this time with Arthur Fiedler, too, on its spring jaunt to Europe.

BSO's European Tour PL. 12/23/70

Corporations Coffering Up

By Jon Lehman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, casting about for financial support from corporations for its 1971 European tour, has caught for openers two consumer products manufacturers — one based in Boston and one near Tanglewood — and a quasi-public agency.

The four organizations, the Gillette Company of Boston, Stanley Home Products Inc. of Westfield, the Massachusetts Port Authority and the symphony, held a press conference last week to explain this promising union of business and the arts and to point out that the orchestra is still looking for as many as 11 other corporations to sponsor the remaining individual concerts in the 13 cities on the tour next April.

It is no secret that even the best established of Boston's cultural institutions are increasingly feeling the economic squeeze of tight money, rising costs and wages and an inability to raise more income from the traditional sources of revenue, such as subscription lists. It is a nationwide problem, and the Boston Symphony has been a leader in recognizing the need to persuade business organizations to support the cultural life of the community.

The three corporate organizations which are participating so far will each sponsor a pair of concerts on the tour, Gillette underwriting two concerts in Berlin April 11 and 12, Massport one in London April 5 and one in Frankfurt April 15, and Stanley Home Products one in Rome April 20 and in Madrid April 21.

The sponsoring corporations will be given acknowledgments in program booklets and promotional materials, will receive a block of tickets to distribute for the concert it sponsors and may also arrange social affairs in connection with the concert. Sponsors will also be given four seats on the transatlantic flight with the orchestra at no charge.

The three organizations which have signed up so far straightforwardly acknowledge there is as much in the arrangement for them as for the orchestra.

Paul G. O'Friel, Gillette's director of corporate public affairs, pointed out that his company would use the Easter weekend concerts in Berlin as a chance to bring together the staffs of Gillette's German subsidiaries.

"American business abroad has always been suspected of taking more out of foreign countries than we put in," said Robert C. Alsop of Stanley Home Products. "We saw this project as a chance to do something on the credit side," he said, adding that his company intended to make that credit clear to the foreign audience and market by "an active" promotional campaign.

John F. Halloran, director of public relations for the Massachusetts Port Authority, pointed out that his agency uses no federal, state or local governmental funds, but operates entirely on the revenues it makes from user fees at the port installations including Logan International Airport. He said Massport's sponsorship of concerts was part of a campaign to increase foreign business use of the port of Boston by emphasizing cultural attractions here.

Talcott M. Banks, president of the symphony's board, estimated the total cost of the European tour at about $250,000, saying "orchestras must have this sort of corporate support to survive," but acknowledged the irony of the fact that it sometime seems easier to enlist business aid for an overseas venture than to find enough similar assistance for deficits incurred at home.

Arthur Fiedler conducts 1st concert on Symphony tour

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
(E) 9,230

APR 6 1971

New England Newsclip

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra departed for London, England, for the first stop of its 23-day European Tour last Friday.

Conductors for the 16 concerts to be played in England, Germany, Austria, Italy and France are William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony; Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops.

This is the Boston Symphony's first international tour in 10 years, when the orchestra went to the Far East, and its first European tour in 15 years. Both of these previous tours were led by former music director, Charles Munch.

The tour opened Sunday evening, April 4 at Royal Albert Hall, London, with Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops orchestra. Pianist Earl Wild played Tchaikovsky's Piano concerto no. 1. The Boston Pops orchestra is the Boston Symphony minus its principal players. This is the first time the Pops has ever played abroad.

Since the Boston Pops concerts were modeled after the London Prom concerts, the Boston Pops orchestra participated in the 100th Anniversary season celebration of London's Royal Albert Hall, home of the Prom concerts. Pops-style tables and chairs were set up in the pit so that the Boston atmosphere, complete with food and drink during the concert, can be recreated. This will also be done in Bonn's Beethovenhalle.

Monday evening, April 5, Music Director William Steinberg conducted the first Boston Symphony concert of the tour in Royal Festival Hall, London. The program was Mozart's Symphony no. 36 and Mahler's Seventh symphony.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, the principal members of the Boston Symphony, perform Tuesday evening, April 6, at Banqueting House, Whitehall, in a concert sponsored by the English Speaking Union. The program includes music by Mozart, Stravinsky and Debussy.

The first Boston Symphony concert on the Continent takes place Wednesday evening, April 7 in Stuttgart at the Beethovensaal der Leiderhalle and is conducted by William Steinberg. Concerts will be performed in other cities in Germany, as well as Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players tour from April 26 to May 10 following the orchestra's tour. The Chamber Players give eight concerts in Paris, Florence, Munich, Hannover, Royaumont, Montpeiller, Bordeaux and Brighton, england.

Forty-one members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and the Friends of Music at Tanglewood accompany the tour. The Friends have paid $3,000 for their tour, including a $1,000 donation to the orchestra, which materially assists in underwriting the tour. The Friends visit seven of the 12 tour cities and have an elaborate social schedule in each city, besides hearing the Boston Symphony, the Boston Pops, European orchestras, and attending European opera and ballet performances.

Six concerts of the tour are sponsored by American organizations: Gillette sponsors the two in Berlin; the Massachusetts Port Authority (Massport) sponsors the Pops concerts in London and Bonn; Stanley Home Products sponsors concerts in Rome and Barcelona.

There are approximately 230 people in the tour party, including orchestra, Friends, corporate sponsors, stage hands, press and managerial staff. Total cost of the tour is in excess of a quarter of a million dollars.

Social highlights of the Friends tour include diplomatic receptions by the United States Ambassadors to England, France, Austria, Germany and Italy. Cocktail parties are scheduled at the House of Lords and the Garrick club in London, and at the German Imperial Hunting Lodge "Bahnhof Rolandseck" near Bonn. Other events include Matins with Choir at Westminister Abbey, receptions by the English Speaking Union, the Lord Mayors of Berlin and Hamburg, and presentation of the keys to the City of Paris at the Hotel de Ville. The Lord Mayor of Boston England will be the orchestra's guest at the opening concert in London. There will also be netertainment by Deutsche Grammophon, the orchestra's new recording company.

Britons Go Wild Over Fiedler's Pops Concert in London

By MARVIN SCHOFER

(Special to Sunday Advertiser)

(The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now touring Europe. This is the first of a series of articles by a member of the Symphony party relating what took place in each city.)

LONDON — Whatever was left of the "reserve" the British are famous for vanished when the entire brass section of the Boston Pops Orchestra rose to sound out the famous climax of Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever."

It was the highpoint of the Boston Pops' first concert outside of Massachusetts and under Arthur Fiedler's energetic leadership it set the 5500 Londoners in Royal Albert Hall to cheering, applauding and stamping in rhythm.

In its 86-year history, the Pops orchestra has never strayed far from home. Now, it was introducing London to the Pops idea—good music, classic and popular, played to perfection, with champagne corks popping and wine flowing.

★

It was also the first concert of Boston Symphony's 90th anniversary European tour, and as you might expect, it was news to many of the English that the Boston Pops Orchestra is actually the Boston Symphony minus its first deck players. (They were getting ready to give their own chamber music concert just two nights later.)

Arthur Fiedler entered. "He looks like Prime Minister Lloyd George" wrote one old-time critic the next day. The orchestra played Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" to begin with, then a Beethoven overture and Offenbach's popular "Gaite Parisienne" ballet suite. The audience was warm—but reserved.

An intermission was next, while the piano was put in place for Malcolm Frager to join Fiedler and the Pops in Tchaivkovsky's first piano concerto. An ovation. The BBC television cameras caught it all, broadcasting it live to all the British Isles.

And then came the first humming along and whistling. But it really took the 'St. Louis Blues March" to get the British with it. And from then on, through the famous Pops "extras" there was no stopping them.

★

The cheering went on and on. Great rolls of applause thundered down each time Fiedler returned to the stage and asked the orchestra to rise to share the applause—foot stomping of a kind usually heard at an English soccer game, not a concert.

When it was all over, Fiedler stood backstage meeting his audience. "I've conducted here a lot," he told me, "but I've never heard anything quite like that."

"It is the first time we've ever heard of a concert where you can get food and drink at tables in the arena," said a lively young English girl, "it's fantastic."

Other well-wishers congratulated pianist Malcolm Frager, who had stepped in for Earl Wild, a great Pops favorite, when Wild became ill and cancelled his appearance only three days before the orchestra left for England.

One of the most enthusiastic backstage visitors was the guest of honor along with the Fiedlers at a party later that evening. He was Alan Foster, the Lord Mayor of Boston, England. "We still like to say that we are the mother city," he said, "but, I guess we can't fool anybody into believing that now they've seen what the daughter city has sent us."

Mrs. Fiedler said, "I knew it was a success as soon as a very dignified lady at the next table leaned over to me during the first part and said 'Madame, would you please be quiet so we can enjoy the music.' Another few concerts like this and even she'll learn you're supposed to laugh and talk while the Pops entertains you."

(Another report on the European tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in next Sunday's Advertiser.)

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950

APR 11 1971 New England Newsclip

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377 (E) 194,700

APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377 (E) 194,700

APR 9 1971 New England Newsclip

CAPACITY CROWD responds with enthusiastic applause as Arthur Fiedler (standing right center) and Boston Pops orchestra conclude concert at the Royal Albert Hall in London. The sellout performance marked the beginning of a three-week European tour by the Boston Symphony and "Pop" orchestras. (UPI)

Orchestra opens European tour

London critics cool to Boston Pops

Associated Press

LONDON—The first performance outside the United States of the Boston Pops orchestra was greeted with little enthusiasm by prominent British critics today.

Champagne flowed at tables in the arena of the Royal Albert Hall while Arthur Fiedler conducted, but Alan Blyth of the "Times" found "not as much fizz in the performances as one would have expected."

"The Bostonians played here as if this was—as it indeed is—just one stop on an extensive tour with each place receiving the stock performance," he wrote.

"There was efficiency, even brilliance, but no real love in the interpretations."

For the first night of its tour the orchestra presented Elgar, Beethoven, Offenbach, Tchaikovsky, a selection from "Hair" and, as a climax the "St. Louis Blues."

Malcolm Frager, the soloist in Tchaikovsky's 1st Piano Concerto, turned in "an old-fashioned bravura performance," said Blyth, with "hardly a note out of place, hardly one played with real imaginative insight."

Edward Greenfield of The Guardian felt Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance No. 1 sounded ill at ease and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was "like a trumpet concerto and a fairly perfunctory one at that with the hall playing an acoustic trick on the brass."

He said Frager "blatantly altered" the layout of the opening chords of the concerto but "then went on to find wit and poetry in the gentler sections."

"Then came the justification for the whole concert, and it was sad we had not had it at the start, an outrageous march version of W. C. Handy's classic 'St. Louis Blues'," Greenfield said.

"At last the sparkle we know on record from Fiedler and his band, their tongue-in-cheek humor, was plain for all to hear."

BOSTON SYMPHONY TOURING ABROAD—1 . . . by Michael Steinberg

Pops delights London audience

LONDON — The fourth encore at Arthur Fiedler's Boston Pops concert in the Royal Albert Hall Sunday evening was "The Stars and Stripes Forever," and the audience — some 6000 — clapped the rhythm in unison, hushed up when THE tune came in, laughed with delight when all the brass stood for the final chorus, then stood and cheered through another four bows until Fiedler — looking just like pictures of Arthur Fiedler, as the lady at the next table observed — took concertmaster Alfred Krips by the elbow and led the orchestra off the stage (platform here).

The Sunday Pops concert was the first event of a Boston Symphony tour — its first to Europe since 1956 — that will wind up in Paris on Saturday, 24 April. The program followed the familiar Pops format, going from Elgar and Beethoven via Offenbach to Tchaikovsky, then to "Hair" and the "St. Louis Blues." For Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto—they say in the Albert Hall that when they wheel out the piano it begins to play that all by itself — there was the unexpected pleasure of the participation of Malcolm Frager, a late-hour replacement for Earl Wild, who is ill with facial neuralgia.

The earlier encores that turned the audience on so were Bizet's rowdy "Farandole," a soft-focus version of "Yesterday," and a raw one of "Mack the Knife." For the first time, tables were put on the main floor of the Albert Hall, Pops-style, and London concertgoers were pleased with the way it dressed the place up. The hall is huge, domed, round, and red, with three tiers of boxes, a balcony, and a standing-room gallery.

The wine list was considerably more elegant than the one at home, "but," said Fiedler backstage, "my bourbon's the same." Fiedler altogether was pleased with the success of the concert and with the audience ("they drink more quietly than in Boston . . . very attentive, very appreciative"). At the rehearsal in the afternoon, part of which was picked up by BBC-TV, he had given a characteristically Fiedlerian performance — "shut up, it's not Pops season yet" and many "stop thats" as the orchestra offered to do some cutting up. Several players commented that by Pops standards, their out-of-town behavior was most decorous.

When the orchestra left Logan airport Friday morning, Fiedler had just returned the night before from a 22-day, 21-concert tour with the National Symphony: "I've had no sleep, you know. Just had time to repack, turn around, and come back to the airport." He got a nap on the plane, tucked in by Mrs. Thomas D. Perry, wife of the BSO manager, and by a Pan Am stewardess. Saturday afternoon in London, I asked him if he had had any sleep yet: "No, had to be on television at 8 this morning."

"Do you know," Fiedler continued, "that this is the first time the Boston Pops has ever played outside Boston? We've not even as much as played New York. I don't understand the management, don't understand why they persist in behaving as though we somehow contaminated the name of the Boston Symphony or something," he said, firing another volley in a cheerfully waged quarter-century war.

Backstage visitors included Colin Davis, conductor of the BBC Symphony, soon to be Music Director of the Covent Garden Opera, and a well-liked Boston Symphony guest conductor. In the audience was avant-garde composer Earle Brown, who looked to be enjoying himself hugely and confirmed that he was, by the orchestra ("fabulous") and by the range of music ("'Yesterday' is one of the greatest melodies ever written"). Afterwards he headed backstage to greet BSO trumpeter Gerard Goguen, to whom he had played second trumpet in his first professional gig at Fitchburg over 25 years ago.

The orchestra, which arrived here on two planes Friday evening, had a free day Saturday, spent it scattered about London, resting, visiting, shopping, going to a variety of shows from "Waiting for Godot" to "Giselle" to a rock "Othello." Its first concert as the Boston Symphony, William Steinberg conducting, was at the Royal Festival Hall Monday evening.

Michael Steinberg, music critic of The Globe, and Ed Fitzgerald, executive photo editor, are accompanying the BSO on its European tour.

A FIRST For London. Note Symphony Hall-style tables at the Royal Albert Hall for last Sunday's Boston Pops concert. (Ed Fitzgerald photo)

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

APR 11 1971 New England Newsclip

London Ovation Greets Boston Pops Orchestra

The following dispatch from London is written by The Springfield Sunday Republican's music critic Richard C. Hammerich, who is in Europe on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LONDON — The applause was friendly when Arthur Fiedler stepped up on the podium in Royal Albert Hall Sunday.

It was full of love when he stepped down.

7000 Attend

More than 7000 Londoners gave him and the Boston Pops a tumultuous ovation in the home of the famous Prom concerts, the predecessors of the Pops.

It was the first concert of a tour that would take the Boston Symphony Orchestra plus 100 wives, friends, staff and reporters 12,000 miles through six countries for 16 concerts in 23 days.

It was the first performance of the Boston Pops abroad. The Londoners loved it, although at first, their response was sedate.

Offenbach's "Gaite Parisienne" warmed them after doses of Beethoven and Elgar, and they were highly appreciative of Malcolm Frager's elegant solo playing of the mellower first (and almost unknown) version of Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto.

But it was an arrangement of "Hair," the "St. Louis Blues March" and encores of "Farandole," "Yesterday," "Mack the Knife" and "Stars and Stripes" that broke them loose and set them to clapping in rhythm.

They stood up and shouted and refused to let Fiedler leave — but after about 50 successful years on the podium, Fiedler knows well when to leave.

He and the orchestra were a great success. It was a happy evening, a nice one for the end of the great hall's centenary week.

On March 29 Queen Elizabeth had dedicated a plaque in the lobby com- opening day of the hall attended exactly 100 years before by Queen Victoria.

It is a gigantic tiered, oval bowl (like a mold for a wedding cake) with seats nearly all the way around its wall. Far at the top, (the seventh level) is a wide fenced shelf that can accommodate 1000 standees (or promenaders).

Hustling to Cabs

But backstage the orchestra members were already hustling to climb into their cabs and chartered buses. They had had a long day, including a long rehearsal, and already on their minds was a concert by the full orchestra to be played the next day in Royal Festival Hall (Mozart and Mahler) to be followed by a reception for the orchestra given by U. S. Ambassador and Mrs. Annenberg.

And then the tour would begin in earnest. Two concerts in 4 days in lively London, with all its diversions for tourists, is nice work, but it is to be followed by 10 concerts in 12 days in Germany and Austria and most orchestra members were not looking forward to it.

Running on a somewhat parallel course are about 40 members of the Friends of the Orchestra societies of Boston and Tanglewood who are living a busy social life.

Their leaders have organized for them a full (daily) schedule of cocktail parties, dinners, luncheons, receptions, Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts and ballet and opera performances in seven of the tour cities.

Each paid $3000 for their three weeks of fun, one third of which goes to help pay the orchestra's tour expenses.

Also helping are three commercial organizations which are sponsoring specific concerts: Gillette (two in Berlin) Massachusetts Port Authority, (London and the Pops in Bonn) and Stanley Home Products (Rome and Barcelona).

Boston Pops Jeered in British bow

By Louis Snyder
Music critic of The Christian Science Monitor

London

The Boston Pops orchestra, appearing for the first time anywhere outside the United States, has made a long-delayed and, as it happened, wildly acclaimed bow in Britain. It signaled the first European tour in 15 years by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose members make up the Pops, and whose own concerts began April 5.

The latest triumph of the Pops took place April 4 in the enormous, newly scrubbed, red-brick, half-sunken flower pot that is Royal Albert Hall, celebrating its 100th anniversary. Going back to 1855 itself, the Pops—with Arthur Fiedler, of course, on the podium—climaxed the hall's past week of centenary festivities.

Whether the Pops had its original inspiration in the Albert Hall "Proms" seemingly was not the reason that an audience of 5,000-plus filled the hall, which for the first time in its history had 45 tables offering refreshments on the lower arena level.

★ Please turn to Page 3

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
APR 6 1971
New England Newsclip

It was perhaps a very live curiosity to see how a body of celebrated musicians, already well in an hour, would adapt themselves to a program that included the Peer Gynt Suite from Grieg's "Gaite Parisienne," 10 numbers from the Gail MacDermot score of "Hair," and a march version of W. C. Handy's "St. Louis Blues." And as is traditional, some delectable "Pops extras."

Elegant 'pomp'

Mr. Fiedler's experienced programming hand began with the first of Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" marches, played very elegantly. Then the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture, played very classically. Then the Offenbach, with its patter pieces, its waltzes, and its cancans. All of a sudden the ice was broken.

But lest one think all seriousness had been cast aside, there came the first (B-flat minor) Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto, with the dazzling young American, Malcolm Frager, deputizing as soloist (at only a few days' notice) for the scheduled Earl Wild. Using a version of the concerto that he had researched himself, including a few variations from the norm, Mr. Frager involved himself and his audience in the work without recourse to the obvious opportunities for show and excess the concerto offers.

The feathery andante, and the majestic finale, to their different degrees, floated to the hall's new acoustical clouds, and a thunderous reception roared back for pianist, conductor, and orchestra.

'Egmont' and 'Hair' greeted

The great bowllike interior of the Albert Hall lends itself to audience-watching: the intent young couple who responded to each selection and each soloist with the fresh enthusiasm that is every performer's dream; the graying woman who glowing smile of recognition greeted "Egmont" and "Hair" with equal pleasure; the youngster, no bigger than this, who listened and gazed all evening, chin in hand, enraptured.

In addition to lightening the atmosphere, the "Hair" selections and the sinuous "St. Louis Blues" march revealed the tremendous strength and finesse of the orchestra's percussion, brass, winds, and strings, individually and as a choir. As they embellished each successive number, they seemed to telegraph to listeners, who began by being rather decorously reserved, that it was all right to relax and enjoy this music in the straightforward, noncondescending manner in which it was being conveyed. And enjoy it they did.

'Stars and Stripes,' too

After the formal program, the cheering, stamping crowd couldn't have enough. (Rhythmic clapping had begun during the "St. Louis Blues.") Mr. Fiedler added the Farandole from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," taken at breakneck speed; the Beatles' "Yesterday," a marvelously sinister "Mack the Knife"; and at last "The Stars and Stripes Forever."

It is doubtful if in its 100-year history the Albert Hall has had happier or more vociferous audience response. Mr. Fiedler was recalled repeatedly, the orchestra beamed its appreciation, and the public from the floor to the glass dome returned it with their palms and their smiles.

This is the first dispatch from Louis Snyder, who is accompanying the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its first European tour in 15 years.

Critics unfizzy

By the Associated Press

London

The first performance outside the United States of the Boston Pops orchestra was greeted with little enthusiasm by prominent British critics today.

Alan Blyth of the Times found "not as much fizz in the performances as one would have expected. . . . There was efficiency, even brillance, but no real love in the interpretations."

Edward Greenfield of the Guardian felt Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance No. 1" sounded ill at ease and Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture was "like a trumpet concerto and a fairly perfunctory one at that with the hall playing an acoustic trick on the brass. . . . Then came the justification for the whole concert, and it was sad we had not had it at the start, an outrageous march version of W. C. Handy's classic 'St. Louis Blues,'" Mr. Greenfield said.

"At last the sparkle we know on records from Mr. Fiedler and his band, their tongue-in-cheek humor, was plain for all to hear."

HERALD TRIBUNE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,000
APR 8 1971 New

Fiedler, Boston Pops in London

By HARRY NEVILLE

LONDON — The Boston Pops added [illegible] to the complication [illegible] of the [illegible] when Arthur Fiedler put on a Symphony Hall, Pops-style concert in Royal Albert Hall. It was the first time the orchestra has played anywhere outside Massachusetts, and it was also the opening of the Boston Pops-Boston Symphony European tour.

JUDGED BY ANY reasonable standards, the event was a huge popular success.

Fiedler was in his most exuberant form, positively radiating Fiedlerian charm despite layers of BBC television makeup. The orchestra played splendidly — better, actually, than we generally hear at home — and the Britishers were enthralled, or so it would seem from the cheers and [illegible] of the 5,000 people who [illegible] the hall.

Some attempts had been made to recreate a Pops-type atmosphere. The regular seats on the main floor had been removed and in their place were the familiar (to Bostonians) tables, complete with beverage lists and (thanks to the Friends who are touring with the orchestra) quite a few Boston faces. And yet in important respects the ambience was quite different from what one experiences on a Pops night at Symphony Hall.

FOR ONE THING the British are inclined to take their music quite seriously — even "Gaite Parisienne," "Pomp and Circumstance," and the omnipresent Tchaikovsky First Piano Concerto, which together with Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture made up the "serious" part of the program.

DURING the performance of these works there was none of the clinking of glasses, none of the conversational buzz that goes on at Symphony Hall. Instead the audience displayed a rapt attentiveness that would have been impressive even by the standards of the most solemn occasions in Boston.

Things changed of course when it came to a medly of tunes from "Hair" and to Handy's "St. Louis Blues March." Here the audience got decidedly "with it," and almost everyone — including several distinguished-looking, walrus-mustached types — could be seen clapping and swaying with the music.

ENCORES were of course demanded and Fiedler obliged with five, concluding with a rousing performance of "Stars and Stripes Forever," which brought down the house, to phrase it as un-Britishly as possible.

Earl Wild was to have played the Tchaikovsky Concerto, but owing to his indisposition he was replaced by Malcolm Frager, who gave what seemed to this listener an unusually poetic account of the work. In part he used the original version of the concerto, a fact which led one usually well informed British critic to state that he had "blatantly altered the layout of the famous opening chords." The same critic went on to say, however, that Frager found "wit and poetry" in the gentler sections.

PRESS REPORTS were available in only two papers the morning following the concert, and these were not altogether favorable. Alan Blyth of "The Times" found that "there was not as much fizz in the performances as one might have expected, at least until the selection from 'Hair' and the inevitable encores were reached.

"Then at last the players seemed to let their hair down and convey some enjoyment in a score that stands up remarkably well to the full-orchestra treatment. Here, too, Arthur Fiedler, ever young in spirit and gesture, caught the mood of a new generation's music." Elsewhere Blyth spoke of "dutiful, even anonymous" playing.

IN A DIFFERENCE of opinion worthy of Boston critics, Edward Greenfield of "The Guardian" found the "Hair" selections "strangely solemn, the orchestration too heavy."

The justification of the whole concert for him was "an outrageous march version" of the "St. Louis Blues," where, "at last the sparkle we know on record from Fiedler and his band, their tongue-in-cheek humour, was plain for all to hear."

Balancing the sheets and giving a more accurate impression of popular reaction, perhaps, was the remark of an attendant at Royal Albert Hall: "That was splendid. Your players seemed really to get into the spirit of the music. I don't think our boys are quite up to that. We British are a bit too inhibited, you know."

The POPS in London

HERALD TRIBUNE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,000
APR 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Symphony Makes Debut in London

By HARRY NEVILLE

LONDON—William Steinberg conducted the Boston Symphony in the Royal Festival Hall, London's attractive new concert hall located alongside the Thames, more or less opposite Parliament. It was the orchestra's first concert of the European tour (the Pops had made its debut the previous night in Royal Albert Hall) and it was therefore an event of extreme importance to both conductor and players.

Touring orchestras are usually given to a kind of programming that puts them in the best possible light, but Steinberg conceded nothing either to his players' comfort or to popular taste in this instance.

THE PROGRAM consisted of two symphonies: Mozart's 36th, or "Linz"—an attractive but by no means easy piece—and Mahler's Seventh, a monumental work that is one of that composer's least popular and most difficult symphonies.

The orchestra had to contend with two things: unfamiliar and (in this case) very bright acoustics, and the absence of any identifiable beat in Steinberg's conducting. One can only hope that these matters will not prove to be the same problem elsewhere on the tour that they were on this occasion.

ALMOST SHOCKING was the review of the "Daily Mail" critic, Michael Reynolds, who wrote a curt notice that complained of a bad blend of tone, out-of-tune playing and a "crass sloppy approach from conductor William Steinberg."

Edward Greenfield of "The Guardian" allowed that the Mozart was "well-behaved" and that the "ears were made to tingle" in the finale of the Mahler. But elsewhere he expressed disappointment, admitting, however, that the hall's acoustics were partly to blame.

THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH" critic singled out a "brilliant and inexhaustible pair of trumpets" and a "leader capable of truly amoroso solos" as being among the orchestras most enviable possessions, while Stanley Sadie of "The Times" found the event "somehow a dispiriting one" in which Steinberg's interpretations had "little evident character."

It should be emphasized that most of the above reviews were written in a spirit of civility and fairness which acknowledged the extreme difficulties of the program and of the performing circumstances. As indicated, the audience's reaction was something else entirely.

THERE WAS a great deal of brilliant playing with individual sections of the orchestra really outdoing themselves.

But this listener's overall impression was that the sheer mechanical difficulty of coordinating the music—particularly the sprawling Mahler Symphony—prevented the players' ever "getting into" it.

Reaction to the concert pretty much followed the pattern of the previous night's pop concert: cheers and a standing ovation from the audience, a rather glum critical report in the following day's newspapers.

12

Boston Pops from London

A Pops Success in Olde Albert Hall

By Jon Lehman

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops brought their own brand of American culture to London's Royal Albert Hall and were rewarded with demands for more from a cheering, standing audience of about 4,000 normally reserved British concertgoers.

In the concert Sunday evening which formally opened the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first European tour in 15 years, Mr. Fiedler and the Pops (which draws its membership from the parent orchestra) gave a performance which was two-thirds impeccable musicianship and the final third the infectiously enthusiastic spirit for which they are famous.

Keeping His Word

For the first two sections of the concert, which were televised by the BBC, the program seemed designed to reflect the wishes of the Boston Symphony's musical director, William Steinberg, who declared in his farewell speech at Logan Airport in Boston last Friday that the tour would prove to the old world that Americans "are not naked savages, jumping from bushes."

The program opened with a tip of the hat to Britain with Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" March No. 1, followed by a restrained, sensitive and letter-perfect performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture. A bit more of the old spirit crept in with the suite from Offenbach's "Gaite parisienne" with its Pops favorite, "Can-can," which closed the concert's first section to warm but not uncontrolled applause.

The middle segment was devoted to the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1, with pianist Malcolm Frager substituting for the scheduled soloist, Earl Wild, who canceled because of illness.

Wins Acceptance

Mr. Frager's occasionally unorthodox treatment of the familiar concerto — (incorporating elements from a previously unknown first edition of the work which he unearthed several years ago) — and his muscular style, which burst into full force in the final movement, were accepted very favorably by the London audience, which called him back for several bows.

But it was only after the BBC cameras were switched off and Mr. Fiedler got down to the orchestra's medley from "Hair" that the enormous Victorian edifice began to feel like Symphony Hall during Pops season. And following another Fiedler favorite, the venerable "St. Louis Blues," they began holding up the signs for the Pops "extras," only they were all at the end this time.

After four extras, including the Beatles' "Yesterday," "Mack the Knife" and a rendition of "The Stars and Stripes Forever" to which the entire house — three balconies and skylight gallery filled with standees — clapped in rhythm, Mr. Fiedler would do no more. After taking four bows and asking the musicians to rise twice, he led his orchestra off stage while the audience stood, cheered and stamped their feet.

It was the Boston Pops' first concert abroad, although many of the audience were obviously familiar with the orchestra's recordings, and appropriately it helped celebrate the 100th season of Royal Albert Hall, the home of the Prom concerts on which the Pops was modeled.

Homey Touch

For the concert, tables and chairs a la Pops were set up on the circular floor of the hall, and London usherettes did their best to impersonate the South Boston serving ladies who have become an institution at Symphony Hall.

Albert Hall, which was dedicated on March 29, 1871, by Queen Victoria to commemorate her beloved consort, is a huge round building with a vast glass dome, decorated inside and out in the highest Victorian style. Its acoustics, which give a big, warm yet bright sound (improved by the plastic saucers which were hung from the soaring ceiling a few years ago to break up a persistent echo) were particularly suited to the Pops sound, as is the gracious Victorian sentiment, for which the hall has become a symbol, to the spirit of the Pops.

The unrestrained enthusiasm with which the audience closed the concert was regarded as a particularly bright success for the Pops. London concertgoers along with those of Paris and Vienna, are regarded by musicians as undemonstrative.

After concerts Monday by the Boston Symphony itself and Tuesday by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, the orchestra was scheduled to fly to Stuttgart, Germany, to begin the second leg of the 23-day, six-nation tour.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
APR 8 1971 New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,[illegible]
APR 6 1971 New England Newsclip

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
(E) 11,496
APR 7 1971 New England Newsclip

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 7 1971 New England Newsclip

Panned in London

Boston residents, even those who can't tell tin pans from timpani, were pretty upset to learn that British music critics panned the performance in London of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This organization, local people have always believed, is to culture what the Pope is to religion. Just there, above and beyond.

Now the show goes on the road, and a foreigner with a typewriter has the nerve to speak of "unpleasant noise" in connection with its performance. This, in a country which gave birth to the Beatles.

Home towners, which we are, may suspect that these critics are envious of upstart genius across the sea. Or they're trying to get even for the Tea Party and Bunker Hill. Or they've never been taught that it's unpardonable to pan the unpannable.

Proper Bostonians will of course shrug off vulgar remarks by critics unworthy to buy lunch for a Symphony fiddler. Why, when they go out of town to play, even the incomparable Bruins sometimes get booed.

FAMILIAR SCENE but different locale finds Arthur Fiedler and Boston Pops Orchestra acknowledging enthusiastic applause—at conclusion of first concert in Royal Albert Hall in London, the beginning of the orchestra's 3-week European tour. (UPI)

785

Pops in Albert Hall

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops perform (background) in Royal Albert Hall, London, before a sold-out house. This is the first concert of the Pops and Boston Symphony 23-day European Tour that covers six countries. The Pops concert was televised throughout the British Isles. (UPI)

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181
APR 7 1971

Another Triumph

It will come as no surprise to its followers to learn the Boston Pops orchestra has taken London, specifically Royal Albert Hall by storm.

Touring with the Boston Symphony, on its first European tour in 15 years, the Pops brought to London its marvelous mixture of musical styles under always delightful Arthur Fiedler.

Those of us who have been transported to Paris so many times by the Pops' rendition of Offenbach's Gaie Parisienne, who have enjoyed the mixture of Bizet, the Beatles and The Stars and Stripes are not at all surprised London fans of all ages cheered the Pops to the very glass dome of the Royal Albert. How could it be otherwise?

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 24 1971 New England Newsclip

A national waste?

Michael Steinberg writes that the adverse remarks of the British critics about the Boston Pops Orchestra "raise the question of whether it makes sense to evaluate, as they do, as a musical event something that we in Boston are more inclined to think of as a sort of party."

Recently a grant of $2 million was given to the local educational TV station WGBH by the Corporation of Public Broadcasting (which is funded by the Federal government and the Ford Foundation) with the stipulation that more than one-third of it (or over $700,000) be used to make a series of films of these "parties." Is this not a matter of national scandal?

BENJAMIN ZANDER
Teacher, New England Conservatory of Music

Boston

12

By ... from London

A Pops Success in Olde Albert Hall

By Jon Lehman

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops brought their [illegible] to London to Royal Albert Hall, and were rewarded with demands for more from a standing, stamping audience of about 4,000 normally reserved British concertgoers.

In the concert Sunday evening which formally opened the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first European tour in 15 years, Mr. Fiedler and the Pops (which draws its musicians from the parent orchestra) gave a performance which was two-thirds impeccable musicianship and the final third the infectiously enthusiastic spirit for which they are famous.

Keeping His Word

For the first two sections of the concert, which were televised by the BBC, the program seemed designed to reflect the views of the Boston Symphony's musical director, William Steinberg, who declared in his farewell speech at Logan Airport in Boston last Friday that the tour would prove to the old world that Americans have not lower standards, jumping from Bach."

The program opened with a tip of the hat to Britain with Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" March No. 1, followed by a restrained, sensitive and letter-perfect performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture. A bit more of the old spirit crept in with the suite from Offenbach's "Gaite parisienne" with its Pops favorite, "Can-can," which closed the concert's first section to warm but not uncontrolled applause.

The middle segment was devoted to the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1, with pianist Malcolm Frager substituting for the scheduled soloist, Earl Wild, who canceled because of illness.

Wins Acceptance

Mr. Frager's occasionally unorthodox treatment of the familiar concerto — (incorporating elements from a previously unknown first edition of the work which he unearthed several years ago) — and his muscular style, which burst into full force in the final movement, were accepted very favorably by the London audience, which called him back for several bows.

But it was only after the BBC cameras were switched off and Mr. Fiedler got down to the orchestra's medley from "Hair" that the enormous Victorian edifice began to feel like Symphony Hall during [illegible] Arthur Fiedler playing another Fiedler favorite, the venerable "St. Louis Blues," they began holding up the signs for the Pops "extras," only they were all at the end this time.

After four extras, including the Beatles' "Yesterday," "Mack the Knife" and a rendition of "The Stars and Stripes Forever" to which the entire house — three balconies and skylight gallery filled with standees — clapped in rhythm, Mr. Fiedler would do no more. After taking four bows and asking the musicians to rise twice, he led his orchestra off stage while the audience stood, cheered and stamped their feet.

It was the Boston Pops' first concert abroad, although many of the audience were obviously familiar with the orchestra's recordings, and appropriately it helped celebrate the 100th season of Royal Albert Hall, the home of the Prom concerts on which the Pops was modeled.

Homey Touch

For the concert, tables and chairs a la Pops were set up on the circular floor of the hall, and London usherettes did their best to impersonate the South Boston serving ladies who have become an institution at Symphony Hall.

Albert Hall, which was dedicated on March 29, 1871, by Queen Victoria to commemorate her beloved consort, is a huge round building with a vast glass dome, decorated inside and out in the highest Victorian style. Its acoustics, which give a big, warm yet bright sound (improved by the plastic saucers which were hung from the soaring ceiling a few years ago to break up a persistent echo) were particularly suited to the Pops sound, as is the gracious Victorian sentiment, for which the hall has become a symbol, to the spirit of the Pops.

The unrestrained enthusiasm with which the audience closed the concert was regarded as a particularly bright success for the Pops. London concertgoers along with those of Paris and Vienna, are regarded by musicians as undemonstrative.

After concerts Monday by the Boston Symphony itself and Tuesday by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, the orchestra was scheduled to fly to Stuttgart, Germany, to begin the second leg of the 23-day, six-nation tour.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,337

APR 8 . 1971 New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 292,[illegible]

APR 6 1971 New England Newsclip

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
(E) 11,496

APR 7 1971 New England Newsclip

785

Pops in Albert Hall

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops perform (background) in Royal Albert Hall, London, before a sold-out house. This is the first concert of the Pops and Boston Symphony 23-day European Tour that covers six countries. The Pops concert was televised throughout the British Isles. (UPI)

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 7 1971 New England Newsclip

Panned in London

Boston residents, even those who can't tell tin pans from timpani, were pretty upset to learn that British music critics panned the performance in London of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This organization, local people have always believed, is to culture what the Pope is to religion. Just there, above and beyond.

Now the show goes on the road, and a foreigner with a typewriter has the nerve to speak of "unpleasant noise" in connection with its performance. This, in a country which gave birth to the Beatles.

Home towners, which we are, may suspect that these critics are envious of upstart genius across the sea. Or they're trying to get even for the Tea Party and Bunker Hill. Or they've never been taught that it's unpardonable to pan the unpannable.

Proper Bostonians will of course shrug off vulgar remarks by critics unworthy to buy lunch for a Symphony fiddler. Why, when they go out of town to play, even the incomparable Bruins sometimes get booed.

FAMILIAR SCENE but different locale finds Arthur Fiedler and Boston Pops Orchestra acknowledging enthusiastic applause—at conclusion of first concert in Royal Albert Hall in London, the beginning of the orchestra's 3-week European tour. (UPI)

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181

APR 7 1971

Another Triumph

It will come as no surprise to its followers to learn the Boston Pops orchestra has taken London, specifically Royal Albert Hall by storm.

Touring with the Boston Symphony, on its first European tour in 15 years, the Pops brought to London its marvelous mixture of musical styles under always delightful Arthur Fiedler.

Those of us who have been transported to Paris so many times by the Pops' rendition of Offenbach's Gaie Parisienne, who have enjoyed the mixture of Bizet, the Beatles and The Stars and Stripes are not at all surprised London fans of all ages cheered the Pops to the very glass dome of the Royal Albert. How could it be otherwise?

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 24 1971 New England Newsclip

A national waste?

Michael Steinberg writes that the adverse remarks of the British critics about the Boston Pops Orchestra "raise the question of whether it makes sense to evaluate, as they do, as a musical event something that we in Boston are more inclined to think of as a sort of party."

Recently a grant of $2 million was given to the local educational TV station WGBH by the Corporation of Public Broadcasting (which is funded by the Federal government and the Ford Foundation) with the stipulation that more than one-third of it (or over $700,000) be used to make a series of films of these "parties." Is this not a matter of national scandal?

BENJAMIN ZANDER
Teacher, New England Conservatory of Music

Boston

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Flop Goes the Pops in London Debut

Critics Find More Fizz at Tables Than in Bostonians' Tour

TELEGRAPH
NASHUA, N. H.
(E) 19,203
APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

1st concert outside US

Boston Pops opens tour in London

Associated Press

performance," said Blyth, the Soloist Faulted

Malcolm Frager, the soloist in

"At last the sparkle we know on record from Fiedler and his band, their tongue-in-cheek humor, was plain for all to hear."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,[illegible]
7 1971 New England Newsclip

CHRONICLE
NORTH ATTLEBORO, MASS.
(E) 4,780
APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Fiedler and Boston Pops Fail to Impress Britians

Arthur Fiedler Conducts

Pops Performs in London

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654
APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

EAGLE-TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS
(M&E) 45,050
APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

CALL
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
(E) 30,774
APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Pops in London Draws Haughty Sniffs

Pops Fails To Stir Critics In London

"Hair" and, as a cli

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 6 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Pops' Performanc Given Little Enthusiasm

NEWS
NEWPORT, R. I.
(E) 14,827
APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

of The s Pomp

Boston Pops' First Tour Fails To Impress Britons

For the first night of its tour the orchestra presented Elgar, Beethoven, Offenbach, Tchai-

Boston Pops doesn't impress British critics

Associated Press

LONDON—The first performance outside the United States of the Boston Pops orchestra was greeted with little enthusiasm by prominent British critics yeaterday.

Champagne flowed at tables in the arena of the Royal Albert Hall while Arthur Fiedler conducted, but Alan Blyth of the "Times" found "not as much fizz in the performances as one would have expected."

"The Bostonians played here as if this was — as it indeed is—just one stop on an extensive tour with each place receiving the stock performance," he wrote.

"There was efficiency, even brilliance, but no real love in the interpretations."

For the first night of its tour the orchestra presented Elgar, Beethoven Offenback, Tchaikovsky, a selection from "Hair" and, as a climax the "St. Louis Blues."

Malcolm Frager, the soloist in Tchaikovsky's 1st Piano Concerto, turned in Blyth, old-fashioned bravura performance," said Blytblyth, with "hardly a note out of place, hardly one played with real imaginative insight."

Edward Greenfield of The Guardian felt Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance No. 1 sounded ill at ease and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was "like a trumpet concerto and a fairly perfunctory one at that with the hall playing an acoustic trick on the brass."

APPLAUSE FOR POPS—Conductor Arthur Fiedler (center profile) and members of Boston Pops Orchestra stand as audience applauds after Fiedler led them in composition at London's Royal Albert Hall Sunday. (AP)

Boston Pops Boring For London's Critics

FOSTER'S DEMOCRAT
DOVER, N. H.
(E) 15,450
APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

RECORDER-GAZETTE
GREENFIELD, MASS.
(E) 13,822
APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800
APR 5 1971 New England Newsclip

News Brief

LONDON (AP) — The first performance outside the United States of the Boston Pops orchestra was greeted with little enthusiasm by prominent British critics today.

London Cool To Boston Pops

LONDON (AP) — The first performance outside the United States of the Boston Pops orchestra was greeted with little enthusiasm by prominent British critics today.

London Critics Rap Boston Pops Performance

LONDON (AP) — The first performance outside the United States of the Boston Pops orchestra was greeted with little enthusiasm by prominent British critics today.

Boston Pops flops

LONDON (AP) — The first performance outside the United States of the Boston Pops Orchestra was greeted with little enthusiasm by prominent British critics today.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERIKANISCHE SCHWEIZER ZEITUNG
W. 2,000
APR 14 1971

Critics Unfizzy

London. — The first performance outside the United States of the Boston Pops orchestra was greeted with little enthusiasm by prominent British critics last week.

Alan Blyth of the Times found "not as much fizz in the performances as one would have expected... There was efficiency, even brillance, but no real love in the interpretations."

Edward Greenfield of the Guardian felt Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance No. 1" sounded ill at ease and Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture was "like a trumpet concerto and a fairly perfunctory one at that with the hall playing an acoustic trick on the brass... Then came the justification for the whole concert, and it was sad we had not had it at the start, an outrageous march version of W. C. Handy's classic 'St. Louis Blues,'" Mr. Greenfield said.

"At last the sparkle we know on records from Mr. Friedler and his band, their tongue-in-check humor, was plain for all to hear."

london
pops story by associated press

14

The BSO abroad

London audience applauds Mozart, Mahler

By Louis Snyder

London

After an evening of semi-frivolity in the guise of Boston Pops at the Royal Albert Hall [reported in yesterday's news pages], the Boston Symphony began its three-week European tour in earnest on Monday at Royal Festival Hall under William Steinberg's musical direction. There were two items on the program — the Symphony No. 36 in C ("Linz") of Mozart, and Mahler's gigantic Seventh Symphony in E minor.

This handsome, acoustically lively auditorium was filled to its 3,000 capacity with Londoners, BSO "friends" from America, and a collection of otherwise intent concertgoers of all ages who exemplified the enviable local practice of rapt concentration on the performance at hand, a trait which deserves to be a duty-free exportable commodity. No one arrived late or left early or seemed to take the players for granted, nor did it appear to their first European audience after 15 years that they should be so taken.

While the Mozart went well, it was the Mahler that swept the listeners off their feet. London is in a Mahler mood. Local performances of several of his symphonies have been played within the past few weeks, and he and his music are being superimposed on Luchino Visconti's screen version of Thomas Mann's "Death in Venice," currently doing big business here. But the seventh, which isn't one of the recently popular ones, or sometimes even tolerable outside the Mahler cult, made a tremendous impact through Mr. Steinberg's strongly motivated reading, and an almost unparalleled display of virtuosity by the musicians.

Since the geographical contours and the sight lines of Royal Festival Hall permit an excellent view of what is happening on stage, it was possible to see when and how everyone contributed to this rousing occasion. For despite the work's length, enthusiasm was cumulative, and the reaction to two night music movements, with a sinister scherzo between, waited until after the all-out rondo-finale to erupt in full measure. Cheers, countless recalls for Mr. Steinberg, and all the signs of an auspicious welcome from audiences across the sea were in evidence.

At a reception for the orchestra, given at the hall afterwards by U.S. Ambassador Walter Annenberg, the instrumentalists individually gave voice to their own satisfaction at the performance with a candor that music critics might envy. "We were tremendous," said one of them, and no one within earshot then or earlier could have agreed more.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
APR 7 1971
New England Newsclip

Sour notes from critics

By the Associated Press

London

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its first appearance in London in 15 years, was slammed by several critics.

"I have rarely heard a more unpleasant noise from a so-called international orchestra," wrote Michael Reynolds in the Daily Mail of the Monday night performance. He added: "Two symphonies comprised the program—Mozart's 'Linz' and Mahler's Seventh. Both suffered from a bad blend of tone, a string section which would be the shame of London, and a crass, sloppy approach from conductor William Steinberg. It was with reluctance I stayed to the end."

Edward Greenfield of the Guardian asked, "Was it the effect of the flight over? Was it that I was expecting too much after the records? Was it that William Steinberg had comparatively little to say . . . ? I wondered. But whatever it was we had to wait until the finale of the Mahler before ears were really made to tingle. Then it was more because of a direct, disciplined assault rather than because of the subtle tonal nuances which this of all American orchestras can produce."

In the Daily Telegraph, Peter Stadlen felt the "renowned band did not come into its own until toward the end of the evening. An utter aversion to showmanship is among Mr. Steinberg's most endearing qualities. But on this occasion it did result in a distinctly stodgy performance of Mozart's 'Linz' Symphony."

Stanley Sadie of the Times felt the concert was dispiriting. "Not because of any lack of efficiency, or individual musicianship of the orchestra, nor any want of responsiveness. But there was not much that was positive to respond to. Often it seemed that the performances were merely the acting out of a well-rehearsed ritual, one that had staled and lost much of its vitality and meaning."

london, a mixed reception for the b.s.o.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 10 1971
New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY TOURING ABROAD—2 . . . by Michael Steinberg

Critics pan, others hail Mahler opus

The Boston Symphony, but more specifically its music director, William Steinberg, drew a quadruple pan in London newspapers for its Monday evening concert in the Royal Festival Hall. In three cases of four, the authors were the papers' second-string critics, the chiefs finding a Covent Garden opera revival of Verdi's "A Masked Ball" more tempting.

All reviewers praised Steinberg's enterprise in programming Mahler's 7th Symphony. London has a terrific Mahler boom just now, still more than New York, but even here the 7th is a rarity. They were inclined as well to praise individual members or sections of the orchestra, but to say also that in the Festival Hall — acoustically nasty, and dry and aggressive in a way that makes it something like the opposite of Symphony Hall — the sound was unblended and unbalanced. The prevalence of trumpet tone and of the electronically amplified mandolin in the Mahler was especially deplored.

It was Steinberg, however, who came in for the chief drubbing. He was blamed for much of the orchestral imbalance and imprecision, and his interpretations — "is that the word?" asked Stanley Sadie in The Times — were called "marmoreally lifeless" both in The Times and in The Financial Times, "solemnly earthbound," "unconvincing," "distinctly stodgy," and generally wanting in character.

The audience that nearly filled the hall, one which included young conductors like Daniel Barenboim and Lawrence Foster as well as quite a number of orchestral musicians came to see how the opposition was doing, brought Steinberg back for five bows and cheered the orchestra at the end of Mahler's 85-minute work.

Members of the orchestra were quick to volunteer comments about the famously awful Festival Hall acoustics. Players have difficulty hearing each other on stage, while out front the sound is harsh and unblended in a way that exaggerates even the slightest imperfections. No questions, though, that in terms of public response, the concert, which had begun with Mozart's "Linz" Symphony was a huge success — "even more than for the Philadelphia Orchestra," a couple of people here suggested cautiously.

Afterwards, there was a reception in Festival Hall — oh, that incredible Scottish smoked salmon! — whose official though absent host was US Ambassador Walter H. Annenberg. The actual and present host was Annenberg's assistant, Robert Scott, who, as a matter of fact, is a trustee of the Philadelphia Orchestra, "the other great orchestra," as the BSO players refer to it.

The two reviews so far of Sunday night's Boston Pops concert in the Albert Hall are unenthusiastic. Alan Blyth in The Times wrote "there was not as much fizz in the performances as one might have expected, at least until the selections from 'Hair' and the inevitable encores were reached . . . there was efficiency, even brilliance, but no real love in the interpretations." In The Guardian, Edward Greenfield did not even like "Hair" ("strangely solemn, the orchestration too heavy, the jazz rhythms played with the literalness one expects of the Black Dyke Mills band"), and found "the sparkle we know on record from Fiedler and his band" only in the concluding march version of the "St. Louis Blues."

Blyth's and Greenfield's fairly detailed criticisms are not really off the mark; they do, however, raise the question of whether it makes sense to evaluate, as they do, as a musical event something that we in Boston are more inclined to think of as a sort of party.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players have another concert in England, and the orchestra moves on to engagements in Stuttgart, Wuppertal, and Berlin on Easter weekend. The group of 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony stay a little longer in London and rejoin the orchestra's tour in Berlin at the end of the week.

Michael Steinberg, music critic of The Globe, is accompanying the BSO on its tour.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77.
APR 6 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Hit By London Music Critics

LONDON (AP) — T
Boston Symphony Orchest making its first appearar in London in 15 years, v slammed by leading crit
today.

The Evening Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 654,741
APR 7 1971

London Music Critics Pan Boston Symphony

LONDON — (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its first appearance in London in 15 years, was slammed by leading critics Tuesday.

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(M) 32,350
APR 6 1971
New England Newsclip

LONDON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its first appearance in London in 15 years, was slammed by a leading critic today.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 917,082 SUN. 1,219,382
APR 10 1971

London Lowers Boom on Boston Symphony

LONDON (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its first appearance in London in 15 years, was slammed by leading critics.

from a bad blend of tone, a string section which would be the shame of London and a crass, sloppy approach from conductor William Steinberg."

TIME
GREENWICH, CONN.
(C) 11,791
APR 6 1971
New England Newsclip

London Critics Pan Bostonians

he Boston making
London
amed by 14

The BSO abroad

London audience applauds Mozart, Mahler

By Louis Snyder

London

After an evening of semi-frivolity in the guise of Boston Pops at the Royal Albert Hall [reported in yesterday's news pages], the Boston Symphony began its three-week European tour in earnest on Monday at Royal Festival Hall under William Steinberg's musical direction. There were two items on the program — the Symphony No. 36 in C ("Linz") of Mozart, and Mahler's gigantic Seventh Symphony in E minor.

This handsome, acoustically lively auditorium was filled to its 3,000 capacity with Londoners, BSO "friends" from America, and a collection of otherwise intent concert-goers of all ages who exemplified the enviable local practice of rapt concentration on the performance at hand, a trait which deserves to be a duty-free exportable commodity. No one arrived late or left early or seemed to take the players for granted, nor did it appear to their first European audience after 15 years that they should be so taken.

While the Mozart went well, it was the Mahler that swept the listeners off their feet. London is in a Mahler mood. Local performances of several of his symphonies have been played within the past few weeks, and he and his music are being superimposed on Luchino Visconti's screen version of Thomas Mann's "Death in Venice," currently doing big business here. But the seventh, which isn't one of the recently popular ones, or sometimes even tolerable outside the Mahler cult, made a tremendous impact through Mr. Steinberg's strongly motivated reading, and an almost unparalleled display of virtuosity by the musicians.

Since the geographical contours and the sight lines of Royal Festival Hall permit an excellent view of what is happening on stage, it was possible to see when and how everyone contributed to this rousing occasion. For despite the work's length, enthusiasm was cumulative, and the reaction to two night music movements, with a sinister scherzo between, waited until after the all-out rondo-finale to erupt in full measure. Cheers, countless recalls for Mr. Steinberg, and all the signs of an auspicious welcome from audiences across the sea were in evidence.

At a reception for the orchestra, given at the hall afterwards by U.S. Ambassador Walter Annenberg, the instrumentalists individually gave voice to their own satisfaction at the performance with a candor that music critics might envy. "We were tremendous," said one of them, and no one within earshot then or earlier could have agreed more.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 7 1971

New England Newsclip

Sour notes from critics

By the Associated Press

London

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its first appearance in London in 15 years, was slammed by several critics.

"I have rarely heard a more unpleasant noise from a so-called international orchestra," wrote Michael Reynolds in the Daily Mail of the Monday night performance. He added: "Two symphonies comprised the program—Mozart's 'Linz' and Mahler's Seventh. Both suffered from a bad blend of tone, a string section which would be the shame of London, and a crass, sloppy approach from conductor William Steinberg. It was with reluctance I stayed to the end."

Edward Greenfield of the Guardian asked, "Was it the effect of the flight over? Was it that I was expecting too much after the records? Was it that William Steinberg had comparatively little to say . . . ? I wondered. But whatever it was we had to wait until the finale of the Mahler before ears were really made to tingle. Then it was more because of a direct, disciplined assault rather than because of the subtle tonal nuances which this of all American orchestras can produce."

In the Daily Telegraph, Peter Stadlen felt the "renowned band did not come into its own until toward the end of the evening. An utter aversion to showmanship is among Mr. Steinberg's most endearing qualities. But on this occasion it did result in a distinctly stodgy performance of Mozart's 'Linz' Symphony."

Stanley Sadie of the Times felt the concert was disparting. "Not because of any lack of efficiency, or individual musicianship of the orchestra, nor any want of responsiveness. But there was not much that was positive to respond to. Often it seemed that the performances were merely the acting out of a well-rehearsed ritual, one that had staled and lost much of its vitality and meaning."

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77

APR 6 1971

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Hit By London Music Critics

The Evening Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 654,741

APR 7 1971

LONDON (AP) — T
Boston Symphony Orchest making its first appearai
in London in 15 years, v slammed by leading crit
today.

London Music Critics Pan Boston Symphony

LONDON — (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its first appearance in London in 15 years, was slammed by leading critics Tuesday.

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(M) 32,350

APR 6 1971

New England Newsclip

LONDON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its first appearance in London in 15 years, was slammed by a leading critic today.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 917,082 SUN. 1,219,382

APR 10 1971

London Lowers Boom on Boston Symphony

LONDON (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its first appearance in London in 15 years, was slammed by leading critics.

from a bad blend of tone, a string section which would be the shame of London and a crass, sloppy approach from conductor William Steinberg."

TIME
GREENWICH, CONN
(C) 11,791

APR 6 1971

New England Newsclip

London Critics Pan Bostonians

he Boston making
London
amed by london, a mixed reception for the b.s.o.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 10 1971

New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY TOURING ABROAD—2 . . . by Michael Steinberg

Critics pan, others hail Mahler opus

The Boston Symphony, but more specifically its music director, William Steinberg, drew a quadruple pan in London newspapers for its Monday evening concert in the Royal Festival Hall. In three cases of four, the authors were the papers' second-string critics, the chiefs finding a Covent Garden opera revival of Verdi's "A Masked Ball" more tempting.

All reviewers praised Steinberg's enterprise in programming Mahler's 7th Symphony. London has a terrific Mahler boom just now, still more than New York, but even here the 7th is a rarity. They were inclined as well to praise individual members or sections of the orchestra, but to say also that in the Festival Hall — acoustically nasty, and dry and aggressive in a way that makes it something like the opposite of Symphony Hall — the sound was unblended and unbalanced. The prevalence of trumpet tone and of the electronically amplified mandolin in the Mahler was especially deplored.

It was Steinberg, however, who came in for the chief drubbing. He was blamed for much of the orchestral imbalance and imprecision, and his interpretations — "is that the word?" asked Stanley Sadie in The Times — were called "marmoreally lifeless" both in The Times and in The Financial Times, "solemnly earthbound," "unconvincing," "distinctly stodgy," and generally wanting in character.

The audience that nearly filled the hall, one which included young conductors like Daniel Barenboim and Lawrence Foster as well as quite a number of orchestral musicians came to see how the opposition was doing, brought Steinberg back for five bows and cheered the orchestra at the end of Mahler's 85-minute work.

Members of the orchestra were quick to volunteer comments about the famously awful Festival Hall acoustics. Players have difficulty hearing each other on stage, while out front the sound is harsh and unblended in a way that exaggerates even the slightest imperfections. No questions, though, that in terms of public response, the concert, which had begun with Mozart's "Linz" Symphony was a huge success — "even more than for the Philadelphia Orchestra," a couple of people here suggested cautiously.

Afterwards, there was a reception in Festival Hall — oh, that incredible Scottish smoked salmon! — whose official though absent host was US Ambassador Walter H. Annenberg. The actual and present host was Annenberg's assistant, Robert Scott, who, as a matter of fact, is a trustee of the Philadelphia Orchestra, "the other great orchestra," as the BSO players refer to it.

The two reviews so far of Sunday night's Boston Pops concert in the Albert Hall are unenthusiastic. Alan Blyth in The Times wrote "there was not as much fizz in the performances as one might have expected, at least until the selections from 'Hair' and the inevitable encores were reached . . . there was efficiency, even brilliance, but no real love in the interpretations." In The Guardian, Edward Greenfield did not even like "Hair" ("strangely solemn, the orchestration too heavy, the jazz rhythms played with the literalness one expects of the Black Dyke Mills band"), and found "the sparkle we know on record from Fiedler and his band" only in the concluding march version of the "St. Louis Blues."

Blyth's and Greenfield's fairly detailed criticisms are not really off the mark; they do, however, raise the question of whether it makes sense to evaluate, as they do, as a musical event something that we in Boston are more inclined to think of as a sort of party.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players have another concert in England, and the orchestra moves on to engagements in Stuttgart, Wuppertal, and Berlin on Easter weekend. The group of 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony stay a little longer in London and rejoin the orchestra's tour in Berlin at the end of the week.

Michael Steinberg, music critic of The Globe, is accompanying the BSO on its tour.

The Pittsburgh Press
D. 346,090 SUN. 744,732

APR 11 1971

WILLIAM STEINBERG
Rapped in London.

Rap At Steinberg London Replay

By CARL APONE, Press Music Editor

The music critics roasted William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra royally in London last week, according to wire service reports.

And for Steinberg their comments must have seemed like a replay of a recording he heard there eight years ago with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

Greeted Cooly

The London critics greeted Steinberg and the local orchestra ever so cooly in that 1963 concert. So cooly, that when Steinberg came back to Pittsburgh he barely answered when I greeted him at a press conference.

An assistant took me aside to say the harsh treatment by the British writers had made him a foe of all critics.

The recent reviews about the Boston and Steinberg seemed to be rather intelligent and penetrating. Steinberg's music can be rather "stodgy" at times and without "much that was positive to respond to." Although, overall, I prefer his work to any other living conductor.

But the recent fire from the British critics recalls the 1963 incident vividly to mind. For who should appear here in the 1964 season but John Pritchard, conductor of the London Philharmonic, and I asked him about London critics. His comments still ring in my ears.

London Critics

With the exception of The Times, he said, the London critics were just "hacks." And he added: "There is no accounting for some of the English critics.

"We are miserable about the matter but we live with it. We don't think the newspapers take all the care they should have in appointing some of these critics."

According to him, many of the new music critics were "young men not long out of college. They use an extremely personal approach to criticism and believe the only way to get notoriety is to pan something.

"The English critics seem to have dipped their pens in venom but they are mellowing. We hope to educate them in time."

The year 1971 has arrived and British critics seemed not to have mellowed. Pritchard, a hulking 6 ft. 2 in., 200-pounder had felt the jab of the critics and he did not hesitate to blast comments he did not like.

"When I read a bad notice I tell the critic he must be crazy or his ears were not open. It does no harm to tell them and it may do some good."

Natural Enemies

I like this kind of talk from conductors. In the musical, "Oklahoma!" the song has it that the farmer and the cowboy should be friends. The same does not hold true with critics and conductors.

They should remain natural enemies and no doubt Steinberg's animosity for them was rekindled in London.

The Boston and Steinberg tour will include 16 concerts in all in England, Germany, Austria, Italy and France.

Perhaps Maestro Steinberg will hear kinder words on the remainder of his tour.

* * *

Report from London

BSO Wins Over the Public, but not the Critics

By Jon Lehman

On the basis of its opening stand in London, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current European tour is shaping up as a popular success, although it has met a somewhat cool reception from the British critics.

The Orchestra's two concerts in London — one by the Boston Pops on Sunday and one by the Symphony itself on Monday — were both sell-out affairs in halls that hold more than 4,000 listeners, and both were given standing and prolonged applause and cheers at the end by audiences which had come expecting to be pleased.

Where's The Fizz?

But the critics, after paying their respects to the reputations of the Pops and the full orchestra respectively, said they had not heard what they anticipated.

Writing in The Guardian of London, Edward Greenfield called the full orchestra's single London concert "tantalizing," the more so, he said, because there was "little of the fizz one hears on Boston records."

For the Monday night concert in London's new Royal Festival Hall, music director William Steinberg chose a challenging program, the Mozart Symphony No. 36 in C (the "Linz"), one of the brightest and wittiest of the late Mozart symphonies, and the problematic and relatively unfamiliar Symphony No. 7 in b minor of Mahler.

Taking a Break

Mahler's Seventh Symphony, although it is entirely instrumental, without chorus or vocal soloists, is on the grand scale of his later works. In fact, due to the long performing time, the orchestra Monday night took a break between the first and second movements during which Mr. Steinberg left the podium although the audience was requested to remain seated.

The first and last movements are large and bold, with the first developing the strong themes in the brass characterisitic of Mahler, while the last movement pushes the minor-key intricacies of the middle three movements into exuberantly orchestrated resolutions in C major.

The reviewers, for the most part, acknowledged the excellence of instrumental playing on the various sections and reserved most of their criticisms for the conducting.

Stanley Sadie, writing in The Times of London, said, "The violins sounded full and suave, even when poised high among the leger-lines, and the cellos sang long, shapely lines in the first of the Night-Music movements. Among a strong woodwind section I particularly relished the playing of the clarinets, rounded in tone and agile . . . "

Little Conviction

However, said Sadie, Mr. Steinberg's interpretation "seemed to have little feeling of conviction, little sense of why the piece is as it is . . ." He said there were spells of "sustained physical excitement, but the ideas themselves were under-characterized and there was no continuity of impulse."

Some music writers traveling with the orchestra had predicted a hard time at the hands of the London critics, who are known as Mahler aficionados. But the edge was taken off the critical coolness by the audience response, the high morale and impeccable musicianship of the players themselves, and by chance for the orchestra to play and be heard in halls with very different acoustics and layouts from Symphony Hall.

Royal Festival Hall is a large modern concert hall on the south bank of the Thames, across the river and downstream from the buildings of Parliament. From the outside it suggests a concrete airport hangar with glass balconies and many ramps and levels.

Inside is a spacious and almost incrdinately civilized complex of cultural and service facilities. The pattern of open ramps and levels is carried into the interior design, and there is a large and excellent restaurant overlooking the river.

Surrounding the inner hall itself are the stacked-in outer balconies, with coatrooms on every level as well as champagne and coffee bars for intermission.

Acoustical Problems

The concert hall itself gives the impression of a large, open space, with seats raked up from an open, spread-out stage.

Members of the orchestra said the open stage gave them the same difficulties of hearing and blending with each other that are experienced in the new Philharmonic Hall in New York's Lincoln Center, but the effect for a listener was much more satisfactory than in the New York hall. Although there was great spaciousness and separation to the orchestral sound, there seemed to be no distortion.

The worst of the acoustic problems in both Festival Hall and Royal Albert Hall, where the Boston Pops (the orchestra minus its first chairs) played Sunday, were for the trumpets. Their crackling, brilliant style, which is mellowed somewhat by the softer acoustics of Symphony Hall, came through in the London concerts with a noticeably overbalancing force.

The Festival Hall concert Monday, which was sponsored partially by the Massachusetts Port Authority as a culture-and-trade promotion, drew an audience which included many Americans, particularly Bostonians, who were in London either as visitors or as temporary residents, as well as a number of British musical figures with connections to the BSO.

Reception

The concert was followed by a cold chicken, asparagus and champagne reception for the orchestra and the friends traveling with it, hosted by deputy U.S. Ambassador Robert Scott in the absence of Ambassador and Mrs. Walter H. Annenberg.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, composed of the principal players of the various sections, performed a concert of Mozart, Stravinsky and Debussy Tuesday night in the Banqueting Hall at Whitehall Palace. London audiences did not have a chance to hear the work of Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's exciting 26-year-old associate conductor, who was, however, scheduled to conduct a concert in Wuppertal, Germany (adjacent to Dusseldorf), on Thursday.

WILLIAM STEINBERG — a cool reception from the London critics.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 12 1971 New England

Not upset by panning

As one who has attended concerts every Saturday night for many years, I would like to be put on record as one of the many residents of Boston who was not "upset to learn that British music critics panned the performance in London of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

For the past few years, many of the Boston audiences have been upset and deeply concerned over the "rise and fall of the B.S.O." Under Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchesta hit the highest level of quality performances. However, this degree of perfection has slowly declined, most remarkably in recent years and the Boston audience has been treated (by and large) to mediocrity. It's about time and it comes as no surprise to this music lover and listener, that London critics were able to pinpoint and print what you, in your editorial, biasedly referred to as "unpardonable."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is no longer a "sacred cow" to be coddled, but rather reviewed openly and objectively even though they're as "Boston" as our beans and Bruins Perhaps if the Boston audience had been more vocal in their discontent with the level of artistry heard every week, the London critics would have heard in live performance what pleased them on records. They, indeed, put their finger on the problem when they wrote about the "lost vitality and meaning" in the music. Maybe when they return from their trip, the trustees will review the poor quality of music and the poor morale in the orchestra which has finally come to light through the poor level of performances. I hope so.

Brookline MRS. S. GOLDBERG

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

APR 9 1971 New England Newsclip

The Pittsburgh Press
D. 346,090 SUN. 744,732

APR 11 1971

WILLIAM STEINBERG
Rapped in London.

Rap At Steinberg London Replay

By CARL APONE, Press Music Editor

The music critics roasted William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra royally in London last week, according to wire service reports.

And for Steinberg their comments must have seemed like a replay of a recording he heard there eight years ago with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

Greeted Cooly

The London critics greeted Steinberg and the local orchestra ever so cooly in that 1963 concert. So cooly, that when Steinberg came back to Pittsburgh he barely answered when I greeted him at a press conference.

An assistant took me aside to say the harsh treatment by the British writers had made him a foe of all critics.

The recent reviews about the Boston and Steinberg seemed to be rather intelligent and penetrating. Steinberg's music can be rather "stodgy" at times and without "much that was positive to respond to." Although, overall, I prefer his work to any other living conductor.

But the recent fire from the British critics recalls the 1963 incident vividly to mind. For who should appear here in the 1964 season but John Pritchard, conductor of the London Philharmonic, and I asked him about London critics. His comments still ring in my ears.

London Critics

With the exception of The Times, he said, the London critics were just "hacks." And he added: "There is no accounting for some of the English critics.

"We are miserable about the matter but we live with it. We don't think the newspapers take all the care they should have in appointing some of these critics."

According to him, many of the new music critics were "young men not long out of college. They use an extremely personal approach to criticism and believe the only way to get notoriety is to pan something.

"The English critics seem to have dipped their pens in venom but they are mellowing. We hope to educate them in time."

The year 1971 has arrived and British critics seemed not to have mellowed. Pritchard, a hulking 6 ft. 2 in., 200-pounder had felt the jab of the critics and he did not hesitate to blast comments he did not like.

"When I read a bad notice I tell the critic he must be crazy or his ears were not open. It does no harm to tell them and it may do some good."

Natural Enemies

I like this kind of talk from conductors. In the musical, "Oklahoma!" the song has it that the farmer and the cowboy should be friends. The same does not hold true with critics and conductors.

They should remain natural enemies and no doubt Steinberg's animosity for them was rekindled in London.

The Boston and Steinberg tour will include 16 concerts in all in England, Germany, Austria, Italy and France.

Perhaps Maestro Steinberg will hear kinder words on the remainder of his tour.

* * *

Report from London

BSO Wins Over the Public, but not the Critics

By Jon Lehman

On the basis of its opening stand in London, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current European tour is shaping up as a popular success, although it has met a somewhat cool reception from the British critics.

The Orchestra's two concerts in London — one by the Boston Pops on Sunday and one by the Symphony itself on Monday — were both sell-out affairs in halls that hold more than 4,000 listeners, and both were given standing and prolonged applause and cheers at the end by audiences which had come expecting to be pleased.

Where's The Fizz?

But the critics, after paying their respects to the reputations of the Pops and the full orchestra respectively, said they had not heard what they anticipated.

Writing in The Guardian of London, Edward Greenfield called the full orchestra's single London concert "tantalizing," the more so, he said, because there was "little of the fizz one hears on Boston records."

For the Monday night concert in London's new Royal Festival Hall, music director William Steinberg chose a challenging program, the Mozart Symphony No. 36 in C (the "Linz"), one of the brightest and wittiest of the late Mozart symphonies, and the problematic and relatively unfamiliar Symphony No. 7 in b minor of Mahler.

Taking a Break

Mahler's Seventh Symphony, although it is entirely instrumental, without chorus or vocal soloists, is on the grand scale of his later works. In fact, due to the long performing time, the orchestra Monday night took a break between the first and second movements during which Mr. Steinberg left the podium although the audience was requested to remain seated.

The first and last movements are large and bold, with the first developing the strong themes in the brass characterisitic of Mahler, while the last movement pushes the minor-key intricacies of the middle three movements into exuberantly orchestrated resolutions in C major.

The reviewers, for the most part, acknowledged the excellence of instrumental playing on the various sections and reserved most of their criticisms for the conducting.

Stanley Sadie, writing in The Times of London, said, "The violins sounded full and suave, even when poised high among the leger-lines, and the cellos sang long, shapely lines in the first of the Night-Music movements. Among a strong woodwind section I particularly relished the playing of the clarinets, rounded in tone and agile . . . "

Little Conviction

However, said Sadie, Mr. Steinberg's interpretation "seemed to have little feeling of conviction, little sense of why the piece is as it is . . ." He said there were spells of "sustained physical excitement, but the ideas themselves were under-characterized and there was no continuity of impulse."

Some music writers traveling with the orchestra had predicted a hard time at the hands of the London critics, who are known as Mahler aficionados. But the edge was taken off the critical coolness by the audience response, the high morale and impeccable musicianship of the players themselves, and by chance for the orchestra to play and be heard in halls with very different acoustics and layouts from Symphony Hall.

Royal Festival Hall is a large modern concert hall on the south bank of the Thames, across the river and downstream from the buildings of Parliament. From the outside it suggests a concrete airport hangar with glass balconies and many ramps and levels.

Inside is a spacious and almost incrdinately civilized complex of cultural and service facilities. The pattern of open ramps and levels is carried into the interior design, and there is a large and excellent restaurant overlooking the river.

WILLIAM STEINBERG — a cool reception from the London critics.

rrounding the inner hall itself are the d-in outer balconies, with coatrooms on every level as well as champagne and coffee bars for intermission.

Acoustical Problems

The concert hall itself gives the impression of a large, open space, with seats raked up from an open, spread-out stage.

Members of the orchestra said the open stage gave them the same difficulties of hearing and blending with each other that are experienced in the new Philharmonic Hall in New York's Lincoln Center, but the effect for a listener was much more satisfactory than in the New York hall. Although there was great spaciousness and separation to the orchestral sound, there seemed to be no distortion.

The worst of the acoustic problems in both Festival Hall and Royal Albert Hall, where the Boston Pops (the orchestra minus its first chairs) played Sunday, were for the trumpets. Their crackling, brilliant style, which is mellowed somewhat by the softer acoustics of Symphony Hall, came through in the London concerts with a noticeably overbalancing force.

The Festival Hall concert Monday, which was sponsored partially by the Massachusetts Port Authority as a culture-and-trade promotion, drew an audience which included many Americans, particularly Bostonians, who were in London either as visitors or as temporary residents, as well as a number of British musical figures with connections to the BSO.

Reception

The concert was followed by a cold chicken, asparagus and champagne reception for the orchestra and the friends traveling with it, hosted by deputy U.S. Ambassador Robert Scott in the absence of Ambassador and Mrs. Walter H. Annenberg.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, composed of the principal players of the various sections, performed a concert of Mozart, Stravinsky and Debussy Tuesday night in the Banqueting Hall at Whitehall Palace. London audiences did not have a chance to hear the work of Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's exciting 26-year-old associate conductor, who was, however, scheduled to conduct a concert in Wuppertal, Germany (adjacent to Dusseldorf), on Thursday.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 12 1971 New England

Not upset by panning

As one who has attended concerts every Saturday night for many years, I would like to be put on record as one of the many residents of Boston who was not "upset to learn that British music critics panned the performance in London of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

For the past few years, many of the Boston audiences have been upset and deeply concerned over the "rise and fall of the B.S.O." Under Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchesta hit the highest level of quality performances. However, this degree of perfection has slowly declined, most remarkably in recent years and the Boston audience has been treated (by and large) to mediocrity. It's about time and it comes as no surprise to this music lover and listener, that London critics were able to pinpoint and print what you, in your editorial, biasedly referred to as "unpardonable."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is no longer a "sacred cow" to be coddled, but rather reviewed openly and objectively even though they're as "Boston" as our beans and Bruins Perhaps if the Boston audience had been more vocal in their discontent with the level of artistry heard every week, the London critics would have heard in live performance what pleased them on records. They, indeed, put their finger on the problem when they wrote about the "lost vitality and meaning" in the music. Maybe when they return from their trip, the trustees will review the poor quality of music and the poor morale in the orchestra which has finally come to light through the poor level of performances. I hope so.

Brookline MRS. S. GOLDBERG

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

APR 9 1971 New England Newsclip

16

UNION
SPRINGFIELD MASS.
(M) 7?

APR 14 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Tour Has Happy Moments

R. C. Hammerich, The Union's music critic, is touring Europe with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LONDON — Four days of life in London for the touring Boston Symphony Orchestra and friends has been a series of separations, gatherings and aching backs.

The aching backs were developed during long walks. The musicians, like hundreds of other tourists milling around London, were gawking at monuments, shopping and snapping pictures.

They were also visiting museums and pubs, the ballet and hotter spots. London is really a swinging town.

But the sun appeared only once in the four days (during the pops rehearsal) and the temperatures stuck below 50, the weather was dismal, the atmosphere sunny.

On the street they saw flaring mustaches and black bowlers with rolled umbrellas, hundreds of Rolls Royces, 'birds' in sweaters hurrying with arms folded against the chill, water trucks continually washing the streets.

They were dispersed in many hotels and they pursued independent interests, gathering ony for rehearsals and concerts, occasionally waving a greeting when they accidentally met on a sidewalk.

Only a handful appeared at social events attended by the 40 members of the Friends Society who are travelling some of the route with them.

There was a cocktail party in the old Garrick Club, a private club for actors, a trip to J. Paul Getty's giant manor house at Sutton Place, a first - class, blacktie reception (no receiving line, no speeches, a vast supply of great food) given the orchestra after the Monday (April 5) concert by the U.S. Ambassador Walter Annenberg (who was in Palm Beach.)

On Tuesday, the chamber players gave a performance in the Banqueting House At Whitehall (through which Charles I walked on his way to the scaffold) which was preceded by a cocktail party in the House of Lords (Lord Stowehill was the gracious host) and followed by a black-tie reception in the Dartmouth House of the English-Speaking Union.

The performance of Mozart and Mahler with Steinberg on the podium in the new Festival Hall Monday was attended by a fut house and was received more warmly by the audience than by the critics next morning, who indicated polite British reserve.

The chamber music program also was well received. It included music by Mozart, Debussy, Beethoven and Stravinsky, whose music was dedicated with a moment of silence to its composer who had died that afternoon in New York.

The orchestra had a day off and disappeared into the giant city, but Wednesday it had a long hard day. The bus trip to Gatwick airport took an hour longer than scheduled (a train strike had jammed street traffic) and there were unforseen delays in getting a group of 150 special tourists on and off planes and through customs.

The plane ride to Stuttgart was one hour, 10 minutes, but it arrives so late that Joseph Silverstein, concert master, had to abandon the group at the airport and take fast trip in his nylon traveling jacket to a Deutche Grammaphon (record company) press conference for music writers from all over Germany.

A French horn player had been taken to the wrong airport in London; so he missed the plane to Stuttgart, but he caught another and caught up to his wardrobe truck and bright brass horn backstage in Stuttgart to appear properly in his white tie.

Steinberg conducted the funeral movement from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony to observe Steinberg's death and then he returned to the scheduled heavy-weight program of Hindemith and Bruckner.

The audience was very quiet, unusually well-dressed and responded not with enthusiasm but with prolonged applause. Many of the audience stood and walked slowly toward the stage clapping not loudly, but relentlessly, for seven or eight call-backs.

It was compensation for a long, hard day that had begun with irritation, but had included sunshine in Germany and a train ride along the Rhine river.

stuttgart and wuppertal

German Critics Glowing in Praise of Boston Symphony

By HARRY NEVILLE

STUTTGART—The second stop of the Boston Symphony European tour was this important manufacturing center of about one million people. Nearly all of whom seemed prosperous if one were to judge by the smartly dressed shoppers who crowded the main streets. Much of the city was destroyed during World War II and there doesn't remain a great deal in the way of truly arresting tourist sights, not at least in the heart of the city.

For the shopping-minded visitor, however, there are hundreds of stores all beautifully stocked with reasonably priced goods. Splendid restaurants, too, in which efficiency and politeness of the service is stunning by American standards.

MATCHING THE general air of affluence is the richness of Stuttgart's musical life, which offers a full-time opera house and the fairly new concert hall in which the BSO performed on April 7. The latter, Die Liederhalle, is actually two halls the Mozartsaal—for solo recitals, chamber ensembles and smallish orchestras—and the Beethovensaal—for larger events such as the BSO concert. The Beethovensaal is an old but striking combination of flowing curves and severe angles. There is a great deal of wooden paneling, which is said to provide a resonant acoustic (I could not tell from the sixth row).

The seats are plush and spacious with plenty of room between rows. In a program that included Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, one might suppose that this was a dangerously comfortable listening situation—even for those blessed with a teutonic attention. But the Stuttgarters were fantastically attentive, though I am beginning to think, after this and the London concerts, that all Europeans audiences are like this.

WILLIAM STEINBERG conducted and although Hindemith's concert music for strings and brass went well enough, it seemed that the orchestra had not yet really hit its stride, that in none of the music did it really sound as the legendary Boston Symphony is supposed to sound. (The slow movement of the Eroica, played in memory of Stravinsky, was particularly plodding and lacking in coherence).

chestras have only technique and no soul. . ." and no soul . . ." Other critics were equally enthusiastic.

WUPPERTAL—A five-hour train ride which passed through Heidelberg and Cologne, brought the symphony to Duesseldorf and from there by bus, to Wuppertal, the orchestra's third stop, where it played a concert April 8 in the Stadthalle. Wuppertal is a part of a kind of Pittsburgh bordering Duesseldorf and Essen. But as with Pittsburgh, Wuppertal is also proud of its cultural attractions, and rightly so. In addition to an orchestra, ballet and opera companies, the village boasts a museum which includes works of Giocometti and Henry Moore. Other attractions are a charming zoo and famous monorail, Europe's first.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conducted and the concert was quite a success—certainly in terms of audience reaction but also in terms of the orchestra's own standards.

The orchestra was in splendid form once it got through "Afternoon of a Faun" (in memory of Stravinsky.) Beethoven's Eighth and Schoenberg's Five Pieces went beautifully, Sherman Welt gave a ravishing account of the Mozart Bassoon Concerto, and Thomas was at his most exuberant in Ravel's La Valse. All this was enhanced by the hall's acoustics, the best yet encountered on the tour.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,5[illegible]
APR 17 1971
New England Newsclip

(Harry Neville, Herald Traveler music critic, is accompanying the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its tour of Europe.)

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
APR 16 1971
New England Newsclip

Two stops on the BSO tour in Europe

The Monitor's music critic, touring with the Boston Symphony, caught an evening of their music in Stuttgart, and another in Wuppertal. Earlier he dropped in on a London concert of Britain's New Philharmonia Orchestra.

By Louis Snyder

Stuttgart, Germany

The sun came out for the first time on the Boston Symphony's European tour when the orchestra landed in Germany for its concert in Stuttgart (Wed. April 7), and the warmth carried over into the evening's audience. In London, the public reaction to a Pops and a BSO concert had been hearty and knowing, if the critical one had matched the weather outside—gray and unsettled. But in Stuttgart's strikingly contemporary Beethovensaal, listeners sat before the music with the kind of glowing perception that doesn't scorch the roof, but keeps the temperature constant and comfortable.

William Steinberg's program began with his and the orchestra's first collective tribute to Igor Stravinsky — the Marcia Funèbre from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. There followed Hindemith's Konzertmusik for Strings and Brass, and Bruckner's bulky Seventh Symphony—certainly not a series of selections chosen to be crowd pleasers. But it was a sophisticated audience that apparently was glad of the opportunity to hear this music, and even more curious to hear Mr. Steinberg and the BSO play it. Their strongest applause came at the end, and was even and continuous, and persisting through seven recalls for Mr. Steinberg and the musicians. This was the first occasion, incidentally, on which Mr. Steinberg and concertmaster Joseph Silverstein were presented with bouquets of flowers, a European custom not usually observed at Symphony Hall.

The Beethovensaal's acoustics seemed to do the orchestra full justice (it had played there 15 years ago when the hall was new), although there were instrumentalists who found that this was a difficult one onstage —Touring Axiom No. 1: One musician's hall is another man's prison. Visually, it is quite striking, with a commodious balcony which sweeps down on the left to the orchestra level; a jagged proscenium, and a startlingly contrasted decorative scheme using wood, plaster, and stone.

At the concert's conclusion, many members of the audience strolled down the aisles to the stage, applauding conductor and orchestra in a restrained but welcoming way, full of understanding and appreciation. So in each city, players and listeners exchange surprises.

Do you know the nail in Wuppertal? Do you know Wuppertal? Many don't, but after a day's Rhine journey by rail along the banks of the big river, with its castles in the mist between Mainz and Cologne, the BSO discovered this many-leveled city not far from Düsseldorf. Now populated by more than 400,000, it dates back to the 11th century; has a monorail which has carried over 1,000-million passengers in its 65 years as a public conveyance linking the Wuppertals, variously known as Wuppertal-Elberfeld, Wuppertal-Barmen, -Vohwinkel, -Ronsdorf, -Cronenberg, and -Beyenburg; is an important center for the manufacture of textiles, electrical and chemical research and processing, with Germany's highest percentage of women workers; boasts a prestigious opera house, a repertory theater with a 10-month season (and a Henry Moore sculpture at the door), a famous Clock Museum, and the Von der Heydt Museum with collections ranging from Manet to Dali, Rodin to Giacometti.

There is the very modern new "Schwimmoper," to showcase another famous Wuppertal export — Olympic swimmers; a park-like zoo, and the middle 19th-century Stadthalle, a long rectangular box with terra-cotta and white decorations inside, and white globular chandeliers to light the high-ceilinged auditorium. Like many European halls, the stage has a built-in balcony behind the musicians, where the younger crowd sits facing the conductor.

The conductor they faced last Thursday (April 8) was one of their own, the BSO's associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, leading his first concert of the tour. Being one who had had many associations with Stravinsky earlier in his own 26 years, Mr. Thomas prefaced his announced program with Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un Faune," which he knew Stravinsky had always admired. It was a touching performance, done by Mr. Thomas and the musicians with art and devotion, and savored at its conclusion in the silence the conductor had requested.

As soon as it was possible to express themselves—first, after Beethoven's Eighth Symphony — the listeners clapped and stamped their pleasurable discovery of the BSO and its young leader. There was hard-core applause for Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, a separate ovation for Sherman Walt's playing of the Mozart Bassoon Concerto (KV 191), and in Ravel's "La Valse" another opportunity to reward Mr. Thomas and the orchestra with the kind of reception that gladdens artists' hearts. A hundred or more who may not have known about Wuppertal before their concert certainly have good reason to remember this short but shining visit.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 281,982 SAT. 297,247
MAY 5 1971

ADORING LOOK—The teen-agers of Europe have found a new concert hero in Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony and new maestro of the Buffalo Philharmonic effective this fall. Here a young admirer gazes speechlessly at Mr. Thomas after his sold-out concert with the touring Boston Orchestra in the Germany city of Wuppertal. Cheering youngsters swarmed backstage for autographs after the 26-year-old conductor's performance, which resulted in six curtain calls.

18

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
MAY 4 1971
New England Newsclip

BSO photo of Michael Tilson Thomas in Wuppertal, Germany

BSO photo of violinist Freddy Ostrovsky at Vienna Musikvereinsaal, where he had made his professional debut years ago

Backstage

Onstage

For more photos of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Europe—and music critic Louis Snyder's final article on its tour—please turn to the first page, second section

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,[illegible]
APR 25 1971
New England Newsclip

BERLIN—Arthur Fiedler, on tour with the Boston Pops in Europe, examines the Berlin Wall.

WUPPERTAL, Germany—Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the orchestra in a sold-out performance. Story on Page 19.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950
APR 18 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Continues Tour In Dusseldorf

Off on the next leg of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 23-day, six-nation European Tour, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., BSO manager (left) chats with David Rockefeller, Jr. (center) and Bernard Zighara, principal harpist in the orchestra, at Dusseldorf, Germany station.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754
APR 18 1971
New England Newsclip

ADVENTURES IN GERMANY

Music, Mishaps Mixed For Boston Symphony

By R. C. HAMMERICH
Republican Staff

BERLIN —(On tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestras) — A token selection of Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians were frisked and their luggage inspected carefully for weapons, apparently a standard spot check, as the orchestra and 100 friends checked in for the flight over East Germany from Dusseldorf to Berlin.

They were subject to a good deal of ridicule by their comical associates peering through a glass barrier, but more serious problems were on several minds.

They were thinking about such matters as George Humphrey's misdirected luggage and missing $3500 and Rolland Tapley's lost folder of documents.

Rolland (say it like Holland) is 69, a violinist, and has been playing with the orchestra longer than anyone else. He joined it in February, 1920, followed in a few weeks by Clarence Knudson, who plays first bench in the second violin section.

Busy Time

Rolland has a busy calendar as conductor of small musical groups near Boston and was studying a folder of irreplacable memoranda and schedules on the train from Stuttgart to Dusseldorf.

It slipped between the seats when attention was distracted by the irresistable Rhine valley, and he left it on the train thinking he had packed it away.

From the discovering of his loss to the recovery of the documents was a tense eight hours. First there was the difficulty of describing the degree of the crisis by hand signals to station attendents — partly solved by a passing German who knew French and could communicate in that language with Mrs. Tapley for a double translation.

Then ther was the interminable couple of hours while the message was sent down the line to someone who could search the train.

And then there was another long wait for a return train to bring back the folder. Mrs. Tapley did the waiting. Mr. Tapley (who likes to be called "Tap") worried while helping to give a fine concert in Wuppertal.

London Snafu

Earlier, in London, George Humphrey, violinist, spent four hours and $10 in taxi fares because his luggage was sent to a series of wrong hotels with him and a cabby in hot pursuit.

Later, settled in and back on schedule, he took a small travel bag to the hotel desk clerk to put into the safe.

It contained $3500 in travelers' checks which he is taking to Rome to buy a Cremona viola, and a hundred one-dollar bills.

The next day the hotel clerk didn't produce it on request. A half hour went by before the hotel manager appeared and, in great embarrassment, because he was forced to admit that the bag had been opened, said it had been turned over to the police because it contained so much money.

Stuttgart in south Germany, a city of more than a half million, from London in the middle of the afternoon immediately hit the streets to look around.

The concert was in a 15-year-old hall of modern design which they had played in when it was new in 1956.

It is non-symetrical. The left wall falls away from the high stage in a wide curve, the other in a zig-zag containing a few boxes, some glassed-in. The balcony juts out normally from the right wall and sweeps back in a wide falling curve than ends in a steep slope to the main floor on the left side.

Bruckner was the major work on the program, William Steinberg was the director and the audience was more than usually well-dressed; there were a great many dinner jackets.

The mood was sombre, the decor grey and brown, the audience very quiet, polite and appreciative.

The next day everyone rode to Dusseldorf in three rail cars and a diner specially assigned to the orchestra and its followers. There were six to a compartment, each with great wide windows through which a few hundred thousand pictures were made (by those musicians not playing cards).

A big chunk of the ride was along the west bank of the Rhine, a nice circumstance offering sights of a few dozen castles of varying vintage, terraced vinyards on the steep banks and many partially quaint villages.

Big Success

Arrival in Dusseldorf resulted in another dispersal, some to Dusseldorf hotels, some to Wuppertal (13 miles) where the concert was scheduled at 8 with Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor. The program was Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, Schonberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra and Mozart's bassoon concerto with Sherman Walt, soloist.

Thomas' success was large. He is young and athletic on the podium, and a bank of terraced seats at the back of the stage in the old, echoing hall gave about 200 teenagers a close, face-on view of him over the heads of the orchestra.

Thomas says he likes that arrangement. Certainly the teenagers did. They pounded their feet in a great rumble of applause and brought Thomas back on stage for seven or eight bows. He seems always to be popular with young people.

Travel note: Wuppertal is a city of 400,000 people distinguished by a famous clock museum, the production of olympic swimmers and a 32-mile-long, monorail train suspended over the narrow Wupper River, which has been giving the burghers public transportation since 1901.

He retrieved it with much bowing and scraping.

These incidents, with the case of the missing French horn player who was taken to the wrong London airport, are only larger events in an endless series of little boondoggles besetting the 110 musicians at every hand; i. e., late busses, bad food, lost sleep, overcharging clerks, hats left on busses, lost tickets, luggage stubs, vouchers, invitations, and misunderstood instructions.

The trip would be really chaotic if it weren't for the efficiency of the Boston travel agent and his helpers, who can solve as well as forestall trouble.

Somehow the musicians are always on time for rehearsals and performances. They disappear in a hundred sight-seeing directions and coalesce for their music-making and mass transportation. And they seem to be smiling the whole time. It is a remarkable group.

For the Boston musicians, Stuttgart and Wuppertal were similar — but separated by a very pleasant train ride.

The players arrived in Boston Symphony at Wuppertal

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a sold-out performance at the Stadthalle Wuppertal, in Wuppertal, Germany. The audience recalled him for seven curtain calls. The concert was part of the orchestra's 23-day, six-nation European tour.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 568,377 (E) 194,700
APR 20 1971
New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY TOURING ABROAD——4 . . . by Michael Steinberg

Weekend for wandering around Berlin

BERLIN — Monday morning, one of the Boston Symphony players asked me as someone who supposedly knew this city a bit, to recommend a strip-show, "but a really raunchy one," because one of the 40 or so Friends of the Boston Symphony, who have paid $3000 each for the privilege of accompanying the orchestra on most of its European tour, had asked him to take her ("no, I'm not going to tell you who").

Here, at any rate the Boston Symphony is, having played its two concerts in Berlin, and now swarming about, many going to East Berlin just to wander around or to enjoy the excellent opera there — productions of Britten's "Midsummer Night's Dream" at the Komische Oper and of Strauss's "Die Frau ohne Schatten" at the Staatsoper were particularly praised — others taking in the zoo or various sorts of entertainment on our side of the wall.

Possibilities were somewhat limited by the four-day Easter weekend, which among other things meant no hotel laundry, because the Germans take Good Friday and Easter Monday very seriously, and West of the Wall at least, everything was shut down as tight as Tel Aviv on Saturdays.

The orchestra played its first concerts in Germany on Wednesday, April 7 (Stuttgart, with William Steinberg conducting the "Eroica" funeral music in recognition of the death of Stravinsky, Hindemith's Concert Music for brass and strings, and the Bruckner 7th), and on the following day in Wuppertal (Michael Tilson Thomas conducting Beethoven's 8th, Schoenberg's Five Pieces, the Mozart Bassoon Concerto with Sherman Walt, and Ravel's "La Valse," the last referred to by one of the players as "That old whore that everybody in the world has had a go at").

Not having been with the tour those days, I asked several people how things had gone in Stuttgart — where I have a happy recollection of having heard the BSO under Munch in 1956 — and repeatedly found that each time I asked about Stuttgart, someone offered to tell me about Wuppertal. The Wuppertal concert aroused enormous enthusiasm, Michael Thomas was pelted with flowers, there was foot-stomping; besides, the orchestra was pleased by the acoustics of the Stadthalle and even turned on by that rather special little Ruhr city with its famous monorail.

Stuttgart did, however, bring the first good reviews of the tour, at least the two anyone has seen so far. Critics here don't write for the next day, nor indeed for any predictable target date, and given that along with the confusion between local papers, national papers, and national papers with local editions, it is hard to keep track. The orchestra itself was praised without reserve; Steinberg was specifically praised for that which most nearly drives the orchestra buggy just now, which is what one might call his minimal conducting — when the going gets tough, "using the quasi-sadistic technique of Fritz Reiner" he conducts even less, one of the writers pointed out delightedly — and these reviews have contributed toward confirming the players' opinion of music criticism and the presumed blindness and deafness of those who write it.

Michael Steinberg, The Globe's music critic, is accompanying the BSO on its European tour.

20 berlin

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,
APR 19 1971
New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY TOUR

Two Concerts Reflect Contrasts in Berlin

(Richard C. Hammerich, music critic for The Springfield Union, is accompanying the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its three week performance tour in Europe.)

By R. C. HAMMERICH
Union Staff

BERLIN, Germany, (with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on tour) — Berlin is a city of contrasts and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, giving the fifth and sixth concerts of its three-week tour, reflected the uneasy atmosphere.

Crowds, Color, Lights

The first concert was inspired — spirited and beautiful; a capacity audience (2200) gave it an ovation; the second, for an audience of perhaps 1700, was routinely good.

The Philharmonie (a recently-built concert hall) is ugly outside and fascinating inside. It is acoutically astounding — clear, bright, balanced, full-toned, wide-ranged.

It is the best concert hall inside I've seen and heard; the worst outside.

West Berlin is full of crowds and action and color and bright lights: East Berlin is a uniform drab gray-brown, and parking space goes begging.

The basic five characteristics of the geography of both cities are the same: war-damaged hulks of buildings, sparkling new steel - masonry - glass buildings, wide open lots, ancient restored buildings, buildings under construction. All are mixed in every block.

East Berlin

And in the back of everyone's mind is the wall. Most of the members of the BSO visited the wall or crossed through the two checkpoints for a tour of East Berlin.

It is a strangely depressing experience, and they showed it.

A few wouldn't go near it; it is too much.

The Philharmonie is near it. From a balcony at the back of the building, it can be seen easily along with the Reichstag, the Brandenburg Gate, Potsdamer Platz and Hitler's bunker — a large, smooth, grass-covered mound—all of which are along the road.

But West Berlin is a large bustling, prospering city which filled its sidewalks with people even during the Easter weekend when the orchestra was there, and those who heard the Boston musicians responded like those in Stuttgart and Wuppertal with modest but prolonged applause.

They just don't stop applauding in Germany.

The Philharmonie

The Philharmonie is of modern design apparently without interior parallel lines. The blocks of seats are mounted on many levels, nearly all facing at slightly different angles from all sides of the performers' platform and nearly all on slightly tilted lateral planes.

A solo instrument can be heard with bell-like clarity in the most remote seat, but the full orchestra is not too loud in the front rows.

The orchestra members loved it, and many said that they played better in it than in the other halls on the trip —but they were reluctant to leave this strange city.

The two Berlin programs, both sponsored by Gillette, were conducted by William Steinberg and included music by Beethoven, Wagner, Hindemith, Schuler and Brahms (a German fare); Beethoven was most popular.

Social note: Friedelind Wagner, the great composer's granddaughter, attended both concerts, smiling broadly and applauding vigorously.

'Parsifal' and BSO on the Berlin scene

Christian Science Monitor date??

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

By Louis Snyder

Berlin

In Berlin, and for that matter all of West Germany, the Easter weekend is an all-out holiday from Friday through Monday. For the musically inclined there was a choice on Good Friday between "Parsifal" at the Deutsche Oper, and the Berlin Radio Orchestra's "St. Matthew Passion." Saturday and Sunday evenings the Boston Symphony played for the first time in the Philharmonie, home of the Berlin Philharmonic. In East Berlin, the operatic fare ranged from the Felsenstein production of Britten's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" to a more conventional "Cav" and "Pag" at the Staatsoper.

The Deutsche Oper, installed in a handsome house of ample proportions which still retains an atmosphere of intimacy, had an impressively simple production of "Parsifal" to offer. Led traditionally by Heinrich Hollreiser, staged sensibly (for the most part) by Wolf Völker, with easily maneuverable settings and lighting by Wilhelm Reinking, it gave the music room to breathe and the singers an unencumbered stage on which to work.

Except for what seemed to be amplified bells and brass in the interludes preceding the Grail scenes, the orchestral sound was exemplary, and the voices almost uniformly good. Veteran bass Josef Greindl lent the weight of his experience to the role of Gurnemanz, and Gustav Neidlinger indicated why he is considered the best of German Klingsors. Gerd Feldhoff's Amfortas was sonorous if not dominating, while two of the company's leading sopranos, Annabelle Bernard and Lisa Otto, headed the groups of Flower Maidens.

What of the opera's soprano and tenor protagonists? As Kundry, the American soprano Gladys Kuchta was vocally persuasive. However, all of her histrionic and singing gifts were of little avail in the long and pivotal "love scene" in Klingsor's garden with the burly Parsifal, Hans Beirer. Clarion-voiced and of massive girth, he moved through the performance apparently impervious even to the simplest theatrical conventions. Miss Kuchta tried hard, but, unbecomingly costumed and fright-bewigged, she could not bring this crucial scene to life. They were as two symbols from former days lost in a modern production otherwise geared to modern techniques and tastes.

BSO at Philharmonie

The two Boston Symphony concerts on Easter eve and night in the spectacular Philharmonie, had enthusiastic receptions from the public, and heartening response from the press, which paid particular tribute to the orchestra's collective and individual virtuosity. Both evenings were sponsored by the Gillette Company.

The hall itself was a revelation to the musicians and the traveling BSO "Friends" organization and press. Imagine, if you can, an Alpine valley of peaks and plateaus transformed into a glistening concert hall with listeners seated on slopes and in ravines, and tucked away among craggy heights, while the orchestra itself sends its sounds upward from the valley floor. During rehearsal, there was an opportunity to explore this extraordinary building, which has perfect sightlines from every nook and cranny, and acoustical reception which arrives with the springiness of a mountain goat. For the players, it was almost uniformly love at first note (although there are always a few holdouts) — some even suggested that a copy of the plans might be stowed away in the orchestra's luggage for future reference.

The exhilaration produced by the surroundings resulted in a rousing opening Beethoven program, led by William Steinberg. The BSO soared through the Leonore No. 3 Overture, and the Third and Fifth Symphonies with a bite and precision that represented the best playing of the tour thus far. While the second program showed somewhat less of this electric quality of discovery, it was the Boston sound at its best in Wagner's Overture to "Die Meistersinger" (with the composer's granddaughter Friedelind in the audience), Hindemith's "Konzertmusik," Schuller's Five Bagatelles, and the Brahms Second.

Boston Symphony Orchestra photo

They liked the hall

. . . the Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg conducting, plays at Berlin's remarkable Philharmonie — and enjoys it, according to the accompanying review, which also deals with spring opera in the city.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 19 1971 New England Newsclip

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Orchestra wins warm praise in Berlin

BERLIN—The Boston Symphony played two concerts here, both under William Steinberg, one (Saturday, April 10) all Beethoven and sold out, the other (Sunday, April 11) with a mixed program of Wagner, Hindemith, Schuller, and Brahms, and filling the hall to about four-fifths of capacity.

One unexplained oddity was the total emptiness at the second concert of the student rush seats, which consist of a half dozen rows of benches directly behind the orchestra. Michael Tilson Thomas reported having talked to two students at intermission, who told him that the box office had said the hall was sold out.

I later found two other students who confirmed that but also someone in the box office who said there had been no demand for student tickets. This island or fenced-in compound pits a rapidly aging population against quite a peppy student one, and perhaps the most acute case of generation gap of any major city in the world, so, as still another Free University student commented, "yes, such things can happen here."

The public greatly enjoyed both concerts, and there was even rhythmic clapping after the Brahms 2nd Symphony. The three reviews so far have been mixed. The orchestra itself was praised warmly, though while one reviewer called the BSO "America's Vienna Philharmonic" and said that it showed America did not produce only efficient high combustion engines like the New York Philharmonic and the Cleveland Orchestra, another wrote that the concert demonstrated that Americans do put technical values ahead of those spiritual and expressive values to which "we in Europe" assign a higher place. Na ja.

Steinberg came in for a slightly more negative than positive press. Again, as in Stuttgart, his anti-gymnastic, non-balletic manner was praised, though there was dissent from one critic who had doubts about the conductor's "almost ostentatious passivity" and suggested that if the orchestra played the Brahms 2nd beautifully, which it did, it seemed to be almost more "against the conductor's will" rather than because of it.

What really delighted the orchestra here—and they have badly needed something to be delighted by—was the hall, the Philharmonie, and there has been lots of talk about the desirability of airlifting it to Boston.

It is singularly hideous from the outside, the color of a bad plastic imitation creme caramel. Inside it is wildly nervous, giving the impression that none of its planes or surfaces continues for more than a few feet before veering off in some other direction. And, as in many European halls, there are seats behind the stage, here something like one fourth of the nearly three thousand. There it sounds, in William Steinberg's words, like a symphony concert heard from behind, with a bit too much horn and viola, with trumpets bouncing loudly and disconcertingly off the ceiling, and with a conducting lesson thrown in. While not good, the sound is perhaps not worse than that of some other halls from out front.

Then, from "normal" seats, except those that are too close, the sound is both clear and resonant, a great pleasure. It is that, too, from some more peculiar locations; indeed, the most gorgeous sound I experienced in my shiftings about during the two concerts was that in a kind of 30-seat eyrie directly above the basses and back stands of cellos at something like fourth balcony level (at any rate 114 steps from stage level). What particularly pleased the players is that they could hear each other so well, something that is not necessarily true in many halls that sound fine to listeners (ours in Boston, for instance).

Just as this goes off, there are two more reviews from Berlin, both friendly. Again, the orchestra is praised; Steinberg is praised in one for his reticence, in the other for his aggressiveness, and in one also for being European enough to interpret Beethoven correctly.

Michael Steinberg, The Globe's music critic, is accompanying the BSO on its European tour.

Today's Letters to the Editor are on page 18

BOSTON SYMPHONY TOURING ABROAD—5 . . . by Michael Steinberg

'A virtuoso in every chair'

FRANKFURT — This is the middle of the busiest part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour, the part when there are six concerts on six consecutive days. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted in the Jahrhundertalle in Hoechst, a Frankfurt suburb, Thursday evening (Schumann "Rhenish," Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with Joseph Silverstein, and Ravel's "La Valse") and in Hanover on Tuesday (Mozart Bassoon Concerto with Sherman Walt, Piston 2d Symphony, Schumann Piano Concerto with Christoph Eschenbach, and "La Valse"), with William Steinberg taking charge in Hamburg Wednesday (Mozart Linz Symphony, Hindemith Concert Music, Beethoven "Eroica").

Reactions: in Hanover, short outbursts of bravoing at the end of Piston and Ravel; otherwise that peculiarly German form of applause, very long and tepid, like a Berlin Bockwurst. In Hamburg, great enthusiasm for the Hindemith, in fact more, to everyone's astonishment, than for Beethoven. In Frankfurt-Hoechst, some of the tour's most intense applause yet for Tchaikovsky-Silverstein and "La Valse." So far one review: Carl-Heinz Mann in the Hamburger Abendblatt, with a headline, "A virtuoso in every chair," unstinting praise for the Hindemith performance, and considerable doubts about Steinberg's understanding of Mozart and Beethoven.

In Hanover, a pretty teen-age blonde popped up on stage several times to present flowers (and a less pretty blonde took pictures, nearly blinding Eschenbach, and succeeding quite well in unnervimg Michael Thomas just as he was about to begin the Piston Symphony). Bassoonist Sherman Walt took his flowers as though he was pleased to get them, which I am sure he was, and perhaps the more so since the management forgot to put his name in the program. Eschenbach looked embarrassed, shoved them into the arms of concertmaster Silverstein, who looked horrified and passed them to Thomas at the first possible moment, Thomas then redelivering them to Eschenbach. Thomas took his own post-Ravel bouquet, waved it about like a thurifer, threw a couple of flowers to orchestra, and was pursued by a violinist who had retrieved the note that had dropped out in the process.

Acoustics were sad in all three towns. Hanover sounded as though one had come late and were being made to wait in the corridor, the Hamburg Grosse Musikhalle (on Karl-Muck-Platz) frightened everyone with its loudness and Frankfurt-Hoechst seemed to flunk with everyone on all counts.

Hanover, a pleasant town where the streetcars look like pop art, provides no locker-room facilities for orchestras who play in its Stadthalle. There was only the backstage part of the corridor that encircles the round hall, and at the end of the concert Hanoverian ladies and gentlemen marched resolutely through the heaps of temporarily trouserless musicians hiding behind orchestra trunks, harp cases, and those sarcophagi that basses travel in. In Wuppertal, what the orchestra had taken for a safe area turned out to be the most convenient exit path for people who had been sitting in the balcony, while in Stuttgart the dressing area was suddenly invaded by a girls' chorus that was rehearsing in another auditorium in the same building and that was now taking a break.

Shortly after arrival in Frankfurt, I met piccolo player Lois Schaefer, who reported that she had already been to the dentist here. The dentist turned out to be from New Jersey. Miss Schaefer wondered the obvious thing and asked him what he was doing here. "Practising dentistry," the man said. But then what can you expect when the story began in Hamburg with a filling lost while eating soup?

Michael Steinberg, The Globe's music critic, is accompanying the BSO on its European tour.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 22 1971 New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 127
APR 18 1971 New England Newsclip

CONDUCTOR ARTHUR FIEDLER, on tour with the Boston Pops in Europe, examines the Berlin Wall as he reaches out to touch the barb wire while his assistant, Harry Ellis Dickson, jokingly holds his arm.—(UPI)

Barbed note

Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler reaches toward the barbed wire of the Berlin Wall, and he's held back by co-conductor Harry Ellis Dickson. The Pops is on its annual European tour. (UPI Telephoto)

(United Press International Telephoto)

STANDARD TIMES
HYANNIS, MASS.
(E) 22,520 (S) 14,725
APR 18 1971 New England Newsclip

Conductor's Tour of the Wall

Conductor Arthur Fiedler, on tour with the Boston Pops Orchestra in Europe, tests barbed wire along the Berlin wall as assistant Harry Ellis Dickinson jokingly holds on to prevent a defection. Looking on at upper right is Richard C. Hammerich of the Sunday Republican staff, who is covering the Boston Symphony and Pops Orchestras on the tour. (See Story on Page 57).

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754
APR 18 1971 New England Newsclip

N. H. SUNDAY NEWS
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(S) 49,171
APR 18 1971 New England Newsclip

CONDUCTOR ARTHUR FIEDLER, on tour with the Boston Pops in Europe, examines the Berlin Wall as he reaches out to touch the barb wire while his assistant, Harry Ellis Dickson, jokingly holds his arm. (UPI Telephoto)

22

Symphony Presents Two Concerts in Berlin

By HARRY NEVILLE

WEST BERLIN—The Boston Symphony gave two concerts here during the long Easter weekend, which in Germany is one of the most important holidays of the year. Both events took place in the Philharmonie, home of the Berlin Philharmonic and one of those "functionally designed" buildings that abound in post-war Berlin architecture.

FROM THE OUTSIDE, the Philharmonie is attractive enough not to have earned one of those nicknames Berliners are fond of applying to the more egregious examples of the new architecture—"Sing Sing," for instance, for the city's opera house, and "The Pregnant Oyster" for the new Congress Hall.

Inside, the Philharmonie is a maze of galleries set in different planes and at different angles, all of which combines somehow to produce one of the richest acoustics in the world. Not matter where one sits—even behind the orchestra—the sound is good, and the higher one goes the better it becomes.

ON SATURDAY before Easter a full house heard William Steinberg conduct an all-Beethoven program—the Third Leonore Overture and the Third and Fifth Symphonies—and on Easter Sunday a somewhat smaller audience showed up for Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude, Hindemith's Concert Music for Strings and Brass, Schuller's Five Bagatelles and Brahms' Second Symphony.

These were important programs both from the standpoint of the orchestra's morale (the London reviews had been particularly stinging) and from the standpoint of achieving good press notices (necessary for healthy record sales). The orchestra made an all-out effort, particularly in the all-Beethoven program, which would inevitably be compared with the performances of Herbert von Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic.

AFTER THE FIRST concert the general feeling among the players was that they had indeed done well, very well in fact, and this was a feeling that seemed to be shared by the audience, which on both occasions gave prolonged and vociferous ovations.

The press felt otherwise, as became apparent Tuesday morning when notices finally appeared. At best these could only be described as "mixed" reviews. Characteristic of them was an article by Walter Bachauer of "Die Welt."

BACHEUER had nice things to say about the players, whom he described as "romantic bacchantes rather than priests of the classical," but he bore down rather heavily on the conductor, speaking of interpretations that were routine and only an "eye blink" away from the conventional.

He found the playing a typical of U. S. orchestras and seemed rather to enjoy the special qualities of the Boston Symphony, for he went on to say that their "unamerican technique could have been an example had it not been for the constant, almost ostentatious passivity of Steinberg. The best moments of the Brahms occurred almost against rather than with his will."

And so it goes. The tour has not been the whirlwind romance that it was during the orchestra's last trip to Europe.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 30 1971 New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,[illegible]

APR 25 1971 New England Newsclip

The two worlds of Berlin

by Harry Neville

Harry Neville, the Herald Traveler's music critic, is in Europe on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

EAST BERLIN—The image of East Berlin which Americans have from movies and TV programs is of a bleak, fortified city. And indeed much of what the traveler expects to find is there. Sentinal towers manned by armed soldiers who constantly peer through binoculars dot "The Wall," a barricade whose existence, thoughly overwhelmingly evident, is not always acknowledged by the East German authorities. Even the possession of a tourist map on which the wall is designated can be an excuse for bureaucratic rudeness —especially so if the traveler carries an American passport, as we belatedly learned during our cross-over.

But The Wall is plainly there, particularly for one entering via the S-Bahn, the elevated train from whose windows can be seen a high barbed wire fence with a hundred feet or so of neatly cleared—and mined—land on the eastern side. Passport checks—three at the Friederickstrasse stop of the S-Bahn, two at "Checkpoint Charlie"—ble for those events to have come about.

Farther into East Berlin large modern buildings are going up. "Centrum," a large department store in this area, was so crowded during the Easter weekend that shoppers had to wait in lines to get in. Store windows display the wares of Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Cuba, Vietnam, etc., but the products are drab with the exception of some of the folk craft.

The image changes on "Unter den Linden", where one sees shops with Meissen, furs, art books and sporting equipment. Here one can buy "Maxwell House" coffee for ten dollars a can or "Camel" cigarettes for one and a half dollars. Here too is a store that sells music scores at roughly half their U.S. price — miniature orchestral scores of "Figaro" and "Fidelio" at four dollars apiece. Records too at similar prices.

The exchange rate between East and West German marks is now even—at least on the eastern side—and although we had been led to suppose that this was inequitable, we nevertheless felt that in most cases we received fair value. At lunchtime we ate a hearty but good and cheap meal in a minimal and highly stylized, costumes quite elegant, and the production moved swiftly with only one intermission which took place after the second act. Best of all, it was a performance in which the words and music were allowed to speak for themselves. The Germans take Mozart seriously and do not require tiresome clowning in order to make his operas palatable.

The performance was given not in the main auditorium of the Staatsoper but in the Apollo-Saal, a room which seats about three hundred people and which provides a charming, intimate atmosphere which is ideal for Mozart. A marvel of rococo elegance, the room contrasted startlingly with the generally bleak atmosphere that was to be found outside.

Recollecting our impressions upon the return to West Berlin, we were struck by the tension and insecurity we had experienced. But even more striking was the fact that those feelings did not abate in the highly Americanized western sector. Reminders of home—a snack of processed cheese, a hilarious German dubbed showing of Andy Warhol's "Trash"—did little to improve our spirits in this isolated city.

bonn pre-concert publicity

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 15 1971 New England Newsclip

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 16 1971 New England Newsclip

$42-a-seat German gala

Joan Kennedy, Pops to give Bonn concert

Reuters

BONN — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife, Joan, arrived here today to perform with the Boston Pops Orchestra in one of the highest priced concerts ever staged in West Germany.

Appearing tires, Mrs. Kennedy and conductor Arthur Fiedler were swamped by German newsmen at Bonn Airport. Although the visit is unofficial, the Massachusetts senator will join his wife tomorrow and attend a foreign ministry reception.

Mrs. Kennedy was questioned repeatedly about her stop in London where she was reported expressing opposition to her husband running for President.

She told newsmen here, however, "I hope that it will not be . . . I don not want to discuss why . . . I am here as a Bostonian with the orchestra. . . ."

Opening its first European tour, the Boston Pops will give a gala concert in Bonn's Beethoven Hall tomorrow night with its usual mixture of classical and light music.

Mrs. Kennedy will narrate the orchestra's rendition of Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf." The Pops are also playing Beethoven's "Egmont Overture" and selections from "Hair."

Speaking fluent German, Fiedler said he was looking forward to the concert as he had never conducted in Germany and had not visited the country since he was a student here in 1936.

Sponsored by Kenneth Rush, US Ambassador to West Germany, the concert is selling tickets priced higher than concertgoers here can ever remember. Seats cost as much as $42 dollars.

The Boston Pops is the same orchestra as the Boston Symphony, minus 11 principal players. Most of the concerts on the orchestra's three-week tour are being given by the Symphony, conducted by William Steinberg. The orchestra is going to Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris after playing in six West German cities.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111

APR 16 1971

Concert Star

Sen. Edward M Kennedy's wife, Joan, arrived in Bonn yesterday to perform with the Boston Pops Orchestra in one of the highest priced concerts ever staged in West Germany.

Appearing tired, Mrs. Kennedy and conductor Arthur Fiedler were swamped by German newsmen at Bonn Airport. Although the visit is unofficial, the Massachusetts Senator will join his wife today and attend a foreign ministry reception.

Mrs. Kennedy was questioned repeatedly about her stop in London where she was reported expressing opposition to her husband running for president.

She told newsmen here, however, "I hope that it will not be . . . I do not want to discuss why . . . I am here as a Bostonian with the orchestra . . ."

Mrs. Kennedy will narrate the orchestra's rendition of Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf." The Pops are also playing Beethoven's "Egmont Overture" and selections from "Hair."

NEWBURGH, N. Y.
NEWS
D. 32,000

MAR 29 1971

Narration Set

PAGE ONE

Mrs. Ted Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler

NEW YORK (AP) — Mrs. Ted Kennedy, wife of the Massachusetts senator, will perform at one stop when the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Boston Pops make a 12-city European tour next month that will cost about $250,000.

It is the orchestra's first international tour in 10 years and first ever for the Pops.

Mrs. Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolfe" in Bonn.

Conductors will be William Steinberg and Michael Tilson Thomas for the Symphony and Arthur Fiei er for the Pops.

Cities to be visited are London, Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hanover, Hamburgh, Frankfurt, Bonn, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona and Paris.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 16 1971 New England Newsclip

CHECKING THE PROGRAM—Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler and Joan Kennedy check program while en route to rehearse tonight's program in Hamburg, Germany. Mrs. Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
(Ed Fitzgerald photo)

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(E) 150,082

APR 16 1971 New England Newsclip

Bonn Voyage

Arriving in the West German capital to do a musical gala are Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of the Massachusetts senator, and Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler, wearing a fireman's helmet presented to him there.
—Associated Press

24

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 423,300
APR 16 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler sports a German firefighters helmet as he and Mrs. Joan Kennedy arrive in the West German capital of Bonn. Fiedler will conduct the orchestra while Mrs. Kennedy narrates "Peter and the Wolf" at tonight's [illegible]ance. —AP Photo

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,4[illegible]
APR 16 1971
New England Newsclip

(Associated Press Wirephoto)

Boston to Bonn

Mrs. Joan Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived Thursday in Bonn to do a gala tonight. Fiedler was presented with a fireman's helmet as a present.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 281,982 SAT. 297,247
APR 16 1971

PEOPLE IN THE NEWS
the world...the nation...the area

MUSICAL VISITORS—Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler wears a fireman's helmet presented to him on his arrival in Bonn, West Germany, Thursday. With him is Joan Kennedy. They will participate in a musical gala in Bonn tonight.

ELYRIA, OHIO
CHRONICLE-TELEGRAM
D. 29,500
APR 16 1971

MRS. JOAN KENNEDY, wife of Massachusetts Sen. EDWARD KENNEDY, arrives in Bonn, Germany, with ARTHUR FIEDLER, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today to do a concert tomorrow night. Fiedler was given a fireman's helmet as a present.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175
APR 16 1971
New England Newsclip

AP

In Germany For Concert

Mrs. Joan Kennedy and Boston Symphony conductor Arthur Fiedler are shown arriving in Bonn, Germany Thursday for a performance to be held tonight. Fiedler, a fire buff, was presented a fireman's helmet as a souvenir of the visit.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,6[illegible]
APR 16 1971
New England Newsclip

CONCERTEERS Mrs. Joan Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the tour- Boston Symphony Orchestra group, arrive in Bonn, Germany, for gala to- [illegible] Germans presented fire buff Fiedler with—what else? (AP)

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
APR 16 1971

IN A GALA MOOD—Mrs. Joan Kennedy, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrive in Bonn, West Germany for a gala. Mrs. Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, was presented with a bouquet; Fiedler got a fireman's helmet, which he seems happy to have. (AP Wirephoto).

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
(E) 41,946
APR 16 1971
New England Newsclip

Fiedler in Bonn

Joan Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, are in Bonn for a concert. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife will be the narrator for the presentation of Peter and the Wolf. Fiedler was presented a fire fighter's helmet as a present. AP Wirephoto

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790
APR 17 1971

CANINE STEIN: Boston Symphony conductor Arthur Fiedler offers a sip of beer to a tiny dog "Napoleon" at a party in Bonn given by West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel. The orchestra is on tour. Mrs. Edward Kennedy will narrate its "Peter and the Wolf" performance. (AP Wirephoto)

WOODBRIDGE, N. J.
NEWS TRIBUNE
D. 52,000
APR 17 1971

The Evening Press
BINGHAMTON, NEW YORK
D. 79,881 SUN. 83,105
APR 18 1971

—Associated Press WIREPHOTO.

HAVE A 'SNORT'—Famed Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, offers a sip of beer to a tiny dog, "Napoleon," at a party given by West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel. The orchestra is in Bonn on tour.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260
APR 17 1971
New England Newsclip

—[Associated Press Photo

Have Some of Mine

Boston Symphony Conductor Arthur Fiedler offers a sip of beer to a tiny dog at a party given yesterday by West German foreign minister Walter Scheel in Bonn. The Symphony is in Bonn on tour.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 144,697 SUN. 221,661
APR 17 1971

Prosit

Arthur Fiedler, conductor on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, offers a sip of bee to pet, Napoleon, at party given yesterday i Bonn, West German Foreign Minister

One on Me

#649

Boston Symphony conductor Arthur Fiedler offers sip of beer to tiny Napoleon at a party yesterday in Bonn, Germany, given by West German foreign Minister Walter Scheel. The Boston Symphony is on tour, and will perform "Peter and the Wolf," to be narrated by Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy. (AP Wirephoto)

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
APR 16 1971

AP Wirephoto

BEER HOUND—Arthur Fiedler, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony, offers a sip of beer ot a tiny dog, "Napoleon," at a party given Fiedler in Bonn by West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel. The Boston Symphony is in Bonn on tour and will perform "Peter and the Wolf," which will be narrated by Joan Kennedy, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy.

THE POST-STANDARD
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
D. 92,652
APR 16 1971

In Bonn for Gala

#5454

Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived Thursday in Bonn, West Germany, to do a gala. Joan is a pianist. Fiedler is wearing a fireman's helmet he was presented. (AP)

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790
APR 17 1971

CANINE STEIN: Boston Symphony conductor Arthur Fiedler offers a sip of beer to a tiny dog "Napoleon" at a party in Bonn given by West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel. The orchestra is on tour. Mrs. Edward Kennedy will narrate its "Peter and the Wolf" performance. (AP Wirephoto)

WOODBRIDGE, N. J.
NEWS TRIBUNE
D. 52,000
APR 17 1971

Prosit

Arthur Fiedler, conductor on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, offers a sip of bee to pet, Napoleon, at party given yesterday i Bonn, West Germany, by West German For eign Minister Walter Scheel.

The Evening Press
BINGHAMTON, NEW YORK
D. 79,881 SUN. 83,105
APR 18 1971

—Associated Press WIREPHOTO.

#6

HAVE A 'SNORT'—Famed Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, offers a sip of beer to a tiny dog, "Napoleon," at a party given by West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel. The orchestra is in Bonn on tour.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(F) 136,232
(E) 8,260
APR 17 1971
New England Newsclip

—[Associated Press Photo

Have Some of Mine

Boston Symphony Conductor Arthur Fiedler offers a sip of beer to a tiny dog at a party given yesterday by West German foreign minister Walter Scheel in Bonn. The Symphony is in Bonn on tour.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 144,697 SUN. 221,661
APR 17 1971

One on Me

#699

Boston Symphony conductor Arthur Fiedler offers sip of beer to tiny Napoleon at a party yesterday in Bonn, Germany, given by West German foreign Minister Walter Scheel. The Boston Symphony is on tour, and will perform "Peter and the Wolf," to be narrated by Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy. (AP Wirephoto)

APR 16 1971

AP Wirephoto

#6

BEER HOUND—Arthur Fiedler, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony, offers a sip of beer ot a tiny dog, "Napoleon," at a party given Fiedler in Bonn by West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel. The Boston Symphony is in Bonn on tour and will perform "Peter and the Wolf," which will be narrated by Joan Kennedy, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy.

THE POST-STANDARD
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
D. 92,652
APR 16 1971

In Bonn for Gala #5454

Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived Thursday in Bonn, West Germany, to do a gala. Joan is a pianist. Fiedler is wearing a fireman's helmet he was presented. (AP)

26

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 23 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Pops and Frager in Bonn

By Louis Snyder
Bonn, Germany

As the fourth in a week of one-night stands in Germany, the Boston Symphony played the second Boston Pops concert of its European tour here on Friday evening April 16 with Arthur Fiedler conducting, and Massport as its sponsor. Along with Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, presumably as a gesture to the composer in his home city, and selections from "Hair" to evoke the Pops image, there was the bursting virtuoso potential of Malcolm Frager in Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto, and the charm, if decidedly modest talents, of Joan Kennedy as narrator of Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf."

The evening was a high-priced benefit for Bonn's Bahnhof Rolandseck, a burgeoning local arts center in a railway station, and it drew a dressy audience of diplomats, BSO Friends, and visiting notables including former President Heinrich Lübke of West Germany, U.S. Ambassador Kenneth Rush, Sen. Edward Kennedy, and Walter Scheel, foreign minister of the Federal Republic, among others. They all sat at refreshment tables à la Symphony Hall, on the main floor of Bonn's Beethovensaal, fending off as best they could the persistent attentions of a tenacious band of press photographers. It was Mr. Fiedler's commanding baton that drove the lensmen away before Mrs. Kennedy finally was allowed to begin her reading stint, but they swarmed back later to turn the evening into something of a travesty of a pleasingly relaxed musical performance.

Again it was the "Hair" medley that succeeded, as it had in the London Pops concert, in communicating the spirit of these lighthearted exports from Symphony Hall, so that everyone in the bright Beethovensaal had received the message by this stage of the program. Enthusiasm ran high from here on, with "The Stars and Stripes Forever" receiving a rhythm-clapping ovation to end the evening.

German welcome

Earlier in the week, the BSO had visited Hannover, headquarters of production facilities for its recording company, Deutsche Grammophon, to play Mozart, Piston, Schumann, and Ravel in the Stadthalle under Michael Tilson Thomas's direction, with bassoonist Sherman Walt and pianist Christoph Eschenbach as soloists. On Wednesday, April 14 one Hamburg critic detected "a virtuoso on every stand" in its Grosse Musikhalle, but found William Steinberg's Mozart (the "Linz" Symphony) problematical. Concertmaster's Joseph Silverstein's performance of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto was a brilliant feature of the Frankfurt concert on Thursday, again under Mr. Thomas. Here the Jahrhunderthalle impressed more with its architecture than its acoustics.

As in other German cities, the public reception for the orchestra has been warm and solidly enthusiastic, while critics have come to friendly, if leisurely, conclusions about the visitors' virtuosity, as opposed to London's rather abrupt petulant press. When Vienna, Rome, Barcelona, and Paris have been heard from—at least three of them traditionally more volatile in public and critical response — the BSO will have a revealing sampling of the temper (and temperature) of a variety of European audiences, paying and prognosticating.

bonn concert

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 27 1971 New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY TOURING ABROAD —6 . . . By Michael Steinberg

Bonn photographers disrupt the Pops

BONN — Backstage in the Beethovenhalle Friday evening, April 16, at the first intermission of the Boston Pops concert, Sen. Edward Kennedy was giving instructions to the house manager. Joan Kennedy was about to recite "Peter and the Wolf," and the gist of the senator's message was, "as many pictures as you like afterwards, but, please, nothing when she first comes out or during the performance."

A few minutes later, Mrs. Kennedy, in white, and Arthur Fiedler appeared on stage to surprisingly thin applause. Nineteen press photographers rushed forward to below the podium and took flash after flash. At the same time the stage was bathed in floodlight for television. Fiedler bent down and tried to shoo the photographers away with words, hands and baton, but, for a long time at least, to no avail. "It's a good thing I know that piece," commented clarinetist Pasquale Cardillo afterwards, "because when we finally began I was still blinded and couldn't see anything but spots in front of my eyes."

Three photographers managed to stay on stage during the performance and several others kept moving through the hall. After the "Peter and the Wolf" performance was done and while Fiedler conducted a medley from "Hair" and a march version of the "St. Louis Blues," it was the Kennedy table, at which were also former German President Heinrich Luebke and Foreign Minister Scheel, that was the real center of attention. Photographers were elbowing and literally kicking each other out of the way — "they were like animals — I've never seen anything like it," said BSO Associate Manager Harry Kraut — while concertgoers, including some of the Friends of the Boston Symphony who are accompanying the orchestra on its tour, crowded around trying to make their way into the pictures. All but the loudest parts of the music disappeared under the roar of conversation.

Earlier in the evening an attempt by pianist Malcolm Frager and by Fiedler not to start Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto until the waiters had stopped marching about failed when Fiedler lost patience with the waiting game.

The traditional Pops format with tables on the main floor, which had been so successfully adapted to the Albert Hall in London, was translated into German and came out as a stiff array of rectangular tables seating five on a side, with open-faced sandwiches, a dull Rhine (Niersteiner Fritzenhoelle Spaetlese '66), and a good champagne (Perigord Imperial Brut). The tab for a table seat was DM 150 ($33) or DM 120 ($26.40), according to location. If you were satisfied to watch people eat and drink, it cost DM 50 ($11) or DM 25 ($5.50). Pops, popular, indeed. Bonn had the highest-priced concert of the entire tour. Comments on the evening by BSO players and staff started from "disgusting," "sickening," "made my blood boil," and went on to the unprintable.

German municipal fire departments continue to be solicitous of Mr. Fiedler. Bonn afforded him his third chance in this country to conduct a fire department band and delivered him to the Beethovenhalle in a fire engine, though unlike Berlin and Hamburg, did not make him an honorary fire chief.

For the Friends of the Boston Symphony, there was an afternoon reception at the quite palatial so-called bungalow of Cabinet Secretary Horst Ehmke. An ironic, not to say somewhat malicious account in the Bonn General-Anzeiger reports that the beer seidels gradually disappeared during the course of the party and comments that "something after all had to be sacrificed to the American passion for souvenirs."

Michael Steinberg, The Globe's music critic, is accompanying the BSO on its European tour.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 292,[illegible]

APR 22 1971 New England Newsclip

Strange Pops Fete In Beethovenhalle

By HARRY NEVILLE

BONN — Here in the birth city of Beethoven, Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops received what must have been one of the strangest receptions of their long and colorful career.

Held April 14 in the Beethovenhalle, which had been set up a la Pops with tables, white-gloved waiters, wine and champagne on the main floor, the concert was a black-tie benefit for an art center which is being established in the local railway station.

IN ATTENDANCE were such notables as Walter Scheel, foreign minister of the Federal Republic; Heinrich Lubke, the Republic's former president; Kenneth Rush, the American ambassador; the Friends of the Boston Symphony; an impressive assortment of European nobility; and Sen. and Mrs. Edward Kennedy.

Mrs. Kennedy appeared on the program as narrator in Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," and it was undoubtedly she and her husband who supplied the occasion's drawing power.

IF THERE WERE any doubts about the still powerful magic of the Kennedy name in this country where nearly every town has its Kennedystrasse or Kennedyplatz, those doubts were resolved by the extraordinary public interest in Mrs. Kennedy's narration of a simple children's story.

Also present were about 50 "papparazzi" of the German, French and Italian press, and it was they who provided the strange, almost surrealistic atmosphere of the evening.

Photographers mobbed the Kennedy table throughout the concert, disrupting the music and making it generally impossible to eat, drink or listen. Some photographers leaped on stage when it came Mrs. Kennedy's turn to perform.

OTHERS ASSEMBLED in front of the stage, blocking the view with lighting equipment, and it was only after some stern words from Arthur Fiedler that they could be persuaded to disperse so that the program could continue.

Naturally the players found it extremely difficult to perform under these conditions, and afterwards many of them expressed dismay and indignation.

IN PRESS ACCOUNTS that appeared the following day, there was little mention of the music but quite a bit of space was given to the social aspects of the evening. One headline chirped, "Boston ladies find everything charming." That reporter could hardly have spoken with the same "Boston ladies" that this one encountered in the Beethovenhalle.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

APR 17 1971

BONN MAKES WAY FOR BOSTON POPS

Kennedy Family Also Adds to Festive Air in Capital

By LAWRENCE FELLOWS
Special to The New York Times

BONN, April 16—Looking down from "Olymp" tonight, the Germans were flabbergasted by their first sight of the Boston Pops, its wealthy Bostonian supporters and the Edward M. Kennedys trying to savor combinations of music, wine and the limelight at the same time.

"As a concert, it was a huge social success," one long-standing admirer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said after the performance.

"It was highly unusual," he added. "The orchestra was very good. But there were distractions: the waiters were not so bad, but the press photographers were climbing all over my table."

Things were less hectic in the Olymp, as the Germans call the highest gallery of seats in their opera houses and concert halls. For those who were early enough to get seats in the packed Beethoven Hall tonight, the only perspective view of the gala concert was from the 210 seats in the high gallery and the balcony below it.

Among the many attractions in the hall was the Boston Pops, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. He has become quite a public figure in Bonn these last two days, since it became known that he is an inveterate fire buff.

When he was met yesterday by the Fire Department band, he took the baton and directed it in a brassy rendition of "Alte Kameraden" (Old Comrades). The bandleader gave him a fire helmet to cover his white mane, and someone saw to it that Mr. Fiedler was brought to the gala concert tonight in a fire engine.

To add to the circus atmosphere, Senator Kennedy arrived at the head of a small army of press photographers. For Germans, the Kennedy name has lost none of its political glitter.

But the Massachusetts Democrat was not campaigning tonight. He had spent the day in separate conversation with Foreign Minister Walter Scheel; General Ulrich de Maziere, commander of the West German armed forces, and Horst Ehmke, the minister in charge of the Chancellory.

He had attended an outdoor reception Mr. Scheel gave for the party of Bostonians this afternoon, and was unable to raise a glass of beer or turn his head without causing an array of flash bulbs to pop at him.

Tonight, he had gone to Beethoven Hall to hear his wife, Joan, narrating "Peter and the Wolf" to Prokofiev's music played by the Boston Pops. She did a fairly professional-looking job, and made a striking figure in a long, silvery beige lamé evening dress.

Senator Kennedy was not signing autographs, but when Mrs. Kennedy finished her number and returned to her table she signed them readily, and the concert became all the more difficult to follow.

There were more than 50 tables in the hall, with 10 persons to a table. Forty-two wealthy Bostonian "friends" of the orchestra who are traveling with it were accustomed to the practice of sitting at tables to enjoy their concerts.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Fiedler Arrives in Fire Truck

Germans Mob Ted And Pops Plays On

By LAWRENCE FELLOWS
(C) New York Times News Service)

BONN — Looking down from the "Olymp" last night, the Germans were flabbergasted by the sight of the Boston Pops, its Bostonian supporters and the Edward Kennedys trying to savor music, wine and the limelight at the same time.

"As a concert it was a huge social success," one longtime admirer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said after the performance.

"It was highly unusual," he added. "The orchestra was very good. But there were distractions: the waiters were not so bad, but the press photographers were climbing all over my table."

Things were less hectic in the "Olymp" as the Germans call the highest gallery of seats in their opera houses and concert halls. For those who were early enough to get seats in the packed Beethoven Hall the only perspective view of the gala concert was from the 210 seats in the high gallery and the balcony below it.

(Continued on Page Four)

Pops Delights Germans, But Ted Takes the Show

(Continued from First Page)

Among the many attractions in the hall was the Boston Pops, under the direction of Arthur Feidler. He has become quite a public figure in Bonn these past two days, since it became known that he is a habitual fire buff.

When he was met Thursday by the Fire Department band, he took the baton and directed it in a brassy rendition of "Old Comrades." The band leader gave him a fire helmut and someone saw to it that Feidler was brought to the concert tonight in a fire engine.

To add to the circus atmosphere, Sen. Edward Kennedy arrived at the head of a small army of press photographers. For Germans, the Kennedy name has lost none of its poltical glitter.

BUT KENNEDY was not campaigning. He spent the day in separate conversations with Foreign Minister Walter Scheel, Gen. Ulrich de Maziere, the commander of the West German armed forces, and Horst Ehmke, the minister in charge of the Chancellory.

At an outdoor reception Scheel gave for the Bostonians this afternoon, Kennedy was unable to raise a glass of beer or turn his head without causing an array of flashbulbs to pop at him.

Tonight he was at Beethoven Hall to hear his wife, Joan, narrating Peter and the Wolf to Prokofiev's music played by the Boston Pops. She made a striking figure in a long, silvery beige lame evening dress.

The senator was not signing autographs. But when Mrs. Kennedy finished her number and returned to her table, she signed them readily, and the concert became all the more difficult to follow.

There were more than 50 tables in the hall with 10 persons to a table. Forty-two wealthy Bostonian "friends" of the orchestra who are traveling with it were accustomed to the practice of sitting at tables to enjoy their concerts in comfort.

But the Germans, even those who had gone expecting nothing more than a social occasion, had trouble getting used to taking their Tchaikowsky and St. Louis Blues with their food and drink.

MEETING FOREIGN MINISTER of West Germany, Walter Scheel, shown with Mrs. Scheel, on his arrival in Bonn, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy later joined wife Joan, touring with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
APR 17 1971

PAGE ONE

Associated Press Photo

AWAITING HER CUE from conductor Arthur Fiedler, Joan Kennedy, the Senator's wife, prepares to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 298,349
APR 18 1971 New England Newsclip

Doing Her Thing: Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, narrates "Peter and the Wolf" during a children's concert Friday night in Beethoven Hall, in Bonn, West Germany. Arthur Fiedler, (r) conducted Boston Pops Orchestra.
—AP Wirephoto from Bonn

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
APR 17 1971

PAGE ONE

Associated Press Wirephoto

APPLAUDED IN ADVANCE, Joan Kennedy, the Senator's wife, arrives at hall in Bonn to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" with Boston Symphony.

Memphis Press-Scimitar
MEMPHIS, TENN.
D. 133,258
APR 17 1971

PEOPLE in the News

Joan a Success

Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass, was brought back for five curtain calls Friday night in her role as narrator for a Boston (Mass.) Pops Orchestra performance of Serge Prokofieff's "Peter And The Wolf." Kennedy sat in the audience at Beethoven Hall among music lovers who paid $81.34 a couple for the privilege of listening while sipping Rhine wine.

Chicago today American
Always on Top of the News
D. 436,893 SUN. 483,418
APR 16 1971

For the conductor with everything . . .

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been setting the musical world afire for years and someone finally paid him his due. Arriving in Bonn yesterday for a gala performance, Fiedler received a German fireman's helmet as a gift.

JOAN KENNEDY

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 8,245
APR 17 1971

World

Mrs. Kennedy A Hit With 'Pops' In Bonn

BONN (UPI)—Joan Kennedy took both the spotlight and the stage from her husband, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Friday night when she appeared with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra in the West German capital.

Mrs. Kennedy did the speaking part in a performance of Serge Prokofieff's Peter and the Wolf, and her husband and others gathered in Bonn's Beethoven Hall gave her applause sufficient to bring her back for five curtain calls.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Fiedler Arrives in Fire Truck

Germans Mob Ted And Pops Plays On

By LAWRENCE FELLOWS
(C) New York Times News Service)

BONN — Looking down from the "Olymp" last night, the Germans were flabbergasted by the sight of the Boston Pops, its Bostonian supporters and the Edward Kennedys trying to savor music, wine and the limelight at the same time.

"As a concert it was a huge social success," one longtime admirer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said after the performance.

"It was highly unusual," he added.

"The orchestra was very good. But there were distractions: the waiters were not so bad, but the press photographers were climbing all over my table."

Things were less hectic in the "Olymp" as the Germans call the highest gallery of seats in their opera houses and concert halls. For those who were early enough to get seats in the packed Beethoven Hall the only perspective view of the gala concert was from the 210 seats in the high gallery and the balcony below it.

(Continued on Page Four) 7

Pops Delights Germans, But Ted Takes the Show

(Continued from First Page)

Among the many attractions in the hall was the Boston Pops, under the direction of Arthur Feidler. He has become quite a public figure in Bonn these past two days, since it became known that he is a habitual fire buff.

When he was met Thursday by the Fire Department band, he took the baton and directed it in a brassy rendition of "Old Comrades." The band leader gave him a fire helmut and someone saw to it that Feidler was brought to the concert tonight in a fire engine.

To add to the circus atmosphere, Sen. Edward Kennedy arrived at the head of a small army of press photographers. For Germans, the Kennedy name has lost none of its poltical glitter.

BUT KENNEDY was not campaigning. He spent the day in separate conversations with Foreign Minister Walter Scheel, Gen. Ulrich de Maziere, the commander of the West German armed forces, and Horst Ehmke, the minister in charge of the Chancellory.

At an outdoor reception Scheel gave for the Bostonians this afternoon, Kennedy was unable to raise a glass of beer or turn his head without causing an array of flashbulbs to pop at him.

Tonight he was at Beethoven Hall to hear his wife, Joan, narrating Peter and the Wolf to Prokofiev's music played by the Boston Pops. She made a striking figure in a long, silvery beige lame evening dress.

The senator was not signing autographs. But when Mrs. Kennedy finished her number and returned to her table, she signed them readily, and the concert became all the more difficult to follow.

There were more than 50 tables in the hall with 10 persons to a table. Forty-two wealthy Bostonian "friends" of the orchestra who are travelling with it were accustomed to the practice of sitting at tables to enjoy their concerts in comfort.

But the Germans, even those who had gone expecting nothing more than a social occasion, had trouble getting used to taking their Tchaikowsky and St. Louis Blues with their food and drink.

MEETING FOREIGN MINISTER of West Germany, Walter Scheel, shown with Mrs. Scheel, on his arrival in Bonn, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy later joined wife Joan, touring with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

APR 17 1971

PAGE ONE

Associated Press Photo

AWAITING HER CUE from conductor Arthur Fiedler, Joan Kennedy, the Senator's wife, prepares to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 298,349

APR 18 1971 New England Newsclip

Doing Her Thing: Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, narrates "Peter and the Wolf" during a children's concert Friday night in Beethoven Hall, in Bonn, West Germany. Arthur Fiedler, (r) conducted Boston Pops Orchestra.
—AP Wirephoto from Bonn

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

APR 17 1971

PAGE ONE

Associated Press Wirephoto

APPLAUDED IN ADVANCE, Joan Kennedy, the Senator's wife, arrives at hall in Bonn to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" with Boston Symphony.

Memphis Press-Scimitar
MEMPHIS, TENN.
D. 133,258

APR 17 1971

PEOPLE in the News

Joan a Success

Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass, was brought back for five curtain calls Friday night in her role as narrator for a Boston (Mass.) Pops Orchestra performance of Serge Prokofieff's "Peter And The Wolf." Kennedy sat in the audience at Beethoven Hall among music lovers who paid $81.34 a couple for the privilege of listening while sipping Rhine wine.

Chicago today American
Always on Top of the News
D. 436,893 SUN. 483,418

APR 16 1971

For the conductor with everything . . .

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been setting the musical world afire for years and someone finally paid him his due. Arriving in Bonn yesterday for a gala performance, Fiedler received a German fireman's helmet as a gift.

JOAN KENNEDY

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 8,245

APR 17 1971

World

Mrs. Kennedy A Hit With 'Pops' In Bonn

BONN (UPI)—Joan Kennedy took both the spotlight and the stage from her husband, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Friday night when she appeared with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra in the West German capital.

Mrs. Kennedy did the speaking part in a performance of Serge Prokofieff's Peter and the Wolf, and her husband and others gathered in Bonn's Beethoven Hall gave her applause sufficient to bring her back for five curtain calls.

28

TELEGRAM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(M) 13,000

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

AP Wirephoto

HAVE SOME OF MINE — Famed Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony, offers a sip of beer to a tiny dog, "Napoleon", at a party given Friday by West German foreign minister Walter Scheel. The Boston Symphony is in Bonn on tour.

Boston Pops Conductor A Hit in West Germany

BONN, Germany (AP) — Fire engine fancier Arthur Fiedler set the pace for a swinging Boston Pops performance Friday night by arriving for the concert in a gleaming hook and ladder truck.

"Great ride," the snowy-haired conductor beamed to the laughing and applauding crowd in front of Bonn's Beethoven Hall before disappearing through a side entrance to give West Germany its first taste of his relaxed approach to the classics.

Prolonged applause following the gala performance in which U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife, Joan, narrated Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" left no doubt about this national capital's reaction.

The Massachusetts senator, West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel and ex-President Heinrich Luebke were amon the audience relaxing aroun candle-lit dinner tables while pianist Malcolm Frager played Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto.

The crowd warmly applauded the blonde Mrs. Kennedy, dressed in glittering silver lame for her narration of the children's classic. But it was Fiedler who got the biggest hand for his spirited versions of tunes from the musical "Hair" and St. Louis Blues. The cheering, clapping crowd held him on the stage for two encores, ending with a rousing "Stars and Stripes Forever."

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,37

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

FAN FARE FOR MAESTRO

BONN, Germany (AP) — Fire engine fancier Arthur Fielder set the pace for a swinging Boston Pops performance last night by arriving for the concert in a gleaming hook and ladder truck.

"Great ride," the snowy-haired conductor beamed to the laughing and applauding crowd in front of Bonn's Beethoven Hall before disappearing through a side entrance to give West Germany its first taste of his relaxed approach to the classics.

Prolonged applause following the gala performance in which U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife, Joan, narrated Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" left no doubt about this national capital's reaction.

The Massachusetts senator, West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel and ex-President Heinrich Luebke were among the audience.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, was greeted by warm applause from a West German audience when she recited Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" at a gala Boston Pops concert in Bonn. Sen. Kennedy was present. The near capacity audience in Beethoven Hall called for two encores from Arthur Fiedler's musicians. During the day reporters and photographers tagged along after Mrs. Kennedy, asking her to pose in hot pants, but she refused.

The Dallas Morning News
DALLAS, TEXAS
D. 236,267 SUN. 276,380

APR 17 1971 Bulkeller

JOAN KENNEDY took both the spotlight and the stage from her husband, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, when she appeared with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra in Bonn, West Germany. Mrs. Kennedy did the speaking part in a performance of Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," and her husband and others gave her applause sufficient to bring her back for five curtain calls.

GENEVA, N. Y.
TIMES
(ROCHESTER MARKET AREA)
D. 14,000

APR 17 1971 Bulkeller

Nebraska State Journal
LINCOLN, NEBR.
D. 45,366

APR 17 1971 Bulkeller

Roaring Success

Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler and Sen. Edward Kennedy's wife, Joan, both scored roaring successes at a concert in Bonn, Germany. Fiedler conducted music from "Hair", the St. Louis Blues and "Peter and the Wolf," which was narrated by Mrs. Kennedy.

Rochester Times-Union
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 145,808

APR 17 1971 Bulkeller

Applause in Bonn

Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler scored a roaring success in Bonn, Germany, last night, from the time he arrived at a concert until he left after two encores.

Fiedler, a fire engine fancier, arrived at Beethoven Hall in a hook and ladder. He drew cheers and applause with his spirited version of tunes from the musical "Hair" and St. Louis Blues.

Also applauded was Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife, Joan, who narrated Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf."

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Fiedler Scores Double Triumph

BONN, Germany (AP) —

EAGLE-TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
(M&E) 45,050

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Germans Applaud Fiedler

BONN, GERMANY AP — Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler scored a roaring success here Friday night, from the time he arrived at a concert in a fire engine until he finally left after two encores.

Fiedler, a fire engine fancier, arrived at Bonn's Beethoven Hall in a gleaming hook and ladder. He drew cheers and applause with his spirited version of tunes from the musical "Hair" and St. Louis Blues.

Also applauded during the gala performance was Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife, Joan, who narrated Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf."

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(E) 42,315

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Fiedler Scores

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87 000

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

FIEDLER A SUCCESS IN CONCERT AT BONN

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

BONN, Germany (AP) — Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler scored a roaring suc- ... om ... on- he

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(E) 150,082

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

'Pops' Conductor Applauded in Bonn

Bonn, Germany — (AP) — Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler scored a roaring success here Friday night, from the time he arrived at a concert in a fire engine until he finally left after two encores.

Fiedler, a fire engine fancier, arrived at Bonn's Beethoven Hall in a gleaming hook and ladder. He drew cheers and applause with his spirited version of tunes from the musical "Hair" and St. Louis Blues.

Also applauded during the gala performance was Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife, Joan, who narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf."

Joan and Arthur and 'Peter'

Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, narrates a special performance of "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn, West Germany as Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sen. Kennedy was in the audience. (UPI.)

Mrs. Joan Kennedy receives applause from German women as she enters Beethoven Hall in Bonn for performance by the Boston Pops Orchestra. Applause also brought Mrs. Kennedy back for five curtain calls after her narration of Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" accompanied by the Pops. —AP Photo

28

TELEGRAM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(M) 13,000

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

AP Wirephoto

HAVE SOME OF MINE — Famed Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony, offers a sip of beer to a tiny dog, "Napoleon", at a party given Friday by West German foreign minister Walter Scheel. The Boston Symphony is in Bonn on tour.

Boston Pops Conductor A Hit in West Germany

BONN, Germany (AP) — Fire engine fancier Arthur Fiedler set the pace for a swinging Boston Pops performance Friday night by arriving for the concert in a gleaming hook and ladder truck.

"Great ride," the snowy-haired conductor beamed to the laughing and applauding crowd in front of Bonn's Beethoven Hall before disappearing through a side entrance to give West Germany its first taste of his relaxed approach to the classics.

Prolonged applause following the gala performance in which U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife, Joan, narrated Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" left no doubt about this national capital's reaction.

The Massachusetts senator, West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel and ex-President Heinrich Luebke were amon, the audience relaxing aroun candle-lit dinner tables while pianist Malcolm Frager played Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto.

The crowd warmly applauded the blonde Mrs. Kennedy, dressed in glittering silver lame for her narration of the children's classic. But it was Fiedler who got the biggest hand for his spirited versions of tunes from the musical "Hair" and St. Louis Blues. The cheering, clapping crowd held him on the stage for two encores, ending with a rousing "Stars and Stripes Forever."

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,3

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

FAN FARE FOR MAESTRO

BONN, Germany (AP) — Fire engine fancier Arthur Fielder set the pace for a swinging Boston Pops performance last night by arriving for the concert in a gleaming hook and ladder truck.

"Great ride," the snowy-haired conductor beamed to the laughing and applauding crowd in front of Bonn's Beethoven Hall before disappearing through a side entrance to give West Germany its first taste of his relaxed approach to the classics.

Prolonged applause following the gala performance in which U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife, Joan, narrated Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" left no doubt about this national capital's reaction.

The Massachusetts senator, West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel and ex-President Heinrich Luebke were among the audience.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 466,377

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, was greeted by warm applause from a West German audience when she recited Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" at a gala Boston Pops concert in Bonn. Sen. Kennedy was present. The near capacity audience in Beethoven Hall called for two encores from Arthur Fiedler's musicians. During the day reporters and photographers tagged along after Mrs. Kennedy, asking her to pose in hot pants, but she refused.

The Dallas Morning News
DALLAS, TEXAS
D. 236,267 SUN. 276,380

APR 17 1971 Bulletin

JOAN KENNEDY took both the spotlight and the stage from her husband, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, when she appeared with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra in Bonn, West Germany. Mrs. Kennedy did the speaking part in a performance of Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," and her husband and others gave her applause sufficient to bring her back for five curtain calls.

GENEVA, N. Y.
TIMES
(ROCHESTER MARKET AREA)
D. 14,000

APR 17 1971 Bulletin

Nebraska State Journal
LINCOLN, NEBR.
D. 45,366

APR 17 1971 Bulletin

Roaring Success

Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler and Sen. Edward Kennedy's wife, Joan, both scored roaring successes at a concert in Bonn, Germany. Fiedler conducted music from "Hair", the St. Louis Blues and "Peter and the Wolf," which was narrated by Mrs. Kennedy.

Rochester Times-Union
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 145,808

APR 17 1971 Bulletin

Applause in Bonn

Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler scored a roaring success in Bonn, Germany, last night, from the time he arrived at a concert until he left after two encores.

Fiedler, a fire engine fancier, arrived at Beethoven Hall in a hook and ladder. He drew cheers and applause with his spirited version of tunes from the musical "Hair" and St. Louis Blues.

Also applauded was Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife, Joan, who narrated Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf."

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Fiedler Scores Double Triumph

BONN, Germany (AP) —

EAGLE-TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
(M&E) 45,050

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Germans Applaud Fiedler

BONN, GERMANY AP — Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler scored a roaring success here Friday night, from the time he arrived at a concert in a fire engine until he finally left after two encores.

Fiedler, a fire engine fancier, arrived at Bonn's Beethoven Hall in a gleaming hook and ladder. He drew cheers and applause with his spirited version of tunes from the musical "Hair" and St. Louis Blues.

Also applauded during the gala performance was Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife, Joan, who narrated Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf."

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(E) 42,315

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Fiedler Scores

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

FIEDLER A SUCCESS IN CONCERT AT BONN

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

BONN, Germany (AP) — Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler scored a roaring suc- ... om ... on- ... he

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(E) 150,082

APR 17 1971 New England Newsclip

'Pops' Conductor Applauded in Bonn

Bonn, Germany — (AP) — Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler scored a roaring success here Friday night, from the time he arrived at a concert in a fire engine until he finally left after two encores.

Fiedler, a fire engine fancier, arrived at Bonn's Beethoven Hall in a gleaming hook and ladder. He drew cheers and applause with his spirited version of tunes from the musical "Hair" and St. Louis Blues.

Also applauded during the gala performance was Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife, Joan, who narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf."

Joan and Arthur and 'Peter'

Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, narrates a special performance of "Peter and the Wolf" in Bonn, West Germany as Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sen. Kennedy was in the audience. (UPI.)

Mrs. Joan Kennedy receives applause from German women as she enters Beethoven Hall in Bonn for performance by the Boston Pops Orchestra. Applause also brought Mrs. Kennedy back for five curtain calls after her narration of Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" accompanied by the Pops. —AP Photo upi story quotes fiedler on tour success

NEWS
MILFORD, MASS.
(E) 10,250

APR 19 1971 New England Newsclip

Fiedler Says Tour Success

VALLEY NEWS
LEBANON, N. H.
(E) 8,795

APR 19 1971 New England Newsclip

EAGLE
CLAREMONT, N. H.
(E) 6,709

APR 19 1971 New England Newsclip

Fiedler Says European Trip 'Terrific Fun'

BOSTON (UPI) — Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops, said the orchestra's two-week European tour "was terrific fun."

Fiedler, who returned to Boston Saturday, said the orchestra was "warmly welcomed everywhere, and always with good food and drink."

Fiedler conducted concerts in London and Bonn, both to full houses. In Bonn Friday the orchestra was joined by Sen. Edward M Kennedy, D-Mass., and his wife Joan. Mrs. Kennedy narrated "Peter and the Wolf" to the orchestra's accompaniment.

"We had a great time, the Kennedys and I," Fiedler said. there seemed camera-mad over the Kennedys and there were flashbulbs going off all the time."

The orchestra continued its tour without Fiedler, receiving standing ovations Saturday night for playing Austrian music to Vienna fans.

Conductor William Steinberg, the orchestra's musical director, chose Mozart's Lin Symphony and the Seventh Symphony by Gustav Mahler as program for the Vienna concerts.

His choice proved to be a full success, although some Vienna music fans had voiced doubts beforehand. They believed it would be tricky for an American orchestra to play classical Austrian music. After the concert they admitted that they were mistaken.

Arthur Fiedler Says European Tour Great Fun

ENTERPRISE
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
(E) 4,700

APR 19 1971 New England Newsclip

"Tour Fun" Said Fiedler

BOSTON (UPI) — Arthur Fiedler, conductor ...

HOUR NORWALK, CONN.
(E) 22,150

APR 19 1971 New England Newsclip

Boston Pops Tour 'Fun,' Says Fiedler

BOSTON (UPI) — Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops, said the orchestra's two-week European tour "was terrific fun."

Fiedler, who returned to Boston Saturday, said the orchestra was "warmly welcomed everywhere, and always with good food and drink."

Fiedler conducted concerts in London and Bonn, both to full houses. In Bonn Friday the orchestra was joined by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and his wife Joan. Mrs. Kennedy narrated "Peter and the Wolf" to the orchestra's accompaniment.

"We had a great time, the Kennedys and I," Fiedler said. "But, you know, everybody there seemed camera-mad over the Kennedys and there were flashbulbs going off all the time."

The orchestra continued its tour without Fiedler, receiving standing ovations Saturday night for playing Austrian music to Vienna fans.

Conductor William Steinberg, the orchestra's musical director, chose Mozart's Lin Symphony and the Seventh Symphony by Gustav Mahler as program for the Vienna concerts.

His choice proved to be a full success, although some Vienna music fans had voiced doubts beforehand. They believed it would be tricky for an American orchestra to play classical Austrian music. After the concert they admitted that they were mistaken.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

APR 19 1971 New England Newsclip

European Tour 'Fun'

HERALD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
(E) 33,518

APR 19 1971 New England Newsclip

Arthur ... the ... tour without Fiedler, receiving standing ovations Saturday night for playing Austrian music to Vienna fans.

Conductor William Stein-

Boston Pops tour of Europe 'terrific fun,' says Fiedler

BOSTON (UPI) — Arthur ... Boston ...

SENTINEL
KEENE, N. H.
(E) 9,318

APR 19 1971 New England Newsclip

night for playing Austrian music to Vienna fans.

Conductor William Steinberg, the orchestra's musical director, chose Mozart's Lin Symphony and the Seventh Symphony by Gustav Mahler as program for the Vienna concerts.

His choice proved to be a full

Boston Pops In Europe: Terrific Fun

BOSTON (UPI) — Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops ...

TIMES
WOBURN, MASS.
(E) 9,470

APR 19 1971 New England Newsclip

Fiedler Conducts And Joan Reads As Public Applauds

BOSTON (UPI) — Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops, said the orchestra's two-week European tour "was terrific fun."

Fiedler, who returned to Boston Saturday, said the orchestra was "warmly welcomed everywhere, and always with good food and drink."

Fiedler conducted concerts in London and Bonn, both to full houses. In Bonn Friday, the orchestra was joined by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and his wife Joan. Mrs. Kennedy narrated, "Peter and the Wolf" to the orchestra's accompaniment.

"We had a great time, the Kennedys and I," Fiedler said. "But you know, everybody there seemed camera-mad over the Kennedys and there were flashbulbs going off all the time."

The orchestra continued its tour without Fiedler, receiving standing ovations Saturday night for playing Austrian music to Vienna fans.

Conductor William Steinberg, the orchestra's musical director, chose Mozart's Lin Symphony and the Seventh Symphony by Gustav Mahler as program for the Vienna concerts.

His choice proved to be a full success, although some Vienna music fans had voiced doubts beforehand. They believed it would be tricky for an American orchestra to play classical Austrian music. After the concert they admitted that they were mistaken.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,906 SUN. 3,221,849

APR 17 1971

UPI Cablephoto

Reading It Like It Is. Joan Kennedy, wife of the senator from Massachusetts, narrates Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" as Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler directs at Bonn, West Germany. Audience, some of whom paid up to $42 a ticket, demanded two encores. Senator Ted, who flew over especially for the concert, was in the audience.

BLANK PAGE

30

Vienna

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 28 1971
New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY TOURING ABROAD—7 . . . by Michael Steinberg

Vienna concert best of tour

VIENNA — Acoustically and from point of view of atmosphere, the Grosser Musikvereinsaal here — a classic shoebox shape like Symphony Hall, only more ornate — is one of the world's most wonderful concert halls in the world.

That will have had something to do with it. So will the mere fact of being in a city whose associations — Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms, Mahler, Schoenberg, Berg, Webern, to stick only with the biggest names — say a lot to any musicians. Perhaps it was also the need to do something after a somewhat dreary series of experiences in Hanover, Hamburg, and Frankfurt, to say nothing of the Bonn debacle and the anti-musical circus that formed about the presence of Sen. and Mrs. Edward Kennedy (Mrs. Kennedy was the reader for "Peter and the Wolf").

At any rate, for whatever reasons, at the first of its two Vienna concerts Saturday evening, the Boston Symphony was in superb form, and the performance, conducted by William Steinberg, of Mahler's 7th Symphony provided the occasion for the finest playing it has done on this European tour so far and, to my ears, some of the best it has done in recent years.

In a radio interview here, Steinberg represented himself as the man who had introduced Mahler and Bruckner to America. Mahler was not popular here during his lifetime and he still is not. The reception of his 7th, and most problematic, symphony was a bit peculiar. The first movement, where Steinberg makes an intermission, was received so half-heartedly as quite to dismay the orchestra. At the end of the finale, maybe a fifth of the sell-out audience at once rushed for the exits, and it was quite a while before the applause of those that remained was joined by cheering as well, to grow eventually into one of the most enthusiastic, and almost certainly the longest ovation of the tour.

The orchestra arrived from Bonn just in time for the concert. Sunday, those few who could get tickets went to the Spanish Riding School, stunning to see in its own building which is rather on the elegant side of the Boston Garden, "imagine being rehearsal pianist for this company," said Michael Thomas), some went to look at the Breughels and Tintorettos and Titians at the Kunsthistorisches Museums or to a show of Rembrandt etchings at the Albertina, did research on the orthodoxy of Dehmel's vs. Sacher's Sacher-torte recipes, or headed for the suburbs and countryside to explore the Heuriger or new wine.

Some of the fellow-travelers, press and friends and wives, tried the Staatsoper's "Figaro" or will go to "Lohengrin" or "Gounod's "Le medecin malgre lui" (at the Volksoper), though doing laundry or just putting one's feet up is a popular evening recreation just now, too.

Just as this goes into the mail, there is a review on the radio. The script becomes familiar: magnificent orchestra (that's quite something from the narcissistic Viennese), dry Mozart, praise for Steinberg's sanity and sobriety, but disappointment in his failure to fill out the whole expressive frame of the Mahler symphony.

Michael Steinberg, The Globe's music critic, is accompanying the BSO on its European tour.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349
APR 18 1971
New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony Acclaimed in Vienna Concert

Vienna — (AP —The Boston Symphony Orchestra won acclaim here yesterday with a program of music by two Austrian composers, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and Gustav Mahler.

The orchestra came to Vienna from Bonn, West Germany. After a second concert here today, it will go to Rome, for a concert Tuesday.

The opening work yesterday was Mozart's Symphony in C-major, followed by Mahler's Seventh Symphony in E-minor.

Conductor William Steinberg followed Mahler's instructions when he ordered an intermission after the first movement and then followed with the remaining four movements.

The concert was in the packed Vienna Musikverein Hall.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003
APR 19 1971
New England Newsclip

Hub Orchestra Wins Ovations

VIENNA (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra received standing ovations Saturday night for playing Austrian music to Austrian fans.

The orchestra, presently on a European tour, was cheered for 15 minutes by a sold-out house at the first of two concerts.

Conductor William Steinberg, the orchestra's musical director, chose Mozart's Linz Symphony and the Seventh Symphony by Gustav Mahler as program for the Vienna concerts.

His choice proved to be a full success, although some Vienna music fans had voiced doubts before hand.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
APR 28 1971
New England Newsclip

BSO Tour Had Grueling Periods

(Harry Neville, Herald Traveler music critic, today writes about the final days of the BSO tour of Europe. Some members of the BSO are already home while others are due home shortly. His final article on the tour will appear tomorrow.)

By HARRY NEVILLE

VIENNA—Perhaps the most grueling part of the Boston Symphony tour was the four-day period following the Berlin engagement, a period which concluded the German segment of the trip and which saw the orchestra performing on successive days in Hanover, Hamburg, Frankfurt and Bonn. After this came Vienna, and here too there was no respite in the schedule, but the sheer beauty of the city plus the fact of being in one place for two successive days improved everyone's spirits.

AS ANY TOURIST KNOWS, the mechanics of traveling take an enormous toll of physical and mental energy. One has no choice but to spend endless amounts of time in trivial and unrewarding ways: waiting for transportation, going through customs, watching luggage (one unfortunate critic made most of the tour with only his typewriter and the clothes on his back), and enduring the interminable and aggravating bus trips from hotels to airports and then from airports to hotels.

Upon being deposited at his hotel a player sometimes has only a couple of hours in which to eat and nap before leaving again for the concert hall. To preserve his sanity he may elect to sight see or to participate in the constant round of social activity, with the result that he is even more pressed for time.

INEVITABLY, such a hectic schedule affects the quality of the playing. But more and more it became apparent during the trip that the rigors of touring accounted only peripherally, if at all, for the less than spectacular receptions. Not once during the concerts this writer heard did the orchestra play poorly. As individuals the players, in fact, often did remarkably good work.

Just as often, however, the whole did not jell. Partly this was a matter of insoluble acoustical problems, but however optimistically one viewed the situation, the conclusion was inescapable that the orchestra is not regarded here as the fine instrument it used to be. Audiences were generally not bowled over and except for the effusive and florid Stuttgart notices, press reviews have been highly qualified.

THE PLAYERS have sometimes been the subject of lavish praise, as for example with the Hamburg critic who stated that, "in each chair sits a virtuoso." The same critic, however, voiced complaints about interpretations, and it was indeed Conductor William Steinberg's abilities and interpretations that were most often the subject of blunt words.

"Restraint is not his strong point," wrote one of the Vienna critics, "and neither is taste." This after a concert in the Grosser Musikvereinsaal, an extraordinary hall whose mellow acoustics put the orchestra in the best possible light. Counterbalancing such comments were statements such as that of the Hamburg critic who found his "exceptional interpretation" of the Eroica "one of the best live performances of Beethoven I've ever heard. . . ."

32

Herald 4-29-71

Rome BSO Concert Lures Americans

(Last of Two Articles)

By HARRY NEVILLE

Rome, Barcelona and Paris were the final stops of the Boston Symphony's European tour, and from none of these cities have press reports yet become available. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Rome concert, which was held in the Accademia Santa Cecilia. The program included Beethoven's Eighth, Schoenberg's Five Pieces, the Mozart Bassoon Concerto and Ravel's "La Valse."

PERHAPS BECAUSE of the large turn-out of the American colony, which seemed to dominate the audience, there was little evidence of "Latin temperament" in the response. The most passionate behavior of the evening, in fact, was Thomas' rather frenetic gymnastics during "La Valse," after which the elderly Roman matron sitting beside me commented, "Your orchestra plays beautifully, but something will have to be done about that young man."

Steinberg and Thomas conducted a concert apiece in Barcelona, each to warm but not overwhelmingly enthusiastic applause. Perhaps the most memorable thing about the concerts here was the altogether extraordinary decor of the Placio de la Musica: glazed terra cotta tiles in the most vivid greens, blues and reds imaginable.

STEINBERG CONDUCTED the tour's final concert, held in Paris' enormous Palais de Chaillot, every one of whose 4,000 or more seats was filled.

The reception here was quite good, although the orchestra, which played the Mahler Seventh four times during the tour, still sounded as though it were playing it for the first time. It will be interesting to hear what the critic of "Le Figaro," reputedly Europe's toughest, will have to say.

rome

barcelona

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 29 1971 New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY TOURING ABROAD—8 . . . by Michael Steinberg

Barcelona's fantastic music 'palacio'

BARCELONA — Said BSO violinist Harry Ellis Dickson: "Good God, I've never played a concert that began on Thursday and finished on Friday." Concerts here begin at 10:30 p.m., which is to say that they actually begin politely late at something like 10:42, and so it is on toward 1 a.m. when things are actually over. The first of the two nights here, Wednesday, April 22, it was hard on that part of the BSO contingent that had come over on the earlier of two flights from Rome and whose day had started at 6:30.

BSO Press Officer Marvin Schofer had warned us not to tell the taxi driver "Palacio de la Musica," which would seem affected, but to use the Catalan "Palau" instead. I did, and the driver said, "ah, si, el palacio de la musica." Oh well. His non-English and my non-Spanish, to say nothing of non-Catalan, permitting, we had a conversation about where we were going and what for, and during the course of that he asked me how many musicians were in the Boston Symphony. I managed to produce the Spanish for 106, to which his response was to let out a long-drawn soft "oooooo" and to put a finger in each ear as we careened rudderless down the Via Layetana.

Michael Steinberg, The Globe's music critic, accompanied the BSO on its just-ended European tour.

What is sure is that none of us had ever seen a concert hall quite like this Palau. It is Moorish Jugendstill, dated 1910, with stained glass, eccentric wrought-iron rings holding teardrop lights, and sculptures that include a huge Pegasus in the balcony and a representation of the events in Wagner's "Die Walkure." On one side of the stage there is an immense bust of Beethoven, on the other one of a man with a moustache who seemed to have found the middle ground between Albert Schweitzer and Theodore Roosevelt, and who actually turned out to be Luis Millet, the founder of the famous Orfeo Catala chorus. On the stage walls, there are figures of saints and musicians, who begin as mosaics, but at about mid-chest turn into sculptures, reminding me of those screens you stick your head through to get your picture taken at carnivals.

It is crazy and wonderfully gay and festive. To add to the effect, someone had dressed the stage apron in a splendid flower arrangement: tangerine bird-of-paradise in front of the podium (matched by a great spray of tangerine gladiolus behind and above the kettledrums), and then proceeding outward from there symmetrically in both directions, fountains of white carnations.

Acoustically, it is a variable hall. It is everywhere unreverberant, but in the front of the first balcony the sound is really vivid and present and surrounds you nicely. In the boxes it is clear but distant; at the back of the floor, under the balcony, you might as well stay home. String players liked the sound on stage; wind players in general did not, complaining that they could hear each other, but not themselves.

William Steinberg conducted the first concert (Beethoven "Leonore" No. 3, Hindemith Concert Music, Schuller Bagatelles, Brahms 2nd), Michael Tilson Thomas the other (Schumann "Rhenish Symphony, Mozart's Bassoon Concerto and Paris Symphony, and "La Valse.") Something else everyone was in agreement about was the wonderful audience, with its scrupulous good manners and quiet attentiveness during the music and its exciting enthusiasm afterwards. Sherman Walt, the soloist in the Mozart concerto, said he had never experienced such an audience and such an atmosphere in his life, "they breathed with me." He got five recalls ("yes, I played well").

The one review I have seen (of Steinberg's concert in Thursday's "Tele-Express"), and which I read hastily, said, in effect, "Great orchestra and not merely glossy as you might expect from America, sensible though cool conductor who doesn't conduct much, who evidently does most of his work in rehearsal and whose function in concert is that of providing reminders."

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,4[illegible]

APR 28 1971 New England Newsclip

Theater News and Views

Europe Applauds BSO

By R. C. HAMMERICH
Union Music Writer

BARCELONA, Spain (On Tour With the Boston Symphony Orchestra) — In Barcelona, concert-going is a high-style event; 95 per cent of the audience was in dinner dress.

No Yawns

The music began at 10.30 p. m. No one yawned, although a few musicians were seen to be pinching their lips. It ended at 12.45.

In Rome, also, the percentage of black ties and elegant gowns (with an occasional, discretely half-hidden hotpants outfit) was high.

In Vienna, as at most of the German concerts, the audience was sedate and apparently cool, but appreciative as indicated by the length of its applause.

In Rome the listeners were more demonstrative, and were rewarded by an encore, an excerpt from a Tchaikovsky ballet, a rare event.

Once Each

The orchestra has played an encore only once each (depending upon which orchestral historian you consult) in Moscow, San Francisco, Tanglewood and now Rome.

The attending representatives of Stanley Home Products of Westfield (Sanhome), Robert Alsop and his wife, were pleased because Stanhome sponsored the concert in Rome and the first of the two concerts in Barcelona.

The company has large distributing organizations in Spain and Italy.

The five concerts in the three cities were being conducted by William Steinberg (three) and Michael Tilson Thomas, who has been received enthusiastically by every audience he has appeared before.

Mozart, Ravel

The programs have included music played on earlier programs, the pieces drawing the greatest response being Mozart's bassoon concerto with Sherman Walt as soloist, and Ravel's "La Valse."

The musicians were showing a few signs of strain from the rigorous sleep-stealing schedule. But they were continuously making jokes about problems of laundry, money exchanges between countries, traffic jams and language barriers.

Their performances by and large, have been exemplary, but the choice of program has come under criticism in newspapers, and judging by the variable applause, also in the concert halls.

William Steinberg's presentation of Mahler's seventh symphony and pieces by Hindemirth and Gunther Schuller receiving the coolest response whenever they appear.

Chilly London

Except for chilly London, however, whose critics' reports were exaggerated when relayed to America, the critics on the continent have been generally friendly.

And the officials of Deutsche Grammaphon, the company which records the orchestra, may feel that their promotional support in seven German cities has been well spent.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950

APR 25 1971 New England Newsclip

Little Crises Plague BSO Tour

By MARVIN SCHOFER
(Special to Sunday Advertiser)

(The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in Europe. This is the third in a series of articles by a member of the Symphony party.)

BARCELONA — After coping with the airplanes, buses, hotel keys, strange money, and eating habits of six countries, everyone reaches the point where he uses any memory system that works.

"Where are we today?" asks a BSO player writing a postcard. Another player thinks a moment and says, "Ah . . . the Brahms Second Symphony." 'Aha,' the first one says, "Berlin."

Coming on the home stretch of the tour, everybody is happy to say that the programs were usually more entertaining than tragic.

★

London is memorable for the horn player who missed the bus. He got there in time, then remembered his travel clock was still in his hotel room, went back for it, glanced out the window and saw the bus pulling out.

Undaunted, he hopped in a cab. The cabby took him to Heathrow, the main airport. Unfortunately, the plane was leaving from Gatwick, an hour in the opposite direction. Still undaunted, he took a plane on his own to Stuttgart and arrived for the concert.

England is also memorable for the oboe player who couldn't find the stage door at the opening Pops concert in Royal Albert Hall. The Hall is round in shape and around and around he went, finding the steam pipes, the fuse boxes, the central plumbing system, but not the stage.

The music began, heard dimly off in the distance. Nothing to do but keep looking until he found it, then slink onstage under Arthur

Language confused, especially when you have Schaeffer, Schofer, Schneider and Snyder all in one hotel, all on the BSO list. Schofer got Schaeffer's passport and Schneider got paged at the airport because Snyder forgot to turn in his hotel key. Fiedler's fierce eye.

★

Only in Rome was there the threat that a general strike might keep the orchestra from arriving in Madrid for its first concert.

It turned out that it was only the streetcar operators and milk dealers who planned to strike the next morning.

So, the orchestra got off on time, though not without minor crisis. Some went to St. Peter's for a Papal audience but the audience went far beyond the time they expected it to end.

With minutes to spare, the group arrived at the hotel (with the bus waiting to leave for the airport) only to be told that the hotel porters had gone on strike. Everyone deshed to his room to get his baggage, by which time the strike had been settled.

"Very Italian," said Patsy Cardillo, Boston Pops' clarinetist, "with a three minute hotel strike and an audience with the Pope. I'll never have to ask where we are. It's got to be Rome."

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 7[illegible]

APR 24 1971 New England Newsclip

Barcelona Lauds Boston Symphony

BARCELONA, Spain (AP) — Newspapers Friday called performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here as "the best concerts that a Barcelona audience has heard in many years."

The Boston Symphony played Wednesday and Thursday at the Barcelona Palau de la Musica. The daily La Vanguardia said "The first concert showed all the magnificence of this orchestra, conducted by such a great maestro as William Steinberg."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

APR 24 1971 New England Newsclip

Spaniards Hail BSO

BARCELONA, Spain (AP) — Friday newspapers hailed performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here as "the best concerts that a Barcelona audience has heard in many years."

The Boston Symphony played Wednesday and Thursday at the Barcelona Palau de la Musica.

34

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 581,160
MAY 9 1971
New England Newsclip

Photo Europe '71

A steady hand captures City of Light

Part of the enjoyment of travel is recording the trip on film. Globe photographer Ed Fitzgerald, just back from a European tour, begins a new series offering tips for camera carrying tourists.

By Ed Fitzgerald
Globe Staff

PARIS —. If you have trouble pronouncing Palis de Chaillot don't worry about it, just ask the Parisian cabbie for the Place Trocadero any evening and make sure your camera is loaded with high speed color (ASA 125) film balanced for artificial light or black and white (rated at ASA 400) and tell the driver not to wait. You'll be too busy getting some great photos of the "City of Light" where the Palais de Chaillot overlooks the Seine backed up by the flood lighted Eiffel Tower. The illuminated fountains the twinkling city lights and hopefully (if you time your visit right) a weak twilight afterglow in the sky just enough to make the almost ugly Eiffel Tower beautiful.

It would be easy to suggest the use of a tripod but I can't think of anything more awkward for a traveler to carry in a carefully budgeted allowance of personal gear. You could improvise like the Globe's man in Paris who was on a European assignment with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as they performed Mahler's Symphony No. 7 in the Concert Hall of the Palais de Chaillot. The 35mm Leica camera with a 28mm wide angel lens and loaded with high speed Tri-X film was pressed against a plate glass window in the darkened lobby of the Palais and a series of four exposures ranging from one full second to one eighth of a second were squeezed out giving a good range of highly printable negatives. The aperture of the lens was set at F3.5.

Most tourists and there were probably 50 or more were resting their cameras on a perfectly situated granite wall high above the fountains. Exposure information was traded back and forth in several languages and all shook their heads when rank beginners popped flashbulbs at a scene that could only be photographed by natural light.

If you have trouble finding a cab to take you back to your hotel, head for the nearby "Metro" entrance at the Trocadero and keep your camera at the ready, but . . . that's another story.

paris

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
APR 28 1971
New England Newsclip

BSO in Rome, Barcelona, Paris

By Louis Snyder

Paris

The grand salle of the Palais Chaillot was the scene of the Boston Symphony's final concert on its three-week European tour. Most of its nearly 4,000 seats were filled, and the orchestra's particular feeling of tension about this audience, with its reputation for being enthusiastic only when pleased, almost crackled in the air.

The program was formidable — Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, Bach's Suite in B minor with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as flute soloist, and the lengthy Mahler Seventh Symphony, last played for two audiences in Vienna's golden glowing Musikvereinsaal. William Steinberg was the conductor, and he and the musicians were greeted warmly. So far so good.

Whether it was Paris in the spring, the sum total of emotions about the tour, the unforgettable visit that morning (at the invitation of Admiral Schweitzer and his wife, Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer) to the beautiful home at Louveciennes of the late BSO music director, Charles Munch, or a combination of all three, the orchestra played one of its most eloquent concerts. The Beethoven was electric, the Bach stylishly refined, with Mrs. Dwyer as its heroine, and the Mahler, which can make even Mahlerites restive, a remarkable demonstration of the individual musical prowess of the Bostonian aggregation. All of this was not lost on the Parisian listeners, who responded with the kind of voluminous waves of sound every performer likes to hear.

Spanish sequel

There had also been warm reaction to the two Barcelona concerts, held in what must be one of Europe's most spectacularly unusual concert halls, the Palacio de la Musica (Palau in Catalan). This extraordinary auditorium, Symphony Hall's junior by two years, is a wonderland of shining ceramic pillars, stained-glass panels, plaster-sculptured medallions, trees, horses, and allegorical figures, which turn up overhead as well as onstage and along the side walls. And excellent acoustics (perhaps attributable to all these uneven surfaces?), which don't always turn up in much more recent buildings. Mr. Steinberg was the conductor of the first program, in which Brahms's Second Symphony won greater favor than the Hindemith and Schuller items.

The next night, Barcelona took Michael Tilson Thomas to its collective heart, and also reserved a special place for Sherman Walt for his playing of the Mozart Bassoon Concerto. Somehow, Mr. Thomas and his Barcelona listeners seemed to have found a common denominator of understanding in Schumann's Third Symphony and the "Paris" Symphony of Mozart, so that when he danced his way (happily a little more restrainedly than within the past week) through Ravel's "La Valse," they rewarded him and his colleagues with a full-fledged ovation. These were warming experiences, since the chilly rain in Spain fell on Barcelona during both days of the orchestra's visit, much to the chagrin of those who had looked forward to sunbaked beaches on the Costa Brava.

Previously, in Rome's Accademia Santa Cecilia auditorium (the larger one in the shadow of St. Peter's), Mr. Thomas had won his audience too, but the process was slower. Perhaps Beethoven's Eighth as a starter, followed by Schoenberg's Cinque Pezzi per Orchestra (which fell on deaf Roman ears) is not in the tradition of Rome's rather sporadic concertgoing. However, the Mozart-Walt Concerto, and "La Valse" brought things back in balance, with the younger element of the audience making its appreciation known. The "bis" which followed the Ravel performance brought forth an all but tradition-breaking occurrence—an encore by the orchestra. It was the Mazurka from Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake," and it sent the Romani happily home across the Tevere. This, like the first of the Barcelona concerts, was sponsored by "Stanhome Spa" (Stanley Home Products), which can thus take credit for the first BSO audience bonus within the memory of most of its players.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,4[illegible]
APR 30 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Orchestra's Tour Ends in Odd Concert Halls

By R. C. HAMMERICH

Union-Republican Music Writer

PARIS (On Tour With the Boston Symphony Orchestra) — Boston's orchestra ended its 16-concert, 12-city, six-country, 12,000 - mile, 23-day tour with concerts in a couple of odd concert halls.

High-Camp

The Palacio de la Musica in Barcelona must be the most over-decorated high-camp auditorium in existence, and the 3000 seat auditorium used in Paris is far underground.

The Palais de Chaillot in Paris is as far from the Seine on the Right Bank as the Eiffel Tower is on the Left, and directly opposite, which is to say they are close.

It is a memorial consisting, above ground, of two large curved buildings placed end-to-end so that they form nearly a half circle enclosing terraced grass and promenades leading down to the river.

Acoustically Bright

Between the ends of the buildings is a large paved plaza the underside of which is the ceiling of the concert hall which is reached by entering one of the buildings and going down what seems to be a few thousand stairs.

It is an acoustically bright hall, and its audience gave conductor William Steinberg an enthusiastic reception.

There were two performances given in Barcelona (which was having its first two days of rain in nearly a month), one led by Steinberg and the other by Michael Tilson Thomas.

Deluxe Bordello

The auditorium, built in 1905, is characterized by a decor which might be described as a mixture of moorish casbah, Prince Edward drawing room and deluxe New Orleans bordello.

The columns that hold up the two narrow balconies are covered with fine, brightly-colored, ceramic mosaic; the proscenium is a soaring sculpture of life-size figures, prancing horses and jungle-thick plant life; the side walls are translucent, colored-glass panels lighted from behind; the curved wall backing the stage platform has painted shapes that grow more life-like as the eye moves upward until the shapes spring from the walls in the form of sculptured maidens leaning over the back rows of the orchestra as the figureheads of Clipper ships lean over the ocean.

But that's just the beginning; the hall is the most grandiose ever seen by most of the orchestra members. It is by far the most ornate of those the orchestra appeared in on this tour.

In Paris, although the hall didn't offer the entertainment of that in Barcelona, its underground status contributed a touch of oddity to the atmosphere, and the orchestra member were buoyed by the knowledge that they were going home or on vacation the next day.

The tour had taken its toll. The musicisns were tired and their mood was quiet. Almost two dozen who had planned to stay in Europe for their vacation week changed their minds and took the first charter plane home the day after the Paris concert.

The rest, nearly 100, mostly with wives, dispersed over Europe with plans to regroup a week later and fly home in the second charter plane.

The orchestra's chamber players (the concertmaster and the other first-chair players), on the other hand, faced another week of concertizing in Europe and then a few concerts in New England before they take a month off to rejuvenate for the Tanglewood season.

"This Hall Is Nutty"

The rest of the orchestra, after a week, was scheduled for the Pops and Esplanade series in Boston. It wasn't scheduled for a serious vacation until the end of the eight weeks of Tanglewood concerts.

The players had had enough of touring after 23 days. Their concern for architectural acoustics was becoming touched by irritation (i.e., this trombone player's voice: "How did it sound out there? This hall is nutty. I couldn't hear the fiddles where I was.")

Most were tired, a bit disappointed in the quality of their music even in the face of enthusiastic response nearly everywhere, and were past ready to go home.

They were subdued on the flight back; there were no more jokes such as . . . "I'm afraid to open my suitcase. My shirts have started to shout 'Ring Around the Collar' at me."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 30 1971
New England Newsclip

Paris responds to Mahler's 7th

PARIS — Since London three weeks ago and at each stage of the Boston Symphony's tour, I have heard dire predictions of the disaster the orchestra would be courting by playing the Mahler 7th here. Wrong. The huge Palais de Chaillot was sold out, and audience response to the long concert, which also included Beethoven's 3d "Leonore" Overture and Bach's B minor Suite with Doriot Anthony Dwyer as flute soloist (done without repeats, obviously more in the interests of mercy than of Bach), was very warm.

The orchestra seemed to think of this as one of its cleaner jobs on the tour. I think that is right (in spite of some tired lips in the brass department), but I found it hard to tell much else about the performance because the sound, though clear, is cold and all comes from directly in front so that one is not really drawn into the music.

For plunging staircases and corridors into near total darkness to punish latecomers (much of the lateness being caused by the inefficiency of the box office staff), for the bad manners of his ushers, for the bar that serves only Coke and beer with one girl to take care of a 30-foot counter, for the ugliness of the fanfare with which the audience is summoned after intermission, the house manager of the Palais de Chaillot merits special mention.

Before the performance, most of the Boston Symphony went to Louveciennes to visit the home of the late Charles Munch, the orchestra's music director, 1949-62. The hostess was the pianist Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, the conductor's niece and a frequent BSO guest soloist during his tenure. The whole Orchestre de Paris, Munch's last orchestra, was there also, and BSO players returned to Paris with reports of a splendid art collection and of the most sumptuously provided party of the tour.

The evening concert was followed by a party at the residence of US Ambassador Watson. Sunday (April 25) a bit less than half the orchestra flew to Boston, others taking their week's vacation — the opening week of Pops is played by Boston freelancers — in Europe, some visiting relatives and friends, others going just to sit in Normandy or Mallorca or somewhere, and with a good many not really sure what they would do. Bassoonist Sherman Walt said, "Well, my tour's half over now," and for the principals, who are members of the BSO Chamber Players, another three weeks with concerts in four countries lay ahead. The last party—everyone has lost count—was scheduled for Orly airport, the host for I think the 7th time being Deutsche Grammophon.

End of series. Michael Steinberg, The Globe's music critic, accompanied the BSO on its tour of Europe.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

APR 20 1971

New England Newsclip

general comment on the european tour

BSO European Tour—Many Miles for Many Reasons

By Jon Lehman

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this week will be the final phase of a three-week European tour which has been three or four years in the planning and for which the official cost estimate is something more than a quarter of a million dollars.

Tonight, the orchestra, led by associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, plays a concert in the Academia Santa Cecilia (named for the patron saint of music) in Rome. The program is a varied one: Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Mozart's Bassoon Concerto with the orchestra's solo bassoonist, Sherman Walt, and Ravel's "La Valse."

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS — a principle beneficiary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's European tour.

Showing Off

The program shows off many of the Boston orchestra's special strengths, something you certainly want to do when displaying yourself abroad.

The Eighth Symphony, not overly familiar for a Beethoven work, will make good use of the depth and dexterity in the orchestra's sections; the Schoenberg, a musicians' favorite from the 20th century repertoire, has been performed frequently and well at home and will argue the Bostonians are not bound to musical tradition; the bassoon concerto is a showcase for one of the brilliant group of first chair players who go a long way toward accounting for the orchestra's greatness, and the Ravel piece acknowledges a tie to the years of Charles Munch's directorship, during which the orchestra's previous tours were made.

Hot Property

But the program's greatest strength, at least so far as the audience and the foreign critics are concerned, should be the chance to see and hear the work of Michael Tilson Thomas, the phenomenal young associate conductor who is the hottest box office property an American orchestra has had since Leonard Bernstein's first years.

Thomas gained stardom last year when, at age 25, he took over in the middle of a Carnegie Hall concert from the ailing William Steinberg. He has ridden a wave of enthusiasm since, fueled by such exciting conducting as in the recently recorded Ives' "Three Places in New England" and Ruggles' "Sun-treader.'

The chance to show off some of its strengths abroad, certainly a necessary support for the orchestra's claim to rank among the world's finest, is of course one of the principal reasons for going on tour. There are some other benefits of going abroad, such as the fact that it's undeniably good for player morale. In addition, touring gives the musicians and conductors a chance to hear themselves in different concert halls and to make new contacts.

The 1971 European tour, which falls in the orchestra's 90th anniversary season, is the first time in 10 years the BSO has been abroad. (In 1961, Charles Munch took the orchestra to Asia and Australia, after having toured Europe in 1952 and 1956.)

Logistical Feat

Taking a symphony orchestra on an international tour is an exercise in logistics which sometimes seems to rival the planning for the Normady invasion. The full entourage amounts to about 230 people, at a cost of about $1,000 apiece; there are about 14 tons of baggage, including the orchestra's instruments and scores. There is a front-office staff of half a dozen, including tour managers, escorts, an advance man and a press officer.

And finally, the orchestra is being accompanied by about 40 of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and the Friends of Music at Tanglewood who are paying $3,000 apiece for the chance to combine a European vacation with some civic-minded concertgoing. In all, members of the two groups of Friends (who have helped raise the orchestra's money for several decades) are underwriting $45,000-$50,000 of the trip's cost.

Funding Change

That is one of the significant differences between this year's European tour and the previous symphony trips under Munch. The previous tours, taken in the heyday of the cultural exchange period, were sponsored by the U.S. State Department. This time aroumd the orchestra is having to find other ways of financing its travel.

Apart from the share of box office receipts (which should be relatively large as ticket prices for most of the concerts are high by European standards) and the contributions of the Friends already mentioned, there are two other apparent sources of funds for the tour. One is the orchestra's new German recording company, Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft, and the other is the group of so-called corporate sponsors which the orchestra has snared.

There are three corporate sponsors: the Gillette Company of Boston, the Massachusetts Port Authority and the Stanley Home Products Company of Westfield. Although everyone is understandably reluctant to discuss the amounts the corporate sponsors are subscribing, each is sponsoring two concerts; between them, they are supporting slightly more than a third of the 16 concerts played by the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops on the tour.

Hard Work

So much for the statistics of going on tour. For the musicians themselves, it is hard work. After an easy beginning in London, where they played two concerts in four days, there have followed two weeks in which they averaged close to a concert a day — a schedule the more grueling by virtue of being spread through nine cities in three countries.

But by far the bulk of the appearances so far (in fact, half the total of all concerts on the tour) have been in Germany, testimony to the importance of the Deutsche Grammophon connection in shaping the tour.

Unusual Move

Indeed, it seems questionable whether there would have been a tour at all this year if it hadn't been for the Deutsche Grammophon recording contract. It was just one year ago that the orchestra, which had previously recorded for RCA Victor, effected the switch to the German firm. It is unusual for a European recording firm, even one with Deutsche Grammophon's reputation for high-quality sound, to take on the American competition on their home ground by signing an exclusive contract with a major American orchestra. So, Deutsche Grammophon has been promoting aggressively, and it can be safely assumed that DGG's contributions to the tour amount to more than the flossy free-of-charge souvenir booklets given away at the concerts and the free tour of the recording plant for the orchestra party.

In fact, Deutsche Grammophon's point of view is one of the few from which a tour makes much sense at this time for the Boston Symphony. After you get past the thought that it's a nice change for the players between the end of the home symphonic season and the beginning of the spring Pops concerts, there seem to be almost as many drawbacks as advantages to an international junket at this point.

First, the past few years have been a time of increasing financial squeeze for cultural institutions, the Boston Symphony among them. For several years, the orchestra has had to spend some of its endowment each year to meet operating costs. While it may be true that an increase in prestige may lead to an increase in income, it seems ironic that it's apparently easier to raise the money for a foreign excursion than for domestic programs.

Second, the Boston Symphony has been undergoing a period of strain since the abrupt departure of music director Erich Leinsdorf in 1969. Although William Steinberg, who remains music director at Pittsburgh, consented to take the Boston job in 1969 on an interim basis, the continuing commitment of his time in Pittsburgh, as well as his uncertain health, have made a less than ideal situation for the orchestra.

Although Michael Thomas has blossomed early, and although the musicians' reflexes certainly are being stretched by the succession of guest conductors (many of them in the first rank of the world's younger conductors), still the wonder is that the orchestra is not coming apart at the seams.

Mr. Steinberg has already asked the trustees to relieve him of his position as music director after next season so that he can devote more time to the Pittsburgh Orchestra. Therefore, it seems doubly odd that the orchestra is being displayed abroad, for what may well be the last time in a long time, led by a conductor who has no permanent hand in shaping its musical personality. Although spokesmen for the symphony discount any suggestion that the tour may make it seem to Europeans that Boston is Mr. Steinberg's orchestra, the tenor of the reviews, in London, at any rate, lent weight to that notion.

Chamber Praised

One less heralded benefit of the 1971 tour is the increasing awareness on the other side of the Atlantic of the exceptional skill of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, who comprise the solo players of each section in the orchestra. To mark the orchestra's arrival in London two weeks ago, music critic Edward Greenfield of the Guardian of London reviewed a batch of Boston records, including some by the Chamber Players. Among his remarks:

"I have rarely if ever heard so satisfying a performance of the much-recorded B flat Trio of Schubert as that given by Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's leader; Jules Eskin, principal cellist, and Claude Frank, the pianist (RCA LSB 4014). You have to go back to 1927 and the performance of Cortot, Thibaud and Casals to find an opening cello solo in the slow movement to match the hushed beauty of Eskin's, and in the finale the Bostonions with superb point actually outshine those old masters "

Boon to Thomas

But one of the tour's principal beneficiaries, from any point of view, must certainly be Michael Tilson Thomas. For him, the tour comes at the end of a year in which he has received constant praise for his conducting — both in concert and on records — in which he was chosen Musician of the Year by the magazine Musical America and in which he has accepted the appointment as musical director of the Buffalo Symphony (while keeping his ties with Boston).

Added to that now is international exposure as conductor of one of the world's great orchestras. Indeed, it seems that every move Michael Thomas or the Boston Symphony make enhances the possibility that he may someday occupy the office whose former tenants include Koussevitsky, Munch and Leinsdorf. And that possibility is one that no one in the Boston Symphony organization is doing much to discount.

B.S.O. on tour in Europe

BY ROY HEMMING

Whom do you believe? The English and German music critics who tore some of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1971 European tour concerts to shreds? Or the audiences who applauded and cheered and in many places stamped their feet or clapped in rhythm the way Europeans express their enthusiasm?

As with so many things today, the answer lies somewhere in-between, as I discovered traveling with the Orchestra for about two-thirds of its tour.

Let's take some of the press reports first, since that was the only guide many people back home had while the orchestra was away.

The English critics were especially rough. "I have rarely heard a more unpleasant noise from a so-called international orchestra," wrote a London Daily Mail critic about the opening London concert. "There was efficiency, even brilliance, but no real love in the interpretations," wrote the London Times' man. "Dispiriting," "distinctly stodgy," and "not much that was positive to respond to" were some of the other quotes the Associated Press sent out over its wire services summarizing the London reviews.

In Germany, the reviews were friendlier, but not entirely so. One Berlin critic referred to "this monumental musical machine from America." Another noted that "the orchestra played so well that (conductor) Steinberg was able to briefly refrain from signaling the beat." Still another, calling the performance of the Beethoven 5th symphony's finale "incomparable," took a jab at the Berlin Philharmonic's chief by saying: "Too bad Herr von Karajan was not there to hear it."

BSO Music Director William Steinberg drew more mixed comments than did the orchestra — from "there was life and substance in his music" and "exactly right tempi" to "methodical," "rigid," and "impersonal." A Vienna critic was perhaps the roughest of all on Steinberg: "Discretion is not his strong point. Neither is taste."

Whether one accepts the reviews as fair and honest, or just the opposite, there is no denying that audiences throughout the tour greeted the orchestra warmly. As the applause and cheers resounded in London's jammed Royal Albert Hall at the end of the Boston Pops' opening concert, Arthur Fiedler remarked backstage: "I've conducted here a lot, but I've never heard anything quite like that!"

Neither had some of the rest of us. Actually, the standing-room-only audience of about 5500 that night had seemed cordial but reserved during the first two parts of the concert — which consisted of classical standards. It was not until Fiedler reached the concert's third section — with its medley from the rock musical Hair (a current London theatre hit), Kurt Weill's "Mack the Knife," the Beatles' "Yesterday," and the Glenn Miller-inspired "St. Louis Blues March" — that you could sense the electricity building up in the audience. By the final encore (Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever") there were few signs of English reserve left anywhere in the huge hall. An Englishman vigorously applauding at the table next to me leaned over and said: "Our boys just couldn't play it like that. Too inhibited, you know."

In several cities, seats behind the orchestra or just to the side overlooking the stage were filled with young listeners in their late teens or early 20s — some of the most intent young listeners I've ever seen. They seemed especially enthusiastic at the concerts conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas. In Wuppertal the eruption of foot-stamping and cheering behind the orchestra at the end of Ravel's La Valse actually startled some of the orchestra members who had forgotten there were listeners behind them.

I continually heard listeners speaking in awe of the technical qualities and versatility of the BSO. "Such sound!" I heard them saying again and again — in London, Berlin, Hamburg, Hannover, you-name-the-place.

Horn-player Harry Shapiro offered this analysis: "We make our nuances more definite than do European orchestras. In other words, when it's fortissimo, we really play loud. And when it's pianissimo, it's really soft. I've noticed in the European orchestras I've heard that they take it easier at both ends of the nuance scale."

But even many of those Europeans who applauded the quality of the BSO's playing were as divided as the critics about what the BSO was playing. The tour repertory included the Mahler 7th symphony, Schoenberg's 5 Pieces for Orchestra, Hindemith's Konzertmusik, and a number of other works that certainly don't qualify as either generally "accepted" concert works or as BSO "showpieces." Only two works — the Beethoven Eroica and Ravel's La Valse — had any significant identity with the orchestra through recordings, and even those were identified with conductors other than the tour conductors.

There were some, to be sure, who found the programs adventurous. Many more made no secret of the fact that they wished the orchestra was playing something else — no matter how excited they were at just having a rare chance to hear the orchestra in person. Ironically, when the orchestra did play a "safe" all-Beethoven program (the popular 3rd and 5th symphonies no less), they did so in Berlin — and earned more than a few grumbles from those who said they get enough of that diet from Karajan and his local Philharmonic.

Quite a few of the orchestra members also grumbled openly about the programs, although many of them asked me not to quote them by name. One who said he didn't mind being quoted was tubist Chester Schmitz. "Frankly, I've been disappointed in our tour programs," he declared. "The choice of pieces do not show us off as a great orchestra. Because of this, the standard of performance cannot be as high as we hoped."

One player, requesting he not be named, said: "If anything can insure the success of a tour, it's the choice of programs. It seems a pity we've come so far, and that so much money is being spent, to play such weak programs."

BSO Personnel Manager William Moyer (doubling on the tour as a trombonist) agreed that "many of the men are not very warm to the programs we're playing. Some are openly disheartened by the choice of pieces. They wonder how some of these choices were ever made, especially for our first European tour in 15 years. Frankly, I don't understand how it happened, since the management and trustees of this orchestra are usually so perceptive and far-seeing."

Moyer stressed, however, that in most other respects orchestra morale was high. "I think people are most happy about the physical arrangements of this tour compared to past tours. All the transportation arrangements have been nicely handled. Travel has been easier than before, and it's a nice time of year to travel. Oh, sure, there's been a bag or two lost temporarily, but no serious hitches."

The full entourage added up to about 230 people. More than half, of course, was the orchestra itself. There were also a dozen staff members (including the manager, the stage manager, the press director, the associate manager acting as advance man along the tour route, and a doctor). Another half-dozen reporters and a photographer were along representing the Boston and national press, plus a radio producer-engineer-commentator team from Boston's WKGB.

The remaining 40 travelers were Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood who underwrote nearly $50,000 of the trip's cost — and got themselves the chance to combine their civic-mindedness with a European vacation.

Unlike the BSO's two previous European tours, this one was not sponsored by the U.S. State Department, so the orchestra had to find new ways to pay the bill. Three corporate sponsors — the Gillette Company of Boston, the Stanley Home Products Company of Westfield, and the Massachusetts Port Authority — underwrote several concerts each. And the BSO's new recording company, the West German-based Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft, contributed significantly.

Deutsche Grammophon also set up press conferences along the tour routes to introduce Steinberg, Fiedler, Thomas, concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, and others, and to promote its first Boston Symphony and Boston Pops releases. The theme was made loud and clear: a quality orchestra of international stature was now recording exclusively for a quality record manufacturer of international stature. If for no other reason, the BSO tour at this particular time in Europe — no matter how controversial the programs, and perhaps because of them — had long-range value in building new friends and new audiences at a time when the U.S. classical record business is in sharp decline.

When they weren't performing or rehearsing, the players did as much sightseeing as they could. One of the most indefatigable was 76-year-old Arthur Fiedler. At one point, Michael Tilson Thomas, now all of 26, turned to Fiedler and said: "I'm glad I'm not making this trip with you five years ago. I'm just about able to keep up with you now."

There were more women players along on the tour this time than before (including two substitute cellists), and several of them found their male counterparts friendlier on the tour than back in Symphony Hall. Violinist Marylou Speaker put it this way: "When I first joined the orchestra, some of the men wouldn't even talk to me. They had the attitude that their male domain was being invaded. Now we have seven women players. The men have been absolutely wonderful to us on this trip, much friendlier than in Boston. I'm grateful for that."

In Berlin, I joined Fiedler, Thomas, BSO Concert Manager Mary Smith, and several others for a close-up look at the Berlin Wall, which will be 10 years old this summer. I asked Fiedler what his thoughts were as he scanned the Wall at the spot where it cuts off the famous Brandenburg Gate from the West.

"The whole thing is rather depressing to me," Fiedler answered, "because I've lived in this city — from 1910 to 1915. I've always remembered Berlin as a gay city, a beautiful city. I took a walk yesterday to see the house where I used to live. There's another building there now."

Michael Tilson Thomas seemed ever more grim-faced as he looked at the Berlin Wall. "I've seen it many times before," he commented. "It's just one of those total, irrational absurdities of recent history. It's a terrible muisance for the people who live here, families separated and so on. I have friends who go through hell just trying to get across for a day, people in the various opera houses and theatre houses in the East. It's all so difficult and so stupid."

"Would you accept an engagement in East Germany if it were offered you?" I asked Thomas.

"Yes," he replied. "There are some marvelous companies there. In some places there's a lot of experimentation going on. There's a kind of fantastic devotion to the serious arts where there's very little other source of expression or entertainment."

Did he think cultural exchanges between East and West helped to ease the kind of tensions and divisions the Berlin Wall symbolized? Thomas paused. "I hope so," was all he answered as we walked back to our car.

Music World

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227
APR 13 1971

A Responsibility To Living Music

Robert Commanday

WHEN are the major symphony orchestras going to stop patronizing and pandering to established local tastes when they go on tour? When are they going to assert their responsibility towards the living current of new music and the shaping of musical taste? Which orchestra is finally going to come up with a point of view that is searching, comprehensive and in the fullest sense, artistic?

Among the worst offenders have been the most famous and solvent of our symphonies, the so-called Big Five, particularly when on tour. The Boston Symphony is the latest case. A recent press release from the BSO proudly announced its 90th anniversary European tour, 16 concerts (April 7-24), through England and the Continent, under William Steinberg, Michael Tilson Thomas and Arthur Fiedler (for some Pops concerts), diplomatic receptions and high honors everywhere, a cost of a quarter of a million dollars.

★ ★ ★

READING further, one discovers that Boston and its Orchestra, once the champion of new and American music, have more reason to be self-critical than proud. It lists 22 of the most obvious, standard works, and only two American compositions (Walter Piston's Second Symphony and Gunther Schuller's Five Bagatelles—Boston composers, at least), plays a medley from "Hair" and Handy's "St. Louis Blues March" for the Pops. (The Symphony's Chamber Players will include two works by Piston and Riegger on its own little tour after the Symphony is finished.)

As if all Europe needs to hear from America is another Beethoven cycle, more Brahms, Bruckner, et. al., plus further proof of the greatness of the BSO as a virtuoso instrument. At $250,000, that's fancy showcasing.

THE U.S. Department of State's Cultural Presentation Division expects artists touring abroad under its auspices to offer at least one major American work on every program. Such expensive orchestral tours as this do not receive direct governmental assistance during these austerity budget years. The government however, relies on the "private sector" voluntarily to represent the creative phase of American life. This is little enough to expect from major organizations which indirectly, through grants and tax exemptions on gifts and income, receive extensive help.

Sad to say, Boston is not an exceptional case. The San Francisco Symphony was guilty of the same thing in its Japan tour, and most other touring orchestras as well. Tours made within this country are no better, by either domestic or foreign orchestras.

Eugene Ormandy will bring his Philadelphia Orchestra here on May 22 playing Bartok's Two Portraits (1910), Mozart's 9th and Prokofiev's Fifth Symphonies. Viva America!

The Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra will soon visit the west coast and South America, and on occasion, will perform one of three works by Dutch composers from its touring repertoire. For its local appearance (Berkeley, May 1) Badings, Von Baaren or Heppener are omitted however, in favor of Mozart and Mahler. Viva the Netherlands in Berkeley!

★ ★ ★

AT THIS turning point in history, many aspects of music are changing. Not the least of these is the role of the major organizations. Concurrently, it has become evident that government support of the ants must increase. It follows then, that the viewpoint-making mechanisms of these organizations must also change.

The Musical Directors are nominally responsible for programming policies. In practice, especially on tour and for recordings it is not so simple. The all-important Orchestra Managers, (in Boston's case, Thomas Perry), outside managements (Sol Hurok, Columbia Artists) and key board members influence the decisions mightily. The Point of View becomes a very misty, complicated pragmatic policy rationalized in a hundred ways.

★ ★ ★

WHAT is needed first, is a more decisive assertion of artistic policy and philosophy by the Musical Director. This assumes he will give his primary attentions to his symphony and not barnstorm all over the world on guest engagements.

Second, statesmanship is required of managers who must be throughly trained in music. Their role should be made more public. They should be more sensitive and responsive to the musical currents.

Third, if Federal funds are going to be used to help support the arts organizations, the taxpayer has every right to expect a broader representation on the governing boards. Governance must no longer be the sole privilege of private patrons. The boards should include composers, performing artists, scholars and others trained in the arts. Their advice should be brought to bear on policy.

Such a professional representation is not now and never has been true of the 75-member San Francisco Board of Governors, to be specific, which now includes only two or three musically trained persons. I doubt that the case is much different elsewhere. If we are to support a "Partnership for the Arts" campaign for increased Federal help, then let the partnership be real.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
MAY 4 1971
New England Newsclip

Modules and modulations

Touring with 200—and staying friends

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first European tour in 15 years, music critic Louis Snyder went along. Here he tells what it is like to travel to 12 cities in a party of 200, with concert clothes stashed in instrument cases and everything precision engineered to get them to the hall on time.

By Louis Snyder

Music critic of The Christian Science Monitor

SOMEONE ONCE SAID THAT THE EASIEST WAY to make enemies of friends is to travel with them. Here is news for that someone:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, its "Friends" organization, some of its staff, a number of its wives, and a sprinkling of press — totaling at least 200 — have just completed a 12,000-mile tour of Europe.

Between April 2 and 25, the full orchestra played 16 concerts in 12 cities in 6 countries. And at the informal reception given by U.S. Ambassador Arthur K. Watson following the concluding concert in Paris, musicians, Friends, and other BSO followers were acting like the happiest of families, even half regretting that the whirlwind three weeks was at an end.

Perhaps the trip that caused that someone's cynical remark had not been planned, as the symphony's was, two or three years in advance. Perhaps, too, the care required to move so large a group with its instruments results in closer attention to detail than the casual traveler expends on himself.

In any case, except for a predictable number of mishaps and schedule alterations, the BSO's going and coming was amazingly smooth.

Music director William Steinberg, who conducted nine of the concerts, was returning to Europe at the head of a great orchestra to scenes of many past associations, while associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas led the BSO in five cities where his newfound reputation had seemingly preceded him.

And internationally known Arthur Fiedler, who has conducted almost everywhere, was on hand to introduce the Boston Pops Orchestra (the BSO without its first-desk players) to European audiences for the first time in London and Bonn.

Handle with care!

Musicians understandably are very solicitious about their instruments—flutists, clarinetists, oboists, and violinists can carry their own—so particular care must be taken to provide safe passage for cellos, percussion impedimenta, double basses, tuba, harps, and brass.

Each player is provided with storage space for his concert clothes in a wardrobe trunk or large instrument case which precedes him to each hall.

This is his home away from home, but not the place to leave (inadvertently, to be sure) one's money and passport as a player did before the move across the border from Spain to France.

Happily, a driver's license and the solid reputation of the BSO helped soften the hearts of reputedly inflexible passport-control officials on both sides of the fence, and the worried instrumentalist was able to rejoin his cash and his laissez-passer backstage at the Palais de Chaillot before the final concert.

While the orchestra is always divided between two flights for air travel, the 3½-ton load of instrument cases and wardrobe trunks is flown across the Atlantic in seven Pan Am jet-freight modules.

On the continent after each concert, stage manager Alfred Robison supervises the loading of this baggage and—under the watchful eye of librarian Victor Alpert—the scores and musical materials into trucks which move from city to city, country to country, on a clockwork-precision schedule.

Only on the move from Rome to Barcelona was it necessary to take to the air in order to arrive in the Spanish city for its traditional 10 p.m. concert time.

Sight-seeing a 'must'

For many of the younger players, this was their first international BSO tour. The orchestra's most recent trip had been to the Far East 10 years ago and to the Soviet Union and Europe in 1956.

That meant fitting in some sight-seeing where there was time—usually in such larger cities as London, Berlin, Vienna, Rome, Barcelona, and Paris, which had a two-day minimum stopover.

Large parties observed the mysteries of record taping, pressing, and packaging at Deutsche Grammophon's homey plant in Hannover. In Vienna, some were delighted to discover that the Donau and the Danube are one and the same and proceeded to take a riverboat ride on it.

There were all kinds of reunions—with long-lost relatives, with music teachers from earlier days, with fellow musicians now playing in European orchestras, with favorite luthiers.

And there was the veteran orchestra wit who rediscovered the house of his birth in West Berlin. "It has a plaque on it now, too," he told his admiring colleagues. What does it say? "For rent," he added.

In a break with the habits of other tours, 43 Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood accompanied the orchestra to seven of the 12 cities visited.

Friends followed busy schedule

A supplementary program of events had been planned by the cochairmen for the tour (Mrs. Harris Fahnestock and Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris, who are respectively, a trustee and an overseer of the BSO), which took them to the House of Lords; to the opera in Berlin, Vienna, and Rome; to Vienna's Spanish Riding School; to the Elbe on a German naval corvette; and to a hands-across-the-sea welcome to Bostonians from the mayor of Paris at the Hotel de la Ville.

The Friends joined the orchestra, too, at luncheons, dinners, and receptions hosted by American Government officials, Deutsche Grammophon and its Italian and French affiliates, and the Berlin Senat of the Arts.

And not just incidentally, they helped defray the $250,000 cost of the orchestra's tour through a round-trip-plus-contribution ticket.

Something new in community-orchestra relations was also added by the participation of three Massachusetts-based organizations with European offices—Massport, Gillette, and Stanley Home Products—which sponsored two concerts each, respectively, in London and Frankfurt, Berlin, and Rome and Barcelona.

And Deutsche Grammophon's obvious pleasure in being able to display its new client in person to audiences throughout Europe was more than substantially manifested.

For the traveling orchestra musician, each new hall takes on the same status as the average tourist's privately discovered restaurant or bargain spot. Can he hear himself and his colleagues? Is there an echo? Enough space for the players to have elbow room? A musical ambience?

Not all halls pass the test with everyone, and there is considerable difference about even the most generally favored. Dare one mention the highest contenders—Wuppertal's warm Stadthalle, the spectacular Berlin Philharmonie, the tradition-encrusted Musikvereinsaal in Vienna, Barcelona's extravagant Palau, and the resounding Palais de Chaillot in Paris?

For the instrumentalist, acoustical and emotional factors are as present as for the listener, but the balance can be altered ever so slightly depending upon where you sit—onstage or in the house.

The critics, of course, sit in the house, and along the European tour route the expected variety of opinions was encountered.

'You can tell he's a gourmet'

They ranged from the suffering London aisle sitter who "with reluctance . . . stayed to the end," to Hamburg's "America's Vienna Philharmonic," Berlin's "Too bad that Herr von Karajan was not there to hear that" (Beethoven's Fifth), and Vienna's "This orchestra shows that in Boston at least the musicians do not play like machines."

There were dissenters, too, as everywhere, and some whose intentions were nebulous.

For instance, one musician was in the course of translating a morning-after review headed "A Virtuoso Sits At Every Desk," and read in satisfaction to the end. Then he pondered the headline, and his brow clouded. "But he doesn't say which one of us it is," he said, thereby adding to the inside "jokelore" of orchestras, where two players share each stand.

Perhaps an international "critical" tour is in order.

Travel in planes, in trains, in buses, and on foot makes for revelation of surprising and pleasing characteristics among musicians. Who's first in line, and who's last, the collectors, the lovers of plants and trees, the connoisseurs, the family people, the sensation seekers, the gourmets, the quiet and the expansive ones.

Languages, currencies, luggage, and schedules become common denominators, but above all is the understanding and fierce devotion to music which they all share. Talk about it is not considered shoptalk by most — it is the thread which binds all other things together.

According to one prominent BSOnian, they even dream about music. "Why," he said, "there was this violinist who dreamed he was playing the slow movement of the New World Symphony. And he woke up to find that he was."

As a prelude to the last concert in Paris, everyone was invited in the morning by Admiral Schweitzer and his pianist wife, Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, to visit Basse la Futaie, the home of the late Charles Munch, former BSO music director, at Louveciennes outside Paris.

A welcome sun shone as players and friends who had known and worked with Mr. Munch explored the large comfortable house, filled with souvenirs of his career and a monument to his rare and catholic taste.

Guests strolled through the "springing" gardens and across the green lawns until an astonishing buffet was announced and the Bostonians and their friends were joined by large groups from two other Munch orchestras, the Orchestre de Paris, and the Orchestre Nationale.

Needless to say, the talk was of the man and his music, and of the extraordinary circumstances which brought all these musicians together, some far away from home, but here very much at home. And if they hadn't already, the reasons for all that hard work and traveling and extra effort settled harmoniously in place in the cool April sunshine.

Stage manager Al Robison supervises the unloading of wardrobe trunks

Moving into Rome's Santa Cecelia concert hall for accompanying photos, see next page

38

Boston Symphony Orchestra photos

Boston Symphony Orchestra on stage at Barcelona, Spain (left), and at the Berlin Philharmonic

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
Second Section
Tuesday, May 4, 1971

4—The Berkshire Eagle, Thursday, April 22, 1971

the lively world

by Milton R. Bass

WHEN THE BOSTON Symphony announced their spring tour of Europe, they cordially informed me that they would be glad to have me accompany them if this newspaper cared to pay the necessary fees. This newspaper even more cordially informed me that times were tough, money was tight, but that they would be happy to have me receive any letters from abroad that any member of the touring group cared to write.

I just got my first one. It is from Marvin Schofer, the dapper head of the orchestra's public relations department. It is from Hamburg, Germany, and it goes as follows:

Dear Milt,

I let the orchestra take off to Frankfurt tonight and stayed here in Hamburg to get a little typewriter work done. The German electrics, I've found out, have the "y" and the "z" reversed, and I've been tzping awaz coyilz sitting here and winding up with some rather peculiar looking copz. So . . .

The DGG people have laid on the feedbag for us and run up the drinking flag everywhere we've gone, which no doubt presages our all going on Dr. Stillman's diet when we get back home. Mz . . . My Berlin hotel room had a bathroom scale in it and I decided to face the worst (after a few days of facing and consuming the wurst) and happily discovered it read in kilos and not in pounds, so I was spared. And Italy still to come.

London is a glorious town, I must say, though our London reviews were less than cordial. Unfortunately the critics didn't quite believe that a Pops concert isn't all "Hair" medleys as they anticipated. Ah, well.

Stuttgart was a rave (David, by the way, will have all these reviews for you by the time zou get this) and Berlin was good, too. It's difficult to catch up with them, since we move on before they come out.

J. Paul Getty's little country place outside of London is a little cramped — the library is only 165 feet long — and the "good paintings," said his secretary, weren't there (we had to get along with Titians and Veroneses), but it was a nice day's outing. As you drive into the place, there's a half-size stop-and-go signal, which is red; you wait, and, presumably because you're expected, it turns green and you proceed. We kept wondering what happens if you don't wait???

You may tell Her Honor Your Wife that in case she wants help for her next social do, we are all now world authorities on The Hors D'oeuvre. We have undoubtedly seen a greater variety of things placed on small pieces of bread than are dreamt of in even Julia Child's philosophy. At Deutsche Grammophon's Hannover plant, we got the Five Dollar Tour, which included a look at the vinyl pellet machine — it washes and dries little B-B shot-sized black vinyl pellets for making LPs — and I couldn't help thinking it looked like what we'd just been eating on hard-boiled egg slices with chopped onion garnish.

The tour started with one of the Friends getting on the wrong airplane out of Boston and messages flashing back and forth from one Pan Am jet to another over the Atlantic until she was located. They were both going to London, she figured, so what's the difference.

The Pan Am jets were specially dubbed Clipper Boston Symphony and Clipper Boston Pops, which happens when a self-stick sticker is applied over the permanent name of the plane — Clipper William Jennings Bryan, or something like that — and you have visions of being the latest in a long and distinguished line: Clipper Elks, Clipper B'nai B'rith, Clipper Gay Liberation Front, Clipper Richmond Selectmen . . . all the greats, as they say in show biz.

I trust this finds you all well and prospering. I suspect that when the time comes, we'll all breathe a great sigh of relief to come home off the hors d'oeuvre and Stadthalle circuit. See zou soon.

Best to all . . .

Marvin

The Lively World

Vicarious trip with the Boston

By MILTON R. BASS

WHEN THE BOSTON Symphony announced their spring tour of Europe, they cordially informed me that they would be glad to have me accompany them if this newspaper cared to pay the necessary fees. This newspaper even more cordially informed me that times were tough, money was tight, but that they would be happy to have me receive any letters from abroad that any member of the touring group cared to write.

I just got my first one. It is from Marvin Schofer, the dapper head of the orchestra's public relations department. It is from Hamburg, Germany, and it goes as follows:

Dear Milt,

I let the orchestra take off to Frankfurt tonight and stayed here in Hamburg to get a little typewriter work done, The German electrics, I've found out have the "y" and the "z" reversed, and I've been tzping awaz coyilz sitting here and winding up with some rather peculiar looking copz. So. . .

The DGG people have laid on the feedbag for us and run up the drinking flag everywhere we've gone, which no doubt presages our all going on Dr. Stillman's diet when we get back home. Mz . . . My Berlin hotel room had a bathroom scale in it and I decided to face the worst (after a few days of facing and consuming the wurst) and happily discovered it read in kilos and not in pounds, so I was spared. And Italy still to come.

London is a glorious town, I must say, though our London reviews were less than cordial. Unfortunately the critics didn't quite believe that a Pops concert isn't all "Hair" medleys as they anticipated. Ah, well.

Stuttgart was a rave (David, by the way, will have all these reviews for you by the time zou get this) and Berlin was good, too. It's difficult to catch up with them, since we move on before they come out.

J.Paul Getty's little country place outside of London is a little cramped — the library is only 165 feet long — and the "good paintings," said his secretary weren't there (we had to get along with Titians and Veroneses), but it was a nice day's outing. As you drive into the place, there's a half-size stop-and-go signal, which is red: you wait, and, presumably because you're expected, it turns green and you proceed. We kept wondering what happens if you don't wait???

You may tell Her Honor Your Wife that in case she wants help for her next social do, we are all now world authorities on The Hors D'oeuvre. We have undoubtedly seen a greater variety of things placed on small pieces of bread than are dreamt of in even Julia Child's philosophy.

At Deutsche Grammophon's Hannover plant, we got the Five Dollar Tour, which included a look at the vinyl pellet machine — it washes and dries little B-B shot-sized black vinyl pellets for making LPs — and I couldn't help thinking it looked like what we'd just been eating on hard-boiled egg slices with chopped onion garnish.

The tour started with one of the Friends getting on the wrong airplane out of Boston and messages flashing back and forth from one Pan Am jet to another over the Atlantic until she was located. They were both going to London, she figured, so what's the difference.

The Pan Am jets were specially dubbed Clipper Boston Symphony and Clipper Boston Pops which happens when a self-stick sticker is applied over the permanent name of the plane — Clipper William Jennings Bryan, or something like that — and you have visions of being the latest in a long and distinguished line: Clipper Elks, Clipper B'nai B'rith, Clipper Gay Liberation Front, Clipper Richmond Selectmen . . . all the greats, as they say in show biz.

I trust this finds you all well and prospering. I suspect that when the time comes, we'll all breathe a great sigh of relief to come home off the hors d'oeuvre and Stadthalle circuit. See zou soon.

Best to all. .
MARVIN

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(E) 6,200
APR 24 1971
New England Newsclip

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER, APRIL 25, 1971 A 14

Little Crises Plague BSO Tour

By MARVIN SCHOFER
Special to Sunday Advertiser)

(The Boston Symjhony Orchestra is in Europe. This is the third in a series of articles by a member of the Symphony party.)

BARCELONA — After coping with the airplanes, buses, hotel keys, strange money, and eating habits of six countries, everyone reaches the point where he uses any memory system that works.

"Where are we today?" asks a BSO player writing a postcard. Another player thinks a moment and says, "Ah . .. the Brahms Second Symphony." 'Aha,' the first one says, "Berlin."

Coming on the home stretch of the tour, everybody is happy to say that the programs were usually more entertaining than tragic.

★

London is memorable for the horn player who missed the bus. He got there in time, then remembered his travel clock was still in his hotel room, went back for it, glanced out the window and saw the bus pulling out.

Undaunted, he hopped in a cab. The cabby took him to Heathrow, the main airport. Unfortunately, the plane was leaving from Gatwick, an hour in the opposite direction. Still undaunted, he took a plane on his own to Stuttgart and arrived for the concert.

England is also memorable for the oboe player who couldn't find the stage door at the opening Pops concert in Royal Albert Hall. The Hall is round in shape and around and around he went, finding the steam pipes, the fuse boxes, the central plumbing system, but not the stage.

The music began, heard dimly off in the distance. Nothing to do but keep looking until he found it, then slink onstage under Arthur Fiedler's fierce eye.

★

Language confused, especially when you have Schaeffer, Schofer, Schneider and Snyder all in one hotel, all on the BSO list. Schofer got Schaeffer's passport and Schneider got paged at the airport because Snyder forgot to turn in his hotel key.

Only in Rome was there the threat that a general strike might keep the orchestra from arriving in Madrid for its first concert.

It turned out that it was only the streetcar operators and milk dealers who planned to strike the next morning.

So, the orchestra got off on time, though not without minor crisis. Some went to St. Peter's for a Papal audience but the audience went far beyond the time they expected it to end.

With minutes to spare, the group arrived at the hotel (with the bus waiting to leave for the airport) only to be told that the hotel porters had gone on strike. Everyone deshed to his room to get his baggage, by which time the strike had been settled.

"Very Italian," said Patsy Cardillo, Boston Pops' clarinetist, "with a three minute hotel strike and an audience with the Pope. I'll never have to ask where we are. It's got to be Rome."

Boston Symphony Orchestra photos

Boston Symphony Orchestra on stage at Barcelona, Spain (left), and at the Berlin Philharmonic

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
Second Section
Tuesday, May 4, 1971

The Lively World

Vicarious trip with the Boston

By MILTON R. BASS

WHEN THE BOSTON Symphony announced their spring tour of Europe, they cordially informed me that they would be glad to have me accompany them if this newspaper cared to pay the necessary fees. This newspaper even more cordially informed me that times were tough, money was tight, but that they would be happy to have me receive any letters from abroad that any member of the touring group cared to write.

I just got my first one. It is from Marvin Schofer, the dapper head of the orchestra's public relations department. It is from Hamburg, Germany, and it goes as follows:

Dear Milt,

I let the orchestra take off to Frankfurt tonight and stayed here in Hamburg to get a little typewriter work done, The German electrics, I've found out, have the "y" and the "z" reversed, and I've been tzping awaz coyilz sitting here and winding up with some rather peculiar looking copz. So. . .

The DGG people have laid on the feedbag for us and run up the drinking flag everywhere we've gone, which no doubt presages our all going on Dr. Stillman's diet when we get back home. Mz . . . My Berlin hotel room had a bathroom scale in it and I decided to face the worst (after a few days of facing and consuming the wurst) and happily discovered it read in kilos and not in pounds, so I was spared. And Italy still to come.

London is a glorious town, I must say, though our London reviews were less than cordial. Unfortunately the critics didn't quite believe that a Pops concert isn't all "Hair" medleys as they anticipated. Ah, well.

Stuttgart was a rave (David, by the way, will have all these reviews for you by the time zou get this) and Berlin was good, too. It's difficult to catch up with them, since we move on before they come out.

J.Paul Getty's little country place outside of London is a little cramped — the library is only 165 feet long — and the "good paintings," said his secretary, weren't there (we had to get along with Titians and Veroneses), but it was a nice day's outing . As you drive into the place, there's a half-size stop-and-go signal, which is red: you wait, and, presumably because you're expected, it turns green and you proceed. We kept wondering what happens if you don't wait???

You may tell Her Honor Your Wife that in case she wants help for her next social do, we are all now world authorities on The Hors D'oeuvre. We have undoubtedly seen a greater variety of things placed on small pieces of bread than are dreamt of in even Julia Child's philosophy.

At Deutsche Grammophon's Hannover plant, we got the Five Dollar Tour, which included a look at the vinyl pellet machine — it washes and dries little B-B shot-sized black vinyl pellets for making LPs — and I couldn't help thinking it looked like what we'd just been eating on hard-boiled egg slices with chopped onion garnish.

The tour started with one of the Friends getting on the wrong airplane out of Boston and messages flashing back and forth from one Pan Am jet to another over the Atlantic until she was located. They were both going to London, she figured, so what's the difference.

The Pan Am jets were specially dubbed Clipper Boston Symphony and Clipper Boston Pops which happens when a self-stick sticker is applied over the permanent name of the plane — Clipper William Jennings Bryan, or something like that — and you have visions of being the latest in a long and distinguished line: Clipper Elks, Clipper B'nai B'rith, Clipper Gay Liberation Front, Clipper Richmond Selectmen . . . all the greats, as they say in show biz.

I trust this finds you all well and prospering. I suspect that when the time comes, we'll all breathe a great sigh of relief to come home off the hors d'oeuvre and Stadthalle circuit. See zou soon.

Best to all. .
MARVIN

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(E) 6,200
APR 24 1971
New England Newsclip

the lively world

by Milton R. Bass

WHEN THE BOSTON Symphony announced their spring tour of Europe, they cordially informed me that they would be glad to have me accompany them if this newspaper cared to pay the necessary fees. This newspaper even more cordially informed me that times were tough, money was tight, but that they would be happy to have me receive any letters from abroad that any member of the touring group cared to write.

I just got my first one. It is from Marvin Schofer, the dapper head of the orchestra's public relations department. It is from Hamburg, Germany, and it goes as follows:

Dear Milt,

I let the orchestra take off to Frankfurt tonight and stayed here in Hamburg to get a little typewriter work done. The German electrics, I've found out, have the "y" and the "z" reversed, and I've been tzping awaz coyilz sitting here and winding up with some rather peculiar looking copz. So . . .

The DGG people have laid on the feedbag for us and run up the drinking flag everywhere we've gone, which no doubt presages our all going on Dr. Stillman's diet when we get back home. Mz . . . My Berlin hotel room had a bathroom scale in it and I decided to face the worst (after a few days of facing and consuming the wurst) and happily discovered it read in kilos and not in pounds, so I was spared. And Italy still to come.

London is a glorious town, I must say, though our London reviews were less than cordial. Unfortunately the critics didn't quite believe that a Pops concert isn't all "Hair" medleys as they anticipated. Ah, well.

Stuttgart was a rave (David, by the way, will have all these reviews for you by the time zou get this) and Berlin was good, too. It's difficult to catch up with them, since we move on before they come out.

J. Paul Getty's little country place outside of London is a little cramped — the library is only 165 feet long — and the "good paintings," said his secretary, weren't there (we had to get along with Titians and Veroneses), but it was a nice day's outing. As you drive into the place, there's a half-size stop-and-go signal, which is red; you wait, and, presumably because you're expected, it turns green and you proceed. We kept wondering what happens if you don't wait???

You may tell Her Honor Your Wife that in case she wants help for her next social do, we are all now world authorities on The Hors D'oeuvre. We have undoubtedly seen a greater variety of things placed on small pieces of bread than are dreamt of in even Julia Child's philosophy. At Deutsche Grammophon's Hannover plant, we got the Five Dollar Tour, which included a look at the vinyl pellet machine — it washes and dries little B-B shot-sized black vinyl pellets for making LPs — and I couldn't help thinking it looked like what we'd just been eating on hard-boiled egg slices with chopped onion garnish.

The tour started with one of the Friends getting on the wrong airplane out of Boston and messages flashing back and forth from one Pan Am jet to another over the Atlantic until she was located. They were both going to London, she figured, so what's the difference.

The Pan Am jets were specially dubbed Clipper Boston Symphony and Clipper Boston Pops, which happens when a self-stick sticker is applied over the permanent name of the plane — Clipper William Jennings Bryan, or something like that — and you have visions of being the latest in a long and distinguished line: Clipper Elks, Clipper B'nai B'rith, Clipper Gay Liberation Front, Clipper Richmond Selectmen . . . all the greats, as they say in show biz.

I trust this finds you all well and prospering. I suspect that when the time comes, we'll all breathe a great sigh of relief to come home off the hors d'oeuvre and Stadthalle circuit. See zou soon.

Best to all . . .
Marvin

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER, APRIL 25, 1971 A 14

Little Crises Plague BSO Tour

By MARVIN SCHOFER
Special to Sunday Advertiser)

(The Boston Symjhony Orchestra is in Europe. This is the third in a series of articles by a member of the Symphony party.)

BARCELONA — After coping with the airplanes, buses, hotel keys, strange money, and eating habits of six countries, everyone reaches the point where he uses any memory system that works.

"Where are we today?" asks a BSO player writing a postcard. Another player thinks a moment and says, "Ah . .. the Brahms Second Symphony." 'Aha,' the first one says, "Berlin."

Coming on the home stretch of the tour, everybody is happy to say that the programs were usually more entertaining than tragic.

★

London is memorable for the horn player who missed the bus. He got there in time, then remembered his travel clock was still in his hotel room, went back for it, glanced out the window and saw the bus pulling out.

Undaunted, he hopped in a cab. The cabby took him to Heathrow, the main airport. Unfortunately, the plane was leaving from Gatwick, an hour in the opposite direction. Still undaunted, he took a plane on his own to Stuttgart and arrived for the concert.

England is also memorable for the oboe player who couldn't find the stage door at the opening Pops concert in Royal Albert Hall. The Hall is round in shape and around and around he went, finding the steam pipes, the fuse boxes, the central plumbing system, but not the stage.

The music began, heard dimly off in the distance. Nothing to do but keep looking until he found it, then slink onstage under Arthur

Language confused, especially when you have Schaeffer, Schofer, Schneider and Snyder all in one hotel, all on the BSO list. Schofer got Schaeffer's passport and Schneider got paged at the airport because Snyder forgot to turn in his hotel key. Fiedler's fierce eye.

★

Only in Rome was there the threat that a general strike might keep the orchestra from arriving in Madrid for its first concert.

It turned out that it was only the streetcar operators and milk dealers who planned to strike the next morning.

So, the orchestra got off on time, though not without minor crisis. Some went to St. Peter's for a Papal audience but the audience went far beyond the time they expected it to end.

With minutes to spare, the group arrived at the hotel (with the bus waiting to leave for the airport) only to be told that the hotel porters had gone on strike. Everyone deshed to his room to get his baggage, by which time the strike had been settled.

"Very Italian," said Patsy Cardillo, Boston Pops' clarinetist, "with a three minute hotel strike and an audience with the Pope. I'll never have to ask where we are. It's got to be Rome."

STRIKING CONCERT HALL—William Steinberg conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Berlin's Philharmonie Hall, within sight of Berlin wall. Suspended cylinder-shaped objects are lights, others sound baffles. (Globe photo by Ed Fitzgerald.)

BSO tour: wine and good health

Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

ABOARD PAN AM CLIPPER BOSTON POPS, ENROUTE PARIS-BOSTON — For most of us on the last day of the Boston Symphony's European tour, there had been more champagne in the last three weeks than in the previous three years. Now, Sunday morning (April 25) at Orly airport, with Deutsche Grammophon as our hosts, we had our last-but-one lot of it (there would be more on the plane), and it was still a pleasure. Between a third and a half of the orchestra was returning on this flight, and most of those members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony who had accompanied the tour. For the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, there were two weeks of concerts still to go in Europe, and the remaining players and staff would go home on another charter after a weeks's vacation.

William Moyer, the orchestra's personnel manager, said about the tour: "I wish it would be this way at home. The players have extended themselves beyond the normal (which is always good)." There had been less absenteeism through sickness than for an equivalent number of services in Boston: "of course, there's always that measure of Christian Science at work in a special situation like this." He commented as well that from the point of view of sheer length, the frequency of concerts and rehearsals, and travel schedules, this had been a "very much more considerate tour than any we've had."

His troubles, Moyer added, had come before the trip, mainly in the long drawn out negotiations between management and players that kept the tour itself in doubt for months while problems about per diems, the waiver of the clause in the working agreement that forbids Sunday concerts, the mixing of Symphony and Pops season, were ironed out.

No key player had become sick during the tour — "either you have to change the program, which the local managements hate, or you reassign parts, which worries the conductors half to death" — but Moyer had dealt with his share of crises in that department before leaving. The extra horn players for the Bruckner symphony in Stuttgart had been lined up in plenty of time, and union agreement had been obtained for the hiring for the Pops concerts in the Albert Hall and in Bonn of an English trumpeter ("strangely enough named Albert Hall"). Still, about six days before leaving, it became evident that principal hornist James Stagliano would not be able to make the tour, which meant redistributing the parts between Associate Principal Charles Yancich and the 26-year-old David Ohanian, who took over Stagliano's Chamber Players chair as well. Then, at four days notice, Madeline Foley was called in to replace a sick cellist, and 30 hours before departure one more cellist, Beverly Lauridsen, who is also a philosophy student at Hunter College and who luckily had a passport and a vaccination, had to be called to replace yet another sick colleague.

MUSIC, Page A-27

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
DD 237,967
SS 696,377
(E) 194,700

MAY 2 1971

New England Newsclip

BSO tour surmounts hitches --- big and small

★ MUSIC
Continued from Page A-23

One horn player had become temporarily detached from the orchestra through a series of misadventures with an alarm clock, the hotel's wakeup service, laryngitis that struck him silent at the moment when he needed to shout at a departing bus, and a taxi that took him to the wrong London airport, but he managed to catch up in time for the next concert. And now, two string players whom Moyer had rather expected to see on this flight home, seemed not to be there, but at this point, since neither had a contractual obligation to the orchestra for another eight days, Moyer was content simply to smile serenely about that.

Keran Chobanian, M.D., who has on his third overseas tour with the Boston Symphony as physician in attendance, and who had lugged 350 lbs of supplies and equipment through six countries and had received an estimated 500 visits in 24 days, looked even more relaxed than he had on the trip and was pleased to be on the point of getting his charges home safe without there having been anything worse than a couple of what he called "medium-sized crises." We'll report separately on a conversation with Dr. Chobanian. Asked about such tours and their future, Talcott M. Banks, president of the Board of Trustees, and Thomas D. Perry, manager, agreed in putting them in the impossible-but-necessary category. After the final concert in Paris the night before, Perry said, "Yes, of course they are financially impossible, but every once in a while we have to go through this gigantic convulsion and present ourselves in person."

On the plane, Banks said that in his view the tour had been "extraordinarily successful musically, for the orchestra, and for the Friends. If you were to ask right now about future tours, I'm sure you would get a 100 percent vote for 'yes'." He did not yet know, he added, just how they had come out financially, but he regarded the commerical sponsorship of six concerts by Gillette, the Massachusetts Post Authority, and Stanley Home Products, and the drawing into the tour of 40 members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony, as highly successful innovations.

Each of the 40 traveling Friends represented a $1000 gift to the orchestra, but both Banks and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, whose idea the Friends' parallel tour had been and who organized it, thought that what had been done to get the Friends and the orchestra acquainted represented a still more important investment."There had never really been such contact before," said Mrs. Fahnestock, "and I think for the first time those Friends who went really know the orchestra and have a sense of its being their orchestra, and they're going to work like the dickens for it. And get the other Friends fired up to work for it, too."

STRIKING CONCERT HALL—William Steinberg conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Berlin's Philharmonia Hall, within sight of Berlin wall. Suspended cylinder-shaped objects are lights, others sound baffles. (Globe photo by Ed Fitzgerald.)

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC 237,967
SUN 566,877 (E) 194,700

MAY 2 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO tour: wine and good health

Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

ABOARD PAN AM CLIPPER BOSTON POPS, ENROUTE PARIS-BOSTON — For most of us on the last day of the Boston Symphony's European tour, there had been more champagne in the last three weeks than in the previous three years. Now, Sunday morning (April 25) at Orly airport, with Deutsche Grammophon as our hosts, we had our last-but-one lot of it (there would be more on the plane), and it was still a pleasure. Between a third and a half of the orchestra was returning on this flight, and most of those members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony who had accompanied the tour. For the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, there were two weeks of concerts still to go in Europe, and the remaining players and staff would go home on another charter after a weeks's vacation.

William Moyer, the orchestra's personnel manager, said about the tour: "I wish it would be this way at home. The players have extended themselves beyond the normal (which is always good)." There had been less absenteeism through sickness than for an equivalent number of services in Boston: "of course, there's always that measure of Christian Science at work in a special situation like this." He commented as well that from the point of view of sheer length, the frequency of concerts and rehearsals, and travel schedules, this had been a "very much more considerate tour than any we've had."

His troubles, Moyer added, had come before the trip, mainly in the long drawn out negotiations between management and players that kept the tour itself in doubt for months while problems about per diems, the waiver of the clause in the working agreement that forbids Sunday concerts, the mixing of Symphony and Pops season, were ironed out.

No key player had become sick during the tour — "either you have to change the program, which the local managements hate, or you reassign parts, which worries the conductors half to death" — but Moyer had dealt with his share of crises in that department before leaving. The extra horn players for the Bruckner symphony in Stuttgart had been lined up in plenty of time, and union agreement had been obtained for the hiring for the Pops concerts in the Albert Hall and in Bonn of an English trumpeter ("strangely enough named Albert Hall"). Still, about six days before leaving, it became evident that principal hornist James Stagliano would not be able to make the tour, which meant redistributing the parts between Associate Principal Charles Yancich and the 26-year-old David Ohanian, who took over Stagliano's Chamber Players chair as well. Then, at four days notice, Madeline Foley was called in to replace a sick cellist, and 30 hours before departure one more cellist, Beverly Lauridsen, who is also a philosophy student at Hunter College and who luckily had a passport and a vaccination, had to be called to replace yet another sick colleague.

MUSIC, Page A-27

BSO tour surmounts hitches --- big and small

★ MUSIC
Continued from Page A-23

One horn player had become temporarily detached from the orchestra through a series of misadventures with an alarm clock, the hotel's wakeup service, laryngitis that struck him silent at the moment when he needed to shout at a departing bus, and a taxi that took him to the wrong London airport, but he managed to catch up in time for the next concert. And now, two string players whom Moyer had rather expected to see on this flight home, seemed not to be there, but at this point, since neither had a contractual obligation to the orchestra for another eight days, Moyer was content simply to smile serenely about that.

Keran Chobanian, M.D., who has on his third overseas tour with the Boston Symphony as physician in attendance, and who had lugged 350 lbs of supplies and equipment through six countries and had received an estimated 500 visits in 24 days, looked even more relaxed than he had on the trip and was pleased to be on the point of getting his charges home safe without there having been anything worse than a couple of what he called "medium-sized crises." We'll report separately on a conversation with Dr. Chobanian. Asked about such tours and their future, Talcott M. Banks, president of the Board of Trustees, and Thomas D. Perry, manager, agreed in putting them in the impossible-but-necessary category. After the final concert in Paris the night before, Perry said, "Yes, of course they are financially impossible, but every once in a while we have to go through this gigantic convulsion and present ourselves in person."

On the plane, Banks said that in his view the tour had been "extraordinarily successful musically, for the orchestra, and for the Friends. If you were to ask right now about future tours, I'm sure you would get a 100 percent vote for 'yes'." He did not yet know, he added, just how they had come out financially, but he regarded the commerical sponsorship of six concerts by Gillette, the Massachusetts Post Authority, and Stanley Home Products, and the drawing into the tour of 40 members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony, as highly successful innovations.

Each of the 40 traveling Friends represented a $1000 gift to the orchestra, but both Banks and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, whose idea the Friends' parallel tour had been and who organized it, thought that what had been done to get the Friends and the orchestra acquainted represented a still more important investment."There had never really been such contact before," said Mrs. Fahnestock, "and I think for the first time those Friends who went really know the orchestra and have a sense of its being their orchestra, and they're going to work like the dickens for it. And get the other Friends fired up to work for it, too."

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W 1793800

MAY 10 1971

AMERICAN MUSICAL AMBASSADORS ON TOUR

"If It's Thursday and 'La Valse,' This Must Be Wuppertal"

During National Music Week (May 2 to 9), schools throughout the nation helped salute the individuals and organizations that keep the U.S. one of the world's most active music-making nations.

High on the list stands the Boston Symphony Orchestra — internationally recognized as one of the world's greatest orchestras. When the B.S.O. (and its affiliated Boston Pops) goes on an overseas tour, it's news. And in April, the Bostonians made such news in five European countries. Senior's Roy Hemming was invited to join the press group covering the tour. Here is his report on the first part of the tour:

By ROY HEMMING

Traveling with a symphony orchestra playing 16 concerts in 12 different cities in 20 consecutive days is a bit like "If it's Thursday and we're playing La Valse, this must be Wuppertal [in West Germany]."

For the 100-plus men and women in the Boston Symphony, their first European tour since 1956 has been an exhausting schedule of performances, rehearsals, official receptions, train and plane travel, and packing and unpacking. But I've heard few complaints. The waves of applause that have greeted performances in every city along the way have had a lot to do with that!

Three things have especially stood out to me on this tour:

First, the genuine respect Europeans have for the quality of America's major symphony orchestras. As esteemed as the orchestras of London, Berlin, and Vienna indeed are, I continually heard listeners speaking in awe of the technical qualities and versatility of the B.S.O. "Such sound!" I heard again and again in London, Berlin, Hamburg, you-name-it — even when press critics were divided about the choice of works the B.S.O. had programmed for each of the different cities.

Second, the excitement over young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas (who has been sharing the tour with B.S.O. Music Director William Steinberg). Word of Thomas' dramatic American success last year [see Oct. 26 issue] had been bolstered by rave reports of his debut with London's New Philharmonia in February. Thus there were many who were eager to hear him firsthand, leading the same

Deutsche Grammophon/Manos

Thomas: conquering a new continent

Boston Symphony with which he had achieved his sudden fame. Wherever he conducted on his tour, it was obvious Thomas was a big hit — particularly with younger listeners. "He's the new American Bernstein," I heard people saying in both Frankfurt and Wuppertal.

Third, the uniqueness of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops, which played special concerts in London and Bonn — the first the Pops has ever played outside its home state of Massachusetts. The Boston Pops is actually the Boston Symphony minus its first-desk players. Americans sometimes forget how unique an institution it is — playing classics and current pop tunes with equal adeptness and flair. This sort of thing just isn't done by European orchestras (other than an occasional Strauss waltz). So when the Boston Pops lit into the music from Broadway's Hair and followed it with a Beatle arrangement, I thought the roof of London's staid old Royal Albert Hall would come crashing down. The ever-enterprising Fiedler (younger and "hipper" than ever at 76) had even added a new fillip to the Hair arrangement in London: an electric fender bass, groovily played by the Pops young lead bassist Bill Rhein.

Unfortunately, the recent ill health of B.S.O. Music Director William Steinberg was evident to many by his manner on stage and by an increasingly unclear baton technique. Yet a warm and genuine respect for Steinberg's reputation was always there. In Germany, from which Steinberg had been forced to flee during the Nazi period, there was special significance in his return as the head of one of the world's greatest orchestras, conducting the music of such "German" composers as Mahler and Bruckner whom he had done so much to advance internationally in the postwar decade.

As the tour began, Steinberg had publicly made an awkward remark about his hopes that the tour would convince Europeans that Americans "are not naked savages still jumping from the bushes." The B.S.O. 1971 tour did indeed show Europeans the exceptionally high state of present-day American musical art. But some in the orchestra could not help but wonder about the future — particularly how our musical organizations can survive the coming years in the face of staggeringly mounting costs and the difficulty of finding money from either private or governmental sources.

For the millions of students in high school today who look forward either to music careers or to just amateur music "listening," the implications extend far beyond the usual rhetoric of National Music Week. □

Springfield Sunday Republican
Sunday Roto

OUR MAN IN EUROPE

On the Cover

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra went to Europe this spring for a 16-concert tour of six countries, Richard C. Hamerich of the Springfield Sunday Republican staff went with it. On the cover (in a new red cardigan from London) he is seen visiting Beethoven's birthplace in Bonn, West Germany, with Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops. On Pages 4 and 5, he reports some of the highlights of the 23-day tour that was the orchestra's first visit to Europe in 15 years, and the Boston Pops' first since its founding.

story begins on following page

Springfield Republican
Sunday Roto

OUR MAN IN EUROPE

On the Cover

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra went to Europe this spring for a 16-concert tour of six countries, Richard C. Hammerich of the Springfield Sunday Republican staff went with it. On the cover (in a new red cardigan from London) he is seen visiting Beethoven's birthplace in Bonn, West Germany, with Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops. On Pages 4 and 5, he reports some of the highlights of the 23-day tour that was the orchestra's first visit to Europe in 15 years and the Boston Pops first since its founding.

Our Man in Europe . . . With the

By R. C. Hammerich
Springfield Republican Roto Staff

In London the Boston symphony Orchestra's music director, William Steinberg, conducts the first concert of the orchestra's 23-day, 16-concert European tour in Royal Festival Hall.

A little knot of Boston Symphony Orchestra players came out of the elevator into the lobby of the Diplomatic Hotel in Barcelona on the afternoon of April 21.

They were all smiles. On the elevator they had met some ardent fans who had heard them at Tanglewood in Lenox, and the rain in Spain suddenly seemed less depressing.

They were on the 20th day of their six-country, 16-concert tour of Europe and they were tired.

They were smiling because the fans were from Southwick . . . members of a group of 15 high school students who, with two chaperones and their Spanish teacher, Miss Jane Sturmer, were spending a couple of weeks in Spain to see the sights and polish their facility with the language.

They hadn't been smiling much in Spain. It was raining; their suitcases were full of confusion. The food was different, and the over-decorated concert hall was a revelation, but the hotel could have been in Rome where they were the day before, or Vienna before Rome or Bonn or Frankfurt or Hamburg or Hannover before that.

And before Hannover there was Berlin and Wuppertal and Stuttgart and London.

For symphony orchestra musicians on tour life is not all tea and crumpets or beer and skittles. The casual concertgoer is not always conscious of what precedes and follows the music offered by the visitors.

As a for-instance, there is the matter of sprains and bruises that afflict the fingers that have to fly over the strings and valve-keys. They are acquired while moving suitcases in and out of hotels and buses and airports.

And there are sometimes not-so-vague inner ailments requiring the attention of Dr. Keran M. Chobanian, the Boston physician who set up shop backstage at every concert. He was there on the tour to Japan 10 years ago, too, and in Europe and Russia 15 years ago.

Also there are little problems that afflict the mind and serve to threaten the concentration needed to play a complicated musical score, little things like lost travelers' checks or a missing suitcase.

Out front in the concert hall, however, the orchestra wives and staff workers were enjoying the European way of concertgoing as well as the orchestral sound they were so fond of.

In London and through Germany, for instance, the halls were brightly lighted. In America concert halls are usually dimly lighted, as contrasted to theaters, which are dark. In Barcelona the hall was as dark as an American theater.

Also in London and all through Germany the customers rushed to the food counters when the music ended for intermission. There was beer and wine and soft drinks and coffee and sandwiches and cakes, sometimes more substantial fare, and as far as I could see everyone not only had time to be served but also to finish eating.

This happy service tended to mollify any minor irritation arroused in American minds over having to pay between 15 and 30 cents for programs.

The fresh flowers were mollifying, too. They were everywhere in the German concert halls, in nooks and crannies around the sides of the auditoriums and the corridors and lobbies; and they were delivered in great bundles to the conductors and soloists (male) at the end of the concerts.

The Bostonian soloists (Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, and Sherman Walt, bassoonist) seemed a bit nonplussed at receiving the bouquets, but they awkwardly solved the problem by giving them to female members of the orchestra before they left the stage.

There were other little matters attracting the attention

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and friends on tour . . . from the Dusseldorf bahnhof (rail station) to the Wuppertal bus.

Carol Procter, a Boston Symphony Orchestra cellist who played in the Springfield orchestra before her appointment in Boston, walks beside the bus in Dusseldorf, Germany, which would take her to the concert in Wuppertal.

Continued on next page

Boston Symphony

continued from preceding page

of the accompanying staff members and of little interest to the orchestra members.

The attendants in the men's rooms, for instance; they are women . . . discreet women who confine their service to the dispensing of towels in the foyer, but women nevertheless.

And there is the matter of seat numbers. Many of the halls in Germany don't identify the rows, just the seats, and there are no duplicates.

The numbers start in the front row at the left end, come back in the other direction in the second row and reverse direction again for each row, back and forth all the way to the last seat at the back.

Blundering into this arrangement without warning and without even a non-English-speaking usher, as some of us did, is humiliating.

In the meantime the musicians had other things on their minds. They were vastly more interested in the acoustic properties of their concert halls than they were in the housing properties of their hotels.

Before the concert in the Palais de Chaillot in Paris Armabde Ghitalla, first trumpeter, limbers up his lip and warms up his horn.

They talked about their concert halls as if they were musical instruments, which, of course, they are in a way. They have to be "played;" their reverberation qualities have to be accounted for, and the musicians were continually adjusting to varieties of "liveliness" from hall to hall and asking everyone how they sounded.

The newspaper reports, when they could be found by the fast-travelling players, were almost entirely favorable. To most of the European musical reporters, the Boston orchestra sounded fine.

Their quibbles, when they had any, were usually differences of opinion about interpretation of well-known music; the sound of the orchestra was universally praised.

In fact, although the Boston musicians are immensely proud of their orchestra, there were some who were less pleased with the music they made in Europe than the Europeans were.

Joan Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler find time in a Hamburg hotel room to rehearse her lines in preparation for the Boston Pops concert in Bonn.

William Steinberg, Boston Symphony Orchestra music director, sends a special message to his musicians during a concert in one of Europe's most famous concert halls, the Grosser Musikvereinssaal in Vienna.

In Wuppertal, Germany, a city of 400,000, Sherman Walt, first bassoonist, was soloist, and Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was conductor. Here they are backstage before the performance.

by Harry Ellis Dickson

"What happened in Dusseldorf?" my wife keeps asking me. So far I haven't told her. Each time the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes a European tour (and I have made all three, in 1952, in 1956, and now in 1971) I keep a diary, in which I record everything, or almost everything. I do this in order to share my experiences with my wife, and also to spare myself the frustrating task of trying to remember where I was each day on our kaleidoscopic tour. The days, the cities, the countries, the halls, the audiences, all seem to merge in my memory, and if I didn't write it down I would remember nothing in its proper perspective. Also when I get home from one of these grueling trips I am tired, so while I am sleeping my wife is reading my diary. However I am not always completely successful, because I leave occasional blank pages in some cities, and invariably she will wake me in the middle of the night and ask, "What happened in Dusseldorf?" Devil that I am, I don't tell her. I am told this is a good way to keep your wife from taking you for granted.

But let us begin our 1971 BSO tour from the beginning. After a send-off by numerous civic and political dignitaries we left Logan Airport in two 707 planes. The Boston Symphony always flies in two sections so that if something happens to one plane the rest of the orchestra can still give a concert. Each section is carefully split down the middle, half the strings in one plane, half in the other, half the woodwinds, half the brass, half the percussion in one plane, half in the other. Even the conductors are divided. In an emergency the programs would have to be changed, but at least there would be a balanced orchestra.

This foresight and planning is quite re-assuring to all concerned except our wives and families. On this tour we were accompanied by about 40 Friends of the Boston Symphony, and they too, were divided, 20 on our plane, 20 on the other. These hardy ladies and gentlemen, mostly elderly ladies, paid handsomely for the privilege of sharing our experiences on a European tour, and we were to discover in the following three weeks what good troopers they are.

We arrived in London late at night and were quickly ushered through Customs without even one bag being opened. Indeed this courtesy of passing us through Customs without examination occurred in each of the six countries we visited. It was not until we returned to our native Boston that we were met with suspicion by our efficient Customs officials who immediately confiscated our various contraband.

London must be the most civilized city in the world. Even the taxi drivers make you feel inferior. Everyone talks like a character out of

---

Harry Ellis Dickson is assistant conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra. He has just returned from touring Europe with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

from Herald
Sunday magazine of the Herald Traveler of Boston June 20, 1971

cont. on following page

Left: Conductor William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra acknowledge applause of Royal Festival Hall audience in London. The popular reception was enthusiastic in contrast to cool critical notices in the British press. Top right: Author Harry Ellis Dickson (far right) and friends (from left), Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler and BSO Press Manager Marvin Schofer, view East Berlin from a location near The Wall. In the background is Brandenburg Gate. Bottom right: Mrs. Thomas Perry Jr., wife of the orchestra manager, chats with Talcott Banks, president of the orchestra trustees, while awaiting bus departure to airport.

On Tour With The Boston Symphony

Playing 16 concerts in 21 days in Europe leaves one a bit confused, so who can say what really happened that day in Dusseldorf, Germany?

Gilbert and Sullivan (but I have a sneaky suspicion they don't really talk that way when they first get up in the morning).

Our first concert of the tour (16 in 21 days) was a Pops concert in the old Albert Hall, Arthur Fiedler conducting, and, the critics not withstanding, it was a howling, screaming success, with the "reserved" English audience of more than 5,000 standing and shouting and stamping at the end.

The second concert, by the full Boston Symphony under William Steinberg, took place the next evening in the sumptuous, fairly new, Royal Festival Hall, where we had played when it was brand new in 1956 under Charles Munch. This concert, from all signs manifested by the audience, was also a huge success. Not quite as noisy, perhaps, as that of the previous night, but one in which the audience rose at the end and recalled Steinberg many times with enthusiastic applause and "bravos."

If the London critics in their reviews the next day were not quite as enthusiastic, it is due, according to one of my British colleagues, to their still deep resentment of the loss of the Colonies. And while we are on the subject of critics I would like to say that after many years of playing I have come to the conclusion that I simply don't know whether or not a performance has been good or bad. I have left the stage quite exhilarated after what I thought was a fine performance only to read the next day that it was not, and conversely I have been part of performances that were quite bad, only to find out in the morning paper that we played divinely.

The two halls in London we found quite different. Albert Hall is old, large, and full of tradition. It was built in 1871 as a memorial to the Prince Consort as a multi-purpose auditorium, and has been used for balls, exhibitions, motion picture performances, even boxing matches, as well as concerts. Royal Albert Hall was the scene for many years of the London Promenade Concerts, which some say were the model upon which our Boston Pops concerts are based. Albert Hall also, for many years, had the distinction of having the worst acoustics in Europe. Happily this is no longer true. Some interior redesigning and rebuilding have given the hall an acceptable sound.

Royal Festival Hall, on the other hand, is modern in design, almost austere in its functional simplicity. There are no balconies. The rows of seats start from the stage and rise higher and higher to a level well above that of the stage. We are told the acoustics are very good, and one can see the entire stage from any seat. I personally found the hall less than comfortable to play in because of its unnatural hardness. One could hardly turn a page without having it reverberate throughout the hall.

After the second concert in London, we were invited to a lavish reception in one of the elegant rooms of Festival Hall, given by the American ambassador, Walter Annenberg. This was the first of many receptions throughout the tour, receptions that turned out to be sumptuous banquets. Musicians are usually ravenously hungry after a concert, and it has been our unfortunate experience in the past to be invited to after-concert parties and served dainty little tid-bits. After a while the players learn to avoid such parties, and instead go out to the nearest good restaurant. This tour was certainly a great exception, for in addition to the fine food and drink that was served to us at our various American embassies the Deutsche Grammophon Company (for whom the BSO now records) out-did itself in acting as hosts throughout the tour. We were told that their budget for

Continued on page 8

continued from preceding page

continued on following page

Continued from preceding page

On Tour

CONTINUED

entertaining the Boston Symphony on this tour was $40,000.

From London we flew to Stuttgart, the first of seven cities we were to visit in Germany. Unfortunately, with the exception of Berlin, these German cities would be one-night stands, so that one could get only a fleeting impression of each.

Sherman Walt prepares backstage for a performance of Mozart's Bassoon Concerto while Michael Tilson Thomas (center) accepts the congratulations of violinist Alfred Krips.

The concert hall in Stuttgart was not new to many of us for we had played there in 1956 when it was quite new. The Beethovensaal der Liederhalle is one of the finest in Europe. It is also modern in design and is a joy to play in. Like many European concert halls in Europe it has a kind of balcony in back of the stage from which the listeners can also see the face of the conductor. I noticed throughout Europe that these seats were usually occupied by young people. Otherwise most of the audiences throughout our tour seemed to be made up of people of middle age and over, and I have gained the impression that our American young people are much more vitally interested and actively engaged in music—all kinds of music—than are the European youngsters.

The next stop was Dusseldorf, where we arrived after a beautiful train ride along the Rhine. But we did not play in Dusseldorf. The concert took place in the industrial town of Wuppertal about 20 miles away.

As we were riding in the bus, Sherman Walt, our first bassoonist who was to be soloist that evening in the Mozart bassoon concerto, reminisced on his experiences during World War II when in this very section he had helped prepare the advance of the American Army. At the concert none of the Germans seemed to resent it, for he was received with tremendous enthusiasm.

The concert was conducted by our associate conductor,

Continued on page 10

On Tour

CONTINUED

The orchestra was surprised when the stolid, middle-aged, expressionless audience in Germany suddenly burst into applause at the end

Michael Tilson Thomas, who amazed all of us by making a speech in flawless German announcing that we would open the concert with Debussy's "L'Apres - Midi d'un Faune" in memory of the late Igor Stravinsky.

The Stadthalle in Wuppertal is a box-like auditorium, entirely white except for the seats and chandeliers. The audience was seated on a flat floor well below the level of the stage, and I kept thinking of the people in the front rows who must have had to strain their necks to see the orchestra. They all seemed like solid, middle-aged Germans with expressionless faces, and so a burst of applause, shouting and stamping at the end came as quite a surprise. But throughout the noisy tribute there was no change in the expression in their faces. I must add, however, that the younger people seated on the balcony above and to the rear of the stage displayed a bit more visible enthusiasm.

On to Berlin the next morning via Lufthansa. I had been looking forward to revisiting the city of my student days where I had spent almost two years just before and partly during the advent of Adolf Hitler. It was in Berlin that I first met my wife (although she came from New York), and I was filled with nostalgic memories and expectations. But, alas, it was not the same Berlin I knew 35 years ago. I suppose if I had returned to my native Boston after so many years I would have been equally disappointed, but somehow I had expected something to have remained of the old charm and beauty that was once Berlin. But nothing seems to have remained. Berlin is a noisy, hard, cold city. The Kurfurstendam that used to be one of the elegant, dignified avenues of the city, with a center of grass and beautiful trees not unlike our downtown Commonwealth Avenue, is now an ugly thoroughfare choked with automobiles and lined on either side with department stores, movie houses and honky-tonk night clubs, all with glaring neon signs.

The Philharmonie, where we gave two concerts, both under William Steinberg, is a new building of modern design, its exterior yellow stucco and quite ugly. The interior, however, is handsome, spacious and functional. There are tuning rooms, rehearsal rooms and various reception halls. The concert hall itself seats about 2,200 (somewhat fewer than our Symphony Hall in Boston), and about a third of the audience surrounds the stage from the sides and back, this concept based upon the very laudable principle that the music should envelop the listeners. It is a very good hall, and creates an atmosphere of intimacy with the audience. It is also a dangerous hall in that it is quite live and responsive, and I had the feeling that one must learn to play in it with great sensitivity just as one learns to play on a fine Stradivarius. Fortunately we had a rehearsal on the morning of the first concert, and were thus able to adjust our playing to the hall's qualities.

Returning to Berlin was an emotional experience not only for me but even more so for our assistant concertmaster, Alfred Krips, who had been born in that city and made a musical career there before being forced out by the Nazi regime. Many of his former colleagues from the Berlin State Opera Orchestra came to call on Alfred, some bringing flowers, and there were some poignant scenes of reunion. The next day I met Alfred on the street as he was strolling with his wife, and he told me he had just pointed out to her the house in which he was born. It is miraculously still standing after the bombing, and Alfred, who has a delicious sense of humor, said to me, "You know, there is a plaque in front of the house now." "What does it say?", I asked. "For rent," he replied.

Since a visit to East Berlin is a must for all foreigners, a group of us made the trip on our free day. We took a sightseeing bus. Before leaving, the guide inspected our passports, then in addition to the 14 marks (a little under $4) we had paid for the tour, he collected four marks apiece for the East Berlin government. This is a stipulation they make for all who cross into East Berlin. One must exchange four or five marks into East German currency upon entering, either to be spent there or given up on the return to the border. No East German money is allowed in West Germany. For some reason our four marks were forfeited, and we never even received their equivalent in East German money.

East Berlin is drab and depressing. The strict formalities and inspection as carried out by the unsmiling border guards already foretell a kind of spiritual depression.

There is less traffic in Berlin, the atmosphere is one of quiet resignation, and the people seem strangely inanimate. There is a great deal of building and reconstruction, especially [illegible] apartment houses.

Unter den Linden, the main street of East Berlin, which begins at the Brandenburg Gate and used to be a very fashionable street housing many foreign embassies and fine hotels, is now lined with department stores and office buildings. We stopped at the State Opera House, which has been repaired since the war, then went across the street to watch the changing of the goose-stepping guards in front of the gray columned stone memorial to "Victims of Fascism." On our return to Check Point Charlie, our East German guide, who had taken over as soon as we had crossed into East Berlin, said good-bye to us, and the rigmarole started again with inspection of passports. This time a uniformed lady looked at our photographs then suspiciously into each face, while two other guards inspected the bus, and another carefully inspected the under side of the bus, using a push-cart with an inverted mirror, evidently looking for possible escapers. Back in West Berlin, one wonders at all of these manifestations of man's inhumanity to man.

Our audiences in Berlin were highly enthusiastic, and the newspaper reviews were most favorable. One critic wrote that while some American orchestras give the impression of being supercharged machines, the Boston Symphony is the Vienna Philharmonic of the United States. What this means I don't know.

After the second concert there was a reception in the

Continued on page 12

Submitting to ministrations of tour physician, Dr. Keran Chobanian, is Al Robison, stage manager. Backstage piano substitutes for examination table.

cont. on next page

In Hamburg the Boston Symphony was serenaded by the local fire department band (loudly if not too well) in honor of Arthur Fiedler

On Tour
CONTINUED

cont. from preceding page

beautiful foyer of the Philharmonie for the orchestra and Friends, given by the Berlin Senate. There were speeches in German followed by English translations, speeches in English followed by German translations, much interspersed applause and, best of all, wonderful Rhine wine for various toasts.

On to Hannover, where we played in one of the largest concert halls of the tour (3,700 seats). Despite its size, it has excellent accoustics. Much of Hannover is new, since 60 per cent of it was destroyed during World War II. The hall itself, the Stadthalle, was untouched by bombs, and it was redecorated, we were told, seven years ago. It was filled to capacity, and again there was a tremendous ovation for the orchestra and Michael Thomas, who conducted.

During the afternoon we were taken on a tour of the Deutsche Grammophon factory where we watched our own records being stamped out. Again a reception with lots of food and drink. (It's a good thing we have a doctor with us!) Hannover is a thriving city, clean and orderly, with large new office buildings, apartment houses and hotels, and its older historical buildings have been restored to their original beauty. Its people seem well-dressed and prosperous, yet I could not understand the discrepancy between what the average German earns and the high price of tickets for our concerts. We were told that one of the higher paid girls at the Deutsche Grammophon, an expert in her field, earned about $90 a week, yet a small glass of orange juice at the hotel cost 70 cents.

After a pleasant one and a half hour train ride from Hannover, we arrived in Hamburg. Unlike the U.S., the German railroads are bustling. Trains and stations are filled with people, and one is filled with nostalgia for the old days when American railroads were the principal means of transportation.

Hamburg, the birthplace of Brahms, seems to have retained much of its old-world charm. True, there is a great deal of traffic and there are some new buildings, but many of the older ones remain. A picturesque lake in the center of the city, the Alster, boasts many sailboats and ferries.

Hamburg audiences are, by tradition, cold, discerning and undemonstrative, yet they displayed great warmth and boisterous enthusiasm at our concert, and Steinberg was recalled many times.

That night we were treated to a fantastic supper-banquet, again by the Deutsche Grammophon, at the posh Atlantic Hotel. The food and drink were copious, and, in honor of Arthur Fiedler, we were entertained by the Hamburg Fire Department band (at least loudly if not too well). Arthur was invited to conduct one number, a stirring march, after which he was made an honorary member of the Hamburg Fire Brigade, and presented with yet another helmet to add to his collection. (Incidentally, all of Arthur Fiedler's numerous citations, fire helmets and other memorabilia, including his own fire-engine, will be displayed soon in a special room being built at the Larz Anderson estate in Brookline.)

From Hamburg to Frankfurt in a big Lufthansa 747. Frankfurt is another busy city with much construction. Our concert took place in a suburb of Frankfurt with an unpronounceable name, Hoechst. The hall is new, and resembles somewhat the Kresge Auditorium in Cambridge. It is an all-purpose hall that can be adjusted to any size, and the accoustics, so we were told, are controlled electronically. How this is done I don't know, but the hall seemed to have a strange, clear sound that stopped almost as soon as it was produced.

By train along the Rhine river to the lovely, quaint old city of Bonn. We were no sooner checked into our hotel when everyone made a mad dash to Beethoven's home. It is situated in the busy shopping district, a simple three-story house which is now a museum. One visits first the tiny bedroom on the top floor where the great master was born, then the other floors where various mementoes of his life and work are exhibited —the viola he played in the town orchestra, his two harpsichords, his small pipe-organ, and some manuscripts. I was particularly interested in the manuscript of the Pastoral Symphony. Beethoven seems to have changed his mind often. There are notes and nuances scratched out, there are added nuances in red, some in blue pencil, there are henscratches and ink marks, and altogether the manuscript is a mess. How, I wondered, do all these so-called Beethoven experts of today know exactly what he wanted? And if he were alive today how many more changes would he make in his music?

Arthur Fiedler sports the Feuerwehrhelmut he was given by the West Berlin Fire Department during a post-concert reception in Berlin's Philharmonic Hall.

In one of the rooms in the house there are a number of hearing devices which Beethoven used during his approaching and finally total deafness, and one is filled with sadness and pity for this great man. The devices are clumsy and crude, some enormous metal horn-like affairs which he strapped over his head and which must have been physically painful to wear. What suffering, physical and mental, this greatest of all musicians had to bear.

Our concert in Bonn was a Pops concert under Arthur Fiedler. It took place in the new Beethovenhalle, and through no fault of ours it turned out to be a shambles. It also was no fault of the dignified and formally-dressed Bonn audience, most of whom had paid almost $40 for their table seats. In an evident attempt to duplicate the atmosphere of our Symphony Hall Pops concerts, there were tables on the floor of the auditorium at which the people sat, but the tables were long with white table-cloths, and they were already laden with mounds of hors d'oevres and sandwiches.

At the end of each piece of music an army of white-gloved waiters marched in with trays of wine and champagne, then retreated while the next number was played. But no sooner had the waiters left then another army—of photographers—made an invasion. Some climbed up on the stage exploding their flash bulbs all around us while we were trying to play Beethoven's Egmont Overture. Our stage manager, Al Robinson, almost had apoplexy trying to shout at them from the wings the German equivalent of "Get the hell off the stage!", but it phased them not at all. When Mrs. Joan Kennedy appeared after intermission to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" the number of photographers seemed to have increased.

Continued on page 31

On Tour
CONTINUED

Indeed, there was a solid wall of cameramen between the stage and the audience, all shoving, elbowing, gesticulating, snapping their pictures furiously. Finally, our associate manager, Harry Kraut, came out and asked them to leave, but no sooner had we begun to play when they all returned, and for the rest of the evening they were in complete command.

After her performance Mrs. Kennedy and her husband, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, joined a group of German dignitaries, among them Walter Scheel, the finance minister, at the center table, and for the rest of the concert the table was completely surrounded by photographers and autograph seekers, all pushing and shouting.

We were quite surprised to hear a burst of applause from the audience at the end of the concert. I wonder how many were able to hear the music.

Vienna, our next stop, is still a charming city, with its fine restaurants, hotels, parks, and restored old buildings. We gave two concerts in the old Musikvereinsaal where Brahms often conducted and which is probably one of the finest concert halls in Europe. Its shape remainds one of Symphony Hall, and one also was reminded that Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, spent much of his youth listening to concerts in this hall.

What do you do in Vienna after a concert? You go to a Hungarian restaurant to eat goulash and be entertained by gypsy musicians. At the Czardas Fursten we renewed acquaintances with an old friend, a gypsy fiddler whom we had met on our last visit to Vienna in 1956. He is a bit older and fatter, and now plays with slightly less fire and abandon than he used to, but we still enjoyed his and his fellow musicians' schmaltzy style. When I asked, this little round fat man if he were an authentic gypsy he answered with a twinkle in his eye, "Absolutely! A real first class Jewish gypsy!"

The real surprise of the gay evening (or morning) came when our own Jimmy Nagy, who is Hungarian by ancestry, took over, after a few beers, and amazed everyone with his fabulous gypsy fiddling.

It was difficult to tear ourselves away from Vienna, but Rome was beckoning.

The flight from Vienna to Rome via Alitalia was delightful. Over the snow-covered Alps, across a portion of Yugoslavia, then the Adriatic Sea to the well-defined coast of Italy, then on to Rome.

Rome is unforgettable. Of all the cities in Europe it seems to change the least—except for the traffic. It is impossible to describe the bedlam in the streets. There seem to be absolutely no rules or regulations, and everyone drives like a maniac, each driver shouting and cursing at the other. But they must be good drivers because one seldom sees an accident, and the cars all seem miraculously unscratched.

Our hotel, the Grand Hotel Plaza, is probably one of the oldest in Rome. Built in 1860, it must have been very elegant in its day, but no longer. Here Queen Carlotta of Mexico received Pope Pius XII in 1866, and here also lived the Italian opera composer, Mascagni. There is a Mascagni Room in the hotel where he is supposed to have composed his last opera, "Nerone."

Our concert in the Accademia Santa Cecilia, conducted by Michael Thomas, was exciting. We greeted old Bostonians, now living in Rome, among them His Eminence John Cardinal Wright,

At Bonn, members of the orchestra made a mad dash to visit Beethoven's home who sat resplendent in his red robes, beaming with pride. At the end the Italian audience exploded in a burst of rhythmic applause, shouting and stamping, and we finally had to play an encore.

The next morning there was time for some of us to go to St. Peter's where there was a public papal audience. We were given choice front seats in the packed church, and were able to observe Pope Paul at close range. He is a small, thin man with penetrating deep-set eyes in an ascetic face. After his public greetings to various groups and organizations, including a warm acknowledgement to the Boston Symphony, he was presented by Monsignor Murray to Talcott Banks, our Symphony president, and I was told he offered warm congratulations to him and the other trustees for their efforts in bringing beauty to the world.

Barcelona was somewhat disappointing. We arrived in a drizzling rain, and for the two days we were there saw no sun. Was this sunny Spain? And where were the flashing Spanish senoritas with their castanets, the proud toreadors in their colorful costumes? What we saw was a busy city with modern department stores, fancy hotels and apartment houses.

We arrived in the evening, still with plenty of time before the concert, because concerts in Barcelona begin at 10:30 p.m. This first concert was rather unusual for us. It actually did not begin until about 10:45, and finished close to 1:00 a.m. It was the first time in my entire career that I ever started a concert on a Wednesday and finished on Thursday. That night also my old joke about the tired viola player came back to haunt me, for I swear I dreamt that I was playing the beautiful slow movement of Brahms' Second Symphony, and woke up and found I was!

We found the Spanish audiences sophisticated and musically knowledgeable. One can sense that almost immediately. They were formally dressed, dignified, and eagerly attentive, and what impressed us greatly was their enthusiasm, as shown by their spontaneous applause, for the more modern works on the program, like Gunther Schuller's Bagatelles on the first evening under Steinberg, and the Schoenberg Five Pieces the next evening under Thomas. They were also fascinated by the Mozart Bassoon Concerto, and Sherman Walt told me afterward that never in his life had he felt such a rapport between himself and an audience. They actually breathed with him.

The Palacio de la Musica is an old hall with rather odd-looking, gaudy, sculptured frescoes surrounding the walls of the stage. They were very distracting, especially the first night when we were so tired. One of my colleagues told me the next day these strange mythical creatures kept him awake all night.

After the second concert there was a reception for the orchestra which ended at about 2:30 a.m. It was raining when we got into the buses that were to take us to our various hotels. We were all thoroughly exhausted and wet — and that night I came close to being executed by my colleagues.

Just as I entered the full bus I loudly complained, "I thought it rained in Spain mainly in the plain!" Not one person appreciated my humor.

On to Paris for our last concert. Our Air France plane left at 9 in the morning from Barcelona, which meant that we had to get up at 7. When we arrived in Paris we were in no mood to fully enjoy the delights of "Paris in the spring." Anyway, it was raining. Fortunately there was no concert that day, and we were able to get some rest.

Paris will be remembered not only for that last triumphal concert at the Palais de Chaillot, but for the delightful excursion by the orchestra, the trustees and Friends, to the home of Charles Munch in Louveciennes, a small town on the outskirts of Paris. We had been invited by Munch's niece and nephew, Nicole (Henriot) and Jean-Jacques Schweitzer. While the Schweitzers live in another house on the simple estate, Munch's house has been left exactly as he lived in it. As we went through it, we felt we were still in the presence of this dear man, especially in his study, where there are numerous reminders of his 13 years with the Boston Symphony. Among them was the beautiful old mahogany desk from the Conductor's Room in Symphony Hall, Boston Symphony Manager Thomas Perry had fashioned from an old antique piano and presented to him. When we entered the room, Joey Silverstein, our concert master, exclaimed, "I signed my first contract at this desk!" It was an unforgettable day, the weather beautiful, the hosts charming, the food and drink superb . . . altogether a fine climax to our tour.

The 1971 BSO tour is now history, but the memory lingers on. Now, let's see, what did happen in Dusseldorf? ■

BLANK PAGE

48

Joan Kennedy and fire buff Fiedler at Bonn reception

LIFE SPECIAL REPORT

Friends, fiddlers and Fiedler on tour

Twelve cities, six countries, 20 days, with meals, hotels, native hospitality and sight-seeing included. It's that time of year again. I'll tell you the real trip of a lifetime: go on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Pops and "Friends." In addition to the normal hassle of airplanes and hotel reservations (one lady on the wrong plane, two trapped in London's Savoy Hotel by a faulty elevator), the Boston tour involved 200 persons, a dazzling array of evening clothes and important names, ten tons of precious musical instruments and equipment, three famous conductors, 16 concerts and 40 "Friends of the Boston Symphony," eight of them past 80 years old. "Native hospitality" for the Friends included receptions by U.S. ambassadors in each country, an afternoon at the country pad of billionaire J. Paul Getty, cocktails at the House of Lords, lunch at Maxim's, a garden party on the Rhine given by the West German foreign minister, and a ride on the Elbe River aboard a German navy corvette.

Unloading a Boston bass in Rome

"We've been awash in champagne and canapés," said one Friend dreamily. "I've been to Europe before of course, but like this? . . ."

Since the trip—the first in 15 years—involved 120 musicians and managers, and since the orchestra always splits in two to fly in case of an accident, the prospect was for a 12,000-mile trip in two half-empty charter planes. Enter wives and Friends, who are orchestra trustees and patrons. They thought it would be wonderful to go along and cheer the hometown fiddlers, plus catch an opera or two in places like Vienna. At $3,000 a head ($1,000 as a contribution to the orchestra, $2,000 for the tour) the Friends deserved something a little special. So Mrs. Harris ("Fran") Fahnestock, a trustee and a pillar of social Boston, undertook to lay on a few special treats. She succeeded so well she found herself at the right elbow of Foreign Minister Walter Scheel on a bright spring day in Bonn introducing the American guests and being coached in German pronunciation by none other than Princess M. L. Bodey-Reuss. Later the foreign minister reciprocated by helping Mrs. Fahnestock carve a slippery sausage from a buffet so sumptuous that it sent two of the Friends back to their hotels for cameras and caused Mrs. Robert M. Murdock to remark that "I've never seen such hospitality—and I had saved money for lunch!"

The tour became, as do all lightning forays, a series of vignettes:

Bonn, Germany, the Beethovenhalle and a stiff black-tied audience rendered immobile by the unexpected presence of wine bottles and canapé trays on long candle-lit tables. "Help yourself," beamed the genial Right Reverend Monsignor Edward Murray. "We always drink during the Pops in Boston." A German reached for the wine, got halfway, sighed, and withdrew his hand. "We are perhaps too religious about music," he said. But he stamped his feet and waved his cigar later when Arthur Fiedler led his musicians into a rousing medley from Hair.

Grinzing, Austria, a wine shop and delicious ham on wooden platters. Violist Robert Karol enthralling a tableful of Friends by showing how to write his name in Japanese and explaining the orchestra's exchange-musician policy. "The orchestra and the Friends are getting acquainted," said Miss Mary Shaw Wheeler happily. "Boston unbends."

Vienna, the Czardasfürstin Restaurant. Assistant Pops Conductor

CONTINUED

CONTINUED

Harry Ellis Dickson, a violinist, is turned down cold when he tries to tip the hat check girl: "We never accept tips from musicians."

"Wow!" says Dickson. "Most of the guys in the orchestra are gourmets and we've been to all the great European restaurants. But this never happened to me before."

Frankfurt, Germany, a transit stop, and going back to the plane the women are made to open their hand luggage and submit to a body check. Some giggle at the unexpected indignity and an orchestra wife speaks up. "It's worse for the men," she said, "especially the reed instrument players who always make their own reeds. They have these very, very sharp knives . . ."

Rome, Italy, the Accademia Santa Cecilia. Two sections of an enormous truck are backed into a narrow street and a small Italian in his undershirt backed up to the truck, motioning the Boston stagehands to tip a wardrobe trunk onto his back. They do it reluctantly and stage manager Al Robison, 6′ 5″, whistles softly. "That thing weighs 300 pounds," he says. Robison has been with the Boston Symphony since 1955 and is the fifth generation of his family to help handle the precious instruments. "I asked my kid what he wanted to do and he said, 'Be a stagehand for the BSO.' I had kind of hoped . . . but still, it's a good job, especially if you like music." Robison and three assistants supervised the packing and air freight of all ten tons of orchestral equipment, then entrusted it to two German drivers and a tandem truck to haul it around Europe. "Jewels, real jewels," he says of the drivers. "They drove 15½ hours without stopping to make the connection between concerts in Bonn and Vienna. And they got to Vienna ten minutes early."

Bonn, Germany, the pink and gray, blue and gold Rathaus where J.F.K. once made a speech. Long-legged waitresses serve steins of beer among the vegetable stalls of the square, and a swarm of photographers wait for Joan Kennedy of Boston who is to read Prokofiev's Peter and the Wolf with the Pops Orchestra. She arrives late, with Fiedler, who promptly steals the show as the Bonn Firemen's Band, hidden behind a curtain, roars into When the Saints. . . . Fire buff Fiedler was handed a local fire helmet, the third one he collected on this trip. The commotion was worse the next night, when Senator Edward Kennedy arrived to hear his wife read and set off a near riot among the undisciplined press. The Bonn performance was a benefit for which some paid $45 and many could neither see nor hear. The Friends were horrified. "Americans are in some disrepute in the world," said Mrs. Frederick Leviseur. "We had hoped to show some Europeans that there are some of us with good manners."

PHOTOS BY DAVID LEES

Two "Friends" sample the buffet

Vienna, and all is almost forgiven, along with the general churlishness of British critics. The Vienna audience liked Conductor William Steinberg's choice of Mahler's Symphony Number 7, the house is sold out two nights running. . . . Rome, and the audience cheered tousle-haired young associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, despite a lackluster rendition of Beethoven's Eighth. Out in front in the best seats were the beaming Friends, applauding wildly.

"Nowadays a good musician can command good pay anywhere," remarked Mrs. George Sargent, part owner of the New England Patriots football team and sister-in-law of the governor of Massachusetts. "The only way we can keep him in Boston is if he feels we like him."

After this there shouldn't be any doubt about that.

by Dora Jane Hamblin

Tour manager David Rockefeller Jr. and Mrs. Morton Prince, 84, at garden fete

50

Belmont doctor tuned up BSO musicians on tour

Boston Globe
May 4, 1971

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

When the Boston Symphony went on a three-week-plus European tour in April, the caravan included a physician, Keran Chobanian, born in Rhode Island and now living in Belmont. It was Dr. Chobanian's third overseas tour with the Symphony, having accompanied them also to Europe and Russia in 1956 and to the Far East in 1960. He believes that the 1956 trip was the first time that a touring orchestra took a physician along. At that time, Chobanian was just beginning to establish his practice, and having heard somehow that the orchestra was thinking of including a doctor on the tour, and being himself a keen lover of music, he wrote to make inquiries and was eventually invited to take on that task.

Chobanian's association with the Boston Symphony is not now limited to its overseas tours. Some of the players have him as their personal physician, but beyond that he has, at the request of the orchestra's management, worked out a health plan out lavishly prepared on tests and so forth in which a large majority of the musicians voluntarily participates. They work through their own physicians, who, however, keep Chobanian informed. On a tour like the one just over, Chobanian works with the advantage of up-to-date health profiles of most of the people with whom he will be dealing. All that, moreover, seems to make the Boston Symphony the only orchestra to have — even without the title — someone who is in effect its medical director.

"The unpredictability of the problem is its only predictable element," says Chobanian, and so he sets out lavsihly prepared on such a tour. This time he took about 350 lbs. of supplies and equipment, the enormous bulk being partially accounted for by the inclusion of an approximately tenfold amount, measured in terms of most probable need, of most medications. Equipment included a newly designed, portable, battery-operated electrocardiogram machine ("we used it only once, and that was to see if it was working properly") and a mobile lab unit for the giving of blood sugar tests ("we have several potential diabetics").

Dr. Chobanian himself is an internist and cardiologist, and before setting out, he had extensive consultations with colleagues in other fields, notably orthopedics and ear-nose-and-throat men. Then, with the aid of the State Department, he made contact with English-speaking physicians in each of the 12 tour cities, ascertained their availability to help if necessary, and had their names, addresses, and phone numbers included in the musicians' tour guide.

He estimated that during 24 days on the road, he had about 500 visits, mostly upper respiratory (UR) problems: "once that starts, the germ theory goes into effect very rapidly." The incidence of ailments varies with local conditions. In Germany, where Chobanian thinks the air pollution is worse than in the United States, the UR miseries were considerable. Then, as the orchestra headed for Italy and Spain, gastro-intestinal problems move into the foreground, "though," he added, "in Hamburg there was an eel soup that seems to have knocked out just about everybody."

"Backstage at intermissions, there were always two lines, one for the john and one for the doctor." His 36 thermometers got plenty of use, and everyone was good-humored about the necessary improvisations like the Bechstein grand piano used as an examining table, or the trombone bell used in lieu of a head-mirror.

JUST TESTING — Dr. Keran Chobanian uses grand piano at Berlin's Philharmonia Hall as table while using portable electrocardiogram machine on Boston Symphony stage manager Al Robison.

(Globe Photo by Ed Fitzgerald)

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77.

APR 29 1971

New England Newsclip

Theater News and Views

Only Few BSO Musicians Find Kin on Europe Tour

By R. C. HAMMERICH

Richard Hammerich music writer for The Springfield Union, toured Europe with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

ROME —Only a handful of musicians in the Boston Symphony Orchestra passed through or near their home towns on their tour through Europe.

Strong Reactions

Some experienced strong emotional reactions.

There were also, 17 (mostly young) members who have played for varying periods with the Springfield, Mass., Symphony Orchestra before they joined Boston.

In a way, it is a measure of the changing character of American orchestras.

Roger Shermont, violinist born in Paris, says when the orchestra visited Europe in 1952, there were 21 French-born members. Now there are four.

When the orchestra reached Paris, Shermont visited his brother, Marcel, for the 11th time since he left home in 1947. There are also 15 or 20 aunts, uncles and cousins.

For a Week

Shermont is staying a week after the tour ended along with nearly 100 other orchestra members and wives.

Another French-born (Angers) member of the Orchestra, Roger Voisin, trumpeter, had a big reunion with 15 or 20 aunts, uncles and cousins in Paris Sunday. Then he headed for the Normandy beach for a week with his wife. (His mother is in Boston.)

There are two other Parisians (in addition to Shermont), Max Winder, violinist, and Bernard Zighera, harpist.

Winder thought his family had been lost in the turmoil of war when he left Paris in 1949, but in 1965 a French girl at a party in Framingham, Mass., mentioned that she had a relative in America.

There were a couple of members of the Boston Orchestra at the party and lives in Cambridge, to the party in minutes.

Cousin's Daughter

The girl was the daughter of one of the cousins Winder thought he had lost. He's staying a week with them after the tour.

Zighera's brother, Leon, is 80 and lives in Macon, France. They saw each other last in 1966 when Zighera passed through on his way to Greece where he had been invited to be a judge of a harp competition. (He was one of Harpo Marx's teachers.)

Zighera, too, is staying for an extra week for a visit with his brother.

There was more drama in Berlin; Eugene Lehner, violist, met his older brother after a 45-year separation.

The meeting was cool. The relationship is shrouded in mystery. Pieced together Lehner's long-time associates (he doesn't talk much about it), the story apparently is that Lehner's older brother was a Nazi sympathizer and his y ounger a friend of oppressed Jews in Germany.

Not Friendly

The Nazi killed the youngest brother and a sister, and Lehner has since not been friendly with the oldest brother.

Alfred Krips, violinist and concertmaster of the Pops, also had an uncomfortable visit in Berlin.

He visited the graves of his parents and he avoided contact with old friends whose friendship was weak when he had to flee Nazi pressure.

Harry Dickson, violinist, was astonished by the real-unreal, dreamlike appearance of the streets and buildings of East Berlin.

He was a student in Berlin in 1931-33 and could find no trace of the people he knew at the music conservatory.

Two Years Ago

In Vienna, Ernst Panenka, bassoonist, visited his brother, whom he last saw two years ago on a vacation.

Otherwise, almost everyone in the group has some sort of contact with Europe. In Hamburg, where my father was born, there are 28 Hammerichs in the telephone book, sme of them cousins, no doubt.

In the meantime, here are the names of 17 members of the Boston orchestra who have played with the Springfield Orchestra, some of them only with Alexander Leslie — but at least one, Richard Greenfield, a horn player hired for the tour, with Robert Gutter and Leslie as well as Robert Staffanson:

Violins: Gottfried Wilfinger, Stanley Benson, Sheldon Rotenberg, Leonard-Moss, William Waterhouse, Ayrton Pinto and Ikuko Mizuno.

Viola: Joseph Pietropaolo.

Cellos? Carol Procter, Ronald Feldman.

Piccolo-flute: Lois Schaefer.

French horns: Davic Ohanian, Ralph Pottle Richard Greenfield Michae Johns.

Timpani: Everett Firth.

Percussion: Frank Ep stein.

51

the Kennedys on tour

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SUN. 697,004
APR 18 1971

#9

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA
APRIL 18, 1971

5454 Boston Symphony

parade

cover story: Joan Kennedy—Coming Into Her Own
by Lloyd Shearer

How One School Turns Bad Guys Into Good Guys
by George Kannar

story begins on next page

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094
APR 18 1971

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
(S) 109,181
APR 18 1971 New England Newsclip

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
(M) 112,525 (S) 198,160
APR 18 1971 New England Newsclip

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87 000
APR 18 1971 New England Newsclip

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87 000
APR 18 1971 New England Newsclip

the Kennedys on tour

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SUN. 637,004
APR 18 1971

#9

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA
APRIL 18, 1971

parade

cover story: Joan Kennedy—Coming Into Her Own
by Lloyd Shearer

How One School Turns Bad Guys Into Good Guys
by George Kannar

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094
APR 18 1971

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
(S) 109,181
APR 18 1971
New England Newsclip

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
(S) 198,160
APR 18 1971
New England Newsclip

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 27,000
APR 18 1971
New England Newsclip

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 27,000
APR 18 1971
New England Newsclip

story begins on next page

52

—Women's Wear Daily

A few weeks ago Joan Kennedy gave a dinner in Washington for conductor Rafael Kubelik and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and showed up wearing hot pants and tunic. Previously she had worn the outfit in Hollywood where several producers thought that she belonged in films.

Joan Kennedy—Coming Into Her Own

by Lloyd Shearer

Last month, Joan Kennedy, 34, golden-haired, green-eyed, beautiful wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.), was paid $7500 by singer Andy Williams to play a little Debussy on his television program.

She was also booked to appear April 16 with the Boston Pops Orchestra in Bonn, Germany, to narrate "Peter and the Wolf."

These two stage appearances do not constitute particularly earth-shattering achievements. But to Joan Bennett Kennedy they mean a great deal—especially her performance on the Williams TV show in Hollywood.

"To think," she exclaims, "that they actually paid me for my work, a guest star's fee, that they thought I was worth it, that they really wanted me and that I contributed something—I can't tell you what it's done for my ego!

Of the $7500 Joan earned as a guest star on the Andy Williams TV show she plans to give most of it to Robert Kennedy Foundation. Both Joan and sister Candy are photogenic.

"To accompany Andy Williams on the piano, to follow Henry Mancini's conducting, to be treated like a regular pro—it's given me self-confidence and enthusiasm. I start thinking, 'Maybe I can have a musical career of my own? Maybe I can be more than Ted Kennedy's wife?' It's sort of like coming out of the shadows."

Figuratively speaking, Joan Kennedy has been living in the shadows ever since the late Francis Cardinal Spellman married her to Ted Kennedy in November, 1958. Theirs was one of the most lavish extravaganzas of the decade. The bridegroom was bugged for sound with a microphone under his left lapel, and the entire wedding ceremony with a cast of 1000 guests was photographed in technicolor by a professional film crew.

When Joan first married into the family she was more than a little uneasy. The Kennedys—male and female—were a group of strong, domineering, competitive personalities.

The competition

To compete against her sisters-in-law, sophisticated Jacqueline Kennedy and athletic and fecund Ethel Kennedy, to know that her husband was headed for the political arena in which she had never played—the setup understandably enough contributed to a young bride's basic insecurity.

"I always used to say," Joan tells friends, "that Ted should have married my younger sister Candy. She was always the family athlete. She plays tennis and golf and rides beautifully, while I'm still allergic to horses. (Candy is married to Robert McMurrey, a Houston lawyer). But my tennis is getting better and so is my skiing. Anyway, I guess there's no going back now. Ted met me and not my sister."

continued

continued from preceding page

The couple met in October, 1957, when music major Joan Bennett (daughter of a Catholic mother and a Protestant father) was attending Manhattanville College, a Catholic institution in Purchase, N.Y., previously attended by Rose Kennedy (Ted's mother), Jean (his sister) and Ethel (his sister-in-law). The Kennedy family was donating a gymnasium to the school, and Ted, then a student in Charlottesville at the University of Virginia Law School, was on hand to make the dedication speech.

'Who's the blonde?'

Joan attended the tea which followed the dedication, and Ted, with the well-trained Kennedy eye for a curvaceous figure and a pretty face, immediately spotted her. "Who's the blonde?" he asked his sister Jean.

In a matter of minutes he was introduced. The courtship began that night via telephone when Kennedy returned to Charlottesville. It bloomed when he introduced Joan to her first ski slope in Stowe, Vt., during her Christmas vacation.

"It was then," Joan remembers, "that I fell in love with him."

That was more than a dozen years ago. Since her marriage, Joan has weathered the assassination of her two brothers-in-law, the lingering death of the family patriarch Joe Kennedy, three miscarriages, Ted's near fatal airplane crash with Birch Bayh in 1964, the tragic accident at Chappaquiddick, plus the many deaths in Ethel Kennedy's family. On balance her married years have been punctuated more by tragedy than triumph.

Joan, Ted, and two of their three children. She was born in New York, reared in its suburbs. Her parents were divorced in Titusville, Fla., last year.

Joan goes through White House receiving line, gets studied look from Mrs. Ferdinand Marcos, Philippines First Lady. Mrs. Nixon is in background.

All of this has matured, saddened, sobered, and deepened the once gay young suburban debutante.

In the early years of her marriage when she was more shy and inhibited than she is now, Joan accepted the maxim that "in this family, you follow the crowd." This included summers at Hyannis Port, winter ski vacations, world travels, and of course the numerous Kennedy political campaigns. She attended the right teas, volunteered for the right charities, always presented the right image, and constantly learned.

During her first pregnancy when Ted was away for the last two months helping with his brother's Presidential campaign, Joan says, "I realized then that if I didn't travel with Ted, I would hardly ever see him."

So she became an experienced campaigner, charming her audiences with tiny, gentle, ladylike speeches: "My name is Joan Kennedy, and I want to say thank you for the Kennedy family. I ask you to send Bobby, Ted, John, Birch [etc.] back to the Senate, House, Congress [etc.]."

Between campaigns, rallies, St. Patrick's Day parades and other functions, Joan returned to her own interests: reading (she likes historical romances such as Nicholas and Alexandra and the works of Irving Stone), but above all, music. She has played the piano since the age of 5, and, says no less an authority than Henry Mancini: "She plays exceedingly well, with feeling and understanding. She knows what she's doing at the keyboard."

Mother of three

At age 34, mother of Kara, 11; Teddy, 9, and Patrick, 3, mistress of three homes, in Boston, Hyannis Port, and the $500,000 main residence in McLean, Va.—Joan Kennedy has finally reached that point in life where she is learning to assert her own personality.

"For years I went along with everything the family said," she admits, "because I didn't dare to do otherwise. But now I speak up and say what I think, and it seems to work out better for everyone."

Blessed with a shapely figure (5 feet 7, 114 pounds), Joan is not afraid to show it. She likes clothes and has on occasion worn mini skirts and hot pants. Her ski clothes fit as if she were born into them and reveal a figure tantalizing enough to make any man look twice.

Although she has all the creature comforts she wants, all the domestic help she needs, five in service including talented multipurpose secretary Rosalie Helm, Joan also realizes that her husband is the recipient of more death threats and crank mail than any other man in Government.

Fears for husband

She does not want him to run for the Presidency and has said so numerous times. She fears a third assassination, but she knows, too, that Ted simply cannot and will not quit the political arena or seek to escape his destiny.

As to her own destiny, a close friend says, "For years Joan took a back seat to the other Kennedy women, to Jackie, Ethel, Pat Lawford, Eunice Shriver, Jean Smith, and, of course, Rose Kennedy. But now the doors are beginning to open for her. She's the prettiest of the Kennedy lot, she's developing into the Washington hostess with the mostest. She's enormously photogenic and she can play the piano.

"She was so good on the Andy Williams show that I understand several Hollywood producers would like to star her in films. Can you picture that? Joan Kennedy, the film star. It's not beyond probability, you know. Yes, Joansie is coming into her own."

54

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111

MAR 7 1971

KEEPING POSTED

"Mrs. Kennedy's sister-in-law, Mrs. Robert F. Kennedy, appeared on the Andy Williams Show a couple of weeks ago, but very few people knew it."

Joan Kennedy on Television

By Dorothy McCardle

Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, has been in California this week, taping her appearance on the Andy Williams Show. The show will appear Saturday.

Mrs. Kennedy's sister-in-law, Mrs. Robert F. Kennedy, appeared on the Andy Williams Show a couple of weeks ago, but very few people knew it.

"I was at the show as a spectator only," said Ethel Kennedy on the night that she accompanied Sen. Edward Kennedy to the reception for the Rev. Walter E. Fauntroy at the Woman's National Democratic Club.

"The only talent I have is to be in the audience," she said. "I had never seen a show taped for television before. I found it fascinating."

Actually, Ethel Kennedy's picture was projected midway in the show to TV viewers as the cameras focused on the audience.

Sen. Kennedy said that his wife Joan will go to Germany with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this spring.

She will do a reading of "Peter and the Wolf" with the Orchestra in Bonn, he said.

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,818

APR 22 1971

JOAN AND THE BOSTONIANS: Officials at American Embassies along the route of the Boston Symphony's European tour are just as happy to see the orchestra head home. Seems Friends of the BSO traveling as paying sponsors on the trip had been promised lavish receptions in each capital — which the embassy folks had to set up. Worse, they complained, was the BSO featured attraction, Joan Kennedy, usually skipped the Friends reception for private parties which meant, according to one ranking Embassy official, "We got stuck with the old ladies." In Rome Wednesday Joan was still the star in the lobby where nuns and schoolgirls rushed to shake hands and paparazzi swarmed all over with flash cameras. She told Eye she had enjoyed the tour. She was heading home from Rome. Onstage the BSO under Michael Tilson Thomas drew moans for an awful performance of Beethoven's Eighth but recuperated fast with a splendid job on Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra.

PORT JERVIS, N. Y.
UNION GAZETTE
D. 4,500

MAY 4 1971

Edward Albee's "All Over" will live its title's death phrase, May 1...Multi-billionaire Jean Paul Getty sold only the operation of his N.Y. Hotel Pierre -- but kept the ground it's on, smart man...D.K. Ludwig, probably richer than Getty, took the latter's Acapulco swankery, Pierre Marques, off Jean Paul's distant hands: Ludwig's "Acapulco Princess," opening in October, will be the most lavish resort hotel in the history of leisure.

When jazz pianist Patti Wicks at the Apartment closes her eyes while playing, we can't ever tell if she's being soulful or sleeping: The gifted kid works daytimes in an office, toils betimes on her musical doctorate thesis (she has her master's already) and just may be napping in snoozy desperation...Dialogue in Cinerama's "Derby" documentary is even earthier (that means dirtier) than you'd hear while watching the Roller Derby it depicts from a front pew; make that phew!...The Gargantua III gorilla touring with the Ringling Bros. Circus is lots larger than the Big Top's original of that name: This big ape's the largest mountain gorilla in captivity (Where'll he sleep? Anywhere he wants to!) ...Has his keeper scared. Jack O'Brian

Billy Daniels (now at Dangerfield's) has the honor, if not any retroactive financial satisfaction, of being the first black performer with his own network TV show (early 50s on ABC -- and a good one)...It didn't get enough commercials, no more than did the next black pioneer, Nat King Cole, whose superb variety show got on NBC-TV through the personal insistence of the late NBC-RCA Veep Manny Sachs, whose heart was in the corrrect place if not his commercial timing.

Flock of important Bostonians who traipsed expensively along with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its European tour have a post mortem beef: Joan Kennedy (Mrs. Teddy), who performed as narrator with the BSO, didn't bother to attend the large receptions and dinners for the touring BSO boosters and European guests...Joanie Baby went to private bashes with her chic European pals instead; but she's a Star! (She is?)

"Fantasticks" and "I Do, I Do" composer Tom Jones and wife Ellie are saying so-long...Already-multi-millionaire David Frost adds more gelt with a series of summer concert appearances: His "Evening with David Frost" will include Barbara McNair and Tiny Tim when he plays the Westbury Music Fair, Mineola, L.I.; Miss McN. and Hines, Hines & Dad at Toronto's O'Keefe theatrical hanger; Enzo Stuarti and Karen Wyman at the Wallingford, Conn., Oakdale Music Theatre; Peggy Lee co-stars with the shrewd Limey at the Merriwether Post Pavilion in Columbia, Md.; Melba Moore joins him for Las Vegas and Lake Tahoe; all by his lonesome at the Concord in the Sour Cream Alps; betimes commuting to N.Y. daytimes to tape his syndicated talk-show. (Wonder why he doesn't bring along his best gal, Dinahnn Carroll.)

Boston Sunday Advertiser
May 2, 1971
Jack O'Brien's syndicated column, p A18

Flock of important Bostonians who traipsed expensively along with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its European tour have a post-mortem beef: Joan Kennedy, who performed as narrator with the BSO, didn't bother to attend the large receptions and dinners for the touring BSO boosters and European guests . . . Joanie Baby went to private bashes with her chic European pals instead; but she's a Star! (She is?)

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

APR 21 1971

Tardy Kennedys Upset Germans

By DAVID BINDER
Special to The New York Times

BONN, April 20 — "Your Teddy Kennedy is a rube," a senior protocol officer of the Bonn Government said recently to an American acquaintance. The word he used means turnip in German, but it is also the slang equivalent of rapscallion. He did not mean it kindly.

The diplomat was referring to the happenings last week when Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and his wife, Joan, descended on the Federal capital with an entourage of more than 100, including the Boston Pops Orchestra.

What annoyed the protocol official and nearly everyone else who had anything to do with the Kennedys here was their seemingly unbreakable habit of showing up late for every appointment.

The Germans in this century have not enjoyed a reputation abroad for good manners. But one point of etiquette tha they carefully observe is punctuality.

So it was that Kennedy tardiness made a bad impression not only on their official hosts but also on the German press.

Concert Was Benefit

The occasion was a benefit concert at the Beethoven Hall, with Mrs. Kennedy as the reader in the Pops Orchestra's performance of Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf."

A critic for the Hamburg Die Welt said she had done the job "with the voice of a long-suffering newscaster."

The waiting for the Kennedys in Germany began in Hamburg, where Mrs. Kennedy slept through a reception planned for her. It continued in Bonn at the Town Hall, where she kept Mayor Peter Kramer and his fire department band waiting 40 minutes until she showed up in blue jeans.

Meanwhile, Senator Kennedy was late for an appointment with Chancellery Minister Horst Ehmke, who stood for half an hour with increasing impatience at the steps of Schaumburg Palace to greet him.

Together, the Kennedys showed up an hour late for a cocktail party given them by the United States Ambassador, Kenneth Rush, at his home in Bad Godesberg.

Playing no favorites, they went on to appear 90 minutes late at another reception in suburban Rolandseck. The host, Helmut Kohl, Minister President of Rhineland-Palatinate, said somewhat stonily: "Kennedys were always welcome here, and that is no different today."

Meanwhile, Foreign Minister Walter Scheel was waiting to give the Kennedys something to eat. He waited two hours.

Topping it all off, Mrs. Kennedy showed up late for the concert.

An American diplomat attempted to soothe the Germans with the explanation that tardiness was "customary and planned" by the Kennedys as a means of increasing the anticipation of their audiences.

"But this trick didn't catch on here," wrote Walter Henkels, who enjoys a reputation as Bonn's "court scribe" in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung. "A thin wall of alienation and distance seemed to have risen up between Senator Edward Kennedy and his wife, Joan, on the one hand and the Bonn public on the other."

Commenting on their lateness, he said: "The honorable Senator came, saw, and did not conquer."

'Lack of Feeling' Cited

Writing in the Süddeutsche Zeitung, Sabine Reuter mentioned the "lack of feeling for time and protocol" of the Kennedys.

Not even Arthur Fiedler's 93-piece orchestra came away unscathed. The German press reported the remark of the Soviet press attaché and reputed intelligence operative, A. J. Bogomolov, that the pianist, Malcolm Frager, had "missed three notes" in Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto.

There was press criticism also of the 40-odd American benefactors of the Boston Pops who were members of the party, and of the fact that most of the 900 paying listeners at the concert had entered with tickets priced at more than $30—an astronomical sum for concert-goers here.

"It was only for an exclusive, financially mighty group," concluded the Bonner General Anzeiger.

There was only one German consolation prize for Senator Kennedy. Bonn's leading seeress, a gypsy named Margarete Gussantier, who calls herself Buchela, predicted: "You will be President of America, but not yet."

He is reported as having replied: "I have time."

Mrs. Kennedy Off to Italy

LONDON, April 20 (UPI)—Mrs. Joan Kennedy left London for Rome today to shop, sightsee and attend a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"This time I will be sitting in the audience enjoying the music," she said. Mrs. Kennedy stayed on in London after her husband, who flew to Bonn to attend her performance last week, left for Washington Sunday.

She planned to visit relatives in Florence tomorrow before returning to the United States later this week.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

APR 25 1971

PLEASED: A Kennedy aide says he is "grinning from ear to ear" over the favorable reaction here and in Bonn, Germany, to his wife Joan's appearances with the Boston Symphony. Mrs. Kennedy received five curtain calls after narrating "Peter and the Wolf" before a packed house in Bonn. Both she and the senator, however, were criticized for constantly being late to social gatherings given in their honor by German officials. "Oh, that's nothing new," the staffer said. "Sen. Kennedy is always late because he's always held up."

The Morning News
PATERSON, N. J.
DAILY 14,952

APR 28 1971

When jazz pianist Patti Wicks at the Apartment closes her eyes while playing, we can't ever tell if she's being soulful or sleeping: The gifted kid works daytimes in an office, toils betimes on her musical doctorate thesis (she has her master's already) and just may be napping in snoozy desperation . . . Dialogue in Cinerama's "Derby" documentary is even earthier (that means dirtier) than you'd hear while watching the Roller Derby it depicts from a front pew; make that phew! . . . The Gargantua II gorilla touring with the Ringling Bros. Circus is lots larger than the Big Top's original of that name: This big ape's the largest mountain gorilla in captivity (Where'll he sleep? Anywhere he wants to!) . . . Has his keeper scared. J. O'Brien

Billy Daniels (now at Dangerfield's) has the honor, if not any retroactive financial satisfaction, of being the first black performer with his own network TV show (early 50s on ABC — and a good one) . . . It didn't get enough commercials, no more than did the next black pioneer, Nat King Cole, whose superb variety show got on NBC-TV through the personal insistence of the late NBC-RCA Veep Manny Sachs, whose heart was in the correct place if not his commercial timing.

Flock of important Bostonians who traipsed expensively along with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its European tour have a post mortem beef: Joan Kennedy (Mrs. Teddy), who performed as narrator with the BSO, didn't bother to attend the large receptions and dinners for the touring BSO boosters and European guests . . . Joanie Baby went to private bashes with her chic European pals instead; but she's a Star! (She is?)

"Punctuality," said Louis XVIII, "is the politeness of kings." Kennedys are not kings—as no one in Bonn last week needed reminding. On tour with the Boston Pops Orchestra, Teddy Kennedy and his wife Joan (who narrates Peter and the Wolf), seemed to be late everywhere they went. Joan kept Mayor Peter Krämer and the fire department band cooling their heels for 45 minutes at the City Hall. Joan was at least an hour late for U.S. Ambassador Kenneth Rush's cocktail party. Joan was two hours late for the party given by West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel; Teddy was only 20 minutes late for his appointment with Chancellery Minister Horst Ehmke. At a reception given by the Minister-President of North Rhine-Westphalia, Teddy was 90 minutes late and Joan didn't show at all. And on the night of the concert, Teddy turned up 45 minutes late at the table where Foreign Minister Scheel and Ambassador Rush were waiting for him. The German press took note. The Süddeutsche Zeitung referred to the Kennedys' "lack of feeling for time and protocol." Wrote influential Columnist Walter Henkels in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung: "A subtle wall of estrangement and aloofness seemed to have arisen between Senator Edward Kennedy and his wife Joan on the one hand, and the Bonn people on the other."

Time May 1, 1971

JOAN & TED

D.P.A.—PICTORIAL

54

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111

MAR 7 1971

KEEPING POSTED

"Mrs. Kennedy's sister-in-law, Mrs. Robert F. Kennedy, appeared on the Andy Williams Show a couple of weeks ago, but very few people knew it."

Joan Kennedy on Television

By Dorothy McCardle

Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, has been in California this week, taping her appearance on the Andy Williams Show. The show will appear Saturday.

Mrs. Kennedy's sister-in-law, Mrs. Robert F. Kennedy, appeared on the Andy Williams Show a couple of weeks ago, but very few people knew it.

"I was at the show as a spectator only," said Ethel Kennedy on the night that she accompanied Sen. Edward Kennedy to the reception for the Rev. Walter E. Fauntroy at the Woman's National Democratic Club.

"The only talent I have is to be in the audience," she said. "I had never seen a show taped for television before. I found it fascinating."

Actually, Ethel Kennedy's picture was projected midway in the show to TV viewers as the cameras focused on the audience.

Sen. Kennedy said that his wife Joan will go to Germany with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this spring.

She will do a reading of "Peter and the Wolf" with the Orchestra in Bonn, he said.

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,818

APR 22 1971

JOAN AND THE BOSTONIANS: Officials at American Embassies along the route of the Boston Symphony's European tour are just as happy to see the orchestra head home. Seems Friends of the BSO traveling as paying sponsors on the trip had been promised lavish receptions in each capital — which the embassy folks had to set up. Worse, they complained, was the BSO featured attraction, Joan Kennedy, usually skipped the Friends reception for private parties which meant, according to one ranking Embassy official, "We got stuck with the old ladies." In Rome Wednesday Joan was still the star in the lobby where nuns and schoolgirls rushed to shake hands and paparazzi swarmed all over with flash cameras. She told Eye she had enjoyed the tour. She was heading home from Rome. Onstage the BSO under Michael Tilson Thomas drew moans for an awful performance of Beethoven's Eighth but recuperated fast with a splendid job on Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra.

PORT JERVIS, N. Y.
UNION GAZETTE
D. 4,500

MAY 4 1971

Edward Albee's "All Over" will live its title's death phrase, May 1...Multi-billionaire Jean Paul Getty sold only the operation of his N.Y. Hotel Pierre -- but kept the ground it's on, smart man...D.K. Ludwig, probably richer than Getty, took the latter's Acapulco swankery, Pierre Marques, off Jean Paul's distant hands: Ludwig's "Acapulco Princess," opening in October, will be the most lavish resort hotel in the history of leisure.

When jazz pianist Patti Wicks at the Apartment closes her eyes while playing, we can't ever tell if she's being soulful or sleeping: The gifted kid works daytimes in an office, toils betimes on her musical doctorate thesis (she has her master's already) and just may be napping in snoozy desperation...Dialogue in Cinerama's "Derby" documentary is even earthier (that means dirtier) than you'd hear while watching the Roller Derby it depicts from a front pew; make that phew!...The Gargantua III gorilla touring with the Ringling Bros. Circus is lots larger than the Big Top's original of that name: This big ape's the largest mountain gor illa in captivity (Where'll he sleep? Anywhere he wants to!) ...Has his keeper scared. Jack O'Brian

Billy Daniels (now at Dangerfield's) has the honor, if not any retroactive financial satisfaction, of being the first black performer with his own network TV show (early 50s on ABC -- and a good one)...It didn't get enough commercials, no more than did the next black pioneer, Nat King Cole, whose superb variety show got on NBC-TV through the personal insistence of the late NBC-RCA Veep Manny Sachs, whose heart was in the corrrect place if not his commercial timing.

Flock of important Bostonians who traipsed expensively along with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its European tour have a post mortem beef: Joan Kennedy (Mrs. Teddy), who performed as narrator with the BSO, didn't bother to attend the large receptions and dinners for the touring BSO boosters and European guests...Joanie Baby went to private bashes with her chic European pals instead; but she's a Star! (She is?)

"Fantasticks" and "I Do, I Do" composer Tom Jones and wife Ellie are saying so-long...Already-multi-millionaire David Frost adds more gelt with a series of summer concert appearances: His "Evening with David Frost" will include Barbara McNair and Tiny Tim when he plays the Westbury Music Fair, Mineola, L.I.; Miss McN. and Hines, Hines & Dad at Toronto's O'Keefe theatrical hanger; Enzo Stuarti and Karen Wyman at the Wallingford, Conn., Oakdale Music Theatre; Peggy Lee co-stars with the shrewd Limey at the Merriwether Post Pavilion in Columbia, Md.; Melba Moore joins him for Las Vegas and Lake Tahoe; all by his lonesome at the Concord in the Sour Cream Alps; betimes commuting to N.Y. daytimes to tape his syndicated talk-show. (Wonder why he doesn't bring along his best gal, Diahann Carroll.)

Boston Sunday Advertiser
May 2, 1971
Jack O'Brien's syndicated column, pA18

Flock of important Bostonians who traipsed expensively along with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its European tour have a post-mortem beef: Joan Kennedy, who performed as narrator with the BSO, didn't bother to attend the large receptions and dinners for the touring BSO boosters and European guests . . . Joanie Baby went to private bashes with her chic European pals instead; but she's a Star! (She is?)

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

APR 21 1971

Tardy Kennedys Upset Germans

By DAVID BINDER
Special to The New York Times

BONN, April 20 — "Your Teddy Kennedy is a rube," a senior protocol officer of the Bonn Government said recently to an American acquaintance. The word he used means turnip in German, but it is also the slang equivalent of rapscallion. He did not mean it kindly.

The diplomat was referring to the happenings last week when Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and his wife, Joan, descended on the Federal capital with an entourage of more than 100, including the Boston Pops Orchestra.

What annoyed the protocol official and nearly everyone else who had anything to do with the Kennedys here was their seemingly unbreakable habit of showing up late for every appointment.

The Germans in this century have not enjoyed a reputation abroad for good manners. But one point of etiquette tha they carefully observe is punctuality.

So it was that Kennedy tardiness made a bad impression not only on their official hosts but also on the German press.

Concert Was Benefit

The occasion was a benefit concert at the Beethoven Hall, with Mrs. Kennedy as the reader in the Pops Orchestra's performance of Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf."

A critic for the Hamburg Die Welt said she had done the job "with the voice of a long-suffering newscaster."

The waiting for the Kennedys in Germany began in Hamburg, where Mrs. Kennedy slept through a reception planned for her. It continued in Bonn at the Town Hall, where she kept Mayor Peter Kramer and his fire department band waiting 40 minutes until she showed up in blue jeans.

Meanwhile, Senator Kennedy was late for an appointment with Chancellery Minister Horst Ehmke, who stood for half an hour with increasing impatience at the steps of Schaumburg Palace to greet him.

Together, the Kennedys showed up an hour late for a cocktail party given them by the United States Ambassador, Kenneth Rush, at his home in Bad Godesberg.

Playing no favorites, they went on to appear 90 minutes late at another reception in suburban Rolandseck. The host, Helmut Kohl, Minister President of Rhineland-Palatinate, said somewhat stonily: "Kennedys were always welcome here, and that is no different today."

Meanwhile, Foreign Minister Walter Scheel was waiting to give the Kennedys something to eat. He waited two hours.

Topping it all off, Mrs. Kennedy showed up late for the concert.

An American diplomat attempted to soothe the Germans with the explanation that tardiness was "customary and planned" by the Kennedys as a means of increasing the anticipation of their audiences.

"But this trick didn't catch on here," wrote Walter Henkels, who enjoys a reputation as Bonn's "court scribe" in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung. "A thin wall of alienation and distance seemed to have risen up between Senator Edward Kennedy and his wife, Joan, on the one hand and the Bonn public on the other."

Commenting on their lateness, he said: "The honorable Senator came, saw, and did not conquer."

'Lack of Feeling' Cited

Writing in the Süddeutsche Zeitung, Sabine Reuter mentioned the "lack of feeling for time and protocol" of the Kennedys.

Not even Arthur Fiedler's 93-piece orchestra came away unscathed. The German press reported the remark of the Soviet press attaché and reputed intelligence operative, A. J. Bogomolov, that the pianist, Malcolm Frager, had "missed three notes" in Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto.

There was press criticism also of the 40-odd American benefactors of the Boston Pops who were members of the party, and of the fact that most of the 900 paying listeners at the concert had entered with tickets priced at more than $30—an astronomical sum for concert-goers here.

"It was only for an exclusive, financially mighty group," concluded the Bonner General Anzeiger.

There was only one German consolation prize for Senator Kennedy. Bonn's leading seeress, a gypsy named Margarete Gussantier, who calls herself Buchela, predicted: "You will be President of America, but not yet."

He is reported as having replied: "I have time."

Mrs. Kennedy Off to Italy

LONDON, April 20 (UPI)—Mrs. Joan Kennedy left London for Rome today to shop, sightsee and attend a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"This time I will be sitting in the audience enjoying the music," she said. Mrs. Kennedy stayed on in London after her husband, who flew to Bonn to attend her performance last week, left for Washington Sunday.

She planned to visit relatives in Florence tomorrow before returning to the United States later this week.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

APR 25 1971

PLEASED: A Kennedy aide says he is "grinning from ear to ear" over the favorable reaction here and in Bonn, Germany, to his wife Joan's appearances with the Boston Symphony. Mrs. Kennedy received five curtain calls after narrating "Peter and the Wolf" before a packed house in Bonn. Both she and the senator, however, were criticized for constantly being late to social gatherings given in their honor by German officials. "Oh, that's nothing new," the staffer said. "Sen. Kennedy is always late because he's always held up."

The Morning News
PATERSON, N. J.
DAILY 14,952

APR 28 1971

When jazz pianist Patti Wicks at the Apartment closes her eyes while playing, we can't ever tell if she's being soulful or sleeping: The gifted kid works daytimes in an office, toils betimes on her musical doctorate thesis (she has her master's already) and just may be napping in snoozy desperation . . . Dialogue in Cinerama's "Derby" documentary is even earthier (that means dirtier) than you'd hear while watching the Roller Derby it depicts from a front pew; make that phew! . . . The Gargantua II gorilla touring with the Ringling Bros. Circus is lots larger than the Big Top's original of that name: This big ape's the largest mountain gorilla in captivity (Where'll he sleep? Anywhere he wants to!) . . . Has his keeper scared. J. O'Brian

Billy Daniels (now at Dangerfield's) has the honor, if not any retroactive financial satisfaction, of being the first black performer with his own network TV show (early 50s on ABC — and a good one) . . . It didn't get enough commercials, no more than did the next black pioneer, Nat King Cole, whose superb variety show got on NBC-TV through the personal insistence of the late NBC-RCA Veep Manny Sachs, whose heart was in the correct place if not his commercial timing.

Flock of important Bostonians who traipsed expensively along with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its European tour have a post mortem beef: Joan Kennedy (Mrs. Teddy), who performed as narrator with the BSO, didn't bother to attend the large receptions and dinners for the touring BSO boosters and European guests . . . Joanie Baby went to private bashes with her chic European pals instead; but she's a Star! (She is?)

. . .

"Punctuality," said Louis XVIII, "is the politeness of kings." Kennedys are not kings—as no one in Bonn last week needed reminding. On tour with the Boston Pops Orchestra, Teddy Kennedy and his wife Joan (who narrates Peter and the Wolf), seemed to be late everywhere they went. Joan kept Mayor Peter Krämer and the fire department band cooling their heels for 45 minutes at the City Hall. Joan was at least an hour late for U.S. Ambassador Kenneth Rush's cocktail party. Joan was two hours late for the party given by West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel: Teddy was only 20 minutes late for his appointment with Chancellery Minister Horst Ehmke. At a reception given by the Minister-President of North Rhine-Westphalia, Teddy was 90 minutes late and Joan didn't show at all. And on the night of the concert, Teddy turned up 45 minutes late at the table where Foreign Minister Scheel and Ambassador Rush were waiting for him. The German press took note. The Süddeutsche Zeitung referred to the Kennedys' "lack of feeling for time and protocol." Wrote influential Columnist Walter Henkels in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung: "A subtle wall of estrangement and aloofness seemed to have arisen between Senator Edward Kennedy and his wife Joan on the one hand, and the Bonn people on the other."

Time May 1, 1971

JOAN & TED

D.P.A.—PICTORIAL

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 15 1971 New England Newsclip

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 14 1971 New England

Joan Kennedy doesn't want husband to seek presidency

TOURING — Mrs. Joan Kennedy was at London's Heathrow Airport yesterday enroute to Bonn. (AP)

Reuter

LONDON — Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, flew into London yesterday and in a frank interview with airport reporters said she did not want her husband to run for President.

Mrs. Kennedy said: "If my husband decides to run, then I will be with him all the way. But I would rather he did not run. We have three young children."

She added: "Having been sister-in-law of a President, I've been close at hand and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job."

Kennedy has frequently been mentioned as a possible candidate for the presidency next year. When asked if she thought her husband would try for the Democratic nomination, Mrs. Kennedy said: "He's leaving it open. You can't blame him."

(Asked in New York about his wife's remark, Kennedy said: "I've made my position clear on that. I'm keeping my mind open, but I'm not a candidate," United Press International reported.)

Asked if it might be too tough in America's top job, she answered: "Yes, I guess that's about it."

Mrs. Kennedy was going to Bonn later yesterday to meet her husband and to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a concert there.

She said: "My husband is coming to see me. I was going to play the piano in Bonn, but then it was decided that I should do "Peter and the Wolf" instead."

Mrs. Kennedy added that the last "fun thing" she did was to play the piano on the "Andy Williams Show."

She and her husband are expected to come back to London this weekend.

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,818
APR 15 1971

TOO HOT A SEAT: At London's Heathrow Airport, Mrs. Edward Kennedy told the press her husband is leaving the matter of running for President open. You can't blame him. But she would prefer that he didn't run, she admitted. "Being sister-in-law of a President, I've been close at hand and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job." Joan was on her way to Bonn where she'll narrate "Peter and the Wolf" with the Boston Symphony. Ted will be in the audience, Joan said. They're planning to return together to London over the weekend for a strictly private visit.

FORBES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 433,000
JUN 15 1971

FORGET ABOUT HIM

Teddy Kennedy will doubtless continue showing up appreciably in the pre-Democratic Convention polls as a prospective Presidential nominee. He'll continue to be written about as a possibility by the political pundits who must fill space and sometimes have no realities to write about.

But his prospects for nomination are as nearly nil as yours and mine. The Convention power centers have written him off to an even greater degree than he has written himself out.

It's often little, unportentous happenings that reveal the state of a politico's appeal. Two such re Teddy:

Item 1: In their West German tour with the Boston Pops Orchestra, Senator Kennedy and his style-extreme wife Joan were consistently, rudely late on nearly every occasion that West German bigwigs and littlewigs gathered to do these Kennedy-namebearers honor.

Item 2: At the recent Washington $500-a-plate Democratic fund-raising dinner, Party treasurer Robert Strauss introduced all the many Democratic hopefuls: Senators Bayh, Hughes, Humphrey, Jackson, McGovern, Muskie and Representative Mills. With the enumeration completed, he had proceeded to other things when someone handed him a note. Said Strauss, "Oh, yes, how could we have overlooked introducing the Senator from Massachusetts, Ted Kennedy."

The silence was audible.

Then, a paucity of scattered applause.

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 546,570 SUN. 712,125
APR 15 1971

Joan Kennedy arrives in London. (UPI)

First Lady? No thanks, Joan says

Watertown Daily Times
WATERTOWN, N. Y.
D. 43,427
APR 14 1971

PAGE ONE — AP Wirephoto

Mrs. Joan Kennedy, walking in corridor at London's Heathrow Airport, says she hopes her husband decides not to run for president in 1972 because she doesn't want to be first lady.

JOAN HOPES TED WON'T RUN IN '72

Associated Press Wirephoto

Joan Kennedy arrives at London airport.

LONDON (AP) — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife said today she hopes he decides not to run for president in 1972 because she doesn't want to be First Lady.

"Being the sister-in-law of a president," said 34-year-old Joan Kennedy, "I've been close at hand, and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job."

Kennedy has said he is not in the running for the White House in 1972, but his wife commented, "He is leaving it open. You can't blame him, can you?"

"If my husband decides to run, then I will be with him all the way," she added. "But I would rather he did not run. We have three young children. If I were an older woman, the situation might be different."

Mrs. Kennedy passed through London en route to Bonn, where she will be the narrator in "Peter and the Wolf" with the touring Boston Symphony. She said the senator is meeting her there and they will return by way of London during the weekend.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656
APR 14 1971

associated press story

Joan Has No Desire To Be First Lady, She Says

The Observer-Dispatch
UTICA, N. Y.
D. 45,005 SUN. 58,143
APR 14 1971

Joan Shuns First Lady Role Idea

LONDON (AP) — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife said today she hopes he decides not to run for president in 1972 because she doesn't want to be first lady.

"Being the sister-in-law of a president, said 34-year-old Joan Kennedy, "I've been close at hand, and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job."

Kennedy has said he is not in the running for the White House in 1972, but his wife commented, "He is leaving it open. You can't blame him, can you?"

Kennedy, in New York City on a hospital inspection tour, said of his wife's statement: "I have nothing to add to what I said before."

"If my husband decides to run, then I will be with him all the way," she added. "But I would rather he did not run. We have three young children. If I were an older woman, the situation might be different."

Mrs. Kennedy passed through London en route to Bonn, where she will be the narrator in "Peter and the Wolf" with the touring Boston Symphony. She said the senator is meeting her there and they will return by way of London during the weekend.

tour, said of his wife's tement: "I have nothing add to what I said be-
e."
"If my husband decides run, then I will be with n all the way," she add-
. "But I would rather he l not run. We have three ung children. If I were older woman, the situa-
n might be different."
Mrs. Kennedy passed
ough London en route
Bonn, where she will be narrator in "Peter and Wolf" with the touring
Boston Symphony. She said
the senator is meeting her there and they will return
by way of London during the weekend.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 15 1971 New England Newsclip

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
APR 14 1971 New England

Joan Kennedy doesn't want husband to seek presidency

TOURING — Mrs. Joan Kennedy was at London's Heathrow Airport yesterday enroute to Bonn. (AP)

Reuter

LONDON — Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, flew into London yesterday and in a frank interview with airport reporters said she did not want her husband to run for President.

Mrs. Kennedy said: "If my husband decides to run, then I will be with him all the way. But I would rather he did not run. We have three young children."

She added: "Having been sister-in-law of a President, I've been close at hand and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job."

Kennedy has frequently been mentioned as a possible candidate for the presidency next year. When asked if she thought her husband would try for the Democratic nomination, Mrs. Kennedy said: "He's leaving it open. You can't blame him."

(Asked in New York about his wife's remark, Kennedy said: "I've made my position clear on that. I'm keeping my mind open, but I'm not a candidate," United Press International reported.)

Asked if it might be too tough in America's top job, she answered: "Yes, I guess that's about it."

Mrs. Kennedy was going to Bonn later yesterday to meet her husband and to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a concert there.

She said: "My husband is coming to see me. I was going to play the piano in Bonn, but then it was decided that I should do "Peter and the Wolf" instead."

Mrs. Kennedy added that the last "fun thing" she did was to play the piano on the "Andy Williams Show."

She and her husband are expected to come back to London this weekend.

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,818
APR 15 1971

TOO HOT A SEAT: At London's Heathrow Airport, Mrs. Edward Kennedy told the press her husband is leaving the matter of running for President open. You can't blame him. But she would prefer that he didn't run, she admitted. "Being sister-in-law of a President, I've been close at hand and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job." Joan was on her way to Bonn where she'll narrate "Peter and the Wolf" with the Boston Symphony. Ted will be in the audience, Joan said. They're planning to return together to London over the weekend for a strictly private visit.

FORBES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 433,000
JUN 15 1971

FORGET ABOUT HIM

Teddy Kennedy will doubtless continue showing up appreciably in the pre-Democratic Convention polls as a prospective Presidential nominee. He'll continue to be written about as a possibility by the political pundits who must fill space and sometimes have no realities to write about.

But his prospects for nomination are as nearly nil as yours and mine. The Convention power centers have written him off to an even greater degree than he has written himself out.

It's often little, unportentous happenings that reveal the state of a politico's appeal. Two such re Teddy:

Item 1: In their West German tour with the Boston Pops Orchestra, Senator Kennedy and his style-extreme wife Joan were consistently, rudely late on nearly every occasion that West German bigwigs and littlewigs gathered to do these Kennedy-namebearers honor.

Item 2: At the recent Washington $500-a-plate Democratic fund-raising dinner, Party treasurer Robert Strauss introduced all the many Democratic hopefuls: Senators Bayh, Hughes, Humphrey, Jackson, McGovern, Muskie and Representative Mills. With the enumeration completed, he had proceeded to other things when someone handed him a note. Said Strauss, "Oh, yes, how could we have overlooked introducing the Senator from Massachusetts, Ted Kennedy."

The silence was audible.

Then, a paucity of scattered applause.

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 546,570 SUN. 712,125
APR 15 1971

Joan Kennedy arrives in London. (UPI)

First Lady? No thanks, Joan says

Watertown Daily Times
WATERTOWN, N. Y.
D. 43,427
APR 14 1971

d M. Kenne-
she hopes he t next year irst Lady.
President,"
"I've been it is really

— AP Wirephoto

Mrs. Joan Kennedy, walking in corridor at London's Heathrow Airport, says she hopes her husband decides not to run for president in 1972 because she doesn't want to be first lady.

JOAN HOPES TED WON'T RUN IN '72

Associated Press Wirephoto

Joan Kennedy arrives at London airport.

LONDON (AP) — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife said today she hopes he decides not to run for president in 1972 because she doesn't want to be First Lady.

"Being the sister-in-law of a president," said 34-year-old Joan Kennedy, "I've been close at hand, and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job."

Kennedy has said he is not in the running for the White House in 1972, but his wife commented, "He is leaving it open. You can't blame him, can you?"

"If my husband decides to run, then I will be with him all the way," she added. "But I would rather he did not run. We have three young children. If I were an older woman, the situation might be different."

Mrs. Kennedy passed through London en route to Bonn, where she will be the narrator in "Peter and the Wolf" with the touring Boston Symphony. She said the senator is meeting her there and they will return by way of London during the weekend.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,556
APR 14 1971

associated press story

Joan Has No Desire To Be First Lady, She Says

LONDON (AP)
The Observer-Dispatch
UTICA, N. Y.
D. 45,205 SUN. 58,143
APR 14 1971

n tour, said of his wife's tement: "I have nothing add to what I said be-re."
"If my husband decides run, then I will be with n all the way," she add-
. "But I would rather he
l not run. We have three ung children. If I were older woman, the situa-
n might be different."
Mrs. Kennedy passed
ough London en route
Bonn, where she will be narrator in "Peter and Wolf" with the touring
Boston Symphony. She said
the senator is meeting her
there and they will return
by way of London during the weekend.

Joan Shuns First Lady Role Idea

LONDON (AP) — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's wife said today she hopes he decides not to run for president in 1972 because she doesn't want to be first lady.

"Being the sister-in-law of a president, said 34-year-old Joan Kennedy, "I've been close at hand, and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job."

Kennedy has said he is not in the running for the White House in 1972, but his wife commented, "He is leaving it open. You can't blame him, can you?"

Kennedy, in New York City on a hospital inspection tour, said of his wife's statement: "I have nothing to add to what I said before."

"If my husband decides to run, then I will be with him all the way," she added. "But I would rather he did not run. We have three young children. If I were an older woman, the situation might be different."

Mrs. Kennedy passed through London en route to Bonn, where she will be the narrator in "Peter and the Wolf" with the touring Boston Symphony. She said the senator is meeting her there and they will return by way of London during the weekend.

56

UTICA DAILY PRESS
UTICA, N. Y.
D. 28,782
APR 15 1971

Doesn't Want to Be First Lady

Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., walks in corridor after arrival Wednesday at London's Heathrow Airport. She said she hopes her husband decides not to run for president in 1972 because she doesn't want to be the First Lady. Mrs. Kennedy passed through London en route to Bonn, Germany, where she will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" with the touring Boston Symphony. (AP)

DAILY MIRROR
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. CIRC. N. AVAIL.
APR 16 1971

WEARING a miniskirt and boots, Joan Kennedy, 34-year-old wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, walks through London's Heathrow Airport Wednesday following her arrival from Washington en route to Bonn, where she will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to narrate "Peter and the Wolf." —(UPI)

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 432,300
APR 17 1971
New England Newsclip

APR 18 1971
New England

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 36,127

associated press story

LOS ANGELES EVENING & SUNDAY
HERALD EXAMINER
D. 540,793 SUN. 529,466
APR 15 1971

Joan Kennedy Doesn't Want Ted to Stand

© 1971 N.Y. Times News Service

LONDON, April 14—"I would rather he did not stand," Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, said here today about her husband's presidential prospects.

"But he is leavng it open, and you can't blame him," the 34-year-old Mrs. Kennedy told newsmen during a brief stopover at Heathrow Airport on her way to Bonn to take part in a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Asked if she would like to be America's first lady, she replied: "I have been very close to it. Being the sister-in-law of a President, I've seen close at hand what it is really like. I do not want the job. Maybe it's too tough at the top."

Mrs. Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" at the Bonn concert.

Sen. Edward Kennedy is welcomed to Bonn by West German Foreign Minister and Mrs. Walter Scheel. Kennedy arrived in Bonn yesterday to join his wife, Joan, who narrated a Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of "Peter and the Wolf." —AP Photo

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 154,165 SUN. 311,112
APR 15 1971

White House Not Her Goal

© New York Times News Service

LONDON — "I would rather he did not stand," Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, said here Wednesday about her husband's presidential prospects.

"But he is leaving it open, and you can't blame him," the 34-year-old Mrs. Kennedy told newsmen during a brief stopover at Heathrow Airport on her way to Bonn to take part in a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Asked if she would like to be America's First Lady, she replied: "I have been close to it. Being the sister-in-law of a president, I've seen close at hand what it is really like. I do not want the job. Maybe it's too tough at the top."

Mrs. Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" at the Bonn concert.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790
APR 18 1971

Kennedy Reaffirms Non-Candidate Stance

LONDON (AP)—Sen. Edward M. Ken- ould not any cir- blonde s week,

Arthur n Sym- West and his d with g home. not be ances," airport ections. United ck and Senate ern, D- for the on who deadline n, Ken- ection."

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181
APR 17 1971

Kennedy Rules Out Candidacy

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
APR 17 1971
New England Newsclip

Ted Repeats He Won't Run For President

LONDON (AP) — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy said again today he will not run for President in 1972 "under any circumstances."

With him was his blonde wife Joan, who said earlier this week, "I hope he doesn't."

The Kennedys arrived with Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from Bonn, West Germany, where Mrs. Kennedy narrated "Peter and the Wolf" at a concert with the orchestra.

English Weekend

The Massachuett Democrat and his wife are spending the weekend with friends in England before returning home.

"I have indicated that I would not be a candidate under any circumstances," Kennedy told newsmen at London airport when asked about next year's elections.

On Vietnam, Kennedy said the United States "should get out, lock, stock and barrel."

Senate Resolve

Noting that he had supported a Senate resolution by Sen. George McGovern, D-S.D., an announced candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination who wants the end of this year as a deadline for U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam, Kennedy said: "I will work in that direction."

On the loss of his job as Senate whip, Kennedy said it released him from some routine work on the Senate floor, and while "no one likes losing any involvement ... I feel an additional kind of freedom."

56

UTICA DAILY PRESS
UTICA, N. Y.
D. 28,752
APR 15 1971

Doesn't Want to Be First Lady

Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., walks in corridor after arrival Wednesday at London's Heathrow Airport. She said she hopes her husband decides not to run for president in 1972 because she doesn't want to be the First Lady. Mrs. Kennedy passed through London en route to Bonn, Germany, where she will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" with the touring Boston Symphony. (AP)

DAILY MIRROR
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. CIRC. N. AVAIL.
APR 16 1971

WEARING a miniskirt and boots, Joan Kennedy, 34-year-old wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, walks through London's Heathrow Airport Wednesday following her arrival from Washington en route to Bonn, w[illegible] she will appear with the Boston Symphony C[illegible] to narrate "Peter and the Wolf." —(UPI

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
APR 17 1971
New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,080 (S) 36,127
APR 16 1971
New England Newsclip

Sen. Edward Kennedy is welcomed to Bonn by West German Foreign Minister and Mrs. Walter Scheel. Kennedy arrived in Bonn yesterday to join his wife, Joan, who narrated a Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of "Peter and the Wolf." —AP Photo

associated press story

HERALD EXAMINER
APR 15 1971

Joan Kennedy Doesn't Want Ted to Stand

© 1971 N.Y. Times News Service

LONDON, April 14—"I would rather he did not stand," Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, said here today about her husband's presidential prospects.

"But he is leavng it open, and you can't blame him," the 34-year-old Mrs. Kennedy told newsmen during a brief stopover at Heathrow Airport on her way to Bonn to take part in a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Asked if she would like to be America's first lady, she replied: "I have been very close to it. Being the sister-in-law of a President, I've seen close at hand what it is really like. I do not want the job. Maybe it's too tough at the top."

Mrs. Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" at the Bonn concert.

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Great Newspaper
APR 15 1971

White House Not Her Goal

© New York Times News Service

LONDON — "I would rather he did not stand," Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, said here Wednesday about her husband's presidential prospects.

"But he is leaving it open, and you can't blame him," the 34-year-old Mrs. Kennedy told newsmen during a brief stopover at Heathrow Airport on her way to Bonn to take part in a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Asked if she would like to be America's First Lady, she replied: "I have been close to it. Being the sister-in-law of a president, I've seen close at hand what it is really like. I do not want the job. Maybe it's too tough at the top."

Mrs. Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" at the Bonn concert.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. CIR. 51,000 (S) 53,700
APR 18 1971

Kennedy Reaffirms Non-Candidate Stance

LONDON (AP)—Sen. Edward M. Ken- [illegible] uld not any cir- [illegible] blonde [illegible] s week,

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 1,151
APR 17 1971

Kennedy Rules Out Candidacy

[illegible] Arthur [illegible] n Sym- [illegible] West [illegible] and his [illegible] d with [illegible] g home. [illegible] not be [illegible] ances." [illegible] airport [illegible] ections. [illegible] United [illegible] ck and [illegible] Senate [illegible] ern, D- [illegible] for the [illegible] on who [illegible] deadline [illegible] n, Ken- [illegible] ection."

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(L) 55,055
APR 17 1971
New England Newsclip

Ted Repeats He Won't Run For President

LONDON (AP) — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy said again today he will not run for President in 1972 "under any circumstances."

With him was his blonde wife Joan, who said earlier this week, "I hope he doesn't."

The Kennedys arrived with Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra, from Bonn, West Germany, where Mrs. Kennedy narrated "Peter and the Wolf" at a concert with the orchestra.

English Weekend

The Massachuett Democrat and his wife are spending the weekend with friends in England before returning home.

"I have indicated that I would not be a candidate under any circumstances," Kennedy told newsmen at London airport when asked about next year's elections.

On Vietnam, Kennedy said the United States "should get out, lock, stock and barrel."

Senate Resolve

Noting that he had supported a Senate resolution by Sen. George McGovern, D-S.D., an announced candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination who wants the end of this year as a deadline for U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam, Kennedy said: "I will work in that direction."

On the loss of his job as Senate whip, Kennedy said it released him from some routine work on the Senate floor, and while "no one likes losing any involvement ... I feel an additional kind of freedom."

NEWS
SALEM, MASS.
(E) 28,099

APR 15 1971 New England Newsclip

(AP Wirep

Doesn't want to be first lady

Mrs. Joan Kennedy walks in corridor after arrival in London en route to Bonn, Germany, where she will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" with the touring Boston Symphony. She said she hopes her husband, Sen. Edward Kennedy, decides not to run for president in 1972 because she doesn't want to be first lady.

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 461,257 SAT. 453,752

APR 21 1971

Bound for Rome

Wearing a denim trouser suit, Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) arrives at Heathrow Airport, London en route to Rome, where she will attend a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (UPI)

KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN
D. 20,500

APR 21 1971

GIRL WATCHING — London's Heathrow Airport was the scene of girl watching with the departure of Joan Kennedy (L) wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, and Jennifer Hosten, Miss World. Mrs. Kennedy, wearing a denim trouser suit, was heading for Rome to shop, sightsee and attend a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Hosten, attired in a split midi dress over hot pants in mustard color set off by a colorful neckerchief, was departing for New Zealand to attend the Miss New Zealand beauty competition and tour the country for seven weeks. (UPI CABLEPHOTO).

SUN
WESTERLY, R. I.
(E) 9,900 (S) 9,950

APR 15 1971 New England Newsclip

OESN'T WANT TED TO RUN
- Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of en. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., alks in corridor after arrival t London. She said she hopes er husband decides not to run or President in 1972 because he doesn't want to be First Lady. Mrs. Kennedy was enroute to Bonn, Germany, where she will narrate "Peter and the Wolf" with touring Boston Symphony.
(AP Wirephoto via cable from London)

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

APR 15 1971

SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY'S wife says she hopes he decides not to run for president in 1972 because she doesn't want to be first lady. "Being the sister-in-law of a president," said 34-year-old Joan Kennedy, "I've been close at hand, and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job."Kennedy has said he is not in the running for the White House in 1972, but his wife commented, "He is leaving it open. You can't blame him, can you?" Mrs. Kennedy made the statements during a stop in London en route to Bonn, where she will be the narrator in "Peter and the Wolf" with the touring Boston Symphony . . . Dr. Margaret Mead, 69, says she will return in July to New Guinea, where her studies of primitive culture brought her fame in the 1930s. The anthropologist said she will leave her post as head of Fordham University's social science department and spend six months in the Admiralty Islands north of New Guinea. She said she and several younger colleagues will study the children and grandchildren of the people she studied earlier.

Joan

Dr. Mead

BLANK PAGE

58

london

pre-concert publicity

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE TIMES
PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE,
LONDON, E.C.4.
ISSUE DATED -3 APR 1971

CONCERTS

ROYAL ALBERT HALL
GENERAL MANAGER:
FRANK J. MUNDY
Kensington, S.W.7.

Harold Holt Ltd. present
BOSTON PROMENADE ORCHESTRA
BOSTON POPS
Conductor: ARTHUR FIEDLER
Piano soloist: MALCOLM FRAGER
TOMORROW at 7.30 p.m.
ELGAR—BEETHOVEN—OFFENBACH—TCHAIKOVSKY
and Selections from 'Hair' and St. Louis Blues March
Wine and Champagne will be available for drinking at tables in the Arena and in the Boxes. Full Bar Service will be available before the concert and during both intervals.
A few seats still remain at £2.50, £2.00, £1.50, £1.00, 75p, 50. Standing at 50p.
Box Office (01-589 8212) open tomorrow from 10 a.m.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE OBSERVER
160, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 28 MAR 1970

Harold Holt Ltd. presents
First appearance in this country
BOSTON PROMENADE ORCHESTRA
(Boston Symphony Orchestra)
BOSTON POPS
Conductor: ARTHUR FIEDLER
SUNDAY, 4 APRIL at 7.30 p.m.

Elgar	Pomp and Circumstance No. 1
Beethoven	Egmont Overture
Offenbach	Suite from 'Gaité Parisienne'
Tchaikovsky	Piano Concerto No. 1 (Soloist EARL WILD)

Selections from 'Hair' and St Louis Blues March.

Wine and Champagne will be available for drinking at tables in the Arena and in the Boxes. Full Bar Service will be available before the concert and during both intervals.

£2.50, £2.00, £1.50, £1.00, 75p, 50p, from Hall (01-589 8212) & usual Agents

Boston Symphony Orchestra

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE OBSERVER
160, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 28 MAR 1971

ROYAL FESTIVAL HALL
Harold Holt Ltd. present
BOSTON SYMPHONY
Conductor: WILLIAM STEINBERG
MONDAY, 5 APRIL at 8 p.m.
Mozart: Symphony No. 36, K.425 (Linz)
Mahler: Symphony No. 7 in B minor
£4.00, £3.00, £2.00, £1.50, £1.00, from Hall (01-928 3191) & Agents.

Boston Pop's Orchestra

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE OBSERVER
160, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 21 MAR 1971

ROYAL FESTIVAL HALL
Harold Holt Ltd. present
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
Conductor: WILLIAM STEINBERG
MONDAY, 5 APRIL at 8 p.m.
Mozart: Symphony No. 36, K.425 (Linz)
Mahler: Symphony No. 7 in B minor
£4.00, £3.00, £2.00, £1.50, £1.00, 75p Hall (01-928 3191) & Agents.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE TIMES
PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE,
LONDON, E.C.4.
ISSUE DATED 27 MAR 1971

Mon. 5 April 8 p.m.	BOSTON SYMPHONY William Steinberg Harold Holt Ltd	Mozart: Symphony No. 36 in C, K 425 (Linz) Mahler: Symphony No. 7 in B minor £4.00, £3.00, £2.00, £1.50, £1.00

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS
10/16, ELM STREET,
LONDON, W.C.1
ISSUE DATED 3 - APR 1971

Boston Promenade Orchestra, conductor Arthur Fiedler, Earl Wild piaho. Elgar, Beethoven, Offenbach, Tchaikovsky, selections from Hair. Albert Hall, Apr 4, 7.30pm.

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RADIO TIMES
35, MARYLEBONE HIGH STREET,
LONDON, W.1
ISSUE DATED 25 MAR 1971

Apr. 1

8.0
News; Weather
Morning Concert: part 2
8.5 Berlioz Overture: Benvenuto Cellini
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
conducted by CHARLES MUNCH
8.12* Bruch Violin Concerto No 1, in G minor: JOSEF SUK
CZECH PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA
conducted by KAREL ANCERL
8.39* Rimsky-Korsakov Spanish Caprice
LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA conducted by IGOR MARKEVITCH
gramophone records

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RADIO TIMES
35, MARYLEBONE HIGH STREET,
LONDON, W.1
ISSUE DATED -1 APR 1971

Ap. 5

8.50* Concert
Part 2 Mahler
Symphony No 7
(The Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts by arrangement with Harold Holt Ltd)

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE LISTENER
35, MARYLEBONE HIGH STREET,
LONDON, W.1
ISSUE DATED 25 MAR 1971

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Festival Hall Relay. MOZART Symphony No 36. MAHLER Symphony No 7. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, COND. WILLIAM STEINBERG.
5 April

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RADIO TIMES
35, MARYLEBONE HIGH STREET,
LONDON, W.1
ISSUE DATED -1 APR 1971

Ap 5

8.0
Boston
Symphony Orchestra concert-master
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN conducted by William Steinberg from the Royal Festival Hall, London
Part 1 Mozart
Symphony No 36, in c major (Linz) (K 425)

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE OBSERVER
160, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 4 APR 1971

Harold Holt Ltd. presents
BOSTON PROMENADE ORCHESTRA
BOSTON POPS
Conductor: ARTHUR FIEDLER
Piano Soloist: MALCOLM FRAGER
TONIGHT, at 7.30 p.m.
ELGAR—BEETHOVEN—OFFENBACH—TCHAIKOVSKY
and Selections from 'Hair' and St Louis Blues March
Wine and Champagne will be available for drinking at tables in the Arena and in the Boxes. Full Bar Service will be available before the concert and during both intervals.
A few seats still remain at £2.50, £2.00, £1.50, £1.00, 75p, 50p. Standing at 50p.
Box Office (01-589 8212) open today from 10 a.m.

Boston Orch. Boston Pops

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE TIMES
PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE,
LONDON, E.C.4.
ISSUE DATED 23 MAR 1971

A concert is being given by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in aid of The English-Speaking Union Educational Trust, on Tuesday, April 6, at the Banqueting House, Whitehall, at 8 p.m. Some tickets are still available. Telephone: 01-629 0104.

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE TIMES
PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE,
LONDON, E.C.4.
ISSUE DATED 21 MAR 1971

Harold Holt Ltd. presents
First appearance in this country
BOSTON PROMENADE ORCHESTRA
(Boston Symphony Orchestra)
BOSTON POPS
Conductor: ARTHUR FIEDLER
SUNDAY, 4 APRIL at 7.30 p.m.

Elgar	Pomp and Circumstance No. 1
Beethoven	Egmont Overture
Offenbach	Suits from 'Gaité Parisienne'
Tchaikovsky	Piano Concerto No. 1 (Soloist EARL WILD)

Selections from 'Hair' and St. Louis Blues March

Wine and Champagne will be available for drinking at tables in the Arena and in the Boxes. Full Bar Service will be available before the concert and during both intervals.

£2.50, £2.00, £1.50, £1.00, 75p, 50p, from Hall (01-589 8212) & usual Agents

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE TIMES
PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE,
LONDON, E.C.4

ISSUE DATED 3 APR 1971

CONCERTS

ROYAL ALBERT HALL
CENTRAL MANAGER
FRANK J. MUNDY
Kensington, S.W.7.

Harold Holt Ltd. presents
BOSTON PROMENADE ORCHESTRA
BOSTON POPS
Conductor: ARTHUR FIEDLER
Piano soloist: MALCOLM FRAGER
TOMORROW at 7.30 p.m.
ELGAR, BEETHOVEN, OFFENBACH, TCHAIKOVSKY
and Selections from 'Hair' and St. Louis Blues March

Boston Symphony Orchestra

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE OBSERVER
160, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4

ISSUE DATED 28 MAR 1971

Harold Holt Ltd. presents
First appearance in this country
BOSTON PROMENADE ORCHESTRA
(Boston Symphony Orchestra)
BOSTON POPS
Conductor: ARTHUR FIEDLER
SUNDAY, 4 APRIL at 7.30 p.m.

Elgar	Pomp and Circumstance No. 1
Beethoven	Egmont Overture
Offenbach	Suite from 'Gaîté Parisienne'
Tchaikovsky	Piano Concerto No. 1 (Soloist EARL WILD)
	Selections from 'Hair' and St. Louis Blues March

Wine and Champagne will be available for drinking at tables in the Arena and in the Boxes. Full Bar Service will be available before the concert and during both intervals.

£2.50, £2.00, £1.50, £1.00, 75p, 50p, from Hall (01-589 8212) & usual Agents

Boston Symphony Orchestra

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE OBSERVER
160, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4

ISSUE DATED 28 MAR 1971

ROYAL FESTIVAL HALL
Harold Holt Ltd. present
BOSTON SYMPHONY
Conductor: WILLIAM STEINBERG
MONDAY, 5 APRIL at 8 p.m.
Mozart: Symphony No. 36, K.425 (Linz)
Mahler: Symphony No. 7 in B minor
£4.00, £3.00, £2.50, £2.00, £1.00, from Hall (01-928 3191) & Agents

Boston Pops Orchestra

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE OBSERVER
160, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4

ISSUE DATED 21 MAR 1971

ROYAL FESTIVAL HALL
Harold Holt Ltd. present
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
Conductor: WILLIAM STEINBERG
MONDAY, 5 APRIL at 8 p.m.
Mozart: Symphony No. 36, K.425 (Linz)
Mahler: Symphony No. 7 in B minor
£4.00, £3.00, £2.50, £2.00, £1.00, from Hall (01-928 3191) & Agents

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE TIMES
PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE,
LONDON, E.C.4.

ISSUE DATED 27 MAR 1971

Mon 5 April 8 p.m.	BOSTON SYMPHONY William Steinberg	Mozart Mahler

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS
10/16, ELM STREET,
LONDON, W.C.1

ISSUE DATED 3 - APR 1971

Boston Promenade Orchestra, conductor Arthur Fiedler, Earl Wild piano. Elgar, Beethoven, Offenbach, Tchaikovsky, selections from Hair. Albert Hall, Apr 4, 7.30pm.

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RADIO TIMES
35, MARYLEBONE HIGH STREET,
LONDON, W.1

ISSUE DATED

Apr. 1

8.0
News; Weather
Morning Concert: part 2
8.5 Berlioz Overture: Benvenuto Cellini
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
conducted by CHARLES MUNCH
8.12* Bruch Violin Concerto No 1, in G minor: JOSEF SUK
CZECH PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA
conducted by KAREL ANCERL
8.39* Rimsky-Korsakov Spanish Caprice
LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA conducted by IGOR MARKEVITCH
gramophone records

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RADIO TIMES
35, MARYLEBONE HIGH STREET,
LONDON, W.1

ISSUE DATED -1 APR 1971

Ap 5

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Festival Hall Relay: MOZART Symphony No. 36; MAHLER Symphony No. 7; BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCH. WILLIAM STEINBERG
8.0 Band

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE LISTENER
35, MARYLEBONE HIGH STREET,
LONDON, W.1

ISSUE DATED

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE OBSERVER
160, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4

ISSUE DATED 4 APR

Harold Holt Ltd. presents
BOSTON PROMENADE ORCHESTRA
BOSTON POPS
Conductor: ARTHUR FIEDLER
Piano Soloist: MALCOLM FRAGER
TONIGHT, at 7.30 p.m.
ELGAR, BEETHOVEN, OFFENBACH, TCHAIKOVSKY
and Selections from 'Hair' and St. Louis Blues March
Wine and Champagne will be available for drinking at tables in the Arena and in the Boxes. Full Bar Service will be available before the concert and during both intervals.
A few seats still remain at £5.00, £4.00, £3.00, £2.50, £2.00, £1.50, £1.00. Standing at 50p.
B.A. Office 01-589 8212 open today from 10 a.m.

Boston Orch. Pops

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE TIMES
PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE,
LONDON, E.C.4.

ISSUE DATED

A concert is being given by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in aid of The English-Speaking Union Educational Trust, on Tuesday, April 6, at the Banqueting House, Whitehall, at 8 p.m. Some tickets are still available. Telephone: 01-629 0104.

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE TIMES
PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE,
LONDON, E.C.4.

ISSUE DATED 27 MAR 1971

Harold Holt Ltd. presents
First appearance in this country
BOSTON PROMENADE ORCHESTRA
(Boston Symphony Orchestra)
BOSTON POPS
Conductor: ARTHUR FIEDLER
SUNDAY, 4 APRIL at 7.30 p.m.

Elgar	Pomp and Circumstance No. 1
Beethoven	Egmont Overture
Offenbach	Suite from 'Gaîté Parisienne'
Tchaikovsky	Piano Concerto No. 1 (Soloist EARL WILD)
	Selections from 'Hair' and St. Louis Blues March

Wine and Champagne will be available for drinking at tables in the Arena and in the Boxes. Full Bar Service will be available before the concert and during both intervals.

£2.50, £2.00, £1.50, £1.00, 50p, 30p, from Hall (01-589 8212) & usual Agents

60

Boston Orch. Pops

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

SUNDAY TELEGRAPH
135, FLEET STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4

ISSUE DATED 28 MAR 1971

The Albert Hall and a Prom

You'll have heard about the Royal Albert Hall's Grand Centenary Concert tomorrow: not only is the first work to be performed a Jubilate by Prince Albert himself, but many of the female audience will be rigged out in something like Victorian style. Or so a fashion-writer tells us in The Daily Telegraph.

The first half of the concert will be conducted by Sir Adrian Boult; in the second half Sir William Walton will conduct his own "Belshazzar's Feast" on what is also his 69th birthday. It is being broadcast live on Radio 3.

Next Sunday there will be a Prom somewhat earlier than usual: not our own dear old Colin Davis conducting the B.B.C. Symphony, but America's dear old Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Promenade, and a right boozey do it promises to be. To make it more like the "Boston Pops" back home, they're setting up tables for 400 in the arena, and they'll be knocking it back in the boxes, and in an extra bar in the basement. There will be 13 different wines on the list.

You can see from this that the Albert Hall prefers the Pops to Pop: it banned Frank Zappa, and a source close to James Brown tells me he was nearly banned . . . until it was made known that he performs before President Nixon at his request. And what could be more respectable than that? The Pops, as it happens, will play music from "Hair"—which will not be among the items recorded by B.B.C. TV.

Arthur Fiedler, who conducts the Boston Pops at the Albert Hall next Sunday—the first time the orchestra has played outside America.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

WHAT'S ON
5/6, ARGYLL STREET,
LONDON, W.1

ISSUE DATED - 2 APR 1971

MONDAY, April 5

First Night: The Oxford and Cambridge Universities Shakespeare Company present "Hamlet" at the Fortune Theatre, "Measure for Measure" opens at the Young Vic and Gilbert and Sullivan at the Haymarket.

"London: A Better Place to Live", an environmental exhibition, actually the first of its kind, at the Roundhouse, Chalk Farm (till May 15).

Music: Edith Vogel piano recital at Guildhall School of Music and Drama. The Westminster Abbey choir perform Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" at Westminster Abbey. Michael Boxford (piano) plays Beethoven and Schumann at the Wigmore Hall. Carole Rosen (mezzo-contralto) and five soloists give the first performances of Sternberg's "Distant Flute" and Partos's "Five Israeli Songs" at the Purcell Room. Richard and John Contigulia (one piano, four hands) play Liszt at the Queen Elizabeth Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by William Steinberg, play Mozart and Mahler at the Royal Festival Hall.

New Art: Eddie Wolfram at the Drian Gallery. [illegible] Dagger at Sigi Krauss. Diane Webb, Kurt Kramer and Verne-Anne Morgan at the Woodstock Gallery.

Those men in their flying machines: "Paranormal Aspects of Unidentified Flying Objects" at the Fifty-Nine Society's meeting.

Garden Packs and Books at the Design Centre (till June 5).

Auctions: They take place throughout the week, and in particular today at Christie's there will be a sale of Chinese Snuffbottles.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE SUNDAY TIMES
200, GRAY'S INN ROAD,
LONDON, W.C.1

ISSUE DATED 4 APR 1971

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra (Festival Hall, tomorrow). A rare visit and by no means an expected programme. Conductor William Steinberg takes them through Mahler's Seventh and Mozart's "Linz" Symphony.

Un Ballo in Maschera (Covent Garden, tomorrow). A Verdi revival conducted by Anton Guadagno and with two newcomers to the roles there: Martina Arroyo and Carlo Bergonzi.

Boston Orch Pops

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH
135, FLEET STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4

ISSUE DATED 24 MAR 1971

Drink and listen

ALBERT HALL audiences who have had difficulty getting a drink in the interval—at the recent Vienna Philharmonic concert conducted by Leonard Bernstein I gave up after finding myself in the fifth rank at one bar—will be relieved to know that life will be easier at the "Boston Pops" concert on April 4.

It will be the first British appearance of the 90-strong Boston Promenade Orchestra, which is composed of members of the Boston Symphony and conducted by Arthur Fiedler. An air of informal drinking while listening is encouraged.

To help provide for the 400 people sitting at tables in the arena to hear Elgar, Beethoven, Offenbach, Tchaikovsky and "Hair," there will be an extra bar in the basement. And six extra staff will be taking orders on each of the floors of boxes. There will be a choice of 13 wines.

Boston S.A.

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

WHAT'S ON
5/6, ARGYLL STREET,
LONDON, W.1

ISSUE DATED - 2 APR 1971

SUNDAY, April 4

Rex Harrison gives 50th John Player lecture at the National Film Theatre.

Sunday's music includes Bach's "St. Matthew Passion", sung in English, by the Jacques Orchestra and the Bach Choir (at 11 a.m. and 2.30 p.m.), at the Royal Festival Hall. The Amadeus String Quartet, with Alvar Lidell (reader), in Haydn's "The Seven Last Words of Our Saviour on the Cross" at the Queen Elizabeth Hall. The Haffner String Quartet at the Conway Hall. The Elizabethans—last in the series of poetry and music devised by Richard Marquand—at the Purcell Room. Choral and organ recital at St. Giles, Cripplegate. Ayla Erduran (violin) and Roger Aubert (piano) play Brahms, Debussy, Bach and Bartok (in the evening) at the Queen Elizabeth Hall. The Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Lawrence Foster, with Radu Lupu (piano) and the Alan Civil Horn Quartet, at the Royal Festival Hall. Andres Segovia guitar recital at the Town Hall, Euston Road. The Boston Promenade Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, with Earl Wild (piano), play at the Royal Albert Hall while the audience consume wine and champagne! John McCabe and Malcolm Troup (two piano recital) at the Victoria and Albert Museum. The Thomas Tallis Society and the Thames Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Philip Simms, at the Royal Naval College Chapel in Greenwich.

Pop: Quintessence at the Lyceum.

Poetry at the Mermaid.

Sunday's larger than usual sport choice includes Cycling (Harp Lager International Grand Prix), Hockey (England v. Czechoslovakia), Motor Racing (BOAC 1,000 Km. World Championships Sports Car Race) at Brands Hatch, Fencing (second and last day of Men's Foil Championships), Badminton (second day).

Boston orchestras

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE EVENING NEWS
CARMELITE HOUSE,
LONDON, E.C.4

ISSUE DATED 2 APR 1971

Pop goes the bubbly at the Proms

THEY ARE having two intervals in a concert at the Royal Albert Hall on Sunday. And for a good reason.

That remarkable chap Arthur Fiedler is appearing with his Boston Promenade Orchestra for an evening of Boston Pops.

Pops in this sense, by the way, are not pop music in the usual meaning of the term. They are mainly familiar and readily acceptable classics.

The Boston Pops, with Arthur Fiedler in charge, have held their place for years in the American musical scene. Now that they have come to London, the Albert Hall is doing them proud.

As at the Proms, the whole of the arena is being cleared of seats. But, unlike the Proms, the space will be filled with tables and chairs.

LONDON MUSIC
LESLIE AYRE

As there will be no waiter service, it will be necessary to buy your bottle of champagne (or beer) at the bar and take it to your table. Hence the two intervals—time in which to organise replenishment.

The music sounds to me to be admirably suited to conviviality—Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance March No. 1 (Land of Hope and Glory), Beethoven's Egmont Overture, Offenbach's Gaite Parisienne, Tchaikovsky's No. 1 Piano Concerto (American pianist Earl Wild as soloist), a selection from Hair, and the whole thing topped off with the St. Louis Blues.

The calendar absurdly suggests that the distinguished-looking Mr Fiedler is now 77 but, of course, no sensible person believes it.

Apart from his talents as a musician, he is a man with an unusual hobby. He loves fire-brigades.

He is an honorary fireman in the U.S. and for his 75th birthday his wife and son bought him a special present—a 1938 vintage New Hampshire fire engine.

On Monday the full Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at the Royal Festival Hall in rather more serious mood.

Boston Orch Pops

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

SUNDAY TELEGRAPH
135, FLEET STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4

ISSUE DATED 28 MAR 1971

The Albert Hall and a Prom

You'll have heard about the Royal Albert Hall's Grand Centenary Concert tomorrow: not only is the first work to be performed a Jubilate by Prince Albert himself, but many of the female audience will be rigged out in something like Victorian style. Or so a fashion-writer tells us in The Daily Telegraph.

The first half of the concert will be conducted by Sir Adrian Boult; in the second half Sir William Walton will conduct his own "Belshazzar's Feast" on what is also his 69th birthday. It is being broadcast live on Radio 3.

Next Sunday there will be a Prom somewhat earlier than usual: not our own dear old Colin Davis conducting the B.B.C. Symphony, but America's dear old Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Promenade, and a right boozey do it promises to be. To make it more like the "Boston Pops" back home, they're setting up tables for 400 in the arena, and they'll be knocking it back in the boxes, and in an extra bar in the basement. There will be 15 different wines on the list.

You can see from this that the Albert Hall prefers the Pops to Pop: it banned Frank Zappa, and a source close to James Brown tells me he was nearly banned . . . until it was made known that he performs before President Nixon at his request. And what could be more respectable than that? The Pops, as it happens, will play music from "Hair"—which will not be among the items recorded by B.B.C. TV.

Arthur Fiedler, who conducts the Boston Pops at the Albert Hall next Sunday—the first time the orchestra has played outside America.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

WHAT'S ON
5/6, ARGYLL STREET,
LONDON, W.1

ISSUE DATED - 2 APR 1971

MONDAY, April 5

First Night: The Oxford and Cambridge Universities Shakespeare Company present "Hamlet" at the Fortune Theatre, "Measure for Measure" opens at the Young Vic and Gilbert and Sullivan at the Haymarket.

"London: A Better Place to Live", an environmental exhibition, actually the first of its kind, at the Roundhouse, Chalk Farm (till May 15).

Music: Edith Vogel piano recital at Guildhall School of Music and Drama. The Westminster Abbey choir perform Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" at Westminster Abbey. Michael Boxford (piano) plays Beethoven and Schumann at the Wigmore Hall. Carole Rosen (mezzo-contralto) and five soloists give the first performances of Sternberg's "Distant Flute" and Partos's "Five Israeli Songs" at the Purcell Room. Richard and John Contigulia (one piano, four hands) play Liszt at the Queen Elizabeth Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by William Steinberg, play Mozart and Mahler at the Royal Festival Hall.

New Art: Eddie Wolfram at the Drian Gallery. Dagger at Sigi Krauss. Diane Webb, Kurt Kramer and Verne-Anne Morgan at the Woodstock Gallery.

Those men in their flying machines: "Paranormal Aspects of Unidentified Flying Objects" at the Fifty-Nine Society's meeting.

Garden Packs and Books at the Design Centre (till June 5).

Auctions: They take place throughout the week, and in particular today at Christie's there will be a sale of Chinese Snuffbottles.

Boston Orch,

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE SUNDAY TIMES
200, GRAY'S INN ROAD,
LONDON, W.C.1

ISSUE DATED 4 APR 1971

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra (Festival Hall, tomorrow). A rare visit and by no means an expected programme. Conductor William Steinberg takes them through Mahler's Seventh and Mozart's "Linz" Symphony.

Un Ballo in Maschera (Covent Garden, tomorrow). A Verdi revival conducted by Anton Guadagno and with two newcomers to the roles there: Martina Arroyo and Carlo Bergonzi.

Boston Orch Pops

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH
135, FLEET STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4

ISSUE DATED 24 MAR 1971

Drink and listen

ALBERT HALL audiences who have had difficulty getting a drink in the interval—at the recent Vienna Philharmonic concert conducted by Leonard Bernstein I gave up after finding myself in the fifth rank at one bar—will be relieved to know that life will be easier at the "Boston Pops" concert on April 4.

It will be the first British appearance of the 90-strong Boston Promenade Orchestra, which is composed of members of the Boston Symphony and conducted by Arthur Fiedler. An air of informal drinking while listening is encouraged.

To help provide for the 400 people sitting at tables in the arena to hear Elgar, Beethoven, Offenbach, Tchaikovsky and "Hair," there will be an extra bar in the basement. And six extra staff will be taking orders on each of the floors of boxes. There will be a choice of 15 wines.

Boston S A

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

WHAT'S ON
5/6, ARGYLL STREET,
LONDON, W.1

ISSUE DATED - 2 APR 1971

SUNDAY, April 4

Rex Harrison gives 50th John Player lecture at the National Film Theatre.

Sunday's music includes Bach's "St. Matthew Passion", sung in English, by the Jacques Orchestra and the Bach Choir (at 11 a.m. and 2.30 p.m.), at the Royal Festival Hall. The Amadeus String Quartet, with Alvar Lidell (reader), in Haydn's "The Seven Last Words of Our Saviour on the Cross" at the Queen Elizabeth Hall. The Haffner String Quartet at the Conway Hall. The Elizabethans—last in the series of poetry and music devised by Richard Marquand—at the Purcell Room. Choral and organ recital at St. Giles, Cripplegate. Ayla Erduran (violin) and Roger Aubert (piano) play Brahms, Debussy, Bach and Bartok (in the evening) at the Queen Elizabeth Hall. The Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Lawrence Foster, with Radu Lupu (piano) and the Alan Civil Horn Quartet, at the Royal Festival Hall. Andres Segovia guitar recital at the Town Hall, Euston Road. The Boston Promenade Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, with Earl Wild (piano), play at the Royal Albert Hall while the audience consume wine and champagne! John McCabe and Malcolm Troup (two piano recital) at the Victoria and Albert Museum. The Thomas Tallis Society and the Thames Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Philip Simms, at the Royal Naval College Chapel in Greenwich.

Pop: Quintessence at the Lyceum.

Poetry at the Mermaid.

Sunday's larger than usual sport choice includes Cycling (Harp Lager International Grand Prix), Hockey (England v. Czechoslovakia), Motor Racing (BOAC 1,000 Km. World Championships Sports Car Race) at Brands Hatch, Fencing (second and last day of Men's Foil Championships), Badminton (second day).

Boston Theatres

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE EVENING NEWS
CARMELITE HOUSE,
LONDON, E.C.4

ISSUE DATED 2 APR 1971

Pop goes the bubbly at the Proms

LONDON MUSIC
LESLIE AYRE

THEY ARE having two intervals in a concert at the Royal Albert Hall on Sunday. And for a good reason.

That remarkable chap Arthur Fiedler is appearing with his Boston Promenade Orchestra for an evening of Boston Pops.

Pops in this sense, by the way, are not pop music in the usual meaning of the term. They are mainly familiar and readily acceptable classics.

The Boston Pops, with Arthur Fiedler in charge, have held their place for years in the American musical scene. Now that they have come to London, the Albert Hall is doing them proud.

As at the Proms, the whole of the arena is being cleared of seats. But, unlike the Proms, the space will be filled with tables and chairs.

As there will be no waiter service, it will be necessary to buy your bottle of champagne (or beer) at the bar and take it to your table. Hence the two intervals—time in which to organise replenishment.

The music sounds to me to be admirably suited to conviviality—Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance March No. 1 (Land of Hope and Glory), Beethoven's Egmont Overture, Offenbach's Gaite Parisienne, Tchaikovsky's No. 1 Piano Concerto (American pianist Earl Wild as soloist), a selection from Hair, and the whole thing topped off with the St. Louis Blues.

The calendar absurdly suggests that the distinguished-looking Mr Fiedler is now 77 but, of course, no sensible person believes it.

Apart from his talents as a musician, he is a man with an unusual hobby. He loves fire-brigades.

He is an honorary fireman in the U.S. and for his 75th birthday his wife and son bought him a special present—a 1938 vintage New Hampshire fire engine.

On Monday the full Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at the Royal Festival Hall in rather more serious mood.

the pops in london

Boston Orchestra

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE GUARDIAN
192, GRAY'S INN ROAD,
LONDON, W.C.1
ISSUE DATED 5 APR 1971

ALBERT HALL

Edward Greenfield

Boston Pops

BOSTON HAD ITS promenade concerts way back in the 1880s even before London. They quickly gave up calling them that, and as the fare was deliberately light they became "Pops" and the orchestra (the Boston Symphony with the front desks missing) became the Boston Pops Orchestra, one of the best-known recording bands in the world. It was 40 years ago that Arthur Fiedler took over as conductor, and there he was, looking more than ever like Lloyd George, directing the Boston Pops' first concert ever in this country at the Royal Albert Hall.

That may be the place for our own Proms but the traditions did not mingle easily. Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance no. 1" sounded ill at ease ("migh-hi-tier yet" with commas in the phrasing), and Beethoven's "Egmont" sounded like a trumpet concerto, and a fairly perfunctory one at that with the hall playing an acoustic trick on the brass. The Tchaikovsky "First Piano Concerto" brought a substitute soloist in Malcolm Frager, who blatantly altered the layout of the famous opening chords but then went on to find wit and poetry in the gentler sections.

By this time the first trumpet had learnt to balance better, and one looked forward to the characteristic Boston lollipops at the end. But selections from "Hair" sounded strangely solemn, the orchestration too heavy, the jazz rhythms played with a literalness one expects of the Black Dyke Mills band. Then came the justification of the whole concert, and it was sad we had not had it at the start, an outrageous march version of W. C. Handy's classic "St Louis Blues." At last the sparkle we know on record from Fiedler and his band, their tongue-in-cheek humour, was plain for all to hear.

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE TIMES
PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 5 APR 1971

Boston Pops

Albert Hall

Alan Blyth

Champagne, at tables in the arena, and music flowed at the Boston Pops Concert last night but there was not as much fizz in the performances as one might have expected, at least until the selection from Hair and the inevitable encores were reached. Then at last the players seemed to let their hair down and convey some enjoyment in a score that stands up remarkably well to the full-orchestra treatment. Here, too, Arthur Fiedler, ever young in spirit and gesture, caught the mood of a new generation's music.

Surely a programme entirely devoted to light music, this orchestra's speciality, would have accorded better with the supposedly convivial spirit of the occasion than a mixture of Tchaikovsky and Beethoven with lesser things. Or, perhaps such thoughts were occasioned by accounts of Beethoven's Egmont overture and Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto that were merely dutiful, even anonymous. The Bostonians played here as if this was (as it indeed is) just one stop on an extensive tour with each place receiving the stock performance. There was efficiency, even brilliance, but no real love in the interpretations.

Malcolm Frager was the soloist in Tchaikovsky and he turned in an old-fashioned bravura performance. He showed little mercy to the piano as he tore strenuously into the histrionics of the outer movements, hardly a note out of place, hardly one played with real imaginative insight. The slow movement was happier, some delicacy tempering his hard tone.

62

b.s.o. in london

Boston Orchestra

DURRANT'S — DURRANT HOUSE, HERBAL HILL, LONDON E.C.1, 01-278 1733

THE GUARDIAN — 192, GRAY'S INN ROAD, LONDON, W.C.1 — ISSUE DATED - 6 APR 1971

FESTIVAL HALL

Edward Greenfield

Boston S.O.

NOT SINCE 1956 HAS the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in London, and now they came for a tantalising single concert before flying off on a European tour. The more tantalising when this particular concert at the Royal Festival Hall had little of the fizz one hears on Boston records. Was it the effect of the flight over; was it that I was expecting too much after the records; was it that William Steinberg, the new Musical Director, had comparatively little to say about these two symphonies, Mozart's "Linz" and Mahler's Seventh? I wondered, but whatever it was, we had to wait until the finale of the Mahler before ears were really made to tingle. Then it was more because of a direct, disciplined assault rather than because of the subtle tonal nuances which this of all American orchestras can produce.

The Mozart received a well-behaved performance, and already—as with the Boston Pops Orchestra at the Albert Hall on Sunday night—it was plain that the orchestral balance was presenting problems in new acoustics. Symphony Hall, Boston, has, I suppose, the most helpful acoustic of any major hall in the world, and there at least the strings can be relied on to provide a cushion of sound. Even in the unhelpful Festival Hall (not so dry as it was but still with no deep resonance) the Boston strings had fine body, but the brass behaved as though it was twice as large. Brass came out in the ensemble a very loud first, strings second and woodwind a disappointing third—no fault of theirs.

Steinberg's view of Mahler was not as searching as we have grown accustomed to even in this once rare symphony. There was little fantasy, little that conveyed the macabre atmosphere of so much of the writing. The second Night Music was given an extrovert reading with the loudest mandoline playing I have ever heard (amplified?) It trotted neatly rather than caressing, but it was the finale with its Elgarian tinges that at last drew from Steinberg as well as the players the imaginative responses we expect of them. This most difficult movement of a difficult symphony surprisingly held together more cogently than the rest, in spite of its comparatively ramshackle structure.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S — DURRANT HOUSE, HERBAL HILL, LONDON E.C.1, 01-278 1733

THE TIMES — PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.4 — ISSUE DATED 6 APR 1971

Boston S.O.
Festival Hall
Stanley Sadie

The Boston Symphony has of course been one of the world's great orchestras for a long time. A visit from them must be something of an occasion. (Seats at the Festival Hall last night cost up to £4, and I did not see an empty one.) And they laudably chose a big and rare piece as their main item: Mahler's seventh symphony.

Yet the concert was somehow a dispiriting one. Not because of any lack of efficiency, or individual musicianship, in the orchestra, nor any want of responsiveness. But there was not much that was positive to respond to. William Steinberg's interpretations—is that the word?—had little evident character. Often it seemed that the performances were merely the acting out of a well-rehearsed ritual, one that had staled and lost much of its vitality and meaning.

The evening started with Mozart's Symphony No. 36, done with slightly reduced strings. The playing in the Allegro scarcely hinted at Mozart's spiritoso qualification; it was curiously listless, and such momentum as Mr. Steinberg developed he dissipated by stretching the pulse at crucial cadences. I had always thought of this piece as among Mozart's wittiest, but here even those leaping dialogues in the finale were solemnly earthbound, and the trio suggested that the light-hearted Ländler swing finds little response in Boston nowadays. The Adagio drew some refined, aristocratic tone from the strings, but it was coolly expressed, and those minor-key shifts had nothing of darkness or mystery.

In Mahler the orchestra had more, or at least more evident, opportunities. The string tone can be rich and warm: the violins sounded full and suave, even when poised high among the leger-lines, and the cellos sang long, shapely lines in the first of the Night-Music movements. Among a strong woodwind section I especially relished the playing of the clarinets, rounded in tone and agile. Among the brass one could scarcely help noticing the trumpets. Mr. Steinberg had them placed high up at the back of the orchestra, one step above the trumpets' usual level; they were several steps above the usual dynamic level, and from my seat (at the back of the stalls on the red side) their cutting tone and crackling brilliance of articulation dominated everything whenever they were let loose, which was often. Perhaps they need to cultivate this hard, bright sound for their gentler acoustic at home

As for the interpretation, it seemed to have little feeling of conviction, little sense of why the piece is as it is. The first movement, the core of the work, certainly had spells of tautly held rhythm, violent attack, and sustained physical excitement: but the ideas themselves were under-characterized, and there was no real continuity of impulse. The group of middle movements went better. Some of the textures were quite delicately hit off, and the underlying tone of bitterness and desolation was hinted at. The C major triumphs of the finale (though can they be counted triumphs when nothing is resolved?) produced the predictably vigorous and full-throated response.

Boston Orchestra

DURRANT'S — DURRANT HOUSE, HERBAL HILL, LONDON E.C.1, 01-278 1733

EVENING STANDARD — 47, SHOE LANE, LONDON, E.C.4 — ISSUE DATED - 6 APR 1971

CONCERT/Paul Callan

Mahler's lush mystery

MAHLER'S seventh symphony—given a rare airing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under William Steinberg in the Royal Festival Hall last night—is a musical oddity.

It was composed at a time when Mahler's musical mores were undergoing a form of transition and it is generally regarded as being the last of the works which marked his middle period as a symphonist.

It is a long (well over an hour and taking up the full second half of the concert) and lushly orchestrated work. Like so much of Mahler's music, it contains great colour and a display of frequently magnificent instrumentation.

But the problem lies in determining thoughout the work any hint of regular and maintained thematic unity.

In the first movement there is a great element of romance, broad and sweeping, as though Mahler was even tilting at the amour - propre of German romanticism.

In the first of the Nightmusic movements there is eloquent interplay among the strings—sweetly handled, particularly by the BSO's cello section—on a noblemente, almost Elgarian bass.

Then it suddenly changes to a spiky, Spanish-style rhythm; then again to an almost military theme which gave the orchestra marked opportunity to display their technical dexterity.

After the eccentric scherzo, with its triplet rhythms, crazy orchestration and high degree of parody, comes the second, Nightmusic movement.

There is some brilliant orchestration here with the subtle touch of guitar and mandolin.

The final movement ends on a festive note and in a distinct neo-classical style. But it still gives little clue to unravelling the complex problem of thematic schizophrenia.

Even Mahler himself found that it was not without its troubles and possibly one wonders whether he was simply etching out a series of drawings, even exercises, before plunging into the darker world inhabited by his later work.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH — 135, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.4 — ISSUE DATED 6 APR 1971

Concerts

Sang-froid with Boston orchestra

By PETER STADLEN

SELFLESSLY, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and their conductor-in-chief William Steinberg chose Mahler's rarely heard Seventh Symphony for their representative London concert at the Festival Hall last night.

Not until towards the end of a long evening did I feel that the renowned band began to come into its own.

Offhand I would say that a brilliant and inexhaustible pair of trumpets and a leader capable of truly amoroso solos are among their most enviable possessions.

Nor, needless to add, were their weaknesses to be noticed in any department if we don't count a mandolin, patently too enthusiastic on finding himself in an orchestra of such repute and size.

Mr Steinberg presided with characteristic sang-froid over his massive forces—I counted nine double basses and seven horns. It cannot be said that he obtained all the finesse his players might have been capable of during the marching and counter-marching, the ironic waltzing and the naively plaintive nocturnal calls.

And some string disunity that occurred as late as the Gracioso episode of the final Rondo must be laid at the conductor's door.

★

There was no mistaking his sense of devotion and utter commitment, not surprising in an artist born and bred in pre-first war Germany. Even so I wished he had deceived us more cunningly still over the remarkable lack of cohesion and musical raison d'être during those 90 minutes or so.

An utter aversion to showmanship is among Mr Steinberg's most endearing qualities. But on this occasion it did result in a distinctly stodgy performance of Mozart's "Linz" Symphony.

GREAT ORCHESTRA TREADS WARILY

DAILY EXPRESS 6/4/71

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Royal Festival Hall

EVERY American orchestra reckons itself to be great. Boston has one of the greater ones, and it appeared in London last night for the first time in 15 years at the outset of a European tour.

Mozart's "Linz" Symphony at the start was presented as if the music were somewhat larger than life, and the players somewhat less than settled in the lack of an ideal ensemble.

But this was in the nature of a preliminary to Mahler's giant Seventh Symphony, which is not exactly a Mahler favourite even among his devotees.

Conductor William Steinberg shaped a performance that demonstrated its problems—the five movements that do not make a completely convincing whole—without actually getting round to solving them.

That is not to say the musical journey was wasted. By no means, when such wealth of character and expressive colour was forthcoming in one episode after another.

I have heard more searching playing that went deeper into the music's spirit, but few orchestras that attacked it so purposefully as the Bostonians.

They could conquer it altogether, no doubt, with a more careful concern for niceties of balance and phrase. I would rather this from such visitors, though, than a programme of absolute certainties.

NOEL GOODWIN

DURRANT'S — DURRANT HOUSE, HERBAL HILL, LONDON E.C.1, 01-278 1733

THE FINANCIAL TIMES — 10, CANNON STREET, LONDON, E.C.4 — ISSUE DATED 6 APR 1971

Festival Hall

Boston Symphony

by RONALD CRICHTON

Fifteen years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra was last in London. The costs of touring a great orchestra so far afield being what they are, it will, in all probability, be an equally long time before we hear them in the flesh again.

In the meantime we shall no doubt feed, as many of us have been doing for more years than we can remember, on the Boston recordings. It was the memory of those recordings, in fact, that made it impossible to experience last night's concert without a pang of acute disappointment, for high expectations were largely unfulfilled.

It would, all the same, be unjust not to praise William Steinberg, the orchestra's musical director and chief conductor, for making the main work in his programme something as unusual by the normal standards of grand tour beanos as Mahler's seventh symphony, that long, fascinating, diverse, finally perplexing score that even the most avid Mahlerians do not expect to hear very often.

Unfortunately, the performance was not calculated to persuade the conventionally-minded that it is worth going off the beaten track on such occasions.

The first movement was disjointed, with an emphasis on dry timbres that surely went beyond what Mahler even in his most bone-rattling moods can have intended—here as in other places there were signs that the Boston players were finding the Festival Hall's unromantic clarity uncomfortably different from what they are accustomed to.

Warmth came about half way through, the first Night music, and in the three middle movements there was some highly expert wind playing of the kind one expects, also some beautiful, sheeny string tone.

Many details were beguiling, others were irritating. Why so much emphasis on the twangling mandoline in the fourth movement; why did the solo violin play the phrases marked "stark hervortretend" with such sweetly gentle tone? The impulse behind the conducting felt only intermittent.

There were moments in the finale when the mixture of Meistersinger, Bizet and Austrian-Turkish military marching was agreeably effervescent in sound, but the closing pages, with the return of the symphony's first theme, were unconvincing.

The evening began with Mozart's Linz symphony, marmoreally lifeless. One would have preferred lots of wrong notes to this chilling smoothness.

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S — DURRANT HOUSE, HERBAL HILL, LONDON E.C.1, 01-278 1733

THE SUNDAY TIMES — 200, GRAY'S INN ROAD, LONDON, W.C.1 — ISSUE DATED 11 APR 1971

The Bostonians

MUSIC □ DESMOND SHAWE-TAYLOR

SINCE the Boston Symphony Orchestra last visited London in 1956, it has acquired a new principal conductor in William Steinberg, a serious-minded musician, who paid us the compliment, at the Festival Hall on Monday, of a serious programme consisting of nothing but two symphonies.

The first of these, Mozart's Linz Symphony, emerged as rather more serious, in fact, than we had hitherto suspected; it hardly seemed the same work that not so long ago used to dance and sparkle under Beecham.

The other symphony was Mahler's Seventh, an unconventional choice even in these Mahler-filled days. There was much to admire, needless to say, in the playing of this great orchestra: string tone that was particularly rich in the lower regions, an agile and well-balanced wind group, and trumpeters who spat out their dramatic interjections with quite venomous brilliance. The performance as a whole caught well enough the nervous, hectic side of the music, and provided some sensuous relaxation during the two "Nachtstück" movements; but it was less successful than other interpretations (those of Bernstein and of Haitink, for example) in forging some kind of unity from the diverse component parts of this self-indulgent and sprawling symphony.

Boston Orchestra

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE GUARDIAN
192, GRAY'S INN ROAD,
LONDON, W.C.1
ISSUE DATED - 6 APR 1971

FESTIVAL HALL

Edward Greenfield

Boston S.O.

NOT SINCE 1956 HAS the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in London, and now they came for a tantalising single concert before flying off on a European tour. The more tantalising when this particular concert at the Royal Festival Hall had little of the fizz one hears on Boston records. Was it the effect of the flight over; was it that I was expecting too much after the records; was it that William Steinberg, the new Musical Director, had comparatively little to say about these two symphonies, Mozart's "Linz" and Mahler's Seventh? I wondered, but whatever it was, we had to wait until the finale of the Mahler before ears were really made to tingle. Then it was more because of a direct, disciplined assault rather than because of the subtle tonal nuances which this of all American orchestras can produce.

The Mozart received a well-behaved performance, and already—as with the Boston Pops Orchestra at the Albert Hall on Sunday night—it was plain that the orchestral balance was presenting problems in new acoustics. Symphony Hall, Boston, has, I suppose, the most helpful acoustic of any major hall in the world, and there at least the strings can be relied on to provide a cushion of sound. Even in the unhelpful Festival Hall (not so dry as it was but still with no deep resonance) the Boston strings had fine body, but the brass behaved as though it was twice as large. Brass came out in the ensemble a very loud first, strings second and woodwind a disappointing third—no fault of theirs.

Steinberg's view of Mahler was not as searching as we have grown accustomed to even in this once rare symphony. There was little fantasy, little that conveyed the macabre atmosphere of so much of the writing. The second Night Music was given an extrovert reading with the loudest mandoline playing I have ever heard (amplified?) It trotted neatly rather than caressing, but it was the finale with its Elgarian tinges that at last drew from Steinberg as well as the players the imaginative responses we expect of them. This most difficult movement of a difficult symphony surprisingly held together more cogently than the rest, in spite of its comparatively ramshackle structure.

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE TIMES
PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE,
LONDON, E.C.4.
ISSUE DATED 6 APR 1971

Boston S.O.
Festival Hall
Stanley Sadie

The Boston Symphony has of course been one of the world's great orchestras for a long time. A visit from them must be something of an occasion. (Seats at the Festival Hall last night cost up to £4, and I did not see an empty one.) And they laudably chose a big and rare piece as their main item: Mahler's seventh symphony.

Yet the concert was somehow a dispiriting one. Not because of any lack of efficiency, or individual musicianship, in the orchestra, nor any want of responsiveness. But there was not much that was positive to respond to. William Steinberg's interpretations—is that the word?—had little evident character. Often it seemed that the performances were merely the acting out of a well-rehearsed ritual, one that had staled and lost much of its vitality and meaning.

The evening started with Mozart's Symphony No. 36, done with slightly reduced strings. The playing in the Allegro scarcely hinted at Mozart's spiritoso qualification; it was curiously listless, and such momentum as Mr. Steinberg developed he dissipated by stretching the pulse at crucial cadences. I had always thought of this piece as among Mozart's wittiest, but here even those leaping dialogues in the finale were solemnly earthbound, and the trio suggested that the light-hearted Ländler swing finds little response in Boston nowadays. The Adagio drew some refined, aristocratic tone from the strings, but it was coolly expressed, and those minor-key shifts had nothing of darkness or mystery.

In Mahler the orchestra had more, or at least more evident, opportunities. The string tone can be rich and warm: the violins sounded full and suave, even when poised high among the leger-lines, and the cellos sang long, shapely lines in the first of the Night-Music movements. Among a strong woodwind section I especially relished the playing of the clarinets, rounded in tone and agile. Among the brass one could scarcely help noticing the trumpets. Mr. Steinberg had them placed high up at the back of the orchestra, one step above the trumpets' usual level; they were several steps above the usual dynamic level, and from my seat (at the back of the stalls on the red side) their cutting tone and crackling brilliance of articulation dominated everything whenever they were let loose, which was often. Perhaps they need to cultivate this hard, bright sound for their gentler acoustic at home.

As for the interpretation, it seemed to have little feeling of conviction, little sense of why the piece is as it is. The first movement, the core of the work, certainly had spells of tautly held rhythm, violent attack, and sustained physical excitement; but the ideas themselves were under-characterized, and there was no real continuity of impulse. The group of middle movements went better. Some of the textures were quite delicately hit off, and the underlying tone of bitterness and desolation was hinted at. The C major triumphs of the finale (though can they be counted triumphs when nothing is resolved?) produced the predictably vigorous and full-throated response.

Boston Orchestra

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

EVENING STANDARD
47, SHOE LANE,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED - 6 APR 1971

CONCERT/Paul Callan

Mahler's lush mystery

MAHLER'S seventh symphony—given a rare airing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under William Steinberg in the Royal Festival Hall last night—is a musical oddity.

It was composed at a time when Mahler's musical mores were undergoing a form of transition and it is generally regarded as being the last of the works which marked his middle period as a symphonist.

It is a long (well over an hour and taking up the full second half of the concert) and lushly orchestrated work. Like so much of Mahler's music, it contains great colour and a display of frequently magnificent instrumentation.

But the problem lies in determining thoughout the work any hint of regular and maintained thematic unity.

In the first movement there is a great element of romance, broad and sweeping, as though Mahler was even tilting at the amour - propre of German romanticism.

In the first of the Nightmusic movements there is eloquent interplay among the strings—sweetly handled, particularly by the BSO's cello section—on a noblemente, almost Elgarian bass.

Then it suddenly changes to a spiky, Spanish-style rhythm; then again to an almost military theme which gave the orchestra marked opportunity to display their technical dexterity.

After the eccentric scherzo, with its triplet rhythms, crazy orchestration and high degree of parody, comes the second, Nightmusic movement.

There is some brilliant orchestration here with the subtle touch of guitar and mandolin.

The final movement ends on a festive note and in a distinct neo-classical style. But it still gives little clue to unravelling the complex problem of thematic schizophrenia.

Even Mahler himself found that it was not without its troubles and possibly one wonders whether he was simply etching out a series of drawings, even exercises, before plunging into the darker world inhabited by his later work.

b.s.o. in london

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE FINANCIAL TIMES
10, CANNON STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 6 APR 1971

Festival Hall

Boston Symphony

by RONALD CRICHTON

Fifteen years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra was last in London. The costs of touring a great orchestra so far afield being what they are, it will, in all probability, be an equally long time before we hear them in the flesh again.

In the meantime we shall no doubt feed, as many of us have been doing for more years than we can remember, on the Boston recordings. It was the memory of those recordings, in fact, that made it impossible to experience last night's concert without a pang of acute disappointment, for high expectations were largely unfulfilled.

It would, all the same, be unjust not to praise William Steinberg, the orchestra's musical director and chief conductor, for making the main work in his programme something as unusual by the normal standards of grand tour beanos as Mahler's seventh symphony, that long, fascinating, diverse, finally perplexing score that even the most avid Mahlerians do not expect to hear very often.

Unfortunately, the performance was not calculated to persuade the conventionally-minded that it is worth going off the beaten track on such occasions.

The first movement was disjointed, with an emphasis on dry timbres that surely went beyond what Mahler even in his most bone-rattling moods can have intended—here as in other places there were signs that the Boston players were finding the Festival Hall's unromantic clarity uncomfortably different from what they are accustomed to.

Warmth came about half way through the first Night music, and in the three middle movements there was some highly expert wind playing of the kind one expects, also some beautiful, sheeny string tone.

Many details were beguiling, others were irritating. Why so much emphasis on the twangling mandoline in the fourth movement; why did the solo violin play the phrases marked "stark hervortretend" with such sweetly gentle tone? The impulse behind the conducting felt only intermittent.

There were moments in the finale when the mixture of Meistersinger, Bizet and Austrian-Turkish military marching was agreeably effervescent in sound, but the closing pages, with the return of the symphony's first theme, were unconvincing.

The evening began with Mozart's Linz symphony, marmoreally lifeless. One would have preferred lots of wrong notes to this chilling smoothness.

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE SUNDAY TIMES
200, GRAY'S INN ROAD,
LONDON, W.C.1
ISSUE DATED 11 APR 1971

The Bostonians

MUSIC □ DESMOND SHAWE-TAYLOR

SINCE the Boston Symphony Orchestra last visited London in 1956, it has acquired a new principal conductor in William Steinberg, a serious-minded musician, who paid us the compliment, at the Festival Hall on Monday, of a serious programme consisting of nothing but two symphonies.

The first of these, Mozart's Linz Symphony, emerged as rather more serious, in fact, than we had hitherto suspected; it hardly seemed the same work that not so long ago used to dance and sparkle under Beecham.

The other symphony was Mahler's Seventh, an unconventional choice even in these Mahler-filled days. There was much to admire, needless to say, in the playing of this great orchestra: string tone that was particularly rich in the lower regions, an agile and well-balanced wind group, and trumpeters who spat out their dramatic interjections with quite venomous brilliance. The performance as a whole caught well enough the nervous, hectic side of the music, and provided some sensuous relaxation during the two "Nachtstück" movements; but it was less successful than other interpretations (those of Bernstein and of Haitink, for example) in forging some kind of unity from the diverse component parts of this self-indulgent and sprawling symphony.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH
135, FLEET STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 6 APR 1971

Concerts

Sang-froid with Boston orchestra

By PETER STADLEN

SELFLESSLY, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and their conductor-in-chief William Steinberg chose Mahler's rarely heard Seventh Symphony for their representative London concert at the Festival Hall last night.

Not until towards the end of a long evening did I feel that the renowned band began to come into its own.

Offhand I would say that a brilliant and inexhaustible pair of trumpets and a leader capable of truly amoroso solos are among their most enviable possessions.

Nor, needless to add, were their weaknesses to be noticed in any department if we don't count a mandolin, patently too enthusiastic on finding himself in an orchestra of such repute and size.

Mr Steinberg presided with characteristic sang-froid over his massive forces—I counted nine double basses and seven horns. It cannot be said that he obtained all the finesse his players might have been capable of during the marching and counter-marching, the ironic waltzing and the naively plaintive nocturnal calls.

And some string disunity that occurred as late as the Gracioso episode of the final Rondo must be laid at the conductor's door.

★

There was no mistaking his sense of devotion and utter commitment, not surprising in an artist born and bred in pre-first war Germany. Even so I wished he had deceived us more cunningly still over the remarkable lack of cohesion and musical raison d'être during those 90 minutes or so.

An utter aversion to showmanship is among Mr Steinberg's most endearing qualities. But on this occasion it did result in a distinctly stodgy performance of Mozart's "Linz" Symphony.

GREAT ORCHESTRA TREADS WARILY

Daily Express 9/4/71

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Royal Festival Hall

EVERY American orchestra reckons itself to be great. Boston has one of the greater ones, and it appeared in London last night for the first time in 15 years at the outset of a European tour.

Mozart's "Linz" Symphony at the start was presented as if the music were somewhat larger than life and the players somewhat less than settled in the lack of an ideal ensemble.

But this was in the nature of a preliminary to Mahler's giant Seventh Symphony, which is not exactly a Mahler favourite even among his devotees.

[illegible] shaped a performance that demonstrated its problems [illegible] make a completely convincing whole—without actually [illegible] time round to solving them.

That is not to say the result [illegible] by no means, which [illegible] wealth of character and expressive colour was for [illegible] in one episode at least [illegible].

I have heard more [illegible] playing that went deeper into the composer's spirit, but few [illegible] purposefully as the Bostonians.

They could conquer it altogether, no doubt, with a more careful concern for matters of balance and phrase. I would rather this [illegible] vivacious, though, than a programme of absolute [illegible].

Conductor William Steinberg

NOEL GOODWIN

Boston Symphony Orchestra
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
HAMPSTEAD & HIGHGATE EXPRESS
HAMPSTEAD,
LONDON, N.W.3
ISSUE DATED 16 APR 1971

The wrong programmes

MUSIC
By Denby Richards

KINDNESS to foreigners, and especially visitors from distant shores, is the essence of hospitality. Which makes life difficult for a critic — and even more so when the visitor makes things difficult for himself by bad planning.

There is nothing more difficult to erase than poor programme planning, either in content or in context of the conditions of performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra faced great problems at the Royal Festival Hall on Monday. They had had a long journey from the USA on Saturday, and on Sunday most members of the orchestra had rehearsed and played a concert with Arthur Fiedler, under the hat of the Boston Pops, at the Albert Hall.

These factors alone would seem to suggest that their Monday programme should have enabled them to relax and play at their best, rather than have to tackle an 85-minute marathon of a work which would tax their endurance as players, as well as their endurance as musicians.

Yet, Mahler's Seventh Symphony was chosen, and they played it in the manner of tired heroes, giving their all in the boistrous brassy finale, which ended with more than enough noise to guarantee a loud equally noisy ovation from the audience.

The subtle phrasing, fine ensembles and richness which are the hallmarks of this great orchestra will be heard by other audiences in Europe — London was as unfortunate as the players themselves.

Steinberg is a fine musician, but he was ill advised to give this symphony—even though he probably insisted on doing it! That he had to go off for a break after the first movement not only broke the tension of the work, but indicated that his own strength was not up to the task.

The following evening a young Belgian visitor made his London debut, in the Purcell Room, and again it was the choice of programme which worked against him.

Fine player

Jean-Claude Vanden Eynden is a fine player, full of temperament and with the gift of poetic expression. He opened with a strong performance of Schumann's F major Novelette, full of warmth and expression, and then brought the poetic side of his nature to Chopin's last Ballade.

However, to play Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No 15 at this stage was a mistake. It was as though he did not like bravura works, and wished to get this one out of the way as soon as possible. The piece was played far too fast—as was the Chopin Ballade — and became technically beyond his power to keep from sounding muggy.

He lost all sense of a march rhythm, and poor Rakoczy was rushed along pellmell.

After the interval, Ravel's Ondine, divorced from the complete Gaspard de la Nuit, was misplaced, and lost its impact. Stravinsky's C major Sonata was the best played work of the evening, which also marked the death of its composer that afternoon. Here the playing was well defined, clean, full of point and biting humour.

However, the three Rachmaninoff Preludes were too forced, paid scant attention to the composer's dynamics, and ended a recital which could have been so much better had the artist chosen his programme with more thought.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
DAILY MAIL
CARMELITE HOUSE,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 6 APR 1971

A surprise from across the Atlantic

By MICHAEL REYNOLDS

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Royal Festival Hall.

LAST NIGHT was a nasty surprise and a profound disappointment: I have rarely heard a more unpleasant noise from a so-called international orchestra. After all, American players usually have at least the quality of technical efficiency.

Two symphonies comprised the programme—Mozart's Linz and Mahler's Seventh. Both suffered from a bad blend of tone, a string section which would be the shame of London and a crass sloppy approach from conductor William Steinberg.

It was with reluctance that I stayed to the end. One of the least of my reasons was the out-of-tune playing. At this moment I am fuming.

Boston Orch
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
MUSIC & MUSICIANS
ARTILLERY MANSIONS,
75, VICTORIA STREET,
LONDON, S.W.1
ISSUE DATED JUN 1971

viewpoint

NOËL GOODWIN

□ □ □ □

AT THE INTERVAL in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert on April 5, quite a widespread concern was apparent among some sections of the audience that we had heard what amounted to a great orchestra much below its best. Even when Mozart was followed by Mahler, the feeling persisted. I heard it suggested that there had been too little time for the orchestra to get the measure of a hall acoustically much different from their own, or that the players had not had time to sort themselves out after the flight over.

Both suggestions had perhaps only a partial degree of truth, but I have begun to wonder if such stopover orchestral tours are any longer fair to the artists and audiences alike. I read that the LSO in Leningrad was handicapped by a lack of rehearsal facilities on the spot, and that it took all of three concerts to find something like its proper form.

Had the Boston orchestra arranged a minimum of three concerts in London, we might have heard more of its impressive potential. Economic stringencies being what they are anyway, I would think it behoved managements and sponsoring bodies, anxious to maintain artistic prestige, to reconsider touring policy in terms of fewer centres and more concerts in each.

Boston Orch
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
JEWISH CHRONICLE
25, FURNIVAL STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 16 APR 1971

MUSIC

Pinnacle at 71

ARTHUR JACOBS

"It's stupid," said an American musician who happened to be at the Festival Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared there last week. "If you have the Boston, why do they have to play Mahler?"

He meant that Mahler requires a deep, intense, homogeneous style of playing, while the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been renowned for its individual glitter, for virtuosity in music that is full of "show," like that of Ravel and Richard Strauss. But this particular brand of fame is, I think, associated with such past conductors as Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf. The present conductor, William Steinberg, evidently nourishes a different ideal.

German by birth and a Jewish exile from Hitler, Steinberg made comparatively little impression as the London Philharmonic's conductor a decade ago. Now, at the age of 71, he appears to have reached a pinnacle. He heads the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra as well as the Boston, the first conductor ever to hold two such major American appointments concurrently.

He prefaced Mahler by Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, and I liked the strong, well-balanced sound. A delightful and quite special effect came from the soft kettledrum strokes, occasionally so soft as to be almost felt rather than heard. If the tempo was staid rather than brisk, there is more than one way of playing a Mozart symphony.

Mr Steinberg himself is a remarkably undemonstrative conductor. His gestures were very restrained or even held in suspense.

His performances of Mahler's Seventh Symphony demonstrated many good points and a few bad ones. I cannot think that the guitar, on one of its rare appearances in the symphony orchestra, should sound so coarse and "buzzing" in tone. But it is the music itself of this 80-minute work which I now find self-indulgent, almost hysterical.

Two nights later the London Mozart Players and their conductor, Harry Blech, found something new to say about Mozart—the Mozart who, in his youthful Salzburg years, had been a church composer. One of his "church sonatas" for orchestra and organ, and one of his settings of the Litany (with the able Cardiff Polyphonic Choir, and soloists led by Jill Gomez) were worth hearing—as curiosities, at least.

THE LAST chord of Mozart's "Linz" Symphony was barely over in the Festival Hall last night as the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended the first half of their concert: a handful of furrow-browed men scrambled out and towards the bar. As they rushed by, a distinctly Boston voice in the audience was heard to observe: "There go the critics."

Boston Orch
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
THE MUSICAL TIMES
27, SOHO SQUARE,
LONDON, W.1
ISSUE DATED

ORCHESTRAL

Boston SO

Sometimes the best-intentioned, most expensive efforts in cultural relations fall to the ground with a dull thud. Such unfortunately was the concert (FH, April 5) by the Boston SO, the first London visit by this famous band for 15 years. What made it all the sadder was that William Steinberg, the orchestra's musical director and chief conductor, had to his credit chosen as the main work in his programme something as unusual by grand tour standards as Mahler's Seventh Symphony. Alas, that his commitment to Mahler should on this showing be so cool, the impulse behind his direction of the long symphony so intermittent.

The first movement was disjointed, with a dryness of timbre that surely went beyond what Mahler in his most bone-rattling mood can have intended—here as in other places, there were signs that the Boston players are accustomed to something warmer and more resonant than the Festival Hall. Warmth did come, about half way through the first Night music; this movement and its two successors brought beguiling details—highly expert wind playing, sheeny string tone. But there were irritating details too. Why such heavy emphasis on the mandoline in the second Night music; why did the solo violin play the phrases marked 'stark hervortretend' with such coy bashfulness? The finale brought moments of effervescence, but the close, with the return of the symphony's first theme, sounded hollow. The evening began with Mozart's Linz Symphony, marmoreally lifeless, with a chilling smoothness to which one would have preferred any amount of wrong notes.

RONALD CRICHTON

International Herald Tribune, April 7, 1971

The Boston Symphony in London

By Henry Pleasants

LONDON, April 6.—William Steinberg brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Royal Festival Hall, last night, for its first appearance here since 1956, and regaled a packed house with Mozart's "Linz" Symphony and Mahler's Symphony No. 7, in B minor.

The choice of Mahler was dictated, presumably, by the current Mahler vogue in London. He has become, as a critic colleague put it, "the Tchaikovsky of our time." The designation is apt in more ways than one, for Mahler and Tchaikovsky had more in common than any good Mahlerian would care to admit. This applies especially to the Seventh Symphony, the banality of whose last movement might well bring blushes to the cheek of the sincerest admirer of Tchaikovsky's familiar piano concerto.

But it was not, in the event, a satisfactory program. From a great orchestra on tour one hopes for a concept that will show off as many facets as possible of its characteristics and capabilities. A variety of familiar masterpieces is the ideal, allowing the touring orchestra a chance to stretch out in music it knows by heart, and giving the audience a chance to measure its performance against the playing of the same music by other orchestras.

Nothing of all this was to be had from comparatively lightweight Mozart, or from an hour-and-a-half of Mahler's least familiar symphony. This latter is as tricky and quirky as it is long, and just about the last symphony in the repertoire to be hazarded by an orchestra playing in a strange acoustical environment and guided by a conductor whose beat is sometimes of Furtwänglerian ambiguity.

There were, to be sure, moments where the superlative virtuosity of the orchestra's soloists and its string and wind choirs could be savored; but the impression was one of seasoned professionals surviving against odds, not of great artists rejoicing in the enrichment of congenial material. Even the Mozart was curiously circumspect. It was, if I may be permitted the use of an unfashionable four-letter word, dull.

The same orchestra, minus its first-chair players, appeared as the Boston Pops Orchestra at the Albert Hall Sunday night under the veteran Arthur Fiedler, the latter looking for all the world like Lloyd George as Lloyd George might have looked had he been a bandmaster. The concert, with Malcolm Frager playing, yes, that Tchaikovsky concerto, was a considerable success.

AP.

William Steinberg

But the proposition that the Boston Symphony becomes the Boston Pops Orchestra by the withdrawal of the first-chair players strikes me as, well, somehow distasteful.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
HAMPSTEAD & HIGHGATE EXPRESS
HAMPSTEAD,
LONDON, N.W.3
ISSUE DATED 16 APR 1971

The wrong programmes

MUSIC
By Denby Richards

KINDNESS to foreigners, and especially visitors from distant shores, is the essence of hospitality. Which makes life difficult for a critic — and even more so when the visitor makes things difficult for himself by bad planning.

There is nothing more difficult to erase than poor programme planning, either in content or in context of the conditions of performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra faced great problems at the Royal Festival Hall on Monday. They had had a long journey from the USA on Saturday, and on Sunday most members of the orchestra had rehearsed and played a concert with Arthur Fiedler, under the hat of the Boston Pops, at the Albert Hall.

These factors alone would seem to suggest that their Monday programme should have enabled them to relax and play at their best, rather than have to tackle an 85-minute marathon of a work which would tax their endurance as players, as well as their endurance as musicians.

Yet, Mahler's Seventh Symphony was chosen, and they played it in the manner of tired heroes, giving their all in the boistrous brassy finale, which ended with more than enough noise to guarantee a loud equally noisy ovation from the audience.

The subtle phrasing, fine ensembles and richness which are the hallmarks of this great orchestra will be heard by other audiences in Europe — London was as unfortunate as the players themselves.

Steinberg is a fine musician, but he was ill advised to give this symphony—even though he probably insisted on doing it! That he had to go off for a break after the first movement not only broke the tension of the work, but indicated that his own strength was not up to the task.

The following evening a young Belgian visitor made his London debut, in the Purcell Room, and again it was the choice of programme which worked against him.

Fine player

Jean-Claude Vanden Eynden is a fine player, full of temperament and with the gift of poetic expression. He opened with a strong performance of Schumann's F major Novelette, full of warmth and expression, and then brought the poetic side of his nature to Chopin's last Ballade.

However, to play Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No 15 at this stage was a mistake. It was as though he did not like bravura works, and wished to get this one out of the way as soon as possible. The piece was played far too fast—as was the Chopin Ballade — and became technically beyond his power to keep from sounding muggy.

He lost all sense of a march rhythm, and poor Rakoczy was rushed along pellmell.

After the interval, Ravel's Ondine, divorced from the complete Gaspard de la Nuit, was misplaced, and lost its impact. Stravinsky's C major Sonata was the best played work of the evening, which also marked the death of its composer that afternoon. Here the playing was well defined, clean, full of point and biting humour.

However, the three Rachmaninoff Preludes were too forced, paid scant attention to the composer's dynamics, and ended a recital which could have been so much better had the artist chosen his programme with more thought.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
DAILY MAIL
CARMELITE HOUSE,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 6 APR 1971

63

A surprise from across the Atlantic

By MICHAEL REYNOLDS

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Royal Festival Hall.

LAST NIGHT was a nasty surprise and a profound disappointment: I have rarely heard a more unpleasant noise from a so-called international orchestra. After all, American players usually have at least the quality of technical efficiency.

Two symphonies comprised the programme—Mozart's Linz and Mahler's Seventh. Both suffered from a bad blend of tone, a string section which would be the shame of London and a cross sloppy approach from conductor William Steinberg.

It was with reluctance that I stayed to the end. One of the least of my reasons was the out-of-tune playing. At this moment I am fuming.

Boston Orch
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
MUSIC & MUSICIANS
ARTILLERY MANSIONS,
75, VICTORIA STREET,
LONDON, S.W.1
ISSUE DATED JUN 1971

viewpoint

NOËL GOODWIN

AT THE INTERVAL in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert on April 5, quite a widespread concern was apparent among some sections of the audience that we had heard what amounted to a great orchestra much below its best. Even when Mozart was followed by Mahler, the feeling persisted. I heard it suggested that there had been too little time for the orchestra to get the measure of a hall acoustically much different from their own, or that the players had not had time to sort themselves out after the flight over.

Both suggestions had perhaps only a partial degree of truth, but I have begun to wonder if such stopover orchestral tours are any longer fair to the artists and audiences alike. I read that the LSO in Leningrad was handicapped by a lack of rehearsal facilities on the spot, and that it took all of three concerts to find something like its proper form.

Had the Boston orchestra arranged a minimum of three concerts in London, we might have heard more of its impressive potential. Economic stringencies being what they are anyway, I would think it behoved managements and sponsoring bodies, anxious to maintain artistic prestige, to reconsider touring policy in terms of fewer centres and more concerts in each.

Boston Orch.
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
JEWISH CHRONICLE
25, FURNIVAL STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 16 APR 1971

MUSIC

Pinnacle at 71

ARTHUR JACOBS

"It's stupid," said an American musician who happened to be at the Festival Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared there last week. "If you have the Boston, why do they have to play Mahler?"

He meant that Mahler requires a deep, intense, homogeneous style of playing, while the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been renowned for its individual glitter, for virtuosity in music that is full of "show," like that of Ravel and Richard Strauss. But this particular brand of fame is, I think, associated with such past conductors as Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf. The present conductor, William Steinberg, evidently nourishes a different ideal.

German by birth and a Jewish exile from Hitler, Steinberg made comparatively little impression as the London Philharmonic's conductor a decade ago. Now, at the age of 71, he appears to have reached a pinnacle. He heads the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra as well as the Boston, the first conductor ever to hold two such major American appointments concurrently.

He prefaced Mahler by Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, and I liked the strong, well-balanced sound. A delightful and quite special effect came from the soft kettledrum strokes, occasionally so soft as to be almost felt rather than heard. If the tempo was staid rather than brisk, there is more than one way of playing a Mozart symphony.

Mr Steinberg himself is a remarkably undemonstrative conductor. His gestures were very restrained or even held in suspense.

His performances of Mahler's Seventh Symphony demonstrated many good points and a few bad ones. I cannot think that the guitar, on one of its rare appearances in the symphony orchestra, should sound so coarse and "buzzing" in tone. But it is the music itself of this 80-minute work which I now find self-indulgent, almost hysterical.

Two nights later the London Mozart Players and their conductor, Harry Blech, found something new to say about Mozart—the Mozart who, in his youthful Salzburg years, had been a church composer. One of his "church sonatas" for orchestra and organ, and one of his settings of the Litany (with the able Cardiff Polyphonic Choir, and soloists led by Jill Gomez) were worth hearing—as curiosities, at least.

THE LAST chord of Mozart's "Linz" Symphony was barely over in the Festival Hall last night as the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended the first half of their concert: a handful of furrow-browed men scrambled out and towards the bar. As they rushed by, a distinctly Boston voice in the audience was heard to observe: "There go the critics."

International Herald Tribune, April 7, 1971

The Boston Symphony in London

By Henry Pleasants

LONDON, April 6.—William Steinberg brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Royal Festival Hall, last night, for its first appearance here since 1956, and regaled a packed house with Mozart's "Linz" Symphony and Mahler's Symphony No. 7, in B minor.

The choice of Mahler was dictated, presumably, by the current Mahler vogue in London. He has become, as a critic colleague put it, "the Tchaikovsky of our time." The designation is apt in more ways than one, for Mahler and Tchaikovsky had more in common than any good Mahlerian would care to admit. This applies especially to the Seventh Symphony, the banality of whose last movement might well bring blushes to the cheek of the sincerest admirer of Tchaikovsky's familiar piano concerto.

But it was not, in the event, a satisfactory program. From a great orchestra on tour one hopes for a concept that will show off as many facets as possible of its characteristics and capabilities. A variety of familiar masterpieces is the ideal, allowing the touring orchestra a chance to stretch out in music it knows by heart, and giving the audience a chance to measure its performance against the playing of the same music by other orchestras.

Nothing of all this was to be had from comparatively lightweight Mozart, or from an hour-and-a-half of Mahler's least familiar symphony. This latter is as tricky and quirky as it is long, and just about the last symphony in the repertoire to be hazarded by an orchestra playing in a strange acoustical environment and guided by a conductor whose beat is sometimes of Furtwänglerian ambiguity.

There were, to be sure, moments where the superlative virtuosity of the orchestra's soloists and its string and wind choirs could be savored; but the impression was one of seasoned professionals surviving against odds, not of great artists rejoicing in the enrichment of congenial material. Even the Mozart was curiously circumspect. It was, if I may be permitted the use of an unfashionable four-letter word, dull.

The same orchestra, minus its first-chair players, appeared as the Boston Pops Orchestra at the Albert Hall Sunday night under the veteran Arthur Fiedler, the latter looking for all the world like Lloyd George as Lloyd George might have looked had he been a bandmaster. The concert, with Malcolm Frager playing, yes, that Tchaikovsky concerto, was a considerable success.

But the proposition that the Boston Symphony becomes the Boston Pops Orchestra by the withdrawal of the first-chair players strikes me as, well, somehow distasteful.

AP.

William Steinberg

Boston Orch
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
THE MUSICAL TIMES
27, SOHO SQUARE,
LONDON, W.1
ISSUE DATED JUN 1971

ORCHESTRAL

Boston SO

Sometimes the best-intentioned, most expensive efforts in cultural relations fail to the ground with a dull thud. Such unfortunately was the concert (FH, April 5) by the Boston SO, the first London visit by this famous band for 15 years. What made it all the sadder was that William Steinberg, the orchestra's musical director and chief conductor, had to his credit chosen as the main work in his programme something as unusual by grand tour standards as Mahler's Seventh Symphony. Alas, that his commitment to Mahler should on this showing be so cool, the impulse behind his direction of the long symphony so intermittent.

The first movement was disjointed, with a dryness of timbre that surely went beyond what Mahler in his most bone-rattling mood can have intended—here as in other places, there were signs that the Boston players are accustomed to something warmer and more resonant than the Festival Hall. Warmth did come, about half way through the first Night music; this movement and its two successors brought beguiling details—highly expert wind playing, sheeny string tone. But there were irritating details too. Why such heavy emphasis on the mandoline in the second Night music; why did the solo violin play the phrases marked 'stark hervortretend' with such coy bashfulness? The finale brought moments of effervescence, but the close, with the return of the symphony's first theme, sounded hollow. The evening began with Mozart's Linz Symphony, marmoreally lifeless, with a chilling smoothness to which one would have preferred any amount of wrong notes.

RONALD CRICHTON

64

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE SUNDAY TIMES
200, GRAY'S INN ROAD,
LONDON, W.C.1
ISSUE DATED

FIEDLER ON THE MOVE

While the Boston Symphony filled the Festival Hall last Sunday (see page 29), the Albert Hall was taken over by the Boston Pops. Philip Oakes talks to their conductor, Arthur Fiedler

ARTHUR FIEDLER has this passion for fires. The bigger the blaze, the greater his enthusiasm. Sometimes, his phone rings in the dead of night; it's the local fire chief reporting on what's going up in smoke. If he's not too tired, Fiedler nips round in a trice: "I don't get what you might call an orgasm watching a conflagration. But there is real excitement in watching mere man fight this devastating force of nature."

It's akin to his own job, he thinks. As conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra he has ninety-seven men under his baton: "And the conductor is the natural enemy of the orchestra." What he's after is control. His interpretation of the music is what matters, and—in his book—debate has no place in the concert hall. "I work as fast as I know how. One may have primadonnas, but in the last resort it is the musician who must give in. I always play what I like. My taste is broad, and I think that is the reason for my success."

Ninety-eight per cent of Fiedler's concerts are fully booked before the tickets are printed. Since 1935, he has sold forty-seven million records. In a typical programme he brackets the Beatles and Bach, Dvorak and Duke Ellington. One of his musicians complained about Fiedler's treatment of Saint-Saëns' The Carnival of Animals. "When the elephants came on I had their music played by eleven basses. The musician said that Saint-Saëns didn't write it that way. I didn't argue. I got hold of the personnel manager and told him 'If this man won't play, then I won't conduct.' He played."

Fiedler breathes fire and brimstone to superb effect; but the fumes, one feels, are part of the performance. He's unremittingly theatrical; curt and courtly in turn. His tan has the permanence of an aniline dye. His moustache glints like frost. He's seventy-six, and lodged on the pantheon as one of the Grand Old Men of Music. But he's restless, forever on the move. God knows where he finds the energy.

On Friday he's conducting a concert in Bonn (Joan Kennedy—Ted's wife—is his narrator for Peter and the Wolf). Then he's flying back to Boston for nine weeks of concerts—six concerts a week—plus thirteen TV shows and recording dates. For the rest of the year he'll be touring as a guest conductor (twenty-one concerts in twenty days with the Washington Symphony Orchestra). And already he's making arrangements for next year's tour of Australia and Japan. He never takes a holiday. "I gypsy around and enjoy it. It's the variety I like. If you are a physician and all you have to do is another appendectomy, it's a bore. I find living out of suitcases very stimulating."

He's not single-minded, far from it. His diversity is what brings the boos from musical purists. But since conducting his first concert at the age of seventeen, he has never wanted any other life. For a while he was an orchestral musician—playing violin, viola, piano, and organ—but he thinks he was a poor soloist. The baton become his chosen instrument: "How else can you get that instantaneous musical response from a hundred men? To me it is irresistible."

He's Boston-born (the son of an Austrian violinist) and he became conductor of the Boston Pops—a section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—in 1930. During the season, beginning next month, several rows of seats in the Symphony Hall are replaced by café tables, and the music is imbibed with wine. It's an innovation which would be welcome in London. Fiedler, who likes a glass himself now and then, scythes down objections with a sweep of his moustache.

"Snobbism is the worst horror of music. Boston Pops doesn't just mean 'pop music.' It means music of all sorts which is deservedly popular. I know that it is considered chic to be enthusiastic about music which you don't understand, but I try to play something for everyone."

A Pops programme may range from Aaron Copland to Sousa. A newly-released album, Fiedler's Greatest Hits, includes waltzes by Richard Rodgers, John Barry's theme from Midnight Cowboy, and tunes by Burt Bacharach and Hal David. Fiedler is sharp about Stockhausen and John Cage, but he has used Moog Synthesisers in his music-making, and he's proud to point out that he conducted the first performance in America of Khatchaturian's concerto for piano and violin. "I know that critics complain that some arrangements are too elaborate, but I say that it is perfectly all right to dress up simple tunes. Mr Bach did it with Couperin, and I have done it with Lennon and McCartney. I wish you could hear the Boston Pops playing I Want to Hold Your Hand. A hundred men playing hard rock. That's really something."

Fiedler may think of himself as a gypsy, but his caravan is fairly sumptuous, and his camp-sites give ample opportunity for rest and digestion. "I don't take any pills. I don't believe in pills. I've learned how to live. Basically, I suppose it's a question of adjusting your diet. I have a substantial mid-day meal, a little drink, a good walk, and then I'm ready for the evening performance. I get my exercise from conducting. I read an article recently by a doctor who said that more laymen should try conducting to records. He said it was great for the circulation. I'm built like a prize fighter: big muscles on top, slender from the waist down. Music keeps me fit.

"What's the difference between conductors? It's difficult to say, but think of it in terms of acting. You get ten actors playing Hamlet. They use the same gestures, the same histrionics. But one man stands out. I think it is because his intent is readily discerned. It's the same with music, although with the listener so much is habit. He becomes so accustomed to hearing a performance on a recording that he can think of it in no other way. It's a sad fact, but Hi-Fi could be the death of the live concert."

Ready to mount the rostrum, Fiedler tweaks his tails, and tugs his boiled shirt straight. He likes to put on a good show for the customers, but travelling puts a strain on his wardrobe. "Can you tell me where to find collar studs these days? The only place I seem to be able to buy them is in an old town with a waterfront section. And where on earth can you get a boiled shirt properly laundered?"

Musically, Arthur Fiedler knows most of the answers. It's his laundry, he says, which remains a hell of a problem.

london interviews with fiedler and thomas

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE GRAMOPHONE
379, KENTON ROAD,
KENTON,
MIDDLESEX

ISSUE DATED JUN 1971

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

Talks to ALAN BLYTH

TIPPED by Newsweek among others as a possible musical director in the not-too-distant future of the Cleveland, Philadelphia or Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas is obviously a name we are sure to hear great deal of before long. Already he has something of the Golden Boy aura of the young Bernstein—Bernstein himself has encouraged and advised Thomas over the past few years—and he himself has an air of levitation about him, not knowing perhaps quite how quickly news, and consequent engagements, follow these days.

His conversation is refreshingly agnostic about received ideas:

Item: "The generation gap in 'serious' music is only now being felt as it has been already in the pop field. A programme of Cage's prepared piano sonatas I gave on television disturbed people over 50. The younger ones understood the music intuitively. At a youth concert I conducted in Los Angeles including Varèse's Deserts the audience found no difficulty, as their elders would have done, in understanding and sympathising with the music. Orchestras in future will simply have to take more of these works into their regular repertory if the institution is to survive. Indeed during the next 15 years I foresee a reformation of our major musical institutions. After all, they're not artistically or economically very successful at the moment, are they?"

Item: "Young people are not interested in stock performances of the standard repertory. Neither am I. They encourage a proprietary approach to these pieces so that anything out of the ordinary gets that hateful tag 'It wasn't musical'. I hope every performance I hear or conduct will be different from the last, and not stuck in a mould. I like to hear things I have never heard before. My generation are less proprietary; we perform what we like.

Item: "A performance of a work such as Schumann's Third Symphony makes much more of an impression if it's set in a completely alien context. Surrounded by modern works, the Schumann can knock you off base and that makes for excitement. That's the sort of format I have in mind for my series, which starts next year in Boston. It is aimed at the younger audience".

Thomas has recently been promoted from assistant to associate conductor in Boston, the latest advance in what has been a fairly sudden rise to prominence in the musical field of a young man who intended to be a scientist until he was 18, although music was always there in his curriculum. He began playing the piano when he was ten but only by ear. His parents were so worried about this that they decided he must have lessons. His father Ted Thomas, who worked in films in Hollywood, never had lessons but has the gift of coming home from concerts and playing large chunks from the pieces he has just heard. The family is theatrical; Michael's grandfather was a famous theatrical director and Thomas's talk is full of theatrical metaphors—"I recently conducted Beethoven's Seventh for the first time—it was rather like doing Henry IV, part 2".

At the University of Southern California he studied mineralology and chrystalography, later moving to biochemistry. Then, suddenly when he was 18, he decided to change to music. "I knew many people who had been disappointed and disillusioned by the profession and they made me very sad, so I said to myself that if I had not accomplished anything by the time I was 20 I would go back to science. Why did I go over to music? You could say it was because of genetic influences, or that something within me told me that's what I should do.

"At the USC, I studied with Ingolf Dahl, himself a much-under-rated composer and conductor. I've never known anyone with more devotion or less bitterness. With him I studied analysis, theory and conducting, not as dry disciplines but as a vital, living part of my work. Once he took me to a concert. We heard a Pergolesi Trio Sonata and immediately he shot a question at me, 'What form was used there?' I'd never thought of listening like that. In this way he increased my perception. By many other means, he made me develop my own perspectives. I don't conduct or interpret in the least as he did but his influence on me is tremendous. I also learned a great deal from my piano teacher, John Crown, one of Rosenthal's prize pupils and a very warm player. These were my foundations".

During 1965-6, he came under the care of Piatigorsky and Boulez, who is very much admired in Los Angeles. Thomas went to Piatigorsky's master-classes in chamber music and worked with Boulez at the Ojai Festival and at Bayreuth, where he went in 1966 to be in Friedlinde Wagner's master-class, but one of the music staff fell ill and Thomas was chosen to replace him as coach. He also played the glockenspiel in Boulez's Parsifal. His début as a conductor was in Los Angeles with the Young Musicians Foundation. "I had the call from Piatigorsky to take this concert on the day of my twentieth birthday so my time-limit was just reached".

He then graduated to the famous Los Angeles "Evenings on the Roof" where he gave no less than 13 local premières of works by Stravinsky, Nono, Boulez, Pousseur, Webern and Gesualdo among others. Word began to get around that here was a young conductor who could really make sense of contemporary scores. Next came Tanglewood and the first performance of a very complex new opera by Silverman involving tapes and projections. That was in 1968, the year he also won the Koussevitzky prize. A year and a half later came the appointment with the Boston Symphony and the real break-through when he took over from Steinberg in the middle of a concert in New York's Philharmonic Hall. He conducted the rest of that particular tour. Recently he has been appointed musical director of the Buffalo Philharmonic while of course keeping his Boston post. He also conducted the BSO on its recent European tour, though not in London.

He is also busy recording with the orchestra for DGG. "I find record-making perplexing. You get together in a room and play a piece, and that's a disc. It becomes an object independent of you but it's only one performance and it may depend on how you felt that day, or on other circumstantial matters. Since I always do something different next time I play that work it upsets those who've got used to your recorded performance".

Thomas is very interested in the possibilities of television. "I believe there are many new ways of using this medium. I've some ideas up my sleeve but at present I'm not willing to talk about them".

When I met Thomas, he was over here to conduct the New Philharmonia in Mahler's Fifth Symphony, and he was very intrigued by the differences for the conductor in directing American and British orchestras. "In performing this kind of piece with an American orchestra, you need to ask the players to tone things down a bit; they can be too brilliant, even brutal, but they do follow your momentary changes of mood. Here, for my taste, your orchestras must be made more responsive to quick changes, more compulsive. In fact, the approach has to be exactly the reverse".

Thomas is a frequent museum visitor and an omnivorous reader in his spare time. "I read at least five books a week. For instance I've just tackled Tolstoy's My Confession, a collection of science fiction, Ibsen's last five plays and Huey Long's Autobiography. I also keep a group of reference books by my bedside to dip into from time to time".

His friends come from other fields in the arts and sciences rather than from the musical profession. "I enjoy the stimulation of hearing about their work and the way they throw fresh ideas at you. I hate any kind of insularity. That's why I believe in university rather than conservatory education, so that you can study other things besides your own subject. I went in for Asiatic studies, comparative literature, art and architecture, and the original ideas I may have come from other subjects. I also take a great interest in what's happening in other musical fields, I listen to Gagaku music, I like the Stones, James Brown and the Jackson Five".

The conversation turned full circle, round to audiences. "I always find the reaction of people in Boston most encouraging to unusual programmes. After I conducted the Sibelius Fourth I had a letter from an old lady saying that she so much enjoyed the performance; she found the piece so perplexing but I had made it clear to her. However, she had to say that, in all honesty, Karl Muck had conducted the Scherzo better than me. That must have been somewhere around 1913".

INTERNATIONAL HERALD TRIBUNE - Paris

65

LONDON

Problems of a Young Musician at the Top

By Henry Pleasants

LONDON, March 16.—A talk with Michael Tilson Thomas is a conversational roller-coaster trip through the centuries and the many worlds of music.

One moment, at his hotel here, a few days ago, he was going on [illegible] "tapping," as he would put it, about organum and Perotin, Leoderum Principes, composed for Notre Dame in the 12th century. In the next he was on to Karlheinz Stockhausen's "Punkte" and "Hymnen." And a few minutes later he was extolling the fantastic bass lines laid down by Bootsie Collins, the bass player in James Brown's soul group.

Well, an American musician who, at the age of 26, is already permanent conductor of the Buffalo Symphony Orchestra and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony must be an extraordinary fellow. But even among young musicians as gifted and accomplished as he, one rarely encounters so wide a range of experience and interest, or a curiosity so disdainful of conventional cultural categorization.

Meeting

I first met him at a party following his London debut last May, when he jumped in for Gennadi Rozhdestvensky as conductor of a concert by the London Symphony Orchestra. This was just a few months after he had made musical history by taking over from William Steinberg at a Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. He is obviously a man who welcomes challenge.

We talked, that evening, about

AP.

Michael Tilson Thomas

the Beethoven violin concerto and Stravinsky's symphony in three movements, which he had just conducted on precariously short notice. But in a matter of minutes the conversation had moved on to Bessie Smith, Mildred Bailey and Peggy Lee. When some of us left, about 2 a.m., Thomas was at the piano, demonstrating Peggy's phrasing of "Fever."

He was back in town recently for a recording and a concert with the London Philharmonic. And he was talking, this time, about the problems of a young man facing a career as a conductor not as an aspirant, but as one already [illegible]. It is not a question of having a career but of how long there will be a career to be had.

The symphony orchestra, as an institution, is in trouble. There is the crisis of rising costs and static or declining revenue. There is the embarrassment of a stagnant repertoire. And there is the disenchantment of the recording industry, especially in America, with the market for classical records. Thomas sees the repertoire as the most likely point of attack.

"The repertoire has to be broadened," he was saying, "but I don't think it should be done simply by digging up forgotten or neglected works from the classical or romantic eras. I want to widen it in terms of historical perspective, to cover the whole 1,000-year arc of Western music, rather than just the two centuries identified with the symphony orchestra.

"And so in Boston recently, I began a concert with Perotin, followed by Stockhausen and ending, after the intermission, with Schumann's 'Rhenish' Symphony. The results were fantastic. Thus startlingly juxtaposed, and separated from any other music of its own genre, each work emerged with new significance. Each was heard in a new and more enlightening perspective."

No Qualms

Going back 800 years means, of course, getting into music that predates the symphony orchestra, or any other kind of orchestra. But Thomas has no qualms about that. Everyone in a symphony orchestra plays an instrument, and he will use instruments in any number and in any combination. In ancient music he will use ancient instruments if he can get them, modern instruments if he can't.

"What I'm thinking about," he went on, "is not just the orchestra as an institution, but the concert as a stimulating and enjoyable experience. I want to get away from the kind of program that begins with Bach and continues through Beethoven and Brahms to Bartok. It's all too suggestive of an educational trip through a music museum, and not as exciting. Contrast, not chronology, is my objective, and the kind of contrast which sets off each work to the best advantage."

[illegible] has no any inhibitions about applying modern science to ancient music for acoustical effects otherwise unobtainable. Symphony Hall in Boston, for example, cannot produce the reverberations of a 12th-century church. And so, in the Perotin, he had the sound transmitted to a reverberant crypt beneath the hall and rebroadcast from there back into the auditorium.

Whether Buffalo or Boston will be getting any rock mixed with rococo is an open question. But Thomas has no intention of contracting the range of his own enthusiasms. When he told one of his orchestra charges, a few weeks ago, that he had been on the road for four days with James Brown, it was suggested to him that he might have spent the time more profitably studying Toscanini and Furtwängler records.

But Michael Tilson Thomas doesn't see it that way.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE GRAMOPHONE
379, KENTON ROAD,
KENTON,
MIDDLESEX

ISSUE DATED JUN 1971

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

Talks to ALAN BLYTH

TIPPED by Newsweek among others as a possible musical director in the not-too-distant future of the Cleveland, Philadelphia or Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas is obviously a name we are sure to hear great deal of before long. Already he has something of the Golden Boy aura of the young Bernstein—Bernstein himself has encouraged and advised Thomas over the past few years—and he himself has an air of levitation about him, not knowing perhaps quite how quickly news, and consequent engagements, follow these days.

His conversation is refreshingly agnostic about received ideas:

Item: "The generation gap in 'serious' music is only now being felt as it has been already in the pop field. A programme of Cage's prepared piano sonatas I gave on television disturbed people over 50. The younger ones understood the music intuitively. At a youth concert I conducted in Los Angeles including Varèse's Deserts the audience found no difficulty, as their elders would have done, in understanding and sympathising with the music. Orchestras in future will simply have to take more of these works into their regular repertory if the institution is to survive. Indeed during the next 15 years I foresee a reformation of our major musical institutions. After all, they're not artistically or economically very successful at the moment, are they?"

Item: "Young people are not interested in stock performances of the standard repertory. Neither am I. They encourage a proprietary approach to these pieces so that anything out of the ordinary gets that hateful tag 'It wasn't musical'. I hope every performance I hear or conduct will be different from the last, and not stuck in a mould. I like to hear things I have never heard before. My generation are less proprietary; we perform what we like.

Item: "A performance of a work such as Schumann's Third Symphony makes much more of an impression if it's set in a completely alien context. Surrounded by modern works, the Schumann can knock you off base and that makes for excitement. That's the sort of format I have in mind for my series, which starts next year in Boston. It is aimed at the younger audience".

Thomas has recently been promoted from assistant to associate conductor in Boston, the latest advance in what has been a fairly sudden rise to prominence in the musical field of a young man who intended to be a scientist until he was 18, although music was always there in his curriculum. He began playing the piano when he was ten but only by ear. His parents were so worried about this that they decided he must have lessons. His father Ted Thomas, who worked in films in Hollywood, never had lessons but has the gift of coming home from concerts and playing large chunks from the pieces he has just heard. The family is theatrical; Michael's grandfather was a famous theatrical director and Thomas's talk is full of theatrical metaphors—"I recently conducted Beethoven's Seventh for the first time—it was rather like doing Henry IV, part 2".

At the University of Southern California he studied mineralology and chrystalography, later moving to biochemistry. Then, suddenly when he was 18, he decided to change to music. "I knew many people who had been disappointed and disillusioned by the profession and they made me very sad, so I said to myself that if I had not accomplished anything by the time I was 20 I would go back to science. Why did I go over to music? You could say it was because of genetic influences, or that something within me told me that's what I should do.

"At the USC, I studied with Ingolf Dahl, himself a much-under-rated composer and conductor. I've never known anyone with more devotion or less bitterness. With him I studied analysis, theory and conducting, not as dry disciplines but as a vital, living part of my work. Once he took me to a concert. We heard a Pergolesi Trio Sonata and immediately he shot a question at me, 'What form was used there?' I'd never thought of listening like that. In this way he increased my perception. By many other means, he made me develop my own perspectives. I don't conduct or interpret in the least as he did but his influence on me is tremendous. I also learned a great deal from my piano teacher, John Crown, one of Rosenthal's prize pupils and a very warm player. These were my foundations".

During 1965-6, he came under the care of Piatigorsky and Boulez, who is very much admired in Los Angeles. Thomas went to Piatigorsky's master-classes in chamber music and worked with Boulez at the Ojai Festival and at Bayreuth, where he went in 1966 to be in Friedlinde Wagner's master-class, but one of the music staff fell ill and Thomas was chosen to replace him as coach. He also played the glockenspiel in Boulez's Parsifal. His début as a conductor was in Los Angeles with the Young Musicians Foundation. "I had the call from Piatigorsky to take this concert on the day of my twentieth birthday so my time-limit was just reached".

He then graduated to the famous Los Angeles "Evenings on the Roof" where he gave no less than 13 local premières of works by Stravinsky, Nono, Boulez, Pousseur, Webern and Gesualdo among others. Word began to get around that here was a young conductor who could really make sense of contemporary scores. Next came Tanglewood and the first performance of a very complex new opera by Silverman involving tapes and projections. That was in 1968, the year he also won the Koussevitzky prize. A year and a half later came the appointment with the Boston Symphony and the real break-through when he took over from Steinberg in the middle of a concert in New York's Philharmonic Hall. He conducted the rest of that particular tour. Recently he has been appointed musical director of the Buffalo Philharmonic while of course keeping his Boston post. He also conducted the BSO on its recent European tour, though not in London.

He is also busy recording with the orchestra for DGG. "I find record-making perplexing. You get together in a room and play a piece, and that's a disc. It becomes an object independent of you but it's only one performance and it may depend on how you felt that day, or on other circumstantial matters. Since I always do something different next time I play that work it upsets those who've got used to your recorded performance".

Thomas is very interested in the possibilities of television. "I believe there are many new ways of using this medium. I've some ideas up my sleeve but at present I'm not willing to talk about them".

When I met Thomas, he was over here to conduct the New Philharmonia in Mahler's Fifth Symphony, and he was very intrigued by the differences for the conductor in directing American and British orchestras. "In performing this kind of piece with an American orchestra, you need to ask the players to tone things down a bit; they can be too brilliant, even brutal, but they do follow your momentary changes of mood. Here, for my taste, your orchestras must be made more responsive to quick changes, more compulsive. In fact, the approach has to be exactly the reverse".

Thomas is a frequent museum visitor and an omnivorous reader in his spare time. "I read at least five books a week. For instance I've just tackled Tolstoy's My Confession, a collection of science fiction, Ibsen's last five plays and Huey Long's Autobiography. I also keep a group of reference books by my bedside to dip into from time to time".

His friends come from other fields in the arts and sciences rather than from the musical profession. "I enjoy the stimulation of hearing about their work and the way they throw fresh ideas at you. I hate any kind of insularity. That's why I believe in university rather than conservatory education, so that you can study other things besides your own subject. I went in for Asiatic studies, comparative literature, art and architecture, and the original ideas I may have come from other subjects. I also take a great interest in what's happening in other musical fields, I listen to Gagaku music, I like the Stones, James Brown and the Jackson Five".

The conversation turned full circle, round to audiences. "I always find the reaction of people in Boston most encouraging to unusual programmes. After I conducted the Sibelius Fourth I had a letter from an old lady saying that she so much enjoyed the performance; she found the piece so perplexing but I had made it clear to her. However, she had to say that, in all honesty, Karl Muck had conducted the Scherzo better than me. That must have been somewhere around 1913".

LONDON

Problems of a Young Musician at the Top

By Henry Pleasants

LONDON, March 16.—A talk with Michael Tilson Thomas is a conversational roller-coaster trip through the centuries and the many worlds of music.

One moment, at his hotel here, a few days ago, he was going on—or "rapping," as he would put it—about organum and Perotin's "Sederunt Principes," composed for Notre Dame in the 12th century. In the next he was on to Karlheinz Stockhausen's "Punkte" and "Hymnen." And a few minutes later he was extolling the fantastic bass lines laid down by Bootsie Collins, the bass player in James Brown's soul group.

Well, an American musician who, at the age of 26, is already permanent conductor of the Buffalo Symphony Orchestra and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony must be an extraordinary fellow. But even among young musicians as gifted and accomplished as he, one rarely encounters so wide a range of experience and interest, or a curiosity so disdainful of conventional cultural categorization.

AP.

Michael Tilson Thomas

Meeting

I first met him at a party following his London debut last May, when he jumped in for Gennadi Rozhdestvensky as conductor of a concert by the London Symphony Orchestra. This was just a few months after he had made musical history by taking over from William Steinberg at a Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. He is obviously a man who welcomes challenges.

We talked, that evening, about the Beethoven violin concerto and Stravinsky's symphony in three movements, which he had just conducted on precariously short notice. But in a matter of minutes the conversation had moved on to Bessie Smith, Mildred Bailey and Peggy Lee. When some of us left, about 2 a.m., Thomas was at the piano, demonstrating Peggy's phrasing of "Fever."

He was back in town recently for a recording and a concert with the London Philharmonic. And he was talking, this time, about the problems of a young man facing a career as a conductor not as an aspirant, but as one already nearing the top. It is not a question of having a career, but of how long there will be a career to be had.

The symphony orchestra, as an institution, is in trouble. There is the crisis of rising costs and static or declining revenue. There is the embarrassment of a stagnant repertoire. And there is the disenchantment of the recording industry, especially in America, with the market for classical records. Thomas sees the repertoire as the most likely point of attack.

"The repertoire has to be broadened," he was saying, "but I don't think it should be done simply by digging up forgotten or neglected works from the classical or romantic eras. I want to widen it in terms of historical perspective, to cover the whole 1,000-year arc of Western music, rather than just the two centuries identified with the symphony orchestra.

"And so in Boston recently, I began a concert with Perotin, followed by Stockhausen and ending, after the intermission, with Schumann's 'Rhenish' Symphony. The results were fantastic. Thus startlingly juxtaposed, and separated from any other music of its own genre, each work emerged with new significance. Each was heard in a new and more enlightening perspective."

No Qualms

Going back 800 years means, of course, getting into music that predates the symphony orchestra, or any other kind of orchestra. But Thomas has no qualms about that. Everyone in a symphony orchestra plays an instrument, and he will use instruments in any number and in any combination. In ancient music he will use ancient instruments if he can get them, modern instruments if he can't.

"What I'm thinking about," he went on, "is not just the orchestra as an institution, but the concert as a stimulating and enjoyable experience. I want to get away from the kind of program that begins with Bach and continues through Beethoven and Brahms to Bartok. It's all too suggestive of an educational trip through a music museum, and about as exciting. Contrast, not chronology, is my objective, and the kind of contrast which sets off each work to the best advantage."

Nor has he any inhibitions about applying modern science to ancient music for acoustical effects otherwise unobtainable. Symphony Hall in Boston, for example, cannot produce the reverberations of a 12th-century church. And so, in the Perotin, he had the sound transmitted to a reverberant crypt beneath the hall and rebroadcast from there back into the auditorium.

Whether Buffalo or Boston will be getting any rock mixed with rococo is an open question. But Thomas has no intention of contracting the range of his own enthusiasms. When he told one of his orchestra charges, a few weeks ago, that he had been on the road for four days with James Brown, it was suggested to him that he might have spent the time more profitably studying Toscanini and Furtwangler records.

But Michael Tilson Thomas doesn't see it that way.

66 announcements of b.b.c. b.s.o. & pops shows

Boston Pops

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

EVENING STAR
IPSWICH, SUFFOLK
ISSUE DATED 23 APR 1971

STAR VIEWING

BBC-1 Milo O'Shea and Anna Manahan return as Bunjy Kennefick and his domineering mother, in another series of the Irish comedy series "Me Mammy." Also back is Yootha Joyce as the long-suffering Miss Argyll, still trying to snatch a few moments alone with Bunjy without the attentions of the dreaded Mammy.

* * *

A new series from the popular Scottish singer Moira Anderson begins tonight. In seven half-hour shows she will be featuring operatic arias, modern standards, and, of course, songs from Scotland. Her guest is Matt Munro.

* * *

The Boston Promenade Orchestra, best known as the Boston Pops, had never given a concert outside Massachusetts until they played at the Royal Albert Hall earlier this month. Part of this concert will be shown when the orchestra under their conductor Arthur Fielder play Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance No. 1," Offenbach's Gaite Parisienne suite, and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Earl Wild as soloist.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

EVENING POST
BRISTOL
ISSUE DATED 23 APR 1971

The pop prom

TONIGHT is quite an occasion for followers of classical music with B.B.C.-1's recording of the very first "Boston Pops" concert outside America at the Royal Albert Hall earlier this month.

Highlights will show the Boston Promenade Orchestra (to give them their full title) playing Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance No. 1, Offenbach's Gaite Parisienne and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1.

And to make conductor Arthur Fielder and his men feel at home, the arena of the Albert Hall was replaced with tables and chairs complete with drinks and refreshments.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

EVENING ECHO
BOURNEMOUTH, HAMPSHIRE
ISSUE DATED 17 APR 1971

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

CROYDON ADVERTISER
CROYDON, SURREY
ISSUE DATED 23 APR 1971

Friday

ME MAMMY, Moira Anderson and Harold McMillan (in that order) is the mixture on B.B.C.-1.

The appearance of the Boston Pops Orchestra later on the same channel features part of a concert given by the orchestra at the Royal Albert Hall earlier this month — the first time it has played anywhere outside America.

In keeping with the tradition of the Pops back in Massachusetts, the Albert Hall was transformed with tables laid to replace the normal rows of seats so that refreshments could be served during the concert.

Boston Pops

The Boston Promenade Orchestra, best known as the Boston Pops, had never given a concert outside Massachusetts until they played at the Royal Albert Hall earlier this month.

Part of this concert will be shown on BBC-1, when the orchestra under their conductor Arthur Fielder play Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance No. 1, Offenbach's Gaite Parisienne suite, and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Earl Wild as soloist.

Fielder has not only conducted the Boston Pops for 42 years but also played in the orchestra for 15 years before that; and since its foundation 85 years ago, the Boston Pops has always one member or another of the Fielder family connected with it.

In keeping with the tradition of the Pops in their home town, the arena of the Albert Hall has been transformed with tables and chairs replacing the regular rows of seats and drinks and refreshments available during the concert.

Joseph Cooper introduces the concert from one of the arena tables.

Boston Pops

DURRANT'S

THE DAILY MAIL
HULL, YORKSHIRE
ISSUE DATED 23 APR 1971

one point of view

MILO O'SHEA and Anna Manahan return to BBC-1 tonight as Bunjy Kennefick and his domineering mother, in another series of the Irish comedy series "Me Mammy." Also back is Yootha Joyce as the long-suffering Miss Argyll, still trying to snatch a few moments alone with Bunjy without the attentions of the dreaded Mammy.

THEY HAD never given a concert outside Massachusetts—the Boston Pops, that is—until they played at the Royal Albert Hall earlier this month. Part of this concert will be screened at 10.50 tonight on BBC-1.

THERE WILL be a new fea

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

SOUTH WALES ARGUS
NEWPORT, MONMOUTHSHIRE
ISSUE DATED 23 APR 1971

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

NORTH-WESTERN EVENING MAIL
BARROW-IN-FURNESS, LANCASHIRE
ISSUE DATED 5 APR 1971

Tonight's orchestral concert on Radio 3 is from the Royal Festival Hall and features distinguished visitors in the Bonston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by William Steinberg

The programme consists of Mozart's Symphony No. 36—and in the second half at 8.50 Mahler's Seventh.

• • •

The Boston Promenade Orchestra, best known as the Boston Pops, had never given a concert outside Massachusetts until they played at the Royal Albert Hall earlier this month.

Part of this concert will be shown on BBC-1 tonight, when the orchestra under their conductor Arthur Fiedler play Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance No. 1, Offenbach's Gaite Parisienne suite, and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Earl Wild as soloist.

Fiedler has not only conducted the Boston Pops for 42 years but also played in the orchestra for 15 years before that; and since its foundation 85 years ago, the Boston Pops has always had one member or another of the Fiedler family connected with it.

• • •

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE SUN
30, Bouverie Street, London, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 17 APR 1971

FRIDAY ★ ★

WHAT a week for comebacks! Now it's ME MAMMY (BBC 1, 8.00), taking its would-be lovers, Milo O'Shea and Yootha Joyce, on a naughty weekend in Amsterdam. They are foiled, as usual, by the arrival of Mammy, Anna Manahan.

SHAKESPEARE'S ISLAND (BBC 2, 8.00) celebrates the Bard's birthday with a look at The Tempest, in production at Stratford.

THE SKY'S THE LIMIT (ITV, 7.00) and ON THE BUSES (ITV, 7.30) bring a more networked look into commercial Friday these days, but the real show-stopper is, of course, BUDGIE (ITV, 9.00), which brings Adam Faith back into the arms of his wife (Georgina Hale).

MOIRA ANDERSON SINGS (BBC 1, 9.20) with guest star Matt Monro in a new series. And, for their first appearance outside the U.S., there's the fabulous BOSTON POPS ORCHESTRA (BBC 1, 10.50) with Arthur Fiedler conducting Elgar and Tchaikovsky.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

PETERBOROUGH EVENING TELEGRAPH
PETERBOROUGH NORTHAMPTONSHIRE
ISSUE DATED 23 APR 1971

STAR CHOICE

The Boston Promenade Orchestra, best known as The Boston Pops, had never given a concert outside Massachusetts until they played at the Royal Albert Hall earlier this month.

Part of this concert will be shown on BBC-1 at 10.50 when the orchestra under their conductor Arthur Fiedler play Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance No 1', Offenbach's Gaite Parisienne suite, and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No 1 with Earl Wild as soloist.

Fiedler has not only conducted the Boston Pops for 42 years but also played in the orchestra for 15 years before that; and since its foundation 85 years ago, the Boston Pops has always had one member or another of the Fiedler family connected with it.

In keeping with the tradition of the Pops in their home town, the arena of the Albert Hall has been transformed with tables and chairs replacing the regular rows of seats and drinks and refreshments available during the concert.

Joseph Cooper introduces the concert from one of the arena tables.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RADIO TIMES
35, MARYLEBONE HIGH STREET, LONDON, W.1
ISSUE DATED 15 APR 1971

10.50 Colour TV Ap. 23
The Boston Pops
This is their first appearance outside the USA
Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops for 42 years, presents his Boston Promenade Orchestra
Elgar Pomp and Circumstance No 1
Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No 1
Soloist Malcolm Frager
Offenbach Suite, Gaîté Parisienne
Introduced by JOSEPH COOPER

Directed by ANTONY CRAXTON †
A recording of part of the concert given in the Royal Albert Hall earlier this month by arrangement with Harold Holt Ltd

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

EVENING CITIZEN
GLASGOW
ISSUE DATED 23 APR 1971

FIEDLER BRINGS HIS BOSTON POPS TO BRITAIN—AT LAST!

☐ The Boston Promenade Orchestra, best known as the Boston Pops, had never given a concert outside Massachusetts until they played at the Royal Albert Hall earlier this month.

You can hear two major pieces from the concert—"pop" classics, "Pomp and Circumstance No. 1" and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1—on BBC-1 at 10.50, conducted by that tremendous character Arthur Fiedler.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

BASINGSTOKE GAZETTE
Basingstoke, Hampshire.
ISSUE DATED 23 APR 1971

Fiedler brings the Boston Pops to London

THE Boston Promenade Orchestra — best known as the Boston Pops — had never given a concert outside Massachusetts until they played at the Royal Albert Hall earlier this month. Part of this concert will be shown on BBC-1 tonight.

The orchestra, under their condoctor Arthur Fiadler, play Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance No. 1', Offenbach's Gaite Parisienne suite and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Earl Wild as soloist.

Fiedler has not only conducted the Boston Pops for 42 years but also played in the orchestra for 15 years before that: and since its foundation 85 years ago, the Boston Pops has always had one member or another of the Fiedler family connected with it.

In keeping with the tradition of the Pops in their home town, the arena of the Albert Hall has been transformed with tables and chairs replacing the regular rows of seats and drinks and refreshments available during the concert.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE NEWS
PORTSMOUTH, HAMPSHIRE
ISSUE DATED 23 APR 1971

BOSTON 'POPS,' FROM AWAY HOME

For the first time, the Boston "Pops" Orchestra has given a concert outside Massachusetts — in the Royal Albert Hall, earlier this month.

Tonight, on B.B.C. 1, viewers can see the orchestra, under its conductor, Arthur Fiedler, playing Elgar, Offenbach, and Tchaikovsky, in London.

Fiedler has not only conducted the Boston Promenade Orchestra for 42 years — before that he also played in it for 15 years. In fact since its foundation, 85 years ago, the Boston Pops has always had one of the Fiedler family connected with it.

In keeping with the tradition of the orchestra in its home town, the Albert Hall arena has been transformed, with tables and chairs replacing the rows of seats, and refreshments available during the concert.

Boston Orch.
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
DAILY MAIL
CARMELITE HOUSE,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 15 APR 1971

Why Mrs K does not want to be First Lady

MRS JOAN KENNEDY, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, flew to London from Washington yesterday and said that she did not want to be a U.S. President's wife.

'As sister-in-law of a President I've been close at hand and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job,' she said.

She wasn't sure whether her husband would stand. 'He is leaving it open. You can't blame him, can you?'

And then she added: 'But I would rather he didn't. We have three young children.'

Fun

Was she worried about the safety of her family? 'I would rather not talk about that.'

Mrs Kennedy, 34, blonde and willowy, is on her way to Bonn, where she will narrate Peter and the Wolf at a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

She said: 'My husband is coming to see me. I was going to play the piano in Bonn, but it was decided that I should do Peter and the Wolf instead.'

Her last 'fun thing' was playing the piano on an American television programme.

She and Senator Kennedy are expected to fly back to London at the weekend.

MRS JOAN KENNEDY: I know what it is really like

Boston Orchestra
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
EVENING STANDARD
47, SHOE LANE,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 14 APR 1971

LONDONER'S DIARY

It's too tough at the top, says Mrs Kennedy

WHATEVER Senator Edward Kennedy's political ambitions may be, his wife Joan does not want him to stand for the United States Presidency.

Mrs. Kennedy made this clear today when she arrived in London by air from Washington. At London Airport she was asked whether the Senator would stand for President. "He is leaving it open," she said. "You can't blame him."

And she went on: "I have been very close to it. Being the sister-in-law of a President I've seen close at hand what it is really like. I do not want the job. Maybe it's too tough at the top.

"If my husband decides to stand, then I will be with him all the way, but I would rather he did not stand. We have three young children."

Pianist

Mrs. Kennedy, now 34, is a skilled pianist and was on her way to Bonn to take part in a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—not as a pianist but as narrator in Prokofiev's Peter and the Wolf. Her husband will join her in Bonn and they expect to fly back to London at the weekend.

She said the last "fun thing" she did was to play the piano in an American television programme.

Boston Orch.
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
SUNDERLAND ECHO
SUNDERLAND,
CO. DURHAM
ISSUE DATED 14 APR 1971

GOING TO BONN

Mrs Joan Kennedy, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, pictured on arrival at Heathrow Airport, London, today en route to Germany from America. Answering questions at the airport, she said she would rather her husband did not stand for President and that she would be a reluctant First Lady. In Bonn, Mrs Kennedy is to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" at a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
THE GUARDIAN
192, GRAY'S INN ROAD,
LONDON, W.C.1
ISSUE DATED 15 APR 1971

Mrs Joan Kennedy, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, arriving at Heathrow Airport-London yesterday on her way to Bonn to narrate Peter and the Wolf with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston S. Orch.
DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
HUDDERSFIELD DAILY EXAMINER
HUDDERSFIELD,
YORKSHIRE
ISSUE DATED 14 APR 1971

'Life is tough at the top'—Joan Kennedy

MRS. JOAN KENNEDY, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, flew into London today and said that she would be a reluctant First Lady.

"I would rather he did not stand," she said.

"Being sister-in-law of a President, I've been close at hand and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job."

As she flew into Heathrow her husband was flying to Germany, where they were to meet later today.

She was asked if she thought her husband would stand for President, and replied, "He is leaving it open. You can't blame him."

Asked if it might be too tough at the top, she said, "Yes, I guess that's about it."

Mrs. Kennedy is to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a concert in Bonn.

london views the Kennedys

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

DAILY MAIL
CARMELITE HOUSE, LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 15 APR 1971

Why Mrs K does not want to be First Lady

MRS JOAN KENNEDY, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, flew to London from Washington yesterday and said that she did not want to be a U.S. President's wife.

'As sister-in-law of a President I've been close at hand and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job,' she said.

She wasn't sure whether her husband would stand. 'He is leaving it open. You can't blame him, can you ?'

And then she added: 'But I would rather he didn't. We have three young children.'

Fun

Was she worried about the safety of her family ? 'I would rather not talk about that.'

Mrs Kennedy, 34, blonde and willowy, is on her way to Bonn, where she will narrate Peter and the Wolf at a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

She said: 'My husband is coming to see me. I was going to play the piano in Bonn, but it was decided that I should do Peter and the Wolf instead.'

Her last 'fun thing' was playing the piano on an American television programme.

She and Senator Kennedy are expected to fly back to London at the weekend.

MRS JOAN KENNEDY: I know what it is really like

Boston Orchestra

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

EVENING STANDARD
47, SHOE LANE, LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 14 APR 1971

LONDONER'S DIARY

It's too tough at the top, says Mrs Kennedy

WHATEVER Senator Edward Kennedy's political ambitions may be, his wife Joan does not want him to stand for the United States Presidency.

Mrs. Kennedy made this clear today when she arrived in London by air from Washington. At London Airport she was asked whether the Senator would stand for President. "He is leaving it open," she said. "You can't blame him."

And she went on: "I have been very close to it. Being the sister-in-law of a President I've seen close at hand what it is really like. I do not want the job. Maybe it's too tough at the top.

"If my husband decides to stand, then I will be with him all the way, but I would rather he did not stand. We have three young children."

Pianist

Mrs. Kennedy, now 34, is a skilled pianist and was on her way to Bonn to take part in a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—not as a pianist but as narrator in Prokofiev's Peter and the Wolf. Her husband will join her in Bonn and they expect to fly back to London at the weekend.

She said the last "fun thing" she did was to play the piano in an American television programme.

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

SUNDERLAND ECHO
SUNDERLAND, CO. DURHAM
ISSUE DATED 14 APR 1971

GOING TO BONN

Mrs Joan Kennedy, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, pictured on arrival at Heathrow Airport, London, today en route to Germany from America. Answering questions at the airport, she said she would rather her husband did not stand for President and that she would be a reluctant First Lady. In Bonn, Mrs Kennedy is to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" at a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE GUARDIAN
192, GRAY'S INN ROAD, LONDON, W.C.1
ISSUE DATED 15 APR 1971

Mrs Joan Kennedy, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, arriving at Heathrow Airport-London yesterday on her way to Bonn to narrate Peter and the Wolf with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston S Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOU
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

HUDDERSFIELD DAILY EXAMINER
HUDDERSFIELD, YORKSHIRE
ISSUE DATED 14 APR 1971

'Life is tough at the top'—Joan Kennedy

MRS. JOAN KENNEDY, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, flew into London today and said that she would be a reluctant First Lady.

"I would rather he did not stand," she said.

"Being sister-in-law of a President, I've been close at hand and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job."

As she flew into Heathrow her husband was flying to Germany, where they were to meet later today.

She was asked if she thought her husband would stand for President, and replied, "He is leaving it open. You can't blame him."

Asked if it might be too tough at the top, she said, "Yes, I guess that's about it."

Mrs. Kennedy is to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a concert in Bonn.

london views the Kennedys

68

Boston Orchestra

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH
135, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 19 APR 1971

KENNEDYS FLY BACK TO U.S.

Senator Edward Kennedy flew out from London yesterday to Washington after a one-day visit. His wife Joan saw him off at Heathrow Airport.

The couple arrived in London on Saturday from Bonn where Mrs Kennedy narrated "Peter and the Wolf" at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. She is due to join her husband in Washington later this week.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

GUARDIAN JOURNAL
NOTTINGHAM, NOTTINGHAMSHIRE
ISSUE DATED 15 APR 1971

KENNEDY'S WIFE FLIES IN

MRS. Joan Kennedy, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, arriving at London's Heathrow Airport, yesterday, en route to Germany from America. She said she would rather her husband did not stand for President and that she would be a reluctant First Lady. In Bonn, Mrs. Kennedy is to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" at a concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH
135, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 15 APR 1971

Mrs Kennedy shuns White House

MRS Joan Kennedy, 34, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, passing through Heathrow Airport yesterday on her way to Bonn to narrate Prokofiev's symphonic fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

She said she did not want her husband to stand for the Presidency next year although she would be with him "all the way" if he did. He was leaving the question "open," and she added: "You can't blame him, can you?"

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

SUNDAY TELEGRAPH
135, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 18 APR 1971

Kennedys visiting friends

Picture: Augustus Rhodes

SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY arriving at Heathrow Airport yesterday with his wife, Joan, whom he had joined in Bonn where she narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are visiting friends in Britain.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

SOUTH WALES ECHO
CARDIFF, GLAMORGANSHIRE
ISSUE DATED 14 APR 1971

It's no life at the top, says Joan Kennedy

MRS. JOAN KENNEDY, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, flew into London today and said she would be a reluctant First Lady. "I would rather he did not stand for President," she said.

"Being sister-in-law of a President, I've been close at hand and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job," she added.

As she flew to London, her husband was flyinfi to Germany, where they are to meet later today. At Heathrow, Mrs. Kennedy, aged 34, asked if she thought her husband would stand for President, replied: "He is leaving it open. You can't blame him."

Mrs. Kennedy is to narrate Peter and the Wolf with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a concert in Bonn.

Boston Orchestra

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

LIVERPOOL DAILY POST
LIVERPOOL, LANCASHIRE
ISSUE DATED 15 APR 1971

JOAN KENNEDY
"I would rather he did not stand."

'I'd be a reluctant First Lady,' says Joan Kennedy

MRS JOAN KENNEDY, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, flew into London yesterday and said she would be a reluctant First Lady.

"I would rather he did not stand," she said.

"Being sister-in-law of a President, I've been close at hand and I know what it is really like. I do not want the job."

At Heathrow Mrs Kennedy, aged 34, asked if she thought her husband would stand for President, replied: "He is leaving it open. You can't blame him."

Would she like to be America's First Lady? "No. If my husband decides to stand then I would be with him all the way, but I would rather he did not stand."

Mrs Kennedy, asked if it might be too tough at the top, said: "Yes, I guess that's about it."

Mrs Kennedy was on her way to Germany, where she is to narrate Peter and the Wolf with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a concert in Bonn. She and her husband are expected to fly to London at the weekend.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE SUN
30, Bouverie Street, London, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED 15 APR 1971

I don't want to be the First Lady, says Joan Kennedy

JOAN KENNEDY, Senator Edward Kennedy's wife, said yesterday she would be a reluctant First Lady.

"Being sister-in-law of a President, I've been close at hand and I know what it is really like.

"I do not want the job," she added as she arrived at London's Heathrow Airport en route to Bonn to meet her husband.

Asked if she thought the Senator would stand for President, 34-year-old Mrs Kennedy replied: "He is leaving it open."

Would she like to be America's First Lady?—"No. If my husband decides to stand then I would be with him all the way, but I would rather he did not stand."

Tough

Mrs Kennedy, asked if it might be too tough at the top, said: "Yes, I guess that's about it."

Mrs Kennedy is to narrate Peter and the Wolf with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a concert in Bonn.

She and her husband are expected to fly to London at the weekend.

Mrs Kennedy arriving yesterday

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 85,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Stuttgarter Nachrichten, Stuttgart
vom - 1. April 1971

3

Die Kennedys werden nach Bonn eingeflogen

Boston ruft Stuttgart

Amerikas Weltklasse-Orchester hat in Deutschland viel vor

Stuttgart wird die erste von neun Stationen sein, an denen das Boston Symphony Orchestra in Deutschland gastiert. Der weltberühmte amerikanische Klangkörper, der häufig als virtuosestes Orchester der Welt bezeichnet wird, tritt am kommenden Mittwoch (7. April) unter Leitung seines 71jährigen Chefdirigenten William Steinberg, einem gebürtigen Kölner, auf. Seine Deutschland-Runde soll am 16. April in Bonn mit einem Gag besonderer Art beendet werden: Mit einem der berühmten „Boston Pops" unter A. Fiedler.

Zu diesem Bonner Konzert erwartet Johannes Wasmuth, sogenannter „Zeremonienmeister" im Künstlerbahnhof Rolandseck, zur Erweckung des nicht sonderlich lustigen Bonner Kulturlebens nicht nur alle Botschafter, Minister und sonstigen Honoratioren der Bundesmetropole, sondern auch eine Flugzeugladung voller Bostoner Prominenz und darunter als besonders exklusiven Star Joan Kennedy, die Frau des Senators Edward, diesen selbst, ferner Bankpräsident David Rockefeller und weitere Bostoner Gesellschaftsspitzen. Joan wird im Programm selbst mitwirken: als Legendenerzählerin in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf". Derweil wird sich das Publikum in 30jähriger Boston-Pop-Art an kaltem Büfett ergötzen und dazu außer Prokofieffs Musik unter anderem auch unterhaltsame „Hair"-Klänge vom selben Elite-Orchester hören, das uns in Stuttgart mit Bruckners 7. und Hindemiths Bostoner Sinfonie begrüßt.

Geschichte und Tätigkeit der 90 Jahre alten und 130köpfigen Bostoner Sinfoniker sind typisch für amerikanische Musikkultur: 1881 verwirklichte der Bostoner Bürgermeister Henry Lee Higginson seinen Traum, der Stadt ein großes Sinfonieorchester zu gründen. 300 Mäzene fanden sich. Bis heute erhalten die Bostoner Sinfoniker keine staatlichen Subventionen. Arthur Nikisch und Karl Muck waren die Dirigenten der ersten Jahre. 1917 entstand die erste Schallplattenaufnahme. 1924 übernahm Serge Koussewitzky den Klangkörper, behielt ihn bis 1949 und machte das bis dahin virtuoseste Orchester daraus. Ihm folgten Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf und seit 1969 William Steinberg, der gleichzeitig das Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra leitet.

Um die existentielle Grundlage des Orchesters zu verbreitern, gründete Koussewitzky 1930 die sogenannten Esplanade Concerts als Gratiskonzerte am Ufer des Charles River, und Arthur Fiedler begann, die „Boston Pops" zu dirigieren. Diese volkstümlichen Konzerte, die in der Zwischenzeit 47 Millionen Schallplatten erbrachten und in den USA ein fester Begriff sind, beginnen alljährlich in der ersten Maiwoche in der Bostoner Symphony Hall. Statt in starren Stuhlreihen sitzt das Publikum nun an Tischen und läßt sich zur Musik Erfrischungen servieren. Dieser neunwöchigen Pop-Saison Fiedlers schließen sich dann im Sommer die abendlichen, unentgeltlichen Esplanade Concerts an, die oft ein Publikum von 20 000 Menschen haben.

Bedenkt man, daß das Boston Symphony Orchestra 1970 nicht weniger als 289 Konzerte gab, um seinen rund 3,5 Millionen-Dollar-Haushalt mit 2,2 Millionen Dollar Eigeneinnahmen einigermaßen in Ordnung halten zu können, so zeigt sich der enorme Anspruch, der an Amerikas arrivierteste Musiker gestellt wird, die nebenher noch Unterricht erteilen müssen und lediglich Saison-Verträge erhalten. Es sollte hierzulande nicht vergessen werden, daß der Staat in Nordamerika für seine Orchesterkultur so gut wie nichts ausgibt, sondern daß das gesamte Kultur- und Universitätsleben auf privaten Stiftungen beruht.

Dieter Schorr

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 56
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Fellbacher Zeitung, Fellbach
vom 1. April 1971

stuttgart

pre-concert publicity

THE KENNEDYS WILL BE FLOWN TO BONN

B O S T O N I S C A L L I N G S T U T T G A R T

Americas World Renowned Orchestra Plans a Lot For Germany

Stuttgart will be the first stop of nine other places in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be guests. The world renowned American Symphonic is quite often called the greatest virtuoso orchestra of the world and will appear coming Wednesday (April 7) under the direction of its 71 year old conductor, William Steinberg, who was born in Cologne. Its German tour will be completed in Bonn on April 16 with an unusual gag: With the famous "Boston Pops" under Arthur Fiedler.

At this concert in Bonn the so called "master of ceremonies" Johannes Wasmuth is expecting not only all ambassadors, ministers and other dignitaries of the Bundes Metropole, but a plane full of Boston's prominents. Among them as a special exclusive star Joan Kennedy, the wife of the Senator Edward who will be present. Also further, bank president David Rockefeller and more of Boston's High Society. Joan will contribute to the program herself: as the narrator in Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf". In the meantime the audience will enjoy a cold buffet in the 30 year Boston Pops tradition and will hear, besides Prokofieff's music, entertaining selections from "Hair" played by the elite orchestra which greeted us in Stuttgart with Bruckner's Seventh and Hindemith's Boston Symphony.

History and activity of the ninety year old symphonic which consists of 130 members is typical for American music culture: In 1881 Henry Lee Higginson, the Mayor of Boston, put his dream into reality; to found a large symphonic orchestra. They found 300 patrons. Until this day the Boston Symphonic does not receive any federal aid. Arhtur Nikisch and Karl Muck were the conductors of the early years. In 1917 the first record was made. In 1924 Serge Koussevitzky took over the orchestra, kept it until 1949, and developed it to the most virtuoso orchestra at that time. Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf, and in 1969, William Steinberg succeeded him. He (Steinberg) also directs the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra at the same time.

In order to spread the essential foundation of the orchestra, Koussovitzky founded the so called "Esplanade Concerts" in 1930 on the shores of the Charles River free of charge and Arthur Fiedler began to conduct the Boston Pops. Since then they have produced 47 million records and they are well established in the United States. Their popular concerts start in the beginning of May in Boston's Symphony Hall. Instead of sitting in formal rows the audience sits at tables and gets refreshments served while listening to the music. After the nine weeks Pops season under Fiedler, the evening Esplanade concerts follow, free of charge, visited quite often by 20,000 people.

Considering that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave 289 concerts in 1970 to take in 2,2 million dollars, in order to keep the 3,5 million dollar budget balanced, one can see the enormous demand made on America's most versatile musicians who have to give lessons as well and receive only single season contracts. One should not forget in this country that the Government of North America doesn't contribute anything to the orchestra, and that the entire cultural existence and university funding consist of private contributions.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 85,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Stuttgarter Nachrichten, Stuttgart
vom - 1. April 1971

Die Kennedys werden nach Bonn eingeflogen

Boston ruft Stuttgart

Amerikas Weltklasse-Orchester hat in Deutschland viel vor

Stuttgart wird die erste von neun Stationen sein, an denen das Boston Symphony Orchestra in Deutschland gastiert. Der weltberühmte amerikanische Klangkörper, der häufig als virtuosestes Orchester der Welt bezeichnet wird, tritt am kommenden Mittwoch (7. April) unter Leitung seines 71jährigen Chefdirigenten William Steinberg, einem gebürtigen Kölner, auf. Seine Deutschland-Runde soll am 16. April in Bonn mit einem Gag besonderer Art beendet werden: Mit einem der berühmten „Boston Pops" unter A. Fiedler.

Zu diesem Bonner Konzert erwartet Johannes Wasmuth, sogenannter „Zeremonienmeister" im Künstlerbahnhof Rolandseck, zur Erweckung des nicht sonderlich lustigen Bonner Kulturlebens nicht nur alle Botschafter, Minister und sonstigen Honoratioren der Bundesmetropole, sondern auch eine Flugzeugladung voller Bostoner Prominenz und darunter als besonders exklusiven Star Joan Kennedy, die Frau des Senators Edward, diesen selbst, ferner Bankpräsident David Rockefeller und weitere Bostoner Gesellschaftsspitzen. Joan wird im Programm selbst mitwirken: als Legendenerzählerin in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf". Derweil wird sich das Publikum in 30jähriger Boston-Pop-Art an kaltem Büfett ergötzen und dazu außer Prokofieffs Musik unter anderem auch unterhaltsame „Hair"-Klänge vom selben Elite-Orchester hören, das uns in Stuttgart mit Bruckners 7. und Hindemiths Bostoner Sinfonie begrüßt.

Geschichte und Tätigkeit der 90 Jahre alten und 130köpfigen Bostoner Sinfoniker sind typisch für amerikanische Musikkultur: 1881 verwirklichte der Bostoner Bürgermeister Henry Lee Higginson seinen Traum, der Stadt ein großes Sinfonieorchester zu gründen. 300 Mäzene fanden sich. Bis heute erhalten die Bostoner Sinfoniker keine staatlichen Subventionen. Arthur Nikisch und Karl Muck waren die Dirigenten der ersten Jahre. 1917 entstand die erste Schallplattenaufnahme. 1924 übernahm Serge Koussewitzky den Klangkörper, behielt ihn bis 1949 und machte das bis dahin virtuoseste Orchester daraus. Ihm folgten Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf und seit 1969 William Steinberg, der gleichzeitig das Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra leitet.

Um die existentielle Grundlage des Orchesters zu verbreitern, gründete Koussewitzky 1930 die sogenannten Esplanade Concerts als Gratiskonzerte am Ufer des Charles River, und Arthur Fiedler begann, die „Boston Pops" zu dirigieren. Diese volkstümlichen Konzerte, die in der Zwischenzeit 47 Millionen Schallplatten erbrachten und in den USA ein fester Begriff sind, beginnen alljährlich in der ersten Maiwoche in der Bostoner Symphony Hall. Statt in starren Stuhlreihen sitzt das Publikum nun an Tischen und läßt sich zur Musik Erfrischungen servieren. Dieser neunwöchigen Pop-Saison Fiedlers schließen sich dann im Sommer die abendlichen, unentgeltlichen Esplanade Concerts an, die oft ein Publikum von 20 000 Menschen haben.

Bedenkt man, daß das Boston Symphony Orchestra 1970 nicht weniger als 289 Konzerte gab, um seinen rund 3,5 Millionen-Dollar-Haushalt mit 2,2 Millionen Dollar Eigeneinnahmen einigermaßen in Ordnung halten zu können, so zeigt sich der enorme Anspruch, der an Amerikas arrivierteste Musiker gestellt wird, die nebenher noch Unterricht erteilen müssen und lediglich Saison-Verträge erhalten. Es sollte hierzulande nicht vergessen werden, daß der Staat in Nordamerika für seine Orchesterkultur so gut wie nichts ausgibt, sondern daß das gesamte Kultur- und Universitätsleben auf privaten Stiftungen beruht.

Dieter Schorr

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 56
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Fellbacher Zeitung, Fellbach
vom 1. April 1971

stuttgart pre-concert publicity

THE KENNEDYS WILL BE FLOWN TO BONN

BOSTON IS CALLING STUTTGART

Americas World Renowned Orchestra Plans a Lot For Germany

Stuttgart will be the first stop of five other places in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be guests. The world renowned American Symphonic is quite often called the greatest virtuoso orchestra of the world and will appear coming Wednesday (April 7) under the direction of its 71 year old conductor, William Steinberg, who was born in Cologne. Its German tour will be completed in Bonn on April 16 with an unusual gag: With the famous "Boston Pops" under Arthur Fiedler.

At this concert in Bonn the so called "master of ceremonies" Johannes Wasmuth is expecting not only all ambassadors, ministers and other dignitaries of the Bundes Metropole, but a plane full of Boston's prominents. Among them as a special exclusive star Joan Kennedy, the wife of the Senator Edward who will be present. Also further, bank president David Rockefeller and more of Boston's High Society. Joan will contribute to the program herself: as the narrator in Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf". In the meantime the audience will enjoy a cold buffet in the 30 year Boston Pops tradition and will hear, besides Prokofieff's music, entertaining selections from "Hair" played by the elite orchestra which greeted us in Stuttgart with Bruckner's Seventh and Hindemith's Boston Symphony.

History and activity of the ninety year old symphonic which consists of 130 members is typical for American music culture: In 1881 Henry Lee Higginson, the Mayor of Boston, put his dream into reality; to found a large symphonic orchestra. They found 300 patrons. Until this day the Boston Symphonic does not receive any federal aid. Arhtur Nikisch and Karl Muck were the conductors of the early years. In 1917 the first record was made. In 1924 Serge Koussevitzky took over the orchestra, kept it until 1949, and developed it to the most virtuoso orchestra at that time. Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf, and in 1969, William Steinberg succeeded him. He (Steinberg) also directs the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra at the same time.

In order to spread the essential foundation of the orchestra, Koussovitzky founded the so called "Esplanade Concerts" in 1930 on the shores of the Charles River free of charge and Arthur Fiedler began to conduct the Boston Pops. Since then they have produced 47 million records and they are well established in the United States. Their popular concerts start in the beginning of May in Boston's Symphony Hall. Instead of sitting in formal rows the audience sits at tables and gets refreshments served while listening to the music. After the nine weeks Pops season under Fiedler, the evening Esplanade concerts follow, free of charge, visited quite often by 20,000 people.

Considering that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave 289 concerts in 1970 to take in 2,2 million dollars, in order to keep the 3,5 million dollar budget balanced, one can see the enormous demand made on America's most versatile musicians who have to give lessons as well and receive only single season contracts. One should not forget in this country that the Government of North America doesn't contribute anything to the orchestra, and that the entire cultural existence and university funding consist of private contributions.

argus
Seit 1857

Auflage (l. Ts.): 35,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
NWZ Göppinger Kreisnachrichten, Göppingen
vom 31. März 1971

Das 1881 gegründete Boston Symphonie Orchestra unternimmt im April seine dritte Europa- und Deutschland-Tournee. Unter seinen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler, William Steinberg und Michael Tilson Thomas wird das Orchester auch in Stuttgart (7. April) gastieren.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

William Steinberg's remarks at Stuttgart concert, Wednesday, April 7, 1971
Translated from German for radio tape

Ladies and Gentlemen:

Today's concert must of necessity open with a memorial. Two days ago, at the age of 88, Igor Stravinsky died. He was the greatest figure in music which the twentieth century has produced , and as music history will undoubtedly show, one of the greatest figures in music ever. It is of course understandable that we musicians memorialize this sad event, particularly the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been linked to him in a variety of ways: not only was his finest and most famous work, the "Symphony of Psalms" commissioned and first performed by the Orchestra, but his entire canon has been performed through the years by my predessors and myself. Maestro Stravinsky himself stood before this Orchestra many times and conducted. In order to solemnize this occasion and honor this great Maestro, I beg your permission to change the start of this program and to allow the substitution of Beethoven's Eroica in place of the Third Leonore Overture. May I also ask that you not applaud at the termination of the performance.

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 35,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
NWZ Göppinger Kreisnachrichten, Göppingen
vom 31. März 1971

Das 1881 gegründete Boston Symphonie Orchestra unternimmt im April seine dritte Europa- und Deutschland-Tournee. Unter seinen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler, William Steinberg und Michael Tilson Thomas wird das Orchester auch in Stuttgart (7. April) gastieren.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

William Steinberg's remarks at Stuttgart concert, Wednesday, April 7, 1971
Translated from German for radio tape

Ladies and Gentlemen:

Today's concert must of necessity open with a memorial. Two days ago, at the age of 88, Igor Stravinsky died. He was the greatest figure in music which the twentieth century has produced , and as music history will undoubtedly show, one of the greatest figures in music ever. It is of course understandable that we musicians memorialize this sad event, particularly the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been linked to him in a variety of ways: not only was his finest and most famous work, the "Symphony of Psalms" commissioned and first performed by the Orchestra, but his entire canon has been performed through the years by my predessors and myself. Maestro Stravinsky himself stood before this Orchestra many times and conducted. In order to solemnize this occasion and honor this great Maestro, I beg your permission to change the start of this program and to allow the substitution of Beethoven's Eroica in place of the Third Leonore Overture. May I also ask that you not applaud at the termination of the performance.

Beethoven's Funeral March for Stravinsky

BOSTON JET WITH CAPTAIN STEINBERG

The Symphony Orchestra opened its German tour in the "Liederhalle"

Traffic presses around the concert hall "Stuttgarter Liederhalle". The audience is already taking their seats after the first bell in the Beethoven Hall. The legions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fill the stage: America's oldest representative orchestra begins the guest performances of its third European tour in Stuttgart. Mastro William Steinberg enters the stage with strong applause. He speaks to the audience from the red velvet of the podium: Igor Stravinsky is dead. He was the greatest one.

America's most aristocratic orchestra, tonal representative of Boston art, felt especially close to the great composer. Mastro Steinberg lifts the long baton slowly. In memory of Stravinsky, the Funeral March from Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica" resounds. The Bostonians are a magnificant orchstra, and they know it. They also are the most ambitious orchestr of the New World. Everybody knows that. And once - under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky for 25 years they were the greatest virtuoso orchestra of the world. For thirteen years after that the Alsatian Charles Munch trained it further to French elegance.

Remaining of this former splendor is the ambition, a powerful sound, virtuoso woodwinds and heavily resounding brass ensembles. Precision and elegance have fallen off decidely. (Inaccurate entry of the brass for Bruckner and first violin dribble in the first Hindemith movement were disturbing). Self-confidence and routine keep it still above the average. And the Boston-sound is still unmistakeable now and then in its compactness, and more beautiful than the New Yorkers. But when I compare it with the Berlin Philharmonic or Celibidache's Stockholm or the London Orchestra is it impossible for me to pass the gold medal anymore.

William Steinberg, the 71 year old mogul of the podium, spreads the aura of a potentate who rules legions with superiority. He is small, stout, an athletic great of American Art-High-Society, very spare, ponderous in his signaling, but very determined. In every move he showed maneuverability, calculation, experience and knowledge of all wordly splendor, but I missed his approach to the heavenly:

This was especially noticeable in Bruckner's Seventh, although the rendering took everything into consideration that has been written into the score, even adding a bit. The woodwinds were radiant, the strings rich; a golden steam-roller on St.Florian's spring meadow; heavenly flights in a jumbo-jet, delicately manouvered, also very precise and powerful, but just no cheerfulness, not a bit of naivete, absolutely nothing ingenious. If I think of Jochum, Leitner or even Hans Roshaud...It is not accidental that Bruckner hasn't become very popular in the USA. The Bostonians offered nothing but a sound garment, no (pious) heart beating in its glittering weave, but only the process executed.

FLAT AND STRONG

First we heard Hindemith's Konzertmusik for strings and brass, with mechanical virtuosity, musical compactness, once composed upon the character of the Bostonians. What used to sound thin and meager and pedantic with European orchestras was presented here with a flat trajectory and power which swept along: a polyphonic wrestling match between strings and brasses, with only winners at the end.

Beethoven;s Funeral March impressed me; very slow, expressive, imensely momentous and so formulated that it almost resulted in a loss of suspense. But even here the giant orchestral machine was most impressive and moved phenomenal sound substances, balancing and catching it, led by a conductor whose highest ability consists of controlling this machine and keeping it in gear. There was no inspiration, there wasn't too much music in this concert, but more sound. I am sure that the audience will applaud much more enthusiasticly after the concert of the Berlin Philharmonic next time.

Dieter Schorr

argus Seit 1667 — Auflage (l. Ts.): 85,0 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971" —
Ausschnitt aus: Stuttgarter Nachrichten, Stuttgart
vom 10. April 1971

argus Seit 1667 — Auflage (l. Ts.): 5,6 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971" —
Ausschnitt aus: Fellbacher Zeitung, Fellbach
10. April 1971
vom

71

3

Beethovens Trauermarsch für Igor Strawinsky

Boston-Jet mit Captain Steinberg

Das Symphony Orchestra eröffnete seine Deutschland-Tournee in der Liederhalle

Um das Konzerthaus Stuttgarter Liederhalle drängeln sich die Autos. Das Publikum nimmt wenig später schon nach dem ersten Klingelzeichen im Beethovensaal die Plätze ein. Die Heerscharen des Boston Symphony Orchestra füllen die Bühne: Amerikas ältestes Repräsentationsorchester beginnt die Deutschland-Gastspiele seiner dritten Europa-Tournee in Stuttgart. Maestro William Steinberg betritt die Bühne unter starkem Beifall und spricht vom roten Samt des Podiums zum Publikum: Igor Strawinsky ist gestorben. Er war der Größte.

Amerikas vornehmstes Orchester, klingender Repräsentant feiner Bostoner Art, war dem großen Komponisten besonders eng verbunden. Maestro Steinberg hebt langsam den langen Taktstock. Zum Gedenken an Strawinsky erklingt der Trauermarsch aus Beethovens 3. Sinfonie „Eroica". Die Bostoner sind ein prachtvolles Orchester, und sie wissen das. Sie sind auch das fleißigste Orchester der Neuen Welt. Das weiß man. Und einst — unter der 25jährigen Leitung Serge Koussevitzkys waren sie das virtuoseste Orchester der Welt, dem danach der Elsässer Charles Münch 13 Jahre lang noch französische Eleganz anerzog.

Übriggeblieben von dieser einstigen Pracht sind der Fleiß, ein gewaltiger Sound, sind virtuose Holz- und schwer schallende Blech-Ensembles. Präzision und Eleganz haben entschieden nachgelassen. (Ungenaue Blecheinsätze bei Bruckner und Primgeigenkleckerei im ersten Hindemith-Satz störten.) Selbstbewußtsein und Routine halten das Niveau noch hoch. Und der Boston-Klang ist immer noch hin und wieder unverwechselbar in seiner weichen Kompaktheit und schöner als der der New Yorker. Doch wenn ich mit den Berliner Philharmonikern oder Celibidaches Stockholmern oder den Londoner Orchestern vergleiche, vermag ich die Goldmedaille nicht mehr über den Atlantik zu reichen.

William Steinberg, 71jähriger Podiums-Mogul, klein, gedrungen, athletischer Souverän amerikanischer Kunst-High-Society, ganz sparsam und schwerfällig in der Zeichengebung, aber höchst bestimmt, verbreitet das Fluidum eines Potentaten, der überlegen Heerscharen regiert. In jeder Bewegung Arriviertheit, Kalkulation, Erfahrung, Kenntnis aller irdischen Herrlichkeiten. Nur eben den Zugang zu den himmlischen vermißte ich:

In Bruckners Siebter vor allem, obgleich die Wiedergabe alles berücksichtigt, was in der Partitur steht und sogar noch einiges dazutat, strahlend im Holz, satt im Streicherklang; goldene Dampfwalze auf St. Florians Frühlingswiesen; Himmelsflüge im Jumbo-Jet, fein ausgesteuert, ganz genau und kraftvoll dazu; aber eben gar keine Fröhlichkeit, gar keine Naivität, gar nichts Genialisches. Denke ich an Jochum, an Leitner oder gar an Hans Rosbaud . . . Nicht zufällig ist Bruckner bis heute in den USA nicht recht populär geworden. Was die Bostoner boten, war nur Schallkleid, hinter dessen glänzendem Gewirk kein (frommes) Herz schlug, sondern nur Aktion sich vollzog.

Rasant und mächtig

Zuvor gab es Hindemiths handwerklich virtuose, musikalisch kompakte Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser, einst den Bostonern auf den Charakter geschrieben. Was da von europäischen Orchestern dünn und dürr und schulmeisterlich zu klingen pflegt, kam hier mit einer Rasanz und Mächtigkeit, die mitriß: polyphoner Ringkampf zwischen Streichern und Bläsern, mit lauter Siegern am Schluß.

Beethovens Trauermarsch, sehr langsam, ausdrucksvoll, unendlich gewichtig und so ausformuliert, daß sich fast schon Spannungslosigkeit ergab, wirkte auf mich eindrucksvoll. Aber am eindrucksvollsten war auch hier diese Riesenorchestermaschine, die phänomenale Klangmassen bewegte, balancierte, auffing; mit einem Dirigenten an der Spitze, dessen größte Fähigkeit darin zu bestehen scheint, daß er diesen Apparat zu beherrschen und in Gang zu halten vermag. Inspiration kam wohl keine auf; so sehr viel Musik war nicht in diesem Konzert; dafür um so mehr Klang. Ich bin sicher, daß das Publikum demnächst nach dem Konzert der Berliner Philharmoniker noch sehr viel begeisterter applaudieren wird.

Dieter Schorr

Chef zweier USA-Orchester
Neben Stokowsky gehört William Steinberg, ein gebürtiger Kölner und ehemaliger Frankfurter Generalmusikdirektor, zu den heute noch lebenden amerikanischen Elitedirigenten der alten Generation. Seit 1968 ist er Chefdirigent der Boston Symphony. Daneben leitet er das Pittsburgh-Orchester.

Picture CONDUCTOR OF TWO US ORCHESTRAS

Besides Stokovsky, William Steinberg, who was born in Cologne and was formerly general music director at Frankfurt, belongs to the still living elite conductors of the old generation. Since 1968 he is the conductor of the Boston Symphony. Besides that he leads the Pittsburgh Orchestra.

further translation notes on the following page

stuttgart reviews

Beethoven's Funeral March for Stravinsky

B O S T O N _ J E T W I T H C A P T A I N S T E I N B E R G

The Symphony Orchestra opened its German tour in the "Liederhalle"

Traffic presses around the concert hall "Stuttgarter Liederhalle". The audience is already taking their seats after the first bell in the Beethoven Hall. The legions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fill the stage: America's oldest representative orchestra begins the guest performances of its third European tour in Stuttgart. Mastro William Steinberg enters the stage with strong applause. He speaks to the audience from the red velvet of the podium: Igor Stravinsky is dead. He was the greatest one.

America's most aristocratic orchestra, tonal representative of Boston art, felt especially close to the great composer. Mastro Steinberg lifts the long baton slowly. In memory of Stravinsky, the Funeral March from Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica" resounds. The Bostonians are a magnificant orchstra, and they know it. They also are the most ambitious orchestr of the New World. Everybody knows that. And once - under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky for 25 years they were the greatest virtuoso orchestra of the world. For thirteen years after that the Alsatian Charles Munch trained it further to French elegance.

Remaining of this former splendor is the ambition, a powerful sound, virtuoso woodwinds and heavily resounding brass ensembles. Precision and elegance have fallen off decidely. (Inaccurate entry of the brass for Bruckner and first violin dribble in the first Hindemith movement were disturbing). Self-confidence and routine keep it still above the average. And the Boston-sound is still unmistakeable now and then in its compactness, and more beautiful than the New Yorkers. But when I compare it with the Berlin Philharmonic or Celibidache's Stockholm or the London Orchestra is it impossible for me to pass the gold medal anymore.

William Steinberg, the 71 year old mogul of the podium, spreads the aura of a potentate who rules legions with superiority. He is small, stout, an athletic great of American Art-High-Society, very spare, ponderous in his signaling, but very determined. In every move he showed maneuverability, calculation, experience and knowledge of all wordly splendor, but I missed his approach to the heavenly:

This was especially noticeable in Bruckner's Seventh, although the rendering took everything into consideration that has been written into the score, even adding a bit. The woodwinds were radiant, the strings rich; a golden steam-roller on St.Florian's spring meadow; heavenly flights in a jumbo-jet, delicately rendered, also very precise and powerful, but just no cheerfulness, not a bit of naivete, absolutely nothing ingenious. If I think of Jochum, Leitner or even Hans Rosbaud...It is not accidental that Bruckner hasn't become very popular in the USA. The Bostonians offered nothing but a sound garment, no (pious) heart beating in its glittering weave, but only the process executed.

F L A T A N D S T R O N G

First we heard Hindemith's Konzertmusik for strings and brass, with mechanical virtuosity, musical compactness, once composed upon the character of the Bostonians. What used to sound thin and meager and pedantic with European orchestras was presented here with a flat trajectory and power which swept along: a polyphonic wrestling match between strings and brasses, with only winners at the end.

Beethoven;s Funeral March impressed me; very slow, expressive, imensely momentous and so formulated that it almost resulted in a loss of suspense. But even here the giant orchestral machine was most impressive and moved phenomenal sound substances, balancing and catching it, led by a conductor whose highest ability consists of controlling this machine and keeping it in gear. There was no inspiration, there wasn't too much music in this concert, but more sound. I am sure that the audience will aupland much more enthusiasticly after the concert of the Berlin Philharmonic next time.

Dieter Schorr

---

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 85,0 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Stuttgarter Nachrichten, Stuttgart
vom 10. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 5,6 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Fellbacher Zeitung, Fellbach
vom 10. April 1971

71

Beethovens Trauermarsch für Igor Strawinsky

Boston-Jet mit Captain Steinberg

Das Symphony Orchestra eröffnete seine Deutschland-Tournee in der Liederhalle

Um das Konzerthaus Stuttgarter Liederhalle drängeln sich die Autos. Das Publikum nimmt wenig später schon nach dem ersten Klingelzeichen im Beethovensaal die Plätze ein. Die Heerscharen des Boston Symphony Orchestra füllen die Bühne: Amerikas ältestes Repräsentationsorchester beginnt die Deutschland-Gastspiele seiner dritten Europa-Tournee in Stuttgart. Maestro William Steinberg betritt die Bühne unter starkem Beifall und spricht vom roten Samt des Podiums zum Publikum: Igor Strawinsky ist gestorben. Er war der Größte.

Amerikas vornehmstes Orchester, klingender Repräsentant feiner Bostoner Art, war dem großen Komponisten besonders eng verbunden. Maestro Steinberg hebt langsam den langen Taktstock. Zum Gedenken an Strawinsky erklingt der Trauermarsch aus Beethovens 3. Sinfonie „Eroica". Die Bostoner sind ein prachtvolles Orchester, und sie wissen das. Sie sind auch das fleißigste Orchester der Neuen Welt. Das weiß man. Und einst — unter der 25jährigen Leitung Serge Koussevitzkys waren sie das virtuoseste Orchester der Welt, dem danach der Elsässer Charles Münch 13 Jahre lang noch französische Eleganz anerzog.

Übriggeblieben von dieser einstigen Pracht sind der Fleiß, ein gewaltiger Sound, sind virtuose Holz- und schwer schallende Blech-Ensembles. Präzision und Eleganz haben entschieden nachgelassen. (Ungenaue Blecheinsätze bei Bruckner und Primgeigenkleckerei im ersten Hindemith-Satz störten.) Selbstbewußtsein und Routine halten das Niveau noch hoch. Und der Boston-Klang ist immer noch hin und wieder unverwechselbar in seiner weichen Kompaktheit und schöner als der der New Yorker. Doch wenn ich mit den Berliner Philharmonikern oder Celibidaches Stockholmern oder den Londoner Orchestern vergleiche, vermag ich die Goldmedaille nicht mehr über den Atlantik zu reichen.

William Steinberg, 71jähriger Podiums-Mogul, klein, gedrungen, athletischer Souverän amerikanischer Kunst-High-Society, ganz sparsam und schwerfällig in der Zeichengebung, aber höchst bestimmt, verbreitet das Fluidum eines Potentaten, der überlegen Heerscharen regiert. In jeder Bewegung Arriviertheit, Kalkulation, Erfahrung, Kenntnis aller irdischen Herrlichkeiten. Nur eben den Zugang zu den himmlischen vermißte ich:

In Bruckners Siebter vor allem, obgleich die Wiedergabe alles berücksichtigt, was in der Partitur steht und sogar noch einiges dazutat, strahlend im Holz, satt im Streicherklang; goldene Dampfwalze auf St. Florians Frühlingswiesen; Himmelsflüge im Jumbo-Jet, fein ausgesteuert, ganz genau und kraftvoll dazu; aber eben gar keine Fröhlichkeit, gar keine Naivität, gar nichts Genialisches. Denke ich an Jochum, an Leitner oder gar an Hans Rosbaud . . . Nicht zufällig ist Bruckner bis heute in den USA nicht recht populär geworden. Was die Bostoner boten, war nur Schallkleid, hinter dessen glänzendem Gewirk kein (frommes) Herz schlug, sondern nur Aktion sich vollzog.

Rasant und mächtig

Zuvor gab es Hindemiths handwerklich virtuose, musikalisch kompakte Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser, einst den Bostonern auf den Charakter geschrieben. Was da von europäischen Orchestern dünn und dürr und schulmeisterlich zu klingen pflegt, kam hier mit einer Rasanz und Mächtigkeit, die mitriß: polyphoner Ringkampf zwischen Streichern und Bläsern, mit lauter Siegern am Schluß.

Beethovens Trauermarsch, sehr langsam, ausdrucksvoll, unendlich gewichtig und so ausformuliert, daß sich fast schon Spannungslosigkeit ergab, wirkte auf mich eindrucksvoll. Aber am eindrucksvollsten war auch hier diese Riesenorchestermaschine, die phänomenale Klangmassen bewegte, balancierte, auffing; mit einem Dirigenten an der Spitze, dessen größte Fähigkeit darin zu bestehen scheint, daß er diesen Apparat zu beherrschen und in Gang zu halten vermag. Inspiration kam wohl keine auf; so sehr viel Musik war nicht in diesem Konzert; dafür um so mehr Klang. Ich bin sicher, daß das Publikum demnächst nach dem Konzert der Berliner Philharmoniker noch sehr viel begeisterter applaudieren wird.

Dieter Schorr

Chef zweier USA-Orchester
Neben Stokowsky gehört William Steinberg, ein gebürtiger Kölner und ehemaliger Frankfurter Generalmusikdirektor, zu den heute noch lebenden amerikanischen Elitedirigenten der alten Generation. Seit 1968 ist er Chefdirigent der Boston Symphony. Daneben leitet er das Pittsburgh-Orchester.

Picture CONDUCTOR OF TWO US ORCHESTRAS

Besides Stokovsky, William Steinberg, who was born in Cologne and was formerly general music director at Frankfurt, belongs to the still living elite conductors of the old generation. Since 1968 he is the conductor of the Boston Symphony. Besides that he leads the Pittsburgh Orchestra.

further translation notes on the following page

stuttgart reviews

further translation notes of "Boston Jet-Mit"... cont. from preceding page.

STUTTGART

Stuttgarter Nachrichten, Stuttgart, April 10, 1971

"The Bostonians are a magnificant Orchestra and they know that. They're also the most painstaking of the New World...

He then describes the orchestra under Koussevitzky and Munch

"Leftover from this former splendor are the diligence, an authoritative sound, the virtuoso woodwind and heavy sounding brass ensembles. Precision and elegance have definitely diminished. (uncertain brass entrances in the Bruckner and uneveness of the first violins in the Hindemith). Self assurance and training still hold the standard high. and the Boston sound is still here and there unequalled in its mellow compactness and more beautiful than the New York. But when I compare it to the Berlin Philharmonic, the Stockholm Orchestra of Celibidache or the London Orchestra, I would be reluctant to send the gold medal across the Atlantic."

He then says (paraphrased)

In the Bruckner the sound was only a body within which no real heart beat - it was only a procedure brought to conclusion -

His lasting impression was that of gigantic orchestral machine which produced a phenomenal mass of sound, with a director at the top whose greatest ability and accomplishment seemed to be that he could command it and keep it under control. No feeling of inspiration was apparent - there was a lot of sound produced, not so much real music. Has the feeling that the public will appreciate even more the Berlin Philharmonic by comparison.

argus
Seit 1907
Auflage (L.Ts.): 1689
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Stuttgarter Zeitung, Stuttgart
vom 13. April 1971

Dekorativer Bruckner

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter William Steinberg in Stuttgart

Das neunte Meisterkonzert brachte als Sonderveranstaltung das Bostoner Symphonieorchester nach Stuttgart, das vor Jahren unter dem unvergeßlichen Charles Münch im Beethovensaal konzertierte. Diesmal mit Werken von Beethoven, Hindemith und Bruckner. Zur Eröffnung des Abends gedachte der Chefdirigent der Bostoner, William Steinberg, des Todes von Igor Strawinsky, der mit dem Orchester durch lange Jahre freundschaftlich verbunden war. Der Trauermarsch aus Beethovens „Eroica", sehr feierlich und langsam und nur im Fugato mit drängenden Impulsen gespielt, war dem Gedenken an Meister Strawinsky gewidmet.

Vor der Würdigung der individuellen Wiedergaben steht die Freude über die Tatsache, eines der bedeutendsten Orchester der Alten und Neuen Welt wieder zu hören, das sich seit seiner Gründung 1881 unter Dirigenten wie Nikisch, Monteux, Koussewitzky, Münch und Leinsdorf zu einem Klangkörper von überragenden technischen Fähigkeiten und musikalischer Kraft entwickelt hat. Die Bostoner vereinigen die Dichte und Differenziertheit des Streicherklangs mit den tonlichen Qualitäten der ausgesucht schönen Holzbläser und der Gewalt der pompösen Blechbläser. Allein schon die mannigfaltigen klanglichen Finessen dieses hochentwickelten, im Piano feinsinnig durchleuchteten, im Forte klanggewaltigen Orchesters zu erleben, ist reiner künstlerischer Genuß.

Foto: Leslie

William Steinberg, der derzeitige Chef der Bostoner, setzte die unterschiedlichen klanglichen Möglichkeiten mit überlegener Kunst und in einem Dirigierstil ein, der weitab von bloßer Absicht der Schaustellung dem Werk diente. Sein Dirigieren ist keine unmittelbar auffallende Bekundung des musikalischen Ausdrucks. Seine Art ist die des sauberen Handwerkers und seiner Sache sicheren Kapellmeisters, die er aber jedesmal überspringt, wo es sich um große dramatische Steigerungen und Zusammenfassungen handelt, die dann plakativ herausgehoben werden. Das war in Hindemiths für das Bostoner Symphonieorchester zu dessen Fünfzig-Jahr-Jubiläum komponierter Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser festzustellen wie in Bruckners siebter Sinfonie.

So ungewöhnlich wie Steinbergs pompöse Feierlichkeit in Beethovens Trauermarsch war, so ungewohnt war auch seine im Prinzip einheitliche, in der Ausführung vieler Ingredienzen Brucknerscher Sinfoniekunst anders gelagerte Widergabe. Groß angelegt und formal deutlich zusammengefaßt der erste Satz, wenn auch das dritte Thema in seiner Leichtigkeit zu wenig abgehoben wurde. Steinberg ging es hauptsächlich um die großen dramatischen Ballungen, die aber nicht als letzte Konsequenz und Krönung erschienen, sondern eher als dekorative, nicht immer wirksamen Blechbläsereffekten abholde Höhepunkte. So in der vom Blechbläserklang gesättigten Durchführung im ersten Satz und in der großen Steigerung mit Beckenschlag und Triangel im zweiten Satz.

Ueber das von Steinberg angeschlagene beinahe behäbige Tempo im Scherzo kann man verschiedener Meinung sein. Jedenfalls besteht bei zu langsamer Temponahme die Gefahr einer Verwischung des notwendigen technisch-musikalischen und geistigen Kontrastes zum Adagio wie zum Finale. Das sehr wirkungsvoll, wenn auch mit zu deutlichen Einschnitten vorgetragene Finale beendete eine Interpretation, die vom technischen Standpunkt aus sehr ansprechende Details zeigte, aber in der Gesamthaltung Bruckners Weltfeierlichkeit, Schlichtheit und Frömmigkeit in die glänzende Sphäre konzertanter Wirksamkeit rückte. Enthusiastische Ovationen für Orchester und Dirigent.

WILLY FRÖHLICH

Steinberg: „Nicht nur Klassiker"

„Ich glaube, daß ein amerikanisches Symphonieorchester die Aufgabe hat, auch einen Einblick in das amerikanische Musikschaffen zu vermitteln. Ich werde daher, obwohl man zu meinem Erstaunen offenbar in der doch als so progressiv geltenden Bundesrepublik ebenso wie anderswo in den Konzertsälen Mozart, Beethoven und andere Klassiker viel lieber hört als Vertreter der modernen Musik, auf dieser Europatournee nicht nur beliebte Klassiker, sondern auch zeitgenössische amerikanische Komponisten präsentieren. Ich werde unter anderem Werke von Walter Piston und Gunther Schuller zum Vortrag bringen, selbst wenn es dem deutschen Konzertpublikum nicht passen sollte. Auch in Amerika gefällt ja nicht alles, was in Europa komponiert wird."

William Steinberg äußerte diese Meinung in einem Pausengespräch in seiner Garderobe in der Stuttgarter Liederhalle, wo nach dem vorausgegangenen Londoner Konzert der festliche Auftakt stattfand für die dreiwöchige Gastspielreise des Boston Symphony Orchestra — die dritte Europatournee dieses weltberühmten Ensembles — durch elf Städte des europäischen Festlands.

petz

STUTTGART Stuttgarter Zeintung, Stuttgart April 13, 1971

"The Bostonians combine the density of discrimination of the strings with the tonal qualities of the extraordinarily beautiful woodwinds and the strength of the magnificant brass section. Only in experiencing the varietios of sonorous finesse of this highly developed Orchestra, delicately illuminated (in the piano sections), powerful in the forte, does one know real artistic pleasure"

He describes Steinberg as " transcending mere technical capability when it is a matter of dramatic intensification and climax - as in Hindemith piece for strings and horn and in Bruckner's 7th.

with an almost comfortable pace. At any rate there is the danger of an obliteration of the necessary technical, musical and spiritual contrasts to the Adagio and the finale when the tempo is taken too slowly. The finale, very impressively conducted, but with much noticeable segmentation, finished the interpretation. From a technical point of view it showed many attractive details, but in the entirety Bruckner's universal solemnity, simplicity and piety moved into the brilliant sphere of orchestral effectiveness.

Willy Fröhlich

Steinberg: "Not only Classics".

"I believe that an American orchestra has the duty to expose American musical composition. Therefore, on this tour, I also want to present contemporary American composers and not just beloved classics. I was surprised to find that in Western Germany, which is supposed to be progressive, Beethoven, Mozart and other classicists are preferred to representatives of contemporary music, just like in other concert halls. I will present among others works of Walter Piston and Gunther Schuller, even if the German audience doesn't approve of it. In America, as well, not everything is favored which is being composed in Europe."

William Steinberg expressed this opinion in his cloak room in the Stuttgart Liederhalle during an intermission. In that hall the festive opening took place after the earlier concert in London on the three week tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra - the third tour through Europe of this world renowned ensemble - through eleven cities of the European continent.

D E C O R A T I V E B R U C K N E R

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under William Steinberg in Stuttgart.

The ninth master concert brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a special presentation. This orchestra gave a concert in Beethoven Hall some years ago under the direction of the unforgettable Charles Munch. Now, with works by Beethoven, Hindemith and Bruckner the conductor of the Bostonians, William Steinberg, honored the death of Igor Stravinsky, who was closely connected with the orchestra, at the opening of the evening. The Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" was dedicated to the memory of the Master Stravinsky, very solemn and slow, only in the fugato played with driving impulses.

Before appreciating the individual renderings we have the pleasure of regarding the fact that we can hear one of the most valuable orchestras of the Old and the New World. It has developed to a symphonic of unsurpassed technical ability and musical force since its foundation in 1881 under conductors like Nikisch, Monteux, Koussewitzky, Munch and Leinsdorf. The Bostonians combine the density and differential of the strings with the sound quality of selected beautiful woodwinds and the power of the magnificent brass. It is pure artistic pleasure just to witness the various sound finesse of this highly developed orchestra, delicately irradiated in the piano and tonal power in the forte.

William Steinberg, the conductor of the Bostonians inserted the different interpretations with superior art and in such a style which served the presentation of the work far above mere intential exhibitionism. His conducting is not an immediately striking testimony of his musical expression. His method is one of a clean workman, a conductor who knows what he is about which is even more apparent whenever it involves a dramatic crescendo and recapatulation which are set off, billboard-like. This was noticeable in Hindemith's Konzertmusik which he composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and also in Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

As unusual as Steinberg's festive solemnity of Beethoven's Funeral March, as unusual was the different rendering of Bruckner's symphonic style, essentially uniform in the reproduction of the composer's ingredients. The first movement was set out powerfully, although the third theme wasn't contrasted enough in its ease. Steinberg was mainly interested in the large dramatic agglomerations which didn't appear as a last consequence and finishing touch, but more as a decorative not always efficient effect of the brasses underplayed highpoints. Like the modulation in the first movement, saturated with brass sound and in the big climax in the second movement, with cymbal and triangle.

One can differ in the opinion of the Scherzo which Steimberg struck

argus
Seit 1887
Auflage (l. T.s.): 168,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Stuttgarter Zeitung, Stuttgart
vom 13. April 1971

Dekorativer Bruckner

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter William Steinberg in Stuttgart

Das neunte Meisterkonzert brachte als Sonderveranstaltung das Bostoner Symphonieorchester nach Stuttgart, das vor Jahren unter dem unvergeßlichen Charles Münch im Beethovensaal konzertierte. Diesmal mit Werken von Beethoven, Hindemith und Bruckner. Zur Eröffnung des Abends gedachte der Chefdirigent der Bostoner, William Steinberg, des Todes von Igor Strawinsky, der mit dem Orchester durch lange Jahre freundschaftlich verbunden war. Der Trauermarsch aus Beethovens „Eroica", sehr feierlich und langsam und nur im Fugato mit drängenden Impulsen gespielt, war dem Gedenken an Meister Strawinsky gewidmet.

Vor der Würdigung der individuellen Wiedergaben steht die Freude über die Tatsache, eines der bedeutendsten Orchester der Alten und Neuen Welt wieder zu hören, das sich seit seiner Gründung 1881 unter Dirigenten wie Nikisch, Monteux, Koussewitzky, Münch und Leinsdorf zu einem Klangkörper von überragenden technischen Fähigkeiten und musikalischer Kraft entwickelt hat. Die Bostoner vereinigen die Dichte und Differenziertheit des Streicherklangs mit den tonlichen Qualitäten der ausgesucht schönen Holzbläser und der Gewalt der pompösen Blechbläser. Allein schon die mannigfaltigen klanglichen Finessen dieses hochentwickelten, im Piano feinsinnig durchleuchteten, im Forte klanggewaltigen Orchesters zu erleben, ist reiner künstlerischer Genuß.

Foto: Leslie

William Steinberg, der derzeitige Chef der Bostoner, setzte die unterschiedlichen klanglichen Möglichkeiten mit überlegener Kunst und in einem Dirigierstil ein, der weitab von bloßer Absicht der Schaustellung dem Werk diente. Sein Dirigieren ist keine unmittelbar auffallende Bekundung des musikalischen Ausdrucks. Seine Art ist die des sauberen Handwerkers und seiner Sache sicheren Kapellmeisters, die er aber jedesmal überspringt, wo es sich um große dramatische Steigerungen und Zusammenfassungen handelt, die dann plakativ herausgehoben werden. Das war in Hindemiths für das Bostoner Symphonieorchester zu dessen Fünfzig-Jahr-Jubiläum komponierter Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser festzustellen wie in Bruckners siebter Sinfonie.

So ungewöhnlich wie Steinbergs pompöse Feierlichkeit in Beethovens Trauermarsch war, so ungewohnt war auch seine im Prinzip einheitliche, in der Ausführung vieler Ingredienzen Brucknerscher Sinfoniekunst anders gelagerte Widergabe. Groß angelegt und formal deutlich zusammengefaßt der erste Satz, wenn auch das dritte Thema in seiner Leichtigkeit zu wenig abgehoben wurde. Steinberg ging es hauptsächlich um die großen dramatischen Ballungen, die aber nicht als letzte Konsequenz und Krönung erschienen, sondern eher als dekorative, nicht immer wirksamen Blechbläsereffekten abholde Höhepunkte. So in der vom Blechbläserklang gesättigten Durchführung im ersten Satz und in der großen Steigerung mit Beckenschlag und Triangel im zweiten Satz.

Ueber das von Steinberg angeschlagene beinahe behäbige Tempo im Scherzo kann man verschiedener Meinung sein. Jedenfalls besteht bei zu langsamer Temponahme die Gefahr einer Verwischung des notwendigen technisch-musikalischen und geistigen Kontrastes zum Adagio wie zum Finale. Das sehr wirkungsvoll, wenn auch mit zu deutlichen Einschnitten vorgetragene Finale beendete eine Interpretation, die vom technischen Standpunkt aus sehr ansprechende Details zeigte, aber in der Gesamthaltung Bruckners Weltfeierlichkeit, Schlichtheit und Frömmigkeit in die glänzende Sphäre konzertanter Wirksamkeit rückte. Enthusiastische Ovationen für Orchester und Dirigent.

WILLY FRÖHLICH

Steinberg: „Nicht nur Klassiker"

„Ich glaube, daß ein amerikanisches Symphonieorchester die Aufgabe hat, auch einen Einblick in das amerikanische Musikschaffen zu vermitteln. Ich werde daher, obwohl man zu meinem Erstaunen offenbar in der doch als so progressiv geltenden Bundesrepublik ebenso wie anderswo in den Konzertsälen Mozart, Beethoven und andere Klassiker viel lieber hört als Vertreter der modernen Musik, auf dieser Europatournee nicht nur beliebte Klassiker, sondern auch zeitgenössische amerikanische Komponisten präsentieren. Ich werde unter anderem Werke von Walter Piston und Gunther Schuller zum Vortrag bringen, selbst wenn es dem deutschen Konzertpublikum nicht passen sollte. Auch in Amerika gefällt ja nicht alles, was in Europa komponiert wird."

William Steinberg äußerte diese Meinung in einem Pausengespräch in seiner Garderobe in der Stuttgarter Liederhalle, wo nach dem vorausgegangenen Londoner Konzert der festliche Auftakt stattfand für die dreiwöchige Gastspielreise des Boston Symphony Orchestra — die dritte Europatournee dieses weltberühmten Ensembles — durch elf Städte des europäischen Festlands.

petz

STUTTGART

Stuttgarter Zeitung, Stuttgart April 13, 1971

"The Bostonians combine the density of discrimination of the strings with the tonal qualities of the extraordinarily beautiful woodwinds and the strength of the magnificant brass section. Only in experiencing the varieties of sonorous finesse of this highly developed Orchestra, delicately illuminated (in the piano sections), powerful in the forte, does one know real artistic pleasure"

He describes Steinberg as " transcending mere technical capability when it is a matter of dramatic intensification and climax - as in Hindemith piece for strings and horn and in Bruckner's 7th.

with an almost comfortable pace. At any rate there is the danger of an obliteration of the necessary technical, musical and spiritual contrasts to the Adagio and the finale when the tempo is taken too slowly. The finale, very impressively conducted, but with much noticeable segmentation, finished the interpretation. From a technical point of view it showed many attractive details, but in the entirety Bruckner's universal solemnity, simplicity and piety moved into the brilliant sphere of orchestral effectiveness.

Willy Fröhlich

Steinberg: "Not only Classics".

"I believe that an American orchestra has the duty to expose American musical composition. Therefore, on this tour, I also want to present contemporary American composers and not just beloved classics. I was surprised to find that in Western Germany, which is supposed to be progressive, Beethoven, Mozart and other classicists are preferred to representatives of contemporary music, just like in other concert halls. I will present among others works of Walter Piston and Gunther Schuller, even if the German audience doesn't approve of it. In America, as well, not everything is favored which is being composed in Europe."

William Steinberg expressed this opinion in his cloak room in the Stuttgart Liederhalle during an intermission. In that hall the festive opening took place after the earlier concert in London on the three week tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra - the third tour through Europe of this world renowned ensemble - through eleven cities of the European continent.

D E C O R A T I V E B R U C K N E R

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under William Steinberg in Stuttgart.

The ninth master concert brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a special presentation. This orchestra gave a concert in Beethoven Hall some years ago under the direction of the unforgettable Charles Munch. Now, with works by Beethoven, Hindemith and Bruckner the conductor of the Bostonians, William Steinberg, honored the death of Igor Stravinsky, who was closely connected with the orchestra, at the opening of the evening. The Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" was dedicated to the memory of the Master Stravinsky, very solemn and slow, only in the fugato played with driving impulses.

Before appreciating the individual renderings we have the pleasure of regarding the fact that we can hear one of the most valuable orchestras of the Old and the New World. It has developed to a symphonic of unsurpassed technical ability and musical force since its foundation in 1881 under conductors like Nikisch, Monteux, Koussewitzky, Munch and Leinsdorf. The Bostonians combine the density and differential of the strings with the sound quality of selected beautiful woodwinds and the power of the magnificent brass. It is pure artistic pleasure just to witness the various sound finesse of this highly developed orchestra, delicately irradiated in the piano and tonal power in the forte.

William Steinberg, the conductor of the Bostonians inserted the different interpretations with superior art and in such a style which served the presentation of the work far above mere intential exhibitionism. His conducting is not an immediately striking testimony of his musical expression. His method is one of a clean workman, a conductor who knows what he is about which is even more apparent whenever it involves a dramatic crescendo and recapatulation which are set off, billboard-like. This was noticeable in Hindemith's Konzertmusik which he composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and also in Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

As unusual as Steinberg's festive solemnity of Beethoven's Funeral March, as unusual was the different rendering of Bruckner's symphonic style, essentially uniform in the reproduction of the composer's ingredients. The first movement was set out powerfully, although the third theme wasn't contrasted enough in its ease. Steinberg was mainly interested in the large dramatic agglomerations which didn't appear as a last consequence and finishing touch, but more as a decorative not always efficient effect of the brasses underplayed highpoints. Like the modulation in the first movement, saturated with brass sound and in the big climax in the second movement, with cymbal and triangle.

One can differ in the opinion of the Scherzo which Steinberg struck

74

Die Welt, Berlin, April 10, 1971

Prunk mit Bruckner

Tourneebeginn des Boston Symphony Orchestra

Eigenbericht der WELT

Stuttgart, 9. April

In Amerika gehen die Uhren anders. Ohne einen Pfennig Unterstützung von staatlicher Seite unternimmt zurzeit das renommierte Boston Symphony Orchestra eine dreiwöchige Tournee durch Europa. Erste Station in Deutschland — fünf weitere Städte in der Bundesrepublik folgen — war die Stuttgarter Liederhalle. Das mit einem Jahresetat von viereinhalb Millionen Dollar von privater Seite ausstaffierte Orchester ist das Resultat eines Mäzenatentums, wie es in Deutschland schon seit Auflösung der Fürstenhäuser nicht mehr existiert.

Als Henry Lee Higginson das Orchester vor knapp neunzig Jahren in Boston gründete, gab er der Institution ein Sieben-Punkte-Programm, das sich auch heute noch sehen lassen kann: Man wollte ein ständiges Orchester mit wöchentlichen Saisonkonzerten bei niedrigen Eintrittspreisen. Das Gehalt für Dirigenten und Musiker sollte vertraglich festgelegt und die Vollbeschäftigung während der ganzen Saison garantiert sein. Die Alleinverantwortung für künstlerische Dinge übertrug Higginson dem Dirigenten.

Und Dirigenten wie Arthur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Koussevitzky, Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf, seit 1969 William Steinberg haben dem Orchester Profil gegeben. 1972 wird Steinberg, heute 71 Jahre alt und gleichzeitig in Pittsburgh Chef auf Lebenszeit, das Bostoner Orchester abgeben. Favoriten für seine Nachfolge sind Abbado, Kubelik und Michael Tilson Thomas, Steinbergs Assistent, der mit seinen 26 Jahren in den USA bereits einen hervorragenden Ruf hat.

Das Stuttgarter Programm änderte Steinberg zu Ehren des toten Strawinsky. An Stelle der 3. Leonoren-Ouvertüre spielten die Amerikaner, die sich mit Strawinsky sehr verbunden fühlen, den Trauermarsch aus der „Eroica". Schon hier wurde deutlich, um welch ein außerordentliches Orchester es sich handelt. Alle Musik, die es an diesem Abend spielte, lebt von einem Cello-Baß-Fundament, wie es kein deutsches Orchester aufzuweisen hat. Ganz Ton in Ton die Klangfärbung der Blechbläser: leichter Ansatz, nie schneidend oder vordergründig die Brillanz. Für eine ausgewogene Mitte sorgen vorzüglich besetzte Holzbläser. Die Deutsche Grammophon hat bekanntlich 1969 mit dem Bostoner Orchester einen Exklusivvertrag abgeschlossen. Wenn auch der eigentliche Antrieb eine Ausweitung des amerikanischen DG-Marktanteils ist, so werden auch die deutschen Hörer von diesem Vertrag nur profitieren.

Steinberg regiert am Pult wie ein Mann alter Schule. Sparsam und doch klar in der Zeichengebung, erinnert er bisweilen in der Effektivität seiner Gestik an Knappertsbusch. Hindemiths „Bostoner Symphonie" — sie wird auch beim Hamburger Konzert der Amerikaner am 14. April neben Beethovens „Eroica" und Mozarts Linzer Sinfonie zu hören sein — kam sonor, kraftvoll kontrapunktisch, schwer und substanzgefüllt. Hindemith muß vor dieser Komposition gewußt haben, wie sich ein Streicher-Unisono bei diesem Orchester anhört.

Prunkstück des Stuttgarter Programms: Bruckners 7. Sinfonie. Steinberg baute mit melodischen Formstangen von beträchtlichem Gewicht. Dunkel und sehr expressiv die Streicher, dazu ein Bläserklang, in dem eindeutig Hörner und Tuben den Farbton bestimmen. Der Bostoner Bruckner verzichtet auf grelle Gegensätze, auf geschärfte Dissonanzen genauso wie auf frömmelndes Gottvertrauen, mystische Größe und falsch verstandenes Pathos.

Die „Bostonians" haben mehrere Gesichter. Fehlen der Konzertmeister sowie die ersten Pulte einer Stimme und steht Arthur Fiedler am Pult, dann feiert das Orchester Triumphe unter dem Namen „Boston Pops". Am 16. April ist, wie berichtet, in der Bonner Beethovenhalle ein Querschnitt aus dem Musical „Hair" zu hören. Dazu gibt es viel Prominenz und belegte Brötchen. Fiedler, 77, ist bereits Ehrenmitglied von über hundert Feuerwehrvereinigungen. Das jüngste Angebot in dieser Richtung stammt von der Freiwilligen Feuerwehr Hamburg-Sasel.

Helmut Lesch

argus Seit 1967

Ausschnitt aus: Die Welt, Hamburg

10. April 1971

Auflage (l. Ts.): 280,8 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

DIE WELT

April 10 1971

Review by HELMUT LESCH of BSO Stuttgart program

Steinberg changed the Stuttgart program in honor of the dead Stravinsky. Instead of the 3rd Leonore overture, the Americans, who feel closely linked with Stravinsky, played the funeral march from the Eroica. Already here it was clear with how extraordinary an orchestra one was dealing. All the music it played on this evening grew from a cello and bass foundation that no German orchestra can offer. The coloration of the brass blended into the whole, lightly attacked, its brilliance never cutting or pushing into the foreground. Excellently staffed woodwinds take care of a finely balanced middle....

Steinberg reigns at the conductor's desk like a man of the old school. Economical yet clear in his signals, in the effectiveness of his gesture, he sometimes reminds one of Knappertsbusch. Hindemith's Boston Symphony...sounded sonorous, powerfully contrapuntal, weighty, and filled with substance. Before writing this composition, Hindemith must have known what a string tutti sounds like in this orchestra.

The splendid centerpiece of the Stuttgart program was Bruckner's 7th Symphony. Steinberg built it up with melodic architectural girders of considerable weight. The strings were dark and expressive, and with them went a brass sound whose color was clearly determined by horns and tubas. The Boston Bruckner does without harsh contrasts, avoids sharpened dissonances as much as sentimentally pious faith in God, mystic grandeur, and false pathos....

74

Die Welt, Berlin, April 10, 1971

Prunk mit Bruckner

Tourneebeginn des Boston Symphony Orchestra

Eigenbericht der WELT

Stuttgart, 9. April

In Amerika gehen die Uhren anders. Ohne einen Pfennig Unterstützung von staatlicher Seite unternimmt zurzeit das renommierte Boston Symphony Orchestra eine dreiwöchige Tournee durch Europa. Erste Station in Deutschland — fünf weitere Städte in der Bundesrepublik folgen — war die Stuttgarter Liederhalle. Das mit einem Jahresetat von viereinhalb Millionen Dollar von privater Seite ausstaffierte Orchester ist das Resultat eines Mäzenatentums, wie es in Deutschland schon seit Auflösung der Fürstenhäuser nicht mehr existiert.

Als Henry Lee Higginson das Orchester vor knapp neunzig Jahren in Boston gründete, gab er der Institution ein Sieben-Punkte-Programm, das sich auch heute noch sehen lassen kann: Man wollte ein ständiges Orchester mit wöchentlichen Saisonkonzerten bei niedrigen Eintrittspreisen. Das Gehalt für Dirigenten und Musiker sollte vertraglich festgelegt und die Vollbeschäftigung während der ganzen Saison garantiert sein. Die Alleinverantwortung für künstlerische Dinge übertrug Higginson dem Dirigenten.

Und Dirigenten wie Arthur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Koussevitzky, Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf, seit 1969 William Steinberg haben dem Orchester Profil gegeben. 1972 wird Steinberg, heute 71 Jahre alt und gleichzeitig in Pittsburgh Chef auf Lebenszeit, das Bostoner Orchester abgeben. Favoriten für seine Nachfolge sind Abbado, Kubelik und Michael Tilson Thomas, Steinbergs Assistent, der mit seinen 26 Jahren in den USA bereits einen hervorragenden Ruf hat.

Das Stuttgarter Programm änderte Steinberg zu Ehren des toten Strawinsky. An Stelle der 3. Leonoren-Ouvertüre spielten die Amerikaner, die sich mit Strawinsky sehr verbunden fühlen, den Trauermarsch aus der „Eroica". Schon hier wurde deutlich, um welch ein außerordentliches Orchester es sich handelt. Alle Musik, die es an diesem Abend spielte, lebt von einem Cello-Baß-Fundament, wie es kein deutsches Orchester aufzuweisen hat. Ganz Ton in Ton die Klangfärbung der Blechbläser: leichter Ansatz, nie schneidend oder vordergründig die Brillanz. Für eine ausgewogene Mitte sorgen vorzüglich besetzte Holzbläser. Die Deutsche Grammophon hat bekanntlich 1969 mit dem Bostoner Orchester einen Exklusivvertrag abgeschlossen. Wenn auch der eigentliche Antrieb eine Ausweitung des amerikanischen DG-Marktanteils ist, so werden auch die deutschen Hörer von diesem Vertrag nur profitieren.

Steinberg regiert am Pult wie ein Mann alter Schule. Sparsam und doch klar in der Zeichengebung, erinnert er bisweilen in der Effektivität seiner Gestik an Knappertsbusch. Hindemiths „Bostoner Symphonie" — sie wird auch beim Hamburger Konzert der Amerikaner am 14. April neben Beethovens „Eroica" und Mozarts Linzer Sinfonie zu hören sein — kam sonor, kraftvoll kontrapunktisch, schwer und substanzgefüllt. Hindemith muß vor dieser Komposition gewußt haben, wie sich ein Streicher-Unisono bei diesem Orchester anhört.

Prunkstück des Stuttgarter Programms: Bruckners 7. Sinfonie. Steinberg baute mit melodischen Formstangen von beträchtlichem Gewicht. Dunkel und sehr expressiv die Streicher, dazu ein Bläserklang, in dem eindeutig Hörner und Tuben den Farbton bestimmen. Der Bostoner Bruckner verzichtet auf grelle Gegensätze, auf geschärfte Dissonanzen genauso wie auf frömmelndes Gottvertrauen, mystische Größe und falsch verstandenes Pathos.

Die „Bostonians" haben mehrere Gesichter. Fehlen der Konzertmeister sowie die ersten Pulte einer Stimme und steht Arthur Fiedler am Pult, dann feiert das Orchester Triumphe unter dem Namen „Boston Pops". Am 16. April ist, wie berichtet, in der Bonner Beethovenhalle ein Querschnitt aus dem Musical „Hair" zu hören. Dazu gibt es viel Prominenz und belegte Brötchen. Fiedler, 77, ist bereits Ehrenmitglied von über hundert Feuerwehrvereinigungen. Das jüngste Angebot in dieser Richtung stammt von der Freiwilligen Feuerwehr Hamburg-Sasel.

Helmut Lesch

argus Seit 1857

Ausschnitt aus: Die Welt, Hamburg

vom 10. April 1971

Auflage (l. Ts.): 280,8 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971"

DIE WELT

April 10 1971

Review by HELMUT LESCH of BSO Stuttgart program

Steinberg changed the Stuttgart program in honor of the dead Stravinsky. Instead of the 3rd Leonore overture, the Americans, who feel closely linked with Stravinsky, played the funeral march from the Eroica. Already here it was clear with how extraordinary an orchestra one was dealing. All the music it played on this evening grew from a cello and bass foundation that no German orchestra can offer. The coloration of the brass blended into the whole, lightly attacked, its brilliance never cutting or pushing into the foreground. Excellently staffed woodwinds take care of a finely balanced middle....

Steinberg reigns at the conductor's desk like a man of the old school. Economical yet clear in his signals, in the effectiveness of his gesture, he sometimes reminds one of Knappertsbusch. Hindemith's Boston Symphony...sounded sonorous, powerfully contrapuntal, weighty, and filled with substance. Before writing this composition, Hindemith must have known what a string tutti sounds like in this orchestra.

The splendid centerpiece of the Stuttgart program was Bruckner's 7th Symphony. Steinberg built it up with melodic architectural girders of considerable weight. The strings were dark and expressive, and with them went a brass sound whose color was clearly determined by horns and tubas. The Boston Bruckner does without harsh contrasts, avoids sharpened dissonances as much as sentimentally pious faith in God, mystic grandeur, and false pathos....

B E A C O N F R O M B O S T O N

The Nineth Master Concert Presents the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Besides the hundred member cast and three conductors the Boston Symphony orchestra brought for its tour through Europe, its own podium, covered with red velvet and with a wide rail, against which Artur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf may have leaned. First of all, the tradition of the Bostonians travels ahead of it like a bow wave. They are the first permanent orchestra in the US, their history is one year older than the Berlin Philharmonic. They have represented for the longest time the "American Way" in the New World.

In the Beethoven Hall of the "Stuttgarter Liederhalle" one realized right away, in the nineth master concert of this series, how much the "American Way of Music" has changed from the European, despite conductors from the Old World who have developed and formed it until today. The element of the calm, refined, graceful and amiable sound is not there, but the dry and ascetic way of the German School is missing, too. Instead the Bostonians open the heavy curtain to a resounding opulence whose richness and perfection usually can only be created on an articicial ideal stereo recording with the adulteration of ten tapes.

The Americans gave the best example in Hindemith's Konzertmusik for strings and brass, op.50, which is known in the history of music as the "Boston Symphony", because it was written for this orchestra on a commission. We are used to hearing it as a brilliant composition, to a certain extent, from local reproductions, regarding it more as one of Hindemith's "labors" than compositions. The reproduction of the Bostonians set us right. Here Hindemith sounded so suggestive, so refreshing and elegant in the rythmical suspense, so intoxicating, almost overwhelming in the orchestration that it could have been written by Leonard Bernstein during a happy hour.

Such a sound doesn't come by chance. William Steinberg, for two years now the successor to Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Bostonians, only has to administer the quality of the orchestra. When he describes his unorthodox depth circle and when he reaches into the vacuum with strong hands, he only has to mould a stream, it seems, to open a sluice here, to close one there. It will always remain firey lava: eruptive and of composite sonority of the strings, and in precious intervals the woodwinds. The horns, trombones and tubas had an unbelievable, immaculate, illuminated power, placeing the true beacons of Boston.. In view of such constant combustion one can easily get over a few effect caesuras which Steinberg used in Beethoven's "Eroica" at the begirning. He put it on the program in memoriam to Stravinsky instead of the Leonore Overture III. In Bruckner's Seventh he created a sound palace of gigantic proportions, over the base of four Wagner tubas. It is not Steinberg's style to express this always large, festive music through unwise haste or artificial theatrics, even in the Adagio which overshadowed by grief. He lets the Bostonians play like a huge organ in full force, he draws forth slower tempi not to provoke sound overlaps (the Scherzo was taken very broadly contrary to Bruckner's instructions). He doesn't smooth any dynamic reliefs. He takes the Seventh as an exercise on a musical tune which really doesn't exhaust itself in hypertrophy, but knows to be first obligated to the acustic phenomenon of a spiritual-psychic matter.

Erwin Schwarz

Eßlinger Zeitung

Samstag, 10. April 1971

Leuchtfeuer aus Boston

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra im neunten Meisterkonzert

Neben einer Hundertmannbesetzung und drei Dirigenten hatte das Bostoner Symphonieorchester für seine Europatournee auch das heimische Dirigentenpult mitgebracht, mit rotem Samt belegt und mit einem breiten Haltebügel, an den sich vielleicht schon Artur Nikisch und Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch und Erich Leinsdorf gelehnt haben dürften. Denn zunächst einmal reist den Bostonern ihre Tradition wie eine Bugwelle voraus. Sie sind das erste ständige Orchester der Vereinigten Staaten, ihre Geschichte ist ein Jahr länger als die der Berliner Philharmoniker, und sie repräsentieren im Konzertleben der Neuen Welt am längsten den „American way".

Im Beethovensaal der Stuttgarter Liederhalle wurde man sich beim neunten Abend in der Meisterkonzertreihe bewußt, wie verschieden dieser „American way of music" vom europäischen geworden ist, obwohl ihn doch Dirigenten aus der alten Welt entwickelt und bis heute geformt haben. Das Element der stillen, feinen, graziösen und liebenswürdigen Klanglichkeit fehlt ihm fast völlig, freilich auch die trockenere und asketischere Art der deutschen Schule. Statt dessen öffnen die Bostoner den schweren Vorhang zu einer klanglichen Opulenz, deren Reichtum und Perfektion ansonsten nur auf einer gekünstelten Idealstereoplatte mit zehn Tonbändern Verschnitt hergestellt werden kann.

Das frappierendste Beispiel lieferten die Amerikaner mit Hindemiths Konzertmusik für Streicher und Blechbläser op. 50, die als „Bostoner Symphony" in die Musikgeschichte eingegangen ist, weil sie als Auftragswerk für dieses Orchester komponiert wurde. Wir sind sie aus einheimischen Wiedergaben als eine halbwegs brillante Komposition gewöhnt, die mehr zu den „Arbeiten" Hindemiths als zu seinen Werken gerückt wird. Die Bostoner Wiedergabe belehrte uns eines Besseren. Hier klingt Hindemith so suggestiv im Klang, so frisch und elegant in der rhythmischen Spannung, so berauschend, ja fast lasziv in der Orchestrierung, daß sie in einer glücklichen Stunde Leonard Bernstein aus der Feder geflossen sein könnte.

Solche Klangpracht kommt nicht von ungefähr. William Steinberg, seit zwei Jahren als Nachfolger Leinsdorfs Chefdirigent der Bostoner, hat diese Eigenwertigkeit des Orchesters fast nur zu verwalten. Wenn er seine unorthodoxen Tiefenkreise beschreibt und mit kräftiger Hand in den Luftraum vor sich greift, scheint er nur einen Strom modellieren zu müssen, hier eine Schleuse zu öffnen, dort zu schließen. Feurige Lava bleibt es immer: eruptiv und von geballter Sonorität die Streicher, kostbar gestuft die Holzbläser und von unglaublicher, makelloser Leuchtkraft die Hörner, Posaunen und Tuben. Sie setzen die eigentlichen Leuchtfeuer von Boston. Angesichts von solchem Dauerbrand lassen sich etliche Effektzäsuren leichter verschmerzen, die William Steinberg eingangs in den Trauermarsch aus Beethovens Eroica setzte, die er in memoriam Igor Strawinski anstelle der vorgesehenen dritten Leonorenouvertüre auf das Programm gesetzt hatte. Bei Bruckners Siebter war über dem Fundament von vier Wagner-Tuben ein Klangpalast von gigantischen Ausmaßen errichtet. Steinbergs Art ist es nicht, diese große, selbst in dem von Trauer überschatteten Adagio immer festliche Musik durch unverständige Hast oder erkünstelte Theatralik zu veräußerlichen. Er läßt die Bostoner musizieren wie eine große Orgel mit vollem Werk, zieht bedächtige Tempi vor, um keine Klangüberlagerungen zu provozieren (sehr breit angelegt war das Scherzo im Gegensatz zu Bruckners Vorschrift), ebnet keine dynamischen Höhenunterschiede ein und versteht die Siebte als Aufgabenstellung für eine Musizierweise, die sich zwar nicht in klanglicher Hypertrophie erschöpft, aber sich doch dem akustischen Erscheinungsbild einer geistig-seelischen Angelegenheit primär verpflichtet weiß.

Erwin Schwarz

argus Seit 1857 — Auflage (l. Ts.): 5,7 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971" —

Ausschnitt aus:

Nord-Stuttgarter-Rundschau, Stuttgart-Zuffenhausen

vom 10. April 1971

argus Seit 1857 — Auflage (l. Ts.): 14,0 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971" —

Ausschnitt aus:

Cannstatter Zeitung, Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt

vom 10. April 1971

T R A C E F R O M B O S T O N

The Ninth Master Concert presents the Boston Symphony Orchestra

In [illegible] and three conductors the Boston [illegible] for its tour through Europe, its own podium, [illegible] rail, against which Artur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf may have leaned. First of all, the tradition of the Bostonians travels ahead of it like a bow wave. They are the first permanent orchestra in the US, their history is one year older than the Berlin Philharmonic. They have represented for the longest time the "American Way" in the New World.

In the Beethoven Hall of the "Stuttgarter Liederhalle" one realized right away, in the nineth master concert of this series, how much the "American Way of Music" has changed from the European, despite conductors from the old World who have developed and formed it until today. The element of the calm, refined, graceful and amiable sound is not there, but the dry and ascetic way of the German School is missing, too. Instead the Bostonians open the heavy curtain to a resounding opulence whose richness and perfection usually can only be created on an articicial ideal stereo recording with the adulteration of ten tapes.

The Americans gave the best example in Hindemith's Konzertmusik for strings and brass, op.50, which is known in the history of music as the "Boston Symphony", because it was written for this orchestra on a commission. We are used to hearing it as a brilliant composition, to a certain extent, from local reproductions, regarding it more as one of Hindemith's "labors" than compositions. The reproduction of the Bostonians set us right. Here Hindemith sounded so suggestive, so refreshing and elegant in the rythmical suspense, so intoxicating, almost overwhelming in the orchestration that it could have been written by Leonard Bernstein during a happy hour.

Such a sound doesn't come by chance. William Steinberg, for two years now the successor to Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Bostonians, only has to administer the quality of the orchestra. When he describes his unorthodox depth circle and when he reaches into the vacuum with strong hands, he only has to mould a stream, it seems, to open a sluice here, to close one there. It will always remain firey lava: eruptive and of composite sonority of the strings, and in precious intervals the woodwinds. The horns, trombones and tubas had an unbelievable, immaculate, illuminated power, placeing the true beacons of Boston.. In view of such constant combustion one can easily get over a few effect caesuras which Steinberg used in Beethoven's "Eroica" at the beginning. He put it on the program in reporian to Stravinsky instead of the Leonore Overture III. In Bruckner's Seventh he created a sound palace of gigantic proportions, over the base of four Wagner tubas. It is not Steinberg's style to express this always large, festive music through unwise haste or artificial theatrics, even in the Adagio which overshadowed by grief. He lets the Bostonians play like a huge organ in full force, he draws forth slower tempi not to provoke sound overlays (the Scherzo was taken very broadly contrary to Bruckner's instructions). He doesn't smooth any dynamic reliefs. He takes the Seventh as an exercise on a musical tune which really doesn't exhaust itself in hypertrophy, but knows to be first obligated to the acustic phenomenon of a spiritual-psychic matter.

Erwin Schwarz

Eßlinger Zeitung

Samstag, 10. April 1971

Leuchtfeuer aus Boston

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra im neunten Meisterkonzert

Neben einer Hundertmannbesetzung und drei Dirigenten hatte das Bostoner Symphonieorchester für seine Europatournee auch das heimische Dirigentenpult mitgebracht, mit rotem Samt belegt und mit einem breiten Haltebügel, an den sich vielleicht schon Artur Nikisch und Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch und Erich Leinsdorf gelehnt haben dürften. Denn zunächst einmal reist den Bostonern ihre Tradition wie eine Bugwelle voraus. Sie sind das erste ständige Orchester der Vereinigten Staaten, ihre Geschichte ist ein Jahr länger als die der Berliner Philharmoniker, und sie repräsentieren im Konzertleben der Neuen Welt am längsten den „American way".

Im Beethovensaal der Stuttgarter Liederhalle wurde man sich beim neunten Abend in der Meisterkonzertreihe bewußt, wie verschieden dieser „American way of music" vom europäischen geworden ist, obwohl ihn doch Dirigenten aus der alten Welt entwickelt und bis heute geformt haben. Das Element der stillen, feinen, graziösen und liebenswürdigen Klanglichkeit fehlt ihm fast völlig, freilich auch die trockenere und asketischere Art der deutschen Schule. Statt dessen öffnen die Bostoner den schweren Vorhang zu einer klanglichen Opulenz, deren Reichtum und Perfektion ansonsten nur auf einer gekünstelten Idealstereoplatte mit zehn Tonbändern Verschnitt hergestellt werden kann.

Das frappierendste Beispiel lieferten die Amerikaner mit Hindemiths Konzertmusik für Streicher und Blechbläser op. 50, die als „Bostoner Symphony" in die Musikgeschichte eingegangen ist, weil sie als Auftragswerk für dieses Orchester komponiert wurde. Wir sind sie aus einheimischen Wiedergaben als eine halbwegs brillante Komposition gewöhnt, die mehr zu den „Arbeiten" Hindemiths als zu seinen Werken gerückt wird. Die Bostoner Wiedergabe belehrte uns eines Besseren. Hier klingt Hindemith so suggestiv im Klang, so frisch und elegant in der rhythmischen Spannung, so berauschend, ja fast lasziv in der Orchestrierung, daß sie in einer glücklichen Stunde Leonard Bernstein aus der Feder geflossen sein könnte.

Solche Klangpracht kommt nicht von ungefähr. William Steinberg, seit zwei Jahren als Nachfolger Leinsdorfs Chefdirigent der Bostoner, hat diese Eigenwertigkeit des Orchesters fast nur zu verwalten. Wenn er seine unorthodoxen Tiefenkreise beschreibt und mit kräftiger Hand in den Luftraum vor sich greift, scheint er nur einen Strom modellieren zu müssen, hier eine Schleuse zu öffnen, dort zu schließen. Feurige Lava bleibt es immer: eruptiv und von geballter Sonorität die Streicher, kostbar gestuft die Holzbläser und von unglaublicher, makelloser Leuchtkraft die Hörner, Posaunen und Tuben. Sie setzen die eigentlichen Leuchtfeuer von Boston. Angesichts von solchem Dauerbrand lassen sich etliche Effektzäsuren leichter verschmerzen, die William Steinberg eingangs in den Trauermarsch aus Beethovens Eroica setzte, die er in memoriam Igor Strawinski anstelle der vorgesehenen dritten Leonorenouvertüre auf das Programm gesetzt hatte. Bei Bruckners Siebter war über dem Fundament von vier Wagner-Tuben ein Klangpalast von gigantischen Ausmaßen errichtet. Steinbergs Art ist es nicht, diese große, selbst in dem von Trauer überschatteten Adagio immer festliche Musik durch unverständige Hast oder erkünstelte Theatralik zu veräußerlichen. Er läßt die Bostoner musizieren wie eine große Orgel mit vollem Werk, zieht bedächtige Tempi vor, um keine Klangüberlagerungen zu provozieren (sehr breit angelegt war das Scherzo im Gegensatz zu Bruckners Vorschrift), ebnet keine dynamischen Höhenunterschiede ein und versteht die Siebte als Aufgabenstellung für eine Musizierweise, die sich zwar nicht in klanglicher Hypertrophie erschöpft, aber sich doch dem akustischen Erscheinungsbild einer geistig-seelischen Angelegenheit primär verpflichtet weiß.

Erwin Schwarz

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 5,7 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971" —

Ausschnitt aus:

Nord-Stuttgarter-Rundschau, Stuttgart-Zuffenhausen

vom 10. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 14,0 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971" —

Ausschnitt aus:

Cannstatter Zeitung, Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt

vom 10. April 1971

76

Stephen Wright
Karl-Marx-Allee
611

Süddeutsche Zeitung

Amerika exportiert Bruckner

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra begann seine Europatournee in Stuttgart

Zum neunzigsten Geburtstag leistet sich das Boston Symphony Orchestra eine Europareise. Auf eigene Rechnung und ohne Staatsgelder fliegt und fährt man mit dem ganzen Orchester, drei Dirigenten, dem hochtourigen Publicity-Apparat der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft, den einheimischen Managern und Betreuern, den Musikkritikern sämtlicher Bostoner Blätter und mit vierzig der privaten Mäzene. Als Außenpunkte werden London, Paris, Rom und Barcelona angesteuert; das Hauptziel sind sechs deutsche Städte, darunter Bonn, Wuppertal und Hannover, aber nicht München, wo sich zwar für jedes barockisierende Zirp- und Zupfgrüppchen ein Saal und ein Veranstalter finden, nicht jedoch für eines der ersten Orchester der Welt. (Die Bostoner sind 1956 unter Charles Münch hier gewesen; das genügt vorläufig.) Der erste Abend der Deutschlandtournee ereignete sich in der Stuttgarter Liederhalle.

Das Konzert begann mit dem, womit ein Konzert nur in Ausnahmefällen anfangen darf: mit einer Rede. Durch Strawinskys Tod war der Sonderfall gegeben. William Steinberg, Kölner des Jahrgangs 1899 und Bostons Orchesterchef seit 1968, rühmte Strawinsky als Freund der Bostoner (Uraufführung der Psalmensymphonie), als Gestalt unseres Jahrhunderts und als „eine der größten Erscheinungen der Musikgeschichte überhaupt". Der Trauermarsch aus der Eroica setzte ein und wurde beinahe das Kernstück des Konzerts. Nach dieser Beethoven-Aufführung verflüchtigte sich die Legende, amerikanische Orchester hätten nur Technik und keine Seele. Verhalten im Ausdruck tränenloser Trauer, durch ein unerbittlich schreitendes Grundtempo zusammengehalten, bewegte sich der Kondukt. Ohne aufgebrachte Dramatik in der Durchführung, noch im Maggiore-Teil vom Moll überschattet, durchzogen von der Klangintensität eines Solo-Oboers, dem allenfalls der Kollege vom Cleveland Orchestra das Wasser reichen kann. Alles vollzog sich unauffällig, mit jener Diskretion des Wesentlichen, wie sie Meistern von der Hand geht, denen Effekt, Auslegungsfinessen und ähnliche Rattenfängereien längst schal und töricht geworden sind.

POMPÖSE WÜRDE DES BLECHS

Hindemiths Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser, für ein Jubiläum der Bostoner komponiert, klingt durchwegs fad und nach Routinearbeit, wenn man sie von einem anderen Orchester hört als von dem, für das sie bestimmt ist. Die langen Unisono-Passagen sind nur in Bostoner Ausführung verständlich. Sie dienen der schier unvergleichlichen Wucht, Fülle und Präzision dieses Orchesters, seiner breiten Kraft des Tones, dem vollen Timbre der unüberbietbaren Violoncell-Gruppe, dem Volumen der von Joseph Silverstein geführten Primgeigen und der pompösen Würde des Blechs. Die Akustik des Beethovensaals der Liederhalle faßte die Parade orchestraler Tugenden in einen Prachtrahmen.

Die Bostoner spielten als Haupt- und Schlußstück Bruckners Siebente. Für diese auf Stuttgart beschränkte Programmnummer wurden eigens Tuba-Bläser eingeflogen. Zum ersten Male dürfte sich ein amerikanisches Orchester in Europa mit einer Bruckner-Symphonie vorgestellt haben. Bruckner war bis vor kurzer Zeit in den USA ein belächelter „boche"; das Ressort für tiefschürfende Monstersymphonik hatte der neuerdings abgewertete Sibelius inne. Nun exportiert man Bruckner. Das nimmt sich aus, als habe ein französisches Dreisterne-Restaurant Geselchtes, Kartoffelknödel und Maibock zur sensationellen Spezialität erhoben.

Selbstverständlich nahm man die Schalk-Fassung. Der Beckenschlag strahlte wie einst unter Knappertsbusch. Das Triangel, das dabei für gewöhnlich an die Wand gedrückt wird, war trotzdem klar zu hören. Steinberg sieht die Siebente als riesiges Konzertstück für fünf Tuben und großes Orchester. Der Klang der Wagner-Tuben, zwischen multipliziertem Horn und vorzeitlichem Mannenzug, war der Angelpunkt des Werkes. Mit Recht, denn es bliesen Spezialisten des sauberen Ansatzes, des samtigen Pianissimo und der niemals grobschlächtigen Wucht. Sie waren die phonstärksten Exponenten des Aufführungsstils: ausmusizierter, voller und expressiver Klang, breitgezogen, plastisch, auf die Kontur des Thematischen abgestellt.

William Steinberg stand auf dem Podium als einer der Letzten aus der guten alten Schule, ruhig, uneitel, autoritär aus Überlegenheit. Welch ein Gruß aus besseren Zeiten, einen Dirigenten sehen zu können, der mit Augenzeichen und Taktstockspitze auskommt und die Unsitte beidarmiger Gymnastik selbst bei heiklen Bläsereinsätzen nicht nötig hat. Welch ein Triumph manueller Technik, als Steinberg mit der Rechten eine Kantilene der Violoncelli aufheizte und mit dem kleinen Finger der Linken die Einsätze für die Hörner gab. Steinbergs Besonderheit ist der Diagonalschlag, mit dem Taktstock von links oben bis fast zur Fußspitze rechts. Aber wenn es brenzlig wird, wendet er die fast sadistische Praktik à la Fritz Reiner an: Er schlägt ganz klein und zwingt dadurch das Orchester, sich auf die Taktstockspitze zu konzentrieren. Damit ist an die Frage gerührt, ob das Boston Symphony Orchestra unfehlbar sei. Es ist dies — Gott sei dank! nicht. Es wurde beim Bruckner-Finale etwas müde. Es spielen herrliche, selbstbewußte Musiker, keine Roboter des Bürokraten-Ideals der schonungslosen Präzision. Sie sind ein Orchester des vollen Klanges: musizierende Rubens-Naturen, Fetischisten des Wohllauts, Herren und (auffallend wenige) Damen, in denen so etwas wie ein „Urbehaben" am großen Ton lebt.

Steinberg, drahtig, bestimmt und alterlos, wirkt wie der Chef eines Stahlkonzerns, der aus tiefem Mißtrauen gegen Waffen keine Kanonen gießen möchte. Der Sarkasmus, mit dem er über das Geschäft des Dirigierens spricht, ließe Schopenhauer und Karl Kraus erbleichen. Er arbeitet einem Steinberg-Mythos entgegen, als handle es sich um üble Nachrede. Auch am Pult, wo er nichts auskostet oder aufbauscht, nicht einmal die Luftpausen, in denen bekanntlich nichts schiefgehen kann. Fast ärgerlich ist er darum besorgt, daß es weitergeht; mit Vorliebe zieht er einen neuen Themenbeginn schon unter das Ende des vorherigen Themas. Er dirigiert episch, nicht dramatisch. Er „erzählt" Beethoven und Bruckner. Das unterscheidet ihn am Ende doch von dem, an den er in vielerlei Betracht erinnert: von Hans Knappertsbusch.

DER BERNSTEIN DER SIEBZIGER JAHRE

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra, privates Unternehmen mit einem Jahresetat von 4,5 Millionen Dollar, lanciert in einigen Tourneestädten seinen „associate conducter", den 26jährigen Michael Tilson Thomas. Er scheint der Typus des modernen Kronprinzen zu sein, hin und her gerissen zwischen Sensibilität, Show und Ehrgeiz. Jedenfalls lassen das seine ersten Schallplatten (Tschaikowsky, Ives) vermuten. Er wird als „Bernstein der siebziger Jahre" verzückt gerühmt. Die Photos auf den Plattentaschen zeigen einen schweißgebadeten Nervendämon, der sich mit knapper Mühe ins Atonale gerettet hat. In Wahrheit ist Mr. Thomas ein ebenso sensitiver wie cleverer junger Mann, gepflegt und unhysterisch, dazu von vielversprechender russischer Abkunft. Der dritte Bostoner Dirigent — er zeigt sich nur in Bonn —, der 75jährige Arthur Fiedler, ist Leiter der Boston Pops Konzerte, die von April bis Juni in der zum Restaurant umfunktionierten Bostoner Konzerthalle vor sich gehen, Programme von Mozart bis „Hair" bringen und das Orchester ohne die Virtuosen von den ersten Pulten aufbieten. Die Bostoner bringen es im Jahr auf etwa 160 Konzerte, meist in ihrer Ein-Millionen-Stadt und beim Festival in Tanglewood.

Ein Novum ist, daß das Boston Symphony Orchestra neuerdings als erstes amerikanisches Orchester exklusiv bei einer deutschen Schallplattenfirma unter Vertrag steht. Die Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft weiß diesen Einbruch in USA-Reservate zu würdigen; sie startete die Deutschland-Tournee, als handle es sich um das wichtigste Ereignis seit der Landung des Columbus. Die Liaison ist ein phonodiplomatischer Schachzug: gründlicher Einbruch in den amerikanischen Plattenmarkt. Zum zweiten ist sie Ersatz für den der Firma weitgehend verlorengegangenen Karajan. Zum dritten Gewinn eines idealen Produktionslokals, denn in der Boston Symphony Hall (2600 Sitze) läßt sich sogar eine Duosonate von Debussy klangschön aufzeichnen, ebenso die Intimkunst der Boston Chamber Players. Schon knüpfen sich enge Bande mit der Stadt des Teesturms. Rafael Kubelik, Claudio Abbado, Christoph Eschenbach und weitere „Hiesige" sind bereits in die Schallplattenstrategie einbezogen. Die Deutschland-Tournee der Bostoner besiegelt konzertant, was musikpolitisch eingefädelt wurde. Ein Beispiel, aber ein künstlerisch ergiebiges, für die zeitgemäße Dreieinigkeit von Musik, Kommerz und Wirbel.

KARL SCHUMANN

SYNCHRONISIERT

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (l. Ts.): 269,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Süddeutsche Zeitung, München
vom 29. April 1971

Briefe an die Süddeutsche Zeitung

Statt der Bostoner die Wiener

In dem Artikel „Amerika exportiert Bruckner" über die Europa-Tournee des Boston Symphony Orchestra (SZ vom 10./11./12. 4.) schreibt Herr Dr. Karl Schumann, daß sich in München kein Veranstalter für ein Konzert des Orchesters gefunden habe. Diese Feststellung ist unrichtig.

Im Januar 1970 wurde uns ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in München am 19. April 1971 verbindlich bestätigt. Im Spätsommer 1970 erhielten wir von dem für die Organisation der Europa-Tournee zuständigen Management die Nachricht, daß das Konzert am 19. April abgesagt werden müsse. Der Grund sei der schlechte Gesundheitszustand von William Steinberg, der eine völlige Umdisposition und Verkürzung der Tournee erforderlich mache. Wir versuchten mit allen Mitteln, das Münchner Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra doch noch zu „retten". Wir erklärten uns damit einverstanden, daß das Konzert von Michael Tilson Thomas an Stelle von William Steinberg dirigiert würde, aber auch das ließ sich nicht realisieren.

Prozesse ersetzen keine Konzerte. Wir haben uns deshalb um Ersatz bemüht, und wir glauben, mit den beiden Konzerten der Wiener Philharmoniker unter Leitung von Leonard Bernstein (ursprünglich war nur ein Konzert geplant) eine gute Lösung gefunden zu haben.

Dr. Göhre
Concerto C. W. Winderstein
München 22, Steinsdorfstraße 1

translation of article on following page

translation of letter

INSTEAD OF THE BOSTONIANS, THE VIENNESE.

Herr Dr. Karl Schumann writes in the article "America Exports Bruckner" about the European tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (S.Z. from April 10/11/12) that there was no manager to be found for a concert of this orchestra in Munich. This statement is wrong.

In January of 1970 a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Munich was contracted for the 19th of April, 1971. In late summer of 1970 we received the news from the management responsible for the European tour of this organization that the concert for April 19 had to be cancelled. The reason was supposedly the poor health of William Steinberg which made it necessary to change completely and abbreviate the tour. We left no stone unturned to save the Munich concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We agreed that Michael Tilson Thomas would conduct the concert instead of William Steinberg, but even this could not be put into certainty.

Lawsuits do not replace concerts. Therefore we tried to find a substitute and we believe that we have found a good solution with the two concerts by the Vienna Philharmonic, under the direction of Leonard Bernstein (originally only one concert was planned).

Dr. Göhre
Concerto C.W.Winderstein
Munich 22, Steinsdorfst. 1

76

Süddeutsche Zeitung

Amerika exportiert Bruckner

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra begann seine Europatournee in Stuttgart

Zum neunzigsten Geburtstag leistet sich das Boston Symphony Orchestra eine Europareise. Auf eigene Rechnung und ohne Staatsgelder fliegt und fährt man mit dem ganzen Orchester, drei Dirigenten, dem hochtourigen Publicity-Apparat der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft, den einheimischen Managern und Betreuern, den Musikkritikern sämtlicher Bostoner Blätter und mit vierzig der privaten Mäzene. Als Außenpunkte werden London, Paris, Rom und Barcelona angesteuert; das Hauptziel sind sechs deutsche Städte, darunter Bonn, Wuppertal und Hannover, aber nicht München, wo sich zwar für jedes barockisierende Zirp- und Zupfgrüppchen ein Saal und ein Veranstalter finden, nicht jedoch für eines der ersten Orchester der Welt. (Die Bostoner sind 1956 unter Charles Münch hier gewesen; das genügt vorläufig.) Der erste Abend der Deutschlandtournee ereignete sich in der Stuttgarter Liederhalle.

Das Konzert begann mit dem, womit ein Konzert nur in Ausnahmefällen anfangen darf: mit einer Rede. Durch Strawinskys Tod war der Sonderfall gegeben. William Steinberg, Kölner des Jahrgangs 1899 und Bostons Orchesterchef seit 1968, rühmte Strawinsky als Freund der Bostoner (Uraufführung der Psalmensymphonie), als Gestalt unseres Jahrhunderts und als „eine der größten Erscheinungen der Musikgeschichte überhaupt". Der Trauermarsch aus der Eroica setzte ein und wurde beinahe das Kernstück des Konzerts. Nach dieser Beethoven-Aufführung verflüchtigte sich die Legende, amerikanische Orchester hätten nur Technik und keine Seele. Verhalten im Ausdruck tränenloser Trauer, durch ein unerbittlich schreitendes Grundtempo zusammengehalten, bewegte sich der Kondukt. Ohne aufgebrachte Dramatik in der Durchführung, noch im Maggiore-Teil vom Moll überschattet, durchzogen von der Klangintensität eines Solo-Oboers, dem allenfalls der Kollege vom Cleveland Orchestra das Wasser reichen kann. Alles vollzog sich unauffällig, mit jener Diskretion des Wesentlichen, wie sie Meistern von der Hand geht, denen Effekt, Auslegungsfinessen und ähnliche Rattenfängereien längst schal und töricht geworden sind.

POMPÖSE WÜRDE DES BLECHS

Hindemiths Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser, für ein Jubiläum der Bostoner komponiert, klingt durchwegs fad und nach Routinearbeit, wenn man sie von einem anderen Orchester hört als von dem, für das sie bestimmt ist. Die langen Unisono-Passagen sind nur in Bostoner Ausführung verständlich. Sie dienen der schier unvergleichlichen Wucht, Fülle und Präzision dieses Orchesters, seiner breiten Kraft des Tones, dem vollen Timbre der unüberbietbaren Violoncell-Gruppe, dem Volumen der von Joseph Silverstein geführten Primgeigen und der pompösen Würde des Blechs. Die Akustik des Beethovensaals der Liederhalle faßte die Parade orchestraler Tugenden in einen Prachtrahmen.

Die Bostoner spielten als Haupt- und Schlußstück Bruckners Siebente. Für diese auf Stuttgart beschränkte Programmnummer wurden eigens Tuba-Bläser eingeflogen. Zum ersten Male dürfte sich ein amerikanisches Orchester in Europa mit einer Bruckner-Symphonie vorgestellt haben. Bruckner war bis vor kurzer Zeit in den USA ein belächelter „boche"; das Ressort für tiefschürfende Monstersymphonik hatte der neuerdings abgewertete Sibelius inne. Nun exportiert man Bruckner. Das nimmt sich aus, als habe ein französisches Dreisterne-Restaurant Geselchtes, Kartoffelknödel und Maibock zur sensationellen Spezialität erhoben.

Selbstverständlich nahm man die Schalk-Fassung. Der Beckenschlag strahlte wie einst unter Knappertsbusch. Das Triangel, das dabei für gewöhnlich an die Wand gedrückt wird, war trotzdem klar zu hören. Steinberg sieht die Siebente als riesiges Konzertstück für fünf Tuben und großes Orchester. Der Klang der Wagner-Tuben, zwischen multipliziertem Horn und vorzeitlichem Mannenzug, war der Angelpunkt des Werkes. Mit Recht, denn es bliesen Spezialisten des sauberen Ansatzes, des samtigen Pianissimo und der niemals grobschlächtigen Wucht. Sie waren die phonstärksten Exponenten des Aufführungsstils: ausmusizierter, voller und expressiver Klang, breitgezogen, plastisch, auf die Kontur des Thematischen abgestellt.

William Steinberg stand auf dem Podium als einer der Letzten aus der guten alten Schule, ruhig, uneitel, autoritär aus Überlegenheit. Welch ein Gruß aus besseren Zeiten, einen Dirigenten sehen zu können, der mit Augenzeichen und Taktstockspitze auskommt und die Unsitte beidarmiger Gymnastik selbst bei heiklen Bläsereinsätzen nicht nötig hat. Welch ein Triumph manueller Technik, als Steinberg mit der Rechten eine Kantilene der Violoncelli aufheizte und mit dem kleinen Finger der Linken die Einsätze für die Hörner gab. Steinbergs Besonderheit ist der Diagonalschlag, mit dem Taktstock von links oben bis fast zur Fußspitze rechts. Aber wenn es brenzlig wird, wendet er die fast sadistische Praktik à la Fritz Reiner an: Er schlägt ganz klein und zwingt dadurch das Orchester, sich auf die Taktstockspitze zu konzentrieren. Damit ist an die Frage gerührt, ob das Boston Symphony Orchestra unfehlbar sei. Es ist dies — Gott sei dank! nicht. Es wurde beim Bruckner-Finale etwas müde. Es spielen herrliche, selbstbewußte Musiker, keine Roboter des Bürokraten-Ideals der schonungslosen Präzision. Sie sind ein Orchester des vollen Klanges: musizierende Rubens-Naturen, Fetischisten des Wohllauts, Herren und (auffallend wenige) Damen, in denen so etwas wie ein „Urbehaben" am großen Ton lebt.

Steinberg, drahtig, bestimmt und alterlos, wirkt wie der Chef eines Stahlkonzerns, der aus tiefem Mißtrauen gegen Waffen keine Kanonen gießen möchte. Der Sarkasmus, mit dem er über das Geschäft des Dirigierens spricht, ließe Schopenhauer und Karl Kraus erbleichen. Er arbeitet einem Steinberg-Mythos entgegen, als handle es sich um üble Nachrede. Auch am Pult, wo er nichts auskostet oder aufbauscht, nicht einmal die Luftpausen, in denen bekanntlich nichts schiefgehen kann. Fast ärgerlich ist er darum besorgt, daß es weitergeht; mit Vorliebe zieht er einen neuen Themenbeginn schon unter das Ende des vorherigen Themas. Er dirigiert episch, nicht dramatisch. Er „erzählt" Beethoven und Bruckner. Das unterscheidet ihn am Ende doch von dem, an den er in vielerlei Betracht erinnert: von Hans Knappertsbusch.

DER BERNSTEIN DER SIEBZIGER JAHRE

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra, privates Unternehmen mit einem Jahresetat von 4,5 Millionen Dollar, lanciert in einigen Tourneestädten seinen „associate conducter", den 26jährigen Michael Tilson Thomas. Er scheint der Typus des modernen Kronprinzen zu sein, hin und her gerissen zwischen Sensibilität, Show und Ehrgeiz. Jedenfalls lassen das seine ersten Schallplatten (Tschaikowsky, Ives) vermuten. Er wird als „Bernstein der siebziger Jahre" verzückt gerühmt. Die Photos auf den Plattentaschen zeigen einen schweißgebadeten Nervendämon, der sich mit knapper Mühe ins Atonale gerettet hat. In Wahrheit ist Mr. Thomas ein ebenso sensitiver wie cleverer junger Mann, gepflegt und unhysterisch, dazu von vielversprechender russischer Abkunft. Der dritte Bostoner Dirigent — er zeigt sich nur in Bonn —, der 75jährige Arthur Fiedler, ist Leiter der Boston Pops Konzerte, die von April bis Juni in der zum Restaurant umfunktionierten Bostoner Konzerthalle vor sich gehen, Programme von Mozart bis „Hair" bringen und das Orchester ohne die Virtuosen von den ersten Pulten aufbieten. Die Bostoner bringen es im Jahr auf etwa 160 Konzerte, meist in ihrer Ein-Millionen-Stadt und beim Festival in Tanglewood.

Ein Novum ist, daß das Boston Symphony Orchestra neuerdings als erstes amerikanisches Orchester exklusiv bei einer deutschen Schallplattenfirma unter Vertrag steht. Die Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft weiß diesen Einbruch in USA-Reservate zu würdigen; sie startete die Deutschland-Tournee, als handle es sich um das wichtigste Ereignis seit der Landung des Columbus. Die Liaison ist ein phonodiplomatischer Schachzug: gründlicher Einbruch in den amerikanischen Plattenmarkt. Zum zweiten ist sie Ersatz für den der Firma weitgehend verlorengegangenen Karajan. Zum dritten Gewinn eines idealen Produktionslokals, denn in der Boston Symphony Hall (2600 Sitze) läßt sich sogar eine Duosonate von Debussy klangschön aufzeichnen, ebenso die Intimkunst der Boston Chamber Players. Schon knüpfen sich enge Bande mit der Stadt des Teesturms. Rafael Kubelik, Claudio Abbado, Christoph Eschenbach und weitere „Hiesige" sind bereits in die Schallplattenstrategie einbezogen. Die Deutschland-Tournee der Bostoner besiegelt konzertant, was musikpolitisch eingefädelt wurde. Ein Beispiel, aber ein künstlerisch ergiebiges, für die zeitgemäße Dreieinigkeit von Musik, Kommerz und Wirbel.

KARL SCHUMANN

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (l. Ts.): 269,5 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus: Süddeutsche Zeitung, München

vom 29. April 1971

Briefe an die Süddeutsche Zeitung

Statt der Bostoner die Wiener

In dem Artikel „Amerika exportiert Bruckner" über die Europa-Tournee des Boston Symphony Orchestra (SZ vom 10./11./12. 4.) schreibt Herr Dr. Karl Schumann, daß sich in München kein Veranstalter für ein Konzert des Orchesters gefunden habe. Diese Feststellung ist unrichtig.

Im Januar 1970 wurde uns ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in München am 19. April 1971 verbindlich bestätigt. Im Spätsommer 1970 erhielten wir von dem für die Organisation der Europa-Tournee zuständigen Management die Nachricht, daß das Konzert am 19. April abgesagt werden müsse. Der Grund sei der schlechte Gesundheitszustand von William Steinberg, der eine völlige Umdisposition und Verkürzung der Tournee erforderlich mache. Wir versuchten mit allen Mitteln, das Münchner Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra doch noch zu „retten". Wir erklärten uns damit einverstanden, daß das Konzert von Michael Tilson Thomas an Stelle von William Steinberg dirigiert würde, aber auch das ließ sich nicht realisieren.

Prozesse ersetzen keine Konzerte. Wir haben uns deshalb um Ersatz bemüht, und wir glauben, mit den beiden Konzerten der Wiener Philharmoniker unter Leitung von Leonard Bernstein (ursprünglich war nur ein Konzert geplant) eine gute Lösung gefunden zu haben.

Dr. Göhre
Concerto C. W. Winderstein
München 22, Steinsdorfstraße 1

translation of article on following page

translation of letter

INSTEAD OF THE BOSTONIANS, THE VIENNESE.

Herr Dr. Karl Schumann writes in the article "America Exports Bruckner" about the European tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (S.Z. from April 10/11/12) that there was no manager to be found for a concert of this orchestra in Munich. This statement is wrong.

In January of 1970 a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Munich was contracted for the 19th of April, 1971. In late summer of 1970 we received the news from the management responsible for the European tour of this organization that the concert for April 19 had to be cancelled. The reason was supposedly the poor health of William Steinberg which made it necessary to change completely and abbreviate the tour. We left no stone unturned to save the Munich concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We agreed that Michael Tilson Thomas would conduct the concert instead of William Steinberg, but even this could not be put into certainty.

Lawsuits do not replace concerts. Therefore we tried to find a substitute and we believe that we have found a good solution with the two concerts by the Vienna Philharmonic, under the direction of Leonard Bernstein (originally only one concert was planned).

Dr. Göhre
Concerto C.W.Winderstein
Munich 22, Steinsdorfst. 1

SÜDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG

April 10-12, 1971

Review by KARL SCHUMANN of BSO Stuttgart concert

...The concert began with that with which a concert begins only in exceptional cases: a speech. Stravinsky's death provided the occasion...the Funeral March from the Eroica began and became almost the core of the concert. After this Beethoven performance, the preconception disappeared that American orchestras are all technique and no soul. Restrained in its expression of dignified mourning, integrated through a relentlessly forward moving basic tempo, the procession moved along. Without exaggerated dynamics in the development, a shadow of the minor still remaining in the "maggiore" section, supported by the tonal intensity of a solo oboist fully the equal of his Cleveland colleague, everything proceeded without calling attention to itself, and with that subtle insistence on essentials that comes only from the hands of masters to whom effect for its own sake, over-precious subtleties, and such popular effects have long become empty and worthless.

Hindemith's Concert music for strings and brass, composed for one of the Bostonians' anniversary occasions, sounds tired and routine whenever one hears it played by an orchestra other than the one for which it was written. The long unison passages can be understood only in the Boston performance. They show off the absolutely incomparable power, fullness, and precision of this orchestra, its broad strength of tone, the rich timbre of its unsurpassable cello section, the power of the first violins as led by Joseph Silverstein, and the magnificent dignity of the brass. The acoustics of the Beethoven Room of the Liederhalle framed in splendor this parade of orchestral virtues.

As the main, and final, work, the Bostonians played Bruckner's 7th. Tuba players were specially flown in for this program item, which was played only in Stuttgart. It must have been the first time an American orchestra introduced itself in Europe with a Bruckner symphony. Until recently, Bruckner in the USA was regarded as a "kraut" to be patronized, the "deeply probing and gigantic" symphony department having been monopolized by the recently devaluated Sibelius. It is as though a French three-star restaurant had elevated boiled beef, potato dumplings, and bock beer to a sensational specialty.

Naturally the Schalk edition was used. The cymbal clash shone as it used to under Knappertsbusch. The triangle, which usually gets slammed against the wall by the cymbal, was instead clearly to be heard. Steinberg sees the symphony as a gigantic concert piece for five tubas and large orchestra. The sound of the Wagner tubas, somewhe between multiple horns and prehistoric warriors, was the cornerstone of the work. Rightly so, for the playing was done by specialists of clean entrances, velvety pianissimos, and the avoidance of rough power. They were the most powerfully sonorous exponents of this style of performance, a completely musical, full, and expressive sound, broadly drawn, three-dimensional, and adjusted to the contours of the themes.

William Steinberg stood on the podium like one of the last of the good old school of conductors, quiet, modest, his authority stemming from superiority. How it harks back to better times to be able to watch a conductor whose cues come from his eyes and from the tip of his baton and who, even at tricky brass entrances, does not need to resort to unmannerly two-armed gymnastics! What a triumph of baton technique it was when Steinberg increased the sound of a cello cantilena with his right hand gave the horns a cue with the little finger of his left. Steinberg's specialty is a diagonal beat with his baton, moving from the up left to the tip of his right shoe. But when things get heated he turns to Fritz Reiner's almost sadistic tactics: his beat gets very small and it forces the orchestra to concentrate on the point of his stick. That brings us to the question as to whether the Boston Symphony is infallible: That, thank God, it is not. It became a little tired during the Bruckner finale. The playing is done by magnificent, confident musicians, not robots (the bureaucratic ideal of relentless precision.) They are a full-toned orchestra, the equivalent of Rubens figure-types, fanatical devotees of beautiful tone, gentlemen and (strikingly few) women who seem to have something like a primaeval joy in grand orchestral tone.

Steinberg, wiry, firm, and ageless, seems rather like the head of a steel manufacturing concern who, out of a deep mistrust of weapons, prefers to manufacture no cannons. The sarcasm with which he speaks about the business of conducting would make Schopenhauer and Karl Kraus blanch. He works against a Steinberg myth as though it were slander. Likewise on the podium, where he indulges himself in nothing, exaggerates nothing, not even the "luftpauses," in which, as is generally known, nothing can go wrong. He is almost angrily concerned to keep things moving; he likes to push the beginning of a new theme under the end of the previous one. His conducting is epic, not dramatic. He "recounts" Beethoven and Bruckner. That, in the end, is the difference between him and the one of whom in many respects he reminds us, Hans Knappertsbusch...

NB -- Balance of the review, which is considerably longer, has to do with the history of the BSO, its prior European tours, Arthur Fiedler, the Pops, Michael Tilson Thomas, and Deutsche Grammophon's assistance in promoting the tour. Mostly background material for German readers not familiar with it.

SÜDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG

April 10-12, 1971

Review by KARL SCHUMANN of BSO Stuttgart concert

...The concert began with that with which a concert begins only in exceptional cases: a speech. Stravinsky's death provided the occasion...the Funeral March from the Eroica began and became almost the core of the concert. After this Beethoven performance, the preconception disappeared that American orchestras are all technique and no soul. Restrained in its expression of dignified mourning, integrated through a relentlessly forward moving basic tempo, the procession moved along. Without exaggerated dynamics in the development, a shadow of the minor still remaining in the "maggiore" section, supported by the tonal intensity of a solo oboist fully the equal of his Cleveland colleague, everything proceeded without calling attention to itself, and with that subtle insistence on essentials that comes only from the hands of masters to whom effect for its own sake, over-precious subtleties, and such popular effects have long become empty and worthless.

Hindemith's Concert music for strings and brass, composed for one of the Bostonians' anniversary occasions, sounds tired and routine whenever one hears it played by an orchestra other than the one for which it was written. The long unison passages can be understood only in the Boston performance. They show off the absolutely incomparable power, fullness, and precision of this orchestra, its broad strength of tone, the rich timbre of its unsurpassable cello section, the power of the first violins as led by Joseph Silverstein, and the magnificent dignity of the brass. The acoustics of the Beethoven Room of the Liederhalle framed in splendor this parade of orchestral virtues.

As the main, and final, work, the Bostonians played Bruckner's 7th. Tuba players were specially flown in for this program item, which was played only in Stuttgart. It must have been the first time an American orchestra introduced itself in Europe with a Bruckner symphony. Until recently, Bruckner in the USA was regarded as a "kraut" to be patronized, the "deeply probing and gigantic" symphony department having been monopolized by the recently devaluated Sibelius. It is as though a French three-star restaurant had elevated boiled beef, potato dumplings, and bock beer to a sensational specialty.

Naturally the Schalk edition was used. The cymbal clash shone as it used to under Knappertsbusch. The triangle, which usually gets slammed against the wall by the cymbal, was instead clearly to be heard. Steinberg sees the symphony as a gigantic concert piece for five tubas and large orchestra. The sound of the Wagner tubas, somewhere between multiple horns and prehistoric warriors, was the cornerstone of the work. Rightly so, for the playing was done by specialists of clean entrances, velvety pianissimos, and the avoidance of rough power. They were the most powerfully sonorous exponents of this style of performance, a completely musical, full, and expressive sound, broadly drawn, three-dimensional, and adjusted to the contours of the themes.

William Steinberg stood on the podium like one of the last of the good old school of conductors, quiet, modest, his authority stemming from superiority. How it harks back to better times to be able to watch a conductor whose cues come from his eyes and from the tip of his baton and who, even at tricky brass entrances, does not need to resort to unmannerly two-armed gymnastics! What a triumph of baton technique it was when Steinberg increased the sound of a cello cantilena with his right hand gave the horns a cue with the little finger of his left. Steinberg's specialty is a diagonal beat with his baton, moving from the up left to the tip of his right shoe. But when things get heated he turns to Fritz Reiner's almost sadistic tactics: his beat gets very small and it forces the orchestra to concentrate on the point of his stick. That brings us to the question as to whether the Boston Symphony is infallible: That, thank God, it is not. It became a little tired during the Bruckner finale. The playing is done by magnificent, confident musicians, not robots (the bureaucratic ideal of relentless precision.) They are a full-toned orchestra, the equivalent of Rubens figure-types, fanatical devotees of beautiful tone, gentlemen and (strikingly few) women who seem to have something like a primaeval joy in grand orchestral tone.

Steinberg, wiry, firm, and ageless, seems rather like the head of a steel manufacturing concern who, out of a deep mistrust of weapons, prefers to manufacture no cannons. The sarcasm with which he speaks about the business of conducting would make Schopenhauer and Karl Kraus blanch. He works against a Steinberg myth as though it were slander. Likewise on the podium, where he indulges himself in nothing, exaggerates nothing, not even the "luftpauses," in which, as is generally known, nothing can go wrong. He is almost angrily concerned to keep things

g of a new theme under the end s epic, not dramatic. He "recounts" end, is the difference between s he reminds us, Hans Knappertsbusch...

onsiderably longer, has to do with ean tours, Arthur Fiedler, the ne Grammophon's assistance in material for German readers not 78

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 35,7 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
NWZ Göppinger Kreisnachrichten, Göppingen
vom 10. April 1971

Die „Bostoner" in Deutschland

„Wir sind da zu demonstrieren", erklärte Chefdirigent William Steinberg zu Beginn der Deutschland-Tournee des Boston Symphony Orchestra in Stuttgart vor Journalisten. Damit meinte er nicht das „herkömmliche Programm", welches sein Orchester im großen und ganzen bietet, sondern zeitgenössische amerikanische Musik von Schuller und Piston. In Stuttgart allerdings hielten sich die Bostoner im herkömmlichen Rahmen: Beethoven, Hindemith, Bruckner. Die Tournee des Orchesters steht freilich noch unter einem anderen Aspekt: die Deutsche Grammophon-Gesellschaft hat die Bostoner unter Vertrag genommen

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,9 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Waiblinger Kreiszeitung, Waiblingen
vom 14. April 1971

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra

William Steinberg dirigierte in Stuttgart zu Beginn der Tournee

Im Rahmen der Stuttgarter Meisterkonzerte begann das weltberühmte Boston Symphony Orchestra eine Deutschland-Tournee, die es noch in weitere acht bundesdeutsche Städte führen wird. Dirigent ist dabei der aus Köln gebürtige, 1936 emigrierte William Steinberg, der seit 1969 die Leitung des Bostoner Klangkörpers (neben der des Pittsburger Symphonie-Orchesters) innehat.

Die Bostoner Symphoniker sind in Stuttgart keine Unbekannten. Vor Jahren hörte man sie hier unter Charles Munch und war von ihrem virtuosen Können, ihrem herrlichen Klang und ihrer Ausgeglichenheit in allen Gruppen fasziniert. Diesmal begannen identical stories appeared in six papers

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 11,5 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Leonberger Kreiszeitung, Leonberg
vom 14. April 1971

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra

William Steinberg dirigierte in Stuttgart zu Beginn der Tournee

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 35,7 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
NWZ Göppinger Kreisnachrichten, Göppingen
vom 14. April 1971

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra

William Steinberg dirigierte in Stuttgart zu Beginn der Tournee

Im Rahmen der Stuttgarter Meisterkonzerte begann das weltberühmte Boston Symphony Orchestra eine Deutschland-Tournee, die es noch in weitere acht bundesdeutsche Städte führen wird. Dirigent ist dabei der aus Köln gebürtige, 1936 emigrierte William Steinberg, der seit 1969 die Leitung des Bostoner Klangkörpers (neben der des Pittsburger Symphonie-Orchesters) innehat.

Die Bostoner Symphoniker sind in Stuttgart keine Unbekannten. Vor Jahren hörte man sie hier unter Charles Munch und war von ihrem virtuosen Können, ihrem herrlichen Klang und ihrer Ausgeglichenheit in allen Gruppen fasziniert. Diesmal begannen

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 8,8 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Kreisnachrichten, Calw
vom 14. April 1971

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra

William Steinberg dirigierte in Stuttgart zu Beginn der Tournee

die Bostoner ihr Konzert mit dem Trauermarsch aus Beethovens „Eroica" und — enttäuschten zunächst ein wenig. Der Dirigent hatte aus Anlaß des zwei Tage zuvor verstorbenen Igor Strawinsky diesen Beetho-

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 8,5 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Heidenheimer Neue Presse, Heidenheim
vom 14. April 1971

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra

William Steinberg dirigierte in Stuttgart zu Beginn der Tournee

die Bostoner ihr Konzert mit dem Trauermarsch aus Beethovens „Eroica" und — enttäuschten zunächst ein wenig. Der Dirigent hatte aus Anlaß des zwei Tage zuvor verstorbenen Igor Strawinsky diesen Beethovensatz in das Programm aufgenommen. Sei es, daß der Wiedergabe unter diesen Umständen keine ausgiebigen Proben vorangegangen waren, sei es, daß sich die Strapazen der vorangegangenen Reise ein wenig bemerkbar machten; jedenfalls dauerte es geraume Zeit, bis — etwa mit dem Beginn des Fugato — der musikalische Ablauf jene Spannungskräfte aufwies, die wir bei Darbietungen durch erstrangige Orchester und Dirigenten gewöhnt sind. Dann aber zeigten sich die ganzen Vorzüge der Bostoner, ihre herrliche Präzision und dynamische Variabilität, ihr wundervoll weicher Klang, das Seidige der Streicher, das konzentriert Helle und doch nie Scharfe der Bläser.

Es folgte Hindemiths „Bostoner Symphonie" genannte, Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser, die 1931 zum fünfzigjährigen Jubiläum des Orchesters geschaffen wurde. Das meisterlich gearbeitete, bewußt populär gehaltene Werk, das eine Übergangsstellung zwischen dem jungen und dem reiferen Hindemith (des „Mathis") einnimmt, wurde mit wahrer Vollendung dargeboten.

Gewisse an Bruckner gemahnende Partien des Werkes ließen bereits Schlüsse auf die Wiedergabe des Hauptwerks des Programms, der siebten Brucknersinfonie, zu. Will man diese Wiedergabe kennzeichnen, so kann man etwa sagen, daß Steinberg weniger das Monumentale, thematisch scharf Geprägte der Brucknerschen Musik betonte, als ihr strömend Seelisches, das sich vor allem in den herrlichen Streicherkantilenen beglückend darbot, und daß die Klarheit und Durchsichtigkeit des Orchesterklangs, die genaue Durchleuchtung der Struktur dem Werk eine vielleicht etwas einseitige, aber immer fesselnde Gestalt gab.

Dirigent und Orchester wurden vom Publikum zu Recht überaus herzlich gefeiert.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 8,6 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Sindelfinger Zeitung, Sindelfingen
vom 14. April 1971

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra

William Steinberg dirigierte in Stuttgart zu Beginn der Tournee

Im Rahmen der Stuttgarter Meisterkonzerte begann das weltberühmte Boston Symphony Orchestra eine Deutschland-Tournee, die es noch in weitere acht bundesdeutsche Städte führen wird. Dirigent ist dabei der aus Köln gebürtige, 1936 emigrierte William Steinberg, der seit 1969 die Leitung des Bostoner Klangkörpers (neben der des Pittsburger Symphonie-Orchesters) innehat.

Die Bostoner Symphoniker sind in Stuttgart keine Unbekannten. Vor Jahren hörte man sie hier unter Charles Munch und war von ihrem virtuosen Können, ihrem herrlichen Klang und ihrer Ausgeglichenheit in allen Gruppen fasziniert. Diesmal begannen

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 132,1 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Badische Zeitung, Freiburg
vom 10. April 1971

Bruckner als Prunkstück

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Steinberg in Stuttgart

In Amerika gehen die Uhren anders. Ohne einen Pfennig Unterstützung von staatlicher Seite unternimmt zur Zeit das renommierte Boston Symphony Orchestra eine dreiwöchige Tournee durch Europa. Erste Station in Deutschland — fünf weitere Städte folgen — war die Stuttgarter Liederhalle. Das mit einem Jahresetat von viereinhalb Millionen Dollar von privater Seite ausstaffierte Orchester ist das Resultat eines Mäzenatentums, wie es in Deutschland schon seit Auflösung der Fürstenhäuser nicht mehr existiert. Als Henry Lee Higginson das Orchester vor knapp 90 Jahren gründete, gab er der Institution ein Siebenpunkteprogramm mit, das sich auch heute noch sehen lassen kann: Man wollte ein ständiges Orchester mit wöchentlichen Saisonkonzerten bei niedrigen Eintrittspreisen. Higginson forderte höchstes Niveau und übertrug die Alleinverantwortung für künstlerische Dinge dem Dirigenten.

Und Dirigenten wie Nikisch, Muck, Monteux, Koussevitzky, Munch, Leinsdorf und seit 1969 William Steinberg gaben dem Orchester markantes Profil. 1972 wird Steinberg (71), gleichzeitig in Pittsburgh Chef auf Lebenszeit, das Bostoner Orchester abgeben.

Das Stuttgarter Programm änderte Steinberg zu Ehren des toten Strawinsky. Anstelle der dritten Leonoren-Ouvertüre spielten die Amerikaner den „Trauermarsch" aus Beethovens „Eroica". Schon hier wurde deutlich, welch außerordentliches Orchester die Bostoner sind. Alle Musik, die sie an diesem Abend spielten, lebt von einem Cello-Baß-Fundament, wie es kein deutsches Orchester aufzuweisen hat. Ganz Ton in Ton die Klangfärbung der Blechbläser: weich der Ansatz, nie schneidend oder vordergründig die Brillanz. Für eine ausgewogene Mitte sorgen vorzüglich besetzte Holzbläser. Steinberg regiert wie ein großflächiger Knappertsbusch. Ein Achselzucken genügt, um den herrlichsten Streicherklang auf die Welt zu setzen, der seit langem zu hören war.

Hindemiths „Boston Symphony" kam sonor, kraftvoll kontrapunktiert, schwer und substanzreich. Hindemith muß gewußt haben, wie ein Bostoner Streicher-Unisono sich anhört. Man verstand endlich, warum er dieses Werk geschrieben hat.

Prunkstück des Programms: Bruckners 7. Sinfonie, die erste Bruckner-Aufführung eines amerikanischen Orchesters in Deutschland. Steinberg baute mit melodischen Formstücken von beträchtlichem Gewicht. Dunkel und sehr expressiv die Streicher, ein Bläserklang, in dem eindeutig Hörner und Tuben dominierten. Schmerzliche Schwermut zog sich hinein bis ins Scherzo.

Helmut Lesch

Westdeutsche Rundschau, 10. April 1971

Meisterliches Meisterkonzert

Michael Tilson Thomas mit den „Bostonern"

Von Jochen Rentsch

Noch waren die letzten Töne von Ravels „La Valse"-Musik bei dem wahrhaft sensationellen Gastspiel des Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchesters am Gründonnerstagabend in der ausverkauften Stadthalle nicht ganz vorbei, als nahezu ohrenbetäubender Beifall des Publikums — besonders der Jugend auf der Chorempore — einsetzte und sich zu einem einzigen Begeisterungsrausch für das Orchester und seinen jungen Dirigenten, Michael Tilson Thomas, steigerte.

Nach diesem Instrumentalfeuerwerk ohnegleichen, das mit sprichwörtlicher amerikanischer Perfektion gezündet wurde, stand fest, daß „das" Orchesterkonzert der Konzertsaison 1970/71 stattgefunden hatte.

Thomas verstand, mit ebenso ungewöhnlicher Begabung wie souveränem „Orchestergriff" seine Hundertschaft zu engagieren — womit allein eindeutig widerlegt sei, daß er „hinter" dem Chefdirigenten dieses Orchesters, William Steinberg, „nur der zweite Mann ist" — nahm schweißtriefend mit knietiefer Verbeugung die Publikumsovationen entgegen.

Und die legeren „Bostonians", jeder ein Meister seines Instruments, spürten beim einzigen, vom WDR live übertragenen NRW-Konzert ihrer „90-Jahre-Jubiläums-Europa-Tournee", daß in Wuppertal alles andere als ein stereotyp „reglementierter Konzertbetrieb" herrscht. Auch in den USA hat sich, wie mir gesprächsweise der „Orchestermanager" versicherte, herumgesprochen, daß in Wuppertal eine „besondere Musikatmosphäre" herrsche.

Amerikanische Unkonventionalität spiegelte sich bereits bei der Programmfolge — Beethovens „Achte", Schönbergs „Fünf Orchesterstücken, op. 16", Mozarts Fagottkonzert, B-Dur, KV 191, und Ravels besagter choreographischen Dichtung „La Valse" — wider. Als Prolog hörte man „in memoriam Igor Strawinski", Debussys „Nachmittag eines Faun" ohne (erbetenen) Applaus, fabelhaft duftig und klangpastelliert, obwohl mir beim besten Willen nicht einleuchtete, wieso gerade dieses Werk in irgendeiner Beziehung zu Strawinskis kürzlichem Tod stand.

Bei Beethovens F-Dur-Sinfonie allerdings mußte ich bei aller Brillanz und Akkuratesse des (zu!) stark besetzten Orchesters (doppeltes Blech!) jene innewohnend abgeklärte Gediegenheit vermissen, die hier eher zu einem sinfonischen Kraftakt verwandelt wurde. Mit Schönbergs ins „absolute Hören" gesteigertem Werk wurde indes die faszinierend differenzierte Farbpalette dieses Orchesters dem Hörer bewußt. Die „Aggressivität einer isolierten, um Neuland kämpfenden Kreatur", wie Adorno einmal Schönbergs op. 16 kommentierte, projizierte sich hier nahezu atembeklemmend. Explosion und Integrität und klangliche Askese machten Schönbergs Werk hier zu einem „Manifest des Ungeheuerlichen".

Dann Mozart: wie der Solofagott ist der Bostoner, Sherman Walt, dieses kostbare Werk zu einem künstlerischen Funktionsbegriff verwandelte, das war ein Optimum an partiturgetreuem Kammermusizieren! Und bei Ravels „La Valse", wo sich das zum Schluß entfesselte Orchester selbst übertraf, gab es tosenden Beifall.

WUPPERTAL

Westdeutsche Rundschau, April 10, 1971

all around rave review for both Michael Tilson Thomas and the BSO

"Almost deafening applause of the audience - particularly the young people in the balcony"

"Instrumental rocket, lit by the proverbial American perfection - the Orchestra concert of the 1970-71 season" particular mention for Sherman Walt - his playing representing the height of achievement of his art

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (t. Ts.): 77,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

General-Anzeiger der Stadt Wuppertal, Wuppertal

vom 2. April 1971

Bostoner Orchester in der Stadthalle

Am 8. April gastiert das amerikanische Boston Symphony Orchestra in Wylachs Meisterkonzert-Reihe in der Wuppertaler Stadthalle. Das berühmte Orchester, das drittälteste der USA, feiert in diesem Jahr mit einer Europa-Tournee sein 90jähriges Bestehen. Sein Chefdirigent ist zur Zeit William Steinberg.

Das Wuppertaler Konzert dirigiert jedoch sein bereits vielbeachteter „assistant conductor", der 26jährige Michael Tilson Thomas. Auf dem Programm stehen Beethovens Achte, Schönbergs Fünf Orchesterstücke, Mozarts Fagott-Konzert (mit Sherman Walt als Solisten) und Ravels „La Valse".

Da das Konzert vom WDR live übertragen wird, werden die Saaltüren spätestens 19.58 Uhr geschlossen.

Michael Tilson Thomas dirigiert

M A S T E R F U L M A S T E R C O N C E R T

Michael Tilson Thomas with the "Bostonians"

The last notes of Ravel's "La Valse" had hardly ended when an almost deafening applause of the audience arose - especially the youth in the choir loft - and increased to a unique rapture of enthusiasm for the orchestra and its young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas. The truely sensational guest tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was sold out in the Stadthalle Maundy Thursday. After such unequalled instrumental fireworks, which were lit with American perfection, it was certain that "the" orchestra concert of the 1970/1971 season has taken place.

Thomas understood how to engage his organization of a hundred players with unusual talent and superior "orchestral grasp" by which it is disproved clearly that he is "only the second man" behind the conductor William Steinberg. He accepted the ovations from the audience, dripping with perspiration , with a knee deep bow.

And the Bostonians, each one a master on his instrument, noticed that in Wuppertal everything but a stereotype "supervised" concert life prevails. It was the only NRW concert broadcast live from WDR in the orchestra's European tour, taken on its ninety anniversay year. During a conversation the orchestra manager assured me that it is known in the USA that a"special musical atmosphere" exists in Wuppertal.

American unconventialism was reflected in the program - Beethoven's Eighth, Schonberg's Fünf Orchesterstücke, op.16, Mozart's Bassoon Concerto and Ravel's poem "La Valse". As a prologue one heard, in memoriam to Stravinsky, Debussy's Afternoon of a Faun (without applause as requested), presented incredibly fragrant and pastel colored. I am not quite clear at all why this particular work has any connection with Stravinsky's recent death.

Despite the brilliance and the accuracy of the (too!) plentifully cast orchestra (double brasses!) with Beethoven's F Major Symphony I missed the dwelled clarified solidity which was changed here to a symphonic power statement. In Schonberg's work of "absolute listening" the listener realized indeed the different color palettes of this orchestra. The "agressiveness of isolated creatures, fighting for new land", as remarked by Adorno once about Schonberg's op.16, was projected here almost breathtakingly. Explosion, concurrance and tonal ascetisism made Schonberg's work here a "Manifesto of the monstrosity".

Then Mozart: How the solo bassoonist of the Bostonians, Sherman Walt, changed this valuable work to an artistic conception of function, that was the optimum of chamber playing, faithful to the score! And after Ravel's "La Valse" when the unchained orchestra surpassed itself at the end applause roared forth.

Jochen Rentsch

wuppertal

Westdeutsche Rundschau, 10. April 1971

Meisterliches Meisterkonzert

Michael Tilson Thomas mit den „Bostonern"

Von Jochen Rentsch

Noch waren die letzten Töne von Ravels „La Valse"-Musik bei dem wahrhaft sensationellen Gastspiel des Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchesters am Gründonnerstagabend in der ausverkauften Stadthalle nicht ganz vorbei, als nahezu ohrenbetäubender Beifall des Publikums — besonders der Jugend auf der Chorempore — einsetzte und sich zu einem einzigen Begeisterungsrausch für das Orchester und seinen jungen Dirigenten, Michael Tilson Thomas, steigerte.

Nach diesem Instrumentalfeuerwerk ohnegleichen, das mit sprichwörtlicher amerikanischer Perfektion gezündet wurde, stand fest, daß „das" Orchesterkonzert der Konzertsaison 1970/71 stattgefunden hatte.

Thomas verstand, mit ebenso ungewöhnlicher Begabung wie souveränem „Orchestergriff" seine Hundertschaft zu engagieren — womit allein eindeutig widerlegt sei, daß er „hinter" dem Chefdirigenten dieses Orchesters, William Steinberg, „nur der zweite Mann ist" — nahm schweißtriefend mit knietiefer Verbeugung die Publikumsovationen entgegen.

Und die legeren „Bostonians", jeder ein Meister seines Instruments, spürten beim einzigen, vom WDR live übertragenen NRW-Konzert ihrer „90-Jahre-Jubiläums-Europa-Tournee", daß in Wuppertal alles andere als ein stereotyp „reglementierter Konzertbetrieb" herrscht. Auch in den USA hat sich, wie mir gesprächsweise der „Orchestermanager" versicherte, herumgesprochen, daß in Wuppertal eine „besondere Musikatmosphäre" herrsche.

Amerikanische Unkonventionalität spiegelte sich bereits bei der Programmfolge — Beethovens „Achte", Schönbergs „Fünf Orchesterstücken, op. 16", Mozarts Fagottkonzert, B-Dur, KV 191, und Ravels besagter choreographischen Dichtung „La Valse" — wider. Als Prolog hörte man „in memoriam Igor Strawinski", Debussys „Nachmittag eines Faun" ohne (erbetenen) Applaus, fabelhaft duftig und klangpastelliert, obwohl mir beim besten Willen nicht einleuchtete, wieso gerade dieses Werk in irgendeiner Beziehung zu Strawinskis kürzlichem Tod stand.

Bei Beethovens F-Dur-Sinfonie allerdings mußte ich bei aller Brillanz und Akkuratesse des (zu!) stark besetzten Orchesters (doppeltes Blech!) jene innewohnend abgeklärte Gediegenheit vermissen, die hier eher zu einem sinfonischen Kraftakt verwandelt wurde. Mit Schönbergs ins „absolute Hören" gesteigertem Werk wurde indes die faszinierend differenzierte Farbpalette dieses Orchesters dem Hörer bewußt. Die „Aggressivität einer isolierten, um Neuland kämpfenden Kreatur", wie Adorno einmal Schönbergs op. 16 kommentierte, projizierte sich hier nahezu atembeklemmend. Explosion und Integrität und klangliche Askese machten Schönbergs Werk hier zu einem „Manifest des Ungeheuerlichen".

Dann Mozart: wie der Solofagott ist der Bostoner, Sherman Walt, dieses kostbare Werk zu einem künstlerischen Funktionsbegriff verwandelte, das war ein Optimum an partiturgetreuem Kammermusizieren! Und bei Ravels „La Valse", wo sich das zum Schluß entfesselte Orchester selbst übertraf, gab es tosenden Beifall.

WUPPERTAL

Westdeutsche Rundschau, April 10, 1971

all around rave review for both Michael Tilson Thomas and the BSO

"Almost deafening applause of the audience - particularly the young people in the balcony"

"Instrumental rocket, lit by the proverbial American perfection - the Orchestra concert of the 1970-71 season"

particular mention for Sherman Walt - his playing representing the height of achievement of his art

argus
Seit 1857
Auflage (i. Ts.): ///,
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
General-Anzeiger der Stadt Wuppertal, Wuppertal
vom 2. April 197

Bostoner Orchester in der Stadthalle

Am 8. April gastiert das amerikanische Boston Symphony Orchestra in Wylachs Meisterkonzert-Reihe in der Wuppertaler Stadthalle. Das berühmte Orchester, das drittälteste der USA, feiert in diesem Jahr mit einer Europa-Tournee sein 90jähriges Bestehen. Sein Chefdirigent ist zur Zeit William Steinberg.

Das Wuppertaler Konzert dirigiert jedoch sein bereits vielbeachteter „assistant conductor", der 26jährige Michael Tilson Thomas. Auf dem Programm stehen Beethovens Achte, Schönbergs Fünf Orchesterstücke, Mozarts Fagott-Konzert (mit Sherman Walt als Solisten) und Ravels „La Valse".

Da das Konzert vom WDR live übertragen wird, werden die Saaltüren spätestens 19.58 Uhr geschlossen.

Michael Tilson Thomas dirigiert

M A S T E R F U L M A S T E R C O N C E R T

Michael Tilson Thomas with the "Bostonians"

The last notes of Ravel's "La Valse" had hardly ended when an almost deafening applause of the audience arose - especially the youth in the choir loft - and increased to a unique rapture of enthusiasm for the orchestra and its young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas. The truely sensational guest tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was sold out in the Stadthalle Maundy Thursday. After such unequalled instrumental fireworks, which were lit with American perfection, it was certain that "the" orchestra concert of the 1970/1971 season has taken place.

Thomas understood how to engage his organization of a hundred players with unusual talent and superior "orchestral grasp" by which it is disproved clearly that he is "only the second man" behind the conductor William Steinberg. He accepted the ovations from the audience, dripping with perspiration , with a knee deep bow.

And the Bostonians, each one a master on his instrument, noticed that in Wuppertal everything but a stereotype "supervised" concert life prevails. It was the only NRW concert broadcast live from WDR in the orchestra's European tour, taken on its ninety anniversay year. During a conversation the orchestra manager assured me that it is known in the USA that a"special musical atmosphere" exists in Wuppertal.

American unconventialism was reflected in the program - Beethoven's Eighth, Schonberg's Fünf Orchesterstücke, op.16, Mozart's Bassoon Concerto and Ravel's poem "La Valse". As a prologue one heard, in memoriam to Stravinsky, Debussy's Afternoon of a Faun (without applause as requested), presented incredibly fragrant and pastel colored. I am not quite clear at all why this particular work has any connection with Stravinsky's recent death.

Despite the brilliance and the accuracy of the (too!) plentifully cast orchestra (double brasses!) with Beethoven's F Major Symphony I missed the dwelled clarified solidity which was changed here to a symphonic power statement. In Schonberg's work of "absolute listening" the listener realized indeed the different color palettes of this orchestra. The "agressiveness of isolated creatures, fighting for new land", as remarked by Adorno once about Schonberg's op.16, was projected here almost breathtakingly. Explosion, concurrance and tonal ascetisism made Schonberg's work here a "Manifesto of the monstrosity".

Then Mozart: How the solo bassoonist of the Bostonians, Sherman Walt, changed this valuable work to an artistic conception of function, that was the optimum of chamber playing, faithful to the score! And after Ravel's "La Valse" when the unchained orchestra surpassed itself at the end applause roared forth.

Jochen Rentsch

wuppertal

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROVIDES THE CONCERT SENSATION

Enthusiastic Applause For M.T. Thomas' Precise Direction

Waves of excitement from the audience went high once again in the sold out Elberfelder Stadthalle. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the most traditional of the world provided for the concert sensation within the 1970/1971 season.

The young, extraordinary talented - although very often dancingly acrobatic - conductor Tilson Thomas is often called in the USA "Bernstein No.2" because of his conducting, loaded with emotional articulation. He made the "hundred man-armada" sing, sob, cry and thunder incomparably, in one precision act, and at Ravel's tone poem "La Valse" at the end he made them explode.

The vibrant machine bubbled to bursting, at the final climax it almost got into a sound stimulus, but as sensative as a geiger counter and thorough to the most delicate tinge of its chief.

Hardly ever was the applause more enthusiastic and spontaneously than in this encounter in Wuppertal. This concert was broadcast live. This points to the extraordinary importance that the Bostonians bestowed on Wuppertal as the only town in Nordrhein-Westfalen during their European tour.

This program was unorthodox for European tradition: First Beethoven's Eighth, presented here a bit too forthright and aggressive, played more desirably as introverted and "suspended" and transparent. Secondly Schonberg's hard to interpret Funf Orchsterstuecke, op.16, in which the Bostonians set a display example of orchestral polish. At the beginning Debussy's tone poem "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'Un Faun" was"flung", enchantingly fragrant and worldly detached, played in the memory of Igor Stravinsky.

In between, a concert hall rarity: Mozart's Bassoon Concerto in B Flat Major, KV 191, that the soloist Sherman Walt performed with such thrilling gracefullness and technical ability of transformation that the audience was beside itself with delight.

Jochen Rentsch

Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, 15. April 1971

WZ Wuppertal, 15.4.71

Bostoner Orchester sorgt für die Konzertsensation

Enthusiastischer Beifall für M. T. Thomas' Präzisions-Dirigat

AUS DEM KREIS. Die Begeisterungswogen des Publikums gingen in der ausverkauften Elberfelder Stadthalle wieder einmal hoch: Das Bostoner Sinfonieorchester, eines der traditionsreichsten der Welt, sorgte für „die" Konzertsensation innerhalb der Saison 1970/71.

Der junge, ungemein talentierte — wenn auch oftmals tänzerisch-akrobatische — Dirigent Michael Tilson Thomas, schon oft als „Bernstein Nummer zwei" in den USA wegen seines emotionsgeladenen Dirigats artikuliert, ließ die „Hundertmann-Armada" in einem Präzisionsakt ohnegleichen singen, schluchzen, heulen, donnern und — bei Ravels „La Valse" - Tondichtung zum Schluß — explodieren.

Der vibrierende, bei der Schlußstretta nahezu orgiastisch in Klangbewegung gekommene Apparat, dabei empfindlich wie ein Geigerzähler und auf die subtilsten Nuancen seines Chefs eingehend, brodelte bis zum Bersten.

Kaum war in Wuppertal bei einem Konzert der Beifall enthusiastischer und spontaner als bei dieser Begegnung, die in live vom Rundfunk übertragen wurde, womit zugleich auf die außergewöhnliche Bedeutung hingewiesen sei, daß die „Bostonians" in Wuppertal als einziger Stadt in Nordrhein-Westfalen im Rahmen ihrer Europa-Tournee anläßlich des 90jährigen Bestehens dieses Orchesters gastierten.

Das Programm war für europäische Traditionen unorthodox: Beethovens „Achte", hier ein wenig zu forsch und aggressiv, als mehr wünschenswert introvertiert und „schwebend" transparent gespielt, dann Schönbergs schwierig zu interpretierenden „Fünf Orchesterstücke op. 16", mit deren Leuchtkraft und technischer Differenzierung die Bostoner ein Paradebeispiel orchestralen Schliffs abgaben und eingangs Debussys „Tongedicht" „Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune", zauberhaft duftig und irdisch gelöst „hingeworfen" in memoriam Igor Strawinski zugeeignet.

Dazwischen eine Konzertsaal-Rarität: Mozarts Fagottkonzert B-Dur, KV 191, das der Solofagottist Sherman Walt mit derart hinreißender Grazie und technischer Wandlungsfähigkeit blies, daß das Publikum aus dem Häuschen geriet.

Jochen Rentsch

WUPPERTAL

Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, April 15, 1971

"BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROVIDES CONCERT SENSATION. Enthusiastic applause for the precision-conducting of Michael Tilson Thomas"

all around excellent review

"...The BSO, one of the richest in tradition in the world, provides the concert sensation of the 1970-71 season."

about Michael Tilson Thomas

"...young, unusually talented - although often rather dancer-like and acrobatic."

about the BSO

"This vibrating instrument, practically in an orgasm of sound at the finale, although at the same time as sensitive as a geiger counter and attentive to the most subtle nuances of its director, swelled to the point of explosion".

special mention for Sherman Walt, who played

" with the kind of overpowering grace and technical facility which brings people running."

80

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROVIDES THE CONCERT SENSATION

Enthusiastic Applause For M.T. Thomas' Precise Direction

Waves of excitement from the audience went high once again in the sold out Elberfelder Stadthalle. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the most traditional of the world provided for the concert sensation within the 1970/1971 season.

The young, extraordinary talented - although very often dancingly acrobatic - conductor Tilson Thomas is often called in the USA "Bernstein No.2" because of his conducting, loaded with emotional articulation. He made the "hundred man-armada" sing, sob, cry and thunder incomparably, in one precision act, and at Ravel's tone poem "La Valse" at the end he made them explode.

The vibrant machine bubbled to bursting, at the final climax it almost got into a sound stimulus, but as sensative as a geiger counter and thorough to the most delicate tinge of its chief.

Hardly ever was the applause more enthusiastic and spontaneously than in this encounter in Wuppertal. This concert was broadcast live. This points to the extraordinary importance that the Bostonians bestowed on Wuppertal as the only town in Nordrhein-Westfalen during their European tour.

This program was unorthodox for European tradition: First Beethoven's Eighth, presented here a bit too forthright and aggressive, played more desirably as introverted and "suspended" and transparent. Secondly Schonberg's hard to interpret Funf Orchsterstuecke, op.16, in which the Bostonians set a display example of orchestral polish. At the beginning Debussy's tone poem "Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'Un Faun" was"flung", enchantingly fragrant and worldly detached, played in the memory of Igor Stravinsky.

In between, a concert hall rarity: Mozart's Bassoon Concerto in B Flat Major, KV 191, that the soloist Sherman Walt performed with such thrilling gracefullness and technical ability of transformation that the audience was beside itself with delight.

Jochen Rentsch

Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, 15. April 1971

Bostoner Orchester sorgt für die Konzertsensation

Enthusiastischer Beifall für M. T. Thomas' Präzisions-Dirigat

AUS DEM KREIS. Die Begeisterungswogen des Publikums gingen in der ausverkauften Elberfelder Stadthalle wieder einmal hoch: Das Bostoner Sinfonieorchester, eines der traditionsreichsten der Welt, sorgte für „die" Konzertsensation innerhalb der Saison 1970/71.

Der junge, ungemein talentierte — wenn auch oftmals tänzerisch akrobatische — Dirigent Michael Tilson Thomas, schon oft als „Bernstein Nummer zwei" in den USA wegen seines emotionsgeladenen Dirigats artikuliert, ließ die „Hundertmann-Armada" in einem Präzisionsakt ohnegleichen singen, schluchzen, heulen, donnern und — bei Ravels „La Valse" - Tondichtung zum Schluß — explodieren.

Der vibrierende, bei der Schlußstretta nahezu orgiastisch in Klangbewegung gekommene Apparat, dabei empfindlich wie ein Geigerzähler und auf die subtilsten Nuancen seines Chefs eingehend, brodelte bis zum Bersten.

Kaum war in Wuppertal bei einem Konzert der Beifall enthusiastischer und spontaner als bei dieser Begegnung, die in live vom Rundfunk übertragen wurde, womit zugleich auf die außergewöhnliche Bedeutung hingewiesen sei, daß die „Bostonians" in Wuppertal als einziger Stadt in Nordrhein-Westfalen im Rahmen ihrer Europa-Tournee anläßlich des 90jährigen Bestehens dieses Orchesters gastierten.

Das Programm war für europäische Traditionen unorthodox: Beethovens „Achte", hier ein wenig zu forsch und aggressiv, als mehr wünschenswert introvertiert und „schwebend" transparent gespielt, dann Schönbergs schwierig zu interpretierenden „Fünf Orchesterstücke op. 16", mit deren Leuchtkraft und technischer Differenzierung die Bostoner ein Paradebeispiel orchestralen Schliffs abgaben und eingangs Debussys „Tongedicht" „Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune", zauberhaft durftig und irdisch gelöst „hingeworfen" in memoriam Igor Strawinski zugeeignet.

Dazwischen eine Konzertsaal-Rarität: Mozarts Fagottkonzert B-Dur, KV 191, das der Solofagottist Sherman Walt mit derart hinreißender Grazie und technischer Wandlungsfähigkeit blies, daß das Publikum aus dem Häuschen geriet.

Jochen Rentsch

WUPPERTAL

Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, April 15, 1971

"BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROVIDES CONCERT SENSATION. Enthusiastic applause for the precision-conducting of Michael Tilson Thomas"

all around excellent review

"...The BSO, one of the richest in tradition in the world, provides the concert sensation of the 1970-71 season."

about Michael Tilson Thomas

"...young, unusually talented - although often rather dancer-like and acrobatic."

about the BSO

"This vibrating instrument, practically in an orgasm of sound at the finale, although at the same time as sensitive as a geiger counter and attentive to the most subtle nuances of its director, swelled to the point of explosion"

special mention for Sherman Walt, who played

" with the kind of overpowering grace and technical facility which brings people running."

General-Anzeiger der Stadt Wuppertal Samstag, 10. April 1971 Seite 7

Ein Feuergeist am Dirigentenpult

Wuppertaler Meisterkonzert: Bostor Symphony Orchestra unter Michael Tilson Thomas

Wuppertal war die dritte Station, die das weltberühmte amerikanische Boston Symphony Orchestra auf seiner Europa-Tournee berührte. Nach London und Stuttgart. Von heute bis zum 24. April folgen Berlin, Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Bonn, Wien, Rom, Barcelona, Paris. Wuppertal befindet sich also in illustrer Gesellschaft. Dank seinem guten Ruf als Musikstadt und dank der Initiative von Rudolf Wylach, der den Abend in seine Meisterkonzertreihe einbaute.

Im dichtbesetzten großen Stadthallensaal (mit bekannten Gesichtern aus Düsseldorf und Köln) war denn auch das Fluidum eines außerordentlichen Ereignisses zu spüren. Ungewöhnlich war die durch schroffe Gegensätze charakterisierte Programmfolge, die sich von dem bei Gala-Konzerten gemeinhin gereichten kulinarischen Gericht unterschied. Schließlich trat ein 26jähriger ans Pult der Bostoner, Michael Tilson Thomas, in seiner amerikanischen Heimat bereits hochgelobt, kaum bekannt bei uns. Erstmals stellte er sich in Wuppertal einem deutschen Publikum vor.

Zunächst mit ein paar Sätzen in deutscher Sprache, in denen er die zusätzliche Aufführung von Debussys Vorspiel zum „Nachmittag eines Fauns" ankündigte — dem verstorbenen Strawinski zum Gedächtnis. Das mediterran flirrende Licht dieser mythischen Vision hatte offenbar den jungen Strawinski („Feuervogel"-Ballett) inspiriert — und gerade das Bostoner Orchester war berufen, den weich betörenden Klang aufs delikateste auszuformen.

Mit Beethovens 8. Sinfonie bekundete dann Thomas auf Anhieb sein energisch zupackendes Temperament. Konnte man zunächst befürchten, gestische Schau überdecke inneres Engagement, so wurde man doch bald inne, daß hier ein Feuergeist das „Allegro vivace„ kräftig anheizt und akzentuiert. Nicht nur mit Händen und Augen — mit dem ganzen, geradezu tänzerisch ausschwingenden Körper. Die bukolische Heiterkeit dieser Sinfonie wurde zwar in den Ecksätzen allzu sehr der dionysisch wirbelnden Dämonie der Siebenten angenähert — eine schlankere, gelöstere thematische Entwicklung ist mir lieber. Aber wie die Streicher und Bläser die metronomische Aribie des zweiten Satzes mit Charme würzten, wie im Trio Klarinette und Horn über den Pizzicati der Celli und Kontrabässe Zwiesprache hielten — das belegte eine kaum überbietbare klangliche Ausgewogenheit ebenso wie die Sensibilität des Dirigenten.

Weit diffiziler, auch zersplitterter und zerklüfteter ist das Klanggewand von Arnold Schönbergs „Fünf Orchesterstücken"; Triumph der Atonalität, doch spätromantisch-expressiv durchglüht. Die Zwölfton-Methode war — entgegen der Programmheft-Erläuterung — als neu bindendes Gesetz damals noch nicht erkannt. Doch weist die Klangfarben-Studie des dritten Stücks bereits auf Ligeti hin. Dem Gefühlsüberschwang — Wagners „Tristan" ist immer noch nahe — war Thomas mit ausladender Verve zugetan, vom Orchester mit einer Nuancierungskunst ohnegleichen unterstützt.

In Mozarts Fagott-Konzert war dann die Intimität alles. Auch in den lustig brabbelnden Sechzehnteln und Trillern des Soloparts, den Sherman Walt mit verblüffender Atemführung und ohne Ausrutscher blies. Von der Kantilene des langsamen Satzes möchte man noch lange träumen, auch davon, wie sie das Orchester zart grundierte.

Fulminanter Abschluß des Abends war Ravels „La Valse", diese flammende Apotheose des Tanzes, die aber auch Kantiges, Widerborstiges aufdeckt. Thomas, scheinbar entfesselter Hexenmeister, war hier ganz in seinem Element. Gab sich dem Rausch hin, ohne ihn überborden zu lassen, gab dem Rhythmus und den Klanggruppen scharfe Kontur, stufte die dynamische Skala meisterhaft ab, von zärtlicher Koketterie bis zur wildesten Entladung. Und das Orchester konnte zeigen, daß auch mit geschliffenster Virtuosität die musikalische Substanz nicht dem Effekt geopfert zu werden braucht.

Die Wogen der Begeisterung gingen hoch. Alfred Mayerhofer

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.):
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Wuppertaler Generalanzeiger

vom 10. 4. 71

81

82

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 67,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Münster'sche Zeitung, Münster

vom 14. April 1971

3

Ein Orchester im Delirium

Glanzvolles Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra in Wuppertal

VON KURT WITTERSTÄTTER

Die Bostoner sind, was Orchesterspielkultur betrifft, schon seit Jahrzehnten in der Musikwelt ein Begriff. In den 50er Jahren, als Charles Münch ihr Chefdirigent war, bezeichnete man sie zuweilen als bestes Orchester der Welt. Aus Anlaß seines 90jährigen Bestehens befindet sich dieses Orchester nun zur Zeit nach zehn Jahren wieder einmal auf Europatournee, in deren Verlauf nach London und Stuttgart auch Wuppertal berührt wurde. Das Wuppertaler Konzert wurde von dem 26jährigen Michael Tilson Thomas geleitet. In Thomas, der blitzartig vom Korrepetitor zum zweiten Dirigenten der Bostoner und zum Chef des Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra avancierte, sehen viele einen zweiten Leonard Bernstein.

Man durfte also auf die Begegnung mit Thomas und den Bostonern gespannt sein. Das Programm steigerte dieses Interesse noch um ein Weiteres: Beethovens Achter folgten Schönberg, Mozart und Ravel. Wenn überhaupt, dann kann man nur bei der Beethoven-Interpretation Kritik üben. Tilson Thomas ist ein temperamentvoller Instinktmusiker, dirigiert rudernd, unternimmt regelrechte Spaziergänge auf dem Podium, mit oder ohne Taktstock, aber immer mit Partitur. Die vergleichsweise natürlich-ruhige Achte lag ihm nicht so sehr.

Mozarts Fagottkonzert nach der Pause wurden Witz und Wärme gleichermaßen mitgegeben. Erstaunliche Routine bewies Thomas, als er souverän über eine Gedächtnislücke des Solisten Sherman Walt im zweiten Satz hinwegzudirigieren wußte, der im übrigen klanglich sehr sonor, im Technischen elegant-geläufig und mit schön schwingendem Klang blies.

Die großen Domänen von Thomas und den Bostonern sind der Impressionismus und jüngst auch die Moderne. So transparent gespielt wie von den Bostonern mußten Schönbergs Fünf Orchesterstücke op. 16 jeden Zuhörer begeistern. Einen Vorgeschmack ihrer Spielkultur hatten die Bostoner zu Beginn ihres Programms mit Debussys zum Gedenken Strawinskys gespieltem „Nachmittag eines Faun" gegeben. Befremdet zunächst das forsche Tempo, so merkte man bald, daß es Thomas weniger auf Stimmung als auf Ziselierung der motivischen und ornamentalen Struktur ankam. Und die lag offen wie in einer Nervenzeichnung — trotz der Riesenbesetzung mit elf Celli und neun Kontrabässen.

Die Transparenz frappierte erst recht bei dem Taumel, in den Thomas das Orchester mit Ravels „La Valse" trieb. Derart brodelnd und kontrolliert zugleich dürfte Ravels Walzer-Apotheose kaum einem anderen Orchester gelingen. Und doch waren bei aller Klangentfesselung die raffinierten Deliriums-Akzente Ravels höchst präzise gesetzt.

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 10,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –

Ausschnitt aus:
Ibbenbürener Volkszeitung, Ibbenbüren

vom 14. April 1971

Wuppertaler Tagebuch 13/4.71

„Wirklich ein Meister-Konzert"

Boston-Symphony-Orchestra unter Michael Tilson Thomas gastierte

Selten schon verbindet sich in der künstlerischen Praxis das Impulsive mit dem Technischen. Noch seltener aber stehen Technisches und Impulsives als gleichwertige Medien demjenigen Etwas zur Verfügung, das Kandinski „das Geistige in der Kunst" nannte, das — speziell in der Musik — trotz großartiger Sinnentwürfe bisher begrifflich nicht faßbar wurde, das — in Analogie zur Logik eines Gedankenganges — die innere Folgerichtigkeit, die gleichermaßen inhaltliche wie grammatische Richtigkeit einer künstlerischen Äußerung zustande bringt. Das letzte Meisterkonzert machte Wuppertals Hörer mit Musikern bekannt, die diese seltenste Art meisterhaften Musizierens beherrschen: Dem Boston Symphony Orchestra und seinem jungen „Nachwuchschef" Michael Tilson Thomas.

Diese Fähigkeit erwies sich in den beiden historisch eng umgrenzten Bereichen, zwischen denen das Programm in seiner Reihenfolge hin und her pendelte: dem „klassischen" Bereich Mozarts und Beethovens und jener Epoche zu Beginn unseres Jahrhunderts, in der zwei wesentliche Züge der sogenannten „Neuen Musik" angelegt werden: Die Verwendung von Klangfarbe und Bewegung als gleichwertige Elemente der Musik neben Melodie und Harmonie — und die Verbindung von äußerster Charakteristik des Inhaltes mit nüchterner Ökonomie der Mittel, beides in einer die Spätromantik noch überbietenden Verfeinerung der Zwischenstufen in allen Dimensionen des Ausdruckes und der Satztechnik.

Um gleich bei der zuletzt genannten Epoche zu bleiben: Hier ließ der Darstellungsstil keinen Wunsch offen. Debussys zauberhaft zartes „Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune" erklang ebenso charakteristisch, wie Ravels fast alptraumhafte Walzervision „La Valse" und wie insbesondere die expressionistischen fünf Orchesterstücke op. 16 von Schönberg, einem Werk der schärfsten emotionalen Kontraste von unerhörter Differenzierung und Intensität, dem künstlerischen Höhepunkt des Abends!

In der Darstellung dieses schwierigen Stückes zeigte sich denn auch ganz besonders die phänomenale Fähigkeit des Dirigenten, den inneren Sinn jeder musikalischen Formulierung unmittelbar zum Erlebnis zu bringen. Diese Fähigkeit, die er fast ohne Einschränkung den ganzen Abend hindurch bewies, berechtigt zu den höchsten Erwartungen. Es gibt viele erstklassige Dirigiertechniker, es gibt so manchen suggestiven jungen Wirbelwind am Pult, selten aber einen, von dem man wie von ihm sagen könnte, er „verkörpere" buchstäblich den Sinn der Musik, deren Darstellung er leitet.

Die „klassischen" Stücke brachten die Musiker in vergleichbarer Vollkommenheit, trotz der durchweg zu starken Besetzung des Streichorchesters. Der fast schon übliche Darstellungsfehler bei Beethovens Achter, sie als „heiteren" Rückblick in die Jugendzeit zu sehen, wie auch die Angewohnheit, Mozart grundsätzlich rokokohaft zu präsentieren, wenn er nicht gerade in Moll schreibt, beide Fehler blieben aus — zugunsten der Charakteristik der Werke! Bravo!

Sherman Walt, erster Fagottist des Orchesters, zeigte z. B. durch sein Spiel, daß Mozarts Fagottkonzert mehr enthält als bloße empfindsame Konvention, und erwies sich dadurch nicht nur als Meister seines Instrumentes, sondern auch als hervorragender Interpret. Alles in allem: Diesmal war's wirklich ein Meisterkonzert! Ingo Schmitt

Niederbergische Morgenzeitung WAZ Velbert, 14.4.71

Klangapparat brodelt bis zum Bersten

Bostoner Sinfonieorchester sorgte für die Konzertsensation in Wuppertal

NIEDERBERG. Die Begeisterungswogen des Publikums gingen in der ausverkauften Elberfelder Stadthalle wieder einmal beim jüngsten „Stich" innerhalb Rudolf Wylachs Meisterkonzertreihe hoch: das Bostoner Sinfonieorchester, eines der traditionsreichsten und qualitativ besten der gesamten Welt, sorgte für „die" Konzertsensation innerhalb der Saison 1970/71.

tterte Dirigent Michael Tilson Thomas ließ die Hundert-Mann-Armada in einem Präzisionsakt ohnegleichen singen, schluchzen, heulen, donnern und — bei Ravels „La-Valse"-Tondichtung zum Schluß — explodieren.

Der vibrierende, bei der Schlußstretta nahezu orgastisch in Klangbewegung gekommene Apparat, dabei empfindlich wie ein Geigerzähler und auf die subtilsten Nuancen seines Chefs eingehend, brodelte bis zum Bersten.

Nirgendwann wir in Wuppertal bei einem Konzert der Beifall enthusiastischer und spontaner, als bei dieser Begegnung, die live vom Rundfunk übertragen wurde, womit zugleich auf die außergewöhnliche Bedeutung hingewiesen sei, daß die „Bostonians" in Wuppertal als einziger Stadt in Nordrhein-Westfalen im Rahmen ihrer Europa-Tournee anläßlich des 90jährigen Bestehens dieses Orchesters gastierten. Es war ein bravouröser Abend schlechthin.

Das bezeugte fernerhin das für europäische Traditionen unorthodoxe Programm: Beethovens „Achte", hier ein wenig zu forsch und aggressiv gespielt, dann Schönbergs irrsinnig schwierig zu interpretierenden „Fünf Orchesterstükke op. 16", mit deren Leuchtkraft und technischer Differenzierung die Bostoner ein Paradebeispiel orchestralen Schliffs abgaben und eingangs Debussy's „Tongedicht" „Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune", zauberhaft duftig und irdisch gelöst „hingeworfen" und in memoriam Igor Strawinsky zugeeignet, der kürzlich verstarb.

Dazwischen eine Konzertsaal-Rarität: Mozarts Fagottkonzert B-Dur, KV 191, das der Solofagottist Sherman Walt mit derart hinreißender Grazie und technischer Wandlungsfähigkeit blies, daß das Publikum aus dem Häuschen geriet. J. R.

p.p. 1 — 119
Scrapbook #2
1971 BSO (Steinberg)
fiedler European tour
Pre tour pub. table of contents

Wuppertaler Tagebuch 13/4.71

„Wirklich ein Meister-Konzert"

Boston-Symphony-Orchestra unter Michael Tilson Thomas gastierte

Selten schon verbindet sich in der künstlerischen Praxis das Impulsive mit dem Technischen. Noch seltener aber stehen Technisches und Impulsives als gleichwertige Medien demjenigen Etwas zur Verfügung, das Kandinski „das Geistige in der Kunst" nannte, das — speziell in der Musik — trotz großartiger Sinnentwürfe bisher begrifflich nicht faßbar wurde, das — in Analogie zur Logik eines Gedankenganges — die innere Folgerichtigkeit, die gleichermaßen inhaltliche wie grammatische Richtigkeit einer künstlerischen Äußerung zustande bringt. Das letzte Meisterkonzert machte Wuppertals Hörer mit Musikern bekannt, die diese seltenste Art meisterhaften Musizierens beherrschen: Dem Boston Symphony Orchestra und seinem jungen „Nachwuchschef" Michael Tilson Thomas.

Diese Fähigkeit erwies sich in den beiden historisch eng umgrenzten Bereichen, zwischen denen das Programm in seiner Reihenfolge hin und her pendelte: dem „klassischen" Bereich Mozarts und Beethovens und jener Epoche zu Beginn unseres Jahrhunderts, in der zwei wesentliche Züge der sogenannten „Neuen Musik" angelegt werden: Die Verwendung von Klangfarbe und Bewegung als gleichwertige Elemente der Musik neben Melodie und Harmonie — und die Verbindung von äußerster Charakteristik des Inhaltes mit nüchterner Ökonomie der Mittel, beides in einer die Spätromantik noch überbietenden Verfeinerung der Zwischenstufen in allen Dimensionen des Ausdruckes und der Satztechnik.

Um gleich bei der zuletzt genannten Epoche zu bleiben: Hier ließ der Darstellungsstil keinen Wunsch offen. Debussys zauberhaft zartes „Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune" erklang ebenso charakteristisch, wie Ravels fast alptraumhafte Walzervision „La Valse" und wie insbesondere die expressionistischen fünf Orchesterstücke op. 16 von Schönberg, einem Werk der schärfsten emotionalen Kontraste von unerhörter Differenzierung und Intensität, dem künstlerischen Höhepunkt des Abends!

In der Darstellung dieses schwierigen Stückes zeigte sich denn auch ganz besonders die phänomenale Fähigkeit des Dirigenten, den inneren Sinn jeder musikalischen Formulierung unmittelbar zum Erlebnis zu bringen. Diese Fähigkeit, die er fast ohne Einschränkung den ganzen Abend hindurch bewies, berechtigt zu den höchsten Erwartungen. Es gibt viele erstklassige Dirigiertechniker, es gibt so manchen suggestiven jungen Wirbelwind am Pult, selten aber einen, von dem man wie von ihm sagen könnte, er „verkörpere" buchstäblich den Sinn der Musik, deren Darstellung er leitet.

Die „klassischen" Stücke brachten die Musiker in vergleichbarer Vollkommenheit, trotz der durchweg zu starken Besetzung des Streichorchesters. Der fast schon übliche Darstellungsfehler bei Beethovens Achter, sie als „heiteren" Rückblick in die Jugendzeit zu sehen, wie auch die Angewohnheit, Mozart grundsätzlich rokokohaft zu präsentieren, wenn er nicht gerade in Moll schreibt, beide Fehler blieben aus — zugunsten der Charakteristik der Werke! Bravo!

Sherman Walt, erster Fagottist des Orchesters, zeigte z. B. durch sein Spiel, daß Mozarts Fagottkonzert mehr enthält als bloße empfindsame Konvention, und erwies sich dadurch nicht nur als Meister seines Instrumentes, sondern auch als hervorragender Interpret. Alles in allem: Diesmal war's wirklich ein Meisterkonzert! Ingo Schmitt

Niederbergische Morgenzeitung WAZ Velbert, 14.4.71

Klangapparat brodelt bis zum Bersten

Bostoner Sinfonieorchester sorgte für die Konzertsensation in Wuppertal

NIEDERBERG. Die Begeisterungswogen des Publikums gingen in der ausverkauften Elberfelder Stadthalle wieder einmal beim jüngsten „Stich" innerhalb Rudolf Wylachs Meisterkonzertreihe hoch: das Bostoner Sinfonieorchester, eines der traditionsreichsten und qualitativ besten der gesamten Welt, sorgte für „die" Konzertsensation innerhalb der Saison 1970/71.

tierte Dirigent Michael Tilson Thomas ließ die Hundert-Mann-Armada in einem Präzisionsakt ohnegleichen singen, schluchzen, heulen, donnern und — bei Ravels „La-Valse"-Tondichtung zum Schluß — explodieren.

Der vibrierende, bei der Schlußstretta nahezu orgastisch in Klangbewegung gekommene Apparat, dabei empfindlich wie ein Geigerzähler und auf die subtilsten Nuancen seines Chefs eingehend, brodelte bis zum Bersten.

Nirgendwann wir in Wuppertal bei einem Konzert der Beifall enthusiastischer und spontaner, als bei dieser Begegnung, die live vom Rundfunk übertragen wurde, womit zugleich auf die außergewöhnliche Bedeutung hingewiesen sei, daß die „Bostonians" in Wuppertal als einziger Stadt in Nordrhein-Westfalen im Rahmen ihrer Europa-Tournee anläßlich des 90jährigen Bestehens dieses Orchesters gastierten. Es war ein bravouröser Abend schlechthin.

Das bezeugte fernerhin das für europäische Traditionen unorthodoxe Programm: Beethovens „Achte", hier ein wenig zu forsch und aggressiv gespielt, dann Schönbergs irrsinnig schwierig zu interpretierenden „Fünf Orchesterstükke op. 16", mit deren Leuchtkraft und technischer Differenzierung die Bostoner ein Paradebeispiel orchestralen Schliffs abgaben und eingangs Debussy's „Tongedicht" „Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune", zauberhaft duftig und irdisch gelöst „hingeworfen" und in memoriam Igor Strawinsky zugeeignet, der kürzlich verstarb.

Dazwischen eine Konzertsaal-Rarität: Mozarts Fagottkonzert B-Dur, KV 191, das der Solofagottist Sherman Walt mit derart hinreißender Grazie und technischer Wandlungsfähigkeit blies, daß das Publikum aus dem Häuschen geriet. J. R.

P.P. 1 — 119

Scrapbook #2

1971 BSO (Steinberg)
fiedler European tour
Pre tour pub. table of contents

84

BETTER ROMANTIC BACCHAE THAN CLASSICAL PRIESTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Steinberg, performed at Philharmonic Hall.

During their "friendly missions"through the musical parts of Europe, they visited Philharmonic Hall for two days, rehearsing, performing, with man, mouse, management and three conductors in their luggage. Nicknamed "the Bostonians" and officially " The Boston Symphony Orchestra", this monumental musical machine from the East Coast of America, showed that the New World cultivates more than the orchestrial "Schnellbrenner" (litteraly: "quick burner") like the New York Philharmonic or the Cleveland Orchestra. The friendly, portly Bostonians, glowing with a great tradition, are the Vienna Philharmonic of America.

Certainly they are not civil servants performing music, but rather a young elite class of performers. And when the string section, in particular the very basic Cello-Bass-chorus, plucked their strings, an extremely rare antique gold revealed itself, a tone of romantic volume opened up wide. With their sense of fullness of music, the Bostonians are like an X-ray screen for musical scores. They prefer to shine rather than to shine through(the musical scores).

Both concerts in Berlin were conducted by William Steinberg. He is the "Chef de Plaisier" (Head of Enjoyment) until 1972. His personal "plaisier" (enjoyment- selections?) may not be consistent with the inclinations and abilities of the orchestra. During rehearsal he had the stern authority of an Otto Klemperer but during the performance he conducted with the slowness of an old man, in order to avoid breathing on the rendition with Furtwanglerian breath. The dramatic element reversed momentarily and the subtleness sounded surprisingly constrained. On the other hand, the contours melted as if the Clock of Music were touched by Dali.

During the incredibly original Beethoven-Program of pure crown jewels- Leonore 111, Dritte and Funfte Symphony, the convential, almost routine interpretations momentarily radiated rays of the glowing orchestra. The old man on the podium permitted the twilight of second-rate epenthesis to fall over the so well-known, sharply defined Beethoven Forms.

To those listeneres accustomed to the Berlin Philharmonic, the Bostonians" may have seemed like romantic Bacchae rather than classical Priests. In the second program, they set Wagner's prelude to the "Meistersinger" in a firmly disicplined frenzy and in the second symphony by Brahms sipped their well developed charms dry.

That so "un-American" technique of epicureanism could serve as a model if Steinberg's almost ostentatious passiveness were not always there. In Brahms, the orchestra rendered its best moments alone, rather than with his directions. The same is true in Hindersmith's 1932 "Bostoner Symphonie", the counterpoints of which have been, for a long time, becoming trite. They are nevertheless useful in the duel between the strings and the magnificent, rustic, triumphant winds. The orchestra attained its limit in Gunter Schuller's "Five Bagatelles", a modern sound-pastiche in several tempos and variations included in the portfolios of other skilled composers.

Berlin also experienced the fragil, elastic form of the 26 year old junior conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, but he didn't perform. He is, in many ways, Steinbergs living opposite. At a rehearsal of Tschaikowsky and Schumann for the performance in Hannover, he conducted with a very direct emotional pulse which transformed the orchestra into sound. It allowed itself to be molded softly, tenselv and sensitively, and it assumed the exact gestures. Only after a public emergency might it be determined whether this "early bloomer" lecturn poet should dare to enter the forum of music wherein direction and reason are synonymous. His public relations in the U.S. favor this, his recordings are against it.

In conclusion: During the tour, if Bonn should enjoy the pleasure of a Boston-Pop Concert with the entertainment version of the orchestra, then Berlin wouldn't take it without protest. The grand old man of every typical Boston Show, Arthur Fiedler, adorns the performance for appearance only. That's wonderful: mustache and silver hair produce the effect of an American TV- Grandfather. Bonn may overhear his "Hair".

Walter Bachauer.

DIE WELT - Nr. 85 - Dienstag, 13. April 1971

Eher sind sie romantische Bacchanten als Priester der Klassik

In der Philharmonie gastierte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem Dirigenten Steinberg

Auf ihren „friendly missions" durch das musikalische Europa belagerten sie für zwei Tage die Philharmonie, probend und konzertierend, mit Mann, Maus, Management und drei Dirigenten im Troß. Im Jargon „The Bostonians", offiziell das „Boston Symphony Orchestra" geheißen, zeigte der monumentale Musikapparat von der amerikanischen Ostküste, daß die Neue Welt nicht nur perfekte orchestrale Schnellbrenner wie das New York Philharmonic oder das Cleveland Orchestra züchtet. Die in großer Tradition glänzenden, freundlich behäbigen Bostoner sind Amerikas Wiener Philharmoniker.

Keine musizierenden Staatsbeamten obzwar, vielmehr im Durchschnitt eine junge Spieler-Elite; und doch, wenn diese Streichertruppe, zumal der wahrhaft fundamentale Celli-Bässe-Chor, die Saiten rührt, prunkt ein äußerst selten gewordenes Altgold auf, ein Klang romantischen Volumens öffnet sich weit. Bei ihrem Gefühl für das Runde in der Musik muß man die Bostoner schon zwingen, Röntgenschirm für Partituren zu sein. Sie wollen lieber leuchten als durchleuchten.

Die beiden Berliner Konzerte standen allein unter William Steinbergs Diktat. Er ist bis 1972 Chef de Plaisier in Boston. Sein privates Plaisier indes mag mit den Fähigkeiten und Lüsten des Orchesters nicht kongruent sein. Bei Proben hat Steinberg einen Zug zur unwirschen Autorität Otto Klemperers, im Konzert teilt er mit ihm die langsamen Alterstempi, doch nicht die Kunst, Überlängen mit Furtwänglerschem Atem anzuhauchen. Dramatisches rutscht bisweilen auf den Knien daher, Mildes kann unversehens hartleibig klingen, umgekehrt Konturiertes hinschmelzen, als hätte Dali die musikalischen Uhren erweicht.

In dem unglaublich originellen Beethoven-Programm aus puren Kronjuwelen — Leonore III, Dritte und Fünfte Symphonie — schoß der Strahl des Bostoner Glanzes immer nur Augenblicke aus konventionellen, beinahe routinemäßigen Interpretationen. Der alte Mann am Pult ließ es gewähren, daß über die so wohlbekannten, scharf geschnittenen Beethoven-Formen die Dämmerung zweitrangiger Epen fiel.

Nun, den an Berlins Philharmoniker gewöhnten Hörern mögen die „Bostonians" von Natur aus nicht als Priester der Klassik erscheinen, eher als romantische Bacchanten, die — im zweiten Programm — Wagners Meistersinger-Vorspiel in einen festlich disziplinierten Taumel versetzten oder die Zweite Symphonie von Brahms in ihrer vollschlanken Grazie bis zur Neige kosteten. Jene so „unamerikanische" Technik des Epikuräertums könnte exemplarisch sein, wäre da nicht stets wieder Steinbergs fast ostentative Passivität. Die besten Momente bei Brahms erspielte sich das Orchester eher gegen als mit seinem Willen. Ebenso in Hindemiths 1932 komponierter „Bostoner Symphonie", deren längst banal gewordene Kontrapunkte immerhin noch zum Duell der Streicher mit den prächtigen, rustikal triumphierenden Bleichbläsern taugen. An seinem äußersten Ende war der Bostoner Aktionsradius in Gunther Schullers „Five Bagatelles" angelangt: eine modernistische Klang-Pastiche in mehreren Tempi und Variationen, die von der geschickten Hand im Portefeuille anderer Komponisten leben.

Nicht zu hören bekam Berlin den Juniordirigenten Michael Tilson Thomas, eine fragile, elastische Gestalt von erst 26 Jahren, in vieler Hinsicht Steinbergs leibhaftiger Gegenspieler. Bei Tschaikowsky- und Schumann-Proben für den Auftritt in Hannover dirigierte er mit sehr direktem emotionalem Puls ein selbst im Klang verwandeltes Orchester. Es läßt sich zart, gespannt, sensibel modellieren, nimmt seine Gesten liebevoll beim Wort. Ob sich der frühreife Pult-Poet aufs Parkett jener Musik wagen darf, wo gute Regie eins ist mit Ratio, möchte man nur nach einem öffentlichen Ernstfall entscheiden. Seine Public Relations in den USA sprechen dafür, seine Schallplatten noch dagegen.

William Steinberg dirigierte das Boston Symphony Orchestra in den Berliner Gastkonzerten

Foto: v. d. Becke

Zu guter Letzt: Daß nur Bonn auf dieser Tournee in den Genuß eines „Boston Pop"-Konzerts mit der Entertainment-Version des Orchesters kommen wird, sollte Berlin nicht protestlos hinnehmen. Der grand old man jener so typischen Boston-Show, Arthur Fiedler, zierte hier nur optisch die Empfänge an der Peripherie. Und zwar wundersam: Schnurrbart und Silberhaar stellen sofort das zentrale Erlebnis eines amerikanischen TV-Großvaters her. Bonn darf sein „Hair" erlauschen.

Walter Bachauer

*

Während eines Empfanges im Anschluß an das erste Gastkonzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra am Ostersamstag in der Berliner Philharmonie hat der Senator für Wissenschaft und Kunst, Prof. Werner Stein, dem Stellvertretenden Kommandanten des amerikanischen Sektors von Berlin, Gesandten Brewster H. Morris, einen 10 000-DM-Scheck der Berliner Gillette Roth-Büchner GmbH und der Braun AG, Kronberg, für die Deutsch-Amerikanische Studienhilfe überreicht.

Die Deutsch-Amerikanische Studienhilfe wurde im April 1970 von einer Gruppe prominenter Deutscher und in Berlin ansässiger Amerikaner als gemeinnütziger Verein gegründet und seither von zahlreichen Mitgliedern und Förderern unterstützt, zu denen insbesondere Minister Brewster H. Morris zählt.

Der Beitrag von Gillette Roth-Büchner und Braun, die auch die Osterkonzerte der Bostoner Symphoniker unter William Steinberg in Berlin ermöglichten, soll dem Ziel dienen, begabten bedürftigen Studenten in der Bundesrepublik und den USA zu Stipendien zu verhelfen.

D. W.

During a ceremony immediately following the first gueat appearance of the Boston Symphonie Orchestra on Easter Saturday at the Berlin Philharmonic, representative of Services and the Arts, Professor Werner Stein, presented a 10,000 DM check from Gillette Roth-Buchner Inc. of Berlin and the Braun Corp. in Kronberg to the acting commander , Brewster H. Morris, of the American Sector in Berlin, for a Scholarship in German-American studies.

The Deutsche-Amerikaner-Atudienhilfe was established as a useful common society in April 1970 by a group of prominent Americans residing in Berlin. Since that time. it has been supported by numerous members and sponsors, one of whom is Minister Brewster H. Morris.

The contribution from Gillette Roth-Buchner and Braun, who also made the Boston Symphony Orchetra's Easter concert possible in Berlin, will be used to assist gifted needy students in the B.R.D. amd the U.S.A.

berlin

84

BETTER ROMANTIC BACCHAE THAN CLASSICAL PRIESTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Steinberg, performed at Philharmonic Hall.

During their "friendly missions"through the musical parts of Europe, they visited Philharmonic Hall for two days, rehearsing, performing, with man, mouse, management and three conductors in their luggage. Nicknamed "the Bostonians" and officially " The Boston Symphony Orchestra", this monumental musical machine from the East Coast of America, showed that the New World cultivates more than the orchestrial "Schnellbrenner" (litteraly: "quick burner") like the New York Philharmonic or the Cleveland Orchestra. The friendly, portly Bostonians, glowing with a great tradition, are the Vienna Philharmonic of America.

Certainly they are not civil servants performing music, but rather a young elite class of performers. And when the string section, in particular the very basic Cello-Bass-chorus, plucked their strings, an extremely rare antique gold revealed itself, a tone of romantic volume opened up wide. With their sense of fullness of music, the Bostonians are like an X-ray screen for musical scores. They prefer to shine rather than to shine through(the musical scores).

Both concerts in Berlin were conducted by William Steinberg. He is the "Chef de Plaisier" (Head of Enjoyment) until 1972. His personal "plaisier" (enjoyment- selections?) may not be consistent with the inclinations and abilities of the orchestra. During rehearsal he had the stern authority of an Otto Klemperer but during the performance he conducted with the slowness of an old man, in order to avoid breathing on the rendition with Furtwanglerian breath. The dramatic element reversed momentarily and the subtleness sounded surprisingly constrained. On the other hand, the contours melted as if the Clock of Music were touched by Dali.

During the incredibly original Beethoven-Program of pure crown jewels-Leonore 111, Dritte and Funfte Symphony, the convential, almost routine interpretations momentarily radiated rays of the glowing orchestra. The old man on the podium permitted the twilight of second-rate epenthesis to fall over the so well-known, sharply defined Beethoven Forms.

To those listeneres accustomed to the Berlin Philharmonic, the Bostonians" may have seemed like romantic Bacchae rather than classical Priests. In the second program, they set Wagner's prelude to the "Meistersinger" in a firmly disicplined frenzy and in the second symphony by Brahms sipped their well developed charms dry.

That so "un-American" technique of epicureanism could serve as a model if Steinberg's almost ostentatious passiveness were not always there. In Brahms, the orchestra rendered its best moments alone, rather than with his directions. The same is true in Hindersmith's 1932 "Bostoner Symphonie", the counterpoints of which have been, for a long time, becoming trite. They are nevertheless useful in the duel between the strings and the magnificent, rustic, triumphant winds. The orchestra attained its limit in Gunter Schuller's "Five Bagatelles", a modern sound-pastiche in several tempos and variations included in the portfolios of other skilled composers.

Berlin also experienced the fragil, elastic form of the 26 year old junior conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, but he didn't perform. He is, in many ways, Steinbergs living opposite. At a rehearsal of Tschaikowsky and Schumann for the performance in Hannover, he conducted with a very direct emotional pulse which transformed the orchestra into sound. It allowed itself to be molded softly, tenselv and sensitively, and it assumed the exact gestures. Only after a public emergency might it be determined whether this "early bloomer" lecturn poet should dare to enter the forum of music wherein direction and reason are synonymous. His public relations in the U.S. favor this, his recordings are against it.

In conclusion: During the tour, if Bonn should enjoy the pleasure of a Boston-Pop Concert with the entertainment version of the orchestra, then Berlin wouldn't take it without protest. The grand old man of every typical Boston Show, Arthur Fiedler, adorns the performance for appearance only. That's wonderful: mustache and silver hair produce the effect of an American TV- Grandfather. Bonn may overhear his "Hair".

Walter Bachauer.

Eher sind sie romantische Bacchanten als Priester der Klassik

In der Philharmonie gastierte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem Dirigenten Steinberg

Auf ihren „friendly missions" durch das musikalische Europa belagerten sie für zwei Tage die Philharmonie, probend und konzertierend, mit Mann, Maus, Management und drei Dirigenten im Troß. Im Jargon „The Bostonians", offiziell das „Boston Symphony Orchestra" geheißen, zeigte der monumentale Musikapparat von der amerikanischen Ostküste, daß die Neue Welt nicht nur perfekte orchestrale Schnellbrenner wie das New York Philharmonic oder das Cleveland Orchestra züchtet. Die in großer Tradition glänzenden, freundlich behäbigen Bostoner sind Amerikas Wiener Philharmoniker.

Keine musizierenden Staatsbeamten obzwar, vielmehr im Durchschnitt eine junge Spieler-Elite; und doch, wenn diese Streichertruppe, zumal der wahrhaft fundamentale Celli-Bässe-Chor, die Saiten rührt, prunkt ein äußerst selten gewordenes Altgold auf, ein Klang romantischen Volumens öffnet sich weit. Bei ihrem Gefühl für das Runde in der Musik muß man die Bostoner schon zwingen, Röntgenschirm für Partituren zu sein. Sie wollen lieber leuchten als durchleuchten.

Die beiden Berliner Konzerte standen allein unter William Steinbergs Diktat. Er ist bis 1972 Chef de Plaisier in Boston. Sein privates Plaisier indes mag mit den Fähigkeiten und Lüsten des Orchesters nicht kongruent sein. Bei Proben hat Steinberg einen Zug zur unwirschen Autorität Otto Klemperers, im Konzert teilt er mit ihm die langsamen Alterstempi, doch nicht die Kunst, Überlängen mit Furtwänglerschem Atem anzuhauchen. Dramatisches rutscht bisweilen auf den Knien daher, Mildes kann unversehens hartleibig klingen, umgekehrt Konturiertes hinschmelzen, als hätte Dali die musikalischen Uhren erweicht.

In dem unglaublich originellen Beethoven-Programm aus puren Kronjuwelen — Leonore III, Dritte und Fünfte Symphonie — schoß der Strahl des Bostoner Glanzes immer nur Augenblicke aus konventionellen, beinahe routinemäßigen Interpretationen. Der alte Mann am Pult ließ es gewähren, daß über die so wohlbekannten, scharf geschnittenen Beethoven-Formen die Dämmerung zweitrangiger Epen fiel.

Nun, den an Berlins Philharmoniker gewöhnten Hörern mögen die „Bostonians" von Natur aus nicht als Priester der Klassik erscheinen, eher als romantische Bacchanten, die — im zweiten Programm — Wagners Meistersinger-Vorspiel in einen festlich disziplinierten Taumel versetzten oder die Zweite Symphonie von Brahms in ihrer vollschlanken Grazie bis zur Neige kosteten. Jene so „unamerikanische" Technik des Epikuräertums könnte exemplarisch sein, wäre da nicht stets wieder Steinbergs fast ostentative Passivität. Die besten Momente bei Brahms erspielte sich das Orchester eher gegen als mit seinem Willen. Ebenso in Hindemiths 1932 komponierter „Bostoner Symphonie", deren längst banal gewordene Kontrapunkte immerhin noch zum Duell der Streicher mit den prächtigen, rustikal triumphierenden Bleichbläsern taugen. An seinem äußersten Ende war der Bostoner Aktionsradius in Gunther Schullers „Five Bagatelles" angelangt: eine modernistische Klang-Pastiche in mehreren Tempi und Variationen, die von der geschickten Hand im Portefeuille anderer Komponisten leben.

Nicht zu hören bekam Berlin den Juniordirigenten Michael Tilson Thomas, eine fragile, elastische Gestalt von erst 26 Jahren, in vieler Hinsicht Steinbergs leibhaftiger Gegenspieler. Bei Tschaikowsky- und Schumann-Proben für den Auftritt in Hannover dirigierte er mit sehr direktem emotionalem Puls ein selbst im Klang verwandeltes Orchester. Es läßt sich zart, gespannt, sensibel modellieren, nimmt seine Gesten liebevoll beim Wort. Ob sich der frühreife Pult-Poet aufs Parkett jener Musik wagen darf, wo gute Regie eins ist mit Ratio, möchte man nur nach einem öffentlichen Ernstfall entscheiden. Seine Public Relations in den USA sprechen dafür, seine Schallplatten noch dagegen.

Zu guter Letzt: Daß nur Bonn auf dieser Tournee in den Genuß eines „Boston Pop"-Konzerts mit der Entertainment-Version des Orchesters kommen wird, sollte Berlin nicht protestlos hinnehmen. Der grand old man jener so typischen Boston-Show, Arthur Fiedler, zierte hier nur optisch die Empfänge an der Peripherie. Und zwar wundersam: Schnurrbart und Silberhaar stellen sofort das zentrale Erlebnis eines amerikanischen TV-Großvaters her. Bonn darf sein „Hair" erlauschen.

Walter Bachauer

William Steinberg dirigierte das Boston Symphony Orchestra in den Berliner Gastkonzerten

Foto: v. d. Becke

*

Während eines Empfanges im Anschluß an das erste Gastkonzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra am Ostersamstag in der Berliner Philharmonie hat der Senator für Wissenschaft und Kunst, Prof. Werner Stein, dem Stellvertretenden Kommandanten des amerikanischen Sektors von Berlin, Gesandten Brewster H. Morris, einen 10 000-DM-Scheck der Berliner Gillette Roth-Büchner GmbH und der Braun AG, Kronberg, für die Deutsch-Amerikanische Studienhilfe überreicht.

Die Deutsch-Amerikanische Studienhilfe wurde im April 1970 von einer Gruppe prominenter Deutscher und in Berlin ansässiger Amerikaner als gemeinnütziger Verein gegründet und seither von zahlreichen Mitgliedern und Förderern unterstützt, zu denen insbesondere Minister Brewster H. Morris zählt.

Der Beitrag von Gillette Roth-Büchner und Braun, die auch die Osterkonzerte der Bostoner Symphoniker unter William Steinberg in Berlin ermöglichten, soll dem Ziel dienen, begabten bedürftigen Studenten in der Bundesrepublik und den USA zu Stipendien zu verhelfen.

D. W.

During a ceremony immediately following the first gueat appearance of the Boston Symphonie Orchestra on Easter Saturday at the Berlin Philharmonic, representative of Services and the Arts, Professor Werner Stein, presented a 10,000 DM check from Gillette Roth-Buchner Inc. of Berlin and the Braun Corp. in Kronberg to the acting commander , Brewster H. Morris, of the American Sector in Berlin, for a Scholarship in German-American studies.

The Deutsche-Amerikaner-Atudienhilfe was established as a useful common society in April 1970 by a group of prominent Americans residing in Berlin. Since that time. it has been supported by numerous members and sponsors, one of whom is Minister Brewster H. Morris.

The contribution from Gillette Roth-Buchner and Braun, who also made the Boston Symphony Orchetra's Easter concert possible in Berlin, will be used to assist gifted needy students in the B.R.D. amd the U.S.A.

berlin

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Philharmonie

Prachtvoller Übergang

Die Philharmonie war am ersten Abend voll besetzt. Das Podium auch. Denn die Stärke, in der das Boston Symphony Orchestra erschien, war — amerikanisch. Die Verdoppelung der Holzbläser ist auch bei uns nicht selten. Sechs Hörner aber haben wir bei der Ouvertüre „Leonore III" noch nicht erlebt.

Mit ihr begannen die Bostoner ihren Beethoven-Abend — ein Beginn, der leider nicht sonderlich glücklich war. William Steinberg, seit zwei Jahren Chef des Orchesters, dehnte nicht nur die langsame Einleitung übermäßig, sondern auch das Allegro. Steigerungen und Höhepunkte wurden vorzeitig verschwendet. Immerhin war seine Konzeption noch diskutabel. Die schwerfällig-plumpe des „Meistersinger"-Vorspiels am zweiten (wesentlich schwächer besuchten) Abend war es nicht mehr. Auch Hindemiths dem Orchester gewidmete „Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser" hätten wir uns im ersten Satz feiner abgetönt vorstellen können.

88 0 88 Jägernummer!

Besser gelangen die beiden folgenden Sätze.

Dabei böte das Boston Symphony Orchestra einem Dirigenten jede Möglichkeit zu künstlerisch bedeutsamer Auswirkung. Es hat eine große Tradition, existiert seit 1881 und hat unter seinen Leitern Persönlichkeiten wie Nikisch, Muck, Monteux und Kussewitzky aufzuweisen. Die Disziplin der Streicher, etwa im Fugato Hindemiths, ließ nichts zu wünschen übrig. Der schlanke Ton der Soloflöten — im Orchester sitzen auch mehrere Damen — kontrastiert wirkungsvoll den süßen Klang der Solooboe. Das 1. Horn brillierte mit einem zauberhaften Piano im Allegro con brio der „Eroica".

Womit wir bei den Glanzleistungen des Orchesters angekommen sind. Die „Eroica" war eine. Steinberg traf genau die richtigen Tempi. Scherzo und Finale-Anfang nimmt er schnell, aber nicht zu schnell. Immer hat die Musik Leben und Nerv.

Von nicht geringerem Elan war Beethovens „Fünfte" durchpulst. Der Anfang „saß". Herrlich das Oboensolo in der Reprise. So muß es sein: losgelöst von jeder metrischen Bindung. Vorzüglich das Scherzo-Trio. Energisch und doch ohne jedes Bogengeräusch der Celli. Schade, daß Herr von Karajan das nicht gehört hat. Prachtvoll der berühmte Übergang in den Finalsatz.

Kurt Westphal

Berlin Zeitung April 13, 1971

BZ Kritik

EINEN Scheck über 10 000 Mark bekam Senator Stein (links) nach dem Konzert für Studienhilfen.

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (l. Ts.): 43,3 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Siegener Zeitung, Siegen

vom 17. April 1971

3 Das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter der Leitung von William Steinberg setzte seine Deutschland-Tournee mit großem Erfolg in der Berliner Philharmonie fort. Ein festliches Publikum dankte Musikern und Dirigenten mit anhaltenden Ovationen für die Aufführung von Beethovens „Leonore"-Ouvertüre, der Symphonie Nr. 3 „Eroica" und der Symphonie Nr. 5. Nach dem Berliner Gastspiel wird das Orchester in Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt/Main und Bonn sowohl unter Steinberg als auch unter Michael Tilson Thomas und Arthur Fiedler gastieren.

BERLINER ZEITUNG

April 13 1971

Review of Philharmonic Hall concert by KURT WESTPHAL

MAGNIFICENT TRANSITION

Philharmonic Hall was completely full the first evening. So was the stage, because the size of the Boston Symphony was, well -- American. Doubling the winds is not unusual here, either. But we've never before lived through six horns in the 3rd Leonore overture.

The Bostonians began their Beethoven evening with this overture, a beginning which didn't quite turn out as expected. William Steinberg, the Orchestra's Music Director for the last two years, not only dragged out the Introduction, but also the Allegro. Crescendos and climaxes were cut off too soon. But nevertheless, his approach was defensible. The heavy, bombastic Meistersinger overture which began the second (and not nearly so well-attended evening) was no improvement. One would also have expected the first movement of Hindemith's Music for strings and brass orchestra, dedicated to the Orchestra, to have been dealt with little more sensitively. The following two movements were better.

Nevertheless, the Boston Symphony Orchestra offers a conductor every possibility to realize his artistic intentions. It has had a great tradition beginning in 1881 and has numbered among its conductors such personalities as Nikisch, Muck, Monteux, and Koussevitzky. The discipline of the strings in the Hindemith fugato, for instance, left nothing to be desired. The delicate tone of the solo flute -- there are quite a few women in the Orchestra -- contrasted effectively with the sweet sound of the solo oboe. The first horn played the Eroica's soft passages magically.

With that we come to the highlights of the performance. The Eroica was one of these. Steinberg found exactly the right tempi. He took the scherzp and finale fast, but not too fast. There was life and substance in the music.

No less exciting was Beethoven's Fifth. The beginning "jelled." The oboe solo in the reprise was magnificent. This was the way it should be: free from metric rigidity. The scherzo trio was superb, energetic yet free of extraneous scraping noises from the cello bows. Too bad that Herr von Karajan was not there to hear that. The famous transition to the final movement was incomparable.

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Philharmonie

Prachtvoller Übergang

Die Philharmonie war am ersten Abend voll besetzt. Das Podium auch. Denn die Stärke, in der das Boston Symphony Orchestra erschien, war — amerikanisch. Die Verdoppelung der Holzbläser ist auch bei uns nicht selten. Sechs Hörner aber haben wir bei der Ouvertüre „Leonore III" noch nicht erlebt.

Mit ihr begannen die Bostoner ihren Beethoven-Abend — ein Beginn, der leider nicht sonderlich glücklich war. William Steinberg, seit zwei Jahren Chef des Orchesters, dehnte nicht nur die langsame Einleitung übermäßig, sondern auch das Allegro. Steigerungen und Höhepunkte wurden vorzeitig verschwendet. Immerhin war seine Konzeption noch diskutabel. Die schwerfällig-plumpe des „Meistersinger"-Vorspiels am zweiten (wesentlich schwächer besuchten) Abend war es nicht mehr. Auch Hindemiths dem Orchester gewidmete „Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser" hätten wir uns im ersten Satz feiner abgetönt vorstellen können.

88 0 88 Jägernummer!

Besser gelangen die beiden folgenden Sätze.

Dabei böte das Boston Symphony Orchestra einem Dirigenten jede Möglichkeit zu künstlerisch bedeutsamer Auswirkung. Es hat eine große Tradition, existiert seit 1881 und hat unter seinen Leitern Persönlichkeiten wie Nikisch, Muck, Monteux und Kussewitzky aufzuweisen. Die Disziplin der Streicher, etwa im Fugato Hindemiths, ließ nichts zu wünschen übrig. Der schlanke Ton der Soloflöten — im Orchester sitzen auch mehrere Damen — kontrastiert wirkungsvoll den süßen Klang der Solooboe. Das 1. Horn brillierte mit einem zauberhaften Piano im Allegro con brio der „Eroica".

Womit wir bei den Glanzleistungen des Orchesters angekommen sind. Die „Eroica" war eine. Steinberg traf genau die richtigen Tempi. Scherzo und Finale-Anfang nimmt er schnell, aber nicht zu schnell. Immer hat die Musik Leben und Nerv.

Von nicht geringerem Elan war Beethovens „Fünfte" durchpulst. Der Anfang „saß". Herrlich das Oboensolo in der Reprise. So muß es sein: losgelöst von jeder metrischen Bindung. Vorzüglich das Scherzo-Trio. Energisch und doch ohne jedes Bogengeräusch der Celli. Schade, daß Herr von Karajan das nicht gehört hat. Prachtvoll der berühmte Übergang in den Finalsatz.

Kurt Westphal

Berlin Zeitung April 13, 1971

BZ Kritik

EINEN Scheck über 10 000 Mark bekam Senator Stein (links) nach dem Konzert für Studienhilfen.

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 43,3 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Siegener Zeitung, Siegen

vom 17. April 1971

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter der Leitung von William Steinberg setzte seine Deutschland-Tournee mit großem Erfolg in der Berliner Philharmonie fort. Ein festliches Publikum dankte Musikern und Dirigenten mit anhaltenden Ovationen für die Aufführung von Beethovens „Leonore"-Ouvertüre, der Symphonie Nr. 3 „Eroica" und der Symphonie Nr. 5. Nach dem Berliner Gastspiel wird das Orchester in Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt/Main und Bonn sowohl unter Steinberg als auch unter Michael Tilson Thomas und Arthur Fiedler gastieren.

BERLINER ZEITUNG

April 13 1971

Review of Philharmonic Hall concert by KURT WESTPHAL

MAGNIFICENT TRANSITION

Philharmonic Hall was completely full the first evening. So was the stage, because the size of the Boston Symphony was, well -- American. Doubling the winds is not unusual here, either. But we've never before lived through six horns in the 3rd Leonore overture.

The Bostonians began their Beethoven evening with this overture, a beginning which didn't quite turn out as expected. William Steinberg, the Orchestra's Music Director for the last two years, not only dragged out the Introduction, but also the Allegro. Crescendos and climaxes were cut off too soon. But nevertheless, his approach was defensible. The heavy, bombastic Meistersinger overture which began the second (and not nearly so well-attended evening) was no improvement.
One would also have expected the first movement of Hindemith's Music for strings and brass orchestra, dedicated to the Orchestra, to have been dealt with little more sensitively. The following two movements were better.

Nevertheless, the Boston Symphony Orchestra offers a conductor every possibility to realize his artistic intentions. It has had a great tradition beginning in 1881 and has numbered among its conductors such personalities as Nikisch, Muck, Monteux, and Koussevitzky.
The discipline of the strings in the Hindemith fugato, for instance, left nothing to be desired. The delicate tone of the solo flute -- there are quite a few women in the Orchestra -- contrasted effectively with the sweet sound of the solo oboe. The first horn played the Eroica's soft passages magically.

With that we come to the highlights of the performance. The Eroica was one of these. Steinberg found exactly the right tempi. He took the scherzp and finale fast, but not too fast. There was life and substance in the music.

No less exciting was Beethoven's Fifth. The beginning "jelled." The oboe solo in the reprise was magnificent. This was the way it should be: free from metric rigidity. The scherzo trio was superb, energetic yet free of extraneous scraping noises from the cello bows. Too bad that Herr von Karajan was not there to hear that. The famous transition to the final movement was incomparable.

86

At a reception following a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Representive of the Arts and Sciences , Dr. Stein, presented Arthur Fielder, the conductor, an unusual gift: a fireman's hat. Fielder has a collection from all over the world.

The Best from Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the most famous American Orchestras, performed at Philmarmonic Hall during Easter(not for the first time). The first evening was devoted entirely to works by Beethoven; the second evening a more interesting concert was offered, including works by Brahms, Wagner, Hindermith and Schuller. Attendance the second evening was smaller but the mood, if possible, was more genuine and more expert.

The orchestra reformed at full strength.
The most important group for the sound effect is the string section. This was evident at the previous afternoon of rehearsals. As is typical of all first class American orchestras, performance is of utmost importance, to reach the most refined functions of "the instrument". Those essentially precise values are, however, less important to us in Europe. Indeed, that striving for perfect expression showed itself in Brahms.

William Steinberg, leading conductor of "the Bostonians" after Munch and Leinsdorff, was born in Cologne in 1899. He has had past experience with the Berlin Orchestra, which he vividly recalls.

He leads his group of master muscians into broader tempo with a minimum of effort. At most, he uses the tip of his baton or a slight hand motion in order to reproduce during the last strains of the music that nuance, which was repeatedly rehearsed. The great form, however, remains even without this.

In addition to Steinberg, two other conductors are participating in this European tour; white haired Arthur Fielder, who as a young man studied music in Berlin and who is capable of holding a good friendly chat; Michael Tilson Thomas, a very promising new comer who will apparently soon be standing on the conductor's podium in Berlin.

The theatre was filled to capacity the evening Beethoven was presented. The imaginary content of the third and fifth symphonies was too similar to be given so closely. The Bostonians easily demonstrated their highly cultured touch in "Eroica" and "Schickalsinfonie".

In the famous march of sadness, the melodic premonition of the turning point transformed especially effectively from sadness into confidence. The already performed third Leonore Overture, overburdened the program with another Beethoven hit. There was almost too much force in this combination.

The second concert was more down to earth. Brahms Second Symphony was the highlight. Steinberg presented not only a most disciplined performance by the orchestra but also his and his players' familiarity with the content of this old German music.

Brahms certainly belongs to the basic structure of the Boston repertoire, which has been developed by German conductors since it was established in 1881.

Paul Hindermith,1931, presented the Boston Ensemble in his "Concert Music for Strings and Wind Instruments", a magnificent musical work infused with spirit, whimsy and craftsmanship. It inspired the American musicians to a brillant reproduction. It would be a pleasure to hear this small "Boston Symphony" a second time.

The short "Fünf Bagatellan" by German-American Gunther Schuller(46), famous in Berlin, were also well performed. These charming miniatures of contemporary music, suited for export, testified to the orchestra's open-mindedness toward the contemporary world of sound.

The artistic greatness of this orchestra's European tour can be measured by considering Wagner's Prelude to the "Meistersinger", with which they opened the second evening's performance in bursting fortissimo. Both times in Berlin they were accorded an enthusiastic reception.

Wolfgang Schnmming.

Note: These are amended paragraphs from the Berlitz translation, which was not entirely accurate

Paragraph 2

As is typical of all first-class American orchestras, the highest [illegible] is achieved by [illegible] by the smooth functioning of the instrument, while the expressive values that are at least as essential to us in Europe (as matters of technique) recede (in importance.) Nevertheless, in the Br hms the expressive tendency (lit: striving) manifested itself more strongly (than in the rest of the program.)

Paragraph 7

In the f[illegible] the melodic premonition of the turn from [illegible] especially forcefully. The [illegible] Leonore Overture No.3 overlo ded the program with yet another Beethoven hit. There was almost too much 'giganticness (? - lit: Titanicness) in this combination (of works.)

NB: These are also rough translations, but I have tried to indic te where the Berlitz tr nsl tor misunderstood an important word or contorted the essential m ning of the sentence.

R. Locke

Der Abend, Berlin, April 13, 1971

EIN UNGEWÖHNLICHES GESCHENK überreichte der Senator für Wissenschaft und Kunst, Dr. Stein, auf einem Empfang nach dem Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchestra, dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler: Er schenkte ihm einen Feuerwehrhelm. Fiedler besitzt eine Sammlung mit Stücken aus der ganzen Welt. Foto: von der Becke

BESTES AUS BOSTON

Symphonie Orchestra in der Philharmonie

Als eines der berühmtesten amerikanischen Orchester gastierte (nicht zum erstenmal) das Boston Symphonie Orchestra über Ostern in der Philharmonie. Am ersten Abend füllte es das Haus ausschließlich mit Beethoven; im zweiten, interessanteren Konzert, bot es Werke von Brahms, Wagner, Hindemith und Schuller. Der Besuch war am zweiten Abend schwächer, die Begeisterung aber womöglich noch echter und kennerischer.

Das Orchester trat in sehr großer Besetzung an. Ausschlaggebend für den Klangeindruck sind die kraftvollen Streichergruppen, wie man schon am Probenvormittag konstatieren konnte. Wie bei allen amerikanischen Orchestern der Elite-Klasse wird der höchste Rang dem spieltechnischen Standard, dem glatten Funktionieren des „Apparates" zugemessen, während die uns in Europa mindestens ebenso wesentlichen Ausdruckswerte zurücktreten. Bei Brahms allerdings äußerte sich auch das expressive Streben stärker.

William Steinberg, der jetzige Chefdirigent der Bostoner nach Münch und Leinsdorff, ist ein gebürtiger Kölner vom Jahrgang 1899. Er hat alte Berliner Orchester-Erfahrungen, an die er sich gern erinnert.

▶ Über sein Ensemble von Meisterspielern gebietet er [illegible] Grundlage [illegible] Tempi mit einem Minimum dirigentischen Aufwandes. Meist genügt die Taktstockspitze oder eine leichte Handbewegung, um in der Spannung der abendlichen Aufführungen die auf den Proben in vielfacher Wiederholung festgelegte Nuance zu reproduzieren. Die große Form steht ohnehin fest.

Außer Steinberg sind zwei andere Dirigenten an der gegenwärtigen Europa-Tournee beteiligt, der weißhaarige Arthur Fiedler, der als junger Mann in Berlin Musik studierte und liebenswürdig zu plaudern weiß, außerdem der erst 26jährige Michael Tilson Tomas, der als große Nachwuchshoffnung gilt und wahrscheinlich in absehbarer Zeit auch in Berlin am Pult stehen wird.

▶ An dem ausverkauften Beethoven-Abend waren sich die dritte und die fünfte Sinfonie in ihrem ideellen Gehalt zu ähnlich, um sich nicht gegenseitig wie zwei Nachbarbäume das volle Licht zu nehmen. Auf jeden Fall konnten die Bostoner aber an der „Eroica" und an der sogenannten „Schicksalssinfonie" ihre hohe Spielkultur flüssig nachweisen.

▶ In dem berühmten Trauermarsch geriet die melodische Vorahnung der Wende von Trauer in Zuversicht besonders eindringlich. Die vorausgeschickte dritte Leonoren-Ouvertüre überlud das Programm gleich noch mit einem weiteren Beethoven-Hit. Es war [illegible] viel Titanismus in dieser Kombination.

Das zweite Konzert der Bostoner verlief irdischer. Das Hauptwerk war Brahms' Zweite Sinfonie, mit der Steinberg nicht nur eine höchst disziplinierte Orchesterleistung anzubieten hatte, sondern auch seine und seiner Spieler tiefe Vertrautheit mit dem Gehalt dieser urdeutschen Musik bekunden konnten. Freilich gehört Brahms seit jeher zu den Grundpfeilern des Bostoner Repertoires, das sich nach der Orchestergründung 1881 unter deutschen Dirigenten herausbildete.

▶ Diesem Bostoner Ensemble widmete Paul Hindemith 1931 seine „Konzertmusik für Streicher und Blechbläser", ein prachtvoll musikantisches Stück aus Geist, Laune und handwerklicher Meisterschaft, das die amerikanischen Musiker zu einer glänzenden Wiedergabeleistung inspirierte. Man hätte diese knappe „Bostoner Symphonie" gern gleich noch ein zweites Mal hören mögen.

▶ Auch die kurzen „Fünf Bagatellen" des in Berlin wohlbekannten Deutsch-Amerikaners Gunther Schuller (46) sind gut instrumentierte, reizvolle Miniaturen zeitgenössischer Musik, die sich zum Export eignen und die Aufgeschlossenheit des Orchesters für die Klangwelt unserer Zeit bezeugten.

Nimmt man Wagners „Meistersinger"-Vorspiel hinzu, mit dem das zweite Konzert in ausladendem Fortissimo begann, so ermißt man die künstlerische Spannweite dieses Europa-Gastspiels des hervorragenden Orchesters, das auch in Berlin beide Male von enthusiastischem Beifall begleitet wurde.

WOLFGANG SCHIMMING

86

At a reception following a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Representive of the Arts and Sciences , Dr. Stein, presented Arthur Fielder, the conductor, an unusual gift: a fireman's hat. Fielder has a collection from all over the world.

The Best from Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the most famous American Orchestras, performed at Philmarmonic Hall during Easter(not for the first time). The first evening was devoted entirely to works by Beethoven; the second evening a more interesting concert was offered, including works by Brahms, Wagner, Hindermith and Schuller. Attendance the second evening was smaller but the mood, if possible, was more genuine and more expert.

The orchestra performed at full strength.
The most important group for the sound effect is the string section. This was evident at the previous afternoon of rehearsals. As is typical of all first class American orchestras, performance is of utmost importance, to reach the most refined functions of "the instrument". Those essentially precise values are, however, less important to us in Europe. Indeed, that striving for perfect expression showed itself in Brahms.

William Steinberg, leading conductor of "the Bostonians" after Munch and Leinsdorff, was born in Cologne in 1899. He has had past experience with the Berlin Orchestra, which he vividly recalls.

He leads his group of master muscians into broader tempo with a minimum of effort. At most, he uses the tip of his baton or a slight hand motion in order to reproduce during the last strains of the music that nuance, which was repeatedly rehearsed. The great form, however, remains even without this.

In addition to Steinberg, two other conductors are participating in this European tour; white haired Arthur Fielder, who as a young man studied music in Berlin and who is capable of holding a good friendly chat; Michael Tilson Thomas, a very promising new comer who will apparently soon be standing on the conductor's podium in Berlin.

The theatre was filled to capacity the evening Beethoven was presented. The imaginary content of the third and fifth symphonies was too similar to be given so closely. The Bostonians easily demonstrated their highly cultured touch in "Eroica" and "Schickalsinfonie".

In the famous march of sadness, the melodic premonition of the turning point transformed especially effectively from sadness into confidence. The already performed third Leonore Overture, overburdened the program with another Beethoven hit. There was almost too much force in this combination.

The second concert was more down to earth. Brahms Second Symphony was the highlight. Steinberg presented not only a most disciplined performance by the orchestra but also his and his players' familiarity with the content of this old German music.

Brahms certainly belongs to the basic structure of the Boston repertoire, which has been developed by German conductors since it was established in 1881.

Paul Hindermith,1931, presented the Boston Ensemble in his "Concert Music for Strings and Wind Instruments", a magnificent musical work infused with spirit, whimsy and craftsmanship. It inspired the American musicians to a brillant reproduction. It would be a pleasure to hear this small "Boston Symphony" a second time.

The short "Fünf Bagatellan" by German-American Gunther Schuller(46), famous in Berlin, were also well performed. These charming miniatures of contemporary music, suited for export, testified to the orchestra's open-mindedness toward the contemporary world of sound.

The artistic greatness of this orchestra's European tour can be measured by considering Wagner's Prelude to the "Meistersinger", with which they opened the second evening's performance in bursting fortissimo. Both times in Berlin they were accorded an enthusiastic reception.

Wolfgang Schnmming.

Note: These are amended paragraphs from the Berlitz translation, which was not entirely accurate

Paragraph 2

[illegible] (than in the rest of the program.)

Paragraph 7

[illegible] (? - lit: [illegible]) in this [illegible] (of Lorde.)

NB: There are also many translations, but I have tried to [illegible] the Berlitz translation and [illegible] an important [illegible] of the sentence.

M. Locke

Der Abend. Berlin, April 13, 1971

EIN UNGEWÖHNLICHES GESCHENK überreichte der Senator für Wissenschaft und Kunst, Dr. Stein, auf einem Empfang nach dem Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchestra, dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler: Er schenkte ihm einen Feuerwehrhelm. Fiedler besitzt eine Sammlung mit Stücken aus der ganzen Welt. Foto: von der Becke

BESTES AUS BOSTON

Symphonie Orchestra in der Philharmonie

Als eines der berühmtesten amerikanischen Orchester gastierte (nicht zum erstenmal) das Boston Symphonie Orchestra über Ostern in der Philharmonie. Am ersten Abend füllte es das Haus ausschließlich mit Beethoven; im zweiten, interessanteren Konzert, bot es Werke von Brahms, Wagner, Hindemith und Schuller. Der Besuch war am zweiten Abend schwächer, die Begeisterung aber womöglich noch echter und kennerischer.

Das Orchester trat in sehr großer Besetzung an. Ausschlaggebend für den Klangeindruck sind die kraftvollen Streichergruppen, wie man schon am Probenvormittag konstatieren konnte. Wie bei allen amerikanischen Orchestern der Elite-Klasse wird der höchste Rang dem spieltechnischen Standard, dem glatten Funktionieren des „Apparates" zugemessen, während die uns in Europa mindestens ebenso wesentlichen Ausdruckswerte zurücktreten. Bei Brahms allerdings äußerte sich auch das expressive Streben stärker.

Willjam Steinberg, der jetzige Chefdirigent der Bostoner nach Münch und Leinsdorff, ist ein gebürtiger Kölner vom Jahrgang 1899. Er hat alte Berliner Orchester-Erfahrungen, an die er sich gern erinnert.

▶ Über sein Ensemble von Meisterspielern gebietet er auf der Grundlage breiter Tempi mit einem Minimum dirigentischen Aufwandes. Meist genügt die Taktstockspitze oder eine leichte Handbewegung, um in der Spannung des abendlichen Spielmomentes die auf den Proben in vielfacher Wiederholung festgelegte Nuance zu reproduzieren. Die große Form steht ohnehin fest.

Außer Steinberg sind zwei andere Dirigenten an der gegenwärtigen Europa-Tournee beteiligt, der weißhaarige Arthur Fiedler, der als junger Mann in Berlin Musik studierte und liebenswürdig zu plaudern weiß, außerdem der erst 26jährige Michael Tilson Tomas, der als große Nachwuchshoffnung gilt und wahrscheinlich in absehbarer Zeit auch in Berlin am Pult stehen wird.

▶ An dem ausverkauften Beethoven-Abend waren sich die dritte und die fünfte Sinfonie in ihrem ideellen Gehalt zu ähnlich, um sich nicht gegenseitig wie zwei Nachbarbäume das volle Licht zu nehmen. Auf jeden Fall konnten die Bostoner aber an der „Eroica" und an der sogenannten „Schicksalssinfonie" ihre hohe Spielkultur flüssig nachweisen.

▶ In dem berühmten Trauermarsch geriet die melodische Vorahnung der Wende von Trauer in Zuversicht besonders eindringlich. Die vorausgeschickte dritte Leonoren-Ouvertüre überlud das Programm gleich noch mit einem weiteren Beethoven-Hit. Es war fast zuviel Titanismus in dieser Kombination.

Das zweite Konzert der Bostoner verlief irdischer. Das Hauptwerk war Brahms' Zweite Sinfonie, mit der Steinberg nicht nur eine höchst disziplinierte Orchesterleistung anzubieten hatte, sondern auch seine und seiner Spieler tiefe Vertrautheit mit dem Gehalt dieser urdeutschen Musik bekunden konnten. Freilich gehört Brahms seit jeher zu den Grundpfeilern des Bostoner Repertoires, das sich nach der Orchestergründung 1881 unter deutschen Dirigenten herausbildete.

▶ Diesem Bostoner Ensemble widmete Paul Hindemith 1931 seine „Konzertmusik für Streicher und Blechbläser", ein prachtvoll musikantisches Stück aus Geist, Laune und handwerklicher Meisterschaft, das die amerikanischen Musiker zu einer glänzenden Wiedergabeleistung inspirierte. Man hätte diese knappe „Bostoner Symphonie" gern gleich noch ein zweites Mal hören mögen.

▶ Auch die kurzen „Fünf Bagatellen" des in Berlin wohlbekannten Deutsch-Amerikaners Gunther Schuller (46) sind gut instrumentierte, reizvolle Miniaturen zeitgenössischer Musik, die sich zum Export eignen und die Aufgeschlossenheit des Orchesters für die Klangwelt unserer Zeit bezeugten.

Nimmt man Wagners „Meistersinger"-Vorspiel hinzu, mit dem das zweite Konzert in ausladendem Fortissimo begann, so ermißt man die künstlerische Spannweite dieses Europa-Gastspiels des hervorragenden Orchesters, das auch in Berlin beide Male von enthusiastischem Beifall begleitet wurde.

WOLFGANG SCHIMMING

Versuchtes und Geglücktes

Aus West-Berliner Konzertsälen

Ein abseitiges und wichtiges Programm brachten die Philharmoniker in einem Konzert der Reihe „Musik des 20. Jahrhunderts". Es brachte zwei Chorwerke religiösen Inhalts. Das eine, aus buddhistischer Welt, kreist direkt um die lamaistische Segensformel „Om mani padme hum", die Lobpreisung des Edelsteins in der Lotosblüte, wie sie auf Zetteln tibetanischer Gebetsmühlen im Wind flattert. Durch Meditation Nirwana zu erreichen ist der Kerngedanke des Textes, den Wolf D. Rogasky aus Buddhas Reden geformt hat. Isang Yun hat ihn zur Grundlage eines halbstündigen Werkes für Sopran, Bariton, Chor und Orchester gemacht. Seine Musik zeigt großen Reichtum der satztechnischen Mittel. Die Palette der Klangfarben schließt Röhrenglocken, Holzblock, Blechkontrapunkte und Spitzentöne des Soprans wirksam ein. Dem Werk haftet eine gar nicht buddhistische Überschwenglichkeit an, Neigung zu Espressivo und Pathos, die durch den Kammerchor Ernst Senff ebenso unterstrichen wurde, wie durch den Dirigenten Reinhard Peters. Neben dem stets musikalisch und stimmlich überzeugenden Barry McDaniel stand, neu für Berlin, die bulgarische Sopranistin Slavka Taskova. Die Stimme ist von großem, lyrischem Zauber, etwas zart in der Mittellage, im Diskant von dramatischer Kraft. Isang Yun, seit seiner Entlassung aus südkoreanischen Gefängnissen wieder in West-Berlin, wurde mit den Ausführenden herzlich akklamiert.

Nach der Pause der in Berlin bekannte „Großinquisitor" von Boris Blacher. Auch er handelt von letzten Dingen, von irdischen Leiden und Erlösung. Doch geht er über die christliche Lehre kritisch weit hinaus zur grundsätzlichen Debatte über Freiheit und Dogma. Christus wird Sieger aus Toleranz: er küßt den Mann, der ihn gefangen hat und zum Scheiterhaufen verurteilt. Die Aktualität war 1942 so brennend wie heute; es gibt in der Weltliteratur kaum einen größeren Stoff als diese Episode aus Dostojewskis „Brüdern Karamasoff". Blachers dramatische Chorsprache wurzelt in den Psalmen von Heinrich Schütz. Doch stärker spricht seine Technik der Aussparung, seine Orchesterökonomie, seine tonal zwielichtige Kanontechnik. Die Aufführung unter Peters war so genau wie stilistisch beherrscht. Als Solobariton löste der Wiener Ernst Gutstein die schwere Aufgabe musikalisch sicher, aber etwas zu stark im Opernton.

Im Studio der Akademie ein neues Kammerorchester aus Wien, „Ensemble Kontrapunkte". Es sind Mitglieder der Wiener Symphoniker, zu zwölft nach Berlin gekommen. Einer von ihnen, der auch Klavier und Glockenspiel bedient, leitet die Gruppe. Peter Keuschnig, so heißt der vielseitige und musikalisch sensitive Mann, hatte ein Programm, das vorwiegend Arbeiten berühmter Exponenten der Moderne brachte. Er begann mit einem „Pentagramm" genannten Bläserquintett von Ernst Krenek. Der vier 1952 komponierten, 1957 überarbeiteten Sätze enthalten temperamentvolle und verspielte Musik, der man die Serien-Konstruktion nicht anmerkt, die aber durch ihr Intervallbewußtsein und die Akkordbildung aus einer Zwölftonreihe das Ohr stets fesselt. Reizvoll ist das Staccato-Scherzo, überraschend das Finale mit dem ausdrucksvollen Beginn, den grotesken Hornquinten und dem Walzer. Offenbar Paradestück des Ensembles, wurde es präzis, durchsichtig und geistreich musiziert.

Nach den Klarinettenstücken von Alban Berg und den „Contrasts" von Bartók gab es Arbeiten von zwei Dreißigjährigen aus der Schule Karl Schiskes und Gottfried von Einems. Martin Bjelfiks 8-Minuten-Oktett ist eine sauber geschriebene, geschmackvolle Arbeit ohne individuelle Sprache. Vier Kammergesänge von Helmut Schmolz nach todessuchtigen Versen Ingeborg Bachmanns deuten ein Talent an, das nicht reif genug ist, um abseitige Wege ungestraft zu gehen. Die Altistin Elisabeth Kummer sang sie mit einer ausdruckslosen Stimme so abseits ihres lyrischen Tons, daß der Eindruck nicht überzeugte.

Applaus für den Kaiserwalzer

Zum Schluß eine Überraschung. Statt des Bläsersextetts von Janáček, das aus technischen Gründen abgesetzt war, hörte man Johann Strauß' Kaiserwalzer, orchestriert von Schönberg. Die Arbeit entstand 1925 zum 100. Geburtstag des Walzerkönigs. Sie ist für Flöte, Klarinette, Streichquartett und Klavier gesetzt, besonders reizvoll durch die ornamentale Behandlung der Blasinstrumente mit Läufen und Trillern. Die Aufführung durch die Wiener Gäste in bestem, schwungvollem Walzergeist, brachte die avantgardistischen Hörer in der Akademie sichtlich in Verlegenheit, löste aber einen Beifallssturm aus, der alle Protestversuche im Keim erstickte.

Programme mit Neuer Musik wirken oft konformistisch. Manchmal verengt sich der Horizont, bis nur noch wichtig zu sein scheint, was der Komponist zu vermeiden wünscht. In diesem Sinne kann man seit den fünfziger Jahren von einer Herdenbewegung derer sprechen, die aus der akademischen Herde links abgebogen sind. Innerhalb dieser Linksabbieger gibt es dann wieder Sekten und Gruppen. Man kennt die ästhetischen und satztechnischen Bilder. Da gibt es den Klingeltypus mit Celesta, Vibraphon und Röhrenglocken; Herkunft aus Tschaikowskis Nußknackerballett, Strauss' „Rosenkavalier" und Schönbergs „Herzgewächsen". Es gibt den Summ- und Tremolotypus, der seine Wagner-Bruckner-schen Ursprünge trotz Tontrauben und Geräuschorganisation nicht verleugnet. Schließlich den Überladungstypus, wo Klänge und Linien so gehäuft werden, daß Ordnung nicht mehr hörbar ist und wohl auch nicht sein soll.

Das 60. Programm des Zyklus „Musik der Gegenwart", das der SFB zusammen mit dem Kölner WDR im Berliner Funkhaus durchführt, zeigte mehr Typisches als Charakteristisches. Makoto Shinohara pflegt in „Visions II" den Klingeltypus. Farben stehen hart nebeneinander. Die Form wächst einseitig aus dem Gegensatz. Extrem hohe Geigen-Clusters antworten auf leise Paukenschläge. Flötenchromatik löst Gegenläufe des ganzen Orchesters aus, Seufzer-Glissandos werden von Trommelfiguren gefolgt, Harfen- und Glockenklängel durch undefinierbare Gleichzeitigkeiten und dünne Kantilenen erwidert. Das eminent gekonnte Stück zeigt den vierzigjährigen Wahlberliner in einem Stadium eklektischer Unsicherheit. Ebenfalls in West-Berlin lebt der Pole Witold Szalonek, Jahrgang 1927, dessen „Mutazioni" für Orchester vor zwei Jahren in Hamburg spukhafter und experimenteller wirkten als jetzt.

Dazwischen, als einzige Uraufführung des Abends, ein Auftragswerk des Schweizers Jacques Wildberger, Solokonzert für wechselnde Flotenarten und Orchester, genannt „Contratempi für einen Solo-Flötisten und vier Orchestergruppen". Der Name, auf deutsch Gegenzeitmaße, bezieht sich laut Kommentar des Autors auf die Struktur der Gruppenverbindung. Hauptperson ist der Flötenbläser, genauer gesagt Aurèle Nicolet, „dessen eminente musikalische Qualitäten ein entscheidender Ansporn bei der Arbeit waren". Von der Baßflöte wechselt er zur Altflöte, von dieser zur Querflöte und dann zum Ryuteki, einer Grifflochflöte der japanischen Hofmusik Gagaku. Er wandert also aus der Baßlage in immer höhere Regionen und dann zurück bis zur Heimkehr in die Tiefe. So entstehen sieben ineinander verfließende Formteile. Wildberger füllt sie mit einem zwanzig Minuten langen Strom musikalischer Substanz von sehr ungleicher Art. Er häuft mit oft magistralem Können die klirrenden, brüsk schlagenden, zornig und grotesk gepaarten Klänge wie Kontrabaßflageolett, Pauke mit Dämpfer, Knall von Röhrenglocken, Xylophoneinwürfe, mystisches Tamtam. Der Solopart steigt aus dieser Brandung wie eine Besinnung auf gesangliche Quellen der Musik. Bei aller Virtuosität ist der Geist der Instrumente nicht ausgeschöpft. Das mag bewußt geschehen, läßt aber auch in Nicolets prachtvoller Interpretation unbefriedigt. Sosehr man Wildbergers Einfallskraft und künstlerische Haltung achten muß: das Ergebnis hat Schwächen, die in der Unvereinbarkeit des Solokonzerts mit dieser Art halb expressiver, halb spekulativer Musik begründet sind.

Nono, Caroll, Maderna

Am Programmschluß stand die Suite aus Luigi Nonos Oper „Intolleranza". Nono ist ein Ausdrucksmusiker der unbedingten Art wie vor ihm Mahler und Schönberg. Er glaubt, was er schreibt, und er schreibt, was er glaubt. Zwei der drei Sätze werden ganz vom Chor und Orchester, der dritte vom Solosopran getragen. Proteste gegen Krieg, Faschismus, Kolonialismus un Rassenhaß bestimmen den agitatorischen ersten Teil. Dem zweiten liegt Majakowskys Gedicht „Unser Marsch" zugrunde. Merkwürdig ist, daß Nonos Textbehandlung die Worte unverständlich macht und damit die Propagandawirkung, um die es ihm doch zu tun ist, vermindert. Doch expressive Kraft der Musik und Wärme des Gefühls sind unverkennbar und überwältigen oft den Hörer. Auch in dem großen Sopransolo, das die Begegnung des Emigranten mit seiner Gefährtin schildert. Es ist die Stelle, wo politische Tragik in persönliche eingreift, sich mit ihr identifiziert und dann von ihr trennt. In Joan Caroll hat Nono eine neue Interpretin gefunden, die mit einem Einsatz ohnegleichen für ihn wirkt. Durch die weit ins dramatische Volumen gewachsene, den schweren Vorgängen in der Höhe gefügige Stimme brachte sie entscheidende Akzente. Der Abend stand unter der souveränen Führung Bruno Madernas. Radio-Symphonie-Orchester und Kammerchor Ernst Senff waren Sprachrohre einer Wiedergabe, die jedem der vier Werke den rechten Stil gab.

Für zwei Abende in der ausverkauften Philharmonie machte das Boston Symphony Orchestra auf seiner Europa-Tournee in Berlin halt. Das erste Programm war mit der dritten Leonoren-Ouvertüre, der Eroica und der c-Moll-Symphonie ganzlich Beethoven gewidmet; das zweite stellte zwischen die Meistersinger-Ouverture und Brahms' Zweite etwas zeitgenössische Musik von Hindemith und Schuller. Wieder, wie schon bei dem ersten Besuch 1952 unter Pierre Monteux, überraschten die Einheitlichkeit des Streichertons, der französische Glanz von Hörnern und Trompeten, die Tonschönheit und Atemruhe der Holzbläser, an der Spitze die Soloflötistin Doriot Anthony Dwyer. William Steinberg, der mit seinen 71 Jahren einen großen Teil der Tournee dirigiert, ist ein strenger, konservativer und langsamer Interpret Beethovenscher Symphonik. Mit überdeutlicher, oft virtuos kreisender und stechender Stabführung, Akzente durch Boxerstöße der Linken und Stampfen des Fußes setzend, ist er doch dem Apoll näher als dem Dionysos.

Nach Hindemiths jugendlich genialer Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser von 1931 gab es fünf Bagatellen von Gunter Schuller. Die knappen, formal freien Stücke sind in einem tonartlosen, farbigen Orchesteridiom geschrieben, mit extremen Registern, manisch wiederholten Akkorden und hochexpressiven Linien. Bergs und Schönbergs Erlebnis ist spürbar. Die beste Aufführung beider Programme fand die zweite Symphonie von Brahms, namentlich in den Übergängen des dritten und Steigerungen des letzten Satzes. Der Erfolg war stürmisch.

Blasende Solisten stehen in der Gunst des Publikums hinter Sängern, Pianisten und Geigern zurück. Um so bemerkenswerter, wenn ein junger, unbekannter Klarinettist Begeisterung weckt wie der Japaner Chitaru Asahina bei seinem Konzert im Hochschulsaal. Sohn des gleichnamigen berühmten Dirigenten, hat er ein Jurastudium abgeschlossen, bevor er in Bremen und bei Heinrich Geuser in Berlin seine Ausbildung als Bläser vollendete. An Fingermechanik, Tonvolumen, Ansatz und Atem ist er ein absolut fertiger Spieler. Seine hohe Intelligenz umfaßt so ungleiche Welten wie die Sonatina von Martinu, die Sonate von Hindemith und die drei Solostücke von Strawinski. Ein Meisterkonzert! H. H. STUCKENSCHMIDT

BERLIN
by
H.H. Stuckenschmidt
May 12, 1971
Mittwoch 12 Mai
Musik und Tanz

87

FROM WEST BERLIN's CONCERT HALLS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, on its European tour, stopped in Berlin for two evenings in the sold out Philharmonic Hall. The first program was entirdy dedicated to Beethoven, with the Leonore Overture III, the "Eroica" and the C Minor Symphony. The second program produced some contemporary music, between the Meistersinger Overture and Brahms Second Symphony, music by Hindemith and Schuller. Just like the first visit in 1952 with Pierre Monteux the unity of the strings surprised one, the French lustre of the horns and the trumpets, the tonal beauty and the restfullness of the woodwinds, led by the top soloist Doriot Anthony Dwyer. William Steinberg, who has conducted a great part of the tour, is a strict, conservative and slow interpreter of Beethoven's symphonic style. With a too clear, often virtuoso circling and pointing direction, accenting with boxing punches of his left and the pounding of his foot he more resembles Apollo than Dionysos.

After Hindemith's youthful, genial Konzertmusik for Strings and Brasses written in 1931, one heard five bagatelles by Gunter Schuller. The short, form-free pieces are written in a keyless colorful orchestra dialect, with extreme registers, repeated chords and highly expressed lines. Berg's and Schonberg's experiences are felt. The best performance of both programs was Brahms's Second Symphony, mainly in the passages of the third movement and the climax in the last movement, The result was stormy.

H.H. Stuckenschmidt

MUSIKERKONTAKTE nach Konzertschluß: Arthur Fiedler (links), dem Boston Symphony Orchestra seit über 40 Jahren als Dirigent der „Boston Pops" verbunden, im Gespräch mit dem Intendanten der Berliner Philharmoniker, Dr. Wolfgang Stresemann. Foto: von der Becke

Unbegrenzte Möglichkeiten

Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Philharmonie

Des Klangkörpers Altersgenossenschaft mit dem Berliner Philharmonischen Orchester hob Senator Stein in seiner Ansprache im Foyer der Philharmonie hervor, wo er dem Boston Symphony Orchestra und seinem Chefdirigenten William Steinberg nach erfolgreich beendetem Beethoven-Konzert Dank und Glückwunsch im Namen der Stadt Berlin überbrachte. Auch von Geld war notwendig die Rede, denn das 1881 von einem Idealisten namens Major Henry Lee Higginson ins Leben gerufene und jahrelang bezahlte Orchester hat staatliche Subvention nie genossen, sondern baut, eine öffentliche Stiftung, bis heute auf die Hilfe von Freunden und Mäzenen, auf die Hilfe seines großen Publikums also und dessen unterschiedlich hohe Schenkungen — neben den eigenen Einnahmen. So hat die Unterstützung eines bedeutenden Industrieunternehmens, das bei dieser Gelegenheit zudem der Deutsch-amerikanischen Studienhilfe einen Scheck über 10 000 DM zukommen ließ, auch die derzeitige Europa-Tournee der Bostoner möglich gemacht.

Sie reisen mit drei Dirigenten: ihrem Chef Steinberg, dem jungen Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas und dem legendär-berühmten Maestro der „Boston Pops", Arthur Fiedler. Dieser war denn auch, im weißen Haar, ein bißchen Star des Empfangs, da der Kultussenator ihm, als erklärtem Liebhaber derartiger Souvenirs, einen Helm der Berliner Feuerwehr zum Geschenk machte. Zum Dirigieren kamen der Senior und der Junior des Bostoner Dirigententeams in Berlin nicht.

William Steinberg, der das Orchester 1969 von Erich Leinsdorf übernommen hat — vorangegangen waren unter anderen Georg Henschel, Artur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Serge Kussevitzky und Charles Munch —, ist hierzulande auch der jüngeren Generation durch seine Gastspiele bei den Berliner Philharmonikern bekannt. Die Älteren konnte der gebürtige Kölner, der heute nicht nur Chef der Bostoner, sondern auch der Pittsburgh Symphony ist, an Staatsopern-Zeiten erinnern.

Da kommen also die Bostoner nach Deutschland und bringen uns zunächst ein abendfüllendes Beethoven-Programm zu Gehör: die dritte Leonoren-Ouvertüre, dann die dritte Sinfonie und die fünfte noch dazu; ein Perfektionsorchester erster Ordnung, ein Abend ohne interpretatorisches Risiko. Steinberg bevorzugt breite, ruhige Tempi, und das groß besetzte Orchester mit Bläser-Verdoppelung, acht Kontrabässen und entsprechender Vielzahl der höheren Streicher beantwortet seine meist gelassene Zeichengebung — dies nicht zuletzt sein Verdienst — mit einem Klangstrom von makelloser Rundung. Niveaubestimmend sind die sonoren Streicher-Chöre, beispielsweise im Trauermarsch, die Holzbläser-Solisten neigen eher zu Understatement. Vibrierende Spannung kommt nur manchmal auf, etwa wenn Steinberg das Finale der Eroica prompt der Coda des Scherzos nachschickt. In der Fünften trumpfen nicht nur die Hörner auf.

Kein sonderlich prägnantes oder gar neuartiges Beethoven-Bild frappiert den Hörer, wohl aber eine Orchesterleistung, die charakteristisch zu sein scheint für das Land der unbegrenzten Möglichkeiten. Steinberg und die Gäste aus Boston wurden herzlich und lange gefeiert.

Sybill Mahlke

★

Schon mit den ersten Takten des „Meistersinger"-Vorspiels, das den zweiten Abend des Gastorchesters aus Boston eröffnete, war man gepackt von dem Pomp der Bläserakkorde und der sonoren Fülle der Streichergruppen. Der Dirigent hatte das Programm auf die volle Entfaltung der instrumentalen Qualitäten seiner Musiker in mehreren klanglich unterschiedenen Stilbereichen ausgerichtet. Dem dekorativen Glanz der Wagnerschen Instrumentation standen die gedeckten Farbtöne der zweiten Sinfonie von Brahms und die robuste Polyphonie der dem Bostoner Ensemble gewidmeten „Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser" von Hindemith gegenüber.

Wir haben William Steinberg mit seinem Pittsburgher Orchester, dem er sich lebenslang verpflichtet hat, und auch am Pult unserer Philharmoniker als universalen Musiker, insbesondere auch als hervorragenden authentischen Interpreten der Mahlerschen Sinfonik kennengelernt. Als ein wahrer Souverän zwingt er die Spielgemeinschaft scheinbar mühelos, aber doch wohl nach unerbittlichen Proben, zum höchsten Einsatz ihrer Kräfte. Dabei verzichtet er auf hektische Gebärden, der Exhibitionismus Leonard Bernsteins ist ihm fremd. Es geht ihm auch weniger um die dynamischen Extreme, die dieser den Musikern abzufordern sucht. Die Anspannung seines Willens verrät Steinberg allenfalls in einem leichten Aufstampfen des linken Fußes; die rhythmische Perfektion des Bostoner Ensembles, dem er nun seit zwei Jahren vorsteht, ist ihm selbstverständliche Voraussetzung. Die breiten Flächen des Wagnerschen Vorspiels sind nach Art barocker Terrassendynamik gegeneinander abgesetzt, in üppigem kantablem Wohllaut schwingen die dreifach kontrapunktierten Linien aus, in machtvoller Stauung des Zeitmaßes wird die Schlußsteigerung erreicht.

Hindemith hat seine „Bostoner Sinfonie" 1931 als Virtuosenstück für die vielgerühmte Blechbläsergruppe des Orchesters konzipiert, aber auch dem Streicherchor, in dem die Violinen nicht geteilt sind, kraftstrotzende thematische Linien und stürmisch bewegte Figurationen zugeteilt. Während sich die Hörer hier von Werk und Wiedergabe willig gefangennehmen ließen, verhielten sie sich gegenüber den „Five Bagatelles" von Gunther Schuller zurückhaltend. Der als künstlerischer Leiter des Tanglewood-Festivals mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra eng verbundene Komponist ist in Deutschland kein Unbekannter mehr. Seine Bagatellen sind ausgesparte, punktuell strukturierte Klangstudien, die aber das empfindsame Seelenklima der Webernschen Vorbilder nicht erreichen.

Die zweite Sinfonie vom Brahms kam mit ihrem relativ freundlichen landschaftlichen Charakter der maßvollen Interpretationsgesinnung Steinbergs entgegen. Er kommandiert seine Truppe nicht, in einladender Gebärde bereitet er das wohllautende Melos der Violinen, Celli und insbesondere der herrlich intonierenden Hörner vor. Die Scheu vor überfließendem Sentiment gibt dem Werk auch in den lyrischen Partien eine formale Strenge, die an den frühen Klemperer erinnert und heute vielleicht bei Brahms seine Rechte auf Authentizität beanspruchen darf. Es gab zum Schluß lange Ovationen für das illustre Orchester und seinen meisterlichen Dirigenten.

Walther Kaempfer

Donnerstag, 15. April 1971 Hannoversche Allgemeine Zeitung

Amerikanische Sinfoniker der Weltklasse

Bostoner Orchester mit Thomas und Eschenbach im Kuppelsaal

Das mit Spannung erwartete Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra im ausverkauften Kuppelsaal Hannover, das achte und letzte Pro-Musica-Orchesterkonzert der Spielzeit, begann – was als ungewöhnlich empfunden wurde – mit einem Fagottkonzert. Der Solofagottist des Orchesters, Sherman Walt, ein tüchtiger Instrumentalist, der gleichsam stellvertretend den solistischen Rang der amerikanischen Bläser demonstrierte, spielte Mozarts B-Dur-Werk KV 191 beinahe als Kammermusik. Der junge Dirigent Michael Tilson Thomas (Jahrgang 1944) hatte den großen Orchesterapparat auf das Minimum eines Kammerorchesters reduziert, um die Begleitung nicht zu belasten. So lief das Konzert, wahrlich kein Meisterwerk, sondern nur ein Gelegenheitsstück aus der Feder des Komponisten, als er 18 Jahre alt war, wie am Schnürchen ab, um so mehr als der Solist im auswendigen Vortrag über alle technischen Schwierigkeiten souverän hinwegkam.

Das war nicht gerade ein Stück zum Einspielen oder Einhören. Gleich darauf aber änderte sich die Orchesterszene der „Bostoner" schlagartig nach der typisch amerikanisch-virtuosen Seite hin: Walter Pistons zweite Sinfonie aus dem Jahre 1944, ein formal übersichtlich gebautes, unproblematisches, heute nach mehr als 25 Jahren recht akademisch erscheinendes Werk, war insofern willkommen, weil es die Wucht, Fülle und Präzision des Orchesterklangs der Amerikaner ins rechte Licht rückte.

Origineller, weil sich spontan anbietend, hätte ein Werk Strawinskijs in dieser Vortragsfolge gewirkt. Ja, man nahm eigentlich an, daß das Boston Symphony Orchestra als Gedenken für den großen russischen Komponisten, der so lange in Amerika gewirkt hat und in diesen Tagen in New York gestorben ist, eine seiner Schöpfungen erklingen lassen würde, nachdem ihm das Orchester vor einigen Tagen im Stuttgarter Abend der Europatournee den Trauermarsch aus Beethovens „Eroica" gewidmet hatte.

Man kann gegen die Piston-Sinfonie sagen, was man will, gewiß ist, daß sie der Virtuosität aller Gruppen dieses Klangkörpers auf den Leib geschrieben erscheint. Thomas, sich als Dirigent zwischen aufbäumender Gebärde, jugendlicher Cleverness und Show gebend, ging die theatralische Klanggeste der Sinfonie geradezu stürmisch an. Man bewunderte das mächtige Volumen der 18 ersten Geigen sowie das Timbre, die Klangkultur der ausdrucksvollen Violoncellogruppe, die der Ausstrahlung der Streicher soviel Klangsinnlichkeit verleihen und immer die rechte Balance zu den elastischen Holzbläsern und dem pompösen „Blech" herstellen. Aber man darf nicht verschweigen, daß soviel verschwenderischer Aufwand und Klangintensität des größtmöglich besetzten amerikanischen Sinfonieorchesters einer wichtigeren, aktuelleren Partitur unseres Jahrhunderts angemessener gewesen wäre.

In der Wiedergabe von Ravels „La Valse" ging die Selbstdarstellung und Selbstbespiegelung des jungen Dirigenten Thomas zu weit. Hier wäre mehr Selbstkontrolle am Platz. Wie man sah und hörte, braucht ein so großartiges Orchester wie die „Bostoner" eine ans Hysterische grenzende Dirigentenpose nicht, in die sich Thomas hier hineinsteigerte und die sich sogar der Leonard Bernstein abgeguckten Sprungeffekte der Beine bediente. Die Apotheose des Wiener Walzers von Ravel ist als Komposition in sich phantastisch und orgiastisch genug. Die leuchtkräftigen Farben der raffinierten Instrumentation würden bei diesem Weltklasseorchester eine noch betörendere wienerische Elastizität und rhythmische Eleganz gewinnen, wenn der Dirigent das ganze Stück nicht durch seine ekstatische körperliche Einflußnahme so barbarisch überheizt hätte.

Der junge amerikanische Dirigent Michael Tilson Thomas (links) mit dem Pianisten Christoph Eschenbach, der im Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hannover das Schumann-Konzert spielte. Aufn.: Karin Blüher

Aber solche Äußerlichkeiten werden sich bei einem hochbegabten jungen Dirigenten von der Art Thomas' mit der Zeit abschleifen. Auf jeden Fall darf man gespannt sein, wie sich dieser vielversprechende, schlagtechnisch perfekte junge Orchesterleiter – man bedenke, daß er erst 27 Jahre alt ist! – weiter entwickeln wird, dessen erste Schallplatten bei der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft, die das Boston Orchestra in Exklusivvertrag genommen hat, bereits große Beachtung gefunden haben.

Erfreulich festzustellen, wie der Pianist Christoph Eschenbach, der an diesem Abend Solist in Schumanns Klavierkonzert war, an seinen weltweiten Verpflichtungen geistig und technisch weiter gewachsen ist! In den Ecksätzen ging er im präzisen Zusammenspiel mit Dirigent und Orchester schwungvoll und mit überlegener virtuoser Geläufigkeit zu Werke. Seine Leidenschaft war um männlich-romantisches Pathos bemüht, das zweifellos Effekt machte. Nur die Poesie des herrlichen Werkes kam zu kurz, vor allem im Intermezzo, das pikanter, graziöser, hellhöriger hätte angepackt werden müssen, was übrigens auch zu Lasten des Dirigenten geht, der hier hemmend wirkte und die Melodik allzu breit auswalzte.

Die zahlreichen Zuhörer im Kuppelsaal feierten die Solisten und das hervorragende amerikanische Orchester mit überschwenglicher Beifallsfreude, die sich nach dem Walzer von Ravel zu lang anhaltenden Sonderovationen für den Dirigenten steigerte.

Erich Limmert

hannover

It is a joy to determine how the young pianist Christoph Eschenbach, the soloist this evening in Schumann's Piano Concerto, has further grown, technically and intellectually through his world wide engagements. In the corner phrases he set about in precise teamwork with the conductor and orchestra, spirited and with surpassing virtuoso skill. His passion attempted a bold-romantic fervor which was effective without any doubt. However, the poetry of this beautiful work came too short, especially in the intermezzo which should have been grasped more pungently, more gracefully and more keen of hearing. This was a burden to the conductor, by the way, who seemed restrained and rolled the melody out too broadly.

The numerous listeners in the Kuppelsaal rewarded the soloists and the excellent American Orchestra with exuberant applause which intensified after Ravel's Valse to long-lasting special ovations for the conductor.

Erich Limmert

AMERICAN SYMPHONIC OF WORLD RENOWN

Boston Orchestra with Thomas and Eschenbach in the Kuppelsaal

The guest performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the eighth and last Pro-Musica-Orchestra concert was sold out in the Kuppelssal of Hannover. Anticipated with exitement, the concert started with a bassoon concerto which was taken as an unusual beginning. The first chair of the orchestra, Sherman Walt, played Mozart's B Flat Major Concerto, KV 191, almost as a chamber work. He is an ambitious instrumentalist who demonstrated as though representing the virtuoso rank of the woodwinds. The young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas (born in 1944) had reduced the huge orchestral machine to the minimum of a chamber orchestra in order not to burden the accompaniment. This way the concerto ran off as smoothly as can be, even more so as the soloist mastered all technical difficulties with superiority. The concerto, truely, is not a masterpiece but only a work of convenience written when the composer was eighteen years old.

This really wasn't a piece to warm up the players or the audience. Right after, though, the orchestral scene of the Bostonians changed suddenly typical of the American-virtuoso style: Walter Piston's Second Symphony (written in 1944). The work was constructed distinct in form, unproblematic and after more than 25 years it is still a very academic-sounding piece. It was welcomed in so far as it moved the power, intensity and precision of the orchestral sound into the right perspective. A work of Stravinsky would have been more original in this series, as it would have been more spontaneous.Really, one expected the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play one of his creations in the memory of the great Russian composer who created in America for such a long time and who died these recent days in New York. The orchestra dedicated the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" at the Stuttgart concert, a few days ago.

One can say anything against the Piston Symphony, but one thing is sure; it was written precisely for the virtuosity of all the instrument groups of this philharmonic. Thomas attacked the theatrical sound gestures of the symphony almost turbulantly. As a conductor he is between rebelling gesticulation, youthful cleverness and exhibitionism. One admires the mighty volume of the eighteen first violins and also the timbre, the sound culture of the expressive cello group which lent so much sound sensuality to the radiation of the strings. They always produced the correct balance to the elastic woodwinds and the pompous brass. One can not suppress the thought that the lavish display and sound intensity of possibly the largest American orchestra would be more suitable to a more important topical score of our century.

In the reproduction of Ravel's "La Valse" the self exhibition and self admiration of the young conductor Thomas went too far. Here more self control would have been more appropriate. As one saw and heard, an orchestra as excellent as the Bostonians doesn't need a conductor's attitude almost at the border of hysteria, into which Thomas advanced and even imitated the jump effects of Leonard Bernstein. The apotheosis of the Vienese Waltz of Ravel is fantastic and sybaritical enough by itself. The illuminating colors of the refined instrumentation would gain an even more infatuated Vienese elasticity and rythmical elegance with this world renowned orchestra if the conductor had not overheated the whole piece so barbaricly because of his physical influence.

In time such habits wear away with such highly intelligent young conductors like Thomas. At any case, one may be anxious to see how this highly promising young orchestra leader with his perfect rythmic technical skill will develop further. One should not forget that he is only 27 years old and whose first recordings with DGG (which has an exclusive contract with the Boston Orchestra) has already found great consideration.

Amerikanische Sinfoniker der Weltklasse

Bostoner Orchester mit Thomas und Eschenbach im Kuppelsaal

Das mit Spannung erwartete Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra im ausverkauften Kuppelsaal Hannover, das achte und letzte Pro-Musica-Orchesterkonzert der Spielzeit, begann – was als ungewöhnlich empfunden wurde – mit einem Fagottkonzert. Der Solofagottist des Orchesters, Sherman Walt, ein tüchtiger Instrumentalist, der gleichsam stellvertretend den solistischen Rang der amerikanischen Bläser demonstrierte, spielte Mozarts B-Dur-Werk KV 191 beinahe als Kammermusik. Der junge Dirigent Michael Tilson Thomas (Jahrgang 1944) hatte den großen Orchesterapparat auf das Minimum eines Kammerorchesters reduziert, um die Begleitung nicht zu belasten. So lief das Konzert, wahrlich kein Meisterwerk, sondern nur ein Gelegenheitsstück aus der Feder des Komponisten, als er 18 Jahre alt war, wie am Schnürchen ab, um so mehr als der Solist im auswendigen Vortrag über alle technischen Schwierigkeiten souverän hinwegkam.

Das war nicht gerade ein Stück zum Einspielen oder Einhören. Gleich darauf aber änderte sich die Orchesterszene der „Bostoner" schlagartig nach der typisch amerikanisch-virtuosen Seite hin: Walter Pistons zweite Sinfonie aus dem Jahre 1944, ein formal übersichtlich gebautes, unproblematisches, heute nach mehr als 25 Jahren recht akademisch erscheinendes Werk, war insofern willkommen, weil es die Wucht, Fülle und Präzision des Orchesterklangs der Amerikaner ins rechte Licht rückte.

Origineller, weil sich spontan anbietend, hätte ein Werk Strawinskijs in dieser Vortragsfolge gewirkt. Ja, man nahm eigentlich an, daß das Boston Symphony Orchestra als Gedenken für den großen russischen Komponisten, der so lange in Amerika gewirkt hat und in diesen Tagen in New York gestorben ist, eine seiner Schöpfungen erklingen lassen würde, nachdem ihm das Orchester vor einigen Tagen im Stuttgarter Abend der Europatournee den Trauermarsch aus Beethovens „Eroica" gewidmet hatte.

Man kann gegen die Piston-Sinfonie sagen, was man will, gewiß ist, daß sie der Virtuosität aller Gruppen dieses Klangkörpers auf den Leib geschrieben erscheint. Thomas, sich als Dirigent zwischen aufbäumender Gebärde, jugendlicher Cleverness und Show gebend, ging die theatralische Klanggeste der Sinfonie geradezu stürmisch an. Man bewunderte das mächtige Volumen der 18 ersten Geigen sowie das Timbre, die Klangkultur der ausdrucksvollen Violoncellogruppe, die der Ausstrahlung der Streicher soviel Klangsinnlichkeit verleihen und immer die rechte Balance zu den elastischen Holzbläsern und dem pompösen „Blech" herstellen. Aber man darf nicht verschweigen, daß soviel verschwenderischer Aufwand und Klangintensität des größtmöglich besetzten amerikanischen Sinfonieorchesters einer wichtigeren, aktuelleren Partitur unseres Jahrhunderts angemessener gewesen wäre.

In der Wiedergabe von Ravels „La Valse" ging die Selbstdarstellung und Selbstbespiegelung des jungen Dirigenten Thomas zu weit. Hier wäre mehr Selbstkontrolle am Platz. Wie man sah und hörte, braucht ein so großartiges Orchester wie die „Bostoner" eine ans Hysterische grenzende Dirigentenpose nicht, in die sich Thomas hier hineinsteigerte und die sich sogar der Leonard Bernstein abgeguckten Sprungeffekte der Beine bediente. Die Apotheose des Wiener Walzers von Ravel ist als Komposition in sich phantastisch und orgiastisch genug. Die leuchtkräftigen Farben der raffinierten Instrumentation würden bei diesem Weltklasseorchester eine noch betörendere wienerische Elastizität und rhythmische Eleganz gewinnen, wenn der Dirigent das ganze Stück nicht durch seine ekstatische körperliche Einflußnahme so barbarisch überheizt hätte.

Der junge amerikanische Dirigent Michael Tilson Thomas (links) mit dem Pianisten Christoph Eschenbach, der im Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hannover das Schumann-Konzert spielte. Aufn.: Karin Blüher

Aber solche Äußerlichkeiten werden sich bei einem hochbegabten jungen Dirigenten von der Art Thomas' mit der Zeit abschleifen. Auf jeden Fall darf man gespannt sein, wie sich dieser vielversprechende, schlagtechnisch perfekte junge Orchesterleiter – man bedenke, daß er erst 27 Jahre alt ist! – weiter entwickeln wird, dessen erste Schallplatten bei der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft, die das Boston Orchestra in Exklusivvertrag genommen hat, bereits große Beachtung gefunden haben.

Erfreulich festzustellen, wie der Pianist Christoph Eschenbach, der an diesem Abend Solist in Schumanns Klavierkonzert war, an seinen weltweiten Verpflichtungen geistig und technisch weiter gewachsen ist! In den Ecksätzen ging er im präzisen Zusammenspiel mit Dirigent und Orchester schwungvoll und mit überlegener virtuoser Geläufigkeit zu Werke. Seine Leidenschaft war um männlich-romantisches Pathos bemüht, das zweifellos Effekt machte. Nur die Poesie des herrlichen Werkes kam zu kurz, vor allem im Intermezzo, das pikanter, graziöser, hellhöriger hätte angepackt werden müssen, was übrigens auch zu Lasten des Dirigenten geht, der hier hemmend wirkte und die Melodik allzu breit auswalzte.

Die zahlreichen Zuhörer im Kuppelsaal feierten die Solisten und das hervorragende amerikanische Orchester mit überschwenglicher Beifallsfreude, die sich nach dem Walzer von Ravel zu lang anhaltenden Sonderovationen für den Dirigenten steigerte.

Erich Limmert

hannover

It is a joy to determine how the young pianist Christoph Eschenbach, the soloist this evening in Schumann's Piano Concerto, has further grown, technically and intellectually through his world wide engagements. In the corner phrases he set about in precise teamwork with the conductor and orchestra, spirited and with surpassing virtuoso skill. His passion attempted a bold-romantic fervor which was effective without any doubt. However, the poetry of this beautiful work came too short, especially in the intermezzo which should have been grasped more pungently, more gracefully and more keen of hearing. This was a burden to the conductor, by the way, who seemed restrained and rolled the melody out too broadly.

The numerous listeners in the Kuppelsaal rewarded the soloists and the excellent American Orchestra with exuberant applause which intensified after Ravel's Valse to long-lasting special ovations for the conductor.

Erich Limmert

AMERICAN SYMPHONIC OF WORLD RENOWN

Boston Orchestra with Thomas and Eschenbach in the Kuppelsaal

The guest performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the eighth and last Pro-Musica-Orchestra concert was sold out in the Kuppelssal of Hannover. Anticipated with exitement, the concert started with a bassoon concerto which was taken as an unusual beginning. The first chair of the orchestra, Sherman Walt, played Mozart's B Flat Major Concerto, KV 191, almost as a chamber work. He is an ambitious instrumentalist who demonstrated as though representing the virtuoso rank of the woodwinds. The young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas (born in 1944) had reduced the huge orchestral machine to the minimum of a chamber orchestra in order not to burden the accompaniment. This way the concerto ran off as smoothly as can be, even more so as the soloist mastered all technical difficulties with superiority. The concerto, truely, is not a masterpiece but only a work of convenience written when the composer was eighteen years old.

This really wasn't a piece to warm up the players or the audience. Right after, though, the orchestral scene of the Bostonians changed suddenly typical of the American-virtuoso style: Walter Piston's Second Symphony (written in 1944). The work was constructed distinct in form, unproblematic and after more than 25 years it is still a very academic-sounding piece. It was welcomed in so far as it moved the power, intensity and precision of the orchestral sound into the right perspective. A work of Stravinsky would have been more original in this series, as it would have been more spontaneous.Really, one expected the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play one of his creations in the memory of the great Russian composer who created in America for such a long time and who died these recent days in New York. The orchestra dedicated the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" at the Stuttgart concert, a few days ago.

One can say anything against the Piston Symphony, but one thing is sure; it was written precisely for the virtuosity of all the instrument groups of this philharmonic. Thomas attacked the theatrical sound gestures of the symphony almost turbulantly. As a conductor he is between rebelling gesticulation, youthful cleverness and exhibitionism. One admires the mighty volume of the eighteen first violins and also the timbre, the sound culture of the expressive cello group which lent so much sound sensuality to the radiation of the strings. They always produced the correct balance to the elastic woodwinds and the pompous brass. One can not suppress the thought that the lavish display and sound intensity of possibly the largest American orchestra would be more suitable to a more important topical score of our century.

In the reproduction of Ravel's "La Valse" the self exhibition and self admiration of the young conductor Thomas went too far. Here more self control would have been more appropriate. As one saw and heard, an orchestra as excellent as the Bostonians doesn't need a conductor's attitude almost at the border of hysteria, into which Thomas advanced and even imitated the jump effects of Leonard Bernstein. The apotheosis of the Vienese Waltz of Ravel is fantastic and sybaritical enough by itself. The illuminating colors of the refined instrumentation would gain an even more infatuated Vienese elasticity and rythmical elegance with this world renowned orchestra if the conductor had not overheated the whole piece so barbaricly because of his physical influence.

In time such habits wear away with such highly intelligent young conductors like Thomas. At any case, one may be anxious to see how this highly promising young orchestra leader with his perfect rythmic technical skill will develop further. One should not forget that he is only 27 years old and whose first recordings with DGG (which has an exclusive contract with the Boston Orchestra) has already found great consideration.

90

15. April 1971 Hannoversche Presse / Nummer 87

Michael Tilson Thomas

Dieser Walzer wurde in Ekstase dirigiert

Show oder ekstatisches Aufgehen in der Musik? Das war hier die Frage. Ohne Zweifel: Er verausgabte sich restlos, der jetzt 26jährige Michael Tilson Thomas, der jüngste der drei Dirigenten, die das berühmte Boston Symphony Orchestra auf seiner diesjährigen Europa-Tournee begleiten. Die Konzertdirektion Hans Ulrich Schmid Hannover stellte ihn in ihrem letzten Orchesterkonzert in dieser Saison vor. Schlagartig war der junge Dirigent bekanntgeworden, als er für den plötzlich erkrankten William Steinberg ein Konzert spontan übernommen hatte.

Harmlos zahm begann der große Abend im Kuppelsaal mit Mozarts Konzert für Fagott. Vorbildlich dezent begleitete der Michael Tilson Thomas den Solisten Sherman Walt, den hervorragenden 1. Fagottisten des Orchesters, das weich und edel musizierte. Sherman Walt schmückte die drei Sätze virtuos mit ausgedehnten Kadenzen. Den Mittelsatz verklärte zartes Espressivo. Um hier die Wirkung der fein entwickelten Kadenz nicht abzuschwächen, wurden sogar einige Takte des Orchesterparts kurz vor Schluß geopfert. Tempomodifikationen trugen ins Finale etwas Unruhe.

Dankenswert, von den Bostonern eine Symphonie des hier kaum gespielten Walter Piston zu hören, seine zweite von 1944. Amerikanische Folklore ist hier in traditionelle Formen einbezogen. Melodiefäden werden fleißig fortgesponnen, zuweilen mit Kontrapunkten in extremer Lage. Effektvoll tauchen lärmend Höhepunkte auf. Widerhaarige Rhythmen durchbrechen häufig die Taktordnung. Die nicht festgefügte Form läßt manchen Leerlauf zu. Das neoklassizistische Werk fand freundlichen Beifall.

Mit Schumanns Klavierkonzert a-Moll trat Christoph Eschenbach als Solist auf den Plan, die große Hoffnung im deutschen Pianistennachwuchs. Dirigent und Pianist schienen darin einig, das Werk mit jugendlich stürmischem Elan zu erfüllen, ganz vom Empfinden her. Das Tempo änderten sie oft, und im Überschwang des Vorwärtsdrängens geriet gelegentlich dann manches weniger klar. Wurde dem Empfinden zu viel nachgegeben, blieb Sentimentalität nicht aus — wie bei der schwelgerischen Durchführung im ersten Satz. Sehr poetisch doch das Intermezzo. Ungewöhnlich robust intonierte Christoph Eschenbach das Hauptthema des Finales. Doch dann gelangen ihm imponierende Steigerungen. Musikalisch war damit der Höhepunkt des Abends erreicht.

Wie sinnfällig Michael Tilson Thomas dann Ravels „La Valse" deutete, ja auf dem Podium förmlich sprang und tanzte — in allen Varianten exaltierter Dirigierkunst, glich schon einem Satyrspiel und war brillant gekonnt. Ein Kapitel „optischer Musik" schien aufgeschlagen — wie es die Moderne liebt. Fast schien Akustisches von Optischem verdrängt, obwohl das Boston Symphony Orchestra seine ganze Virtuosität entfaltete. Es blieb Show im Zwang des Rhythmus. Doch sie kam an und weckte manches Schmunzeln.

WERNER FREYTAG

THIS WALTZ WAS CONDUCTED IN ECSTASY

A show or unfolding ecstasy in music? This was the question here. Without any doubt: He spent himself completely, the now 26 year old Michael Tilson Thomas, the youngest of the three conductors who accompanied the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra on its European tour this year. The concert management Hans Ulrich Schmid Hannover introduced him in this, their last concert of this season. Suddenly the young conductor became known after he substituted for Steinberg, who suddenly was taken ill at this concert.

The great evening started harmlessly tame in the Kuppelsaal with Mozart's Concerto for Bassoon. Michael Tilson Thomas accompanied with exemplary reserve the brilliant first bassoonist Sherman Walt of the orchestra who played a mellow and noble performance. Sherman Walt decorated the three movements expertly with extensive cadenzas. The middle movement was radiant with a tender espressivo. A few bars of the orchestral parts were sacrified shortly before the end, in order not to weaken the effect of the finely developed cadenza. Tempo modifications brought a bit of unrest into the finale.

The Bostonians are deserving of thanks in bringing a symphony by the seldom heard Walter Piston, his second one from 1944. American folklore was drawn into traditional forms, particles of melodies were spun busily, now and then with counterpoints in extreme registers. Effectively noisy highlights emerged. Rebellious rythms broke through the time order often. The form, not tightly joined, allowed some idling. The neo-classic work received friendly applause.

Schumann's Piano Concerto in A Minor presented Christoph Eschenbach, the great hope in the rising generation of German pianists. Conductor and pianist agreed to perform this work with youthful, headstrong pluck, completely impulsive. They changed the speed often and during the exuberance of the hurrying forward some parts appeared to be unclear. If too much was given to feeling, sentimentality was not left out - like the voluptious modulation in the first movement. Christoph Eschenbach intoned the main theme of the finale unusually rough. But then he succeeded in impressive crescendos. Musically the high point of the evening was reached with that.

How conspicuously Michael Tilson Thomas interpreted Ravel's "La Valse". He almost jumped and danced on the podium - highly strung conducting in all variants. He resembled almost a satirical play and did it brilliantly. A chapter of "optical music" was opened up - as the modern trend likes it. The acoustical was almost displaced by the optical, although the Boston Symphony Orchestra unfolded all its virtuosity. It remained a show in the force of rythm. But it succeeded and awoke some grins.

Werner Freytag

15. April 1971 Hannoversche Presse / Nummer 87

Michael Tilson Thomas

Dieser Walzer wurde in Ekstase dirigiert

Show oder ekstatisches Aufgehen in der Musik? Das war hier die Frage. Ohne Zweifel: Er verausgabte sich restlos, der jetzt 26jährige Michael Tilson Thomas, der jüngste der drei Dirigenten, die das berühmte Boston Symphony Orchestra auf seiner diesjährigen Europa-Tournee begleiten. Die Konzertdirektion Hans Ulrich Schmid Hannover stellte ihn in ihrem letzten Orchesterkonzert in dieser Saison vor. Schlagartig war der junge Dirigent bekanntgeworden, als er für den plötzlich erkrankten William Steinberg ein Konzert spontan übernommen hatte.

Harmlos zahm begann der große Abend im Kuppelsaal mit Mozarts Konzert für Fagott. Vorbildlich dezent begleitete der Michael Tilson Thomas den Solisten Sherman Walt, den hervorragenden 1. Fagottisten des Orchesters, das weich und edel musizierte. Sherman Walt schmückte die drei Sätze virtuos mit ausgedehnten Kadenzen. Den Mittelsatz verklärte zartes Espressivo. Um hier die Wirkung der fein entwickelten Kadenz nicht abzuschwächen, wurden sogar einige Takte des Orchesterparts kurz vor Schluß geopfert. Tempomodifikationen trugen ins Finale etwas Unruhe.

Dankenswert, von den Bostonern eine Symphonie des hier kaum gespielten Walter Piston zu hören, seine zweite von 1944. Amerikanische Folklore ist hier in traditionelle Formen einbezogen. Melodiefäden werden fleißig fortgesponnen, zuweilen mit Kontrapunkten in extremer Lage. Effektvoll tauchen lärmend Höhepunkte auf. Widerhaarige Rhythmen durchbrechen häufig die Taktordnung. Die nicht festgefügte Form läßt manchen Leerlauf zu. Das neoklassizistische Werk fand freundlichen Beifall.

Mit Schumanns Klavierkonzert a-Moll trat Christoph Eschenbach als Solist auf den Plan, die große Hoffnung im deutschen Pianistennachwuchs. Dirigent und Pianist schienen darin einig, das Werk mit jugendlich stürmischem Elan zu erfüllen, ganz vom Empfinden her. Das Tempo änderten sie oft, und im Überschwang des Vorwärtsdrängens geriet gelegentlich dann manches weniger klar. Wurde dem Empfinden zu viel nachgegeben, blieb Sentimentalität nicht aus — wie bei der schwelgerischen Durchführung im ersten Satz. Sehr poetisch doch das Intermezzo. Ungewöhnlich robust intonierte Christoph Eschenbach das Hauptthema des Finales. Doch dann gelangen ihm imponierende Steigerungen. Musikalisch war damit der Höhepunkt des Abends erreicht.

Wie sinnfällig Michael Tilson Thomas dann Ravels „La Valse" deutete, ja auf dem Podium förmlich sprang und tanzte — in allen Varianten exaltierter Dirigierkunst, glich schon einem Satyrspiel und war brillant gekonnt. Ein Kapitel „optischer Musik" schien aufgeschlagen — wie es die Moderne liebt. Fast schien Akustisches von Optischem verdrängt, obwohl das Boston Symphony Orchestra seine ganze Virtuosität entfaltete. Es blieb Show im Zwang des Rhythmus. Doch sie kam an und weckte manches Schmunzeln. WERNER FREYTAG

THIS WALTZ WAS CONDUCTED IN ECSTASY

A show or unfolding ecstasy in music? This was the question here. Without any doubt: He spent himself completely, the now 26 year old Michael Tilson Thomas, the youngest of the three conductors who accompanied the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra on its European tour this year. The concert management Hans Ulrich Schmid Hannover introduced him in this, their last concert of this season. Suddenly the young conductor became known after he substituted for Steinberg, who suddenly was taken ill at this concert.

The great evening started harmlessly tame in the Kuppelsaal with Mozart's Concerto for Bassoon. Michael Tilson Thomas accompanied with exemplary reserve the brilliant first bassoonist Sherman Walt of the orchestra who played a mellow and noble performance. Sherman Walt decorated the three movements expertly with extensive cadenzas. The middle movement was radiant with a tender espressivo. A few bars of the orchestral parts were sacrified shortly before the end, in order not to weaken the effect of the finely developed cadenza. Tempo modifications brought a bit of unrest into the finale.

The Bostonians are deserving of thanks in bringing a symphony by the seldom heard Walter Piston, his second one from 1944. American folklore was drawn into traditional forms, particles of melodies were spun busily, now and then with counterpoints in extreme registers. Effectively noisy highlights emerged. Rebellious rythms broke through the time order often. The form, not tightly joined, allowed some idling. The neo-classic work received friendly applause.

Schumann's Piano Concerto in A Minor presented Christoph Eschenbach, the great hope in the rising generation of German pianists. Conductor and pianist agreed to perform this work with youthful, headstrong pluck, completely impulsive. They changed the speed often and during the exuberance of the hurrying forward some parts appeared to be unclear. If too much was given to feeling, sentimentality was not left out - like the voluptious modulation in the first movement. Christoph Eschenbach intoned the main theme of the finale unusually rough. But then he succeeded in impressive crescendos. Musically the high point of the evening was reached with that.

How conspicuously Michael Tilson Thomas interpreted Ravel's "La Valse". He almost jumped and danced on the podium - highly strung conducting in all variants. He resembled almost a satirical play and did it brilliantly. A chapter of "optical music" was opened up - as the modern trend likes it. The acoustical was almost displaced by the optical, although the Boston Symphony Orchestra unfolded all its virtuosity. It remained a show in the force of rythm. But it succeeded and awoke some grins.

Werner Freytag

DER Ausschnitt
1 BERLIN 45, Telex: 1-83538
Aufl. i. Tsd. / Richtung: / lt. Stamm 1970 205,4;u
Berliner Morgenpost I
1000 Berlin 61 (BW) 14.4.71 L

In Europa fest verwurzelt

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra gastierte an der Spree

Auch auf ihrer dritten Europa-Tournee ließen die Bostoner Symphoniker Berlin nicht aus. Sie gastierten an zwei Tagen in der Philharmonie. Wir hörten das Konzert am Ostersonnabend, das Chefdirigent William Steinberg ausschließlich Beethoven gewidmet hatte.

Steinberg, der gebürtige Kölner, der 1938 auf Einladung Toscaninis in den USA Fuß faßte, gehört zu den Pultstrategen alter Schule, denen man nichts vormachen kann. Er hat seine Musiker fest im Griff und boxt seinen Willen unmißverständlich mit harter Faust durch. Obwohl er vom Temperament her zur offensiven Dirigierweise neigt, gönnt er seinen Solisten Muße zu schöner, selbständiger Phrasierung.

Der Leistungsstandard des Orchesters gestattete es Steinberg, schon in der dritten „Leonoren"-Ouvertüre langsame Tempi vorzulegen, die den Pianissimo-Passagen wohl anstanden und das Stück sogleich aus der Nähe des Konzertsaal-Schlagers wegrückten.

Steinberg ist zu gründlich in der europäischen Musiktradition verwurzelt, als daß er es darauf anlegte, Beethoven partout aus modernem Gesichtswinkel zu bieten. Er hat ihn im Kopf wie andere ihren „Faust"- oder „Wallenstein"-Monolog und verwaltet ihn auch in Übersee nach bestem deutschen Gewissen. Interpretations-Finessen, intelektuell getüftelte Deutungen und psychologische Durchleuchtungen sind von ihm nicht zu erwarten.

Demzufolge hörte man sowohl die Dritte, die „Eroica", als auch die Fünfte, die Schicksals-Symphonie, in jener klaren Gelassenheit und strengen Zucht, die beiden Werken eine Sonderstellung im Schaffen Beethovens und in der Gunst des Publikums sichert.

Den amerikanischen Gästen war die Befriedigung über den begeisterten Beifall in Berlin anzumerken. H. F.

Junger Dirigent

Michael Tilson Thomas ist 26 Jahre alt und schon ein Star am Dirigentenpult. In Fachkreisen gilt er als Amerikas stärkste Dirigentenbegabung seit dem jungen Leonard Bernstein. Das Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra führte ihn jetzt auch nach Berlin. Thomas leitet die Tournee des Orchesters durch Europa als Co-Dirigent.

Er selbst erklärt seine Blitzkarriere ganz unkompliziert: „Es war natürlich eine Menge Glück dabei. Dann hat mir die Vielseitigkeit meiner Ausbildung sehr geholfen. Ich habe mich während meines Musikstudiums in Los Angeles mit den verschiedenen Aspekten der Musik befaßt und wurde damit für ziemlich alles vorbereitet, was auf mich zukommen kann."

Thomas war gerade 24, als er seine erste große Chance bekam: Im Herbst 1969 erkrankte William Steinberg. Thomas übernahm für ihn die Leitung des Boston Symphony Orchestra für die ganze Saison. Seine Erfolge in 34 Konzerten machten Schlagzeilen. Seit kurzem hat er nun auch sein eigenes Orchester; er ist Chefdirigent des Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra.

In den wenigen Jahren seiner Praxis hat Thomas bereits feste Ansichten über die Zukunft der Orchesterkonzerte entwickelt. Das Repertoire sollte, findet er, „das ganze weite Spektrum vom Mittelalter bis zur Avantgarde umfassen". In einem Bostoner Konzert stellte er kürzlich die Werke von Magnus Perotinus, Karlheinz Stockhausen und Robert Schumann nebeneinander.

Hinter der Dirigentenpraxis tritt die eigene Kompositionsarbeit jetzt zurück. Wenn er heute komponiert, dann sei es, erklärt er, „ganz privat. Es ist kein Entdeckungsgang mehr durch die Musik. Es soll mir neue Aufschlüsse über das geben, was schon geschrieben ist".

Entsprechend den Entdeckungen wechseln die musikalischen Vorlieben. Schumann schätzt er im Moment am meisten, und der gerade gestorbene Strawinsky ist eine seiner „ganz großen Leidenschaften". Schr.

Gastspiel mit „Rusalka"

250 Mitglieder der Oper des Prager Nationaltheaters sind jetzt mit Sonderbussen in Schweinfurt eingetroffen. Sie geben dort fünf Vorstellungen der Dvořák-Oper „Rusalka". (AP)

DER Ausschnitt
1 BERLIN 45, Telex: 1-83538
Aufl. i. Tsd. / Richtung: / lt. Stamm 1970 331,8;u
B.Z.
1000 Berlin 61 (BW)

Gestern trafen sie in Berlin ein: der Dirigent William Steinberg und das Boston Symphony Orchestra, die mit dieser Reise zum drittenmal in Europa sind. Schon 1952 war das Orchester in Berlin mit seinem langjährigen Dirigenten Charles Münch. Steinberg hat jetzt dessen Stelle inne. Er wird an zwei Abenden in der Philharmonie, heute und morgen, Werke von Beethoven, Wagner, Hindemith, Schuller und Brahms dirigieren.

Foto: v. d. Becke

92

DER Ausschnitt
1 BERLIN 45, Telex: 1-83 538
Aufl. i. Tsd. / Richtung: } lt. Stamm 1970 : 52,0;u
nacht-depesche
1000 Berlin 33 (BW) 14.4.71 F

Bostoner Ostern

William Steinberg und sein Symphony Orchestra in der Philharmonie

Das war ein gutes Ostergeschenk an das musikalische Berlin: das Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter William Steinberg in der Philharmonie am Vorabend des Festes und am 1. Feiertag. Die Bostoner – das ist auch ein Stück deutscher Musiktradition von Anfang an, denn deutsche Dirigenten leiteten und formten dieses Orchester, darunter Nikisch und Muck, zuletzt Leinsdorf und nun seit rund zwei Jahren Steinberg. Aber auch sonst verbinden sich mit ihm große Namen wie Monteux und Kussevitzky. So etwas schafft Tradition, technische wie künstlerische, eine an europäischen Maßstäben gewachsene Tradition.

Die Bostoner sind ein Orchester von absoluter Spitzenklasse. Da ist nicht nur Perfektion, „amerikanische", da steht diese Perfektion, diese Präzision, die vielfach bis ins handwerkliche Detail der Musiker reicht, im Dienste künstlerischen Gestaltens. Und da läßt eine weite Ausdrucksskala aufhorchen und eine feine klangliche Homogenität.

Der erste Abend galt Beethoven mit der Leonore III, der 3. und der 5. Sinfonie; am zweiten standen Wagner mit dem „Meistersinger"-Vorspiel, Hindemith mit der Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser (die „Bostoner Symphonie"), Gunther Schuller mit „Five Bagatelles" und Brahms mit der Zweiten auf dem Programm. Interessanterweise erwies sich der erste Abend (Beethoven!) als viel publikumsattraktiver als der zweite.

Steinberg bedient sich des leicht ansprechenden Klangkörpers souverän. Hat man ihn früher einen Antiromantiker genannt, so scheint Altersweisheit diese Askese überwunden zu haben. Gewiß, geblieben ist seine analysierende dirigentische Sicht, und vielleicht noch gesteigert, aber indem er mit den Mitteln der Dynamik und der Phrasierung analysiert, ja seziert, fügt er zugleich mit denselben Kräften das Ganze in breiter Formübersicht, breitet die Partitur förmlich vor den Zuhörern aus und erfüllt sie mit angemessener Beseelung. Manifestation der Erfahrungen eines langen Musikerlebens im Blickpunkt der geistigen wie der menschlichen Inhalte der Musik.

Da gewannen Beethoven und Brahms beglückende Deklaration, da wurde bei Wagner zwar ein Schluck aus der vollen klangschwelgerischen Pulle genommen und dabei doch nobel maßgehalten. Hindemiths Konzertmusik ist in Satztechnik und musikalischer Aussage ein unmittelbar ansprechendes Werk, Schullers Bagatellen steht wohl die Konstruktion auf der Stirn geschrieben, aber sie gewinnen als klangsucherische Experimente Interesse.

F.

DER Ausschnitt
1 BERLIN 45, Telex: 1-83 538
Aufl. i. Tsd. / Richtung: } lt. Stamm 1970 : (+);u
Telegraf
1000 Berlin (BW) 14.4.71 G

argus
Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 30,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ostfriesenzeitung, Leer
vom 23. April 1971

3

Hochbegabter junger Dirigent

Bostoner Sinfonieorchester zu Gast in Hannover

Hannover. Dem Wagemut eines vorbildlichen Mäzens, des Majors Higginson, verdankt das Bostoner Symphony-Orchestra seine Existenz. Vor genau 90 Jahren wurde es von ihm gegründet, bedeutende Dirigenten von Arthur Nikisch über Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux und Serge Kussevitzky bis zu William Steinberg, der vor 2 Jahren an die Spitze trat, erzogen es zu einem Klangkörper, der zu den führenden der Welt gehört. Das Steinberg, der heute Einundsiebzigjährige, eine anstrengende Europa-Tournee seines Orchesters nicht allein leiten kann, ist verständlich. Deshalb übertrug er das Pro-Musica-Konzert im hannoverschen Kuppelsaal seinem „brillanten Assistenten" Michael Tilson Thomas.

Die Bekanntschaft mit diesem jungen Musiker lohnte sich. Selbst wenn man berücksichtigt, daß er das Glück hat, mit einem hervorragenden Orchester zu arbeiten, für das keine Schwierigkeiten zu existieren scheinen, so blieb doch genug des Bewundernswerten. Aus der „neoklassizistischen", (richtiger: brav epigonalen) zweiten Sinfonie seines Landsmannes Walter Piston wußte er die Reize einer gekonnten Instrumentation förmlich herauszukitzeln. Und durch sein — auch in der Gestik — spontan-exzessives Temperament wurde „La Valse" von Ravel zwar in ein viel zu vehementes Grundtempo hineingesteigert, aber mit einem so faszinierenden Zug von Rauschhaftigkeit versehen, daß sich zum Schluß ein förmlicher Begeisterungssturm erhob.

Was Michael Tilson Thomas an echter Dirigierbegabung besitzt, zeigt sich allerdings am besten bei der Solistenbegleitung. Dem erstklassigen Fagottisten Sherman Walt, der Mozarts B-Dur-Konzert mit allem klanglichen und dynamisch-agogischen Reichtum echter Kammermusik ausstattete, sekundierte er — trotz einer zu zahlreichen Streicherbesetzung — sehr feinhörig. Aber dann überraschte er durch die wendige Geistesgegenwart, mit der er sich allen Willkürlichkeiten anzupassen wußte, die Christoph Eschenbach dem Klavierkonzert von Schumann angedeihen ließ. Eschenbach ist ja, wie man immer wieder feststellen muß, trotz seiner Jugend künstlerisch in das Virtuosenzeitalter des 19. Jahrhunderts einzuordnen. Romantische Musik, die solche Interpretation durchaus verträgt, ist deshalb seine eigentliche Domäne. Man erkannte es dankbar an.

G. R.

A HIGHLY TALENTED YOUNG CONDUCTOR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest in Hannover

Through the gallantry of a representative patron, the Mayor Higginson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is indebted for their existence. It was founded exactly ninety years ago. Famous conductors, from Arthur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky to William Steinberg, who has lead it for two years now, educated it to a philharmonic which has become one of the leading orchestras of the world. That the now 71 year old Steinberg cannot lead a strenuous tour of the orchestra all by himself is understandable. Therefore he put in charge his "brilliant assistant" Michael Tilson Thomas for the Pro Musica Concert in Hannover's Kuppelsaal.

The aquaintance with this young musician was worth it. Even if one takes into consideration that he was fortunate enough to work with such an excellent orchestra which didn't seem to have any difficulties whatsoever, there was enough left for admiration. He knew downright to tickle the response of a well done instrumentation in the "neo-classic" (better: honest decadent) Second Symphony of his countryman Walter Piston. And because of his spontaneity and excessive temperament - also in gestures - Ravel's La Valse was intensified into a much too impetuous basic tempo. But he did it with such a fascinating stroke of intoxication that a storm of ovation arose at the end.

What Michael Tilson Thomas possesses of true leadership certainly showed best as an accompanist for the soloist. The first-class bassoonist Sherman Walt who performed Mozart's B Flat Concerto provided it with timbre and the dynamicly paced richness of true chamber music. Thomas's accompaniment was very refined, although with too many strings. But then he surprised us with a versatile presence of mind. He knew how to adapt himself to all the arbitrarinesses which Christoph Eschenbach bestowed upon Schumann's Piano Concerto. One has to confirm again and again that Eschenbach is classified in the virtuoso age of the 19th century artistically, despite his youth. Romantic music is his real domain as it can stand such interpretation. One recognized it gratefully.

G.R.

pan american - public relations - hamburg - 12. april 1971

e i l t - termin, dienstag, 13. april 1971 treffpunkt: 11.40 uhr luftaufsicht langenhagen

das bostoner symphonie orchester auf europa-tournee - am dienstag, 13. april 1971 in hannover

im jahre seines 90jaehrigen bestehens charterte das boston symphony orchestra zwei boeing 707 clipper der pan am und traf am 3. april zu der ersten europa-tournee seit 15 jahren in london ein.

am dienstag, 13. april wird das orchester mit pan am-jets in hannover-langenhagen eintreffen (pa 641 um 11.55 uhr und pa 643 um 13.00 uhr) und abends in der stadthalle ein konzert geben, bei dem auch christoph eschenbach als solist auftreten wird.

die symphoniker werden auf dieser tournee begleitet von den bostoner kammermusikern und dem boston pops orchestra. insgesamt reisen 220 personen, die musiker, zum teil auch deren frauen, vertreter der orchester-administration und journalisten.

nach stuttgart, wuppertal und berlin ist hannover die vierte deutsche stadt, die von dem weltberuehmten orchester besucht wird. weitere stationen der europa-tournee sind hamburg, frankfurt, bonn, wien, rom, barcelona und paris, von wo aus der rueckflug am 25. april angetreten wird.

pan american - public relations - hamburg, 12. april 1971

released to Hannover Press

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 30,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –

Ausschnitt aus:

Ostfriesenzeitung, Leer

vom 23. April 1971

Hochbegabter junger Dirigent

Bostoner Sinfonieorchester zu Gast in Hannover

Hannover. Dem Wagemut eines vorbildlichen Mäzens, des Majors Higginson, verdankt das Bostoner Symphony-Orchestra seine Existenz. Vor genau 90 Jahren wurde es von ihm gegründet, bedeutende Dirigenten von Arthur Nikisch über Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux und Serge Kussevitzky bis zu William Steinberg, der vor 2 Jahren an die Spitze trat, erzogen es zu einem Klangkörper, der zu den führenden der Welt gehört. Das Steinberg, der heute Einundsiebzigjährige, eine anstrengende Europa-Tournee seines Orchesters nicht allein leiten kann, ist verständlich. Deshalb übertrug er das Pro-Musica-Konzert im hannoverschen Kuppelsaal seinem „brillanten Assistenten" Michael Tilson Thomas.

Die Bekanntschaft mit diesem jungen Musiker lohnte sich. Selbst wenn man berücksichtigt, daß er das Glück hat, mit einem hervorragenden Orchester zu arbeiten, für das keine Schwierigkeiten zu existieren scheinen, so blieb doch genug des Bewundernswerten. Aus der „neoklassizistischen", (richtiger: brav epigonalen) zweiten Sinfonie seines Landsmannes Walter Piston wußte er die Reize einer gekonnten Instrumentation förmlich herauszukitzeln. Und durch sein — auch in der Gestik — spontan-exzessives Temperament wurde „La Valse" von Ravel zwar in ein viel zu vehementes Grundtempo hineingesteigert, aber mit einem so faszinierenden Zug von Rauschhaftigkeit versehen, daß sich zum Schluß ein förmlicher Begeisterungssturm erhob.

Was Michael Tilson Thomas an echter Dirigierbegabung besitzt, zeigt sich allerdings am besten bei der Solistenbegleitung. Dem erstklassigen Fagottisten Sherman Walt, der Mozarts B-Dur-Konzert mit allem klanglichen und dynamisch-agogischen Reichtum echter Kammermusik ausstattete, sekundierte er — trotz einer zu zahlreichen Streicherbesetzung — sehr feinhörig. Aber dann überraschte er durch die wendige Geistesgegenwart, mit der er sich allen Willkürlichkeiten anzupassen wußte, die Christoph Eschenbach dem Klavierkonzert von Schumann angedeihen ließ. Eschenbach ist ja, wie man immer wieder feststellen muß, trotz seiner Jugend künstlerisch in das Virtuosenzeitalter des 19. Jahrhunderts einzuordnen. Romantische Musik, die solche Interpretation durchaus verträgt, ist deshalb seine eigentliche Domäne. Man erkannte es dankbar an.

G. R.

A HIGHLY TALENTED YOUNG CONDUCTOR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest in Hannover

Through the gallantry of a representative patron, the Mayor Higginson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is indebted for their existence. It was founded exactly ninety years ago. Famous conductors, from Arthur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux and Serge Koussevitzky to William Steinberg, who has lead it for two years now, educated it to a philharmonic which has become one of the leading orchestras of the world. That the now 71 year old Steinberg cannot lead a strenuous tour of the orchestra all by himself is understandable. Therefore he put in charge his "brilliant assistant" Michael Tilson Thomas for the Pro Musica Concert in Hannover's Kuppelsaal.

The aquaintance with this young musician was worth it. Even if one takes into consideration that he was fortunate enough to work with such an excellent orchestra which didn't seem to have any difficulties whatsoever, there was enough left for admiration. He knew downright to tickle the response of a well done instrumentation in the "neo-classic" (better: honest decadent) Second Symphony of his countryman Walter Piston. And because of his spontaneity and excessive temperament - also in gestures - Ravel's La Valse was intensified into a much too impetuous basic tempo. But he did it with such a fascinating stroke of intoxication that a storm of ovation arose at the end.

What Michael Tilson Thomas possesses of true leadership certainly showed best as an accompanist for the soloist. The first-class bassoonist Sherman Walt who performed Mozart's B Flat Concerto provided it with timbre and the dynamicly paced richness of true chamber music. Thomas's accompaniment was very refined, although with too many strings. But then he surprised us with a versatile presence of mind. He knew how to adapt himself to all the arbitrarinesses which Christoph Eschenbach bestowed upon Schumann's Piano Concerto. One has to confirm again and again that Eschenbach is classified in the virtuoso age of the 19th century artistically, despite his youth. Romantic music is his real domain as it can stand such interpretation. One recognized it gratefully.

G.R.

pan american - public relations - hamburg - 12. april 1971

a i l t - termin, dienstag, 13. april 1971 treffpunkt: 11,40 uhr luftschutzbunker langenhagen

das bostoner symphonie orchester auf europatournee -
am dienstag, 13. april 1971 in hannover

im rahmen seines 90jährigen bestehens startete das bostoner symphonie orchester zwei weitere 707 clipper der pan am auf ihre erste europa-tournee. [illegible] der ersten europatournee auf 15 tagen [illegible] dauert.

am dienstag, 13. april [illegible] in hannover [illegible] gehen, [illegible] sind.

die [illegible] spielen auf einigen [illegible] der bostonian symphonie [illegible] orchester, insgesamt sind es 90 musiker, die [illegible] zum teil [illegible] damen fahren. [illegible] der [illegible] tournee.

nach [illegible] ist, ausgerechnet [illegible] hannover [illegible] wird. weitere stationen der [illegible] frankfurt, bern, wien, rom, barcelona und paris, von wo aus den rückflug am 25. april angetreten wird.

pan american - public relations - hamburg, 12. april 1971

released to Hannover Press

94

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): o.A.
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Salzgitter-Zeitung, Salzgitter-Lebenstedt

vom 15. April 1971

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): o.A.
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Osteroder Kreisanzeiger, Osterode

vom 16. April 1971

Die Bostoner und ihr 26jähriger Dirigent / Konzert in Hannover

Nach zwei erfolgreichen Gastspielen in der Berliner Philharmonie (wo besonders das Beethoven-Konzert unter William Steinberg das Publikum enthusiasmierte) musizierte jetzt im Rahmen seiner Europa-Tournee das Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hannover. Ein für uns etwas ungewohntes Programm erwartete den Hörer in dem akustisch nicht gerade idealen Kuppelsaal der Stadthalle: das Fagottkonzert von Mozart, Walter Pistons zweite Sinfonie, das Klavierkonzert in a-moll, op. 54, von Robert Schumann und das Poème choréographique „La Valse" von Maurice Ravel. Wie immer man auch zu einer derartigen Zusammenstellung stehen mag — die kräftig bunte Mischung gab Gelegenheit, die charakteristischen Eigenschaften des renommierten amerikanischen Orchesters und zugleich das junge Dirigiertalent Michael Tilson Thomas kennenzulernen.

Der Abend wurde quasi kammermusikalisch, mit einer Rarität eingeleitet. Wann erklingt schon das einzige auf uns überkommene Fagott-Konzert in B-dur, KV 191, von Mozart in unseren Sälen? Diese reizvolle Komposition wurde 1774 für den Baron Dürnitz geschrieben (zwei weitere gingen verloren) und eröffnen dem Solisten mancherlei Möglichkeiten, virtuoses Können zu zeigen. Diese Chance ließ sich dann auch der erste Fagottist des Orchesters, Sherman Walt, nicht entgehen. Der vornehme, aber doch etwas stumpfe Ton des Instruments verhinderte zwar die Entfaltung bis zur Brillanz. Dennoch mußte man von der Eleganz des Spiels angetan sein, die sich ebenso in den Figurationen wie in den melodischen Arabesken des Andante, besonders aber in den ausgeweiteten Kadenzen in jedem Satz kundtat. Das Orchester spielte seinen Part sehr dezent; der Streichkörper (besonders die ersten Violinen) bevorzugte den bedeckten Klang und erzielte damit Intimität in dem pompösen Raum.

Dieses Charakteristikum der Geigen, dem sich die vortrefflichen Bläser anglichen, bestimmten im wesentlichen alle weiteren Wiedergaben. Es wurde evident bei der Darstellung der zweiten, 1944 entstandenen Sinfonie des 1894 in Rockland geborenen Amerikaners Walter Piston. Das Werk, mit einer Aufführungsdauer von etwa einer halben Stunde, erhielt 1945 den New Yorker Musikkritikerpreis, obgleich Virgil Thomson sich damals äußerte, daß die Sinfonie zwar „zweifelsohne untadelig im methodischen Aufbau und von klarer Ausdruckskraft, jedoch mangelhaft im Gehalt" sei.

Dieser Wertung kann man heute nur beipflichten, denn die in neoklassizistischen und spätromantischen Bereichen beheimatete Sinfonie erweckt wohl manche freundliche Erinnerung an Dvořák, Sibelius und Grieg. Wirklich Eigenständiges ist schwerlich zu entdecken. Dennoch faszinierte die Farbskala dieser Partitur, die die Bostoner zu erregendem Leuchten brachten. Nach dem schon unkonventionell dirigierten Mozart demonstrierte der 26jährige Michael Tilson Thomas seine spezifische Eigenart, die Präzision, Exaltation und Emphase miteinander verband. Diese Dirigierweise vor einem großen Sinfonieorchester wird freilich von europäischen Augen als Show empfunden und zieht die Aufmerksamkeit vom Werk ab hin zum Kapellmeister. Jener Tatbestand konnte jedoch nicht darüber hinwegtäuschen, daß sich eine außerordentliche Begabung präsentierte, die freilich am Schluß mit der Wiedergabe von Ravels Apotheose auf den Wiener Walzer zum Knalleffekt ihrer selbst wurde.

Michael Tilson Thomas entpuppte sich hier als Tänzer auf dem Podium à la Bernstein, trieb es bis zur Karikatur eines Künstlers à la Wilhelm Busch, erreichte allerdings auch den tosenden Beifall des Publikums, das sich an der fernsehgerechten Aktion eines jungen Individualisten vergnügte. Die bemerkenswerten Qualitäten des Orchesters zeigten sich dennoch im hellsten Licht. Der Rausch der Klänge und Rhythmen, mit Elan aufgewirbelt, riß dann auch das Auditorium zu stürmischem Beifall hin.

Den eigentlichen künstlerischen Höhepunkt des Abends brachte indessen zuvor die Wiedergabe des Klavierkonzertes von Schumann. In seiner so unverwechselbaren Verflechtung von Orchester und Solopart, in seiner zartgliedrigen Rhythmik, in seinen poetischen Dialogen der Streicher und einzelner Instrumente, der Oboe und der Violoncelli mit dem Klavier etwa, wurde es mit federnder Verve musiziert. Man vergaß, daß der Klang des Flügels für den Hörer im Parkett nicht voll erblühen konnte, denn Christoph Eschenbach spielte seinen Part technisch und geistig überlegen und immer in engem Kontakt mit dem Orchester, das ihm seit langem aus gemeinsamer Konzerttätigkeit vertraut ist.

Christoph Eschenbach wie auch jüngst das Boston Symphony Orchestra stehen bei der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft exklusiv unter Vertrag. Die Produzentin gab aus diesem und dem Anlaß der Europa-Tournee für das berühmte amerikanische Orchester (und seinen Solisten) in Hannover einen Empfang. Christoph Eschenbach, der vor drei Jahren in Braunschweig das zweite Klavierkonzert von Henze spielte, wurde als Solist des Yomiuri Nippon Symphony Orchestra Tokio verpflichtet, das im Rahmen der Braunschweiger Philharmonischen Konzerte in der kommenden Saison gastieren wird.

Gotthard Schmidtke

Auf Eis gelegt

Solschenizyns neuer Roman

Alexander Solschenizyn hat nach Angaben seiner Freunde die sowjetischen Staatsverlage Anfang des Jahres vergeblich darum ersucht, seinen neuen, fertiggestellten Roman „August 1914" zu veröffentlichen. Aus der gleichen Quelle verlautete, die sowjetischen Behörden verhinderten auch, daß der in seiner Heimat offiziell geächtete Autor in den Genuß der gesamten mit dem Nobelpreis verbundenen Prämien gelangt. Solschenizyn hat noch Verbindung zu dem Zürcher Anwalt, der eine unautorisierte Veröffentlichung seines neuen Romans im Westen verhindern soll. Nachdem „Der erste Kreis der Hölle" und „Krebsstation" gegen den Willen des Schriftstellers im Westen erschienen waren, war er 1969 vom sowjetischen Schriftstellerverband ausgeschlossen worden.

Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, 15. April 1971

Bostoner Orchester sorgt für die Konzertsensation

Enthusiastischer Beifall für M. T. Thomas' Präzisions-Dirigat

AUS DEM KREIS. Die Begeisterungswogen des Publikums gingen in der ausverkauften Elberfelder Stadthalle wieder einmal hoch: Das Bostoner Sinfonieorchester, eines der traditionsreichsten der Welt, sorgte für „die" Konzertsensation innerhalb der Saison 1970/71.

Der junge, ungemein talentierte — wenn auch oftmals tänzerisch akrobatische — Dirigent Michael Tilson Thomas, schon oft als „Bernstein Nummer zwei" in den USA wegen seines emotionsgeladenen Dirigats artikuliert, ließ die „Hundertmann-Armada" in einem Präzisionsakt ohnegleichen singen, schluchzen, heulen, donnern und — bei Ravels „La Valse" - Tondichtung zum Schluß — explodieren.

Der vibrierende, bei der Schlußstretta nahezu orgiastisch in Klangbewegung gekommene Apparat, dabei empfindlich wie ein Geigerzähler und auf die subtilsten Nuancen seines Chefs eingehend, brodelte bis zum Bersten.

Kaum war in Wuppertal bei einem Konzert der Beifall enthusiastischer und spontaner als bei dieser Begegnung, die in live vom Rundfunk übertragen wurde, womit zugleich auf die außergewöhnliche Bedeutung hingewiesen sei, daß die „Bostonians" in Wuppertal als einziger Stadt in Nordrhein-Westfalen im Rahmen ihrer Europa-Tournee anläßlich des 90jährigen Bestehens dieses Orchesters gastierten.

Das Programm war für europäische Traditionen unorthodox: Beethovens „Achte", hier ein wenig zu forsch und aggressiv, als mehr wünschenswert introvertiert und „schwebend" transparent gespielt, dann Schönbergs schwierig zu interpretierenden „Fünf Orchesterstücke op. 16", mit deren Leuchtkraft und technischer Differenzierung die Bostoner ein Paradebeispiel orchestralen Schliffs abgaben und eingangs Debussys „Tongedicht" „Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune", zauberhaft durftig und irdisch gelöst „hingeworfen" in memoriam Igor Strawinski zugeeignet.

Dazwischen eine Konzertsaal-Rarität: Mozarts Fagottkonzert B-Dur, KV 191, das der Solofagottist Sherman Walt mit derart hinreißender Grazie und technischer Wandlungsfähigkeit blies, daß das Publikum aus dem Häuschen geriet.

Jochen Rentsch

hamburg

pre-concert publicity

das bostoner symphonie-orchester auf europa-tournee - in hamburg am 14. april die m a e z e n e kommen zuerst (am 13.4. um 10.00 uhr)

im jahre seines 90jaehrigen bestehens charterte das boston symphony orchestra zwei boeing 707 der pan am und traf am 3. april 1971 +zu der ersten europa-tournee seit 15 jahren in London ein.

hamburg gehoert zu den 12 staedten, die auf dem kontinent besucht werden: hier wird das weltberuehmte orchester unter seinem dirigenten william steinberg am 14. april in der grossen musikhalle ein konzert geben.

in boston, dem wirtschaftlichen und kulturellen mittelpunkt neu-englands, gesellte sich zu den musikern ein kreis von potentiellen foerderern, es sind die ''friends of the boston symphony''. 40 dieser herren sind mit dem orchester ueber den atlantik gereist, besuchen aber nur neun europaeische staedte und treffen in hamburg bereits am dienstag, 13. april, 10.00 uhr mit pan am-flug 605 aus berlin ein, waehrend das orchester erst am 14.4. anreisen wird.

die symphoniker werden auf dieser tournee begleitet von den bostoner kammermusikern sowie von arthur fiedler mit seinem beliebten boston pops orchestra, das erstmalig ausserhalb der usa zu hoeren ist. insgesamt reisen etwa 220 personen, die musiker, teilweise auch deren frauen, die friends, vertreter der orchester-administration und journalisten.

nach stuttgart, wuppertal , berlin und hannover ist hamburg die fuenfte deutsche stadt, die von dem orchester besucht wird. weitere stationen der europa-tournee, die am 25. april endet, sind frankfurt, bonn, wien, rom, barcelona und paris.

pan american - public relations - hamburg, 12. april 1971

released to Hamburg Press

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 314,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hamburger Abendblatt, Hamburg
vom 14. April 1971

3

Menschlich gesehen

Chefdirigent aus Boston

Seit dem Frühjahr 1968 leitet William Steinberg das weltbekannte Boston Symphony Orchestra. Der gebürtige Kölner, dessen Vitalität so bemerkenswert ist wie sein außergewöhnliches Können, hat damit ein Novum der amerikanischen Geschichte gesetzt: Er ist Chefdirigent zweier führender Orchester in den USA, nämlich der Bostoner und des Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, mit dem ihn heute ein Kontrakt auf Lebenszeit verbindet.

Der über 70jährige William Steinberg begann seine Karriere als Assistent des Dirigenten Otto Klemperer an der Kölner Oper. Er ging 1925 an das Deutsche Theater in Prag und wurde 1929 Chefdirigent der Frankfurter Oper. Dort und auch in Berlin, wo er mehrfach am Pult der Staatsoper stand, widmete er sich besonders der Moderne.

Doch 1936 mußte Steinberg aus dem nationalsozialistischen Deutschland emigrieren und gründete mit Bronislav Hubermann das Palästina-Orchester. Auf Einladung Toscaninis ging er schließlich 1938 in die Staaten, um ihm beim Aufbau und der Schulung des NBC Symphony Orchestra zu assistieren.

Kaum hatte William Steinberg in den USA Fuß gefaßt, rissen sich die amerikanischen Symphony-Orchester um ihn. Bei vielen war er Gastdirigent. 1945 übernahm er das Buffalo-Philharmonic-Orchestra und sieben Jahre später die gleiche Stellung bei den Symphonikern in Pittsburgh.

Sein Leitsatz: „Ich arbeite mit Orchestern, in denen die Spieler außergewöhnliche Persönlichkeiten sind." Daran hat er sich stets gehalten. Heute abend wird William Steinberg am Pult in der Hamburger Musikhalle stehen und seine Bostoner dirigieren.

95
DIE WELT, Hamburg - April 14, 1971

Alsterbummel vor dem Konzert

Einen Bummel an der Außenalster machte gestern Arthur Fiedler, einer der drei Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, das unter seinem Chefdirigenten William Steinberg heute um 20 Uhr in der Musikhalle ein (seit langem ausverkauftes) Konzert gibt. Das weltberühmte Ensemble charterte aus Anlaß seines 90jährigen Bestehens zwei Boeing 707 der PanAm, um seine erste Europa-Tournee seit 15 Jahren anzutreten. Gewissermaßen als Vorhut des Orchesters, das am 3. April seinen ersten Abend in London absolvierte, traf Fiedler, in den USA bekannt und beliebt durch seine Konzerte mit seinem Boston Pops Orchestra, schon gestern in der Hansestadt ein. Hamburg gehört zu den zwölf Städten, die auf dem Kontinent besucht werden, und ist die fünfte deutsche Station nach Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin und Hannover. Die weiteren Ziele des Gastorchesters sind Frankfurt, Bonn, Wien, Rom, Barcelona und Paris. Eine Abordnung des Orchesters sowie Vertreter der „Friends of the Boston Symphony" werden heute vormittag im Rathaus empfangen. Wir werden auf das Hamburger Gastspiel noch ausführlich zurückkommen.

Foto: Conti-Press

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 280,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Die Welt, Hamburg
vom 23. 3. 71

Boston Symphony Orchestra kommt in die Bundesrepublik

pd. Hamburg, 22. März

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra unternimmt im April seine dritte Europatournee. In der Bundesrepublik sind sieben Konzerte vorgesehen. Der erste Abend findet am 7. April in Stuttgart statt und wird geleitet von William Steinberg, der seit 1969 neben dem von ihm seit 1952 geleiteten Pittsburgh Orchestra auch Chefdirigent der Sinfoniker in Boston ist.

Steinberg dirigiert in der Bundesrepublik vier Konzerte. Drei Konzerte werden von dem 26jährigen Michael Tilson Thomas geleitet. Im Rahmen der Deutschland-Tournee gibt es am 16. April ein Konzert der Boston Pops. Das aus Mitgliedern der Sinfoniker gebildete Ensemble, das sich vorwiegend der Unterhaltungsmusik widmet, wird ein Programm spielen, das von Beethoven bis zu Ausschnitten aus dem Musical „Hair" reicht.

hamburg

pre-concert publicity

das bostoner symphonie-orchester auf europa-tournee - in hamburg am 14. april die m a e z e n e kommen zuerst (am 13.4. um 10.00 uhr)

im jahre seines 90jaehrigen bestehens charterte das boston symphony orchestra zwei boeing 707 der pan am und traf am 3. april 1971 zu der ersten europa-tournee seit 15 jahren in london ein.

hamburg gehoert zu den 12 staedten, die auf dem kontinent besucht werden; hier wird das weltberuehmte orchester unter seinem dirigenten william steinberg am 14. april in der grossen musikhalle ein konzert geben.

in boston, dem wirtschaftlichen und kulturellen mittelpunkt neu-englands, gesellte sich zu der musikern ein kreis von potentiellen foerderern, es sind die "friends of the boston symphony". 40 dieser herren sind mit dem orchester ueber den atlantik gereist, besuchen aber nur neun europaeische staedte und treffen in hamburg bereits am dienstag, 13. april, 10.00 uhr mit dem pm-flug 605 aus berlin ein, waehrend das orchester erst am 14.4. anreisen wird.

die symphoniker waren auf dieser tournee begleitet von den bostoner kammermusikern sowie von arthur fiedler mit seinem beliebten boston pops orchestra, das erstmalig ausserhalb der usa zu hoeren ist. insgesamt reisen etwa 220 personen, die musiker, teilweise auch deren frauen, die friends, vertreter der orchester-administration und journalisten.

nach stuttgart, wuppertal, berlin und hannover ist hamburg die fuenfte deutsche stadt, die von dem orchester besucht wird. weitere stationen der europa-tournee, die am 25. april endet, sind frankfurt, bonn, wien, rom, barcelona und paris.

pan american - public relations - hamburg, 12. april 1971

released to Hamburg Press

DIE WELT, Hamburg - April 14, 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 314,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hamburger Abendblatt, Hamburg
vom 14. April 1971

3 Menschlich gesehen

Chefdirigent aus Boston

Seit dem Frühjahr 1968 leitet William Steinberg das weltbekannte Boston Symphony Orchestra. Der gebürtige Kölner, dessen Vitalität so bemerkenswert ist wie sein außergewöhnliches Können, hat damit ein Novum der amerikanischen Geschichte gesetzt: Er ist Chefdirigent zweier führender Orchester in den USA, nämlich der Bostoner und des Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, mit dem ihn heute ein Kontrakt auf Lebenszeit verbindet.

Der über 70jährige William Steinberg begann seine Karriere als Assistent des Dirigenten Otto Klemperer an der Kölner Oper. Er ging 1925 an das Deutsche Theater in Prag und wurde 1929 Chefdirigent der Frankfurter Oper. Dort und auch in Berlin, wo er mehrfach am Pult der Staatsoper stand, widmete er sich besonders der Moderne.

Doch 1936 mußte Steinberg aus dem nationalsozialistischen Deutschland emigrieren und gründete mit Bronislav Hubermann das Palästina-Orchester. Auf Einladung Toscaninis ging er schließlich 1938 in die Staaten, um ihm beim Aufbau und der Schulung des NBC Symphony Orchestra zu assistieren.

Kaum hatte William Steinberg in den USA Fuß gefaßt, rissen sich die amerikanischen Symphony-Orchester um ihn. Bei vielen war er Gastdirigent. 1945 übernahm er das Buffalo-Philharmonic-Orchestra und sieben Jahre später die gleiche Stellung bei den Symphonikern in Pittsburgh.

Sein Leitsatz: „Ich arbeite mit Orchestern, in denen die Spieler außergewöhnliche Persönlichkeiten sind." Daran hat er sich stets gehalten. Heute abend wird William Steinberg am Pult in der Hamburger Musikhalle stehen und seine Bostoner dirigieren.

Alsterbummel vor dem Konzert

Einen Bummel an der Außenalster machte gestern Arthur Fiedler, einer der drei Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, das unter seinem Chefdirigenten William Steinberg heute um 20 Uhr in der Musikhalle ein (seit langem ausverkauftes) Konzert gibt. Das weltberühmte Ensemble charterte aus Anlaß seines 90jährigen Bestehens zwei Boeing 707 der PanAm, um seine erste Europa-Tournee seit 15 Jahren anzutreten. Gewissermaßen als Vorhut des Orchesters, das am 3. April seinen ersten Abend in London absolvierte, traf Fiedler, in den USA bekannt und beliebt durch seine Konzerte mit seinem Boston Pops Orchestra, schon gestern in der Hansestadt ein. Hamburg gehört zu den zwölf Städten, die auf dem Kontinent besucht werden, und ist die fünfte deutsche Station nach Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin und Hannover. Die weiteren Ziele des Gastorchesters sind Frankfurt, Bonn, Wien, Rom, Barcelona und Paris. Eine Abordnung des Orchesters sowie Vertreter der „Friends of the Boston Symphony" werden heute vormittag im Rathaus empfangen. Wir werden auf das Hamburger Gastspiel noch ausführlich zurückkommen.

Foto: Conti-Press

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 280,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Die Welt, Hamburg
vom 5. 3. 71

Boston Symphony Orchestra kommt in die Bundesrepublik

pd. Hamburg, 22. März

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra unternimmt im April seine dritte Europatournee. In der Bundesrepublik sind sieben Konzerte vorgesehen. Der erste Abend findet am 7. April in Stuttgart statt und wird geleitet von William Steinberg, der seit 1969 neben dem von ihm seit 1952 geleiteten Pittsburgh Orchestra auch Chefdirigent der Sinfoniker in Boston ist.

Steinberg dirigiert in der Bundesrepublik vier Konzerte. Drei Konzerte werden von dem 26jährigen Michael Tilson Thomas geleitet. Im Rahmen der Deutschland-Tournee gibt es am 16. April ein Konzert der Boston Pops. Das aus Mitgliedern der Sinfoniker gebildete Ensemble, das sich vorwiegend der Unterhaltungsmusik widmet, wird ein Programm spielen, das von Beethoven bis zu Ausschnitten aus dem Musical „Hair" reicht.

96

HAMBURGER ABENDBLATT

13 April 1971

Besuch aus Boston

William Steinberg

Eines der bedeutendsten Orchester der USA, das Boston Symphony Orchestra, unternimmt vom 4. bis 24. April seine erste Europa-Tournee seit 15 Jahren. Das Hamburg-Konzert unter Leitung des Chefdirigenten William Steinberg am 14. April mit Werken von Mozart, Hindemith und Beethoven ist seit Monaten ausverkauft. Es wird von einer Reihe gesellschaftlicher Ereignisse umrahmt:

Am Vormittag empfängt der Senat im Rathaus eine Gruppe von amerikanischen Gästen, die sogenannten „friends" — Persönlichkeiten aus Industrie, Wirtschaft und Kultur, die Mäzene des Orchesters sind. Für den Nachmittag hat die Deutsche Grammophon, die seit Herbst 1970 exklusiv Schallplatten mit den Bostonern aufnimmt, die drei Dirigenten William Steinberg, Arthur Fiedler und Michael T. Thomas sowie eine Orchester-Delegation in ihr Stammhaus am Harvestehuder Weg eingeladen. Im Anschluß an das Konzert in der Musikhalle findet ein Gala-Empfang für die amerikanischen Gäste und Persönlichkeiten des Hamburger Kulturlebens im Hotel Atlantic statt. Unter ihnen befindet sich auch Joan Kennedy, die Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy, die in Bonn in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" als Sprecherin mitwirkt.

Arthur Fiedler, seit 40 Jahren Leiter der traditionellen „Boston Pops"-Konzerte und Ehrenmitglied zahlreicher Feuerwehrvereinigungen in aller Welt, kann seinen 100. Feuerwehrhelm in Empfang nehmen: er wird coram publico zum Ehrenmitglied der Freiwilligen Feuerwehr Hamburg-Sasel ernannt. t.

HAMBURGER ABENDBLATT - 15.4.1971

Fiedler wurde Feuerwehrmann von Sasel . . .

Mit Feuerwehrhelm: Dirigent Otto Fiedler aus Boston

Nach dem Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Hamburger Musikhalle stand gestern abend bei einem Empfang für 400 Ehrengäste im Atlantic Hotel Dirigent Arthur Fiedler im Mittelpunkt. Dem 77jährigen weltberühmten Künstler wurde, als er im Hotel die 24köpfige Blaskapelle der Freiwilligen Feuerwehr Hamburg-Sasel dirigierte, nicht weniger applaudiert als zuvor in der Musikhalle. (Es ist Fiedlers Hobby, in aller Welt Feuerwehrkapellen zu dirigieren.) Mit der Überreichung eines Saseler Feuerwehrhelms wurde er zum Ehren-Feuerwehrmann ernannt. Mittags hatte Fiedler auf dem Hamburger Flughafen Joan Kennedy, Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy, mit Rosen empfangen. Freitag abend wollen sie gemeinsam in der Bonner Beethovenhalle auftreten. (Siehe auch Seite 9) Fotos: KIESEL/FEDDERSEN

Vom Flughafen ins Hotelbett: Übermüdete Joan Kennedy

Die Welt, 14/4/71

Alsterbummel vor dem Konzert

Einen Bummel an der Außenalster machte gestern Arthur Fiedler, einer der drei Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, das unter seinem Chefdirigenten William Steinberg heute um 20 Uhr in der Musikhalle ein (seit langem ausverkauftes) Konzert gibt. Das weltberühmte Ensemble charterte aus Anlaß seines 90jährigen Bestehens zwei Boeing 707 der PanAm, um seine erste Europa-Tournee seit 15 Jahren anzutreten. Gewissermaßen als Vorhut des Orchesters, das am 3. April seinen ersten Abend in London absolvierte, traf Fiedler, in den USA bekannt und beliebt durch seine Konzerte mit seinem Boston Pops Orchestra, schon gestern in der Hansestadt ein. Hamburg gehört zu den zwölf Städten, die auf dem Kontinent besucht werden, und ist die fünfte deutsche Station nach Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin und Hannover. Die weiteren Ziele des Gastorchesters sind Frankfurt, Bonn, Wien, Rom, Barcelona und Paris. Eine Abordnung des Orchesters sowie Vertreter der „Friends of the Boston Symphony" werden heute vormittag im Rathaus empfangen. Wir werden auf das Hamburger Gastspiel noch ausführlich zurückkommen.

Foto: Conti-Press

96

HAMBURGER ABENDBLATT

13 April 1971

Besuch aus Boston

William Steinberg

Eines der bedeutendsten Orchester der USA, das Boston Symphony Orchestra, unternimmt vom 4. bis 24. April seine erste Europa-Tournee seit 15 Jahren. Das Hamburg-Konzert unter Leitung des Chefdirigenten William Steinberg am 14. April mit Werken von Mozart, Hindemith und Beethoven ist seit Monaten ausverkauft. Es wird von einer Reihe gesellschaftlicher Ereignisse umrahmt:

Am Vormittag empfängt der Senat im Rathaus eine Gruppe von amerikanischen Gästen, die sogenannten „friends" — Persönlichkeiten aus Industrie, Wirtschaft und Kultur, die Mäzene des Orchesters sind. Für den Nachmittag hat die Deutsche Grammophon, die seit Herbst 1970 exklusiv Schallplatten mit den Bostonern aufnimmt, die drei Dirigenten William Steinberg, Arthur Fiedler und Michael T. Thomas sowie eine Orchester-Delegation in ihr Stammhaus am Harvestehuder Weg eingeladen. Im Anschluß an das Konzert in der Musikhalle findet ein Gala-Empfang für die amerikanischen Gäste und Persönlichkeiten des Hamburger Kulturlebens im Hotel Atlantic statt. Unter ihnen befindet sich auch Joan Kennedy, die Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy, die in Bonn in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" als Sprecherin mitwirkt.

Arthur Fiedler, seit 40 Jahren Leiter der traditionellen „Boston Pops"-Konzerte und Ehrenmitglied zahlreicher Feuerwehrvereinigungen in aller Welt, kann seinen 100. Feuerwehrhelm in Empfang nehmen: er wird coram publico zum Ehrenmitglied der Freiwilligen Feuerwehr Hamburg-Sasel ernannt. t.

HAMBURGER ABENDBLATT - 15.4.1971

Fiedler wurde Feuerwehrmann von Sasel . . .

Mit Feuerwehrhelm: Dirigent Otto Fiedler aus Boston

Nach dem Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Hamburger Musikhalle stand gestern abend bei einem Empfang für 400 Ehrengäste im Atlantic Hotel Dirigent Arthur Fiedler im Mittelpunkt. Dem 77jährigen weltberühmten Künstler wurde, als er im Hotel die 24köpfige Blaskapelle der Freiwilligen Feuerwehr Hamburg-Sasel dirigierte, nicht weniger applaudiert als zuvor in der Musikhalle. (Es ist Fiedlers Hobby, in aller Welt Feuerwehrkapellen zu dirigieren.) Mit der Überreichung eines Saseler Feuerwehrhelms wurde er zum Ehren-Feuerwehrmann ernannt. Mittags hatte Fiedler auf dem Hamburger Flughafen Joan Kennedy, Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy, mit Rosen empfangen. Freitag abend wollen sie gemeinsam in der Bonner Beethovenhalle auftreten. (Siehe auch Seite 9) Fotos: KIEBEL/FEDDERSEN

Vom Flughafen ins Hotelbett: Übermüdete Joan Kennedy

Die Welt, 14/4/71

Alsterbummel vor dem Konzert

Einen Bummel an der Außenalster machte gestern Arthur Fiedler, einer der drei Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, das unter seinem Chefdirigenten William Steinberg heute um 20 Uhr in der Musikhalle ein (seit langem ausverkauftes) Konzert gibt. Das weltberühmte Ensemble charterte aus Anlaß seines 90jährigen Bestehens zwei Boeing 707 der PanAm, um seine erste Europa-Tournee seit 15 Jahren anzutreten. Gewissermaßen als Vorhut des Orchesters, das am 3. April seinen ersten Abend in London absolvierte, traf Fiedler, in den USA bekannt und beliebt durch seine Konzerte mit seinem Boston Pops Orchestra, schon gestern in der Hansestadt ein. Hamburg gehört zu den zwölf Städten, die auf dem Kontinent besucht werden, und ist die fünfte deutsche Station nach Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin und Hannover. Die weiteren Ziele des Gastorchesters sind Frankfurt, Bonn, Wien, Rom, Barcelona und Paris. Eine Abordnung des Orchesters sowie Vertreter der „Friends of the Boston Symphony" werden heute vormittag im Rathaus empfangen. Wir werden auf das Hamburger Gastspiel noch ausführlich zurückkommen.

Foto: Conti-Press

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (l. Ta.): 314,2 — lt. Jahrbuch 1970 —

Ausschnitt aus:
Hamburger Abendblatt, Hamburg
vom 15. April 1971

Donnerstag, 15. April 1971 HAMBURGER ABENDBLATT Theater · Kun

An jedem Pult sitzt ein Virtuose

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hamburg / Problematischer Mozart

Hamburg gehört zu den sechs deutschen Städten, in denen die 107 Musiker des Boston Symphony Orchestra mit ihren drei Dirigenten William Steinberg, Arthur Fiedler und Michael Tilson Thomas gastieren. Als Außenpunkte werden London, Wien, Rom, Barcelona und Paris angesteuert. Diese Europatournee zum 90. Geburtstag des Orchesters finanzieren private Mäzene, von denen 40 mitreisen, wie auch die Musikkritiker sämtlicher Bostoner Zeitungen. Vor und nach dem gestrigen Konzert in der Großen Musikhalle fanden Empfänge beim Senat und der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft statt, die seit Herbst 1970 das Orchester unter Exklusivvertrag hat.

Fünfzehn Konzerte mit abwechslungsreichen Programmen zwischen Offenbach, Beethoven, Schönberg und Schuller: Chefdirigent Steinberg (72) wird achtmal und der 26jährige „Kronprinz" M. T. Thomas fünfmal am Pult stehen.

Die außergewöhnliche Variationsbreite des Repertoires resultiert aus der für Europa ungewöhnlichen Besetzungsregie: Das BSO tritt als Sinfonieorchester und für volkstümliche Programme als „Boston Pops"-Orchester auf. Zwölf Solisten bilden überdies ein Kammermusikensemble, die Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

Fiedler (77), der vor 41 Jahren die Boston Pops erfand und nach der traditionellen Frühlingssaison in jedem Sommer auch die „Esplanade Concerts" (Gratiskonzerte im Freien) dirigiert, ist jedem Amerikaner ein Begriff.

Die Bostoner Sinfoniker, privates Unternehmen mit einem Jahresetat von 4,5 Millionen Dollar, bestreiten in ihrer Stadt und beim Sommerfestival in Tanglewood über 200 Konzerte pro Saison. In der Reihe ihrer Dirigenten finden sich viele prominente Namen: Nikisch, Muck, Koussevitzky, Munch, Leinsdorf. Der gebürtige Kölner Steinberg, seit 1938 in den USA, führt die große Tradition des Orchesters fort. S. T.

Ein Bostoner aus Köln: Chefdirigent William Steinberg in der Hamburger Musikhalle

*

Ein hinreißender Hindemith — aber unüberhörbare Probleme beim Umgang mit den Wiener Klassikern, vor allem mit Mozart: So widersprüchlich las sich am Ende die Visitenkarte, die die Bostoner gestern abend in der Hamburger Musikhalle abgaben.

Dabei kann es über den hohen Rang dieses Orchesters keinen Zweifel geben. An jedem Pult sitzt ein versierter Virtuose, der — so jedenfalls der Eindruck — nur der gelegentlichen Mit- oder auch sanften Nachhilfe des Dirigenten bedarf und im übrigen mit traumhafter Sicherheit und Selbstgewißheit seinen Einsatz und seinen Teil zum Klangbild liefert. Der Zufall — ein unbekanntes Wesen für den Profi. Das freilich hat auch eine Kehrseite...

Doch zunächst muß von Hindemiths Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläsern die Rede sein, einem Auftragswerk für Boston, das den Auftraggebern in Hamburg ein glänzendes Zeugnis verschaffte. Bewundernswert vor allem die homogene Gruppe der Blechbläser mit ihrem kompakten, wuchtigen Klang, der indes nie polterte oder schrillte. Hinreißend die von Steinberg einstudierte Wiedergabe, die musterhafte spielerische Vitalität mit rhythmischer Eleganz zu verbinden wußte und darüber hinaus den eng verzahnten Dialog zwischen den an sich so grundverschiedenen Instrumentengruppen nie abreißen ließ: Dieser Hindemith aus der Neuen Welt hat — sehr im Gegensatz zu manchem anderen in diesem Land gefertigten — noch keinerlei Spuren von Staub oder klanglichem Fett angesetzt.

Anders stand es um Mozart und Beethoven. Befremdlich zunächst die fast schon unbegreifliche Gelassenheit, mit der Steinberg die ersten drei Sätze der Linzer Sinfonie (KV 425) entfaltete, um dann mit einem wirklichen Finale-Presto einiges an verschlenderter Zeit aufzuholen. Ein äußeres Kennzeichen für das nicht vorhandene natürliche Verhältnis zu dieser Musik.

Steinberg, immerhin doch ein Kölner von Geburt, tut ein übriges, mit gänzlich uneitlen, präzisen, bisweilen auch überspitzten Kapellmeister-Gesten die Akzente, die klanglichen Gliederungen zu unterstreichen. Die Folge jedoch: Die Melodie fließt nicht, gerät immer wieder ins Stocken; zu überdeutlich sind die Übergänge, auch der Wechsel der Instrumente in einer Periode, miteinander verkittet. Der Eindruck: ein Mozart, genau nach Partitur — aber bei allem instrumentalen Vibrato doch ohne wirkliche Wärme, ohne seelisches Engagement.

Auch in Beethovens Eroica gab es Partien, in denen die Strukturen fast schmerzhaft deutlich hervortraten, ohne daß der Impuls sie mit musikalischem Leben auffüllte: die Durchführung im ersten Satz, besonders aber die von Nüchternheit gezeichnete Reprise. Für einen Bostoner, so schien es hier, liegt ein Piano oder gar ein Pianissimo jenseits allen künstlerischen Interesses. Das muß zu manchen Ungereimtheiten führen, wie dem fast lehrhaft plumpen Auftakt der Hörner im Scherzo-Trio, der (genau wie die Auftakte im Mozart-Menuett zuvor schon) isoliert vom Folgenden in der Luft hängen blieb.

Auch hier wiederum die breiten Tempi des Anfangssatzes und des — nun freilich auch mit Herz gespielten — Trauermarsches von geradezu Furtwänglerischem Sentiment. Das äußerst sauber hingelegte Scherzo und der Stretta-Wirbel der ersten Finale-Variationen — Herausforderungen an ein Elite-Ensemble und also ein gefundenes Fressen für das Bostoner Orchester! — unterstrichen abschließend die Qualitäten dieses in vielen Dingen sehr typischen amerikanischen Orchesters. Das Publikum sparte nicht mit Beifall und Sympathiekundgebungen — mit kleinen, aber hörbaren Unterschieden.

CARL-HEINZ MANN

hamburg reviews

At Every Desk Sits A Virtuoso

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hamburg
Problematic Mozart

Long introduction including a reference to "the 26-year-old 'crown-prince', M.T.Thomas."

* *

"Ravishing Hindemith but unmistakable problems with the Viennese classics, especially Mozart"---Thus read the contradictory visiting card that the Bostonians gave us last night in the Hamburg Musikhalle.

Further, there can be no doubt about the high rank of this orchestra. At every desk sits a well-versed virtuoso, who--at least this is the impression--needs only occasional gentle assistance from the conductor and otherwise makes his entry and his contribution to the (larger) musical picture with fabulous security and self-confidence. For these pros there is no such thing as chance! Admittedly the coin has another side...

But first we must mention Hindemith's Konzertmusik for String Orchestra and Brass, a work commissioned for Boston and which offered shining testimony to the commissioning orchestra in Hamburg. Particular remarkable was the homogeneous group of brass players with their compact and weighty sound that never was blustery or shrill. Captivating was the performance--rehearsed by Steinberg--which united exemplary vitality with rhythmic elegance and which further never let the closely-linked dialogue between the two so different groups of instruments fall apart. This Hindemith from the New World has--very much in contrast to many others prepared in this land--no trace yet of dust or sonic fat stuck to it.

It was different with the Mozart and Beethoven. First it was strange with what almost inconceivable calmness (laxness) Steinberg presented the first three movements of the Linz Symphony (K. 425), only to make up for lost time with a real Finale-Presto. An outward indication of the lack of a natural relationship to this music.

Steinberg, still after all a born Cologner (Colognian?), does more than his share to underline the accents and the musical divisions by means of completely modest, precise, at time even overrefined gestures. The result however is that the melody does not flow but rather keeps coming to a standstill. The transitions are too clear, the alternation of instruments within one period too pasted together. The impression was of Mozart played literally from the printed score but--in spite of all instrumental vibrato--without any real warmth, without spiritual (emotional) involvement.

In Beethoven's Eroica too there were parts in which the structure was almost painfully clear without it being infused with musical life: the development in the first movement, but especially the sober recapitulation. For a Bostonian, so it seemed here, a piano or pianissimo is far from all artistic interest (concern). That can only lead to many absurdities, such as the almost textbook-clumsy upbeat of the horns in the Scherzo Trio that (exactly like the upbeats in the Mozart minuet before it) hang in mid-air, isolated from what follows.

Here again were the broad tempi in the opening movement and in the Funeral March, admittedly played with the heart and nearly Furtwänglerian sentiment. The extremely clear Scherzo and the giddy stretti of the first variations in the finale--these are challenges to an elite ensemble (and therefore peanuts for the Boston orchestra) and they underlined finally the qualities of this in many ways very typical American orchestra. The audience was generous in their applause and expressions of sympathy--with small but audible distinctions.

CARL-HEINZ MANN

translated by Ralph Locke

further translation notes on the following page

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (t. Ts.): 314,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hamburger Abendblatt, Hamburg
vom 15. April 1971

An jedem Pult sitzt ein Virtuose

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hamburg / Problematischer Mozart

Hamburg gehört zu den sechs deutschen Städten, in denen die 107 Musiker des Boston Symphony Orchestra mit ihren drei Dirigenten William Steinberg, Arthur Fiedler und Michael Tilson Thomas gastieren. Als Außenpunkte werden London, Wien, Rom, Barcelona und Paris angesteuert. Diese Europatournee zum 90. Geburtstag des Orchesters finanzieren private Mäzene, von denen 40 mitreisen, wie auch die Musikkritiker sämtlicher Bostoner Zeitungen. Vor und nach dem gestrigen Konzert in der Großen Musikhalle fanden Empfänge beim Senat und der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft statt, die seit Herbst 1970 das Orchester unter Exklusivvertrag hat.

Fünfzehn Konzerte mit abwechslungsreichen Programmen zwischen Offenbach, Beethoven, Schönberg und Schuller: Chefdirigent Steinberg (72) wird achtmal und der 26jährige „Kronprinz" M. T. Thomas fünfmal am Pult stehen.

Die außergewöhnliche Variationsbreite des Repertoires resultiert aus der für Europa ungewöhnlichen Besetzungsregie: Das BSO tritt als Sinfonieorchester und für volkstümliche Programme als „Boston Pops"-Orchester auf. Zwölf Solisten bilden überdies ein Kammermusikensemble, die Boston Symphony Chamber Players, Fiedler (77), der vor 41 Jahren die Boston Pops erfand und nach der traditionellen Frühlingssaison in jedem Sommer auch die „Esplanade Concerts" (Gratiskonzerte im Freien) dirigiert, ist jedem Amerikaner ein Begriff.

Die Bostoner Sinfoniker, privates Unternehmen mit einem Jahresetat von 4,5 Millionen Dollar, bestreiten in ihrer Stadt und beim Sommerfestival in Tanglewood über 200 Konzerte pro Saison. In der Reihe ihrer Dirigenten finden sich viele prominente Namen: Nikisch, Muck, Koussevitzky, Munch, Leinsdorf. Der gebürtige Kölner Steinberg, seit 1938 in den USA, führt die große Tradition des Orchesters fort. S. T.

Ein Bostoner aus Köln: Chefdirigent William Steinberg in der Hamburger Musikhalle

•

Ein hinreißender Hindemith — aber unüberhörbare Probleme beim Umgang mit den Wiener Klassikern, vor allem mit Mozart: So widersprüchlich las sich am Ende die Visitenkarte, die die Bostoner gestern abend in der Hamburger Musikhalle abgaben.

Dabei kann es über den hohen Rang dieses Orchesters keinen Zweifel geben. An jedem Pult sitzt ein versierter Virtuose, der — so jedenfalls der Eindruck — nur der gelegentlichen Mit- oder auch sanften Nachhilfe des Dirigenten bedarf und im übrigen mit traumhafter Sicherheit und Selbstgewißheit seinen Einsatz und seinen Teil zum Klangbild liefert. Der Zufall — ein unbekanntes Wesen für den Profi. Das freilich hat auch eine Kehrseite...

Doch zunächst muß von Hindemiths Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläsern die Rede sein, einem Auftragswerk für Boston, das den Auftraggebern in Hamburg ein glänzendes Zeugnis verschaffte. Bewundernswert vor allem die homogene Gruppe der Blechbläser mit ihrem kompakten, wuchtigen Klang, der indes nie polterte oder schrillte. Hinreißend die von Steinberg einstudierte Wiedergabe, die musterhafte spielerische Vitalität mit rhythmischer Eleganz zu verbinden wußte und darüber hinaus den eng verzahnten Dialog zwischen den an sich so grundverschiedenen Instrumentengruppen nie abreißen ließ: Dieser Hindemith aus der Neuen Welt hat — sehr im Gegensatz zu manchem anderen in diesem Land gefertigten — noch keinerlei Spuren von Staub oder klanglichem Fett angesetzt.

Anders stand es um Mozart und Beethoven. Befremdlich zunächst die fast schon unbegreifliche Gelassenheit, mit der Steinberg die ersten drei Sätze der Linzer Sinfonie (KV 425) entfaltete, um dann mit einem wirklichen Finale-Presto einiges an verschlenderter Zeit aufzuholen. Ein äußeres Kennzeichen für das nicht vorhandene natürliche Verhältnis zu dieser Musik.

Steinberg, immerhin doch ein Kölner von Geburt, tut ein übriges, mit gänzlich uneitlen, präzisen, bisweilen auch überspitzten Kapellmeister-Gesten die Akzente, die klanglichen Gliederungen zu unterstreichen. Die Folge jedoch: Die Melodie fließt nicht, gerät immer wieder ins Stocken; zu überdeutlich sind die Übergänge, auch der Wechsel der Instrumente in einer Periode, miteinander verkittet. Der Eindruck: ein Mozart, genau nach Partitur — aber bei allem instrumentalen Vibrato doch ohne wirkliche Wärme, ohne seelisches Engagement.

Auch in Beethovens Eroica gab es Partien, in denen die Strukturen fast schmerzhaft deutlich hervortraten, ohne daß der Impuls sie mit musikalischem Leben auffüllte: die Durchführung im ersten Satz, besonders aber die von Nüchternheit gezeichnete Reprise. Für einen Bostoner, so schien es hier, liegt ein Piano oder gar ein Pianissimo jenseits allen künstlerischen Interesses. Das muß zu manchen Ungereimtheiten führen, wie dem fast lehrhaft plumpen Auftakt der Hörner im Scherzo-Trio, der (genau wie die Auftakte im Mozart-Menuett zuvor schon) isoliert vom Folgenden in der Luft hängen blieb.

Auch hier wiederum die breiten Tempi des Anfangssatzes und des — nun freilich auch mit Herz gespielten — Trauermarsches von geradezu Furtwänglerischem Sentiment. Das äußerst sauber hingelegte Scherzo und der Stretta-Wirbel der ersten Finale-Variationen — Herausforderungen an ein Elite-Ensemble und also ein gefundenes Fressen für das Bostoner Orchester! — unterstrichen abschließend die Qualitäten dieses in vielen Dingen sehr typischen amerikanischen Orchesters. Das Publikum sparte nicht mit Beifall und Sympathiekundgebungen — mit kleinen, aber hörbaren Unterschieden.

CARL-HEINZ MANN

hamburg reviews

At Every Desk Sits A Virtuoso

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hamburg
Problematic Mozart

Long introduction including a reference to "the 26-year-old 'crown-prince', M.T.Thomas."

* *

"Ravishing Hindemith but unmistakable problems with the Viennese classics, especially Mozart"---Thus read the contradictory visiting card that the Bostonians gave us last night in the Hamburg Musikhalle.

Further, there can be no doubt about the high rank of this orchestra. At every desk sits a well-versed virtuoso, who--at least this is the impression--needs only occasional gentle assistance from the conductor and otherwise makes his entry and his contribution to the (larger) musical picture with fabulous security and self-confidence. For these pros there is no such thing as chance! Admittedly the coin has another side...

But first we must mention Hindemith's Konzertmusik for String Orchestra and Brass, a work commissioned for Boston and which offered shining testimony to the commissioning orchestra in Hamburg. Particular remarkable was the homogeneous group of brass players with their compact and weighty sound that never was blustery or shrill. Captivating was the performance--rehearsed by Steinberg--which united exemplary vitality with rhythmic elegance and which further never let the closely-linked dialogue between the two so different groups of instruments fall apart. This Hindemith from the New World has--very much in contrast to many others prepared in this land--no trace yet of dust or sonic fat stuck to it.

It was different with the Mozart and Beethoven. First it was strange with what almost inconceivable calmness (laxness) Steinberg presented the first three movements of the Linz Symphony (K. 425), only to make up for lost time with a real Finale-Presto. An outward indication of the lack of a natural relationship to this music.

Steinberg, still after all a born Cologner (Colognian?), does more than his share to underline the accents and the musical divisions by means of completely modest, precise, at time even overrefined gestures. The result however is that the melody does not flow but rather keeps coming to a standstill. The transitions are too clear, the alternation of instruments within one period too pasted together. The impression was of Mozart played literally from the printed score but--in spite of all instrumental vibrato--without any real warmth, without spiritual (emotional) involvement.

In Beethoven's Eroica too there were parts in which the structure was almost painfully clear without it being infused with musical life: the development in the first movement, but especially the sober recapitulation. For a Bostonian, so it seemed here, a piano or pianissimo is far from all artistic interest (concern). That can only lead to many absurdities, such as the almost textbook-clumsy upbeat of the horns in the Scherzo Trio that (exactly like the upbeats in the Mozart minuet before it) hang in mid-air, isolated from what follows.

Here again were the broad tempi in the opening movement and in the Funeral March, admittedly played with the heart and nearly Furtwänglerian sentiment. The extremely clear Scherzo and the giddy stretti of the first variations in the finale--these are challenges to an elite ensemble (and therefore peanuts for the Boston orchestra) and they underlined finally the qualities of this in many ways very typical American orchestra. The audience was generous in their applause and expressions of sympathy--with small but audible distinctions.

CARL-HEINZ MANN

translated by Ralph Locke

further translation notes on the following page

98 translation notes cont. from the preceding page

Hamburger Abendblatt

Review by Karl-Heinz Mann

A VIRTUOSO SITS AT EVERY DESK

...THERE CAN BE NO DOUBT ABOUT THE HIGH CLASS OF THIS ORCHESTRA. A VIRTUOSO SITS AT EVERY DESK, WHO, ONE HAD THE IMPRESSION, NEEDED ONLY A LITTLE GENTLE HELP FROM THE DIRECTOR AND IN GENERAL PLAYED WITH FABULOUS CERTAINTY AND SELF-CONFIDENCE.

HINDEMITH: Particularly remarkable was the homogenous group of brass players with their compact and powerful sound -- there was never a single ugly or shrill note. Steinberg's studied interpretation was gripping....

MOZART: ...The impression was of Mozart played literally from the printed page -- but in spite of all instrumental vibrato, without any real warmth, without emotional involvement....

BEETHOVEN: ...[redacted] ...Also in Beethoven's Eroica, there were parts in which the structure was almost painfully clear without it being infused with any musical impulse, particularly the [redacted] over-sober reprise of the first movement....The Funeral march, however, was played with much feeling in an almost Furtwaenglerian way, and the clean scherzo and exciting stretti of the last movement underlined finally the qualities of this in many ways typically American orchestra. The public gave them its wholehearted applause.

Bild Welt, 15/4

Empfang und Gala-Souper für die Symphoniker

Ein Empfang im Rathaus, ein Stehkonvent bei der Deutschen Grammophon, das Hauptereignis eines ausverkauften Konzerts und ein anschließendes Gala-Souper im Atlantic Hotel — und all dies an einem einzigen Tag: Das Gastspiel des berühmten Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem Chefdirigenten William Steinberg gestern hätte kaum anstrengender, aber kaum auch glanzvoller verlaufen können. Für die Hansestadt wurde es nicht nur zu einem musikalischen, sondern auch zu einem gesellschaftlichen Ereignis. Und das Frühlingswetter kam den 107 Musikern aus den USA wie ein Geschenk.

Im Rathaus hatte sich der über 70jährige Steinberg für den freundlichen Empfang durch Staatsrat Gerhard Schattschneider in deutscher Sprache bedankt. Sein Kollege Arthur Fiedler hatte auf dem Flughafen Joan Kennedy abgeholt: Sie wird, in Anwesenheit ihres Mannes Edward Kennedy, morgen in der Bonner Beethovenhalle die Partie der Sprecherin in Serge Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" unter Fiedlers Leitung übernehmen. Das Konzert gestern abend in der Musikhalle und das anschließende Souper vereinigten alles an Prominenz, was abkömmlich und interessiert war.

Hamburg ist eine der insgesamt zwölf Stationen, die das Bostoner Orchester auf seiner ersten Europa-Tournee nach 15 Jahren besuchte. In seiner nunmehr 90jährigen Geschichte hat das Ensemble so bedeutende Dirigenten wie Karl Muck, Charles Munch, Serge Koussevitzky, Erich Leinsdorf und — seit 1969 — William Steinberg gehabt.

„Karl Muck war es, der mich vor 57 Jahren als Mitglied des Orchesters verpflichtete", sagt mir Arthur Fiedler, „damals spielte ich Bratsche und andere Instrumente." Ich frage: „Haben Sie auch als Solist gewirkt?" Fiedler: „Nein, den Ehrgeiz habe ich nie gehabt." Der Mann mit dem prächtigen weißen Haar ist durch seine Pop-Konzerte selbst eine volkstümliche Figur geworden, die man bewundert und liebt. Er ist seit 41 Jahren Dirigent bei den Bostonern — „länger als irgendein anderer", betont er. Was er unter Pop in concert versteht? „Alles, von Bach bis zur Moderne", erklärt Fiedler, der das Deutsch seines österreichischen Vaters (auch er war Mitglied im Orchester) nicht verlernt hat.

Eine besondere Ehrung für Arthur Fiedler: Gestern nach dem Konzert wurde ihm von der Freiwilligen Feuerwehr Sasel ein Feuerwehrhelm überreicht und die Ehrenmitgliedschaft angetragen. „Feuerwehr ist mein Hobby", erzählt Fiedler, „ich bin Feuerwehrhauptmann in 275 Wehren und habe schon mehr als 70 oder 80 Helme. Sie stehen alle bei mir zu Hause oder in meinem Büro auf Regalen — meine Frau hat sich so lange über die Staubfänger geärgert, daß ich jetzt alles dem Museum schenke, einschließlich eines Feuerwehrwagens, der in meiner Garage steht."

Schade, daß wir weder Fiedler noch seinen 26jährigen Kollegen Michael Tilsen Thomas hier zu hören bekamen.

Walter Deppisch

98 translation notes cont. from the preceding page

Hamburger Abendblatt

Review by Karl-Heinz Mann

A VIRTUOSO SITS AT EVERY DESK

...THERE CAN BE NO DOUBT ABOUT THE HIGH CLASS OF THIS ORCHESTRA. A VIRTUOSO SITS AT EVERY DESK, WHO, ONE HAD THE IMPRESSION, NEEDED ONLY A LITTLE GENTLE HELP FROM THE DIRECTOR AND IN GENERAL PLAYED WITH FABULOUS CERTAINTY AND SELF-CONFIDENCE.

HINDEMITH: Particularly remarkable was the homogenous group of brass players with their compact and powerful sound -- there was never a single ugly or shrill note. Steinberg's studied interpretation was gripping....

MOZART: ...The impression was of Mozart played literally from the printed page -- but in spite of all instrumental vibrato, without any real warmth, without emotional involvement....

BEETHOVEN: ...[redacted] ...Also in Beethoven's Eroica, there were parts in which the structure was almost painfully clear without it being infused with any musical impulse, particularly the [redacted] over-sober reprise of the first movement....The Funeral march, however, was played with much feeling in an almost Furtwaenglerian way, and the clean scherzo and exciting stretti of the last movement underlined finally the qualities of this in many ways typically American orchestra. The public gave them its wholehearted applause.

Bild Welt, 15/4

Empfang und Gala-Souper für die Symphoniker

Ein Empfang im Rathaus, ein Stehkonvent bei der Deutschen Grammophon, das Hauptereignis eines ausverkauften Konzerts und ein anschließendes Gala-Souper im Atlantic Hotel — und all dies an einem einzigen Tag: Das Gastspiel des berühmten Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem Chefdirigenten William Steinberg gestern hätte kaum anstrengender, aber kaum auch glanzvoller verlaufen können. Für die Hansestadt wurde es nicht nur zu einem musikalischen, sondern auch zu einem gesellschaftlichen Ereignis. Und das Frühlingswetter kam den 107 Musikern aus den USA wie ein Geschenk.

Im Rathaus hatte sich der über 70jährige Steinberg für den freundlichen Empfang durch Staatsrat Gerhard Schattschneider in deutscher Sprache bedankt. Sein Kollege Arthur Fiedler hatte auf dem Flughafen Joan Kennedy abgeholt: Sie wird, in Anwesenheit ihres Mannes Edward Kennedy, morgen in der Bonner Beethovenhalle die Partie der Sprecherin in Serge Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" unter Fiedlers Leitung übernehmen. Das Konzert gestern abend in der Musikhalle und das anschließende Souper vereinigten alles an Prominenz, was abkömmlich und interessiert war.

Hamburg ist eine der insgesamt zwölf Stationen, die das Bostoner Orchester auf seiner ersten Europa-Tournee nach 15 Jahren besuchte. In seiner nunmehr 90jährigen Geschichte hat das Ensemble so bedeutende Dirigenten wie Karl Muck, Charles Munch, Serge Koussevitzky, Erich Leinsdorf und — seit 1969 — William Steinberg gehabt.

„Karl Muck war es, der mich vor 57 Jahren als Mitglied des Orchesters verpflichtete", sagt mir Arthur Fiedler, „damals spielte ich Bratsche und andere Instrumente." Ich frage: „Haben Sie auch als Solist gewirkt?" Fiedler: „Nein, den Ehrgeiz habe ich nie gehabt." Der Mann mit dem prächtigen weißen Haar ist durch seine Pop-Konzerte selbst eine volkstümliche Figur geworden, die man bewundert und liebt. Er ist seit 41 Jahren Dirigent bei den Bostonern — „länger als irgendein anderer", betont er. Was er unter Pop in concert versteht? „Alles, von Bach bis zur Moderne", erklärt Fiedler, der das Deutsch seines österreichischen Vaters (auch er war Mitglied im Orchester) nicht verlernt hat.

Eine besondere Ehrung für Arthur Fiedler: Gestern nach dem Konzert wurde ihm von der Freiwilligen Feuerwehr Sasel ein Feuerwehrhelm überreicht und die Ehrenmitgliedschaft angetragen. „Feuerwehr ist mein Hobby", erzählt Fiedler, „ich bin Feuerwehrhauptmann in 275 Wehren und habe schon mehr als 70 oder 80 Helme. Sie stehen alle bei mir zu Hause oder in meinem Büro auf Regalen — meine Frau hat sich so lange über die Staubfänger geärgert, daß ich jetzt alles dem Museum schenke, einschließlich eines Feuerwehrwagens, der in meiner Garage steht."

Schade, daß wir weder Fiedler noch seinen 26jährigen Kollegen Michael Tilson Thomas hier zu hören bekamen.

Walter Deppisch

Harburger Anzeigen und Nachrichten
15. April 1971

Enthusiastisch gefeiert

Das Bostoner Symphony-Orchester in der Musikhalle

Die Musikhalle war dicht besetzt und das gastierende großartige Bostoner Symphony-Orchester sah sich mit seinem hervorragenden Dirigenten William Steinberg vom Auditorium sogleich mit starken Sympathiekundgebungen empfangen. Die Gäste boten ein schönes, die Hörer entflammendes Programm. Schon mit der einleitend vom Dirigenten nobel interpretierten Sinfonie Mozarts K. V. 428 offenbarte sich ihre musikalische Kultur, verbunden mit einer Nobilität des Vortrags, in der viele eingeflochtene Feinheiten die Hörer entzückten.

Dieser Auftakt war bereits verheißungsvoll, denn das Orchester musizierte nicht nur im Glanz von Kultur und Musikalität; es bot Eigenwertiges in der Gestaltung, die sich aus der Initiative des Dirigenten entwickelte. Im lichten Gesamtvortrag entzückten sogleich die substantiellen Feinheiten bestechender Orchesterkultur.

Dem Auftakt folgte Hindemiths „Konzertmusik für Streichinstrumente und Blechbläser, op. 99", eine gehaltvolle — eigenwertige Komposition, die, als Bostoner Sinfonie gezeichnet, eine sich gedanklich und musikalisch frei entfaltende Linie verfolgt, die durch Schönheit der Diktion wie der Charakteristik beeindruckte.

Nach beiden Werken sahen sich Dirigent und Orchester stürmisch gefeiert. Höhepunkt des Konzerts war dann Beethovens abschließend erklingende „Eroica" — dritte Sinfonie Es-Dur, op. 55. Hier überzeugte die großartige dirigistische Form und die von ihr ausgehende, das Orchester befeuernde Initialkraft. Gerade in den Standardwerken, die immer mehr einem Überlieferungsstil verfallen, ist es wichtig, neue vortragliche Aspekte zu gewinnen. Sie sind von der Konvention zu lösen, um durch künstlerische Direktiven neu erlebt zu werden, wobei die Materie in das Licht ihrer eigenwertigen, von der Norm abweichenden Gestaltung rückt. Da zeigt sich, daß ein großes Kunstwerk unausschöpfbar ist, daß die scheinbar festliegende Diktion in die Aura einer Subjektivität gerückt werden kann, dank der das Kunstwerk in bereicherter Schönheit neu aufblüht. Die Hörer erkannten diesen Wandel — der die sachliche Objektivität natürlich nicht tangierte — als musisches Geschenk von eigenherrlicher Schönheit. Die Gesamtheit entzückte. Die Gäste und ihr hervorragender Dirigent sahen sich mit enthusiastischen Beifallsbezeigungen gefeiert.

Hans Hauptmann

ENTHUSIASTICLY CELEBRATED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Musik Hall

The Musik Hall was filled. The splendidly entertaining Boston Symphony Orchestra with its excellent conductor William Steinberg was immediately welcomed with strong applause. The guests offered a beautiful program to inflame the listeners. Their musical culture was revealed already in Mozart's Symphony, KV 428, nobly interpreted by the conductor, combined with the nobility of the reproduction into many fine details were interwoven, exciting the listeners.

The opening was already promising as the orchestra didn't just make music in the splendor of culture and musicality. It offered characteristic value in the construction which developed from the initiative of the conductor. All in all the bright performance was enchanting, with substantial fine details of the attractive orchestral culture.

Hindemith's Konzertmusik for String Orchestra and Brasses, op.99 followed the opening, a rich valuable composition, called the "Boston Symphony". The composition follows a freely developed line, intellectually and musically which impressed through its beauty of diction and character.

After both works the conductor and the orchestra were honored stormily. The highlight of the concert was Beethoven's Eroica, Third Symphony in E Flat Major, op.55. Here the grandly directed form convinced, and coming from it, the initial strength, stimulating the orchestra. Especially in those war horses which deteriorate to a traditional style, it is very important to gain new aspects in performing. They should withdraw from the conventional to experience them again through artistic direction in which the matter moves into the light of its own condition, divergent from the rule. There it shows that a work of art is inexhaustible, that the apparently defined diction can be moved into the aura of subjetivity which makes the work of art bloom again in enriched beauty. The listeners recognized the change - which didn't touch upon the essential objectivity - as a musical gift of magnificant splendor. The entirety was delightful. The guests and their excellent conductor were honored with enthusiastic applause.

Hans Hauptmann

Hamburger Anzeiger und Nachrichten
15. April 1971

Enthusiastisch gefeiert

Das Bostoner Symphony-Orchester in der Musikhalle

Die Musikhalle war dicht besetzt und das gastierende großartige Bostoner Symphony-Orchester sah sich mit seinem hervorragenden Dirigenten William Steinberg vom Auditorium sogleich mit starken Sympathiekundgebungen empfangen. Die Gäste boten ein schönes, die Hörer entflammendes Programm. Schon mit der einleitend vom Dirigenten nobel interpretierten Sinfonie Mozarts K. V. 428 offenbarte sich ihre musikalische Kultur, verbunden mit einer Nobilität des Vortrags, in der viele eingeflochtene Feinheiten die Hörer entzückten.

Dieser Auftakt war bereits verheißungsvoll, denn das Orchester musizierte nicht nur im Glanz von Kultur und Musikalität; es bot Eigenwertiges in der Gestaltung, die sich aus der Initiative des Dirigenten entwickelte. Im lichten Gesamtvortrag entzückten sogleich die substantiellen Feinheiten bestechender Orchesterkultur.

Dem Auftakt folgte Hindemiths „Konzertmusik für Streichinstrumente und Blechbläser, op. 99", eine gehaltvolle — eigenwertige Komposition, die, als Bostoner Sinfonie gezeichnet, eine sich gedanklich und musikalisch frei entfaltende Linie verfolgt, die durch Schönheit der Diktion wie der Charakteristik beeindruckte.

Nach beiden Werken sahen sich Dirigent und Orchester stürmisch gefeiert. Höhepunkt des Konzerts war dann Beethovens abschließend erklingende „Eroica" — dritte Sinfonie Es-Dur, op. 55. Hier überzeugte die großartige dirigistische Form und die von ihr ausgehende, das Orchester befeuernde Initialkraft. Gerade in den Standardwerken, die immer mehr einem Überlieferungsstil verfallen, ist es wichtig, neue vortragliche Aspekte zu gewinnen. Sie sind von der Konvention zu lösen, um durch künstlerische Direktiven neu erlebt zu werden, wobei die Materie in das Licht ihrer eigenwertigen, von der Norm abweichenden Gestaltung rückt. Da zeigt sich, daß ein großes Kunstwerk unausschöpfbar ist, daß die scheinbar festliegende Diktion in die Aura einer Subjektivität gerückt werden kann, dank der das Kunstwerk in bereicherter Schönheit neu aufblüht. Die Hörer erkannten diesen Wandel — der die sachliche Objektivität natürlich nicht tangierte — als musisches Geschenk von eigenherrlicher Schönheit. Die Gesamtheit entzückte. Die Gäste und ihr hervorragender Dirigent sahen sich mit enthusiastischen Beifallsbezeigungen gefeiert.

Hans Hauptmann

ENTHUSIASTICLY CELEBRATED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Musik Hall

The Musik Hall was filled. The splendidly entertaining Boston Symphony Orchestra with its excellent conductor William Steinberg was immediately welcomed with strong applause. The guests offered a beautiful program to inflame the listeners. Their musical culture was revealed already in Mozart's Symphony, KV 428, nobly interpreted by the conductor, combined with the nobility of the reproduction into many fine details were interwoven, exciting the listeners.

The opening was already promising as the orchestra didn't just make music in the splendor of culture and musicality. It offered characteristic value in the construction which developed from the initiative of the conductor. All in all the bright performance was enchanting, with substantial fine details of the attractive orchestral culture.

Hindemith's Konzertmusik for String Orchestra and Brasses, op.99 followed the opening, a rich valuable composition, called the "Boston Symphony". The composition follows a freely developed line, intellectually and musically which impressed through its beauty of diction and character.

After both works the conductor and the orchestra were honored stormily. The highlight of the concert was Beethoven's Eroica, Third Symphony in E Flat Major, op.55. Here the grandly directed form convinced, and coming from it, the initial strength, stimulating the orchestra. Especially in those war horses which deteriorate to a traditional style, it is very important to gain new aspects in performing. They should withdraw from the conventional to experience them again through artistic direction in which the matter moves into the light of its own condition, divergent from the rule. There it shows that a work of art is inexhaustible, that the apparently defined diction can be moved into the aura of subjetivity which makes the work of art bloom again in enriched beauty. The listeners recognized the change - which didn't touch upon the essential objectivity - as a musical gift of magnificant splendor. The entirety was delightful. The guests and their excellent conductor were honored with enthusiastic applause.

Hans Hauptmann

100

Klasse-Musiker kamen aus USA

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dirigent William Steinberg. Programm: Linzer Symphonie von Mozart; Bostoner Symphonie von Hindemith; Eroica von Beethoven.

Die Gäste aus USA fühlten sich spürbar wohl. Unsere Stadt gilt ihnen als eines der Musikzentren Europas. Aber ihre Fragen nach Hamburgs musikalischer Repräsentanz mußten negativ beantwortet werden. „Wo ist Schmidt-Isserstedt? Wo Leopold Ludwig?" — „In Amerika!" — „Und Sawallisch, Horst Stein?" — Auch nicht zu Hause!" Staatsopern-Intendant Liebermann, obzwar er gleich zwei Theater am Hals hat, war da, fand sich umringt von vielen Freunden aus Amerika. Hochstimmung überall: bei den Empfängen im Rathaus, beim US-Generalkonsul, im Atlantic Hotel. Die ausverkaufte Musikhalle in gespannter Erwartung.

Den 100. Helm ergattert: Feuerwehrfan Fiedler (Fotos: Krauss)

Das Orchester präsentierte sich unter William Steinberg (72) als ein sehr ausgewogener, mit hervorragenden Bläsern bestückter Klangkörper. Musiziert wurde ohne Perfektionsstreben, dafür aber mit äußerster Konzentration, Disziplin und heißem Engagement. William Steinberg zeichnet sich durch hochkultivierten Klangsinn und brillante Disposition aus. Seine Zeitmaße scheinen an dem Furtwängler-Lehrsatz orientiert, nach welchem die jeweiligen Tempi immer von den kleinsten Notenwerten bestimmt werden sollen.

Das Ereignis war die Bostoner Symphonie, die Hindemith im Zenith seiner Schöpferkraft für das Bostoner Orchester geschrieben hat (1931). Ein großartiges Stück, und eine unvergleichlich brillante Wiedergabe. Der Mozart erschien uns etwas matt und farblos; Beethovens Eroica gedieh blut- und kraftvoll, aber ohne Weltschmerz. Da hatte alles das rechte Gewicht, das gute Maß und noble Würde.

Ludwig Pollner

Ganz ohne Konzertsaal-Würde, sehr flott, sehr leger, ging vonstatten, was zwischen „den Bostonern" in Hamburg und den Bostonern in Bonn noch zu erledigen war: Die Klavierprobe von Mrs. Joan Kennedy, dem sprechenden Star für die Musik-Legende von „Peter und der Wolf". Joan, die schöne, lässige Senatorenfrau, kam morgens um 9 Uhr mit blauen Jeans vors Klavier im Atlantic Hotel marschiert:

„Hey, Arthur", begrüßte sie ihren Dirigenten, „war's lang gestern nacht?" Und Arthur Fiedler antwortete freundlich brummelnd durch seinen weißen Schnauzbart: „Anstrengend, aber ich bin ein Pferd und schnell wach — ich schlafe auf den Füßen."

Und während die beiden die Partituren durchblätterten, wollte sie wissen, wie wohl das Hamburger Konzert gewesen sei. „Ach, schön, schön, aber ich wär lieber hinters Hotel gelaufen, da gab's nämlich ein Feuer." — „Ach ja", antwortete Mrs. Kennedy und lächelte verständnisvoll, „ich habe es gerochen."

Daß Arthur Fiedler, der Weißhaarige, Alerte, der gern Lackschuhe mit Schleifchen trägt, ein Feuerwehr-Fan ist, wußte man auch in Hamburg: Die Freiwilligen von Sasel überreichten ihm ihren Helm — den 100. übrigens, den Arthur Fiedler nach Boston trägt, wo er Ehren-Chief der Stadtfeuerwehr ist und ein eigenes Feuerwehrauto hegt und pflegt.

Eva Kohlrusch

Klavierprobe in Hamburg: Joan Kennedy und Arthur Fiedler

QUALITY MUSICIANS CAME FROM U S A

The Boston Symphony Orchestra. Conductor: William Steinberg. Program: Mozart, Linz Symphony, Boston Symphony by Hindemith, Eroica by Beethoven.

It was obvious that the guest from USA felt great. For them our city is one of the music centers of Europe. But their inquiries for Hamburg's musical representatives had to be answered negative. "Where is Schmidt-Isserstedt? Where is Leopold Ludwig?" "In America!" "And Sawallisch, Horst Stein?" "Not at home either!" Liebermann, the director of the opera, encumbered with two theaters, was surrounded by many friends from America. Good feeling was everywhere: At the receptions in the City Hall, at the US Consul-General and at the ATlantic Hotel. The sold out Muisc Hall was filled with anticipation.

The orchestra showed a very calibrated philharmonic, with excellent brasses, under William Steinberg (72). They made music without trying to achieve perfection, but instead with extreme concentration and firey involvement. William Steinberg excelled with highly cultural feeling for sound and brilliant management. His tempi seemed to be oriented towards the Furtwangler-teachings at which each tempo is determined by the smallest note value.

The sensation was the Boston Symphony which Hindemith had written for the Boston Orchestra in 1931, at the hight of his creative career. A splendid piece, and an incomparibly brilliant randition. Mozart seemed to us a bit colorless and weak; Beethoven's Eroica developed full of body and power, but without weariness of life. Everything had the right weight, the good measure and noble dignity.

Ludwig Pollner

Very gay and down to earth and completely without concert hall dignity, there was a matter that had to be settled between the "Bostonians" in Hamburg and the Bostonians in Bonn: The piano rehearsel of Mrs. Joan Kennedy, the narrator for the musical legend of "Peter and the Wolf". Joan the beautiful, indolent Senator's wife appeared in the morning at 9 o'clock, in blue jeans in front of the piano at the Atlantic Hotel.

"Hi, Arthur" she greeted the conductor, "Have you been out late last night?" And Arthur Fiedler answered through his white mustache, mumbling aimiably "It was strenuous, but I am like a horse and wake up quickly - I sleep on my feet."

And while the two leafed through the score she wanted to know how the concert in Hamburg had been: "Very well, very well, but I'd rather run behind the hotel, because they had a fire there." "oh yes, answered Mrs. Kennedy smilingly and understanding. "I smelled it."

In Hamburg, too, everybody knew that Arthur Fiedler was a fire bug, the white-haired, alert man, who likes to wear patent leather shoes with laces. The volunteer fire department of Sasel gave him their helmet, the hundredth that Arthur Fiedler brings to Boston. There he is Honorary Chief of the city's fire department and he cares and cherishes his own fire engine.

Eva Kohlrusch

Fiedler, the fire bug, gets his hundredth helmet.

Piano rehearsel in Hamburg: Joan Kennedy and Arthur F.

100

Klasse-Musiker kamen aus USA

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dirigent William Steinberg. Programm: Linzer Symphonie von Mozart; Bostoner Symphonie von Hindemith; Eroica von Beethoven.

Die Gäste aus USA fühlten sich spürbar wohl. Unsere Stadt gilt ihnen als eines der Musikzentren Europas. Aber ihre Fragen nach Hamburgs musikalischer Repräsentanz mußten negativ beantwortet werden. „Wo ist Schmidt-Isserstedt? Wo Leopold Ludwig?" – „In Amerika!" – „Und Sawallisch, Horst Stein?" – Auch nicht zu Hause!" Staatsopern-Intendant Liebermann, obzwar er gleich zwei Theater am Hals hat, war da, fand sich umringt von vielen Freunden aus Amerika. Hochstimmung überall: bei den Empfängen im Rathaus, beim US-Generalkonsul, im Atlantic Hotel. Die ausverkaufte Musikhalle in gespannter Erwartung.

Den 100. Helm ergattert: Feuerwehrfan Fiedler (Fotos: Krauss)

Das Orchester präsentierte sich unter William Steinberg (72) als ein sehr ausgewogener, mit hervorragenden Bläsern bestückter Klangkörper. Musiziert wurde ohne Perfektionsstreben, dafür aber mit äußerster Konzentration, Disziplin und heißem Engagement. William Steinberg zeichnet sich durch hochkultivierten Klangsinn und brillante Disposition aus. Seine Zeitmaße scheinen an dem Furtwängler-Lehrsatz orientiert, nach welchem die jeweiligen Tempi immer von den kleinsten Notenwerten bestimmt werden sollen.

Das Ereignis war die Bostoner Symphonie, die Hindemith im Zenith seiner Schöpferkraft für das Bostoner Orchester geschrieben hat (1931). Ein großartiges Stück, und eine unvergleichlich brillante Wiedergabe. Der Mozart erschien uns etwas matt und farblos; Beethovens Eroica gedieh blut- und kraftvoll, aber ohne Weltschmerz. Da hatte alles das rechte Gewicht, das gute Maß und noble Würde.

Ludwig Pollner

Ganz ohne Konzertsaal-Würde, sehr flott, sehr leger, ging vonstatten, was zwischen „den Bostonern" in Hamburg und den Bostonern in Bonn noch zu erledigen war: Die Klavierprobe von Mrs. Joan Kennedy, dem sprechenden Star für die Musik-Legende von „Peter und der Wolf". Joan, die schöne, lässige Senatorenfrau, kam morgens um 9 Uhr mit blauen Jeans vors Klavier im Atlantic Hotel marschiert:

„Hey, Arthur", begrüßte sie ihren Dirigenten, „war's lang gestern nacht?" Und Arthur Fiedler antwortete freundlich brummelnd durch seinen weißen Schnauzbart: „Anstrengend, aber ich bin ein Pferd und schnell wach — ich schlafe auf den Füßen."

Und während die beiden die Partituren durchblätterten, wollte sie wissen, wie wohl das Hamburger Konzert gewesen sei. „Ach, schön, schön, aber ich wär lieber hinters Hotel gelaufen, da gab's nämlich ein Feuer." — „Ach ja", antwortete Mrs. Kennedy und lächelte verständnisvoll, „ich habe es gerochen."

Daß Arthur Fiedler, der Weißhaarige, Alerte, der gern Lackschuhe mit Schleifchen trägt, ein Feuerwehr-Fan ist, wußte man auch in Hamburg: Die Freiwilligen von Sasel überreichten ihm ihren Helm — den 100. übrigens, den Arthur Fiedler nach Boston trägt, wo er Ehren-Chief der Stadtfeuerwehr ist und ein eigenes Feuerwehrauto hegt und pflegt.

Eva Kohlrusch

Klavierprobe in Hamburg: Joan Kennedy und Arthur Fiedler

QUALITY MUSICIANS CAME FROM U S A

The Boston Symphony Orchestra. Conductor: William Steinberg. Program: Mozart, Linz Symphony, Boston Symphony by Hindemith, Eroica by Beethoven.

It was obvious that the guest from USA felt great. For them our city is one of the music centers of Europe. But their inquiries for Hamburg's musical representatives had to be answered negative. "Where is Schmidt-Isserstedt? Where is Leopold Ludwig?" "In America!" "And Sawallisch, Horst Stein?" "Not at home either!" Liebermann, the director of the opera, encumbered with two theaters, was surrounded by many friends from America. Good feeling was everywhere: At the receptions in the City Hall, at the US Consul-General and at the ATlantic Hotel. The sold out Muisc Hall was filled with anticipation.

The orchestra showed a very calibrated philharmonic, with excellent brasses, under William Steinberg (72). They made music without trying to achieve perfection, but instead with extreme concentration and firey involvement. William Steinberg excelled with highly cultural feeling for sound and brilliant management. His tempi seemed to be oriented towards the Furtwangler-teachings at which each tempo is determined by the smallest note value.

The sensation was the Boston Symphony which Hindemith had written for the Boston Orchestra in 1931, at the hight of his creative career. A splendid piece, and an incomparibly brilliant randition. Mozart seemed to us a bit colorless and weak; Beethoven's Eroica developed full of body and power, but without weariness of life. Everything had the right weight, the good measure and noble dignity.

Ludwig Pollner

Very gay and down to earth and completely without concert hall dignity, there was a matter that had to be settled between the "Bostonians" in Hamburg and the Bostonians in Bonn: The piano rehearsel of Mrs. Joan Kennedy, the narrator for the musical legend of "Peter and the Wolf". Joan the beautiful, indolent Senator's wife appeared in the morning at 9 o'clock, in blue jeans in front of the piano at the Atlantic Hotel.

"Hi, Arthur" she greeted the conductor, "Have you been out late last night?" And Arthur Fiedler answered through his white mustache, mumbling aimiably "It was strenuous, but I am like a horse and wake up quickly - I sleep on my feet."

And while the two leafed through the score she wanted to know how the concert in Hamburg had been: "Very well, very well, but I'd rather run behind the hotel, because they had a fire there." "oh yes, answered Mrs. Kennedy smilingly and understanding. "I smelled it."

In Hamburg, too, everybody knew that Arthur Fiedler was a fire bug, the white-haired, alert man, who likes to wear patent leather shoes with laces. The volunteer fire department of Sasel gave him their helmet, the hundredth that Arthur Fiedler brings to Boston. There he is Honorary Chief of the city's fire department and he cares and cherishes his own fire engine.

Eva Kohlrusch

Fiedler, the fire bug, gets his hundredth helmet.

Piano rehearsel in Hamburg: Joan Kennedy and Arthur F.

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 96,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Lübecker Nachrichten, Lübeck
vom 16. April 1971

Bewunderung für „Bostonians"

William Steinbergs Konzert in der Hamburger Musikhalle

Die Bostoner Symphoniker, das erste ständige hochqualifizierte Orchester der Vereinigten Staaten, feiern ihr 90jähriges Jubiläum in diesem Jahr mit einer großen Tournee durch die alte Welt. Nach Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin und Hannover gastierten sie am Mittwochabend in der Hamburger Musikhalle. Große Dirigenten wie Nikisch, Muck, Monteux und Koussevitzky haben dem „Boston Symphony Orchestra" Profil gegeben. Nach Erich Leinsdorf übernahm 1969 William Steinberg die Leitung, der auch das Hamburger Konzert dirigierte.

Das Programm für Hamburg überstieg kaum konventionellen Rahmen: eine Mozart-Symphonie (die „Linzer"), Hindemiths „Bostoner Symphonie" von 1931, sein Auftragswerk zum 50. Jubiläum dieses Orchesters, und die „Eroica" zum Abschluß. Doch verstummt Kritik vor dem unwahrscheinlichen Niveau der Darstellung. Hier erscheint der Idealfall verwirklicht, daß ein Klangkörper noch an den letzten Pulten mit Musikern ersten Ranges und gleicher Intensität des Musizierens besetzt ist. Nur so erklärt sich die einzigartige Ausgewogenheit und Erfülltheit im Klangbild dieses Orchesters. Klassiker wie Mozart und Beethoven erscheinen so in höchster Vollendung, und selbst Hindemiths grobschlächtige Musik gewinnt noch an klanglicher Kultur.

William Steinberg am Pult verkörpert den Dirigenttypus alter Schule. Sparsam und doch klar in der Zeichengebung fördert er klug die zuchtvolle Musizierlust der „Bostonians". Ihre sublime Klangkultur fand denn auch ohne Suggestivgewalt den bewundernden Beifall des Publikums.

Paul Amberg

Es kam ein Dirigent und tanzte

Die verwelkten Vorschußlorbeeren des M.T.T.

Das neunzig Jahre alte Boston Symphony Orchestra gastierte auf seiner diesjährigen Europatournee in den deutschen Städten Hamburg, Bonn (wo die Gattin des Senators Edward Kennedy das russische Märchen vom „Peter und dem Wolf" zu Musik rezitierte) und Frankfurt. Das 108 Musiker starke Orchester wurde in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle mit herzlichstem Beifall vom gut wattierten Haus empfangen und mit enthusiastischem Applaus, der es allerdings zu keiner Zugabe verleiten konnte, verabschiedet.

Leider stand in Frankfurt nicht der mit der Stadt durch seine Ehrenmitgliedschaft bei den Städtischen Bühnen besonders verbundene Chefdirigent William Steinberg, sondern der in einer echt amerikanischen Blitzkarriere emporgekommene Michael Tilson Thomas am Dirigentenpult. Die vor dem Gastspiel reichlich verteilten Vorschußlorbeeren für den jungen Mann — er ist ein Endzwanziger — welkten allerdings schnell, als er sich nach wenigen Takten der „Dritten" Robert Schumanns als ein ausgesprochener Schaudirigent präsentierte.

Thomas mag, das sei gar nicht bestritten, ein großes Dirigiertalent sein. Ein Dirigent im Sinne der Bezeichnung eines genialen Interpreten oder Orchesterziehers ist er kaum. Seine hektisch manierierte Dirigierweise mit ständig herumfuchtelnden Armen, unentwegt in zuckenden Bewegungen sich biegendem Oberkörper, sein ewiges Tänzeln auf dem Podium soll den Eindruck erwecken, als beeinflusse er das Orchester zu irgendwelchen besonderen Taten. Was dabei herauskommt, ist leider nicht mehr als ein in ununterbrochenem Fortissimo über den Hörer dahinbrausender Tonbrei, aus dem thematische Gebilde nur ganz selten einmal zu hören sind.

Dynamische Vorschriften der Komponisten, wie etwa das dreifache Pianissimo Schumanns im fünften Takt vor Schluß des dritten Satzes, stören ihn nicht im mindesten. Er bleibt immer im Forte.

Den Solopart in Tschaikowskys „Violinkonzert" spielte der Erste Konzertmeister des Orchesters, Joseph Silverstein. Ein dünnes Tönchen, das schon in der ersten Hochparkettreihe aus der von Thomas überraschend zurückgehaltenen Orchesterbegleitung nicht immer ganz sauber in den raschen Läufen klang und sich die vorgeschriebenen Mehrfachgriffe erleichterte, konnte den Ansprüchen des Komponisten nur sehr bedingt genügen. Mr. Silverstein ist sicher ein ausgezeichneter Konzertmeister — ein Solist ist er nicht.

Aus der den Abend abschließenden „La Valse" von Ravel, in der Thomas noch einmal seine ganze choreographische Kunststückchensammlung produzierte, wurde ein billiger Rausschmeißer. Die brillante Feuerwerksinstrumentation verleitet ja leicht zu diesen raffinierten Klangextremen.

Erstaunlich ist und bleibt, daß sich ein deutsches Konzertpublikum so leicht von solcher dirigentischen Firlefanzerei bluffen läßt.

WILLY WERNER GÜTTIG

Nr, 17.4.71

Nachtausgabe / Abendpost

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 96,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Lübecker Nachrichten, Lübeck
vom 16. April 1971

Bewunderung für „Bostonians"

William Steinbergs Konzert in der Hamburger Musikhalle

Die Bostoner Symphoniker, das erste ständige hochqualifizierte Orchester der Vereinigten Staaten, feiern ihr 90jähriges Jubiläum in diesem Jahr mit einer großen Tournee durch die alte Welt. Nach Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin und Hannover gastierten sie am Mittwochabend in der Hamburger Musikhalle. Große Dirigenten wie Nikisch, Muck, Monteux und Koussevitzky haben dem „Boston Symphony Orchestra" Profil gegeben. Nach Erich Leinsdorf übernahm 1969 William Steinberg die Leitung, der auch das Hamburger Konzert dirigierte.

Das Programm für Hamburg überstieg kaum konventionellen Rahmen: eine Mozart-Symphonie (die „Linzer"), Hindemiths „Bostoner Symphonie" von 1931, sein Auftragswerk zum 50. Jubiläum dieses Orchesters, und die „Eroica" zum Abschluß. Doch verstummt Kritik vor dem unwahrscheinlichen Niveau der Darstellung. Hier erscheint der Idealfall verwirklicht, daß ein Klangkörper noch an den letzten Pulten mit Musikern ersten Ranges und gleicher Intensität des Musizierens besetzt ist. Nur so erklärt sich die einzigartige Ausgewogenheit und Erfülltheit im Klangbild dieses Orchesters. Klassiker wie Mozart und Beethoven erscheinen so in höchster Vollendung, und selbst Hindemiths grobschlächtige Musik gewinnt noch an klanglicher Kultur.

William Steinberg am Pult verkörpert den Dirigenttypus alter Schule. Sparsam und doch klar in der Zeichengebung fördert er klug die zuchtvolle Musizierlust der „Bostonians". Ihre sublime Klangkultur fand denn auch ohne Suggestivgewalt den bewundernden Beifall des Publikums.

Paul Amberg

Es kam ein Dirigent und tanzte

Die verwelkten Vorschußlorbeeren des M.T.T.

Das neunzig Jahre alte Boston Symphony Orchestra gastierte auf seiner diesjährigen Europatournee in den deutschen Städten Hamburg, Bonn (wo die Gattin des Senators Edward Kennedy das russische Märchen vom „Peter und dem Wolf" zu Musik rezitierte) und Frankfurt. Das 108 Musiker starke Orchester wurde in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle mit herzlichstem Beifall vom gut wattierten Haus empfangen und mit enthusiastischem Applaus, der es allerdings zu keiner Zugabe verleiten konnte, verabschiedet.

Leider stand in Frankfurt nicht der mit der Stadt durch seine Ehrenmitgliedschaft bei den Städtischen Bühnen besonders verbundene Chefdirigent William Steinberg, sondern der in einer echt amerikanischen Blitzkarriere emporgekommene Michael Tilson Thomas am Dirigentenpult. Die vor dem Gastspiel reichlich verteilten Vorschußlorbeeren für den jungen Mann — er ist ein Endzwanziger — welkten allerdings schnell, als er sich nach wenigen Takten der „Dritten" Robert Schumanns als ein ausgesprochener Schaudirigent präsentierte.

Thomas mag, das sei gar nicht bestritten, ein großes Dirigiertalent sein. Ein Dirigent im Sinne der Bezeichnung eines genialen Interpreten oder Orchestererziehers ist er kaum. Seine hektisch manierierte Dirigierweise mit ständig herumfuchtelnden Armen, unentwegt in zuckenden Bewegungen sich biegendem Oberkörper, sein ewiges Tänzeln auf dem Podium soll den Eindruck erwecken, als beeinflusse er das Orchester zu irgendwelchen besonderen Taten. Was dabei herauskommt, ist leider nicht mehr als ein in ununterbrochenem Fortissimo über den Hörer dahinbrausender Tonbrei, aus dem thematische Gebilde nur ganz selten einmal zu hören sind.

Dynamische Vorschriften der Komponisten, wie etwa das dreifache Pianissimo Schumanns im fünften Takt vor Schluß des dritten Satzes, stören ihn nicht im mindesten. Er bleibt immer im Forte.

Den Solopart in Tschaikowskys „Violinkonzert" spielte der Erste Konzertmeister des Orchesters, Joseph Silverstein. Ein dünnes Tönchen, das schon in der ersten Hochparkettreihe aus der von Thomas überraschend zurückgehaltenen Orchesterbegleitung nicht immer ganz sauber in den raschen Läufen klang und sich die vorgeschriebenen Mehrfachgriffe erleichterte, konnte den Ansprüchen des Komponisten nur sehr bedingt genügen. Mr. Silverstein ist sicher ein ausgezeichneter Konzertmeister — ein Solist ist er nicht.

Aus der den Abend abschließenden „La Valse" von Ravel, in der Thomas noch einmal seine ganze choreographische Kunststückchensammlung produzierte, wurde ein billiger Rausschmeißer. Die brillante Feuerwerksinstrumentation verleitet ja leicht zu diesen raffinierten Klangextremen.

Erstaunlich ist und bleibt, daß sich ein deutsches Konzertpublikum so leicht von solcher dirigentischen Firlefanzerei bluffen läßt.

WILLY WERNER GÖTTIG

Ne, 17.4.71

Nachtausgabe / Abendpost

Freitag, 16. April 1971 - Nr. 88 - DIE WELT

HANSESTADT HAMBURG

Wiener Philharmoniker aus Amerika

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra gastierte in der Musikhalle

Offenbar anders als in Berlin, wo nach den beiden Orchesterkonzerten des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter William Steinberg, zumal der Beethovenabend, recht unterschiedlich beurteilt wurde, lag bei dem Hamburger Besuch der Gäste aus den USA in der unverkennbaren Gunst Musikhalle der Schwerpunkt ganz eindeutig auf der Eroica. Und zwar gilt das nicht etwa nur für das Werk oder für die Leistung des Orchesters, das selbst unter den Elitekörpern der Neuen Welt obenan aller artistischen Vollkommenheit immer noch eine führende Rolle spielt und mit dem Ehrentitel „Amerikas Wiener Philharmoniker" auch in seiner Eigenart treffend charakterisiert ist. Daß der Erfolg dieses Abends so eindeutig Beethovens Dritter Sinfonie zufiel, war nicht zuletzt und im besonderen auch dem Dirigenten Steinberg zu danken, der sich hier gleichsam übertroffen zeigte.

Mit gesammelter Energie, nahezu jugendlicher Elastizität und dennoch in jedem Detail mit jener klaren Disposition und weitumspannenden Übersicht, die nur Erfahrung, viel Liebe und jener unfehlbare untrügliche Sinn für die Werte, die gerade aus einer großen Tradition lebendig sich entwickeln können, errichtete der bald 71jährige nach den vom Heldenschlagen der Eroica-Takte zum Wunderbau des ersten Satzes, die Dur-Dur über das dunkelharmonische Spannungen, die den simplen Dreiklangsbeginn grundierten, hinbaute. Von dieser Grundlage des Charakters des ersten Satzes hob sich dramatisch gesteigert im Übergang zum dritten Thema, das den „klassischen" Formtypus auf epochale, später erst von Mahler aufgegriffene Weise für das Entstehungsjahr 1803 geradezu „revolutioniert".

Steinbergs frische, in Tempo und Dynamik sich immer wieder erneuernde, am Werk inspirierte Spannkraft erfüllte auch das sprühend vitale, bezaubernd leicht hingetupfte Scherzo (ein Bravo der schlanken, virtuos gespielten Hornier-Episode) und das pointierte, bis ins Kleinste subtil durchgezeichnete Finale. Dankenswert frei von aller romantischen „Zelebration" a la Furtwängler, aus dem Geist der Frühklassik erlernt, der sich noch eher den strengen Gesetzen einer Doppelfuge beugt als dem Überschwang eines „freien" Gefühls-Expressivo, wurde die „Marcia funebre" zum innern Höhepunkt dieser exzeptionellen Interpretation, die dank der noch differenzierten Wiedergabe durch die Bostoner Sinfoniker zu einer der besten Live-Aufführungen von Beethoven wurde, die wir je hörten.

Wir erlebten, was wir an dem geburtenen Kölner Steinberg verloren, der sich bei Klemperer einübte, dann zu leitender Stelle in Prag, später als Generalmusikdirektor in Frankfurt am Main wirkte, dann nach Gastrollen des Israel-Orchesters durch Frank Wildhorn, an der er erst ebenfalls mitwirkte, als Assistent Toscaninis in die USA emigrierte und endlich schließlich in führender Position unter veränderten Bedingungen nordamerikanische Tradition in das junge, aufnahmebereite Musikleben Neu-Amerikas weiterreichte.

Weniger überzeugte demgegenüber die Begegnung mit Mozarts Linzer Sinfonie (K.V. 425), der es trotz mancher Feinheiten der klanglichen Valeurs und der melodischen Impulse insgesamt etwas an der „atmenden" Atmosphäre des spezifisch österreichischen Idioms fehlte. Mit aller Verve einer erstmalig [illegible] besetzten Streicher und Bläser setzten sich Steinberg und seine Musiker für die „Bostoner Symphonie" ein, die Paul Hindemith Ende 1931 zum 50. Jahrestage des Bestehens dieses weltweiten Ensembles schrieb — noch ganz aus dem „Concerto-grosso"-Geist seiner Frühzeit heraus, ohne die Tiefenperspektiven, die ihm die Beschäftigung mit der Welt etwa des „Mathis der Maler" auch für seine späteren Tonsprache eröffnete. Etwas zu primitiv muten uns heute, vierzig Jahre später, gewisse Fanfaren und Rhythmen an, die stereotype Gegenüberstellung der beiden konzertierenden Gruppen. Trotzdem fehlt es nicht an emotionalen Impuls, der das Stück lebendig hält und nutzter zu schönen, ausdrucksstarken Partien führt wie am Schluß mit seinen deutlich geschwungenen Streichermelodien, in die Bläser-Injektionen ihre charakterisierenden Farben und Akzente werfen.

Das alles wurde so herrlich gespielt, daß man schon am klanglichen Ereignis seine helle Freude haben konnte. Der Beifall war entsprechend enthusiastisch.

Heinz Joachim

Der Chefdirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra: William Steinberg

Foto: Conti-Press

Hamburg review from Die Welt

By Heinz Joachim

The BSO counts as one of the elite ensembles of the New World and plays a leading role there under the honorary title "America's Vienna Philharmonic." This expression does in fact characterize the orchestra very well. The success of this evening was clearly Beethoven's Eroica and this was in no small measure due to the conductor, Steinberg, who appeared to surpass himself. The 71-year old conductor showed the following qualities in conducting the first movement -- a controled energy coupled with a youthful elasticity which clarified each detail and shaped the general structure....This exceptional interpretation, thanks to the richly differentiated playing of the BSO, was one of the best live performances of Beethoven I've ever heard....

The Hindemith was so splendidly played that one could easily enjoy the sheer sound for its own sake. The applause expressed everyone's enthusiasm.

VIENNA PHILHARMONIC FROM AMERICA

The Boston Sympjony Orchestra as guests in the Musik Halle

It was obviously different in Berlin where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was judged quite differently after the two orchestra concerts under William Steinberg, especially the Beethoven evening. At the visit in Hamburg their strength was definitely with the "Eroica", as the guests from USA played in the soldout Great Musik Hall. This did not only apply to the composition or the performance of the orchestra which is still playing a leading role among the elite ensembles of the New World and stands above all artistical perfection. It has the honorary title of "America's Vienna Philharmonic" and this is characterized to the point. That the success of this evening rests with Beethoven's Third Symphony so clearly, is to be credited especially to the conductor William Steinberg who seem to surpass himself here.

With concentrated energy and almost youthful elasticity the 71 year old erected the miraculous construction of the first movement, after the two e flat major beats. He did it with every detail, with a clear disposition and spacious overlook which can only develop through lively experience and maturity, and an innate, infallible sense for the values of a great tradition. He built the first movement over the dark harmonic tensions which are the basis for the simple triad beginning, contrasting from the melodic charm of the arioso intermezzo. He augmented dramaticly in the bridge to the third theme which "revolutionizes" the "classic" from type, epoch making, in the year of origin, 1803, which was later taken up by Mahler.

Steinberg's vigor was always newly inspired by the work, refreshed, in tempi and dynamics. This also was noticed in the sparkling, lively Scherzo, enchanting and lightly dabbed, (a bravo to the graceful, virtuoso performed horn episode) and the emphazised finale, traced to the smallest, subtlest details. Deserving of thanks that it was free of all romantic "celebrations" a la Furtwangler, as learned by the spirit of the early classic which rather surrenders to the strict laws of a double fugue than to the superabundance of a "free" expressive sentiment. Therefore the "Marcia Funebre" became the spiritual highlight of this exceptional interpretation. Thanks to the richly differential reproduction by the Bostonians, this became one of the best live concerts of Beethoven ever heard.

Less convincing was the encounter with Mozart's Linz Symphony, KV 425, which lacked the "breathing" atmosphere of the specific Austrian idioms, despite some finesses of the sounding depth. With all the verve of this first class, splendid orchestra of strings and brasses Steinberg and his musicians put all their influence into the "Boston Symphony" which Hindenith wrote for the fiftieth anniversary of this magnificant ensemble, in 1930/1931. It is in the "concerto grosso" spirit of his early years, without the depth perspective, which opened the world for him at about Matthis der Maler" and later sound language. Primitive as it seems to us today, after forty years, certain fanfares and rythms, the stereotype comparison of those two concert groups. However no emotional impulses which keep the piece alive were missing, leading to beautiful, expressive and strong parts as in the finale with its melancholic vibrating melodies of the strings, into which injections of the brasses threw their chracteristic colors and accents.

All this was played so beautifully that one took a real pleasure in just the tonal result. Therefore the applause was enthusiastic.

Heinz Joachim

Freitag, 16. April 1971 - Nr. 88 - DIE WELT HANSESTADT HAMBURG

Wiener Philharmoniker aus Amerika

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra gastierte in der Musikhalle

Offenbar anders als in Berlin, wo nach den beiden Orchesterkonzerten des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter William Steinberg, zumal der Beethovenabend, recht unterschiedlich beurteilt wurde, lag bei dem Hamburger Besuch der Gäste aus USA in der unverkennbaren Gewichtung Musikhalle der Schwerpunkt ganz eindeutig auf der Eroica. Und zwar gilt das nicht etwa nur für die Wertung aber für die Leistung des Orchesters, das selbst unter den Elite-Ensembles der Neuen Welt [illegible] Amerikas Wiener Philharmoniker [illegible] Dall der Eroica unter Abzug so eindeutig Beethovens Dritter Sinfonie zufiel, war nicht zuletzt und im besonderen auch dem Dirigenten Steinberg zu danken, der sich selber noch übertroffen schien.

Mit gebändigter Energie, nahezu jugendlicher Elastizität und dennoch in jedem Detail mit einer klaren Disposition und weitumfassenden Überschau, die nur Erfahrung und Liebe und jener angeborene untrügliche Sinn für die Werte der großen Musik [illegible] Wunderkind der ersten Stunde, [illegible] den dunklen harmonischen Spannungen, die den ganzen Satz [illegible] Dreiklangsbeginn [illegible] Charme des [illegible] und dramatisch gesteigert im Übergang zum dritten Thema, das den „Marcia funebre" Formtypus auf epochale, später erst von Mahler aufgegriffene Weise für das Entstehungsjahr 1803 geradezu „revolutioniert".

Steinbergs frische, in Tempo und Dynamik sich immer wieder erneuernde, am Werk inspirierte Spannkraft erfüllte auch das sprühend vitale, bezaubernd leicht hingetupfte Scherzo (ein Bravo der schlanken, virtuos gespielten Hornerpisode) und das pointierte, bis ins kleinste subtil durchgezeichnete Finale. Dankenswert frei von aller spätromantischen „Zelebration" a la Furtwängler, aus dem Geist der Frühklassik erwachsen, der sich noch einer den strengen Gesetzen einer Doppelfuge beugt als dem Überschwang eines „drama" Gefühls-Expressivo, wurde die „Marcia funebre" zum inneren Höhepunkt dieser exzeptionellen Interpretation, die dank der reich differenzierten Wiedergabe durch die Bostoner Sinfoniker zu einer der besten Live-Aufführungen von Beethoven wurde die wir je hörten.

Wir erlebten, was wir an dem geburtigen Kölner Steinberg verloren, der sich bei Klemperer stählte, dann an bedeutender Stelle in Prag, später als Generalmusikdirektor in Frankfurt am Main wirkte, dann nach Gründung des Israel-Orchesters durch Frau Dr. Huberman, an der er entscheidend mitwirkte, als Assistent Toscanini in die USA emigrierte und [illegible] in führenden Positionen unter veränderten Bedingungen nordamerikanische Tradition in das jetzt [illegible] gewachsene Musikleben Neu-Amerikas weiterreichte.

Weniger überzeugte demgegenüber die Begegnung mit Mozarts Linzer Sinfonie (K.V. 425), der es trotz mancher Feinheiten der klanglichen Valeurs und der melodischen Impulse insgesamt etwas an der „atmenden" Atmosphäre der spezifisch österreichischen Idiome fehlte. Mit aller Verve ihrer ersten Gruppen bewährten sich Steinberg und seine Musiker für die „Bostoner Symphonie" von Paul Hindemith, Ehrgeiz zum fünfzigsten Jahrestage des Bestehens dieses [illegible] Ensembles schrieb — noch ganz aus dem „Concerto-grosso"-Geist seiner Frühzeit heraus, ohne die Tiefenperspektiven, die ihm die Beschäftigung mit der Welt etwa des „Mathis der Maler" auch für seine späteren Tonsprache eröffnete. Etwas zu primitiv muten uns heute, vierzig Jahre später, gewisse Fanfaren und Rhythmen an, die stereotype Gegenüberstellung der beiden konzertierenden Gruppen. Trotzdem fehlt es nicht an emotionalen Impuls, der das Stück lebendig hält und [illegible] zu schönen, ausdrucksstarken Partien führt wie am Schluß mit seinen [illegible] geschwungenen Streichermelodien, in die Bläser-Injektionen ihre charakterisierenden Farben und Akzente werfen.

Das alles wurde so herrlich gespielt, daß man schon im klanglichen Ereignis seine helle Freude haben konnte. Der Beifall war entsprechend enthusiastisch.

Heinz Joachim

Der Chefdirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra: William Steinberg
Foto: Conti-Press

Hamburg review from Die Welt

By Heinz Joachim

The BSO counts as one of the elite ensembles of the New World and plays a leading role there under the honorary title "America's Vienna Philharmonic." This expression does in fact characterize the orchestra very well. The success of this evening was clearly Beethoven's Eroica and this was in no small measure due to the conductor, Steinberg, who appeared to surpass himself. The 71-year old conductor showed the following qualities in conducting the first movement -- a controled energy coupled with a youthful elasticity which clarified each detail and shaped the general structure....This exceptional interpretation, thanks to the richly differentiated playing of the BSO, was one of the best live performances of Beethoven I've ever heard....

The Hindemith was so splendidly played that one could easily enjoy the sheer sound for its own sake. The applause expressed everyone's enthusiasm.

VIENNA PHILHARMONIC FROM AMERICA

The Boston Sympjony Orchestra as guests in the Musik Halle

It was obviously different in Berlin where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was judged quite differently after the two orchestra concerts under William Steinberg, especially the Beethoven evening. At the visit in Hamb their strength was definitely with the "Eroica", as the guests from USA pla in the soldout Great Musik Hall. This did not only apply to the compositi or the performance of the orchestra which is still playing a leading role among the elite ensembles of the New World and stands above all artistical perfection. It has the honorary title of "America's Vienna Philharmonic" and this is characterized to the point. That the success of this evening rests with Beethoven's Third Symphony so clearly, is to be credited especi to the conductor William Steinberg who seem to surpass himself here.

With concentrated energy and almost youthful elasticity the 71 year old erected the miraculous construction of the first movement, after the two e flat major beats. He did it with every detail, with a clear disposition and spacious overlook which can only develop through lively experience and maturity, and an innate, infallible sense for the values of a great traditi He built the first movement over the dark harmonic tensions which are the basis for the simple triad beginning, contrasting from the melodic charm of the arioso intermezzo. He augmented dramaticly in the bridge to the thir theme which "revolutionizes" the "classic" from type, epoch making, in the year of origin, 1803, which was later taken up by Mahler.

Steinberg's vigor was always newly inspired by the work, refreshed, in tempi and dynamics. This also was noticed in the sparkling, lively Scherzo, enchanting and lightly dabbed, (a bravo to the graceful, virtuoso performed horn episode) and the emphazised finale, traced to the smallest, subtlest details. Deserving of thanks that it was free of all romantic "celebrations" a la Furtwangler, as learned by the spirit of the early classic which rather surrenders to the strict laws of a double fugue than to the superabundance of a "free" expressive sentiment. Therefore the "Marcia Funebre" became the spiritual highlight of this exceptional interpretation. Thanks to the richly differential reproduction by the Bostonians, this became one of the best live concerts of Beethoven ever heard.

Less convincing was the encounter with Mozart's Linz Symphony, KV 425, which lacked the "breathing" atmosphere of the specific Austrian idioms, despite some finesses of the sounding depth. With all the verve of this first class, splendid orchestra of strings and brasses Steinberg and his musicians put all their influence into the "Boston Symphony" which Hindenith wrote for the fiftieth anniversary of this magnificant ensemble, in 1930/1931. It is in the "concerto grosso" spirit of his early years, without the depth perspective, which opened the world for him at about "Matthis der Maler" and later sound language. Primitive as it seems to us today, after forty years, certain fanfares and rythms, the stereotype comparison of those two concert groups. However no emotional impulses which keep the piece alive were missing, leading to beautiful, expressive and strong parts as in the finale with its melancholic vibrating melodies of the strings, into which injections of the brasses threw their chracteristic colors and accents.

All this was played so beautifully that one took a real pleasure in just the tonal result. Therefore the applause was enthusiastic.

Heinz Joachim

Freitag, 16. April 1971 - Nr. 88 - DIE WELT

HANSESTADT HAMBURG

Wiener Philharmoniker aus Amerika

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra gastierte in der Musikhalle

Offenbar anders als in Berlin, wo nach den beiden Orchesterkonzerten des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter William Steinberg, zumal der Beethovenabend, recht unterschiedlich beurteilt wurde, hat bei dem Hamburger Besuch der Gäste aus den USA in der ausverkauften Großen Musikhalle der Schwerpunkt eindeutig auf der Eroica. Und [illegible] nicht nur für das Werk oder für die Leistung des Orchesters, [illegible] unter den Elite-Ensembles der Neuen Welt [illegible] Philharmoniker" [illegible] Dabei [illegible] Beethovens Dritter Sinfonie zahlt, war nicht zuletzt auf das [illegible] Verdienst des Dirigenten Steinberg zu buchen, der [illegible] 71 Jahre nach dem [illegible] der Entstehung der Eroica [illegible] Mahler aufgegriffene Weise für das Entstehungsjahr 1803 geradezu „revolutioniert".

Steinbergs frische, in Tempo und Dynamik sich immer wieder erneuernde, ans Werk inspirierte Spannkraft erfüllte auch das sprühend vitale, bezaubernd leicht hingetupfte Scherzo (ein Bravo der schlanken, virtuos gespielten Hornist-Episode) und das [illegible] bis ins kleinste subtil durchgezeichnete Finale. Dankenswert frei von aller romantischen „Feiertags"-Attitüde a la Furtwängler, aus dem Geist der Kammermusik erfaßt, der sich noch einer den strengen Gesetzen einer Doppelfuge beugt als dem Überschwang einer „freien" Gefühls-Expressivo, wurde die „Marcia funebre" zum innern Höhepunkt dieser exzeptionellen Interpretation, die dank der noch differenzierten Wiedergabe durch die Bostoner Sinfoniker zu einer der besten Live-Aufführungen von Beethoven werden ließ, die wir je hörten.

Wir erlebten, was wir an dem geburtsnahen Kölner Steinberg verloren, der sich bei Kempter [illegible] dann bekanntlich Stelle in Prag [illegible] als Opernchef in Frankfurt am Main wählte, dann nach Gastspielen des Israel-Orchesters [illegible] Prom[illegible] [illegible] Amerika [illegible] Wenigstens [illegible] demgegenüber die Begegnung mit Mozarts Linzer Sinfonie (K.V. 425) der es trotz mancher Feinheiten der klanglichen Valeurs und [illegible] Impulse [illegible] Atmosphäre [illegible] Verve [illegible] Streicher und Bläser [illegible] Steinberg und seine [illegible] für die „Bostoner Symphonie" [illegible] Paul Hindemiths Beitrag zum [illegible] Jahrestage des Bestehens dieses [illegible] Ensembles schrieb — [illegible] aus dem „Concerto-grosso"-Geist seiner Frühzeit heraus, ohne die Tiefenperspektiven, die ihm die Begegnung mit der Welt etwa des „Mathis der Maler" auch für seine späteren Tonsprache eröffnete. Etwas zu primitiv muten uns heute, vierzig Jahre später, gewisse Fanfaren und Rhythmen an, die stereotype Gegenüberstellung der beiden konzertierenden Gruppen. Trotzdem fehlt es nicht an emotionalen Impuls, der das Stück lebendig hält und [illegible] zu schönen, ausdrucksstarken Partien führt wie am Schluß mit seinen [illegible] geschwungenen Streichermelodien, in die Bläser-Injektionen ihre charakterisierenden Farben und Akzente werfen.

Das alles wurde so herrlich gespielt, daß man schon am klanglichen Ereignis seine helle Freude haben konnte. Der Beifall war entsprechend enthusiastisch.

Heinz Joachim

Der Chefdirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra: William Steinberg

Foto: Conti-Press

Hamburg review from Die Welt

By Heinz Joachim

The BSO counts as one of the elite ensembles of the New World and plays a leading role there under the honorary title "America's Vienna Philharmonic." This expression does in fact characterize the orchestra very well. The success of this evening was clearly Beethoven's Eroica and this was in no small measure due to the conductor, Steinberg, who appeared to surpass himself. The 71-year old conductor showed the following qualities in conducting the first movement -- a controled energy coupled with a youthful elasticity which clarified each detail and shaped the general structure....This exceptional interpretation, thanks to the richly differentiated playing of the BSO, was one of the best live performances of Beethoven I've ever heard....

The Hindemith was so splendidly played that one could easily enjoy the sheer sound for its own sake. The applause expressed everyone's enthusiasm.

VIENNA PHILHARMONIC FROM AMERICA

The Boston Sympjony Orchestra as guests in the Musik Halle

It was obviously different in Berlin where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was judged quite differently after the two orchestra concerts under William Steinberg, especially the Beethoven evening. At the visit in Hamburg their strength was definitely with the "Eroica", as the guests from USA played in the soldout Great Musik Hall. This did not only apply to the composition or the performance of the orchestra which is still playing a leading role among the elite ensembles of the New World and stands above all artistical perfection. It has the honorary title of "America's Vienna Philharmonic" and this is characterized to the point. That the success of this evening rests with Beethoven's Third Symphony so clearly, is to be credited especially to the conductor William Steinberg who seem to surpass himself here.

With concentrated energy and almost youthful elasticity the 71 year old erected the miraculous construction of the first movement, after the two e flat major beats. He did it with every detail, with a clear disposition and spacious overlook which can only develop through lively experience and maturity, and an innate, infallible sense for the values of a great tradition. He built the first movement over the dark harmonic tensions which are the basis for the simple triad beginning, contrasting from the melodic charm of the arioso intermezzo. He augmented dramaticly in the bridge to the third theme which "revolutionizes" the "classic" from type, epoch making, in the year of origin, 1803, which was later taken up by Mahler.

Steinberg's vigor was always newly inspired by the work, refreshed, in tempi and dynamics. This also was noticed in the sparkling, lively Scherzo, enchanting and lightly dabbed, (a bravo to the graceful, virtuoso performed horn episode) and the emphazised finale, traced to the smallest, subtlest details. Deserving of thanks that it was free of all romantic "celebrations" a la Furtwangler, as learned by the spirit of the early classic which rather surrenders to the strict laws of a double fugue than to the superabundance of a "free" expressive sentiment. Therefore the "Marcia Funebre" became the spiritual highlight of this exceptional interpretation. Thanks to the richly differential reproduction by the Bostonians, this became one of the best live concerts of Beethoven ever heard.

Less convincing was the encounter with Mozart's Linz Symphony, KV 425, which lacked the "breathing" atmosphere of the specific Austrian idioms, despite some finesses of the sounding depth. With all the verve of this first class, splendid orchestra of strings and brasses Steinberg and his musicians put all their influence into the "Boston Symphony" which Hindenith wrote for the fiftieth anniversary of this magnificant ensemble, in 1930/1931. It is in the "concerto grosso" spirit of his early years, without the depth perspective, which opened the world for him at about Matthis der Maler" and later sound language. Primitive as it seems to us today, after forty years, certain fanfares and rythms, the stereotype comparison of those two concert groups. However no emotional impulses which keep the piece alive were missing, leading to beautiful, expressive and strong parts as in the finale with its melancholic vibrating melodies of the strings, into which injections of the brasses threw their chracteristic colors and accents.

All this was played so beautifully that one took a real pleasure in just the tonal result. Therefore the applause was enthusiastic.

Heinz Joachim

103

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 63,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Frankfurter Allgemeine Stadtausgabe, Franfurt Main

vom 25. März 1971

Die Bostoner kommen

f. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra gastiert auf einer Europa-Tournée anläßlich seines 90jährigen Bestehens am 15. April in der Jahrhunderthalle Höchst. Geleitet wird es von Michael Tilson Thomas. Der 26jährige Dirigent und Pianist war bei den Bayreuther Festspielen von 1966 Assistent von Pierre Boulez, wurde 1969 assistierender Dirigent und Pianist der Boston Symphony Chamber Players und ist seit 1970 Associate Conductor der Bostoner Sinfoniker.

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 166,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Frankfurter Rundschau, Frankfurt/Main

22. März 1971

vom

Konzert der Bostoner Sinfoniker

Die Bostoner Sinfoniker gastieren am 15. April in der Jahrhunderthalle. Der 26jährige Michael Tilson Thomas leitet das Orchester während einer ausgedehnten Europa-Tournee anläßlich seines 90jährigen Bestehens.

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 160,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Frankfurter Neue Presse, Frankfurt/Main

14. April 197

vom

Werner Stein (57), Westberliner Wissenschaftssenator, überreichte dem Chefdirigenten des Bostoner Pop-Orchesters, Arthur Fiedler, anläßlich eines Gastspiels des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters einen Feuerwehrhelm als Erinnerungsgabe. Fiedler ist Sammler von Feuerwehr-Ausrüstungsgegenständen. Auf seinen weltweiten Tourneen hat er bereits mehr als 70 Helme, Spieße, Koppel und ähnliche Ausrüstungsgegenstände zusammengetragen.

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 202,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Frankfurter Abendpost-Nachtausgabe Frankfurt/Main

vom

DAS BOSTONER symphonische Orchester eroberte die Herzen der Wiener. Nach seinem Wiener Konzert gab es für das Orchester und seinen Dirigenten William Steinberg eine Viertelstunde lang begeisterte Ovationen.

★

frankfurt

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (i. Ts.): 7,1 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus: Taunus-Zeitung, Oberursel
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (i. Ts.): o. A. – lt. „Leitfaden 1970 – Ausschnitt aus: Nassauische Landeszeitung, Limburg
vom 17. April 1971

3

Romantik als Klangschwall

Die Bostoner Symphoniker in der Jahrhunderthalle

Mit langen schwarzen Flügelarmen scheint der junge Michael Tilson Thomas ins Orchester hineinzugreifen, um dicke Klänge herauszuheben, um einzelne Akkorde an die Oberfläche eines schroffen Tönereliefs zu befördern.

Er muß die vielen enthusiastischen Bravos für seine weit ausgreifenden Gesten bekommen haben, denn zumindest bei Schumanns „Rheinischer Symphonie" waren sie als Lohn fürs Musikalische nicht am Platze. Die Bostoner spielten sie wie Amerikaner, die sämtliche rheinischen Burgen und dabei immer Alt-Heidelberg vor Augen haben. Deutsche Romantik — das scheint pompöse Wucht, graziöse Trägheit, gewaltiger Klangschwall, manchmal à la Wagner, zu bedeuten. Von Schumanns musikalischen Delikatessen blieb dabei nicht viel übrig, zumal das Orchester nur leger auf die Anweisungen seines Dirigenten reagiert. Dennoch Jubel für den jungen Mann, vielleicht, weil er so jung ist, 26 Jahre.

Joseph Silverstein, Konzertmeister der Bostoner Symphoniker, hatte sich mit Tschaikowskis Violinkonzert D-Dur zuviel vorgenommen. Weder in der Technik, noch überhaupt im kargen Klang seines Instruments kann er mit den großen Interpreten konkurrieren. Mit dem Ton nimmt er es nicht so genau, mitunter hört man die Saiten kratzen. Seine Melodien gehen sich kokett und gefühlvoll aufgeputzt.

Bis dahin eigentlich nur Negatives von einem Abend in der Jahrhunderthalle, der durch einen Reklamefeldzug groß angekündigt worden war. Aber dann wartete Michael Tilson Thomas mit einer Überraschung auf, die eines zeigt: Er ist zu jung für „alte" Musik. Er ließ Ravels „Valse" spielen und die Bostoner Symphoniker beweisen, was sie wirklich können: den Klang beherrschen im unergründlichen Tonmeer, aus dem langsam Rhythmus und Thema aufsteigen, über heftig kreisende Melodiebögen bis zu ekstatischen Klangschlägen.

Dabei ersann er eine ungewöhnlich motorische Interpretation. Zuvor hatte er für jeden Satz nur ein stereotypes Schema gefunden.

GN

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (i. Ts.): 160,0 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus: Frankfurter Neue Presse, Frankfurt/Main
vom 17. April 1971

ROMANTICISM AS A SOUND SWELL

The Boston Symphony in the Jahrhundert Hall

The young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas seems to reach into the orchestra with long black winged arms, lifting out heavy sounds in order to bring to the surface a few chords of a rough tone relief.

He must have received the many enthusiastic bravos for his wide grasping gestures as they were not deserved for a reward for Schumann's "Rheinisch Symphony". The Bostonians played it like Americans who have all the Rheinisch castles and Old Heidelberg in front of their eyes. German Romanticism - this seems to mean pompous force, graceful idleness, immense sound swelling, sometimes a la Wagner. Not much was left of Schumann's musical delicacies, especially as the orchestra reacted very off hand to the instruction of the conductor. Nevertheless, exultation for the young man, perhaps because he is so young, 26 years old.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony undertook too much with Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D Major. He can't compete with the great interpreters either technically or in the poor sound of his instrument. He wasn't too particular in his tone, and now and then one heard the scratching of the strings. His melodies seem coquettish and dressed up with sentiment.

Until now, essentially, only negatives have been said about an evening in the Jahrhundert Hall which was announced in a big advertising campaign. But then Michael Tilson Thomas had a surprise which showed one thing: He is too young for "old" music. He played Ravel's La Valse and the Boston Symphony proved what they really can do: to control the sound in a bottomless tone sea from which arise slow rythms and themes, from strong circling melody arches to ecstatic sound beats.

With that he invented an unusually moving interpretation. Before, he had found only a stereotype scheme for each movement.

GN

FRANKFURT

Frankfurter Neue Presse, April 17, 1971

Romanticism as a flood of sound

on Schumann's "Rheinisher Symphonie"

says MTT got great applause for this - maybe it was for his theatrical gestures or because he's so young - but it couldn't have been for the music itself - They played it like Americans with visions of Rheineland burghers and Old Heidelberg before them, thinking of the German Romanticism as weighty splendor a la Wagner - no feeling for the delicacy for Schumann's music.

says Joseph Silverstein took on too much with Tchaikovsk's Concerto in D - neither technically nor in the scanty sound of his instrument can he compete with the really great interpreters.

comes to the conclusion that perhaps MTT is too young for "old" music, since he did the Ravel beautifully - in the "Valse" he had the Orchestra really play and show whay they're capable of - in this piece he presented an unusual dynamic interpretation - up until then had found only a stereotyped presentation.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 7,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Taunus-Zeitung, Oberursel
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): o.A.
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Nassauische Landeszeitung, Limburg
vom 17. April 1971

3

Romantik als Klangschwall

Die Bostoner Symphoniker in der Jahrhunderthalle

Mit langen schwarzen Flügelarmen scheint der junge Michael Tilson Thomas ins Orchester hineinzugreifen, um dicke Klänge herauszuheben, um einzelne Akkorde an die Oberfläche eines schroffen Tönereliefs zu befördern.

Er muß die vielen enthusiastischen Bravos für seine weit ausgreifenden Gesten bekommen haben, denn zumindest bei Schumanns „Rheinischer Symphonie" waren sie als Lohn fürs Musikalische nicht am Platze. Die Bostoner spielten sie wie Amerikaner, die sämtliche rheinischen Burgen und dabei immer Alt-Heidelberg vor Augen haben. Deutsche Romantik — das scheint pompöse Wucht, graziöse Trägheit, gewaltiger Klangschwall, manchmal à la Wagner, zu bedeuten. Von Schumanns musikalischen Delikatessen blieb dabei nicht viel übrig, zumal das Orchester nur leger auf die Anweisungen seines Dirigenten reagiert. Dennoch Jubel für den jungen Mann, vielleicht, weil er so jung ist, 26 Jahre.

Joseph Silverstein, Konzertmeister der Bostoner Symphoniker, hatte sich mit Tschaikowskis Violinkonzert D-Dur zuviel vorgenommen. Weder in der Technik, noch überhaupt im kargen Klang seines Instruments kann er mit den großen Interpreten konkurrieren. Mit dem Ton nimmt er es nicht so genau, mitunter hört man die Saiten kratzen. Seine Melodien geben sich kokett und gefühlvoll aufgeputzt.

Bis dahin eigentlich nur Negatives von einem Abend in der Jahrhunderthalle, der durch einen Reklamefeldzug groß angekündigt worden war. Aber dann wartete Michael Tilson Thomas mit einer Überraschung auf, die eines zeigt: Er ist zu jung für „alte" Musik. Er ließ Ravels „Valse" spielen und die Bostoner Symphoniker beweisen, was sie wirklich können: den Klang beherrschen im unergründlichen Tonmeer, aus dem langsam Rhythmus und Thema aufsteigen, über heftig kreisende Melodiebögen bis zu ekstatischen Klangschlägen.

Dabei ersann er eine ungewöhnlich motorische Interpretation. Zuvor hatte er für jeden Satz nur ein stereotypes Schema gefunden.

GN

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 160,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Neue Presse, Frankfurt/Main
vom 17. April 1971

ROMANTICISM AS A SOUND SWELL

The Boston Symphony in the Jahrhundert Hall

The young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas seems to reach into the orchestra with long black winged arms, lifting out heavy sounds in order to bring to the surface a few chords of a rough tone relief.

He must have received the many enthusiastic bravos for his wide grasping gestures as they were not deserved for a reward for Schumann's "Rheinisch Symphony". The Bostonians played it like Americans who have all the Rheinisch castles and Old Heidelberg in front of their eyes. German Romanticism - this seems to mean pompous force, graceful idleness, immense sound swelling, sometimes a la Wagner. Not much was left of Schumann's musical delicacies, especially as the orchestra reacted very off hand to the instruction of the conductor. Nevertheless, exultation for the young man, perhaps because he is so young, 26 years old.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony undertook too much with Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D Major. He can't compete with the great interpreters either technically or in the poor sound of his instrument. He wasn't too particular in his tone, and now and then one heard the scratching of the strings. His melodies seem coquettish and dressed up with sentiment.

Until now, essentially, only negatives have been said about an evening in the Jahrhundert Hall which was announced in a big advertising campaign. But then Michael Tilson Thomas had a surprise which showed one thing: He is too young for "old" music. He played Ravel's La Valse and the Boston Symphony proved what they really can do: to control the sound in a bottomless tone sea from which arise slow rythms and themes, from strong circling melody arches to ecstatic sound beats.

With that he invented an unusually moving interpretation. Before, he had found only a stereotype scheme for each movement.

GN

FRANKFURT

Frankfurter Neue Presse, April 17, 1971

Romanticism as a flood of sound

on Schumann's "Rheinisher Symphonie"

says MTT got great applause for this - maybe it was for his theatrical gestures or because he's so young - but it couldn't have been for the music itself - They played it like Americans with visions of Rheineland burghers and Old Heidelberg before them, thinking of the German Romanticism as weighty splendor a la Wagner - no feeling for the delicacy for Schumann's music.

says Joseph Silverstein took on too much with Tchaikovsk's Concerto in D - neither technically nor in the scanty sound of his instrument can he compete with the really great interpreters.

comes to the conclusion that perhaps MTT is too young for "old" music, since he did the Ravel beautifully - in the "Valse" he had the Orchestra really play and show whay they're capable of - in this piece he presented an unusual dynamic interpretation - up until then had found only a stereotyped presentation.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 15,5 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Schwetzinger Zeitung, Schwetzingen
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 167,8 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Mannheimer Morgen, Mannheim
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 24,3 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Fränkische Nachrichten, Tauberbischofsheim
vom 17. April 1971

3

Die „Bostonians" in der Jahrhunderthalle

Michael Tilson Thomas dirigierte das amerikanische Orchester beim Gastkonzert in Höchst

Es ist lange, viele Jahre her, daß die „Bostonians" in Deutschland zu Gast waren. Ob es in diesem zeitlichen Abstand begründet ist, daß ihr Gastkonzert in der Jahrhunderthalle Höchst zwar gut besucht schien, aber keineswegs ausverkauft? Wie anders war es gewesen, als die New Yorker Philharmoniker oder das Philadelphia Orchestra am gleichen Ort musizierten!

Diese Konzerte freilich dirigierten Leonard Bernstein (die New Yorker) und Eugene Ormandy (das Philadelphia), zwei Persönlichkeiten, die im Stellenwert des internationalen Interesses hoch veranschlagt sind. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra, das in diesen Wochen seine dritte Europa-Tournee absolviert, die von London bis Rom und Barcelona, von Berlin, Wien bis Paris führt, brachte in den Rhein-Main-Raum Michael Tilson Thomas mit...

...einen 26jährigen, aus Hollywood stammenden Amerikaner, in dem professionelle Talent-Aufspürer jenseits des Atlantiks eine kommende Größe wittern. Der gegenwärtige „Assistant Conductor" der Bostoner und künftige Chef des Buffalo Symphony Orchestra ist von der größten amerikanischen Musikzeitschrift „Musical America" zum „Musician of the Year", zum Musiker des Jahres 1970, gewählt worden — die Deutsche Grammophon, die durch ihren Exclusiv-Vertrag mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra beträchtliches Aufsehen auf dem amerikanischen Schallplatten-Markt erregt hat, bringt Michael Tilson Thomas als Dirigent wie als Pianist mit etlichen Aufnahmen heraus. Seine Karriere, so scheint es, ist nicht aufzuhalten.

Im Vergleich zu europäischen Bräuchen bietet der junge Mann allerdings einen zumindest ungewohnten Anblick: Lang und spindeldürr, in hautenge Frackhosen genäht, das Haar flatternd auf dem konvulsivisch zuckenden Kopf, hüpft er hurtig auf dem kleinen Dirigentenpodest. Nach rechts und nach links, vor und zurück, und das Ganze auch in umgekehrter Reihenfolge, je nachdem, wo sich gerade die Hauptstimme seines Instrumentariums zu entfalten beginnt. Jäh klappt er zusammen, federt auf, wippt ständig auf den Fußspitzen, schlägt mit den Armen in weiten Kreisen hoch in die Luft und breit nach der Seite hin — kurzum, er hat das Dirigieren nicht nur als Assistent von Pierre Boulez, sondern auch bei einem Choreographen gelernt. Das Ergebnis ist eine tänzerische Show, die lebendig gewordene Karikatur des Künstlers von unserem so ahnungsvollen Wilhelm Busch.

Lassen sich die „Bostonians", wie die Orchestermusiker liebevoll zärtlich tituliert werden, davon irritieren? Nun, sie spielen, Zappelei hin oder her, über die Maßen herrlich, es ist dies noch immer ein Orchester allerersten Ranges — in der Holzbläser süßer Kantabilität, in der gerundeten Sicherheit des Blechs, der weich grundierten Exaktheit der Streicher. Die Damen und Herren, zahlreich an den Pulten, gaben jetzt in Höchst Robert Schumanns dritter Sinfonie Brahms'sche Schwerblütigkeit. Gedeckte Farben, gebundene Übergänge, wenig Kontraste. Das „Rheinische" dieses Opus wird mythologisch begriffen; das Innere gotischer Kathedralen pflegt in der Tat dunkel zu sein. Wir sehen Schumanns Romantik agiler, ausgeprägter im Licht-Schatten-Spiel und differenzierter. Hier zeigte sich in unverhülltem Nebeneinander das gewiß vorhandene Talent wie die unausgegorene Jugend des Assistant Conductor: Die impulsive Musikalität ist bei Michael Tilson Thomas einstweilen noch keine stets funktionierende Barriere gegen schulmäßige Behandlung ganzer Flächen. Weder in den Tempi noch in der Phrasierung sitzt dieser Schumann nach Maß. Das wäre, angesichts verdienstvoller Erprobung und Erfahrungssuche eines angehenden Genies (unterstellen wir einmal, daß er eines wird) nicht weiter schlimm, würde man in der Fremde bei der Begegnung mit einem exzeptionellen Orchester nicht auch eine exzeptionelle interpretatorische Erarbeitung erwarten.

Merkwürdigerweise blieben die Bostoner auch beim Solisten-Konzert des Abends hinter solchen Erwartungen weit zurück. Joseph Silverstein mag ein vorzüglicher Erster Konzertmeister seiner Kollegen sein, Tschaikowskys Violinkonzert wird durch ihn zum Privatfall, Sentimentalität ersetzt Gefühl, Manierismus beherrscht die Details, nirgends ein Aufriß, der das Werk im Solotell zu seiner exemplarischen Schlüssigkeit führte.

Brillanter Schlußpunkt: „La Valse" von Ravel. Virtuoser Impressionismus, Klangfarbenzauber in höchster Vollendung. Die Bostoner und ihr „Solotänzer" Thomas fesseln durch Schliff, Brechungen, Nuancen einer staunenswerten Orchesterkultur. Das Fest im Dreiviertel-Takt hat Wiener Charme; zu kurz kommt die leichte Ironie gallischen Esprits. — Viel Applaus den Gästen aus Amerika.

Kurt Heinz

THE BOSTONIANS IN THE JAHRHUNDERT HALLE

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the American Orchestra during the guest concert in Höchst.

Many long years have past since the Bostonians were in Germany as guests. Maybe this timely distance was the reason that this guest concert in the Jahrhundert Halle in Höchst was well visited but not sold out? How different has it been when the New York Philharmonic or the Philadelphia Orchestra gave a concert in the same town.

Those concerts, of cause, were conducted by Bernstein (the New Yorkers) and Eugene Ormandy (the Philadelphians), two personalities who rate very highly in the international interests. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ends in these weeks its third European tour (from London to Rome and Barcelona, from Berlin, Vienna to Paris) brought with them to the Rhein-Main County Michael Tilson Thomas....

....a 26 year old American, coming from Hollywood whom professional talent hunters from across the Atlantic scent as a coming great. The present "assistant conductor" of the Bostonians and future chief of the Buffalo Symphony Orchestra had been chosen to be the "Musician of the Year" in 1970, in the largest American Musical magazine "Muiscal America". Deutsche Grammophon had made an exclusive contract with the Boston Orchestra and caused quite a sensation in the American record industry. They made several recordings of Michael Tilson Thomas as conductor and as pianist. His career - so it seems - is not to be stopped.

In comparison to European customs the young man offers indeed an unfamiliar sight: tall and skinny as a spindle, sewed into skin tight tuxedo pants, the hair streaming on his convulsive head. He jumps swiftly on the podium. To the right, to the left, back and forward, the same thing in reverse, too, depending on where the main theme of his instrumentarium develops. Suddenly he collapses, bounces up, balancing continuesly on his tip toes, striking wide circles way up in the air and to the side. In short - he didn't just learn how to conduct as assistant from Pierre Boulez but also from a choreographer. The result is a dancing show, the cartoon of the artist, who came to life, drawn by the ominous Wilhelm Busch.

Does this irritate the "Bostonians" as the musicians are called, tenderly and lovingly. Well, they play beautifully in the highest degree, with convulsions to and fro, for it still is a orchestra of the first rank. In the woodwinds a sweet cantata sound, in the rounded security of the brasses the soft, exactness of the strings. The ladies and gentlemen, plenty at the desks, performed in the Höchst concert Schumann's Third Symphony with Brahms's Melancholy. Concealed colors, connected passages, but not many contrasts. The "Rheinish" of this opus is interpreted mythologically: The interior of Gothic cathedrals seemed to be dark, indeed. We see Schumann's romanticism livelier, more pronounced, more contrasted in light and shadow games. Here we see, bared next to each other, the existing talent and the restless youth of the assistant conductor: Michael Tilson Thomas's impulsive musicality is as yet not an always functioning barrier for his scholastic treatment of whole levels. This Schumann was timed neither in the tempi nor in the phrasing. This wouldn't be too bad considering the deserved tests and the search for experience of a future genius (let's assume he'll become one). But also one expects in a foreign country with an exceptional orchestra an equally exceptionally interpreted performance.

Strangely the Bostonians did not come up to the expectations in the solistic side of the evening either. Joseph Silverstein may be an exeptional first chair concert master for his collegues, but Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto became a private downfall. Sentimentality replaced feeling, manners ruled over details. Nowhere was an elevation which led the work in the solo part to its exemplary determination.

A brilliant finale: La Valse by Ravel. Vituoso impressionism, an enchantment of tonecolor in the highest perfection. The Bostonians and their "solo dancer" Thomas fascinated with polish, arpeggios, shades of an astonishing orchestral culture. The festival in three-quarter time had Viennese charm, but the light irony of a gallic esprit came off badly. Much applause for the guests from America.

Kurt Heinz

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (i. Ts.): 15,5 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Schwetzinger Zeitung, Schwetzingen
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (i. Ts.): 167,8 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Mannheimer Morgen, Mannheim
vom 17. April 197

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (i. Ts.): 24,3 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Fränkische Nachrichten, Tauberbischofsheim
vom 17. April 1971

Die „Bostonians" in der Jahrhunderthalle

Michael Tilson Thomas dirigierte das amerikanische Orchester beim Gastkonzert in Höchst

Es ist lange, viele Jahre her, daß die „Bostonians" in Deutschland zu Gast waren. Ob es in diesem zeitlichen Abstand begründet ist, daß ihr Gastkonzert in der Jahrhunderthalle Höchst zwar gut besucht schien, aber keineswegs ausverkauft? Wie anders war es gewesen, als die New Yorker Philharmoniker oder das Philadelphia Orchestra am gleichen Ort musizierten!

Diese Konzerte freilich dirigierten Leonard Bernstein (die New Yorker) und Eugene Ormandy (das Philadelphia), zwei Persönlichkeiten, die im Stellenwert des internationalen Interesses hoch veranschlagt sind. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra, das in diesen Wochen seine dritte Europa-Tournee absolviert, die von London bis Rom und Barcelona, von Berlin, Wien bis Paris führt, brachte in den Rhein-Main-Raum Michael Tilson Thomas mit...

...einen 26jährigen, aus Hollywood stammenden Amerikaner, in dem professionelle Talent-Aufspürer jenseits des Atlantiks eine kommende Größe wittern. Der gegenwärtige „Assistant Conductor" der Bostoner und künftige Chef des Buffalo Symphony Orchestra ist, von der größten amerikanischen Musikzeitschrift „Musical America" zum „Musician of the Year", zum Musiker des Jahres 1970, gewählt worden — die Deutsche Grammophon, die durch ihren Exclusiv-Vertrag mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra beträchtliches Aufsehen auf dem amerikanischen Schallplatten-Markt erregt hat, bringt Michael Tilson Thomas als Dirigent wie als Pianist mit etlichen Aufnahmen heraus. Seine Karriere, so scheint es, ist nicht aufzuhalten.

Im Vergleich zu europäischen Bräuchen bietet der junge Mann allerdings einen zumindest ungewohnten Anblick: Lang und spindeldürr, in hautenge Frackhosen genäht, das Haar flatternd auf dem konvulsivisch zuckenden Kopf, hüpft er hurtig auf dem kleinen Dirigentenpodest. Nach rechts und nach links, vor und zurück, und das Ganze auch in umgekehrter Reihenfolge, je nachdem, wo sich gerade die Hauptstimme seines Instrumentariums zu entfalten beginnt. Jäh klappt er zusammen, federt auf, wippt ständig auf den Fußspitzen, schlägt mit den Armen in weiten Kreisen hoch in die Luft und breit nach der Seite hin — kurzum, er hat das Dirigieren nicht nur als Assistent von Pierre Boulez, sondern auch bei einem Choreographen gelernt. Das Ergebnis ist eine tänzerische Show, die lebendig gewordene Karikatur des Künstlers von unserem so ahnungsvollen Wilhelm Busch.

Lassen sich die „Bostonians", wie die Orchestermusiker liebevoll zärtlich tituliert werden, davon irritieren? Nun, sie spielen, Zappelei hin oder her, über die Maßen herrlich, es ist dies noch immer ein Orchester allerersten Ranges — in der Holzbläser süßer Kantabilität, in der gerundeten Sicherheit des Blechs, der weich grundierten Exaktheit der Streicher. Die Damen und Herren, zahlreich an den Pulten, gaben jetzt in Höchst Robert Schumanns dritter Sinfonie Brahms'sche Schwerblütigkeit. Gedeckte Farben, gebundene Übergänge, wenig Kontraste. Das „Rheinische" dieses Opus wird mythologisch begriffen; das Innere gotischer Kathedralen pflegt in der Tat dunkel zu sein. Wir sehen Schumanns Romantik agiler, ausgeprägter im Licht-Schatten-Spiel und differenzierter. Hier zeigte sich in unverhülltem Nebeneinander das gewiß vorhandene Talent wie die unausgegorene Jugend des Assistant Conductor: Die impulsive Musikalität ist bei Michael Tilson Thomas einstweilen noch keine stets funktionierende Barriere gegen schulmäßige Behandlung ganzer Flächen. Weder in den Tempi noch in der Phrasierung sitzt dieser Schumann nach Maß. Das wäre, angesichts verdienstvoller Erprobung und Erfahrungssuche eines angehenden Genies (unterstellen wir einmal, daß er eines wird) nicht weiter schlimm, würde man in der Fremde bei der Begegnung mit einem exzeptionellen Orchester nicht auch eine exzeptionelle interpretatorische Erarbeitung erwarten.

Merkwürdigerweise blieben die Bostoner auch beim Solisten-Konzert des Abends hinter solchen Erwartungen weit zurück. Joseph Silverstein mag ein vorzüglicher Erster Konzertmeister seiner Kollegen sein, Tschaikowskys Violinkonzert wird durch ihn zum Privatfall, Sentimentalität ersetzt Gefühl, Manierismus beherrscht die Details, nirgends ein Aufriß, der das Werk im Solo-teil zu seiner exemplarischen Schlüssigkeit führte.

Brillanter Schlußpunkt: „La Valse" von Ravel. Virtuoser Impressionismus, Klangfarbenzauber in höchster Vollendung. Die Bostoner und ihr „Solotänzer" Thomas fesseln durch Schliff, Brechungen, Nuancen einer staunenswerten Orchesterkultur. Das Fest im Dreiviertel-Takt hat Wiener Charme; zu kurz kommt die leichte Ironie gallischen Esprits. — Viel Applaus den Gästen aus Amerika.

Kurt Heinz

THE BOSTONIANS IN THE JAHRHUNDERT HALLE

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the American Orchestra during the guest concert in Höchst.

Many long years have past since the Bostonians were in Germany as guests. Maybe this timely distance was the reason that this guest concert in the Jahrhundert Halle in Höchst was well visited but not sold out? How different has it been when the New York Philharmonic or the Philadelphia Orchestra gave a concert in the same town.

Those concerts, of cause, were conducted by Bernstein (the New Yorkers) and Eugene Ormandy (the Philadelphians), two personalities who rate very highly in the international interests. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ends in these weeks its third European tour (from London to Rome and Barcelona, from Berlin, Vienna to Paris) brought with them to the Rhein-Main County Michael Tilson Thomas....

....a 26 year old American, coming from Hollywood whom professional talent hunters from across the Atlantic scent as a coming great. The present "assistant conductor" of the Bostonians and future chief of the Buffalo Symphony Orchestra had been chosen to be the "Musician of the Year" in 1970, in the largest American Musical magazine "Muiscal America". Deutsche Grammophon had made an exclusive contract with the Boston Orchestra and caused quite a sensation in the American record industry. They made several recordings of Michael Tilson Thomas as conductor and as pianist. His career - so it seems - is not to be stopped.

In comparison to European customs the young man offers indeed an unfamiliar sight: tall and skinny as a spindle, sewed into skin tight tuxedo pants, the hair streaming on his convulsive head. He jumps swiftly on the podium. To the right, to the left, back and forward, the same thing in reverse, too, depending on where the main theme of his instrumentarium develops. Suddenly he collapses, bounces up, balancing continuesly on his tip toes, striking wide circles way up in the air and to the side. In short - he didn't just learn how to conduct as assistant from Pierre Boulez but also from a choreographer. The result is a dancing show, the cartoon of the artist, who came to life, drawn by the ominous Wilhelm Busch.

Does this irritate the "Bostonians" as the musicians are called, tenderly and lovingly. Well, they play beautifully in the highest degree, with convulsions to and fro, for it still is a orchestra of the first rank. In the woodwinds a sweet cantata sound, in the rounded security of the brasses the soft, exactness of the strings. The ladies and gentlemen, plenty at the desks, performed in the Höchst concert Schumann's Third Symphony with Brahms's Melancholy. Concealed colors, connected passages, but not many contrasts. The "Rheinish" of this opus is interpreted mythologically: The interior of Gothic cathedrals seemed to be dark, indeed. We see Schumann's romanticism livelier, more pronounced, more contrasted in light and shadow games. Here we see, bared next to each other, the existing talent and the restless youth of the assistant conductor: Michael Tilson Thomas's impulsive musicality is as yet not an always functioning barrier for his scholastic treatment of whole levels. This Schumann was timed neither in the tempi nor in the phrasing. This wouldn't be too bad considering the deserved fests and the search for experience of a future genius (let's assume he'll become one). But also one expects in a foreign country with an exceptional orchestra an equally exceptionally interpreted performance.

Strangely the Bostonians did not come up to the expectations in the solistic side of the evening either. Joseph Silverstein may be an exeptional first chair concert master for his collegues, but Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto became a private downfall. Sentimentality replaced feeling, manners ruled over details. Nowhere was an elevation which led the work in the solo part to its exemplary determination.

A brilliant finale: La Valse by Ravel. Vituoso impressionism, an enchantment of tonecolor in the highest perfection. The Bostonians and their "solo dancer" Thomas fascinated with polish, arpeggios, shades of an astonishing orchestral culture. The festival in three-quarter time had Viennese charm, but the light irony of a gallic esprit came off badly. Much applause for the guests from America.

Kurt Heinz

106

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 63,9 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 — Ausschnitt aus: Frankfurter Allgemeine Stadtausgabe, Franfurt Main
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 316,6 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Frankfurter Allgemeine, Frankfurt/Main
vom 20. April 1971

3

Klangkultur und Pultshow

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Jahrhunderthalle

Zu den europäischen Lieblingsvorstellungen über Amerika gehört die vom Fehlen kultureller Tradition, wie es dem wohlfeilen Gegensatz von Neuer und Alter Welt entsprach. Vorurteile dieser Art lassen sich zwar widerlegen, aber nur schwer abbauen, entspringen sie doch zumeist einer in sich ambivalenten Projektion: stolz wähnt man sich im festen Besitz verbrieften kulturellen Erbes und starrt zugleich sehnsüchtig auf das historisch angeblich unvorbelastete „Land der unbegrenzten Möglichkeiten". Dabei hat sich gerade in Amerika schon in der Mitte des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts der organisierte Konzertbetrieb auf breiter Publikumsbasis entwickelt. Die bekannten amerikanischen Orchester sind kaum jünger als die europäischen. So wurden die New Yorker und die Wiener Philharmoniker im selben Jahr (1842) gegründet. Es folgten die Orchester von Boston (1881), Chikago (1891), Philadelphia (1900) und Cleveland (1918).

„The Boston Symphony Orchestra" wurde durch einen musikbegeisterten Bostoner Geschäftsmann zusammengestellt und finanziert. Die ersten Dirigenten stammten aus Deutschland; die berühmtesten waren Artur Nikisch und Karl Muck. 1919 bis 1924 leitete Pierre Monteux das Orchester, sein Nachfolger war bis 1949 der Russe Serge Koussevitzki. Unter ihm vor allem entwickelte es sich zum Spitzenensemble, in dem sich deutsche Tradition, französische Klangkultur und amerikanischer Perfektionismus vereinten. Besonders die beiden Bläsergruppen erlangten schon bald weltweiten Ruhm. Hindemith widmete dem Orchester 1930 seine Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser, die „Bostoner Sinfonie", Bartok 1943 sein Konzert für Orchester. Von 1949 bis 1962 war Charles Münch Chefdirigent. Ihm folgte bis 1969 Erich Leinsdorf. Seitdem teilt ich William Steinberg in die Leitung des Pittsburgher und des Bostoner Orchesters, dem die Boston Symphony Chamber Players und das von Arthur Fiedler dirigierte „Boston Pops Orchestra" entstammen.

Zur Zeit unternehmen die „Bostoner", die vor einem Jahr einen Exklusivvertrag mit der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft geschlossen haben, von dem schon eine Reihe bemerkenswerter Schallplatten zeugen, seine dritte Europatournee. Dirigiert werden die Konzerte von William Steinberg und dem „Associate Conductor", dem erst sechsundzwanzigjährigen Michael Tilson Thomas, der mit seinen Schallplattenaufnahmen (auch als Pianist der Chamber Players) ausgezeichneten Eindruck machte. Sein Konzert mit dem Bostoner Orchester in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle hingegen wirkte etwas zwiespältig. Thomas, der auch an neuer Musik interessiert ist, vor kurzem zum Chefdirigenten des bisher von dem Komponisten Lukas Foss geleiteten Buffalo Symphony Orchestra ernannt wurde, gilt in Amerika manchen schon als ein zweiter Leonard Bernstein. Mit diesem teilt er zumindest eine zwar erklärliche, sich musikalisch aber nicht immer ganz vorteilhaft auswirkende Vorliebe für exaltierte Show-Effekte.

Darunter litt Schumanns „Rheinische". Nun sind Schumanns Symphonien, mit Ausnahme der „Vierten", für Orchester wie Dirigenten stets ein wenig heikel, zumindest keine selbstverständlich-dankbaren Zugstücke. Und gerade im Falle des Es-Dur-Werkes ist die Gefahr des Spannungsabfalls nach dem emphatisch-enthusiastischen Kopfsatz ein interpretatorisches Problem, dem mit großem Bewegungsaufwand kaum beizukommen ist. Thomas verließ sich hier zu sehr auf das Prinzip gestischer Verdoppelungen musikalischer Momente. Jeder Akzent, jede unerwartete harmonische Wendung gerät ihm zur impulsiv wirkenden Gebärde. Dirigieren wird zum Tanz, dessen engagierter Eindruck sich freilich nicht adäquat in die klangliche Aktion umsetzte. Die Ekstatik des Optischen und die überraschende Wohltemperiertheit, ja Zähigkeit des Klingenden schienen sich dialektisch zu berühren. Daß das Bostoner Orchester gleichwohl perfekt, plastisch und klangschön spielte, war dabei ebenso erstaunlich wie im Grunde nicht überraschend. Ein größerer Gegensatz als der zwischen dem jungen Thomas und den sparsam agierenden Dirigenten Leinsdorf oder Steinberg ist schwerlich denkbar.

Der Rang eines Orchesters wird durch die solistischen Qualitäten der einzelnen Mitglieder ebenso bestimmt wie durch deren Integration zum Kollektiv. Vor allem an den ersten Pulten sitzen in Boston hervorragende Virtuosen, bei den Bläsern, die mit Beweglichkeit, tonlicher Plastizität und klanglicher Ausgeglichenheit gleichermaßen glänzen wie bei den Streichern. Der Konzertmeister Joseph Silverstein ist sogar ein exzellenter Solo-Geiger, der es sich durchaus leisten kann, sich mit dem Tschaikowsky-Konzert vorzustellen. Zwar bleiben auch bei ihm die immensen Schwierigkeiten des Stückes an einigen Stellen noch erkennbar, doch ist insgesamt die ruhige Sicherheit und Prägnanz seines Spiels sowohl in den motorisch rasanten wie auch in den unaufdringlich phrasierten kantablen Partien imponierend. Hier bewährte sich auch Thomas als überlegener und diskreter Begleiter, zumal ihm Silversteins agogisch unexzentrische Interpretation seine Aufgabe erleichterte.

Finalreißer des Programms war Ravels „La Valse". Thomas, der auf dem Podium frenetische Aktivität entfaltete, legte das Stück als triumphalen orchestralen Bravour- und Kraftakt an, dem es dennoch an drahtiger Transparenz der klanglichen Schichten nicht fehlte.

GERHARD R. KOCH

Aus unserer Morgen

Samstag/Sonntag, 17./18. April 1971 / Nr. 88

Vereint in Amerika viele Hoffnungen auf sich

Michael Tilson Thomas, der 26jährige Amerikaner aus Hollywood, dirigierte das Gastkonzert des Boston Symphony Orchestras in der Jahrhunderthalle Höchst (siehe unsere Kritik auf dieser Seite). Als Kapellmeister wie als Pianist ist er bislang hervorgetreten; 1968 erhielt er den Serge-Koussevitzky-Preis. Foto: DG/Manos

Frankfurter Allgemeine
April 17, 1971

Klangkultur und Pultshow
(Musical Refinement and Podium Display)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra
in Centenary Hall

Introduction: history of the orchestra and the Tour. Reference to "a series of notable records" released under exclusive contract with Deutsche Grammaphon.

...The concerts are conducted by William Steinberg and the Assistant Conductor, the just 20-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas, who made an outstanding impression with his recordings (also as pianist of the Chamber Players.) His concert with the Boston orchestra in the Höchst Centenary Hall, on the other hand, had a somewhat variable effect. Thomas, who is also interested in new music and recently was named Conductor of the Buffalo Symphony Orchestra--heretofore led by Lukas Foss--ranks in America already as a second Leonard Bernstein. At the least, he shares with the latter a preference for showy effects, musically effective but not always beneficially so.

Schumann's Rhenish Symphony suffered from this. Now Schumann's symphonies are, with the exception of the Fourth, always a little ticklish for orchestras as well as for conductors and at the very least not automatic (lit: self-evidently grateful) hits. And precisely in the case of the E-flat work is the danger of a falling-off in tension an interpretive problem after the emphatically enthusiastic first movement, a problem which is not to be gotten at with great display of motion. Thomas depends too much on ----- (illegible) duplication of musical moments (events.) Each accent, each unexpected harmonic turn brings out some impulsive gesture from him. Conducting becomes a dance, whose passionate (lit: engagé, committed) impression admittedly does not translate well into musical activity. The ecstasy of the optical and the surprising well-temperedness, even hardness of the sonic seem to touch dialectically. It was therefore as astounding as it was at base unsurprising that the Boston orchestra nevertheless played perfectly, flexibly (graphically?) and beautifully. A greater contrast can hardly be imagined than that between the young Thomas and the economical conductors Leinsdorf or Steinberg.

The rank of an orchestra is determined by the solo quality of its individual members as much as by their integration into the larger whole. Above all, the first desks in Boston are occupied by outstanding virtuosos, and this is as true of the winds--which shine (?) with agility, plastic tone, and well-balanced sound- as of the strings. Comcertmaster Joseph Silverstein is even an excellent solo violinist, fully capable of presenting himself in the Tchaikovsky Concerto. Admittedly the immense difficulties of the piece can still be recognized in his performance, but as a whole the calm security and meaningfulness (Prägnanz) of his playing is impressive in both the motorically impetuous and unostentatiously phrased cantabile sections. Here Thomas proved himself a superior and discreet accompanist, the moreso since Silverstein's rhythmically uneccentric interpretation lightened his task.

The program closed with Ravel's La Valse. Thomas, who displayed frenetic (? - hardly legible) activity on the podium, presented the piece as a triumphal orchestral exercise (Akt) in bravura and force, which however did not lack for (a kind of) wiry transparency of the levels of sound. GERHARD R. KOCH

TRANSLATED BY RALPH LOCKE

106

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 63,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Allgemeine Stadtausgabe, Franfurt Main

vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 316,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Allgemeine, Frankfurt/Main

vom 20. April 1971

3

Klangkultur und Pultshow

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Jahrhunderthalle

Zu den europäischen Lieblingsvorstellungen über Amerika gehört die vom Fehlen kultureller Tradition, wie es dem wohlfeilen Gegensatz von Neuer und Alter Welt entsprach. Vorurteile dieser Art lassen sich zwar widerlegen, aber nur schwer abbauen, entspringen sie doch zumeist einer in sich ambivalenten Projektion: stolz wähnt man sich im festen Besitz verbrieften kulturellen Erbes und starrt zugleich sehnsüchtig auf das historisch angeblich unvorbelastete „Land der unbegrenzten Möglichkeiten". Dabei hat sich gerade in Amerika schon in der Mitte des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts der organisierte Konzertbetrieb auf breiter Publikumsbasis entwickelt. Die bekannten amerikanischen Orchester sind kaum jünger als die europäischen. So wurden die New Yorker und die Wiener Philharmoniker im selben Jahr (1842) gegründet. Es folgten die Orchester von Boston (1881), Chikago (1891), Philadelphia (1900) und Cleveland (1918).

„The Boston Symphony Orchestra" wurde durch einen musikbegeisterten Bostoner Geschäftsmann zusammengestellt und finanziert. Die ersten Dirigenten stammten aus Deutschland; die berühmtesten waren Artur Nikisch und Karl Muck. 1919 bis 1924 leitete Pierre Monteux das Orchester, sein Nachfolger war bis 1949 der Russe Serge Koussevitzki. Unter ihm vor allem entwickelte es sich zum Spitzenensemble, in dem sich deutsche Tradition, französische Klangkultur und amerikanischer Perfektionismus vereinten. Besonders die beiden Bläsergruppen erlangten schon bald weltweiten Ruhm. Hindemith widmete dem Orchester 1930 seine Konzertmusik für Streichorchester und Blechbläser, die „Bostoner Sinfonie", Bartok 1943 sein Konzert für Orchester. Von 1949 bis 1962 war Charles Münch Chefdirigent. Ihm folgte bis 1969 Erich Leinsdorf. Seitdem teilt ich William Steinberg in die Leitung des Pittsburgher und des Bostoner Orchesters, dem die Boston Symphony Chamber Players und das von Arthur Fiedler dirigierte „Boston Pops Orchestra" entstammen.

Zur Zeit unternehmen die „Bostoner", die vor einem Jahr einen Exklusivvertrag mit der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft geschlossen haben, von dem schon eine Reihe bemerkenswerter Schallplatten zeugen, seine dritte Europatournee. Dirigiert werden die Konzerte von William Steinberg und dem „Associate Conductor", dem erst sechsundzwanzigjährigen Michael Tilson Thomas, der mit seinen Schallplattenaufnahmen (auch als Pianist der Chamber Players) ausgezeichneten Eindruck machte. Sein Konzert mit dem Bostoner Orchester in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle hingegen wirkte etwas zwiespältig. Thomas, der auch an neuer Musik interessiert ist, vor kurzem zum Chefdirigenten des bisher von dem Komponisten Lukas Foss geleiteten Buffalo Symphony Orchestra ernannt wurde, gilt in Amerika manchen schon als ein zweiter Leonard Bernstein. Mit diesem teilt er zumindest eine zwar erklärliche, sich musikalisch aber nicht immer ganz vorteilhaft auswirkende Vorliebe für exaltierte Show-Effekte.

Darunter litt Schumanns „Rheinische". Nun sind Schumanns Symphonien, mit Ausnahme der „Vierten", für Orchester wie Dirigenten stets ein wenig heikel, zumindest keine selbstverständlich-dankbaren Zugstücke. Und gerade im Falle des Es-Dur-Werkes ist die Gefahr des Spannungsabfalls nach dem emphatisch-enthusiastischen Kopfsatz ein interpretatorisches Problem, dem mit großem Bewegungsaufwand kaum beizukommen ist. Thomas verließ sich hier zu sehr auf das Prinzip gestischer Verdoppelungen musikalischer Momente. Jeder Akzent, jede unerwartete harmonische Wendung gerät ihm zur impulsiv wirkenden Gebärde. Dirigieren wird zum Tanz, dessen engagierter Eindruck sich freilich nicht adäquat in die klangliche Aktion umsetzte. Die Ekstatik des Optischen und die überraschende Wohltemperiertheit, ja Zähigkeit des Klingenden schienen sich dialektisch zu berühren. Daß das Bostoner Orchester gleichwohl perfekt, plastisch und klangschön spielte, war dabei ebenso erstaunlich wie im Grunde nicht überraschend. Ein größerer Gegensatz als der zwischen dem jungen Thomas und den sparsam agierenden Dirigenten Leinsdorf oder Steinberg ist schwerlich denkbar.

Der Rang eines Orchesters wird durch die solistischen Qualitäten der einzelnen Mitglieder ebenso bestimmt wie durch deren Integration zum Kollektiv. Vor allem an den ersten Pulten sitzen in Boston hervorragende Virtuosen, bei den Bläsern, die mit Beweglichkeit, tonlicher Plastizität und klanglicher Ausgeglichenheit gleichermaßen glänzen wie bei den Streichern. Der Konzertmeister Joseph Silverstein ist sogar ein exzellenter Solo-Geiger, der es sich durchaus leisten kann, sich mit dem Tschaikowsky-Konzert vorzustellen. Zwar bleiben auch bei ihm die immensen Schwierigkeiten des Stückes an einigen Stellen noch erkennbar, doch ist insgesamt die ruhige Sicherheit und Prägnanz seines Spiels sowohl in den motorisch rasanten wie auch in den unaufdringlich phrasierten kantablen Partien imponierend. Hier bewährte sich auch Thomas als überlegener und diskreter Begleiter, zumal ihm Silversteins agogisch unexzentrische Interpretation seine Aufgabe erleichterte.

Finalreißer des Programms war Ravels „La Valse". Thomas, der auf dem Podium frenetische Aktivität entfaltete, legte das Stück als triumphalen orchestralen Bravour- und Kraftakt an, dem es dennoch an drahtiger Transparenz der klanglichen Schichten nicht fehlte.

GERHARD R. KOCH

Samstag/Sonntag, 17./18. April 1971 / Nr. 88

Vereint in Amerika viele Hoffnungen auf sich

Michael Tilson Thomas, der 26jährige Amerikaner aus Hollywood, dirigierte das Gastkonzert des Boston Symphony Orchestras in der Jahrhunderthalle Höchst (siehe unsere Kritik auf dieser Seite). Als Kapellmeister wie als Pianist ist er bislang hervorgetreten; 1968 erhielt er den Serge-Koussevitzky-Preis. Foto: DG/Manos

Frankfurter Allgemeine
April 17, 1971

Klangkultur und Pultshow
(Musical Refinement and Podium Display)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra
in Centenary Hall

Introduction: history of the orchestra and the Tour. Reference to "a series of notable records" released under exclusive contract with Deutsche Grammaphon.

...The concerts are conducted by William Steinberg and the Assistant Conductor, the just 20-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas, who made an outstanding impression with his recordings (also as pianist of the Chamber Players.) His concert with the Boston orchestra in the Höchst Centenary Hall, on the other hand, had a somewhat variable effect. Thomas, who is also interested in new music and recently was named Conductor of the Buffalo Symphony Orchestra--heretofore led by Lukas Foss--ranks in America already as a second Leonard Bernstein. At the least, he shares with the latter a preference for showy effects, musically effective but not always beneficially so.

Schumann's Rhenish Symphony suffered from this. Now Schumann's symphonies are, with the exception of the Fourth, always a little ticklish for orchestras as well as for conductors and at the very least not automatic (lit: self-evidently grateful) hits. And precisely in the case of the E-flat work is the danger of a falling-off in tension an interpretive problem after the emphatically enthusiastic first movement, a problem which is not to be gotten at with great display of motion. Thomas depends too much on ----- (illegible) duplication of musical moments (events.) Each accent, each unexpected harmonic turn brings out some impulsive gesture from him. Conducting becomes a dance, whose passionate (lit: engagé, committed) impression admittedly does not translate well into musical activity. The ecstasy of the optical and the surprising well-temperedness, even hardness of the sonic seem to touch dialectically. It was therefore as astounding as it was at base unsurprising that the Boston orchestra nevertheless played perfectly, flexibly (graphically?) and beautifully. A greater contrast can hardly be imagined than that between the young Thomas and the economical conductors Leinsdorf or Steinberg.

The rank of an orchestra is determined by the solo quality of its individual members as much as by their integration into the larger whole. Above all, the first desks in Boston are occupied by outstanding virtuosos, and this is as true of the winds--which shine (?) with agility, plastic tone, and well-balanced sound- as of the strings. Comcertmaster Joseph Silverstein is even an excellent solo violinist, fully capable of presenting himself in the Tchaikovsky Concerto. Admittedly the immense difficulties of the piece can still be recognized in his performance, but as a whole the calm security and meaningfulness (Prägnanz) of his playing is impressive in both the motorically impetuous and unostentatiously phrased cantabile sections. Here Thomas proved himself a superior and discreet accompanist, the moreso since Silverstein's rhythmically uneccentric interpretation lightened his task.

The program closed with Ravel's Ia Valse. Thomas, who displayed frenetic (? - hardly legible) activity on the podium, presented the piece as a triumphal orchestral exercise (Akt) in bravura and force, which however did not lack for (a kind of) wiry transparency of the levels of sound. GERHARD R. KOCH

TRANSLATED BY RALPH LOCKE

argus
Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 166,2
— lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Rundschau, Frankfurt/Main
vom 19. April 1971

Konzert für Konduktor

3

Vom Boston Symphony-Orchestra in Höchst begleitet

Vor zwei Jahren begann Michael Tilson Thomas, der junge Musikstar aus Hollywood, als Pianist und Dirigierassistent der Boston Symphony Chamber Players seine Kometenkarriere, und bald danach rückte er vor zum „Associate Conductor" des Boston Symphony Orchestra, zur stellvertretenden „rechten Hand" des Chefdirigenten William Steinberg. In der Jahrhunderthalle Hoechst — einer Gastspielstation der ausgedehnten Europatournee, die das berühmte Orchester zur Feier seines 90jährigen Bestehens derzeit absolviert — zeigte sich freilich, daß Master Thomas für seine Dirigierleidenschaft weit mehr als nur die Taktstockhand braucht. Warum auch nicht? Vielleicht ist man in Boston der Ansicht, einem erst 26jährigen Ausdrucksgenie dürften schlagtechnische Fesseln keineswegs angelegt werden, und sowohl ihm als auch dem Publikum sei die Schau hemmungslosen Expressionpumpens aus Armen und Beinen, knieweich mit federnder und elektrisiert um sich werfender Klangrauschgebärden, sehr wohl zu gönnen. Zumal ein so durchtrainierter Instrumentalkörper wie der Bostoner für unverbrüchliche Spielpräzision schon selber aufkäme. Ja, wenn dem so wäre.

In der Tat schlug es Schumanns „Rheinischer" Sinfonie gar nicht gut an, daß sie eingangs sozusagen als „Concerto for the Conductor" (mit obligater Streicher- und Bläserbegleitung) herhalten mußte. Im Auditiven wirkte diese „visible music" arg lau und verwaschen, rhythmisch unbestimmt, mitunter trivial melodieselig, ohne Rückgrat in der Hauptthematik des Kopfsatzes wie in der es-Moll-Sakralsprache des 4. Satzes.

Als Thomas dann von seiner Solistenrolle etwas abrückte, dem Konzertmeister Joseph Silverstein als Geiger des Tschaikowsky-Violinkonzerts die Vorhand ließ und bemüht war, einigermaßen akkurat die Begleittempi anzugeben, kam keinerlei agogische Dynamik im Orchester auf; der Solopart — ohnehin eher gekonnt gefiedelt als bedeutungsvoll interpretiert, mit Bravourton zwar, aber bar jeglicher anrührenden Pathetik — wurde so grobkörnig, so unstrukturiert flächenhaft untermalt wie von einem drittklassigen Korrepetitor am Klavier.

Darauf „La Valse" von Ravel: Sie gab zu erkennen, zu welchen phänomenalen Klangsuggestionen dieses Orchester fähig ist, obwohl Ravels eisige Tanzdämonie mit der weit vordergründigeren Turbulenz etwa der „Three Places of New England" von Charles Ives in einen Topf geworfen wurde. fu.

Frankfurter Rundschau
April 19, 1971

Concerto for Conductor

Accompanied by the Boston
Boston Symphony Orchestra in
Höchst Centenary Hall

Two years ago Michael Tilson Thomas, the young star-musician (Musikstar) from Hollywood, began his meteoric career as pianist and assistant director of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, and soon thereafter he moved on to Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the acting right-hand-man of Conductor William Steinberg. In the Höchst Centenary Hall--one stop of the extended European tour which the orchestra is just now finishing in celebration of its 90th Anniversary--it became evident indeed that Master Thomas needs far more for his conducting passion than just his baton-hand. Well, why not? Perhaps in Boston one is of the opinion that a merely 26-year-old expressive genius should in no way be subjected to the shackles of time-beating and that he himself as well as the audience should not be denied the exhibition of uninhibited expressive pumping of the arms and legs, weak-at-the-knees, with bouncy, electrically-charged delirious gestures (lit: gestures of one in a delirium of sound) tossed around here and there. Besides, an instrumental body as thoroughly trained as the Boston could itself take care of (maintaining) absolute precision in playing. Oh, if it could only be!

In fact, it did not serve Schumann's Rhenish Symphony at all well that the work had to be treated (lit: suffer, bear up) as, so to speak, a "Concerto for the Conductor" (with obbligato string and wind accompaniment.) To the ear, this "visible music" had a destructively (lit: grossly, viciously) tepid and washed-out effect, rhythmically indefinite, now and then with a trivial melodic felicity, (but) without backbone in the main thematic material of the first movement as well as in the e-flat minor religious language of the fourth movement.

When Thomas then stepped back from his solo role somewhat, let Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein call the cards as violinist in the Tchaikovsky Concerto and (instead) took pains to indicate the accompaniment tempi with some degree of precision, there (still) appeared no agogic dynamics (? - If this means anything, it is some kind of rhythmic impulse or forward motion.) in the orchestra. The solo part--in any case (merely) competently fiddled ~~Rather than~~ rather than meaningfully interpreted, admittedly with a bravura tone but devoid of any touching pathos--was so coarsely, so superficially accompanied, without (a sense of) structure, as if by a third-class rehearsal pianist at the keyboard.

After that, Ravel's La Valse made recognizable what phenomenal tonal subtleties (lit: sound-suggestions) this orchestra is capable of (producing), although Ravel's icy diablerie in dance (Tanzdämonie) was thrown together (lit: into one pot) with the far more obvious (lit: in the foreground) turbulence, say, of the Three Places of New England by Charles Ives. fu.

translated by Ralph Locke

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 166,2
— lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Rundschau, Frankfurt/Main
vom 19. April 1971

Konzert für Konduktor

3

Vom Boston Symphony-Orchestra in Höchst begleitet

Vor zwei Jahren begann Michael Tilson Thomas, der junge Musikstar aus Hollywood, als Pianist und Dirigierassistent der Boston Symphony Chamber Players seine Kometenkarriere, und bald danach rückte er vor zum „Associate Conductor" des Boston Symphony Orchestra, zur stellvertretenden „rechten Hand" des Chefdirigenten William Steinberg. In der Jahrhunderthalle Hoechst — einer Gastspielstation der ausgedehnten Europatournee, die das berühmte Orchester zur Feier seines 90jährigen Bestehens derzeit absolviert — zeigte sich freilich, daß Master Thomas für seine Dirigierleidenschaft weit mehr als nur die Taktstockhand braucht. Warum auch nicht? Vielleicht ist man in Boston der Ansicht, einem erst 26jährigen Ausdrucksgenie dürften schlagtechnische Fesseln keineswegs angelegt werden, und sowohl ihm als auch dem Publikum sei die Schau hemmungslosen Expressionpumpens aus Armen und Beinen, knieweich mit federnder und elektrisiert um sich werfender Klangrauschgebärden, sehr wohl zu gönnen. Zumal ein so durchtrainierter Instrumentalkörper wie der Bostoner für unverbrüchliche Spielpräzision schon selber aufkäme. Ja, wenn dem so wäre.

In der Tat schlug es Schumanns „Rheinischer" Sinfonie gar nicht gut an, daß sie eingangs sozusagen als „Concerto for the Conductor" (mit obligater Streicher- und Bläserbegleitung) herhalten mußte. Im Auditiven wirkte diese „visible music" arg lau und verwaschen, rhythmisch unbestimmt, mitunter trivial melodieselig, ohne Rückgrat in der Hauptthematik des Kopfsatzes wie in der es-Moll-Sakralsprache des 4. Satzes.

Als Thomas dann von seiner Solistenrolle etwas abrückte, dem Konzertmeister Joseph Silverstein als Geiger des Tschaikowsky-Violinkonzerts die Vorhand ließ und bemüht war, einigermaßen akkurat die Begleittempi anzugeben, kam keinerlei agogische Dynamik im Orchester auf; der Solopart — ohnehin eher gekonnt gefiedelt als bedeutungsvoll interpretiert, mit Bravourton zwar, aber bar jeglicher anrührenden Pathetik — wurde so grobkörnig, so unstrukturiert flächenhaft untermalt wie von einem drittklassigen Korrepetitor am Klavier.

Darauf „La Valse" von Ravel: Sie gab zu erkennen, zu welchen phänomenalen Klangsuggestionen dieses Orchester fähig ist, obwohl Ravels eisige Tanzdämonie mit der weit vordergründigeren Turbulenz etwa der „Three Places of New England" von Charles Ives in einen Topf geworfen wurde. fu.

Frankfurter Rundschau
April 19, 1971

Concerto for Conductor

Accompanied by the Boston
Boston Symphony Orchestra in
Höchst Centenary Hall

Two years ago Michael Tilson Thomas, the young star-musician (Musikstar) from Hollywood, began his meteoric career as pianist and assistant director of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, and soon thereafter he moved on to Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the acting right-hand-man of Conductor William Steinberg. In the Höchst Centenary Hall--one stop of the extended European tour which the orchestra is just now finishing in celebration of its 90th Anniversary--it became evident indeed that Master Thomas needs far more for his conducting passion than just his baton-hand. Well, why not? Perhaps in Boston one is of the opinion that a merely 26-year-old expressive genius should in no way be subjected to the shackles of time-beating and that he himself as well as the audience should not be denied the exhibition of uninhibited expressive pumping of the arms and legs, weak-at-the-knees, with bouncy, electrically-charged delirious gestures (lit: gestures of one in a delirium of sound) tossed around here and there. Besides, an instrumental body as thoroughly trained as the Boston could itself take care of (maintaining) absolute precision in playing. Oh, if it could only be!

In fact, it did not serve Schumann's Rhenish Symphony at all well that the work had to be treated (lit: suffer, bear up) as, so to speak, a "Concerto for the Conductor" (with obbligato string and wind accompaniment.) To the ear, this "visible music" had a destructively (lit: grossly, viciously) tepid and washed-out effect, rhythmically indefinite, now and then with a trivial melodic felicity, (but) without backbone in the main thematic material of the first movement as well as in the e-flat minor religious language of the fourth movement.

When Thomas then stepped back from his solo role somewhat, let Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein call the cards as violinist in the Tchaikovsky Concerto and (instead) took pains to indicate the accompaniment tempi with some degree of precision, there (still) appeared no agogic dynamics (? - If this means anything, it is some kind of rhythmic impulse or forward motion.) in the orchestra. The solo part--in any case (merely) competently fiddled ~~Rather than~~ rather than meaningfully interpreted, admittedly with a bravura tone but devoid of any touching pathos--was so coarsely, so superficially accompanied, without (a sense of) structure, as if by a third-class rehearsal pianist at the keyboard.

After that, Ravel's La Valse made recognizable what phenomenal tonal subtleties (lit: sound-suggestions) this orchestra is capable of (producing), although Ravel's icy diablerie in dance (Tanzdämonie) was thrown together (lit: into one pot) with the far more obvious (lit: in the foreground) turbulence, say, of the Three Places of New England by Charles Ives. fu.

translated by Ralph Locke

108

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 110,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Allgemeine Zeitung, Mainz

vom 17. April 1971

3

Gäste aus Boston

In der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle

Eines der berühmtesten und traditionsreichsten Orchester der Neuen Welt unter der Leitung eines sehr jungen Dirigenten zu erleben: diese nicht alltägliche Gelegenheit bot das Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Michael Tilson Thomas. Die Bostoner Symphoniker, aus Anlaß ihres 90jährigen Bestehens auf ihrer dritten Europa-Tournee, machten in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle Station, und daß sie in der Tat einer der glänzendsten, technisch wie musikalisch perfektesten Klangkörper sind — davon konnte man sich an diesem Abend hinreichend überzeugen. Man weiß nicht, was man an diesem Orchester am meisten bewundern soll: die prachtvoll ausgeglichenen Instrumentengruppen, den wunderbar geschlossenen Streicherklang, die sonore Fülle der Bläser (deren Blech allerdings an diesem Abend — vermutlich ganz unprogrammgemäß — nicht immer mit der wünschenswerten Präzision „ansprach"), den insgesamt voluminösen, weichen und sauberen Ton, die ungeheure, schlafwandlerische Routine schließlich, die durch nichts zu erschüttern ist.

Michael Tilson Thomas, der 26jährige Nachwuchsdirigent, der das Orchester im Wechsel mit William Steinberg leitet, ist mit manchen Vorschußlorbeeren bedacht worden — nicht zuletzt wegen seiner Schallplattenaufnahmen; aber sein Dirigat vollzieht sich — zunächst — doch eher im fruchtbaren Grenzgebiet zwischen Versprechen und Erfüllung, als daß es bereits die Erfüllung selbst sein könnte. Viel dirigentische Energie und Gestik werden, so scheint es, in die Schaustellung investiert, wobei das Spektrum der Schlagtechnik und Zeichengebung in Wirklichkeit gar nicht so groß ist; es erschöpft sich zumeist in weit ausgreifenden, schwingenden, im Grunde aber stereotypen Bewegungen der Arme und bisweilen des Oberkörpers, von denen nur bedingt eine differenziertere „Mitteilung" ausgeht.

Das Ergebnis, zumindest bei Schumanns Rheinischer Symphonie, war denn auch entsprechend. Man vermißte den von hinreißendem Schwung getragenen romantischen Höhenflug im allzu behäbigen Einleitungssatz ebenso wie manche kontrapunktische Verzahnung und dynamische Nuancierung in den mittleren Sätzen; das Finale, dem auch die intensivste Darstellung nicht das fehlende, notwendige Gewicht im Gesamtaufbau geben kann, war — trotz grandioser Steigerung der Stretta — einfach zu langsam, während der großartig aufgebaute und zusammengehaltene langsame (vierte) Satz restlos zu überzeugen vermochte.

Joseph Silverstein, der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, war der Solist im Violinkonzert von Tschaikowsky, das eine ebenso klare wie wohlakzentuierte und temperamentvolle Darstellung fand. Silverstein erwies sich als nahezu idealer Interpret des Konzerts: mit stets präsentem, erfülltem Ton und einer warmleuchtenden, beseelten und zugleich verhaltenen Gesanglichkeit spielte er seinen Part — eine Deutung von imponierender Geschlossenheit, Konsequenz und Vitalität, die in der ausgewogen-diskreten, stets disziplinierten Begleitung ihre prägnante Entsprechung fand: glänzende Ehrenrettung eines vermeintlichen Reißers und Nur-Virtuosenstücks, dessen ungeheure technische Ansprüche gleichsam wie „beiläufig" erfüllt worden waren.

Ravels Tondichtung „La Valse", die rauschhafte, ironisch-phantastische Apotheose auf den Wiener Walzer, setzte den Schlußpunkt. Verständlich, daß Dirigent und Orchester bei diesem Werk — mit seiner unerschöpflichen Klangphantasie und nervösen Spannung, seiner schwelgerisch-bizarren Farbenpracht und raffinierten Phantastik — ganz in ihrem Element waren. Eine überwältigende Intensität bestimmte die Wiedergabe, und man wäre wunschlos glücklich gewesen, wenn die Ausdrucksschwingungen dieser unauslotbar genialen Partitur in etwas biegsameren Tempi herausgearbeitet worden wären, ohne die einzelnen Abschnitte so starr und agogisch unflexibel nebeneinanderzustellen, wie es hier bisweilen der Fall war. — Frenetischer Beifall eines begeisterten Publikums, das vergeblich nach einem Dakapo verlangte: „La Valse" hatte, wie stets, seine „erschlagende" Wirkung nicht verfehlt . . .

WERNER MATTHES

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Foto: privat

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 166,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Frankfurter Rundschau, Frankfurt/Main

vom 20. April 1971

Junge Franzosen in Griesheim

3

Sie waren im Zoo und fuhren auf dem Rhein

Zum viertenmal führte die Emil-von-Behring-Schule in Griesheim einen Schüleraustausch innerhalb der deutsch-französischen Verständigung durch. Vom 4. bis 18. April waren 25 junge Franzosen aus Chateau-Chinon in Burgund im Alter von 14 bis 16 Jahren gerngesehene Gäste in Griesheimer Familien. Bis auf zwei waren sie zum erstenmal in Deutschland, und da sie in einer Kleinstadt aufwachsen, waren Palmengarten, Zoo und Besuch der Oper (Rigoletto) höchst eindrucksvolle Stationen ihres Aufenthalts. Sie wurden im Römer empfangen, machten eine Rheinfahrt nach St. Goarshausen, besichtigten die Farbwerke Hoechst und konnten das Konzert des Bostoner Sinfonieorchesters in der Jahrhunderthalle besuchen.

Fröhlich und unbeschwert gestaltete sich ein Abend mit Eltern. Wenn's auch mit der Verständigung anfangs nicht immer klappen wollte, verlief der Aufenthalt innerhalb der Familien recht harmonisch, und die gegenseitigen Sprachkenntnisse nahmen erfreulich zu.

Der deutsche Gegenbesuch von 25 Behring-Schülern ist vom 19. Mai bis 4. Juni geplant. Er sieht als Höhepunkte zwei Tage Aufenthalt in Paris vor. Der Chateau-Chinon — Griesheim-Austausch, aus der Initiative der Lehrer beider Schulen entstanden, in unzähligen Dias festgehalten, ist heute schon ein abendfüllendes Programm.

E —s

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 57,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Wiesbadener Kurier, Wiesbaden

19. April 1971

Jahrhunderthalle

3

Emphase und Disziplin

Zwei bedeutende Orchester

Michael Tilson Thomas, 26jähriger Nachwuchsdirigent beim Boston Symphony Orchestra, hat das Talent zum Publikumsliebling. Und in Boston glaubt man, daß er auch darüberhinaus Talent, ja Genie habe. In der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle mochte man bei seinem Gastspiel mit dem amerikanischen Renommierorchester am Genie seine Zweifel haben. Unübersehbar freilich war, wie Michael Tilson Thomas sich auf dem Podium in Szene zu setzen vermochte, wie er mit ausufernder Gestik das große Gefühl deklarierte und das Publikum zu emphatischen Zuschauern zu machen verstand. Der Effekt seiner Anstrengungen ist karger als man glaubt.

Dennoch war erstaunlich, wie ein so qualifiziertes Orchester in Schumanns dritter Sinfonie in Es op. 97 („Rheinische") herunterkommen kann. So grob und undifferenziert hätten sie ohne Dirigenten zweifellos nie gespielt. So aber jagte Thomas diesen herrlichen Apparat mit seinem standhaften Streicherglanz und dem immer noch imponierenden Blech von einem bedeutungsschweren Forte ins nächste. Es ist zwar überliefert, daß gerade Tschaikowsky von dieser Sinfonie schwärmte. Aber Thomas irrt, wenn er die „Rheinische" deswegen für Tschaikowsky hält.

Die nicht gerade variantenreiche Technik von Michael Tilson Thomas, die vor allem vom forcierten Ausdruck lebt, fügt sich indes sichtlich besser ein, wo es zu begleiten gilt. Thomas kann sich geschickt unterordnen. Das bekam der Konzertmeister Joseph Silverstein zu spüren, der mit sehr schönem, nur zuweilen an den technischen Anforderungen zerbrechendem Ton Tschaikowskys Violinkonzert spielte. Die noble, sehr kluge Gestaltung dieses Konzerts durch Silverstein wurde nie durchs Orchester ernsthaft gefährdet.

Dafür holte Thomas bei Ravels „La Valse" zum großen Schlag aus. Wenn er den einfachen Rittberger sprang oder volley eine Rückhand ins Orchester setzte, war was los. Nur dürfte Ravel um einiges raffinierter klingen, durchtriebener und flexibler.

*

Ein Orchester ganz anderer Art lernte man zwei Abende später kennen: die Sinfoniker des Staatlichen Rumänischen Rundfunks Bukarest unter Josif Conta, einem Grandseigneur von gebändigtem Temperament. An diesem Abend herrschte die Form. Aber sie wurde belebt durch einen ganz intensiven, vibrierenden Klang, der von Conta stimuliert und von dem vorzüglichen Orchester nervös aufgenommen wird. Das ist kein Apparat, dem Perfektion über alles geht. Hier spürt man die musikantische Auseinandersetzung des einzelnen mit Musik noch in den Streichermassen.

Aufschlußreich wurde so wieder einmal die Begegnung mit George Enescu, dem großen, hier fast unbekannten rumänischen Komponisten. Seine Rhapsodie Nr. 2 op. 11 ist sicher der Tradition mehr verpflichtet als dem Experiment mit neuen Klängen. Aber dennoch ergeben sich aus einer immer stärker sich durchwirkenden Polyphonie frappierende Konstellationen.

Ein Fest der Virtuosen wurde Respighis symphonische Dichtung „Feste Romane". Der Virtuose Conta stellte bei dieser Gelegenheit seine Blechbläser vor, die allerlei Kapriolen auf dem fröhlichen Jahrmarkt Resphighis vollführten.

Ion Voicu nahm sich danach Paganini vor. Der staunenswerte rumänische Violinvirtuose ist längst über die technischen Tricks Paganinis hinaus. So verleiht er dem Konzert Nr. 1 in D-Dur alle Süße des Ariosen, zaubert Melos noch aus den vertrackten Doppelgriffen und delikaten Flageoletts, macht eine ganz beseeligende Musik aus diesen paar Seiten purer Artistik. Und bei dem wunderbaren Seitenthema des Maestoso, das geradewegs aus der Oper kommt, leuchtet der ganz edle Ton um so heller auf.

Zum Schluß Straussens Eulenspiegelei op. 28. Das Raffinement des ständig changierenden Hintergrunds, die Farbwechsel, die den gelehrten Kontrapunkt verzaubern — alles kann mit Intelligenz und Intensität, und es hätte nur eine Spur nonchalanter sein können. Aber dafür wirkt Josif Conta zu aristokratisch, zu streng und beherrscht bei aller Vitalität. Was, wie gesagt, der Struktur so komplizierter Werke nur zugute kommt. ly

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 56,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Darmstädter Echo, Darmstadt

vom 20. April 1971

3

Dirigiergymnastik

Das „Boston Symphony Orchestra" in Höchst

Das „Boston Symphony Orchestra" schätzt man nicht nur als eines der besten Orchester Amerikas, man zählt es auch mit vieler Berechtigung in die Spitzengruppe der internationalen Konzertorchester-Konkurrenz. Bestürzung und Widerspruch erregen mußte daher die neuerliche Begegnung mit diesem Klangkörper gelegentlich eines Europa-Tournee-Konzerts in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle, denn an diesem Abend stand vor dem Orchester Michael Tilson Thomas: ein sehr junger Dirigent, dem es gewiß nicht an Begabung, wohl aber vorläufig noch an jeglichem Gefühl für großräumige formale Gestaltung wie für Ökonomie in der dirigentischen Zeichengebung fehlt. Was er sich an unentwegtem Flügelschlagen beider Arme, Hin- und Herhüpfen auf dem Dirigentenpodest leistete, erinnerte stark an die Liebestänze gewisser Stelzvögel zur Brunstzeit. Man weiß, was der Orchestermusiker von derlei Dirigiergymnastik hält: nichts. So auch hier. Völlig unbeeindruckt von der ekstatischen Zeichengebung des Dirigenten, spielten die „Bostoner" die an den Anfang des Programms gestellte Es-Dur-Symphonie Robert Schumanns herunter: schön und sonor, präzise und kultiviert. Bei der Interpretation von Maurice Ravels „La Valse" gaben dann auch sie ihren „Affen Zucker", wodurch eine phonstarke Gaudi herauskam ohne eine Spur vom Esprit dieser mehr an Waldteufel als an Johann Strauss orientierten Walzer-Parodie.

Ein völlig verwandeltes Orchester erlebte man indessen bei der Begleitung von Tschaikowskys D-Dur-Violinkonzert. Hier folgten die Musiker ihrem Konzertmeister, der den Solopart innehatte, und taten damit ihrem Rang und Ruf alle nur mögliche Ehre an, denn fern von billigen geigerischen Mätzchen, wofür dieses Konzert ja bekanntermaßen einen sicheren Aufhänger abgeben kann, musizierte Joseph Silverstein in wahrhaft adeliger Weise. Er war der Glanzpunkt des Abends. Als dominierend blieb zurück der Eindruck einer Dirigentenpantomime mit symphonischem Background, zu welchem Mißbrauch sich ein Orchester vom Niveau der Bostoner Symphoniker für zu gut halten sollte.

Paul Cadow

110

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 27,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Wiesbadener Tageblatt, Wiesbaden

17 April 19..

Zwischen Versprechen und Erfüllung

Michael Tilson Thomas und das Boston Symphony Orchestra in Höchst

Eines der berühmtesten und traditionsreichsten Orchester der Neuen Welt unter der Leitung eines sehr jungen Dirigenten zu erleben: diese nicht alltägliche Gelegenheit bot das Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Michael Tilson Thomas. Die Bostoner Symphoniker, aus Anlaß ihres 90jährigen Bestehens auf ihrer dritten Europa-Tournee, machten in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle Station, und daß sie in der Tat einer der glänzendsten, technisch wie musikalisch perfektesten Klangkörper sind — davon konnte man sich an diesem Abend hinreichend überzeugen. Man weiß nicht, was man an diesem Orchester am meisten bewundern soll: die prachtvoll ausgeglichenen Instrumentengruppen, den wunderbar geschlossenen Streicherklang, die sonore Fülle der Bläser (deren Blech allerdings an diesem Abend — vermutlich ganz unprogrammgemäß — nicht immer mit der wünschenswerten Präzision „ansprach"), den insgesamt voluminösen, weichen und sauberen Ton, die ungeheure, schlafwandlerische Routine schließlich, die durch nichts zu erschüttern ist.

Michael Tilson Thomas, der 26jährige Nachwuchsdirigent, der das Orchester im Wechsel mit William Steinberg leitet, ist mit manchen Vorschußlorbeeren bedacht worden — nicht zuletzt wegen seiner Schallplattenaufnahmen; aber sein Dirigat vollzieht sich — zunächst — doch eher im fruchtbaren Grenzgebiet zwischen Versprechen und Erfüllung, als daß es bereits die Erfüllung selbst sein könnte. Viel dirigentische Energie und Gestik werden, so scheint es, in die Schaustellung investiert, wobei das Spektrum der Schlagtechnik und Zeichengebung in Wirklichkeit gar nicht so groß ist; es erschöpft sich zumeist in weit ausgreifenden, schwingenden, im Grunde aber stereotypen Bewegungen der Arme und bisweilen des Oberkörpers, von denen nur bedingt eine differenziertere „Mitteilung" ausgeht.

Das Ergebnis, zumindest bei Schumanns Rheinischer Symphonie, war denn auch entsprechend. Man vermißte den von hinreißendem Schwung getragenen romantischen Höhenflug im allzu behäbigen Einleitungssatz ebenso wie manche kontrapunktische Verzahnung und dynamische Nuancierung in den mittleren Sätzen; das Finale, dem auch die intensivste Darstellung nicht das fehlende, notwendige Gewicht im Gesamtaufbau geben kann, war — trotz grandioser Steigerung der Stretta — einfach zu langsam, während der großartig aufgebaute und zusammengehaltene langsame (vierte) Satz restlos zu überzeugen vermochte.

Joseph Silverstein, der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, war der Solist im Violinkonzert von Tschaikowsky, das eine ebenso klare wie wohlakzentuierte und temperamentvolle Darstellung fand. Silverstein erwies sich als nahezu idealer Interpret des Konzerts: mit stets präsentem, erfülltem Ton und einer warmleuchtenden, beseelten und zugleich verhaltenen Gesanglicheit spielte er seinen Part — eine Deutung von imponierender Geschlossenheit, Konsequenz und Vitalität, die in der ausgewogen-diskreten, stets disziplinierten Begleitung ihre prägnante Entsprechung fand: glänzende Ehrenrettung eines vermeintlichen Reißers und Nur-Virtuosenstücks, dessen ungeheure technische Ansprüche gleichsam wie „beiläufig" erfüllt worden waren.

Ravels Tondichtung „La Valse", die rauschhafte, ironisch-phantastische Apotheose auf den Wiener Walzer, setzte den Schlußpunkt. Verständlich, daß Dirigent und Orchester bei diesem Werk — mit seiner unerschöpflichen Klangphantasie und nervösen Spannung, seiner schwelgerisch-bizarren Farbenpracht und raffinierten Phantastik — ganz in ihrem Element waren. Eine überwältigende Intensität bestimmte die Wiedergabe, und man wäre wunschlos glücklich gewesen, wenn die Ausdrucksschwingungen dieser unauslotbar genialen Partitur in etwas biegsameren Tempi herausgearbeitet worden wären, ohne die einzelnen Abschnitte so starr und agogisch unflexibel nebeneinanderzustellen, wie es hier bisweilen der Fall war. — Frenetischer Beifall eines begeisterten Publikums, das vergeblich nach einem Dakapo verlangte: „La Valse" hatte, wie stets, seine „erschlagende" Wirkung nicht verfehlt . . .

WERNER MATTHES

INCORRECT PAGINATION

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (t. Ts.): 52,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Offenbach-Post, Offenbach
vom -3. April 1971

Michael Tilson Thomas dirigiert in der Jahrhunderthalle

Nachwuchskünstler am Pult der Bostoner

Junger Künstler machte Karriere

Michael Tilson Thomas ist einer der begabtesten Dirigenten der jungen Generation. William Steinberg, Chefdirigent der Bostoner Symphoniker, hat sich die Mitarbeit des Nachwuchsmusikers Thomas gesichert. Das ruhmreiche Orchester von Weltgeltung feiert sein 90jähriges Bestehen. Aus diesem Anlaß begibt es sich auf Europa-Tournee. Am 15. April konzertieren die Instrumentalisten in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle. Interpretiert werden Schumanns 3. Symphonie, Ravels „La Valse" und Tschaikowskys Violinkonzert. Es dirigiert Michael Tilson Thomas.

Der junge Thomas wurde bereits 1966 bei uns bekannt. Als Assistent von Pierre Boulez kam er nach Bayreuth. Zwei Jahre später wurde der junge aus Hollywood gebürtige Künstler mit dem Koussevitzky-Preis ausgezeichnet. 1969 engagierte das Boston Symphony Orchestra den jungen Dirigenten und Pianisten als Assistenten. Kaum einen Monat nach Beginn seiner Tätigkeit dirigierte Michael Tilson Thomas für den erkrankten William Steinberg ein Konzert in der Philharmonic Hall im New Yorker Lincoln Center. Sein Erfolg war riesengroß. Thomas konnte ihn in der Carnegie Hall wiederholen.

In über dreißig Konzerten dirigierte Thomas die Bostoner Symphoniker.

Dieser junge Künstler machte Karriere. Seine Erfolgskurve führt steil nach oben.

Wer Thomas und die Bostoner zu Hause erleben will, kann die Grammophon-LP 2530 078 erstehen. Thomas und die Bostoner interpretieren Tschaikowskys Symphonie Nr. 1 g-Moll op. 13 „Winter-Träume", ein Opus, das als Keimzelle künftiger Größe Tschaikowskys gelten darf. Der russische Komponist führte hier den Orchesterwalzer in die symphonische Großform ein. Die Aufnahmetechnik läßt keine Wünsche offen. Elsbet Kern

111

Offenbach Post
19.4.1971

Pantomime am Dirigentenpult

Michael Tilson Thomas dirigierte die Bostoner

Sein Ruf und eine gut eingespielte Publicity waren ihm vorausgeeilt auf seiner Tournee durch einige europäische Länder: dem Boston Symphony Orchestra, das am Donnerstagabend in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle zu Gast war. Die Bostoner weilen nicht zum erstenmal in Europa. Der Dirigent des Abends, der 26jährige Michael Tilson Thomas, gibt jedoch sein europäisches Debut. Er teilt sich mit William Steinberg, dem Chefdirigenten, in die Stabführung. Den Musikfreunden im Rhein-Main-Gebiet präsentierten die Bostoner den jungen Thomas. Vom weitaus überwiegenden Teil des Publikums wurde er stürmisch gefeiert, eine Minderheit schwankte zwischen Skepsis und Ironie.

Der Abend war in mehrfacher Weise bemerkenswert. Da ist das Orchester, ein Phänomen an technischer Brillanz, verbunden mit einer überwältigenden Dynamik. Und doch ist dieses Orchester weder intellektuell überstrapaziert noch verzichtet es auf Romantik in des Wortes weitester Bedeutung. Schumanns dritte Sinfonie in Es-Dur, die „Rheinische", vom Komponisten etwas zerfahren zwischen Feierlichkeit und Volkstümlichkeit angesiedelt, gewann unter Thomas hörbar an Kontur. Der Synkopenrhythmus, der dem ersten der aus fünf Sätzen bestehenden Sinfonie das Gepräge gibt, das Posaunen-Adagio im dritten Satz und der lebhafte Schlußsatz wurden mit fast Brucknerscher Eindringlichkeit interpretiert. Der weitgehende Verzicht auf „rheinischen Frohsinn", besonders im zweiten Satz, ist dem Werk durchaus bekommen.

Die Bostoner nahmen nach der Pause einen Brauch wieder auf, der früher auch bei uns geübt wurde, im Zeichen der großen Stars aber heute kaum noch praktiziert wird: Sie ließen ein Mitglied des Orchesters als Solisten auftreten. In diesem Falle war es Joseph Silverstein, der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, der Tschaikowskys berühmtes Konzert für Violine und Orchester D-Dur, op. 35 spielte. Ein dreisätziger, leidenschaftlicher Dialog zwischen Orchester und Violine, der besonders in den Kadenzen des ersten Satzes und bei den sogenannten Doppelgriffen dem Geiger technische Fertigkeiten abverlangt, die zeitweise als unspielbar galten. Silverstein, von Natur aus ein einfühlsamer und eher zurückhaltender Musikant, steigerte sich streckenweise in eine halsbrecherische Virtuosität, die den Zuschauer den Atem anhalten ließ. Doch es ging soweit alles gut.

Das abschließende Werk, La Valse von Maurice Ravel, gibt Gelegenheit, sich näher mit dem Dirigenten zu befassen, denn hier wurde in Reinkultur geboten, was von der Kritik als Parterre-Akrobatik bezeichnet zu werden pflegt. Michael Tilson Thomas dürfte der tänzerischste aller Dirigenten der Gegenwart sein. Er gibt dem Publikum eine überzeugende Darbietung als Pantomime, er hüpft von einer Seite des Podiums zur anderen, reißt die Arme in den Himmel, schwingt Bögen gewaltigen Ausmaßes, dabei auf den Zehenspitzen stehend, beugt sich bis fast zum Überkippen ins Orchester, rudert, schwingt, stelzt, schreitet, hüpft, ficht, stößt zu — eine faszinierende Darbietung am Pult. Wir sagen dies ohne jede Ironie, denn Thomas ist kein Schauspieler. Er will sich nicht produzieren, sondern er produziert mit jeder Faser auch seiner Physis. Er ist ganz Musik, er beschwört sein Orchester mit seinen Tänzen — und entscheidend ist das Ergebnis: die Intensität einer Interpretation, die bei La Valse kaum noch übertroffen werden kann.

Der weitaus größte Teil der Zuhörer erfaßte denn auch richtig die unerhörte musikalische Leistung hinter dem Pantomimischen und rief und klatschte begeistert Beifall — einem außergewöhnlichen Dirigenten und einem herrlich altmodischen Orchester, das es sich nicht nehmen läßt, bei aller Perfektion beim Musikmachen auch Gefühle zu zeigen. tk.

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (l. Ts.): 202,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Abendpost-Nachtausgabe
Frankfurt/Main

3

Es kam ein Dirigent und tanzte

Die verwelkten Vorschußlorbeeren des M.T.T.

Das neunzig Jahre alte Boston Symphony Orchester gastierte auf seiner diesjährigen Europatournee in den deutschen Städten Hamburg, Bonn (wo die Gattin des Senators Edward Kennedy das russische Märchen vom „Peter und dem Wolf" zu Musik rezitierte) und Frankfurt. Das 100 Musiker starke Orchester wurde in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle mit herzlichstem Beifall vom gut wattierten Haus empfangen und mit enthusiastischem Applaus, der es allerdings zu keiner Zugabe verleiten konnte, verabschiedet.

Leider stand in Frankfurt nicht der mit der Stadt durch seine Ehrenmitgliedschaft bei den Städtischen Bühnen besonders verbundene Chefdirigent William Steinberg, sondern der in einer echt amerikanischen Blitzkarriere emporgekommene Michael Tilson Thomas am Dirigentenpult. Die vor dem Gastspiel reichlich verteilten Vorschußlorbeeren für den jungen Mann — er ist ein Endzwanziger — welkten allerdings schnell, als er sich nach wenigen Takten der „Dritten" Robert Schumanns als ein ausgesprochener Schaudirigent präsentierte.

Thomas mag, das sei gar nicht bestritten, ein großes Dirigiertalent sein. Ein Dirigent im Sinne der Bezeichnung eines genialen Interpreten oder Orchestererziehers ist er kaum. Seine hektisch manierierte Dirigierweise mit ständig herumfuchtelnden Armen, unentwegt in zuckenden Bewegungen sich biegendem Oberkörper, sein ewiges Tänzeln auf dem Podium soll den Eindruck erwecken, als beeinflusse er das Orchester zu irgendwelchen besonderen Taten. Was dabei herauskommt, ist leider nicht mehr als ein in ununterbrochenem Fortissimo über den Hörer dahinbrausender Tonbrei, aus dem thematische Gebilde nur ganz selten einmal zu hören sind.

Dynamische Vorschriften der Komponisten, wie etwa das dreifache Pianissimo Schumanns im fünften Takt vor Schluß des dritten Satzes, stören ihn nicht im mindesten. Er bleibt immer im Forte.

Den Solopart in Tschaikowskys „Violinkonzert" spielte der Erste Konzertmeister des Orchesters, Joseph Silverstein. Ein dünnes Tönchen, das schon in der ersten Hochparkettreihe aus der von Thomas überraschend zurückgehaltenen Orchesterbegleitung nicht immer ganz sauber in den raschen Läufen klang und sich die vorgeschriebenen Mehrfachgriffe erleichterte, konnte den Ansprüchen des Komponisten nur sehr bedingt genügen. Mr. Silverstein ist sicher ein ausgezeichneter Konzertmeister — ein Solist ist er nicht.

Aus der den Abend abschließenden „La Valse" von Ravel, in der Thomas noch einmal seine ganze choreographische Kunststückchensammlung produzierte, wurde ein billiger Rausschmeißer. Die brillante Feuerwerksinstrumentation verleitet ja leicht zu diesen raffinierten Klangextremen.

Erstaunlich ist und bleibt, daß sich ein deutsches Konzertpublikum so leicht von solcher dirigentischen Firlefanzerei bluffen läßt.

111

Offenbach Post
19.4.1971

Pantomime am Dirigentenpult

Michael Tilson Thomas dirigierte die Bostoner

Sein Ruf und eine gut eingespielte Publicity waren ihm vorausgeeilt auf seiner Tournee durch einige europäische Länder: dem Boston Symphony Orchestra, das am Donnerstagabend in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle zu Gast war. Die Bostoner weilen nicht zum erstenmal in Europa. Der Dirigent des Abends, der 26jährige Michael Tilson Thomas, gibt jedoch sein europäisches Debut. Er teilt sich mit William Steinberg, dem Chefdirigenten, in die Stabführung. Den Musikfreunden im Rhein-Main-Gebiet präsentierten die Bostoner den jungen Thomas. Vom weitaus überwiegenden Teil des Publikums wurde er stürmisch gefeiert, eine Minderheit schwankte zwischen Skepsis und Ironie.

Der Abend war in mehrfacher Weise bemerkenswert. Da ist das Orchester, ein Phänomen an technischer Brillanz, verbunden mit einer überwältigenden Dynamik. Und doch ist dieses Orchester weder intellektuell überstrapaziert noch verzichtet es auf Romantik in des Wortes weitester Bedeutung. Schumanns dritte Sinfonie in Es-Dur, die „Rheinische", vom Komponisten etwas zerfahren zwischen Feierlichkeit und Volkstümlichkeit angesiedelt, gewann unter Thomas hörbar an Kontur. Der Synkopenrhythmus, der dem ersten der aus fünf Sätzen bestehenden Sinfonie das Gepräge gibt, das Posaunen-Adagio im dritten Satz und der lebhafte Schlußsatz wurden mit fast Brucknerscher Eindringlichkeit interpretiert. Der weitgehende Verzicht auf „rheinischen Frohsinn", besonders im zweiten Satz, ist dem Werk durchaus bekommen.

Die Bostoner nahmen nach der Pause einen Brauch wieder auf, der früher auch bei uns geübt wurde, im Zeichen der großen Stars aber heute kaum noch praktiziert wird: Sie ließen ein Mitglied des Orchesters als Solisten auftreten. In diesem Falle war es Joseph Silverstein, der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, der Tschaikowskys berühmtes Konzert für Violine und Orchester D-Dur, op. 35 spielte. Ein dreisätziger, leidenschaftlicher Dialog zwischen Orchester und Violine, der besonders in den Kadenzen des ersten Satzes und bei den sogenannten Doppelgriffen dem Geiger technische Fertigkeiten abverlangt, die zeitweise als unspielbar galten. Silverstein, von Natur aus ein einfühlsamer und eher zurückhaltender Musikant, steigerte sich streckenweise in eine halsbrecherische Virtuosität, die den Zuschauer den Atem anhalten ließ. Doch es ging soweit alles gut.

Das abschließende Werk, La Valse von Maurice Ravel, gibt Gelegenheit, sich näher mit dem Dirigenten zu befassen, denn hier wurde in Reinkultur geboten, was von der Kritik als Parterre-Akrobatik bezeichnet zu werden pflegt. Michael Tilson Thomas dürfte der tänzerischste aller Dirigenten der Gegenwart sein. Er gibt dem Publikum eine überzeugende Darbietung als Pantomime, er hüpft von einer Seite des Podiums zur anderen, reißt die Arme in den Himmel, schwingt Bögen gewaltigen Ausmaßes, dabei auf den Zehenspitzen stehend, beugt sich bis fast zum Überkippen ins Orchester, rudert, schwingt, stelzt, schreitet, hüpft, ficht, stößt zu — eine faszinierende Darbietung am Pult. Wir sagen dies ohne jede Ironie, denn Thomas ist kein Schauspieler. Er will sich nicht produzieren, sondern er produziert mit jeder Faser auch seiner Physis. Er ist ganz Musik, er beschwört sein Orchester mit seinen Tänzen — und entscheidend ist das Ergebnis: die Intensität einer Interpretation, die bei La Valse kaum noch übertroffen werden kann.

Der weitaus größte Teil der Zuhörer erfaßte denn auch richtig die unerhörte musikalische Leistung hinter dem Pantomimischen und rief und klatschte begeistert Beifall — einem außergewöhnlichen Dirigenten und einem herrlich altmodischen Orchester, das es sich nicht nehmen läßt, bei aller Perfektion beim Musikmachen auch Gefühle zu zeigen. tk.

---

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 202,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Abendpost-Nachtausgabe
Frankfurt/Main 17. April 1971

3

Es kam ein Dirigent und tanzte

Die verwelkten Vorschußlorbeeren des M.T.T.

Das neunzig Jahre alte Boston Symphony Orchester gastierte auf seiner diesjährigen Europatournee in den deutschen Städten Hamburg, Bonn (wo die Gattin des Senators Edward Kennedy das russische Märchen vom „Peter und dem Wolf" zu Musik rezitierte) und Frankfurt. Das 108 Musiker starke Orchester wurde in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle mit herzlichstem Beifall vom gut wattierten Haus empfangen und mit enthusiastischem Applaus, der es allerdings zu keiner Zugabe verleiten konnte, verabschiedet.

Leider stand in Frankfurt nicht der mit der Stadt durch seine Ehrenmitgliedschaft bei den Städtischen Bühnen besonders verbundene Chefdirigent William Steinberg, sondern der in einer echt amerikanischen Blitzkarriere emporgekommene Michael Tilson Thomas am Dirigentenpult. Die vor dem Gastspiel reichlich verteilten Vorschußlorbeeren für den jungen Mann — er ist ein Endzwanziger — welkten allerdings schnell, als er sich nach wenigen Takten der „Dritten" Robert Schumanns als ein ausgesprochener Schaudirigent präsentierte.

Thomas mag, das sei gar nicht bestritten, ein großes Dirigiertalent sein. Ein Dirigent im Sinne der Bezeichnung eines genialen Interpreten oder Orchestererziehers ist er kaum. Seine hektisch manierierte Dirigierweise mit ständig herumfuchtelnden Armen, unentwegt in zuckenden Bewegungen sich biegendem Oberkörper, sein ewiges Tänzeln auf dem Podium soll den Eindruck erwecken, als beeinflusse er das Orchester zu irgendwelchen besonderen Taten. Was dabei herauskommt, ist leider nicht mehr als ein in ununterbrochenem Fortissimo über den Hörer dahinbrausender Tonbrei, aus dem thematische Gebilde nur ganz selten einmal zu hören sind.

Dynamische Vorschriften der Komponisten, wie etwa das dreifache Pianissimo Schumanns im fünften Takt vor Schluß des dritten Satzes, stören ihn nicht im mindesten. Er bleibt immer im Forte.

Den Solopart in Tschaikowskys „Violinkonzert" spielte der Erste Konzertmeister des Orchesters, Joseph Silverstein. Ein dünnes Tönchen, das schon in der ersten Hochparkettreihe aus der von Thomas überraschend zurückgehaltenen Orchesterbegleitung nicht immer ganz sauber in den raschen Läufen klang und sich die vorgeschriebenen Mehrfachgriffe erleichterte, konnte den Ansprüchen des Komponisten nur sehr bedingt genügen. Mr. Silverstein ist sicher ein ausgezeichneter Konzertmeister — ein Solist ist er nicht.

Aus der den Abend abschließenden „La Valse" von Ravel, in der Thomas noch einmal seine ganze choreographische Kunststückchensammlung produzierte, wurde ein billiger Rausschmeißer. Die brillante Feuerwerksinstrumentation verleitet ja leicht zu diesen raffinierten Klangextremen.

Erstaunlich ist und bleibt, daß sich ein deutsches Konzertpublikum so leicht von solcher dirigentischen Firlefanzerei bluffen läßt.

bonn pre-concert publicity

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 57,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Bonner Rundschau, Bonn
15. April 1971

Joan und Ted Kennedy lächeln für die Bonner

VON HANS SCHAMBERGER

Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent der Bostoner Symphoniker, begrüßte gestern auf dem Hamburger Flugplatz Joan und Ted Kennedy. (R)-Foto

Bonn. Wo er auftaucht in Amerika, da umdrängen ihn im Nu Menschenmassen: Sie alle wollen nur einmal einem leibhaftigen Kennedy die Hand drücken, ihn aus nächster Nähe sehen. Edward Kennedy (39), jüngstes Mitglied der berühmten Kennedys. Seine Frau Joan (34) gilt als die Schönste des Kennedy-Clans. Heute sind beide in Bonn. Mit ihnen ein Teil des Jet-Sets Amerikas: Gestern noch hat Edward Kennedy, Ted genannt, zugesagt, nach Bonn zu kommen zu dem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in der Beethovenhalle, das am Freitagabend deutsche Geldaristokratie, Bundesbonner und amerikanische Millionäre zusammenführen soll.

Heute lächelt er für die Bonner: Ted Kennedy. (R)-Foto

Bei einem Autounfall Ted Kennedys, bei dem seine Sekretärin Mary Jo Kopechne den Tod fand, machte der Senator, immer wieder im Gespräch als eventueller Präsidentschaftsbewerber der USA, Schlagzeilen in der Weltpresse.

Seine Frau Joan und seine beiden Kinder Edward (9) und Care Anne (11) standen zu ihrem Papa: Die Kennedys geben niemals auf. Sie lächeln auch, wenn ihnen nicht danach zumute ist.

Joan Kennedy, in den Staaten eine bekannte Pianistin, gab bereits 500 Wohltätigkeitskonzerte mit den Bostoner Philharmonikern. In Bonn wird Joan nicht am Flügel sitzen. Sie rezitiert den Sprechpart in Tschaikowskys Märchen Peter und der Wolf.

Im Königshof wird der High-Society-Troß aus den Staaten Quartier nehmen. Gegen 12.05 Uhr soll der Düsenclipper, aus Boston über Frankfurt am Main kommend, auf dem Bonner Flughafen aufsetzen, sicherlich von einem Rudel Fotografen erwartet. Und weil auch Bundesdeutschlands Creme der Creme den Besuch aus Amerika für einen geeigneten Anlaß hält, Gesellschaftliches zu pflegen, gibt es eine Reihe von den so beliebten Bonner Cocktailempfängen. Der erste findet gleich heute nachmittag im Rathaus statt, wo Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer die Bostoner, die Kennedys, die Rockefellers, die Cabots und ihren Anhang empfängt: Dort soll es, so sagte der OB, eine Überraschung für Arthur Fiedler, den 75jährigen Star-Dirigenten der Philharmoniker, geben. Weiter freilich wollte sich der Oberbürgermeister noch nicht auslassen: „Sonst ist ja die Überraschung fort." Der Empfang um 16 Uhr wird sicherlich für die Bonner geeigneter Anlaß sein, vor dem Rathaus die Kennedy-Familie gebührend zu bewundern. Am Abend um 20 Uhr gibt US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush in der Botschaft einen Empfang.

Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel erwartet am Freitagmorgen schließlich die US-Einwohner zum Cocktail, und am Nachmittag wird der Ministerpräsident von Rheinland-Pfalz, Helmuth Kohl, im Künstlerbahnhof Sekt ausschenken lassen, wo Hausherr und Veranstalter Johannes Wasmuth schon alles vorbereitet hat: Endlich, endlich, am Abend dürfen die Bostoner in der Beethovenhalle konzertieren, und ihre mitgebrachten Gäste dürfen endlich, endlich beim Klang der Musik dinieren.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 64,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Recklinghäuser Zeitung, Recklinghausen
vom 15. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 25,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Stader Tagblatt, Stade
vom 15. April 1971

Joan Kennedy macht Kurzbesuch

Der Dirigent des Boston-Symphony-Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, nahm Joan Kennedy auf dem Flughafen in Empfang. (Foto: dpa)

Hamburg (lno) — Joan Kennedy, Ehefrau von Edward Kennedy, dem Senator des US-Bundesstaates Massachusetts, und Schwägerin des verstorbenen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy, ist zu einem kurzen Hamburg-Besuch auf dem Flugplatz Fuhlsbüttel eingetroffen.

Nach Auskunft der Konzertdirektion Dr. Rudolf Götte wird Joan Kennedy am Mittwochabend in der Hamburger Musikhalle das Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra besuchen und anschließend an einem Gala-Empfang im Hotel „Atlantic" teilnehmen.

Joan Kennedy, die auf dem Flugplatz von Dirigent Arthur Fiedler in Empfang genommen wurde, ist bereits mehrfach in öffentlichen Konzerten mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra aufgetreten, so unter anderem als Rezitatorin in Serge Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf".

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 7,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Taunus-Zeitung, Oberursel
15. April 1971

JOAN KENNEDY, Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, macht Stippvisite in Hamburg. In der Hamburger Musikhalle will sie ein Konzert des „Boston Symphonie Orchestra" besuchen. Dirigent Arthur Fiedler nahm Joan Kennedy auf dem Flughafen in Empfang. Funkbild: dpa/UPI

Bei einem Gala-Konzert in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle wird die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy am Freitag mitwirken. Bei einem Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra spricht sie den Text in Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wo Am Mittwoch traf Joan Kennedy mit dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler (Bild) in H burg ein. Foto:

113

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 17,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Buersche Zeitung, Gelsenkirchen-Buer
vom 15. April 19

JOAN KENNEDY, Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, macht Stippvisite in Hamburg. In der Hamburger Musikhalle will sie ein Konzert des „Boston Symphonie Orchestra" besuchen. Dirigent Arthur Fiedler nahm Joan Kennedy auf dem Flughafen in Empfang. Funkbild: dpa/UPI

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 59,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
General-Anzeiger für Bonn und Umgebung, Bonn
vom 15. April 1971

CHRICHTEN UND BERICHTE

JOAN KENNEDY, Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, traf gestern in Hamburg ein, um bei einem Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra den Part „Peter und der Wolf" zu sprechen — wie auch am Freitagabend in Bonn. Dirigent Arthur Fiedler begrüßte Joan Kennedy auf dem Flughafen der Hansestadt. „G.-A."-Telefoto upi

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 37,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hildesheimer Allgemeine Zeitung, Hildesheim
vom 15. 4. 71

Zu einem „musikalischen" Kurzbesuch traf gestern Joan Kennedy, die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, auf dem Hamburger Flughafen ein, wo sie von dem Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, Arthur Fiedler, begrüßt wurde. Gestern abend besuchte sie in Hamburg ein Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker, morgen wird sie in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle als Sprecherin die Texte von Serge Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vortragen. (dpa/upi-Funkbild)

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 4,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Wümme Zeitung, Lilienthal
vom 15. April 1971

Joan Kennedy in Hamburg

Die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan Kennedy (rechts), besuchte gestern in Hamburg das Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dirigent Arthur Fiedler (links) nahm Frau Kennedy auf dem Flughafen in Empfang.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 37,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Saarbrücker Landeszeitung, Saarbrücken
vom 15. April 1971

Joan Kennedy, Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, machte Stippvisite in Hamburg. Gestern abend besuchte sie in der Hamburger Musikhalle das Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters. Unser Bild zeigt Dirigent Arthur Fiedler, der Joan Kennedy auf dem Flughafen empfing.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 46,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Die Glocke, Oelde/Westf.
vom 15. April 197

Joan Kennedy auf Konzertreise in Deutschland

Hamburg. Joan Kennedy, die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, machte gestern im Rahmen einer Konzertreise durch die Bundesrepublik in Hamburg halt, um in der Hamburger Musikhalle an einem Gastspiel des Symphonie-Orchesters aus Boston teilzunehmen. Auf dem Hamburger Flughafen nahm Dirigent Arthur Fiedler die prominente Besucherin in Empfang (unser Bild).

Die Frau des letzten der noch lebenden Kennedy-Brüder gilt als hervorragende Kennerin und Interpretin klassischer Musik. Am Freitagabend nimmt sie an einem Gala-Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker in der Bonner Beethovenhalle teil. Zu diesem Konzert wird auch Edward Kennedy als Zuhörer erwartet.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 1950,4 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Der Stern, Hamburg

vom 16. Mai 1971

Der Dirigent Arthur Fiedler (mit Feuerwehrhelm — er ist ein Sammler von Feuerwehrrequisiten) kam mit Joan Kennedy in die Bonner Beethovenhalle

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 139,0 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Westfalen-Post, Hagen

vom 15. April 1971

Joan Kennedy besuchte gestern in Hamburg ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Leitung von Arthur Fiedler, der sie am Flughafen abholte (Bild). Die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy wird morgen in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle selber künstlerisch aktiv werden: Als Sprecherin trägt sie bei einem Konzert des berühmten Bostoner Orchesters Texte aus Prokofiews „Peter und der Wolf" vor.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 19,4 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Grafschafter Nachrichten, Nordhorn

vom 17. April 1971

Joan Kennedy, Ehefrau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, traf zu einer Stippvisite in Hamburg ein. Sie besuchte in der Musikhalle das Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra und anschließend einen Gala-Empfang im Hotel „Atlantic". Arthur Fiedler (unser Bild), einer der drei Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, nahm Joan Kennedy auf dem Flughafen Fuhlsbüttel in Empfang.

Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 116,4 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Düsseldorfer Nachrichten, Düsseldorf

vom 15. April 1971

Stippvisite in Hamburg

Joan Kennedy, die Frau des US-Senators, traf gestern in Hamburg ein, wo sie am Abend das Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra besuchte. Links der Dirigent Arthur Fiedler.

Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 7,8 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Südhessische Post, Heppenheim

vom 16. April 1971

JOAN KENNEDY, die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, hält sich z Zeit in Deutschland auf: Als Publikum und als Akteurin. Denn zunächst besuchte sie Hamburg ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra – dessen Dirigent Arthur Fiedl sie hier am Flughafen abholte – und heute abend wird sie während eines weiteren Ko zerts des Orchesters in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle den Text von Serge Prokofiefs mu kalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" sprechen. Unter den Zuhörern wird heute au Edward Kennedy sein.

(Foto: dpa/UPI-Bildfun

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 98,7 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Aachener Volkszeitung, Aachen

vom 15. April 1971

Von Boston nach Hamburg: Joan Kennedy, die Frau des US-Senators, kam mit dem Sinfonie-Orchester ihrer Heimatstadt in die Bundesrepublik. Zusammen mit dem Dirigenten, Arthur Fiedler, stellte sie sich am Mittwoch den Kameras.

(AVZ-Bildfunk/dpa-upi)

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 73,4 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Hannoversche Presse, Hannover

vom 16. April 1971

JOAN KENNEDY, Ehefrau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, kam zu einer Stippvisite nach Hamburg, um ein Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters zu besuchen. Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent des Orchesters holte die charmante Senatorenfrau vom Flughafen ab.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 35,1 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Gießener Allgemeine, Gießen

vom 17. April 1971

ARTHUR FIEDLER (links), Dirigent des berühmten Boston-Symphonie-Orchesters, traf mit dem Orchester und der Frau des US-Senators Kennedy, Joan, an Bord eines Jets auf dem Hamburger Flughafen ein. Joan Kennedy wollte sich als Sprecherin in Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf" engagieren.

115

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 18,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Waldecksche Landeszeitung, Korbach
vom 16. April 1971

Prominente Musikantin

Zu einem Gala-Konzert das heute in Bonn stattfinden wird, trafen das berühmte Boston Symphony Orchestra unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler (links) und die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan, auf dem Hamburger Flughafen ein. Joan Kennedy wird die Sprecherin in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" sein. Auf dem Programm stehen außerdem Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre und Peter Tschaikowskys b-Moll-Klavierkonzert. (dpa)

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 18,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Iserlohner Kreisanzeiger, Iserlohn
vom 15. April 1971

Joan Kennedy, die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, machte Stippvisite in Hamburg. Sie besuchte gestern abend in der Hamburger Musikhalle das Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dirigent Arthur Fiedler nahm Joan Kenndey auf dem Flughafen in Empfang. Vor Reportern äußerte sie den Wunsch, ihr Mann möge nicht für die Präsidentschaftswahlen kandidieren.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 23,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Pfälzer Tagblatt, Landau
vom 15. April 1971

JOAN KENNEDY, die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, machte gestern eine Stipvisite in Hamburg, wo sie auf dem Flughafen vom Dirigenten des Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, begrüßt wurde. Mrs. Kennedy wird heute in Bonn erwartet, wo sie in „Peter und der Wolf" als Sprecherin auftreten wird.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Burgdorfer Kreisblatt, Burgdorf
vom 17. April 1971

Joan Kennedy machte kurzen Abstecher nach Hamburg

Joan Kennedy, die Ehefrau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, traf zu einer Stippvisite in Hamburg ein. Am Abend besuchte sie in der Musikhalle das Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters, das zuvor in Hannover gastiert hatte. Anschließend nahm sie an einem Empfang im Hotel „Atlantic" teil. Unser Bild zeigt sie beim Eintreffen auf dem Hamburger Flugplatz, wo sie von Arthur Fiedler, einem der drei Dirigenten des Bostoner Orchesters, in Empfang genommen wurde. Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 199,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Rhein-Zeitung, Koblenz
vom 15. April 1971

„Koblenz" war der Name des Flugzeugs, mit dem Joan Kennedy, die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, in Hamburg eintraf. Auf dem Flugplatz wurde sie vom Dirigenten des Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, begrüßt, dessen Konzert in der Hamburger Musikhalle die Senatorsgattin am Mittwochabend besuchte. Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 19,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Trierische Landeszeitung, Trier
vom 15. April 1971

100

Joan Kennedy, Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, machte Stippvisite in Hamburg. Gestern abend besuchte sie in der Hamburger Musikhalle das Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchesters. Unser Bild zeigt Dirigent Arthur Fiedler, der Joan Kennedy auf dem Flughafen empfing.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Pfälzischer Merkur, Zweibrücken
vom 15. April 197

JOAN KENNEDY, die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, machte gestern eine Stipvisite in Hamburg, wo sie auf dem Flughafen vom Dirigenten des Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, begrüßt wurde. Mrs. Kennedy wird heute in Bonn erwartet, wo sie in „Peter und der Wolf" als Sprecherin auftreten wird.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): o. A.
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Nassauische Landeszeitung, Limburg
vom 15. April 1971

Bei einem Gala-Konzert in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle wird die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy am Freitag mitwirken. Bei einem Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra spricht sie den Text in Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf". Am Mittwoch traf Joan Kennedy mit dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler (Bild) in Hamburg ein. Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 261,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ruhr-Nachrichten, Dortmund
vom 15. April 1971

Joan Kennedy besuchte gestern in Hamburg ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Leitung von Arthur Fiedler, der sie am Flughafen abholte (Bild). Die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy wird am Freitag in der Bonner Beethovenhalle selber künstlerisch aktiv werden: Als Sprecherin trägt sie bei einem Konzert des berühmten Bostoner Orchestere Texte von Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" vor.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 202,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Abendpost-Nachtausgabe
Frankfurt/Main
vom 15. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 255,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälische Rundschau, Dortmund
vom 15. April 197

(dpa/UPI-Funkbild)

Rosen gab es für Joan Kennedy. Dirigent Arthur Fiedler begrüßte die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy auf dem Hamburger Flughafen. Mrs. Kennedy besuchte gestern abend in der Musikhalle der Hansestadt das Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra. Morgen wird Joan Kennedy prominenteste Interpretin bei einem Gala-Konzert in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle sein. Als Sprecherin trägt sie die Texte von Serge Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vor. Wie in Bonn verlautet, wird auch Edward Kennedy im Zuhörersaal sitzen.

Joan Kennedy liest „Peter und der Wolf" ul Bonn. — Ein besonderes Ereignis steht den Kunstfreunden in Bonn bevor: Am Freitagabend gastiert das berühmte „Boston Symphony Orchestra" unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler mit dem Gala-Konzert „Boston Pops" in der Beethoven-Halle.

Prominenteste Interpretin ist die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan Kennedy. Als Sprecherin trägt sie die Texte von Serge Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vor.

Wie der Veranstalter des Konzerts, Johannes Wasmuth, am Mittwoch in Bonn mitteilte, wird der Senator als Zuhörer an dem Konzert teilnehmen.

Auf dem Programm stehen außerdem Ludwig van Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre und Peter Tschaikowskys Konzert für Piano Nummer eins in b-Moll.

Wasmuth zufolge findet am Freitagnachmittag im Gebäude des ehemaligen Bahnhofs Rolandseck ein Empfang zu Ehren Joan Kennedys statt, zu dem auch der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Helmut Kohl erwartet wird.

Für Edward Kennedy ist am Vormittag ein Gespräch mit Außenminister Walter Scheel vorgesehen.

● Am heutigen Donnerstag gastieren die Bostoner Symphoniker unter dem Dirigenten Michael Thilson Thomas in der Jahrhunderthalle in Frankfurt-Höchst.

■ Auf dem Weg nach Bonn Stippvisite in Hamburg: Joan Kennedy (34) wurde am Mittwoch auf dem Flughafen von Dirigent Arthur Fiedler empfangen (unser Bild).

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Pfälzischer Merkur, Zweibrücken
vom 15. April 197

JOAN KENNEDY, die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, machte gestern eine Stipvisite in Hamburg, wo sie auf dem Flughafen vom Dirigenten des Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, begrüßt wurde. Mrs. Kennedy wird heute in Bonn erwartet, wo sie in „Peter und der Wolf" als Sprecherin auftreten wird.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 255,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälische Rundschau, Dortmund
vom 15. April 197

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): o. A.
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Nassauische Landeszeitung, Limburg
vom 15. April 1971

Bei einem Gala-Konzert in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle wird die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy am Freitag mitwirken. Bei einem Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra spricht sie den Text in Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf". Am Mittwoch traf Joan Kennedy mit dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler (Bild) in Hamburg ein. Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 261,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ruhr-Nachrichten, Dortmund
vom 15. April 1971

Joan Kennedy besuchte gestern in Hamburg ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Leitung von Arthur Fiedler, der sie am Flughafen abholte (Bild). Die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy wird am Freitag in der Bonner Beethovenhalle selber künstlerisch aktiv werden: Als Sprecherin trägt sie bei einem Konzert des berühmten Bostoner Orchestere Texte von Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" vor.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 202,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Abendpost-Nachtausgabe
Frankfurt/Main
vom 15. April 1971

(dpa/UPI-Funkbild)

Rosen gab es für Joan Kennedy. Dirigent Arthur Fiedler begrüßte die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy auf dem Hamburger Flughafen. Mrs. Kennedy besuchte gestern abend in der Musikhalle der Hansestadt das Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra. Morgen wird Joan Kennedy prominenteste Interpretin bei einem Gala-Konzert in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle sein. Als Sprecherin trägt sie die Texte von Serge Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vor. Wie in Bonn verlautet, wird auch Edward Kennedy im Zuhörersaal sitzen.

Joan Kennedy liest „Peter und der Wolf" ui Bonn. — Ein besonderes Ereignis steht den Kunstfreunden in Bonn bevor: Am Freitagabend gastiert das berühmte „Boston Symphony Orchestra" unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler mit dem Gala-Konzert „Boston Pops" in der Beethoven-Halle.

Prominenteste Interpretin ist die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan Kennedy. Als Sprecherin trägt sie die Texte von Serge Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vor.

Wie der Veranstalter des Konzerts, Johannes Wasmuth, am Mittwoch in Bonn mitteilte, wird der Senator als Zuhörer an dem Konzert teilnehmen.

Auf dem Programm stehen außerdem Ludwig van Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre und Peter Tschaikowskys Konzert für Piano Nummer eins in b-Moll.

Wasmuth zufolge findet am Freitagnachmittag im Gebäude des ehemaligen Bahnhofs Rolandseck ein Empfang zu Ehren Joan Kennedys statt, zu dem auch der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Helmut Kohl erwartet wird.

Für Edward Kennedy ist am Vormittag ein Gespräch mit Außenminister Walter Scheel vorgesehen.

● Am heutigen Donnerstag gastieren die Bostoner Symphoniker unter dem Dirigenten Michael Thilson Thomas in der Jahrhunderthalle in Frankfurt-Höchst.

■ Auf dem Weg nach Bonn Stippvisite in Hamburg: Joan Kennedy (34) wurde am Mittwoch auf dem Flughafen von Dirigent Arthur Fiedler empfangen (unser Bild).

117

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 314,2 – lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hamburger Abendblatt, Hamburg
vom 15. April 1971

Fuhlsbüttel: Dirigent Fiedler empfing Joan Kennedy

Joan Kennedy probt in Hamburg

Neffe John-John war in Lebensgefahr

Eigener Bericht - SAD

lie. Hamburg, 15. April

Ein wenig erschöpft vom Flug New York — Hamburg kam sie aus der Maschine. Doch als Joan Kennedy die gelben Rosen sah, die ihr der 77jährige „Boston-Pops"-Dirigent Arthur Fiedler überreichte, strahlte sie wieder. Dennoch fuhr die Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy gleich zu einem „Beauty Sleep" (Schönheitsschlaf) ins Hotel Vierjahreszeiten. „Ich werde morgen früh mit Arthur Fiedler den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" proben. Er wird mich am Flügel begleiten. Freitag abend will ich in der Beethovenhalle in Bonn auftreten. Dazu wird auch mein Mann herüberkommen." Einen ausführlichen Bericht über das Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" lesen Sie auf der Feuilleton-Seite 9.

Während Joan Kennedy in Hamburg ihren Auftritt vorbereitete, kam aus den USA die Nachricht, daß ihr Neffe, John-John Kennedy, der Sohn des ermordeten US-Präsidenten, in Lebensgefahr schwebte. Beim Baden an der Platin-Küste der Karibischen Insel Barbados wurde er von der starken Strömung abgetrieben. Er rief laut um Hilfe. Doch der wachhabende Leibwächter konnte nicht schwimmen und mußte erst einen seiner sieben Kollegen rufen, der den Jungen rettete.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 160,0 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Neue Presse, Frankfurt/Main
15. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 273,2 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Ruhrzeitung, Essen
vom 15. April 1971

3/281

Joan Kennedy ist in Bonn beim Gala-Konzert dabei

Joan Kennedy (34), Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, wird am Freitagabend Mittelpunkt eines Gala-Konzertes in der Bonner Beethovenhalle sein. Zur Musik des Boston Symphony-Orchestra unter der Leitung von Artur Fiedler wird sie die Sprechrolle in Tschaikowskis „Peter und der Wolf" übernehmen. Gestern kam sie in Hamburg an, wo sie von Artur Fiedler begrüßt wurde.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 20,3 – lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Fuldaer Volkszeitung, Fulda
vom 16. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 24,3 – lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Rhein-Zeitung, Düsseldorf
vom 15. April 1971

3/281

Joan Kennedy ist in Bonn beim Gala-Konzert dabei

Joan Kennedy (34), Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, wird am Freitagabend Mittelpunkt eines Gala-Konzertes in der Bonner Beethovenhalle sein. Zur Musik des Boston Symphony-Orchestra unter der Leitung von Artur Fiedler wird sie die Sprechrolle in Tschaikowskis „Peter und der Wolf" übernehmen. Gestern kam sie in Hamburg an, wo sie von Artur Fiedler begrüßt wurde.

ZU EINEM GALA-KONZERT, das am Freitag in Bonn stattfinden wird, traf am Mittwoch das berühmte Boston Symphony Orchestre unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler (links) und die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan (rechts), an Bord eines Jets auf dem Hamburger Flughafen ein. Joan Kennedy wird die prominente Sprecherin in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" sein. Auf dem Programm stehen außerdem Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre und Peter Tschaikowskys b-Moll-Klavierkonzert.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 221,8 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Kölner Stadtanzeiger, Köln
vom 15. April 1971

3/281

Maestro holt Joan Kennedy ab

Joan Kennedy, die Frau des US-Senators, traf gestern auf dem Hamburger Flughafen ein. Dirigent Arthur Fiedler von den Bostoner Symphonikern, die sich zur Zeit auf Deutschlandtournee befinden, begrüßte die blonde Amerikanerin. Der Maestro hat bereits mehrfach mit Joan Kennedy zusammengearbeitet. Entweder begleitete er die Amateurpianistin bei Wohltätigkeitsveranstaltungen oder bot den musikalischen Hintergrund, wenn Mrs. Kennedy die Texte aus dem Prokofieff-Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vortrug. Das wird sie auch morgen abend tun, wenn sich — in Anwesenheit von Senator Edward Kennedy — die rheinische High Society in der Bonner Beethovenhalle zu einem Gala-Konzert mit lukullischen Einlagen trifft.

Bild: dpa

Bei einem Gala-Konzert in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle wird die Frau des US-Senators Erward Kennedy am Freitag mitwirken. Bei einem Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra spricht sie den Text in Prokofjews musikalischen Märchen „Peter und der Wolf". Am Mittwoch traf Joan Kennedy mit dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler (Bild) in Hamburg ein.
Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 261,6 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ruhr-Nachrichten, Dortmund
vom 15. April 1971

Joan Kennedy besuchte gestern in Hamburg ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Leitung von Arthur Fiedler, der sie am Flughafen abholte (Bild). Die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy wird morgen in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle selber künstlerisch aktiv werden: Als Sprecherin trägt sie bei einem Konzert des berühmten Bostoner Orchesters Texte aus Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf" vor.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 59,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
General-Anzeiger für Bonn und Umgebung, Bonn
vom 16. April 1971

Links: Empfang im Alten Rathaus: Joan Kennedy und Dirigent Arthur Fiedler posieren mit Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer für die Fotographen — Rechts: Da Dirigent Arthur Fiedler ein „Feuerwehr-Fan" ist, verlieh ihm Branddirektor Heinz Diekmann zur Erinnerung an seinen Bonner Aufenthalt einen Feuerwehrhelm mit Widmung Aufn.: Engels (2)

Ein Feuerwehrhelm für den Orchesterchef

Sinfoniker dirigierte „Alte Kameraden"

„Boston-Pops" mit Joan Kennedy im Alten Rathaus – Heute Galakonzert in der Beethovenhalle Wa - Am Anfang war nichts als Warten. Während die Freunde des Boston Symphony Orchestra — Angehörige alter Bostoner Familien, unter ihnen David Rockefeller jr., Mitglieder der Familie Fahnenstock und der Bankier Banks — schon im Gobelinsaal des Alten Rathauses eingetroffen waren, verspäteten sich die Hauptpersonen, Dirigent Arthur Fiedler und Joan Kennedy, die Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy, erheblich. Doch als sie da waren, ging es um so ungezwungener und fröhlicher zu. Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer hatte sich für die Gäste eine Überraschung ausgedacht: Die Feuerwehrkapelle Bonn-Bad Godesberg intonierte am Schluß der kurzen Begrüßungsworte des OB den Song: „When the Saints go marching in" und ließ sie dann von Dirigent Fiedler dirigieren. Ihm wurde zur Erinnerung ein Feuerwehrhelm überreicht. Arthur Fiedler hat nämlich eine Schwäche für die Feuerwehr.

assanten und Neugierige hatten sich auf dem Marktplatz versammelt, und das Straßencafé neben dem Rathaus war bis auf den letzten Platz besetzt. Man wartete geduldig auf das große Ereignis: die Ankunft des Boston Symphony Orchestra, das heute unter Dirigent Arthur Fiedler ein Gala-Konzert in der Beethovenhalle geben wird. OB Kraemer begrüßte seine Gäste am Fuß der Rathaustreppe, Blumen überreichten die Bonner Hostessen. „Sie kommen als hervorragende Repräsentanten der alten und reichen Handelsstadt Boston, die mit Stolz den beziehungsreichen Beinamen ‚Athen Amerikas' trägt", sagte der Oberbürgermeister.

Der OB erwähnte weiterhin die lange Tradition des Orchesters, das in diesem Jahr sein 90jähriges Bestehen feiert. Mit seiner Geschichte sind Namen deutscher Dirigenten eng verbunden. Das Orchester befindet sich anläßlich seines Jubiläums auf einer ausgedehnten Europa-Tournee. Dabei wird es in vielen Hauptstädten spielen. Dort allerdings wird William Steinberg, Chefdirigent der Bostoner Symphoniker, die Konzerte leiten.

In Bonn präsentiert es sich als „Boston Pops" mit einem seiner amerikanischen „populären" Programme; die Leitung hier hat Arthur Fiedler, der seit 43 Jahren diese für Amerika typischen populären Konzerte dirigiert. Veranstalter des Galakonzerts, das unter der Schirmherrschaft des Botschafters der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika, Kenneth Rush, steht, ist „Festival pro", personifiziert durch Johannes Wasmuth, Rolandseck.

Die Gäste strahlten, als zu ihrer Überraschung die Feuerwehrkapelle aus Bad Godesberg aufspielte, und Fiedler machte sich eine Freude daraus, den Marsch „Alte Kameraden" zu dirigieren. Mehr noch freute er sich über das erwähnte Gastgeschenk, das Branddirektor Heinz Diekmann ihm überreichte: den Feuerwehrhelm, der im ledernen Nackenschutz die Widmung enthielt: „Zur Erinnerung an Ihren Besucht, Bonn, 15. April 1971."

Gestern abend wurden die amerikanischen Gäste in der USA-Botschaft erwartet; heute vormittag findet ein Empfang bei Außenminister Walter Scheel statt. Außerdem wird Senator Kennedy mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke zusammentreffen. Am Nachmittag vor dem Konzert wird zum Empfang in dem Rolandsecker Bahnhof gebeten, bei dem der Ministerpräsident von Rheinland-Pfalz, Dr. Helmut Kohl, anwesend sein wird. Am Abend findet dann das Gala-Konzert in der Beethovenhalle statt, zu dem Gäste aus der ganzen Bundesrepublik erwartet werden.

Joan Kennedy, die beim heutigen Konzert den Sprechpart in Serge Prokofieffs Musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernimmt, war noch im Reiseanzug, einem mittelblauen, jugendlich-flotten Collegemantel. Die Verspätung des Flugzeuges und ein Interview mit dem Rundfunk hatte sie nicht zum Umziehen kommen lassen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 255,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälische Rundschau, Dortmund
vom 16. April 1971

Ehrengäste im Bonner Rathaus waren gestern Joan Kennedy, die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, und der Dirigent Arthur Fiedler. Joan Kennedy wird einen Textteil in einem Gala-Konzert von Fiedler sprechen. Der Dirigent erhielt den Ehrenhelm der Bonner Feuerwehr, nachdem er ihre Kapelle geleitet hatte. Senator Kennedy wird heute politische Gespräche mit Außenminister Scheel und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke führen. (dpa/UPI-Funkbild)

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 17,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Holsteinischer Courier, Neumünster
16. April 1971

„Boston Pops" mit Joan Kennedy in der Bonner Beethovenhalle

Bonn. - Senator Edward Kennedy wird der prominenteste Zuhörer sein, wenn seine Frau Joan heute in der Bonner Beethovenhalle den Text von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" spricht. Das Galakonzert der 130 Bostoner Symphoniker, die unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein populäres Programm („Boston Pops") mit Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskijs 1. Klavierkonzert (Solist: Earl Wild) sowie Melodien aus dem Musical „Hair" aufwarten, fällt auch deshalb aus dem Rahmen, weil die Konzertbesucher im Saal an Tischen sitzen und sich während des Konzerts an Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein laben können. Veranstalter des Konzerts, das unter der Schirmherrschaft von US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush steht, ist die „Galerie pro" von Johannes Wasmuth. Unser Bild zeigt Joan Kennedy und Arthur Fiedler, der eben einen Ehrenfeuerwehrhelm erhalten hat, nachdem er die Kapelle der Bonner Feuerwehr dirigiert hatte.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 50,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Aachener Nachrichten, Aachen
vom 16. April 1971

Auf der Bonner Bühne: „Ted" und Joan Kennedy

Der amerikanische Senator Edward („Ted") Kennedy wird heute in Bonn zu Gesprächen mit Bundesaußenminister Scheel und dem Minister im Kanzleramt, Prof. Ehmke, zusammentreffen. Frau Joan Kennedy hält sich schon seit Donnerstag in Bonn auf. Sie traf zusammen mit dem Bostoner Philharmonischen Orchester ein, das heute ein Konzert in Bonn geben will. Joan Kennedy wird dabei den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" rezitieren. Unser Bild zeigt Frau Kennedy zusammen mit dem Dirigenten Fiedler, dem zur Begrüßung ein Feuerwehr-Helm verpaßt wurde. Foto: AP

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 147,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfalen-Blatt, Bielefeld
vom 16. April 1971

Joan Kennedy, Ehefrau des Senators Edward Kennedy, und der Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, Arthur Fiedler, trafen gestern in Bonn ein. In dem musikalischen Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" wird Joan Kennedy den Sprechpart rezitieren. Auf unserem Foto hat sich Dirigent Fiedler das Begrüßungsgeschenk, einen Feuerwehrhelm, aufgesetzt. Foto: AP

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 35,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälisches Volksblatt, Paderborn
vom 16. April 1971

Joan Kennedy, Ehefrau des Senators Edward Kennedy, und der Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, Arthur Fiedler, trafen gestern in Bonn ein. In dem musikalischen Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" wird Joan Kennedy den Sprechpart rezitieren. Auf unserem Foto hat sich Dirigent Fiedler das Begrüßungsgeschenk, einen Feuerwehrhelm, aufgesetzt. Foto: AP

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): o. A.
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Bergische Landeszeitung, Bergisch Gladbach
vom 16. April 1971

Prominente Gäste wurden am Donnerstag im Bonner Rathaus von Bonns Oberbürgermeister Peter Krämer – hier in der Mitte – empfangen. Joan Kennedy, die Gattin des US-Senators Ted Kennedy (links), wird am heutigen Freitag einen Textteil während des Galakonzerts mit Arthur Fiedler (rechts) sprechen. Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 255,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälische Rundschau, Dortmund
vom 16. April 1971

Ehrengäste im Bonner Rathaus waren gestern Joan Kennedy, die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, und der Dirigent Arthur Fiedler. Joan Kennedy wird einen Textteil in einem Gala-Konzert von Fiedler sprechen. Der Dirigent erhielt den Ehrenhelm der Bonner Feuerwehr, nachdem er ihre Kapelle geleitet hatte. Senator Kennedy wird heute politische Gespräche mit Außenminister Scheel und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke führen. (dpa/UPI-Funkbild)

Joan Kennedy ist zu Besuch im Rheinland

Ⓡ Bonn. Ein Stück „American Way of Life" demonstriert seit gestern ein Teil der US-Gesellschaft am Rhein: Joan Kennedy, Frau des US-Senators Edward (Ted) Kennedy, kam mit 40 millionenschweren Amerikanern, um am heutigen Freitagabend dem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonns Beethovenhalle lauschen zu können. Eintrittspreis zwischen 25 und 150 Mark. Die Bostoner, die in Bonn unter Arthur Fiedler spielen, sind zur Zeit auf Europatournee.

Als der Jet-Set aus den Staaten mit 15 Journalisten der angesehensten Blätter der USA in Wahn landete, wurde er von fast einem halben Hundert Fotografen umringt: Im Scheinwerferlicht stand Joan Kennedy, die in Bonn Prokofieffs Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" rezitieren wird. Ihr Mann Edward soll heute ebenfalls eintreffen.

Der Trupp der Amerikaner besichtigte nach der Ankunft unvorhergesehen den Kölner Dom und fuhr erst dann nach Bonn weiter. In Bonns altem Rathaus gab Oberbürgermeister Peter Krämer einen Empfang, bei dem Arthur Fiedler die Bonner Feuerwehrkapelle dirigierte.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 57,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Bonner Rundschau, Bonn
vom 16. April 1971

Prominente Gäste wurden am Donnerstag im Bonner Rathaus von Bonns Oberbürgermeister Peter Krämer – hier in der Mitte – empfangen. Joan Kennedy, die Gattin des US-Senators Ted Kennedy (links), wird am heutigen Freitag einen Textteil während des Galakonzerts mit Arthur Fiedler (rechts) sprechen. Foto: dpa

Joan Kennedy ist zu Besuch im Rheinland

Ⓡ Bonn. Ein Stück „American Way of Life" demonstriert seit gestern ein Teil der US-Gesellschaft am Rhein: Joan Kennedy, Frau des US-Senators Edward (Ted) Kennedy, kam mit 40 millionenschweren Amerikanern, um am heutigen Freitagabend dem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonns Beethovenhalle lauschen zu können. Eintrittspreis zwischen 25 und 150 Mark. Die Bostoner, die in Bonn unter Arthur Fiedler spielen, sind zur Zeit auf Europatournee.

Als der Jet-Set aus den Staaten mit 15 Journalisten der angesehensten Blätter der USA in Wahn landete, wurde er von fast einem halben Hundert Fotografen umringt: Im Scheinwerferlicht stand Joan Kennedy, die in Bonn Prokofieffs Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" rezitieren wird. Ihr Mann Edward soll heute ebenfalls eintreffen.

Der Trupp der Amerikaner besichtigte nach der Ankunft unvorhergesehen den Kölner Dom und fuhr erst dann nach Bonn weiter. In Bonns altem Rathaus gab Oberbürgermeister Peter Krämer einen Empfang, bei dem Arthur Fiedler die Bonner Feuerwehrkapelle dirigierte.

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 128

European Tour

1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 570,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Bildzeitung, Ausgabe Hamburg
vom 15. April 1971

Begrüßte Joan Kennedy am Flugplatz Fuhlsbüttel: US-Konsul William Lacy Swing

Kurzes Gespräch nach der Ankunft: Frau Kennedy und Dirigent Arthur Fiedler

Senator Edward Kennedy 1964 bei der Einweihung der Kennedy-Brücke in Hamburg

Sie kam nach Hamburg und sagte Gute Nacht

Von ASTRID OTT

Hamburg, 15. April

Als Joan Kennedy, die Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, gestern in Fuhlsbüttel landete, war die Begrüßung nur kurz. Dirigent Arthur Fiedler und Konsul William Lacy Swing konnten nicht viele Worte wechseln, denn Joan war durch den langen Flug „geschafft". Sie verabschiedete sich mit einem „Gute Nacht", ließ sich in ihr Hotel bringen und legte sich erst mal schlafen.

Joan Kennedy war nach Hamburg gekommen, um mit Arthur Fiedler, dem Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, das gestern in der Musikhalle gastierte, eine „Klavierprobe" abzuhalten. Denn am Freitag tritt sie mit dem Orchester in der Beethovenhalle in Bonn als Rezitatorin in Serge Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" auf.

Auch am späten Abend hatte sich die Frau des Senators noch nicht von den Reisestrapazen erholt. Anstatt, wie ursprünglich geplant, an dem Konzert der „Boston Pops" teilzunehmen, blieb sie in ihrem Hotelzimmer.

Vom Flug „geschafft": Joan Kennedy

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 221,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Kölner Stadtanzeiger, Köln
vom 16. April 1971

DIRIGENT ARTHUR FIEDLER mit gelbem Feuerwehrhelm und Joan Kennedy gestern in Bonn. Bild: Norbert Müller

Joan kam in Jeans

Von unserem Redakteur Günter Schumann

Bonn — „Oh, Arthur, that's wonderful!" jubelte eine Dame im Gelbseidenen entzückt, als die Blaskapelle der Bonner Freiwilligen Feuerwehr mächtig ins Horn stieß. Und Arthur Fiedler (75), seit 41 Jahren einer der Chefdirigenten des weltbekannten Bostoner Symphony Orchestra, lächelte. Weil er eine besondere Vorliebe für Feuerwehren hat, brachten ihm die Männer in den blauen Uniformen ein Ständchen. Er revanchierte sich, indem er kurz den Taktstock übernahm und ihn über den blasenden Feuerwehrmännern schwang.

Ort der Rührszene war gestern das Alte Bonner Rathaus. Für 16 Uhr hatten sich der Orchesterchef, die blonde Joan Kennedy und einige Dutzend schwerreicher Mäzene der Bostoner Symphoniker beim Oberbürgermeister angesagt.

Aber der Stadtvater, hundert Schaulustige und eine Meute Journalisten warteten zunächst vierzig Minuten vergebens auf die attraktive Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy. Die Lady hatte sich im Kölner Dom verspätet und mußte sich erst frisch machen. Man munkelte sogar von einem Schwächeanfall. Schließlich erschien sie doch: in Blue jeans und Kapuzenmantel aus gleichem Stoff.

Nach der offiziellen Begrüßung und der musikalischen Einlage kam für Maestro die Überraschung des Empfangs: Bonns Oberbranddirektor überreichte ihm einen gelben Feuerwehrhelm. Da vergaß auch Joan Kennedy ihre Müdigkeit und freute sich mit, während die Dollarmillionäre im festlichen Göbelinsaal begeistert Beifall klatschten: „Good Old Germany!"

Heute abend wird Arthur Fiedler in der Beethovenhalle mit seinen „Boston Pops" ein Gala-Konzert geben, bei dem gelunch't werden darf. Joan Kennedy rezitiert den Text zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf".

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 67,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Münster'sche Zeitung, Münster
16. April 1971

PROMINENTE GÄSTE wurden im Bonner Rathaus empfangen: Joan Kennedy, Gattin des Senators Ted Kennedy, die einen Textteil während eines Galakonzerts von Arthur Fiedler sprechen wird. Hier hat Fiedler einen Ehren-Feuerwehrhelm erhalten, nachdem er die Kapelle der Bonner Feuerwehr dirigiert hatte. Bild: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 32,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Pforzheimer Zeitung, Pforzheim
vom 20. März 1971

Galakonzert mit Tellerklappern

Bostoner Philharmoniker gastieren in der Bundeshauptstadt

Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einen Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Kalvierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus Hair. Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht; der Flug an den Rhein gleichermaßen eine gehörige Portion Skurrilität wie die Reverenz an Fiedler und seine 130 Philharmoniker.

Kurt Pleyer

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 21,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ruhr-Anzeiger, Hattingen
vom 16. April 1971

Kennedy kommt nach Bonn

„Boston Pops" in der Beethovenhalle

Bonn. Senator Edward Kennedy wird der prominenteste Zuhörer sein, wenn seine Frau Joan heute in der Bonner Beethovenhalle den Text von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" spricht.

Das Galakonzert der 130 Bostoner Symphoniker, die unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein populäres Programm („Boston Pops") mit Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskis erstem Klavierkonzert (Solist: Earl Wild) sowie Melodien aus dem Musical „Hair" aufwarten, fällt auch deshalb aus dem Rahmen, weil die Konzertbesucher im Saal an Tischen sitzen und sich während des Konzerts an Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein laben können.

Veranstalter des Konzerts, das unter der Schirmherrschaft von US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush steht, ist die „Galerie pro" von Johannes Wasmuth.

121

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 10,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –

Ausschnitt aus:

Ibbenbürener Volkszeitung, Ibbenbüren

16 April 1971

PROMINENTE GÄSTE wurden im Bonner Rathaus empfangen: Joan Kennedy, Gattin des Senators Ted Kennedy, die einen Textteil während eines Galakonzerts von Arthur Fiedler sprechen wird. Hier hat Fiedler einen Ehren-Feuerwehrhelm erhalten, nachdem er die Kapelle der Bonner Feuerwehr dirigiert hatte. Bild: dpa

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 8,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Gevelsberger Zeitung, Gevelsberg

vom 16. April 1971

Joan Kennedy, die Ehefrau des Senators Edward Kennedy, und Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent der Bostoner Symphoniker, trafen gestern in Bonn ein. Joan Kennedy wird heute in der Bonner Beethovenhalle den Text von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" sprechen. Ihr Ehemann wird dem Galakonzert der Bostoner Symphoniker beiwohnen.

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 43,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Westfälischer Anzeiger und Kurier, Hamm/Westf.

vom 16. April 1971

Kennedy kommt nach Bonn

„Boston Pops" in der Beethovenhalle

Bonn. Senator Edward Kennedy wird der prominenteste Zuhörer sein, wenn seine Frau Joan heute in der Bonner Beethovenhalle den Text von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" spricht.

Das Galakonzert der 130 Bostoner Symphoniker, die unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein populäres Programm („Boston Pops") mit Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskis erstem Klavierkonzert (Solist: Earl Wild) sowie Melodien aus dem Musical „Hair" aufwarten, fällt auch deshalb aus dem Rahmen, weil die Konzertbesucher im Saal an Tischen sitzen und sich während des Konzerts an Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein laben können.

Veranstalter des Konzerts, das unter der Schirmherrschaft von US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush steht, ist die „Galerie pro" von Johannes Wasmuth.

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 362,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –

Ausschnitt aus:

Hamburger Morgenpost, Hamburg

vom 15. April 1971

Zwischenstation in Hamburg: Joan Kennedy

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 18,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Iserlohner Kreisanzeiger, Iserlohn

16. April 1971

Joan Kennedy, die Gattin des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, traf gestern in Bonn ein, wo sie heute als Sprecherin bei einem Gala-Konzert unter Leitung von Arthur Fiedler mitwirken wird.

Frau Kennedy übte an der Alster

Sie kam, sie lachte – sie war „die Kennedy". Kaum Aufwand am Hamburger Flughafen, als sie gestern Punkt 12.05 Uhr landete, kaum Aufwand im Hotel Atlantic, wo sie zusammen mit dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler eintraf – der Aufwand wird morgen in Bonn zelebriert: Joan Kennedy, 33, musische Ehefrau des Senators von Massachusetts, Edward Kennedy, wird als Star eines dreistündigen Musik-Mahls mit dem Bostoner Symphonieorchester auftreten. „Hamburg is beautiful", sagte sie müde. Schön fand sie den Hamburger Himmel und sehr, sehr blau. Aber sie fand nur Zeit, um eine Runde zu schlafen, zum Empfang des amerikanischen Generalkonsuls zu eilen, eine Klavierprobe mit Fiedler zu machen und abends schon wieder in Gala zu steigen, um beim Konzert der Bostoner in der Musikhalle dabeizusein. In Hamburg jedoch nur als Gast: „O yes", sagte sie, „für den Auftritt muß ich noch üben."

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 342,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Rheinische Post, Düsseldorf

Joan Kennedy, Ehefrau des amerikanischen Senators Ted Kennedy, Mutter zweier Kinder, Freizeitpianistin und — wie man sagt — hübscheste im ganzen Kennedy-Clan, sollte gestern in Bonn eigentlich der Star eines teils weltstädtisch, teils provinziellen Empfangs sein, doch Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, wurde es. Dem alten, freundlichen Herrn mit dem schlohweißen Haar, waren die Strapazen des „Sich-herum-reichen-Lassens" weniger anzumerken als der 34jährigen, in der Tat ebenso hübschen wie bescheidenen Joan Kennedy. Um was es eigentlich bei dem halb gesellschaftlichem, halb politischen Besuch in der Bundeshauptstadt geht, ist nur schwer zu erklären, aber Bonn steckt ja auch erst in den Anfängen, auf gesellschaftlicher Spitzenebene aus sich etwas zu machen.

Da gibt es einen jungen, ebenso künstlerisch veranlagten wie agilen Mann namens Johannes Wasmuth. Er rettete vor Jahren den alten Bahnhof Rolandseck und schuf im alten Gebäude einen Musentempel für fortschrittliche Künstler. Daraus entstanden die „Festival Pro", die Künstler, Politiker und Geldaristokratie zusammenbrachten. Auf der Suche nach immer neuen Gags gewann Wasmuth jetzt das „Boston Symphony-Orchestra" für einen Bonn-Besuch. Dieses in Amerika ebenso berühmte wie populäre 120-Mann-Orchester spielt ebenso klassische Werke wie Popmusik. Zwei Dirigenten stehen fürs klassische, einer fürs musikalisch Popartige zur Verfügung. Dieser Mann heißt Arthur Fiedler.

Milliarden Dollar trafen sich im Bonner Rathaus

Kurzum: Heute abend wird in der Beethovenhalle zu Bonn exclusive Pop-Musik gemacht. Nicht nur als Ohrenschmaus, sondern gemixt mit Gaumenfreunden. Man muß allerdings tief in die Tasche greifen: Denn wer erstmalig und einmalig in Bonn im Ehrensaal des Ludwig van Beethoven ein klassisches Orchester bei Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein Popmusik spielen hören will, hatte bis zu 150 Mark für die Eintrittskarte zu zahlen. Wasmuth gestern: „Alles ausverkauft; aus der ganzen Bundesrepublik haben uns Leute, die Geld haben und Geltungsdrang verspüren, die Karten aus den Händen gerissen."

Delikates und Delikatessen vermischen sich also heute abend, denn mancher hat in die Tasche gegriffen, um vielleicht neben Senator Ted Kennedy sitzend (er trifft heute in Bonn ein), dessen Frau Joan auf der Bühne den Text aus Serge Prokofieffs musikalischen Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" sprechen zu hören (sie tut es übrigens nur exclusiv in und für Bonn). Mit den 120 Musikern kamen gestern auch 50 Bostoner Industrielle und Bankiers an (darunter David Rockefeller jr.), die den Freundeskreis des auf privater Grundlage musizierenden Orchesters bilden. Beim gestrigen Empfang im Bonner Rathaus, so hörte man, seien mindestens 80 Milliarden Dollar versammelt gewesen.

Mit was sollte man da auf Bonner Lokalebene schon imponieren? Mit einem Gag natürlich. Wissend, daß Pop-Dirigent Arthur Fiedler ein begeisterter Freizeit-Feuerwehrmann ist, ließ man im Rathaus die Bonner Feuerwehr-Kapelle antreten. Als Fiedler die Doppel-Kollegen sah, wurde er recht munter, nahm sich den Taktstock, und auf gings im musikalischen Tempo wie sonst nur bei der Feuerwehr. Branddirektor Diekmann stülpte zum Lohn dem Kollegen Arthur einen Original-Einsatzfeuerwehrhelm über den Kopf, und Fiedlers Augen leuchteten: „Wo brennt's, Kollege?"

Leider war nur Durst zu löschen. Jeder Spaß hat schließlich seine Grenzen. Naja, vielleicht wird's heute abend feuriger. Musikalisch, versteht sich.

Heinz Schweden

Mit Blumen und einem Feuerwehrhelm wurden gestern in Bonn Joan Kennedy und der Dirigent Arthur Fiedler (rechts) bei einem Empfang im Rathaus bedacht. Bild: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 342,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Rheinische Post, Düsseldorf
vom 15. April 197

AUF DEM WEGE NACH BONN machte Joan Kennedy, Senator Edward Kennedys Frau, gestern in London Station. Sie wird heute in der Bundeshauptstadt eintreffen und morgen abend als Amateur-Solistin in einem Gala-Pop-Konzert des Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchesters in der Beethovenhalle mitwirken. Senator Kennedy kommt morgen ebenfalls nach Bonn; im Kanzlerbungalow gibt Außenminister Scheel um 11 Uhr einen Empfang für die prominenten Besucher aus USA.
Funkbild: upi

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 133,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westdeutsche Allgemeine, Ausgabe Essen
vom 15. April 1971

Joan Kennedy in Hamburg

Die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan Kennedy, ist am Mittwoch in Hamburg eingetroffen. Am Abend besuchte sie ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Hansestadt. Am Freitagabend tritt sie dann in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle während eines weiteren Konzerts des Orchesters als Sprecherin der Texte von Serge Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" auf. Die Besucher sitzen im Beethovensaal an Tischen und können sich während des Konzerts an Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein laben. Auch Senator Edward Kennedy wird an diesem Tag in Bonn sein und unter anderem von Außenminister Walter Scheel empfangen werden.
ap-Telebild

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 171,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Kölnische Rundschau, Köln,
vom 11. April 1971

In der Passagierliste nach Wahn stehen Namen wie Rockefeller und Kennedy

Blonde Joan spielt Rolle im Märchen

Bonn erlebt das Konzert des Jahres mit illustren Gästen

VON EVI KEIL

Bonn. Amerikas Jet-Set kommt im Jet nach Bonn. Ein Düsenklipper aus der amerikanischen Millionärsstadt Boston, mit dollarschwerer Prominenz angefüllt, wird am 15. April in Wahn landen. Vom US-Bankier David Rockefeller bis zur Senatorengattin Joan Kennedy reicht die Passagierliste.

Und sie alle, Freunde des Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchesters, kommen nur, um einen Abend später am Boston Pops Orchestra Festival teilzunehmen, zu dem der Rolandsecker Bahnhofshausherr Johannes Wasmuth in die Bonner Beethovenhalle einlädt. Wenn die Schönste aus dem Kennedy-Clan, die blonde Joan persönlich, eine Rolle in Prokofieffs Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernimmt, dann wundert es nicht mehr, daß plötzlich auch die High-Society aus der Bundesrepublik ihr Interesse für Bonn angemeldet hat.

Der „Fürst" des Rolandsecker Künstlerbahnhofes, wie Betreuerin Rosalka Johannes Wasmuth tituliert, brauchte nicht pingeling zu sein, als er die Einladungen versandte: Seine Karten, 150 DM, 120 DM, die billigsten 25 DM, finden reißenden Absatz. 50 Karten der teuersten Sorte gingen an einen anonymen Besteller nach Brüssel.

Nicht anonym meldete sich die Sekretärin „Seiner Durchlaucht". Deutschlands reichster Junggeselle, an Gütern, Geld und Schlössern wohlgesegnet, Johannes Fürst zu Thurn und Taxis, bestellte natürlich die teuersten Plätze. Aus Düsseldorf, dem wohlhabenden Klein-Paris des Rheines, kommen illustre Gäste, unter ihnen der international bekannte Finanzier Herbert Liesenfeld.

Ein superreicher Finck kommt auch angeflogen, Wilhelm von Finck, Mitinhaber des Bankhauses Waldthausen. Und auch ein Bundestagsabgeordneter, für seine prall gefüllte Brieftasche bekannt, Walther Leisler Kiep, ließ wissen, daß er teilnehme. Direktoren der Chase Manhattan Bank, das Vorstandsmitglied des Gerling-Konzerns Anton Weiler und die Cabots aus Boston werden zu jenen gehören, die wissen, was gut und teuer ist. Und dabei hatten die Cabots immer von sich behauptet, sie sprächen gerade noch mit den Lodges, und die nur noch mit dem lieben Gott.

Hoffentlich verblaßt bei soviel Geld-Adel nicht der politische „Adel" von Bonn, der zugesagt hat: Zu ihm gehören das Ex-Präsidentenpaar Heinrich und Wilhelmine Lübke, Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke, Bonns Protokollchef, Botschafter Hans Schwarzmann und mehrere Diplomaten, die Botschafter von Israel und Österreich.

Für den deutsch-amerikanischen Jet-Set gibt es natürlich in den zwei Bonner Tagen auch eine Empfangsserie. US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush hat es gerade noch möglich machen können. Der US-Diplomat, der sich auf seine nächsten Berlin-Gespräche vorbereitet, empfängt die US-Freunde am 15. April.

Vorher sind die Bostoner einschließlich ihres berühmten Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler, der auch für seine Leidenschaft für Feuerwehren bekannt ist — er besitzt mehr als 60 Feuerwehrehrenwürden und bekam zum 75. Geburtstag von seiner Gattin gar ein echtes Feuerwehrauto geschenkt —, bei Bonns Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer im Rathaus zu Gast. Außenminister Walter Scheel ist am 16. April Gastgeber im Kanzlerbungalow. Und am Nachmittag hält die Bostoner Gesellschaft gemeinsam mit Rheinland-Pfalz-Ministerpräsident Helmut Kohl Hof im Rolandsecker Bahnhof.

Doch Glanzpunkt aller Ereignisse soll das Konzert am Abend werden: 1000 Plätze sind zu vergeben. Und wer den Jet-Set bittet, muß was bieten.

Bei den Boston Pops mit ihrem Programm, das auch Beethoven und Tschaikowsky seine Reverenz erweisen wird, darf während des Konzerts gegessen und getrunken werden: Sandwichs gibt es und Bier, allerdings nicht auf den billigen Plätzen. Bliebe übrigens zu erwähnen, daß auch einige weltberühmte Künstler als Gäste zusagten: Pianist Stefan Askenase, Dada-Erfinder Hans Richter und last not least die Malerwitwe Moll.

Dirigent Arthur Fiedler mit Joan, der schönsten Frau aus dem Kennedy-Clan, bei den Proben. ®-Foto

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 18,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Dithmarscher Landeszeitung, Heide i. H.
16. April 1971

Joan Kennedy, Gattin des US-Senators Ted Kennedy, in Bonn

Prominente Gäste im Bonner Rathaus: Joan Kennedy, die Gattin des US-Senators Ted Kennedy, die während des heute abend stattfindenden Galakonzertes von Arthur Fiedler (r.) einen Textteil sprechen wird. Hier hat Fiedler einen Ehrenhelm erhalten, nachdem er die Kapelle der Bonner Feuerwehr dirigiert hat.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 316,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Allgemeine, Frankfurt/M.
vom 15. April 1971

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra kommt auf seiner derzeitigen Deutschlandtournee unter der Leitung seiner Dirigenten William Steinberg, Michael Tilson Thomas und Arthur Fiedler nach Konzerten in Stuttgart, Wuppertal, Berlin, Hannover und Hamburg am 15. April in die Höchster Jahrhunderthalle, am 16. April nach Bonn. Die Europatournee (zum 90jährigen Bestehen des Orchesters) die in London begonnen hatte, führt weiter nach Österreich, Italien, Spanien und Frankreich. Zum ersten Male nehmen auch die „Boston Pops", die Unterhaltungs- und Freiluftkonzerte bieten, daran teil.
F.A.Z.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 316,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Allgemeine, Frankfurt/M.
16. April 1971

Edward Kennedy besucht Bonn

BONN, 15. April (UPI). Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy wird am Freitag in Bonn zu getrennten Gesprächen mit Bundesaußenminister Scheel und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke zusammentreffen, teilte Regierungssprecher von Wechmar am Donnerstag mit. Kennedy ist am Donnerstag in der Bundeshauptstadt eingetroffen. Seine Frau, Joan Kennedy, wird am Freitag in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle während eines Konzerts des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" als Sprecherin der Texte von eSrge Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" auftreten.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 17,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Pirmasenser Zeitung, Pirmasens
vom 15. April 1971

Galakonzert mit Joan Kennedy morgen in Bonn

Bonn (upi) — Ein besonderes Ereignis steht den Kunstfreunden in Bonn bevor: Morgen gastiert das berühmte Boston Symphony Orchestra unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler mit dem Gala Konzert „Boston Pops" in der Beethoven-Halle. Prominenteste Interpretin ist die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan Kennedy. Als Sprecherin trägt sie die Texte von Serge Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vor. Wie der Veranstalter des Konzerts, Johannes Wasmuth, mitteilte, wird der Senator als Zuhörer an dem Konzert teilnehmen. Auf dem Programm stehen außerdem Ludwig van Beethovens Egomt-Ouvertüre und Peter Tschaikowskys Konzert für Piano Nummer 1 in b-Moll.

Morgen nachmittag findet im Gebäude des ehemaligen Bahnhofs Rolandseck ein Empfang zu Ehren Joan Kennedys statt, zu dem auch der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Helmut Kohl erwartet wird. Für Edward Kennedy ist am Vormittag ein Gespräch mit Außenminister Walter Scheel vorgesehen.

Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra, und Joan Kennedy bei der Ankunft auf dem Hamburger Flughafen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 110,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Allgemeine Zeitung, Mainz
il 1971

Gala-Konzert in Bonn

Mit Joan Kennedy als Interpretin

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra gastiert am Freitag unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler mit einem Gala-Konzert „Boston Pops" in der Bonner Beethovenhalle. Prominenteste Interpretin ist Joan Kennedy, die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, die als Sprecherin die Texte von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vorträgt. Der Senator wird als Zuhörer an dem Konzert teilnehmen. Außerdem stehen Werke von Beethoven und Tschaikowsky auf dem Programm. Am Freitagnachmittag gibt der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Kohl im Gebäude des ehemaligen Bahnhofs Rolandseck für die Gäste aus Boston einen Empfang. Für Edward Kennedy ist am Vormittag ein Gespräch mit Außenminister Scheel vorgesehen. — Wie schon gemeldet, gastiert das Orchester am Donnerstag in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle mit Werken von Schumann, Tschaikowsky und Ravel. Der Dirigent ist Michael Tilson Thomas.

em/UPI

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 165,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Saarbrücker Zeitung, Saarbrücken
vom 15. April 1971

Joan Kennedy spricht Märchen

Galakonzert „Boston Pops" in Bonn

Ein besonderes Ereignis steht den Kunstfreunden in Bonn bevor: Am Freitagabend gastiert das berühmte Boston Symphony Orchestra unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler mit dem Galakonzert „Boston Pops" in der Beethoven-Halle. Prominenteste Interpretin ist die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan Kennedy.

Als Sprecherin trägt sie die Texte von Serge Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vor. Wie der Veranstalter des Konzertes Johannes Wasmuth in Bonn mitteilte, wird Senator Edward Kennedy als Zuhörer an dem Konzert teilnehmen. Auf dem Programm stehen außerdem Ludwig van Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre und Peter Tschaikowskis Konzert für Piano Nr. 1 in b-Moll.

Am Freitagnachmittag findet im Gebäude des ehemaligen Bahnhofs Rolandseck ein Empfang zu Ehren Joan Kennedys statt, zu dem auch der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Helmut Kohl erwartet wird. Für Edward Kennedy ist am Vormittag ein Gespräch mit Außenminister Walter Scheel vorgesehen.

UPI

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 22,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hellweger Anzeiger, Unna
16. April 1971

Kennedy kommt nach Bonn

„Boston Pops" in der Beethovenhalle

Bonn. Senator Edward Kennedy wird der prominenteste Zuhörer sein, wenn seine Frau Joan heute in der Bonner Beethovenhalle den Text von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" spricht.

Das Galakonzert der 130 Bostoner Symphoniker, die unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein populäres Programm („Boston Pops") mit Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskis erstem Klavierkonzert (Solist: Earl Wild) sowie Melodien aus dem Musical „Hair" aufwarten, fällt auch deshalb aus dem Rahmen, weil die Konzertbesucher im Saal an Tischen sitzen und sich während des Konzerts an Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein laben können.

Veranstalter des Konzerts, das unter der Schirmherrschaft von US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush steht, ist die „Galerie pro" von Johannes Wasmuth.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 20,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Darmstädter Tageblatt, Darmstadt
vom 16. April 1971

Gala-Konzert in Bonn

Mit Joan Kennedy als Interpretin

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra gastiert am Freitag unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler mit einem Gala-Konzert „Boston Pops" in der Bonner Beethovenhalle. Prominenteste Interpretin ist Joan Kennedy, die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, die als Sprecherin die Texte von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vorträgt. Der Senator wird als Zuhörer an dem Konzert teilnehmen. Außerdem stehen Werke von Beethoven und Tschaikowsky auf dem Programm. Am Freitagnachmittag gibt der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Kohl im Gebäude des ehemaligen Bahnhofs Rolandseck für die Gäste aus Boston einen Empfang. Für Edward Kennedy ist am Vormittag ein Gespräch mit Außenminister Scheel vorgesehen. — Wie schon gemeldet, gastiert das Orchester am Donnerstag in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle mit Werken von Schumann, Tschaikowsky und Ravel. Der Dirigent ist Michael Tilson Thomas.

em/UPI

argus Seit 1887
Ausschnitt aus:
Honnefer Volkszeitung, Honnef
vom 16. April 1971

Bonner Feuerwehrhelm für weltberühmten Dirigenten

BONN. Das werden Bonns Feuerwehrleute niemals vergessen. Ein Mann, der sonst nur vor Galapublikum den Taktstock schwingt, dirigierte im Rathaus die Bonner Feuerwehrkapelle: Arthur Fiedler vom weltberühmten Boston Symphony Orchestra! Das war der Dank des Maestros für eine Überraschung des Bonner Oberbürgermeisters Peter Kraemer. Der OB setzte dem Feuerwehrfan Fiedler einen Bonner Feuerwehrhelm auf den Kopf. Der Meister besitzt bereits 80 solcher Helme und hat dazu auch noch 270 Ehrenmitgliedschaften der Feuerwehren aus aller Welt. Mit dem Bostoner Symphonikum kamen auch Joan Kennedy, Frau des US-Senators Edward (Ted) Kennedy, und 40 millionenschwere Amerikanern, um am heutigen Freitagabend dem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonns Beethovenhalle lauschen zu können. Eintrittspreis zwischen 25 und 150 Mark. Oberbürgermeister Kraemer: Dem Besuch der Bostoner Philharmoniker, die heute abend in der Beethovenhalle ein Galakonzert geben, habe man erwartungsvoll entgegengesehen. Das Konzert sei ein groß-

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 16,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Lüdenscheider Nachrichten, Lüdenscheid
vom 15. April 197

„Boston Pops" mit Joan Kennedy in Bonn

upi. Bonn. Ein besonderes Ereignis steht den Kunstfreunden in Bonn bevor: Am kommenden Freitagabend gastiert das berühmte Boston Symphony Orchestra unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler mit dem Gala Konzert „Boston Pops" in der Beethoven-Halle. Prominenteste Interpretin ist die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan Kennedy.

Als Sprecherin trägt sie die Texte von Serge Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vor. Wie der Veranstalter des Konzerts, Johannes Wasmuth, gestern in Bonn mitteilte, wird der Senator als Zuhörer an dem Konzert teilnehmen. Auf dem Programm stehen außerdem Ludwig van Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre und Peter Tschaikowskys Konzert für Piano Nummer eins in B-Moll.

Wasmuth zufolge findet am Freitagnachmittag im Gebäude des ehemaligen Bahnhofs Rolandseck ein Empfang zu Ehren Joan Kennedys statt, zu dem auch der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Kohl erwartet wird. Für Edward Kennedy ist am Vormittag ein Gespräch mit Außenminister Scheel vorgesehen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 32,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Pforzheimer Zeitung, Pforzheim
vom 16. April 1971

Sandwiches und Sekt zum Galakonzert

Senator Edward Kennedy wird der prominenteste Zuhörer sein, wenn seine Frau Joan in der Bonner Beethovenhalle den Text von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" spricht. Das Galakonzert der 130 Bostoner Symphoniker, die unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein populäres Programm („Boston Pops") mit Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskys erstem Klavierkonzert, sowie Melodien aus dem Musical „Hair" aufwarten, fällt auch deshalb aus dem Rahmen, weil die Konzertbesucher im Saal an Tischen sitzen und sich während des Konzerts an Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein laben können. Veranstalter des Konzerts, das unter der Schirmherrschaft von US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush steht, ist die „Galerie Pro" von Johannes Wasmuth.

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172
Information aus:
TAGBLATT
Linz Datum 16. April 1971

„Boston Pops" in Bonn

BONN. Die derzeit in Europa gastierenden Bostoner Symphoniker werden heute in der Bonner Beethovenhalle ein populäres Programm unter dem Titel „Boston Pops" bestreiten: Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskis erstes Klavierkonzert, Prokofieffs musikalisches Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" und Melodien aus dem Musical „Hair". Joan Kennedy, die Gattin von Senator Edward Kennedy, wird den Text zu „Peter und der Wolf" sprechen. Dirigent des Konzertes ist Arthur Fiedler.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 36,6 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Reutlinger Generalanzeiger, Reutlingen

vom 20. März 1971

Fiedlers Feuerwerk am Rhein

Bostoner Philharmoniker planen Ungewöhnliches

Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus Hair. Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben.

Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum. Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht; der Flug an den Rhein gleichermaßen eine gehörige Portion Skurrilität wie die Reverenz an Fiedler und seine 130 Philharmoniker.

Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen; nach 14 Jahren wieder das erste Mal, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem Orchester nach Europa kommt. Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der neuen Welt in die alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr."

Kurt Pleyer

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 43,7 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Westfälischer Anzeiger und Kurier, Hamm/Westf.

vom 15. April 1971

ZU EINEM BESUCH des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, das in der Bundesrepublik „Peter und der Wolf" aufführt, traf gestern die 34jährige Joan Kennedy, Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, in Hamburg ein. Bei einer Zwischenlandung in London (Bild) meinte sie zu Journalisten, sie wünsche sich nicht ihren Mann als Präsidentschaftskandidaten. (dpa/upi-Funkbild)

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 199,1 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Rhein-Zeitung, Koblenz

vom 16. April 1971

Konzert mit Joan Kennedy bei Sandwiches und Sekt

Senator Edward Kennedy wird der prominenteste Zuhörer sein, wenn seine Frau Joan am heutigen Freitag in der Bonner Beethovenhalle den Text von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" spricht. Das Galakonzert der 130 Bostoner Symphoniker, die unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein populäres Programm („Boston Pops") mit Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskys Erstem Klavierkonzert (Solist: Earl Wild) sowie Melodien aus dem Musical „Hair" aufwarten, fällt auch deshalb aus dem Rahmen, weil die Konzertbesucher im Saal an Tischen sitzen und sich während des Konzerts an Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein laben können. Veranstalter des Konzerts, das unter der Schirmherrschaft von US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush steht, ist die „Galerie Pro" von Johannes Wasmuth.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 27,3 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Wiesbadener Tageblatt, Wiesbaden

15. April 1971

Gala-Konzert in Bonn

Mit Joan Kennedy als Interpretin

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra gastiert am Freitag unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler mit einem Gala-Konzert „Boston Pops" in der Bonner Beethovenhalle. Prominenteste Interpretin ist Joan Kennedy, die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, die als Sprecherin die Texte von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vorträgt. Der Senator wird als Zuhörer an dem Konzert teilnehmen. Außerdem stehen Werke von Beethoven und Tschaikowsky auf dem Programm. Am Freitagnachmittag gibt der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Kohl im Gebäude des ehemaligen Bahnhofs Rolandseck für die Gäste aus Boston einen Empfang. Für Edward Kennedy ist am Vormittag ein Gespräch mit Außenminister Scheel vorgesehen. — Wie schon gemeldet, gastiert das Orchester am Donnerstag in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle mit Werken von Schumann, Tschaikowsky und Ravel. Der Dirigent ist Michael Tilson Thomas.

em/UPI

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 14,3 — lt. „Leitfaden 1969" —

Ausschnitt aus:

Oldenburgische Volkszeitung, Vechta

16. April 1971

Gala-Konzert in Bonn

Mit Joan Kennedy als Interpretin

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra gastiert am Freitag unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler mit einem Gala-Konzert „Boston Pops" in der Bonner Beethovenhalle. Prominenteste Interpretin ist Joan Kennedy, die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, die als Sprecherin die Texte von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vorträgt. Der Senator wird als Zuhörer an dem Konzert teilnehmen. Außerdem stehen Werke von Beethoven und Tschaikowsky auf dem Programm. Am Freitagnachmittag gibt der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Kohl im Gebäude des ehemaligen Bahnhofs Rolandseck für die Gäste aus Boston einen Empfang. Für Edward Kennedy ist am Vormittag ein Gespräch mit Außenminister Scheel vorgesehen. — Wie schon gemeldet, gastiert das Orchester am Donnerstag in der Höchster Jahrhunderthalle mit Werken von Schumann, Tschaikowsky und Ravel. Der Dirigent ist Michael Tilson Thomas.

em/UPI

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 314,2 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Hamburger Abendblatt, Hamburg

vom 16. April 1971

Kennedy-Empfang

Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy, der sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan anläßlich eines Gala-Konzerts des „Bonston Pops"-Orchesters in Bonn aufhält, wird heute von den Ministern Scheel und Ehmke empfangen.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 50,2 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Aachener Nachrichten, Aachen

vom 15. März 1971

Nach zwölf Jahren wird das Boston Symphony Orchestra erneut eine Deutschland-Tournee unternehmen. Es wird dabei von seinen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler, William Steinberg und Michael Tilson Thomas geleitet.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 133,0 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Westdeutsche Allgemeine, Ausgabe Essen

vom 15. April 1971

Joan Kennedy in Hamburg

Die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan Kennedy, ist am Mittwoch in Hamburg eingetroffen. Am Abend besuchte sie ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Hansestadt. Am Freitagabend tritt sie dann in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle während eines weiteren Konzerts des Orchesters als Sprecherin der Texte von Serge Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" auf. Die Besucher sitzen im Beethovensaal an Tischen und können sich während des Konzerts an Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein laben. Auch Senator Edward Kennedy wird an diesem Tag in Bonn sein und unter anderem von Außenminister Walter Scheel empfangen werden.

ap-Telebild

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 30,3 — lt. „Leitfaden 1969" —

Ausschnitt aus:

Ostfriesenzeitung, Leer

vom 16. April 1971

„Boston Pops" in Bonn

Bonn. Senator Edward Kennedy wird der prominenteste Zuhörer sein, wenn seine Frau Joan am Freitag in der Bonner Beethovenhalle den Text von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" spricht. Das Galakonzert der 130 Bostoner Symphoniker, die unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein populäres Programm („Boston Pops") mit Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskys erstem Klavierkonzert (Solist: Earl Wild) sowie Melodien aus dem Musical „Hair" aufwarten, fällt auch deshalb aus dem Rahmen, weil die Konzertbesucher im Saal an Tischen sitzen und sich während des Konzerts an Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein laben können.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 30,3 — lt. „Leitfaden 1969" —

Ausschnitt aus:

Ostfriesenzeitung, Leer

vom 15. April 1971

Joan Kenndey besucht Hamburg

Washington. Die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan Kennedy (Bild), traf am Mittwoch in Hamburg ein. Nach Angaben des amerikanischen Generalkonsulats besuchte sie am Abend ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Hansestadt. Senator Edward Kennedy war an diesem Tag in Bonn.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 22,7 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Hellweger Anzeiger, Unna

vom 15. April 197

ZU EINEM BESUCH des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, das in der Bundesrepublik „Peter und der Wolf" aufführt, traf gestern die 34jährige Joan Kennedy, Frau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, in Hamburg ein. Bei einer Zwischenlandung in London (Bild) meinte sie zu Journalisten, sie wünsche sich nicht ihren Mann als Präsidentschaftskandidaten. (dpa/upi-Funkbild)

argus
Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 57,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Bonner Rundschau, Bonn
16. April 1971

Super-Show im Alten Rathaus

Arthur Fiedler dirigierte die Feuerwehrkapelle – Joan Kennedy stürmisch gefeiert

VON EVI KEIL UND HANS SCHAMBERGER

Bonn. Im Alten Rathaus haben sie gestern die Show abgezogen. Doch davor mußten die Festgäste fast eine geschlagene Stunde lang bangen, ob Joan Kennedy und Arthur Fiedler, Stars eines Empfangs von Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer, überhaupt kommen würden: Sie waren von langem Flug und langer Besichtigung des Kölner Domes ermüdet.

Dann kamen sie doch, festlich empfangen, später lautstark begrüßt von der Bonner Feuerwehrkapelle, die nun doch noch spielte: When the saints go marching in. „Bravo" rief der Maestro und griff selbst zum Dirigentenstab. Die Feuerwehr intonierte zu Ehren der Ehrengäste im Alten Rathaus den Marsch „Washington Post". Doch vorher noch gab es feierliche Worte von Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer: Dem Besuch der Bostoner Philharmoniker, die heute abend in der Beethovenhalle ein Galakonzert geben, habe man erwartungsvoll entgegengesehen. Das Konzert sei ein großartiger Nachtrag zum Beethovenfest zum 200. Geburtstag: „Wir heißen Sie in der Beethovenstadt herzlich willkommen."

Bürgermeister Michael Hitz begrüßte Arthur Fiedler auf Englisch an der Pforte zum Gobelinsaal: „Maestro, we are very glad to see you here." Dann ging die Saaltür auf und Bonns Feuerwehrmusiker musizierten und Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer setzte dem Feuerwehrfan Fiedler einen Bonner Feuerwehrhelm auf den Kopf. Der Meister besitzt bereits 80 solcher Helme und hat dazu auch noch 270 Ehrenmitgliedschaften der Feuerwehren aus aller Welt.

Schon am Morgen war die US-Gesellschaft am Flughafen von einem Fotografen-Rudel empfangen worden. Ein halbes Hundert Reporter umringten Joan Kennedy, die in einem raffiniert einfach geschnittenen Leinenmantel mit passenden Blue jeans im amerikanischen Western-Look aus der Maschine stieg.

Das reifende Stimmwunder Heintje, das mit der Maschine weiterflog, mit der Joan Kennedy gerade angekommen war, wurde gestern von den Fotografen nicht beachtet: Nicht ein Blitzlicht wurde auf den an der Café-Bar des Abflugs harrenden Heintje abgeschossen.

Kenneth Rush, US-Botschafter in Bonn, hatte einen Flug nach Berlin um ein paar Stunden herausgeschoben, um gestern Abend in seiner Botschafterresidenz in der Rolandstraße Joan Kennedy, Arthur Fiedler und die Boston Friends zu empfangen. Der Botschafter, Gattin Jane und Tochter Cynthia begrüßten eine strahlend gut gelaunte Joan: In einem schneeweißen Mini-Wollkleid erschien die Senatorengattin. Kaum hatte sie die ersten Honneurs hinter sich, da stürzte das Botschaftspersonal auf sie zu. Joan Kennedy mußte auf alten Speisekarten für Kellner und Stubenmädchen Autogramme im Non-Stop geben.

Dirigent Arthur Fiedler erblickte als erster unter den Gästen Dr. Max Adenauer: „Ich erkenne ihn, bei der Ähnlichkeit mit dem Vater.", fand er. Dr. Adenauer, von einem Zelt-Ausflug aus Nepal zurück, war der richtige Gesprächspartner für den berühmten Dirigenten: „21 Millionen DM zahlt die Stadt Köln für Oper und Orchester", verriet er dem Amerikaner, dessen Musiker seinerseits auf Privatmittel angewiesen sind. Konterte Fiedler: „Und unsere Boston Friends geben für uns zwischen 50 und 500 000 Dollar."

Paßt: Der Feuerwehrhelm aus Bonn für Arthur Fiedler. Foto: Munkel

sako
Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172
Information aus:
NEUE ZEIT
Graz
16. April 1971
Datum

Künstlerin Kennedy

Joan Kennedy, Gattin des nach Präsidentschaftsehren strebenden letzten Kennedys Edward, jagt auf eigenen Wegen dem Weltruhm nach: In der Bonner Beethovenhalle spricht sie heute im Rahmen eines Konzerts der Bostoner Symphoniker den Text zu Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf".

HAMBURGER ABENDBLATT - 15.4.1971

Mit Feuerwehrhelm: Dirigent Otto Fiedler aus Boston

Fiedler wurde Feuerwehrmann von Sasel . . .

Nach dem Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Hamburger Musikhalle stand gestern abend bei einem Empfang für 400 Ehrengäste im Atlantic Hotel Dirigent Arthur Fiedler im Mittelpunkt. Dem 77jährigen weltberühmten Künstler wurde, als er im Hotel die 24köpfige Blaskapelle der Freiwilligen Feuerwehr Hamburg-Sasel dirigierte, nicht weniger applaudiert als zuvor in der Musikhalle. (Es ist Fiedlers Hobby, in aller Welt Feuerwehrkapellen zu dirigieren.) Mit der Überreichung eines Saseler Feuerwehrhelms wurde er zum Ehren-Feuerwehrmann ernannt. Mittags hatte Fiedler auf dem Hamburger Flughafen Joan Kennedy, Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy, mit Rosen empfangen. Freitag abend wollen sie gemeinsam in der Bonner Beethovenhalle auftreten. (Siehe auch Seite 9) Fotos: KIESEL/FEDDERSEN

Vom Flughafen ins Hotelbett: Übermüdete Joan Kennedy

126

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 57,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Bonner Rundschau, Bonn
16. April 1971

Super-Show im Alten Rathaus

Arthur Fiedler dirigierte die Feuerwehrkapelle — Joan Kennedy stürmisch gefeiert

VON EVI KEIL UND HANS SCHAMBERGER

Bonn. Im Alten Rathaus haben sie gestern die Show abgezogen. Doch davor mußten die Festgäste fast eine geschlagene Stunde lang bangen, ob Joan Kennedy und Arthur Fiedler, Stars eines Empfangs von Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer, überhaupt kommen würden: Sie waren von langem Flug und langer Besichtigung des Kölner Domes ermüdet.

Dann kamen sie doch, festlich empfangen, später lautstark begrüßt von der Bonner Feuerwehrkapelle, die nun doch noch spielte: When the saints go marching in. „Bravo" rief der Maestro und griff selbst zum Dirigentenstab. Die Feuerwehr intonierte zu Ehren der Ehrengäste im Alten Rathaus den Marsch „Washington Post". Doch vorher noch gab es feierliche Worte von Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer: Dem Besuch der Bostoner Philharmoniker, die heute abend in der Beethovenhalle ein Galakonzert geben, habe man erwartungsvoll entgegengesehen. Das Konzert sei ein großartiger Nachtrag zum Beethovenfest zum 200. Geburtstag: „Wir heißen Sie in der Beethovenstadt herzlich willkommen."

Bürgermeister Michael Hitz begrüßte Arthur Fiedler auf Englisch an der Pforte zum Gobelinsaal: „Maestro, we are very glad to see you here." Dann ging die Saaltür auf und Bonns Feuerwehrmusiker musizierten und Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer setzte dem Feuerwehrfan Fiedler einen Bonner Feuerwehrhelm auf den Kopf. Der Meister besitzt bereits 80 solcher Helme und hat dazu auch noch 270 Ehrenmitgliedschaften der Feuerwehren aus aller Welt.

Schon am Morgen war die US-Gesellschaft am Flughafen von einem Fotografen-Rudel empfangen worden. Ein halbes Hundert Reporter umringten Joan Kennedy, die in einem raffiniert einfach geschnittenen Leinenmantel mit passenden Blue jeans im amerikanischen Western-Look aus der Maschine stieg.

Das reifende Stimmwunder Heintje, das mit der Maschine weiterflog, mit der Joan Kennedy gerade angekommen war, wurde gestern von den Fotografen nicht beachtet: Nicht ein Blitzlicht wurde auf den an der Café-Bar des Abflugs harrenden Heintje abgeschossen.

Kenneth Rush, US-Botschafter in Bonn, hatte einen Flug nach Berlin um ein paar Stunden herausgeschoben, um gestern Abend in seiner Botschafterresidenz in der Rolandstraße Joan Kennedy, Arthur Fiedler und die Boston Friends zu empfangen. Der Botschafter, Gattin Jane und Tochter Cynthia begrüßten eine strahlend gut gelaunte Joan: In einem schneeweißen Mini-Wollkleid erschien die Senatorengattin. Kaum hatte sie die ersten Honneurs hinter sich, da stürzte das Botschaftspersonal auf sie zu. Joan Kennedy mußte auf alten Speisekarten für Kellner und Stubenmädchen Autogramme im Non-Stop geben.

Dirigent Arthur Fiedler erblickte als erster unter den Gästen Dr. Max Adenauer: „Ich erkenne ihn, bei der Ähnlichkeit mit dem Vater.", fand er. Dr. Adenauer, von einem Zelt-Ausflug aus Nepal zurück, war der richtige Gesprächspartner für den berühmten Dirigenten: „21 Millionen DM zahlt die Stadt Köln für Oper und Orchester", verriet er dem Amerikaner, dessen Musiker seinerseits auf Privatmittel angewiesen sind. Konterte Fiedler: „Und unsere Boston Friends geben für uns zwischen 50 und 500 000 Dollar."

Paßt: Der Feuerwehrhelm aus Bonn für Arthur Fiedler. Foto: Munker

sako
Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172

Information aus:
NEUE ZEIT
Graz
Datum 16. April 1971

Künstlerin Kennedy

Joan Kennedy, Gattin des nach Präsidentschaftsehren strebenden letzten Kennedys Edward, jagt auf eigenen Wegen dem Weltruhm nach: In der Bonner Beethovenhalle spricht sie heute im Rahmen eines Konzerts der Bostoner Symphoniker den Text zu Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf".

HAMBURGER ABENDBLATT - 15.4.1971

Mit Feuerwehrhelm: Dirigent Otto Fiedler aus Boston

Fiedler wurde Feuerwehrmann von Sasel . . .

Nach dem Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Hamburger Musikhalle stand gestern abend bei einem Empfang für 400 Ehrengäste im Atlantic Hotel Dirigent Arthur Fiedler im Mittelpunkt. Dem 77jährigen weltberühmten Künstler wurde, als er im Hotel die 24köpfige Blaskapelle der Freiwilligen Feuerwehr Hamburg-Sasel dirigierte, nicht weniger applaudiert als zuvor in der Musikhalle. (Es ist Fiedlers Hobby, in aller Welt Feuerwehrkapellen zu dirigieren.) Mit der Überreichung eines Saseler Feuerwehrhelms wurde er zum Ehren-Feuerwehrmann ernannt. Mittags hatte Fiedler auf dem Hamburger Flughafen Joan Kennedy, Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy, mit Rosen empfangen. Freitag abend wollen sie gemeinsam in der Bonner Beethovenhalle auftreten. (Siehe auch Seite 9) Fotos: KIESEL/FEDDERSEN

Vom Flughafen ins Hotelbett: Übermüdete Joan Kennedy

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 12,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Lahrer Zeitung, Lahr
vom 30. März 1971

Boston-Pops in der Beethovenhalle

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker geben in Bonn ein ungewöhnliches Galakonzert

(np). Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus Hair. Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht; der Flug an den Rhein gleichermaßen eine gehörige Portion Skurrilität wie die Reverenz an Fiedler und seine 130 Philharmoniker.

Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Alle Karten sind jetzt schon ausverkauft — schließlich soll es nach 14 Jahren wieder das erste Mal sein, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der neuen Welt in die alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 153,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälische Nachrichten, Münster
vom 27. März 1971

BONN - von Woche zu Woche

Einer oder 99 Gerechte?

Goldene Worte im Bundestag / Stars zu Gast

Aus der Bundestagsdebatte über die inneren Reformen in dieser Woche verdienen zwei Sätze prominenter Oppositionspolitiker der CDU festgehalten zu werden. „Weniger über Reformen reden und mehr tun!" sagte der ehemalige Arbeits- und Sozialminister Hans Katzer. Und: „Veränderungen in unserer Gesellschaft erfolgen auch ohne unser Zutun," meinte der ehemalige Wissenschaftsminister Gerhard Stoltenberg. Für den aufmerksamen und kritischen Beobachter waren dies Nadelstiche, die dem aufgeblasenen Paradepferd „innere Reformen" einige Luft abließen. Urwüchsig bayrisch äußerte sich der CSU-Politiker und ehemalige Landwirtschaftsminister Hermann Höcherl zum gleichen Thema: Der Kanzler hätte zugeben sollen, daß er bei der Regierungserklärung „den Mund zu voll genommen" habe und zurückschrauben müssen. Dabei zeigte Höcherl sich fast ganz bibelfest, als er zitierte: „Über einen reuigen Sünder ist im Himmel mehr Freude als über einen Gerechten." (Zwischenruf „... über 99 Gerechte!" – Höcherl: „Was, neunundneunzig? Na, ich wollte nicht zu weit gehen!"

In einem Illustrierten-Interview hatte der prominente SPD-Politiker und Kanzler-Freund Herbert Wehner seinerseits die Ansicht geäußert, daß man in einer Legislaturperiode über zwei, allerhöchstens drei Reformen reden könne, die man auch durchzusetzen vermag. Wörtlich sagte er: „Die Regierung hat weder einen Bauchladen, noch ist sie ein Supermarkt, in dem sich jeder holen kann, was ihm in die Augen sticht." Das scheint allerdings seine ganz private Erkenntnis zu sein, von der seine Parteifreunde im Kabinett bisher noch nichts wissen wollen.

Zum drittenmal während seiner Amtszeit erholte sich Bundeskanzler Willy Brandt bei einem „Künstleressen" von der harten Regierungsarbeit. Bei diesem „Abendessen mit Wissenschaftlern und Künstlern im Bungalow" – wie die offizielle Bezeichnung lautet – war die erfolgreiche Chanson-Sängerin und neuerliche Bestsellerautorin Hildegard Knef Brandts Tischdame, und Frau Rut saß zwischen dem Schauspieler Maximilian Schell und dem Dirigenten Christoph von Dohnanyi, einem Bruder des Bonner Staatssekretärs. Mit von der Partie waren unter anderem auch die beliebten Fernsehunterhalter Dietmar Schönherr und Vivi Bach. Wie verlautet, gesellten sich zu den Künstlern aus Regierungskreisen die Verehrer schöner Frauen: Verteidigungsminister Helmut Schmidt, Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke und Regierungssprecher Conrad Ahlers.

In Kürze werden in Bonn Regierung und Diplomatie Ehrengäste sein bei einem kulinarischen Konzert nach feiner Bostoner Art. Die 130 Bostoner Symphoniker kommen am 16. April in die Bonner Beethovenhalle mit einem Programm, das von Beethoven über Tschaikowski und Prokofieff bis zu Oklahoma, Westside-Story und Hair reicht.

Bei diesem Konzert nach Vorbild der „Boston pops", sitzen die Gäste an Tischen und dinieren. Es werden allerdings trotz des Eintrittspreises von 120 und 150 DM außer Wein und Sekt nur Sandwiches serviert werden, „damit es nicht zu sehr in Musik klappert". Höhepunkt der „Bonn pops" wird der Auftritt von Joan Kennedy sein. Sie erzählt zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" die Legende. Unter den Gästen; die mit einer Sondermaschine aus Amerika zu diesem Galakonzert kommen, werden Senator Ted Kennedy und Bankpräsident David Rockefeller sein.

Wer es noch nicht gemerkt haben sollte: Bonn wird eine Metropole mit Musik und internationaler Gesellschaft.

INGEBURG REISSENBERGER

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westdeutsche Rundschau, Wuppertal
vom 24. März 1971

Händel mit Festessen

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker kommen nach Bonn

Von Kurt Pleyer

Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten. Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis Klavierkonzert b-Moll, Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus „Hair". Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokofjew-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung wird nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht.

Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Nach 14 Jahren ist es das erstemal, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der Neuen Welt in die Alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 37,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Saarbrücker Landeszeitung, Saarbrücken
25. März 1971

Boston-Pops nach Bonn

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker geben ein ungewöhnliches Galakonzert

Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „boston-Pop" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus Hair. Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht; der Flug an den Rhein gleichermaßen eine gehörige Portion Skurrilität wie die Reverenz an Fiedler und seine 130 Philharmoniker.

Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents ma-

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 342,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Rheinische Post, Düsseldorf
vom 30. März 1971

Bostoner Symphoniker kommen

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra unternimmt im April seine dritte Europa-Tournee. Unter seinen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler, William Steinberg und Michael Tilson Thomas wird das Orchester in Stuttgart (7. April), Wuppertal (8. April), Berlin (10. und 11. April), Hannover (13. April), Hamburg (14. April), Frankfurt (15. April) und Wien (17. und 18. April) Konzerte geben. Unter Mitwirkung von Joan Kennedy als Sprecherin des von Prokofieff vertonten Märchens „Peter und der Wolf" findet am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle eine Veranstaltung der „Boston Pops" unter Leitung von Arthur Fiedler statt. Das führende amerikanische Orchester wird unter anderem auch noch in Rom, Paris, London und Barcelona gastieren.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 56,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Darmstädter Echo, Darmstadt
vom 30. März 1971

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester unternimmt im April seine dritte Europa- und Deutschlandtournee. Unter seinen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler, William Steinberg und Michael Tilson Thomas wird das Orchester in Stuttgart (7. April), Wuppertal (8. April), Berlin (10. und 11. April), Hannover (13. April), Hamburg (14. April), Frankfurt am Main (15. April) und Wien (17. und 18. April) Konzerte geben.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 43,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälischer Anzeiger und Kurier, Hamm/Westf.
vom 20. März 1971

Boston-Pops in der Beethovenhalle

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker geben ungewöhnlichen Galaabend

Bonn. Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und aus „Hair". Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Wahrlich für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht. Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Alle Karten sind jetzt schon ausverkauft — schließlich wird es nach 14 Jahren wieder das erstemal sein, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem berühmten Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der neuen Welt in die alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr!" Kurt Pleyer

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 12,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Lahrer Zeitung, Lahr
vom 30. März 1971

Boston-Pops in der Beethovenhalle

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker geben in Bonn ein ungewöhnliches Galakonzert

(np). Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus Hair. Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht; der Flug an den Rhein gleichermaßen eine gehö-ige Portion Skurrilität wie die Reverenz an Fiedler und seine 130 Philharmoniker.

Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Alle Karten sind jetzt schon ausverkauft — schließlich soll es nach 14 Jahren wieder das erste Mal sein, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der neuen Welt in die alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 37,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Saarbrücker Landeszeitung, Saarbrücken
25. März 1971

Boston-Pops nach Bonn

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker gaben ein ungewöhnliches Galakonzert

Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „boston-Pop" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus Hair. Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht; der Flug an den Rhein gleichermaßen eine gehörige Portion Skurrilität wie die Reverenz an Fiedler und seine 130 Philharmoniker.

Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Alle Karten sind jetzt schon ausverkauft — schließlich soll es nach 14 Jahren wieder das erste Mal sein, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der Neuen Welt in die Alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 342,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Rheinische Post, Düsseldorf
vom 30. März 1971

Bostoner Symphoniker kommen

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra unternimmt im April seine dritte Europa-Tournee. Unter seinen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler, William Steinberg und Michael Tilson Thomas wird das Orchester in Stuttgart (7. April), Wuppertal (8. April), Berlin (10. und 11. April), Hannover (13. April), Hamburg (14. April), Frankfurt (15. April) und Wien (17. und 18. April) Konzerte geben. Unter Mitwirkung von Joan Kennedy als Sprecherin des von Prokofieff vertonten Märchens „Peter und der Wolf" findet am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle eine Veranstaltung der „Boston Pops" unter Leitung von Arthur Fiedler statt. Das führende amerikanische Orchester wird unter anderem auch noch in Rom, Paris, London und Barcelona gastieren.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 153,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälische Nachrichten, Münster
vom 27. März 1971

BONN - von Woche zu Woche

Einer oder 99 Gerechte?

Goldene Worte im Bundestag / Stars zu Gast

Aus der Bundestagsdebatte über die inneren Reformen in dieser Woche verdienen zwei Sätze prominenter Oppositionspolitiker der CDU festgehalten zu werden. „Weniger über Reformen reden und mehr tun!" sagte der ehemalige Arbeits- und Sozialminister Hans Katzer. Und: „Veränderungen in unserer Gesellschaft erfolgen auch ohne unser Zutun," meinte der ehemalige Wissenschaftsminister Gerhard Stoltenberg. Für den aufmerksamen und kritischen Beobachter waren dies Nadelstiche, die dem aufgeblasenen Paradepferd „innere Reformen" einige Luft abließen. Urwüchsig bayrisch äußerte sich der CSU-Politiker und ehemalige Landwirtschaftsminister Hermann Höcherl zum gleichen Thema: Der Kanzler hätte zugeben sollen, daß er bei der Regierungserklärung „den Mund zu voll genommen" habe und zurückschrauben müssen. Dabei zeigte Höcherl sich fast ganz bibelfest, als er zitierte: „Über einen reuigen Sünder ist im Himmel mehr Freude als über einen Gerechten." (Zwischenruf „... über 99 Gerechte!" – Höcherl: „Was, neunundneunzig? Na, ich wollte nicht zu weit gehen!"

In einem Illustrierten-Interview hatte der prominente SPD-Politiker und Kanzler-Freund Herbert Wehner seinerseits die Ansicht geäußert, daß man in einer Legislaturperiode über zwei, allerhöchstens drei Reformen reden könne, die man auch durchzusetzen vermag. Wörtlich sagte er: „Die Regierung hat weder einen Bauchladen, noch ist sie ein Supermarkt, in dem sich jeder holen kann, was ihm in die Augen sticht." Das scheint allerdings seine ganz private Erkenntnis zu sein, von der seine Parteifreunde im Kabinett bisher noch nichts wissen wollen.

Zum drittenmal während seiner Amtszeit erholte sich Bundeskanzler Willy Brandt bei einem „Künstleressen" von der harten Regierungsarbeit. Bei diesem „Abendessen mit Wissenschaftlern und Künstlern im Bungalow" – wie die offizielle Bezeichnung lautet – war die erfolgreiche Chanson-Sängerin und neuerliche Bestsellerautorin Hildegard Knef Brandts Tischdame, und Frau Rut saß zwischen dem Schauspieler Maximilian Schell und dem Dirigenten Christoph von Dohnanyi, einem Bruder des Bonner Staatssekretärs. Mit von der Partie waren unter anderem auch die beliebten Fernsehunterhalter Dietmar Schönherr und Vivi Bach. Wie verlautet, gesellten sich zu den Künstlern aus Regierungskreisen die Verehrer schöner Frauen: Verteidigungsminister Helmut Schmidt, Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke und Regierungssprecher Conrad Ahlers.

In Kürze werden in Bonn Regierung und Diplomatie Ehrengäste sein bei einem kulinarischen Konzert nach feiner Bostoner Art. Die 130 Bostoner Symphoniker kommen am 16. April in die Bonner Beethovenhalle mit einem Programm, das von Beethoven über Tschaikowski und Prokofieff bis zu Oklahoma, Westside-Story und Hair reicht.

Bei diesem Konzert nach Vorbild der „Boston pops", sitzen die Gäste an Tischen und dinieren. Es werden allerdings trotz des Eintrittspreises von 120 und 150 DM außer Wein und Sekt nur Sandwiches serviert werden, „damit es nicht zu sehr in Musik klappert". Höhepunkt der „Bonn pops" wird der Auftritt von Joan Kennedy sein. Sie erzählt zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" die Legende. Unter den Gästen, die mit einer Sondermaschine aus Amerika zu diesem Galakonzert kommen, werden Senator Ted Kennedy und Bankpräsident David Rockefeller sein.

Wer es noch nicht gemerkt haben sollte: Bonn wird eine Metropole mit Musik und internationaler Gesellschaft.

INGEBURG REISSENBERGER

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 56,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Darmstädter Echo, Darmstadt
vom 30. März 1971

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester unternimmt im April seine dritte Europa- und Deutschlandtournee. Unter seinen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler, William Steinberg und Michael Tilson Thomas wird das Orchester in Stuttgart (7. April), Wuppertal (8. April), Berlin (10. und 11. April), Hannover (13. April), Hamburg (14. April), Frankfurt am Main (15. April) und Wien (17. und 18. April) Konzerte geben.

126

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westdeutsche Rundschau, Wuppertal
vom 24. März 1971

Händel mit Festessen

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker kommen nach Bonn

Von Kurt Pleyer

Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten. Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis Klavierkonzert b-Moll, Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus „Hair". Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokofjew-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung wird nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht.

Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Nach 14 Jahren ist es das erstemal, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der Neuen Welt in die Alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 43,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälischer Anzeiger und Kurier, Hamm/Westf.
vom 20. März 1971

Boston-Pops in der Beethovenhalle

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker geben ungewöhnlichen Galaabend

Bonn. Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und aus „Hair". Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Wahrlich für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht. Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Alle Karten sind jetzt schon ausverkauft — schließlich wird es nach 14 Jahren wieder das erstemal sein, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem berühmten Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der neuen Welt in die alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr!" Kurt Pleyer

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 16,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Lüdenscheider Nachrichten, Lüdenscheid
vom 24. März 1971

„Boston-Pop" in der Beethovenhalle

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker geben ein ungewöhnliches Konzert — Jean Kennedy angekündigt

Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus Hair. Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rokkefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht; der Flug an den Rhein ist gleichermaßen eine gehörige Portion Skurilität wie die Reverenz an Fiedler und seine 130 Philharmoniker.

Die Bostoner werden von der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Alle Karten sind jetzt schon ausverkauft — schließlich soll es nach 14 Jahren wieder das erste Mal sein, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der neuen Welt in die alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr."

Kurt Pleyer

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 116,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Düsseldorfer Nachrichten, Düsseldorf
vom 24. März 1971

Händel mit Festessen

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker kommen nach Bonn

Von Kurt Pleyer

Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten. Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis Klavierkonzert b-Moll, Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus „Hair". Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokofjew-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung wird nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht.

Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Nach 14 Jahren ist es das erstemal, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der Neuen Welt in die Alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 153,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Badische Neueste Nachrichten, Karlsruhe
vom 27. März 1971

DIE FIRST LADY VON MORGEN?

Wenn man hübsch ist und zudem Kennedy heißt

Im kommenden Monat wird sie in Bonn, Wien und Rom zusammen mit Arthur Fiedler und den „Boston Pops" auftreten, um die Geschichte von Peter und dem Wolf zu erzählen. Die Boston-Pops sind ein Ableger des Boston Symphonie Orchesters, dessen Ruf unter der Leitung von Leonard Bernstein über die USA hinausdrang. Joan hat am Manhattanville College, einer der von Nonnen geleiteten Mädchenschulen Musik studiert und sich nicht um die Politik gekümmert.

Dies änderte sich aber schlagartig, als sie den Jüngsten der Kennedybrüder geheiratet hatte. In einem ihrer wenigen Zeitungsinterviews hat Joan Kennedy einmal die Bemerkung gemacht: „Wenn man durch Einheirat eine Kennedy wurde, ist es das Schwerste, mit dem Clan Schritt zu halten". In den Hallen der Macht, des Wohlstandes und des Ruhms hat sie es letztlich gelernt. Obwohl Kameras surren und Blitzlichter aufflackern, wenn sich Joan Kennedy in der Öffentlichkeit zeigt, können die Klatschreporterinnen kaum ein Wort aus ihr herausholen. Die Vertrauten in ihrer Umgebung charakterisieren sie als schüchtern und zurückhaltend, die jene aufgeblasene Geschäftigkeit und Geschwätzigkeit der Gesellschaftslöwen ablehnt. Sie hat in den politischen Zirkeln keine Feinde, denn sie diskutiert nicht über Politik und macht keine umstrittenen Bemerkungen über umstrittene Themen.

Das wichtigste Examen einer Kennedy hat Joan aber mit Brillianz bestanden. Vor der letzten Senatswahl im November 1970 war sie von morgens bis abends im Wahlkampf, schüttelte Hände und sprach vor den Supermärkten mit den Hausfrauen, ihren Ted doch zu wählen. In einem überfüllten Klubhaus zeigte sie Schmalfilme von den Urlaubsreisen der Familie und weist jeden Hinweis auf die Affäre mit Mary Jo Kopechne von sich. „Ich glaube alles, was mein Mann mir erzählt hat, und wenn die Sache noch immer im Gerede ist, so ist das die Presse." Sie nimmt Babies auf den Arm und läßt sich willig fotografieren. Auf einer Kegelbahn zieht sie geschwind die Schuhe aus und läßt die Kugel einmal in die vollen rollen.

Sie weiß genau, daß dieser etwas hemdsärmelige Kontakt mit dem Volk zum politischen Geschäft gehört, um den Namen der Kennedys und ihr „Image" im Volk bekannt zu machen. Sie hält sich eigentlich vielmehr für eine Hausmutter, die für ihre drei Kinder sorgt und den Stab von Angestellten dirigiert. Dazu gehören neben einem Butler und einem Gärtner noch eine Sekretärin und der französische Koch, der ehemals in den Diensten der Herzogin von Windsor stand.

Die Frage, ob sie gern als First Lady im Weißen Haus residieren und „Ted" als Präsidenten sehen möchte, beantwortet sie immer wieder mit einem kategorischen Nein.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 21,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ruhr-Anzeiger, Hattingen
vom 20. März 1971

Boston-Pops in der Beethovenhalle

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker geben ungewöhnlichen Galaabend

Bonn. Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und aus „Hair". Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Wahrlich für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht. Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Alle Karten sind jetzt schon ausverkauft — schließlich wird es nach 14 Jahren wieder das erstemal sein, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem berühmten Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der neuen Welt in die alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr!"

Kurt Pleyer

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 37,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Offenburger Tageblatt, Offenburg
vom 30. März 1971

Boston-Pops in der Beethovenhalle

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker geben in Bonn ein ungewöhnliches Galakonzert

(np). Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus Hair. Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht; der Flug an den Rhein gleichermaßen eine gehörige Portion Skurrilität wie die Reverenz an Fiedler und seine 130 Philharmoniker.

Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Alle Karten sind jetzt schon ausverkauft — schließlich soll es nach 14 Jahren wieder das erste Mal sein, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der neuen Welt in die alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 26,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Spandauer Volksblatt, Berlin-Spandau
vom 31. März 1971

„Boston Pops" in Bonn mit Joan Kennedy

Das 1881 gegründete Boston Symphonie Orchestra unternimmt im April seine dritte Europa- und Deutschland-Tournee. Unter seinen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler, William Steinberg und Michael Tilson Thomas wird das Orchester in Stuttgart, Berlin (10. und 11. April), Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt/Main und Wien Konzerte geben.

Unter Mitwirkung von Joan Kennedy als Sprecherin des von Prokofjew vertonten Märchens „Peter und der Wolf" findet am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle eine Exklusivveranstaltung der „Boston Pops" unter Leitung von Arthur Fiedler statt. Das führende amerikanische Orchester wird unter anderem auch noch in Rom, Paris, London und Barcelona gastieren.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 16,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Lüdenscheider Nachrichten, Lüdenscheid
vom 24. März 1971

„Boston-Pop" in der Beethovenhalle

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker geben ein ungewöhnliches Konzert — Jean Kennedy angekündigt

Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus Hair. Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rokkefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht; der Flug an den Rhein ist gleichermaßen eine gehörige Portion Skurilität wie die Reverenz an Fiedler und seine 130 Philharmoniker.

Die Bostoner werden von der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Alle Karten sind jetzt schon ausverkauft — schließlich soll es nach 14 Jahren wieder das erste Mal sein, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der neuen Welt in die alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr."

Kurt Pleyer

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 116,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Düsseldorfer Nachrichten, Düsseldorf
vom 24. März 1971

Händel mit Festessen

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker kommen nach Bonn

Von Kurt Pleyer

Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten. Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis Klavierkonzert b-Moll, Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus „Hair". Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokofjew-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung wird nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht.

Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Nach 14 Jahren ist es das erstemal, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der Neuen Welt in die Alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 153,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Badische Neueste Nachrichten, Karlsruhe
vom 27. März 1971

DIE FIRST LADY VON MORGEN?

Wenn man hübsch ist und zudem Kennedy heißt

Im kommenden Monat wird sie in Bonn, Wien und Rom zusammen mit Arthur Fiedler und den „Boston Pops" auftreten, um die Geschichte von Peter und dem Wolf zu erzählen. Die Boston-Pops sind ein Ableger des Boston Symphonie Orchesters, dessen Ruf unter der Leitung von Leonard Bernstein über die USA hinausdrang. Joan hat am Manhattanville College, einer der von Nonnen geleiteten Mädchenschulen Musik studiert und sich nicht um die Politik gekümmert.

Dies änderte sich aber schlagartig, als sie den Jüngsten der Kennedybrüder geheiratet hatte. In einem ihrer wenigen Zeitungsinterviews hat Joan Kennedy einmal die Bemerkung gemacht: „Wenn man durch Einheirat eine Kennedy wurde, ist es das Schwerste, mit dem Clan Schritt zu halten". In den Hallen der Macht, des Wohlstandes und des Ruhms hat sie es letztlich gelernt. Obwohl Kameras surren und Blitzlichter aufflackern, wenn sich Joan Kennedy in der Öffentlichkeit zeigt, können die Klatschreporterinnen kaum ein Wort aus ihr herausholen. Die Vertrauten in ihrer Umgebung charakterisieren sie als schüchtern und zurückhaltend, die jene aufgeblasene Geschäftigkeit und Geschwätzigkeit der Gesellschaftslöwen ablehnt. Sie hat in den politischen Zirkeln keine Feinde, denn sie diskutiert nicht über Politik und macht keine umstrittenen Bemerkungen über umstrittene Themen.

Das wichtigste Examen einer Kennedy hat Joan aber mit Brillianz bestanden. Vor der letzten Senatswahl im November 1970 war sie von morgens bis abends im Wahlkampf, schüttelte Hände und sprach vor den Supermärkten mit den Hausfrauen, ihren Ted doch zu wählen. In einem überfüllten Klubhaus zeigte sie Schmalfilme von den Urlaubsreisen der Familie und weist jeden Hinweis auf die Affäre mit Mary Jo Kopechne von sich. „Ich glaube alles, was mein Mann mir erzählt hat, und wenn die Sache noch immer im Gerede ist, so ist das die Presse." Sie nimmt Babies auf den Arm und läßt sich willig fotografieren. Auf einer Kegelbahn zieht sie geschwind die Schuhe aus und läßt die Kugel einmal in die vollen rollen.

Sie weiß genau, daß dieser etwas hemdsärmelige Kontakt mit dem Volk zum politischen Geschäft gehört, um den Namen der Kennedys und ihr „Image" im Volk bekannt zu machen. Sie hält sich eigentlich vielmehr für eine Hausmutter, die für ihre drei Kinder sorgt und den Stab von Angestellten dirigiert. Dazu gehören neben einem Butler und einem Gärtner noch eine Sekretärin und der französische Koch, der ehemals in den Diensten der Herzogin von Windsor stand.

Die Frage, ob sie gern als First Lady im Weißen Haus residieren und „Ted" als Präsidenten sehen möchte, beantwortet sie immer wieder mit einem kategorischen Nein.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 21,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ruhr-Anzeiger, Hattingen
vom 20. März 1971

Boston-Pops in der Beethovenhalle

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker geben ungewöhnlichen Galaabend

Bonn. Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und aus „Hair". Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Wahrlich für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht. Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Alle Karten sind jetzt schon ausverkauft — schließlich wird es nach 14 Jahren wieder das erstemal sein, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem berühmten Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der neuen Welt in die alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr!"

Kurt Pleyer

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 37,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Offenburger Tageblatt, Offenburg
30. März 1971
vom

Boston-Pops in der Beethovenhalle

Die Bostoner Philharmoniker geben in Bonn ein ungewöhnliches Galakonzert

(np). Was am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle passieren wird, kann als ein Spektakel besonderer Art gelten: Arthur Fiedler, Chef und Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, wird an diesem Tag zum „Boston-Pops" einladen, einem Galaabend mit klassischer Musik, Show und Festdiner. Die Aufführung wird zum größten Teil von den Freunden des Orchesters finanziert, die damit einmal im Jahr den Philharmonikern ihren Dank abstatten möchten.

Auf dem musikalischen Programm stehen Werke wie Händels „Feuerwerksmusik", Prokoffiefs „Peter und der Wolf", Tschaikowskis „Klavierkonzert Nummer eins" sowie Melodien aus der US-„Klassik" und Szenen aus Hair. Garniert wird die Aufführung durch ein Festessen. Zwischen Händel und der Prokoffief-Legende, die Jean Kennedy, Ehefrau des skandalbeschwerten Edward Kennedy, lesen soll, wird es also munteres Tellerklappern und Gläserklingen geben. Fürwahr: für die kleine Residenz am Rhein, ehrwürdig, was die Musik betrifft, ein Novum.

Aber Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent und Exzentriker, mag es eben so. In seiner Begleitung werden nach Angaben der Veranstalter auch eine Reihe prominenter Amerikaner reisen. In der Chartermaschine haben angeblich schon Nelson Rockefeller, die Kennedys und andere illustre Mitglieder der US-Society Plätze gebucht; der Flug an den Rhein gleichermaßen eine gehörige Portion Skurrilität wie die Reverenz an Fiedler und seine 130 Philharmoniker.

Die Bostoner werden vor der Bonner Einlage eine Konzerttournee durch die Weltstädte des alten Kontinents machen. Alle Karten sind jetzt schon ausverkauft — schließlich soll es nach 14 Jahren wieder das erste Mal sein, daß Arthur Fiedler mit seinem Orchester nach Europa kommt.

Die letzte Nachricht, die über den Dirigenten aus der neuen Welt in die alte gefunkt wurde, hatte weniger mit Musik als mit Show zu tun: Läutend und rasselnd war Fiedler mit einem knallroten Feuerwehrauto durch Bostons Innenstadt gefahren. Das Dampfroß aus der Pionierzeit war ein Geschenk seiner Frau zum 75. Geburtstag. Er chauffierte den Oldtimer im Frack vor die Bostoner Philharmonie, stieg aus und erklärte lächelnd: „Ich liebe die Feuerwehr."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 26,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Spandauer Volksblatt, Berlin-Spandau
31. März 1971
vom

„Boston Pops" in Bonn mit Joan Kennedy

Das 1881 gegründete Boston Symphonie Orchestra unternimmt im April seine dritte Europa- und Deutschland-Tournee. Unter seinen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler, William Steinberg und Michael Tilson Thomas wird das Orchester in Stuttgart, Berlin (10. und 11. April), Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt/Main und Wien Konzerte geben.

Unter Mitwirkung von Joan Kennedy als Sprecherin des von Prokofjew vertonten Märchens „Peter und der Wolf" findet am 16. April in der Bonner Beethovenhalle eine Exklusivveranstaltung der „Boston Pops" unter Leitung von Arthur Fiedler statt. Das führende amerikanische Orchester wird unter anderem auch noch in Rom, Paris, London und Barcelona gastieren.

argus
Seit 1867

Auflage (t. Ts.): 221,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Kölner Stadtanzeiger, Köln
vom 31. März 1971

128

MIT IHREM MANN Edward Kennedy kommt die blonde Joan am 16. April nach Bonn. Bild: dpa

3

Die schöne Joan liest Märchen in Bonn

Kennedys kommen in die Beethovenhalle

EB Bonn — Als ausgesprochen unschicklich galt bisher, wer in Konzertsälen zu Beethoven-Klängen ein Butterbrot verspeiste und die Krümel mit einem guten Tropfen heruntersplülte. Das soll nun anders werden. Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester bringt am 16. April feine amerikanische Lebensart in die Bonner Beethoven-Halle. Der besseren Gesellschaft am Rhein steht ein Ohren- und Gaumenschmaus ganz besonderer Art ins Haus.

Die Ankündigung des Ereignisses entnahm die Bonner Prominenz dieser Tage goldenen Umschlägen. Auf weißem Bütten werden die erlauchten Herrschaften zu einem „Gala-Konzert" gebeten. Die Stars des Abends, der 75jährige Dirigent Arthur Fiedler und Joan Kennedy, die schönste aus dem gleichnamigen Clan, werben mit ihrem hochglänzenden Konterfei für die musikulinarische Festlichkeit.

Wie im Mittelalter

Es soll zugehen wir im Mittelalter: Während die 130 Bostoner Symphoniker auf der Bühne populäre klassische Weisen intonieren, lassen es sich die Zuhörer bei Kerzenschein an festlich gedeckten Tischen gut schmecken. Zu Tschaikowskys Klavierkonzert Nr. 1 kann man Sekt oder Weingläser erklingen lassen, und wem bei der Egmont-Ouvertüre der Magen knurrt, kann dem mit einem belegten Brötchen abhelfen.

Zur Halbzeit des dreistündigen Musik-Gelages tritt Joan Kennedy auf, die am vergangenen Wochenende in den Vereinigten Staaten ihr Fernsehdebüt als Pianistin gab. In Bonn allerdings greift sie nicht in die Tasten. Sie wird die Legende zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" erzählen.

Helfer aus USA

60 amerikanische Honoratioren, allesamt regelmäßige Besuchr der „Boston Pops", wie diese Form geselligen Beisammenseins von ihren Erfindern genannt wird, werden der Bonner Crème de la Cremè beim Nachempfinden ihrer Lebensart behiflich sein. Die „freiwilligen Helfer" reisen im Sonderflugzeug an. Unter ihnen Bankpräsident David Rockefeller und Senator Edward Kennedy.

150 Mark Eintritt

Veranstaltet wird das Klassik-Mahl zum Eintritt von 120 und 150 Mark für Speis und Klang vom Bonner Zeremonienmeister Johannes Wasmuth, 34. Der gelernte Dekorateur garniert seit Jahren die Bundeshauptstadt mit gesellschaftlichen Ereignissen, deren Mischung aus Snob-Appeal und Wohltätigkeit ihm stets so gut gelang, daß alle Beteiligten hinterher nur noch fassungslos ihre eigene Nächstenliebe bestaunten.

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 299,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Abendzeitung, München
vom 19. April 1971

JOAN KENNEDY ALS MÄRCHENTANTE: Die Frau des US-Senatorslas den Sprechpart von „Peter und der Wolf". Arthur Fiedler (rechts) dirigierte das Melodram.

Kunstgenuß auf amerikanisch für die Gesellschaft in Bonn

Zu Beethoven gab es Roastbeef rosa

Von Andreas Müller

Alexander Bondarenko, sowjetischer Geschäftsträger in Bonn, fühlte patriotisch, als Joan, bildhübsche Frau des US-Senators Edward („Ted") Kennedy, den Märchentext zu Serge Prokofieffs Melodram „Peter und der Wolf" ins Mikrofon hauchte. Was sonst in der Bonner Beethovenhalle geschah, fand seine Billigung nicht. Für 150 Mark Eintrittsgeld konnte man dort aus nächster Nähe erleben, wie sich die feine Gesellschaft hohen Kunstgenuß vorstellt.

Da genügt längst nicht mehr Kunst allein. Zu Beethoven und Tschaikowsky wurde Prager Saftschinken mit Spargelspitzen, Holsteiner Katenrauchwurst, Mastputenfleisch, Roastbeef rosa, Holländer Käse, Wildbachforellenfilet und Burgunder Rücken auf Brötchen serviert. Wen die Trauermusik zu Goethes „Egmont" vergraulte, der kam bei einem Gläschen Niersteiner Fritzenhölle (Spätlese) wieder in Stimmung.

Pianist Malcolm Frager, der in letzter Sekunde für den indisponierten Earl Wild einsprang, hatte sich vorher nicht ausreichend informiert. Als er zu Beginn seines Auftritts einen Blick in den Zuschauerraum warf, schloß er bestürzt die Augen — und machte sie bis zum Schluß nicht mehr auf. Da standen üppig gedeckte Tische, und da saßen berauschte Herren neben aufgedonnerten Damen: scherzend bei Kerzenlicht. Der Pianist schleuderte seinen Schmerz in die Tasten. Später, auf dem Weg ins Hotel, sagte er mir: „Das war kein Konzert, das war ein Hochzeitsfest."

Derlei gibt es in den Vereinigten Staaten schon lange. Das „Boston Pops Orchestra" („BSO", Dirigent: Arthur Fiedler), ein Ableger des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" (Dirigent: William Steinberg), hat es sich zur Aufgabe gemacht, mit Unterhaltungsveranstaltungen besonderer Art neue Mäzene zu werben. Begleitet von sechzig millionenschweren Mitgliedern des „Vereins der Freunde des BSO" reist das Orchester seit Anfang April durch Europa.

David Rockefeller jr., Manager des „Boston Pops", Sohn des Bankpräsidenten David Rockefeller und Neffe des Gouverneurs von New York, Nelson Rockefeller, erklärt den Sinn und Zweck der Veranstaltungen so: „Pops kommt von Pop. Das bedeutet populär. Wir wollen nicht hohe Kunst machen, wir wollen unterhalten. Leute, die sonst an klassischer Musik nicht interessiert wären, sollen gewonnen werden."

Und dies nicht nur durch Speis und Trank. Bemerkenswert ist auch die ungewöhnliche Programm-Mischung: Neben klassischen Hits spielte das „Boston Pops" in Bonn Musik aus „Hair", den „St. Louis Blues March" und zum Abschluß „The Stars and Stripers Forever" („Hoch das Sternenbanner").

Die Deutschen waren dieser amerikanischen Erfindung nicht ganz gewachsen. Während die Gäste aus den USA von Anfang an gerne zugelangt hätten, verhielt sich die Bonner Crême de la Crême andächtig, als wäre sie in einem ganz normalen Konzert. Nur Walter Scheel gewöhnte sich rasch an die ungewohnte Situation: Schon nach Beethovens „Egmont"-Ouvertüre zündete er sich eine dicke Zigarre an und paffte den Rauch seiner lauschenden Gattin Mildred ins ernste Gesicht.

Expräsident Heinrich Lübke (mit Wilhelmine) indessen blieb steif bis zum Schluß. Mein Tischnachbar, Mister Edward G. Murray, ein Pastor, sagte enttäuscht: „In Boston trinken wir schon zur Musik."

Als ich ihn fragte, ob er es nicht sehr kapitalistisch finde, daß das gewöhnliche Volk (zum Preise von immerhin 50 Mark) ohne Verpflegung von den Rängen zusehen mußte, antwortete er: „Ich habe Neuigkeiten für Sie: Wir in Amerika sind Kapitalisten. Gäbe es keine Kapitalisten, gäbe es kein Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Dann kam Joan Kennedy (im Hagel der Fotoblitze strahlend schön), erzählte das Märchen von Peter und dem Wolf genauso wie sich der kleine Fritz das Märchenerzählen vorstellt, erzitterte manchmal unter den Donnerschlägen der Prokofieff-Musik, zwinkerte dreimal ins Publikum (aber nicht zu ihrem Mann Edward, der frisch gescheitelt neben Mildred Scheel saß), bekam zum Schluß rote Rosen, aber herzlich wenig Applaus.

EIN PLATZ AN DEN TISCHEN kostete 150 Mark. Für 50 Mark durfte man, von den Rängen aus, den Reichen von Bonn beim Essen zusehen.

Am meisten klatschten die Fotografen, die sie noch einmal richtig ins Bild kriegen wollten. Veranstalter Johannes Wasmuth (schweißtriefend, mit wallender Künstlermähne) schrie sogar „bravo". Das Publikum empfand das als Störung: Es hatte sich längst über die Brötchen geworfen.

Gemischtes Büfett (ohne Musik) hatte es schon am Vormittag bei Scheels Empfang im Bonner Kanzler-Bungalow gegeben. Edward Kennedy, prominentestes Kuratoriums-Mitglied des „Vereins der Freunde des BSO" kam mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke zu Fuß vom Palais Schaumburg herüber: müde, abgespannt, lustlos.

Scheel, gebräunt vom Urlaub in Hinterthal/Salzburg, verzichtete auf offizielle Ansprachen. Ted murmelte irgend etwas von „Normalisierung" in den Beziehungen zu Rotchina, bestellte sich Münchner Weißbier, nahm vom Büfett eine Scheibe Emmentaler, plauderte lange mit Arthur Fiedler (der wie Albert Einstein aussieht), und endeckte viel zu spät (nach einer guten dreiviertel Stunde) Mildred Scheel, von der er wußte, daß sie amerikanische Vorfahren hat. Mildred: „Mein Großvater war Weinhändler in den Staaten. Als die Prohibition eingeführt wurde, ging er zugrunde."

Joan Kennedy wurde in Hot pants erwartet, kam aber (zwei Stunden zu spät) in langer, himmelblauer Hose. Scheel bestellte ihr gebratene Weißwürstchen mit Senf. Als sie nach Messer und Gabel verlangte, gab Protokollchef Hans Schwarzmann höflich zu bedenken: „Eigentlich ißt man so etwas mit der Hand."

Im Bahnhof war das Essen besser

Joan bekam dennoch Besteck, schnippelte mißtrauisch an den Würstchen herum — und schob sie dann heimlich zu Scheel. Tags zuvor hatte sie (nach einem Empfang beim Bonner OB Peter Kraemer) bei Johannes Wasmuth im Künstlerbahnhof Rolandseck besser gespeist: klare Bouillon, Fasanenbrust mit Sauerkraut, Fürst-Pückler-Eis.

Zur Begrüßung der Bostoner Gäste durch den Ministerpräsidenten Helmut Kohl kam Ted Kennedy („Jetzt spiele ich die Hauptrolle, heute abend steht meine Frau im Mittelpunkt") ohne Joan nach Rolandseck. Er hatte ihr geraten, sich für abends zu schonen. Statt dessen — man erfuhr es durch den Chauffeur Karlheinz Stein — ließ sie sich von Bonns Star-Figaro Willi Michels die Haare legen.

Bahnhof Rolandseck (erbaut 1856 als Endstation einer Privatbahn) ist seit hundert Jahren Schauplatz piekfeiner Feste, Treffpunkt für Maler, Dichter, Musiker und Diplomaten. Kaiser Wilhem II., Otto von Bismarck, Königin Viktoria von England, Elisabeth von Rumänien, Heinrich Heine, Nietzsche, Franz Liszt, Apollinaire, Alexander von Humboldt, Clara Schumann und viele andere waren hier schon zu Gast.

1965 wollte die Bundesbahn den als Bahnhof funktionslos gewordenen Bau abreißen, Helmut Kohl kaufte das Haus, setzte Wasmuth (Geschäftsführer der „arts and music GmbH") als Pächter auf Lebenszeit ein und gab ihm 600 000 Mark für die Renovierung.

Für 600 Mark Monatsmiete darf seit zwei Jahren auch der Pianist Stefan Askenase bei ihm wohnen. Ich traf ihn, das kleine, weißhaarige Männchen, auf dem Weg zur Boston-Pops-Gala, im Zug. (Eine Fahrkarte Rolandseck—Bonn kostet 1,40 Mark.) Der greise Künstler hatte noch nicht zu Abend gespeist. Nach dem Andantino aus Tschaikowskys Klavierkonzert b-Moll war für seine Tischnachbarn kein Sandwich mehr übrig.

bonn concert reports

129

argus Seit 1867
Auflage (i. Ts.): 41,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Oberhausen
vom 17. April 1971

Arthur Fiedler stülpte sich seinen 81. Helm sofort auf

Vor den Symphonikern erst noch die Feuerwehrkapelle dirigiert

Weiß-blauer Wirbel mit Leberkäs und Bier um drei Amerikaner in Bonn

Von WAZ-Chefreporter ERNST NEY

Drei Amerikaner machten Wirbel in Bonn: Die Dame zuerst: blonde, langhaarige Senatorengattin Joan Kennedy. Zweitens: Senator Edward Kennedy, ehrgeiziger Politiker, möglicherweise präsidentschaftsverdächtig, skandalumwitterter Unfallfahrer in jener Affäre, bei der seine Sekretärin nachts in Florida den Tod fand. Schließlich: der 75jährige Dirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, vor vielen Jahren und zwei Weltkriegen Student der Musik in Berlin.

Anlaß des Prominentenbesuches war eines der größten gesellschaftlichen Spektakel im bisherigen Bonner Hauptstadtleben, ein Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker am Freitagabend in der Beethovenhalle. Mit Beethoven fing es an, mit „Hair" hörte es auf. Joan Kennedy sprach die Texte zu „Peter und der Wolf" von Prokofieff. Ein für Deutschland völlig neues Konzertgefühl, denn auf den teuren Plätzen im Parkett wurde gleichzeitig diniert.

Bevor der Große Abend in Szene ging, wurden die immer lächelnden Kennedys und der putzmuntere Mittsiebziger Arthur mit Ehrungen, Einladungen und Empfängen überhäuft. Bonns Oberbürgermeister Krämer eröffnete den Reigen. Sekt und goldenes Buch im Rathaus.

270mal Ehrenmitglied

Krämers Überraschung: Er ließ im Festsaal die Feuerwehrkapelle blasen, denn aus irgendeinem Grunde hat der alte Arthur eine Schwäche für die Feuerwehr. Er ist Ehrenmitglied von rund 270 Feuerwehren in aller Welt und besitzt 80 Feuerwehrhelme, denen in Bonn der 81. hinzugefügt wurde. Er stülpte sich das Geschenk sofort auf das schlohweiße Haar, lieh sich vom Dirigenten dessen Stab und feuerte die Feuerwehr zum Marsch von den „Altem Kameraden" an.

Mister Arthur brachte seinen Helm auch mit, als am Freitagvormittag Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred sich die Ehre gaben, die Kennedys und den Dirigenten im Kanzlerbungalow des Schaumburgparks zu empfangen.

Die Gäste wurden mit einem rustikalen Büfett bewirtet: Leberkäs, Würstchen, Münchner Bier, Laugenbrezel und andere Spezialitäten aus dem weißblauen Teil Süddeutschlands. In Stellvertretung des Bundeskanzlers, der am Gardasee seinen letzten Osterurlaubstag verbrachte, hatte Horst Ehmke mit „Ted" ein politisches Gespräch.

US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush verschob für einige Stunden seinen Abflug nach Berlin, zum 18. Botschaftertreffen, um in seiner Residenz die Landsleute willkommen zu heißen. Joan in einem mädchenhaften schneeweißen Wolle-Mini. Man könnte auch sagen: Wonne-Mini.

Bei den anderen Auftritten bevorzugte sie einen fliederfarbenen Hosenanzug, einen ebensolchen Midimantel lässig um die Schultern gelegt. Ich würde sagen, die Hosen waren zu kostbar, um zu sagen: Joan trug Jeans.

Bankräuber starb in Kölner Haftzelle

KÖLN (dpa)

13 Stunden nach seinem mißglückten Überfall auf eine Bankfiliale in Köln ist ein 47jähriger Familienvater am Freitag gestorben. Bei einer Routinekontrolle der Haftzellen im Kölner Polizeipräsidium fand ein Beamter den Mann nur noch schwach atmend auf seiner Pritsche. Auf dem Weg zum Krankenhaus starb der 47jährige. Nach den Feststellungen der Polizei ist der Mann mit größter Wahrscheinlichkeit eines natürlichen Todes gestorben. Die genaue Todesursache müsse die Obduktion ergeben. Der 47jährige Auftragsschriftsteller aus Düsseldorf hinterläßt fünf Kinder, davon das jüngste im Alter von fünf Jahren. Bei dem Überfall hatte er schon 151 000 DM erbeutet, war jedoch schnell gefaßt worden.

MIT SEINEM NEUEN WEISSEN FEUERWEHRHELM genoß der Dirigent Arthur Fiedler den Empfang im Festsaal des Bonner Rathauses. Zwischen Fiedler und Joan Kennedy: der Bonner Oberbürgermeister Peter Krämer. dpa/upi-Funkbild

argus Seit 1867
Auflage (i. Ts.): o.A.
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Nassauische Landeszeitung, Limburg
vom 19. April 1971

Egmont mit Sandwiches – und bei den Preisen nicht zimperlich

Von unserem dpa-Korrespondenten Holger Quiring

Bonn, 18. April (dpa)

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war; weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskis erstem Klavierkonzert und Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Joan Kennedy spricht in Bonn von „Peter und Wolf". dpa-Foto

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowski-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

argus Seit 1867
Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Pfälzischer Merkur, Zweibrücken
vom 19. April 1971

Bonn, Mettwurst und Maestoso

NEUES VON DEN FEINEN LEUTEN ZU BONN: ABENDESSEN MIT MUSIK

Bonn. Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbildes auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei...

Joan Kennedy als Sprecherin bei Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf", rechts der Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, Arthur Fiedler.

131

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 41,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Oberhausen
vom 19. April 1971

DIE STARS DER BONNER GALA MIT DEN BOSTON POPS: Joan Kennedy und Dirigent Arthur Fiedler. ap-Telebild

Beethoven mit Brötchen und ein heißes Höschen

Galakonzert mit Joan Kennedy in Bonn — Dirigent kam mit Feuerwehr

Von WAZ-Chefreporter ERNST NEY — BONN

Die Einladung schimmerte golden. Die Plätze im Parkett kosteten 120 bis 150 DM, je nach Lage. Dafür gab es außer Beethoven, Tschaikowsky den Kennedys und den Rockefellers belegte Brötchen, einen Wein aus Rheinhessen, später ein Glas Sekt und zum Schluß noch einen Kaffee. Wer „nur" 25 oder 50 Mark für eine Karte anzulegen bereit war, konnte — außer Blatzheims Verpflegung — alles andere von den „trockenen" Balkonplätzen aus genießen. In den Pausen mischen sich dann „oben" und „unten".

Das Spektakel um Joan und Ted Kennedy und um die Bostoner Philharmoniker samt ihrem 75jährigen rustikalen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler erreichte mit einem Galakonzert in der Beethovenhalle einen teils rauschenden, teils komischen Höhepunkt.

Dieses noch vorweg: Es stimmt nicht, daß das Parkett voller „Geldadel" saß. Auch die politische Prominenz war nur schwach vertreten. In Sachen Schmuck, Eleganz, Garderoben hatte man sich mehr versprochen, obwohl es unbestreitbar das eine oder andere fürs Auge gab. Aber im großen und ganzen war es eine recht solide Versammlung. Es gibt eben heute viele Leute, auch unterhalb der gern zitierten „Finanzgewaltigen von Rhein und Ruhr", die für eine solche Sache mehr als einen Blauen hinblättern. Außerdem hatte Johannes Wasmuth, der ideenreiche Künstlervorstand vom Bahnhof Rolandseck, in letzter Minute mit Freikarten „gestopft", damit es auch „schön voll" aussah.

Ein festlicher Abend war es schon. Selbst den halbierten, belegten Brötchen hatte das Management klingende Namen gegeben: Prager Saftschinken mit Spargelspitzen, Mastputenfleisch, Lachsschinken mit gefüllten Oliven, Wildbachforellenfilet mit Kaviarsahne, Burgunder Rücken mit Ananas. Ich bin durchaus einverstanden, denn das läßt sich hübsch schreiben, aber, wenn man das Zeug so zwischen den Zähnen hatte, war es genau das, was es zu Hause auch gibt, wenn „Kaltverpflegung" im Kalender steht.

An unserem 10-Personen-Tisch kamen wir mit den zwei Brötchenplatten ganz gut weg, denn drei Plätze blieben leer. Aber auch bei voller Besetzung der Tische reichte es, denn die Gäste hatten allgemein eine gewisse Scheu, so richtig nach Herzenslust zuzugreifen, während das Orchester und die Solisten sich auf der Bühne strapazierten. Bostoner Bräuche sind eben keine Bonner Bräuche. Beethoven und Brötchen, das will uns nicht so recht schmecken.

Der wirkungsvoll weißhaarige Dirigent, seine genau 107 Mannen und dazu noch der schlanke, schwarzhaarige Malcolm Frager, Solist in Tschaikowskys Klavierkonzert Nr. 1 b-Moll, zeigten sich in dem kunterbunt zusammengestellten Programm vielseitig und temperamentvoll, vor allem aber zeigten sie eine bravouröse Exaktheit, äußerste Perfektion.

Ein Hauch von Jazzerei

Die Burschen aus Boston scheuen sich nicht, bei den großen Meistern, wo schnelle, kantige Passagen es zulassen, einen Hauch von Jazzerei unterzumischen. Serge Prokofiefs Musikmärchen von Peter und dem Wolf machte Fiedler ganz sanft und lyrisch. Und bei den Auszügen aus „Hair" schließlich, da zeigte das Orchester was drinsteckt. Einfach Klasse! Es fehlten nur noch ein paar Susaphone. „Hair" noch nie so gehört. Unvermeidlich: „Stars and Stripes", streckenweise vom Händeklatschen des mächtig in Fahrt gekommenen Publikums begleitet. Eine Zugabe von Bizet, minutenlanger Beifall und Ende.

Mittelpunkt: Joan Kennedy, keine im landläufigen Sinne schöne Frau, aber eine großartige Erscheinung, liebenswürdig elegant in jeder Bewegung, temperamentvoll, gesprächseifrig. Höhepunkt: ebenfalls Joan Kennedy, als sie mit angenehmer, nicht zu hoher, einfühlsamer Stimme, mitten im Orchester stehend, die Rezitationen zu „Peter und der Wolf" vortrug. Das war schon etwas ausgesprochen Besonderes. Ted nachher zu Joan: „Das hast du wundervoll gemacht."

Tisch 17 war der Prominententisch: die Kennedys und die Scheels, US-Botschafter Rush mit Familie, der sowjetische Geschäftsträger Bondarenko und an den Tischen ringsum einige Dutzend finanzkräftige Amerikaner aus dem „Freundeskreis" des Orchesters, der zugleich der Kreis der Mäzene, der Spender ist. Denn die „Boston Pops" sind ein privatwirtschaftlich betriebenes Unternehmen, kein staatlich subventioniertes Orchester.

DIE EINZIGE TRÄGERIN heißer Höschen wurde auf der Bonner Gala von Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel in ein Gespräch verwickelt. ap-Telebild

Trägerin des einzigen „heißen Höschens" im Saale: eine der jüngeren aus der Familie Rockefeller, Nancy mit Vornamen, schwarz das Höschen, eng der Pullover. Feuerwehrfan Arthur Fiedler hatte mit Freuden die Offerte der Bonner Feuerwehr angenommen, mit Blaulicht und Martinshorn auf einen Drehleiterwagen zum Galakonzert zu fahren. Erschreckte Passanten meinten zuerst, es brenne in der Halle oder es sei gar Bombenalarm, das Ganze werde nicht stattfinden — aber es war „nur" der spleenige Dirigent, der im Frack vom Leiterwagen kletterte und offenbar gerade wieder einmal „eine der schönsten Minuten" (so sagte er ständig) seines Lebens beim Wickel hatte.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 46,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Die Glocke, Oelde/Westf.
vom 19. April 1971

Bonner Prominenz zahlte kräftig für Abendessen mit Gala-Konzert

Joan Kennedy unbestrittener Stargast in der Beethovenhalle

Bonn (dpa). Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist nichts zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Veranstalter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte.

Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Zunächst mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Bostoner Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts Nr. 1 so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr.

Ueber diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert dieses Orchesters bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

Joan Kennedy war der unbestrittene Star des Gala-Abends in der Bonner Beethovenhalle. Sie hatte den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Am Dirigentenpult Arthur Fiedler.

„Glocke"-Fur

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 22,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hellweger Anzeiger, Unna
vom 19. April 1971

DEN SPRECHPART in dem musikalischen Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" hatte Joan Kennedy, die Frau des amerikanischen Senators, bei einer Festaufführung in der Bonner Beethovenhalle übernommen. Hier ist der hohe Gast bei seinem Vortrag zu sehen. Der Dirigent ist Arthur Fiedler, der das amerikanische Orchester leitete.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.):
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Offenbacher Post, Offenbach
19. 4. 1971

Joan, Peter und der Wolf

Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy war der prominenteste Zuhörer seiner Frau: Joan Kennedy hatte in der Bonner Beethovenhalle bei einem Konzert des Bostoner Pop-Orchesters den Sprechpart in Sergej Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen (auf dem Bild links). Rechts der Dirigent des amerikanischen Orchesters, Arthur Fiedler, aufgenommen während des Konzerts in der Beethovenhalle. Eine weitere Besonderheit dieser Galavorstellung war die Tatsache, daß sich die Konzertbesucher während der Darbietung an Tischen im Saal mit Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein stärken konnten. Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 51,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Schwäbische Donau-Zeitung, Ulm
19. April 1971

Ein Hauch von Nerz

Joan Kennedy und „Boston-Pops"-Konzert begeisterte Bonn

Von unserem Korrespondenten Weillington Long

BONN. Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan haben Bonn gegeben, um was es sich immer so besorgt gemüht: gesellschaftliche Reputation mit einem Hauch von Nerz.

Während sich der demokratische Politiker in Gesprächen mit Außenminister Walter Scheel und Kanzleramts-Chef Horst Ehmke bemühte, seine eigene Position und die der USA deutlich zu machen, bereitete sich seine Frau für einen Auftritt in der Beethoven-Halle vor: Sie sollte den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" übernehmen.

Doch nicht nur der Name der politischen Dynastie Kennedy machte das aus, was die Bundeshauptstadt unter einem gesellschaftlichen Ereignis versteht: es spielte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter dem 76jährigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler.

Wer dabei sein wollte, mußte bis zu 150 DM für eine Karte ausgeben oder aber zur Prominenz gehören die freien Eintritt hatte — um die 33jährige blonde Senatorenfrau sprechen zu hören, wenn sie nicht gerade vom 107-Mann-Orchester überspielt wurde. Der Beifall war für den Abend gleichmäßig verteilt: die Besucher feierten Joan Kennedy ebenso wie Arthur Fiedler, die Musiker und die Solisten.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 37,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ludwigsburger Kreiszeitung, Ludwigsburg
vom 19. April 1971

Bostoner Symphonieorchester und Joan Kennedy

Zum Gala-Essen wurde Egmont „serviert"

Eine neue Variante gesellschaftlicher Vergnügungen in Bonn – Prominenz rar

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue – allerdings etwas zwitterhafte – Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte.

Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein, und Sekt vor sich. Wer – für weniger Geld – auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Mästoso.

Erst die Getränke

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: Weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einen 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskyk erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Familie Scheel war da

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbot-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die – in fließendem weißen Maxi – den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den Virtuosen und punkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller Junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei.

Joan Kennedy und Dirigent Fiedler. dpa-Funkbild

Applaus für Mrs. Joan Kennedy und die Bostoner Symphoniker in Bonn.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 169,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Christ und Welt, Stuttgart
23. April 1971

natorensitz und zwei Senatsdirektoren-Stellen angeboten. Damit war die Krise einstweilen beigelegt. Bei der Wahl erhielt dann Schütz als neuer Regierender Bürgermeister auch die 72 SPD-Stimmen. Für den CDU-Gegenkandidaten Lorenz stimmten 53 Abgeordnete. Die elf Nein-Stimmen dürften von der FDP stammen.

Die Kennedys in Bonn

Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan statteten gemeinsam mit den Bostoner Symphonikern und ihrem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler der Bundeshauptstadt einen Besuch ab. Für 100 bis 150 Mark Eintrittsgeld wurde in der Beethovenhalle „Boston Pops" geboten. Die Kennedys erweckten große Aufmerksamkeit unter anderem dadurch, daß sie zu allen Empfängen mindestens eine Stunde zu spät kamen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 9,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Walsroder Zeitung, Waldsrode
vom 19. April 197

Mit Beifall und Interesse wurde Joan Kennedys Sprechrolle in Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" aufgenommen. Eigener Funkdienst dpa/upi

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 7,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Taunus-Zeitung, Oberursel
vom 19. April 1971

Als Fan von Feuerwehrausrüstungen gab sich Arthur Fiedler auch in Bonn zu erkennen. Der Dirigent der berühmten Bostoner Symphoniker kam zum Galaabend in der Beethovenhalle im Frack — auf einem Feuerwehrwagen. (Bericht auf Seite 2.)

Anzeige

Beethoven bei Sekt und Brötchen

Neue Party-Masche auf Bonner Parkett / Prominenteste Gäste: Ehepaar Kennedy

Bonn (dpa/upi). Die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten des gesellschaftlichen Lebens zwischen Stehempfang und Staatsbankett ist in Bonn um eine neue Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik. Jetzt also ist auch das Publikum in der Bundeshauptstadt mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut gemacht worden! Prominenteste Sendboten waren das Ehepaar Senator Edward Kennedy.

Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm, das von Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum St. Louis Blues March von Williams Christopher Handy und natürlich – dabei hatte Frau Kennedy ihren Sprech-Auftritt – zu Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" reichte.

Im Saal saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer – für weniger Geld – auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso – das Ganze für rund 150 Mark Eintritt.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren üblich, und speziell Joan Kennedy kennt ihren Part aus dem Prokofjew-Musikmärchen von vielen, vielen öffentlichen Auftritten. Der Erlös fließt fast immer karitativen Zwecken zu.

Das Programm enthüllte: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt der 76jährige Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, nämlich solange, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war.

Politische Prominenz machte sich rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo Jet eine Schar von Freunden des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die – in fließendem weißen Maxi – ihre Rolle sprach. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 24,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Fränkische Nachrichten, Tauberbischofsheim
vom 19. April 1971

Im Gefolge des Boston Symphony Orchestra

Die Kennedys und Rockefellers im Hauptstädtchen

Bahnhof Rolandseck bewährte sich als Wartesaal / Image-Polierer hatten Hochkonjunktur

Von Wolfgang von Gropper

Bonn/Rolandseck. Am Freitagfrüh 7 Uhr landete der Senator Edward Kennedy in Köln-Wahn. Seine Frau Joan war schon drei Tage vorher gekommen. David Rockefeller jr. mit Gattin tummelten sich ebenfalls am Rhein. Nach Zusammenkünften „Ted" Kennedys mit Außenminister Scheel, Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und dem rheinland-pfälzischen Ministerpräsidenten Helmut Kohl versammelten sich Amerikas Jet set-Mitglieder am Freitagabend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle zu einem Konzert des „Boston Pops"-Orchesters. Als ob sie das nicht zu Hause hören könnten. Wie kam es zu diesem Auflauf in unserem Bundeshauptstädtchen?

Am Anfang stand – wieder einmal – Johannes Wasmuth. Wer das ist? Oh, Kenner kennen ihn. Seit langem. Versuch einer Darstellung für Nichtkenner: Zwei-Zentner-Mann, um die Vierzig, marzipangesichtig, wasserblauäugig. Löwenmähne vom Kopf bis zum Nacken. Beruf? – Ja, da wird's schwierig. Nach allem, was man hört, würde ich sagen: international geläufiger Bildersammler, Organisator und Arrangeur. Die Angaben über Herkunft schwanken zwischen ehemaligem Buchbinder-, Schreiner- und Tüncherlehrling. Es gibt Leute, die Wasmuth ernsthaft für ein Genie halten. Andere rühmen ihm wenigstens einen genialischen Sinn für Qualität schlechthin nach. Die Gemälde, die er im stillgelegten Bahnhof Rolandseck im nördlichsten Zipfel von Rheinland-Pfalz in seiner Galerie „PRO" zusammengetragen hat, sprechen tatsächlich für einen ungewöhnlichen „Riecher". Er wohnt auch in diesem Bahnhof. Zusammen mit dem Pianisten Stefan Askenase. Zu seinen Freunden und regelmäßigen Gästen gehören Künstler vom Kaliber Marcel Marceau. Und die große Gesellschaft gibt sich im Bahnhof dann und wann ein Stelldichein. Zu Silvester oder so. Jedenfalls dann, wenn Johannes Wasmuth, dessen Fäden nach Westen in San Francisco und nach Osten in Tokio erst zu enden scheinen, es will.

Für letzten Freitag hatte er das Boston Symphony Orchestra zu einem „Pops Concert" in die Bonner Beethovenhalle dirigiert. Doch im Wesen des Genies liegt es, immer gleich mehrere Fliegen mit einer Klappe zu schlagen. Wasmuth schlug. Nur die Fliegen gebärdeten sich – frecherweise – ein wenig eigenwillig. Joan Kennedy wäre offenbar überhaupt nicht zu einem Empfang, den Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred am Freitagmittag ihr und ihrem Mann zu Ehren im Kanzler-Bungalow gaben, erschienen, wenn Gatte Ted sie nicht nach zwei Stunden herbeitelefoniert hätte.

Am Nachmittag, 16.30 Uhr, freuten sich (laut Einladung) der Ministerpräsident des Landes Rheinland-Pfalz und Frau Kohl zu Ehren der Solisten und Freunde des Boston Symphony Orchestra den und jenen zu einem Empfang im Bahnhof Rolandseck begrüßen zu können. Der Bahnhof wurde zum Wartesaal. Etwa sechszig bis achtzig Gäste und ebensoviele Kameramänner und Journalisten harrten und harrten. Hier Helmut Kohl, dort Bernhard Timm, der BASF-General. Dort die Frau des Bonner Protokollchefs Schwarzmann, hier der stellvertretende US-Botschafter Fessenden. Das Kalte Büffet stellte bereits die Ohren. David Rockefeller jr., Neffe des New Yorker Gouverneurs und Sohn des Chefs der Chase Manhattan Bank, war mit Gattin da. Aber wer kennt die schon in Rolandseck?

Von den gebetenen Solisten des Orchesters kam niemand. Nur ein paar Förderer aus Boston und Umgebung waren erschienen. Und endlich – fünfviertel Stunden zu spät – Ted Kennedy (ohne Frau). Er war dann da und doch stets „abwesend". Er redete, nach Kohl, einige belanglose Sätze ins Mikrofon. Ohne Lautsprecher mit Professor Timm, um schließlich noch mit seinem Gastgeber, dem CDU-Rekken aus Mainz, einige Worte über die Schwierigkeit, jung gewählt zu werden, zu wechseln. Und schon war er wieder weg. Ein Ministerialbeamter erzählte mir, sein Sohn habe kritisch bemerkt, er mißbillige, daß sein Vater da hingehe. Der Kennedy wolle doch nur sein angeschlagenes Image aufpolieren. – Ein kluges Kind, der Bub. Frau Kohl hatte wohl Ahnungen. Sie war erst gar nicht präsent. Dafür aber die Hellseherin Buchela und eine, wie es hieß, echte Zigeunerprinzessin. Als eigentliche Attraktion in Rolandseck erwies sich das Zigeuner-Quintett Schnuckenack-Reinhardt aus Haßloch. Da es auf dem Balkon plaziert war, hatten wenigstens die vielen Polizisten in der Umgebung des Bahnhofs etwas von seiner Musik.

Endlich am Abend war Joan Kennedy zu sehen. Am Prominententisch in der Beethovenhalle und auf der Bühne. Sie fungierte als Sprecherin zu „Peter und der Wolf" von Prokofieff. Dazu hatte sie viel Ruhe zuvor nötig. Versteht sich: Künstlerin, Auftrittsfieber. Doch sie spricht, wie sie eben spricht. Studiert hat sie Musik. Sie war jedenfalls die Giraffe des Abends. Nichtsdestoweniger verstanden sich die Pops-Musiker durchzusetzen. Es sind die gleichen wie die, die als Symphony Orchestra auftreten. Nur der Dirigent, Arthur Fiedler, ist ausschließlich für leichtere „pop"-uläre Unterhaltungsmusik zuständig. Dazu zählen die Amerikaner neben Melodien aus „Hair" und „St. Louis Blues"-Märschen auch Tschaikowskys b-moll-Klavierkonzert. Ja, wenn man es so, wie dort gespielt, auffaßt! Dazu saß das illustre Publikum, besmokingt, an Tischen mit Kerzen, aß, trank und rauchte. Shocking!? Anfangs ja, später nein. Spätestens nach der „Hair"-Musik wurden aus den feinen Leuten Menschen. Es zog Stimmung in die Halle ein. Man war froh und heiter, vom Gemeinschaftserlebnis getragen und inspiriert. „Das kann die beste Fernsehsendung zu Hause nicht ersetzen", sagte einer im Rausgehen. Den Eintrittspreis von 150 Mark hatte er – in ehrlicher Begeisterung allerdings – schon vergessen.

Joan Kennedy und A. Fiedler beim „Pops Concert" in Bonns Beethovenhalle
dpa/UPI-Bild

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 165,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Saarbrücker Zeitung, Saarbrücken
vom 19. April 1971

Joan, Peter und der Wolf

Joan Kennedys Auftritt war für Bonn ein Ereignis

Bonn, 18. April (UPI)

Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan haben Bonn am Freitag gegeben, um was es sich immer so besorgt bemüht: Gesellschaftliche Reputation mit einem Hauch von Nerz. Während sich der demokratische Politiker in Gesprächen mit Außenminister Walter Scheel und Kanzleramts-Chef Horst Ehmke bemühte, seine eigene Position und die der USA deutlich zu machen, bereitete sich seine Frau für einen Auftritt in der Beethoven-Halle vor: Sie sollte den Sprechpart in Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf" übernehmen.

Doch nicht nur der Name der politischen Dynastie Kennedy machte das aus, was die Bundeshauptstadt unter einem gesellschaftlichen Ereignis versteht: Es spielte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter dem 76jährigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler.

Wer dabei sein wollte, mußte bis zu 150 DM für eine Karte ausgeben oder aber zur Prominenz gehören – die freien Eintritt hatte –, um die 33jährige blonde Senatorenfrau sprechen zu hören, wenn sie nicht gerade vom 107-Mann-Orchester überspielt wurde. Der Beifall war gleichmäßig verteilt: Die Besucher feierten Joan Kennedy ebenso wie Arthur Fiedler, die Musiker und die Solisten für ein „Hair"-Querschnitt, für die Ouvertüre zu Beethovens „Egmont" oder für das Klavierkonzert Nummer eins von Tschaikowski (Solist: Malcom Trager).

Auch wenn der Sprecher der sowjetischen Botschaft, Alexander Bogomolow, Griffehler des Pianisten bemängelte, manche enttäuscht waren, daß Frau Kennedy nicht „hot pants" oder eine durchsichtige Bluse trug, Walter Schell war begeistert: ein Konzert nach Bostoner Art mit belegten Brötchen auf silbernen Tabletts, rhein-hessischem Wein „Niersteiner Fritzenhölle Spätlese" und Champagner „Périgord Imperial brut" waren zusammen mit den Kennedys ein Hit für Bonn. Zum Schluß, als Signal für den Kaffee, gab Arthur Fiedler „The Stars und Stripes forever".

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 255,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälische Rundschau, Dortmund
vom 17. April 1971

Vor einem Konzert mit Senatorgattin Joan Kennedy in der Bonner Beethovenhalle gab es einen Empfang im Kanzleramt: Senator Edward Kennedy (links) im Gespräch mit der Frau des Bundesaußenministers, Mildred Scheel. Ihr Mann (rechts) unterhielt sich mit Mrs. Kennedy.

Politische Gespräche führten gestern US-Senator Edward Kennedy und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke am Rande eines Empfangs für das Bostoner Symphonieorchester. dpa/UPI-Funkbilder)

Empfang im Bundeskanzleramt vor Konzert mit Joan Kennedy

Bonn. Geld, Kunst und Politik gaben sich gestern mittag im Bonner Bundeskanzleramt ein Stelldichein: der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy, seine attraktive Frau Joan, das Bostoner Symphonieorchester und eine Reihe dollarschwerer Mitglieder der Bostoner High-Society waren zu einem Empfang geladen. Offizieller Anlaß war ein Galakonzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" in der Beethovenhalle.

Im Mittelpunkt des Programms unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler stand Joan Kennedy: die Senatorengattin rezitierte Textpartien in „Peter und der Wolf" von Serge Prokofieff. Joan Kennedy hat bei ähnlichen Gelegenheiten auch schon als Pianistin geglänzt.

Es blieb fast unbeachtet, daß Edward Kennedy auch politische Gespräche führte. Mit Außenminister Scheel und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke diskutierte er über Ostpolitik und über das Berlin-Problem. Die Gespräche wurden als „nützlich" bezeichnet . . .

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 347,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Expreß, Köln
vom 16. April 1971

Joan Kennedy, Frau des amerikanischen Senators, und Arthur Fiedler, Chef des Boston Symphony Orchestra, besichtigten gestern mittag den Kölner Dom. Bild: Kollmann

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 26,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Oberhessische Presse, Marburg
vom 17. April 1971

Nur zum Lesen...

... kam diese Dame nach Bonn. Aber sie ist prominent genug, um mit Blumen und Riesen-Fotografenaufgebot begrüßt zu werden: Joan, Ehefrau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, war Star eines Konzertabends des Boston-Symphonie-Orchesters, das gestern in der Beethovenhalle stattfand. Die prominente Politiker-Frau las den Text des musikalischen Märchens „Peter und der Wolf". Unter den Zuhörern Ehemann Edward, der die Gelegenheit der Bonn-Visite zu politischen Gesprächen nutzte.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 37,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Offenburger Tageblatt, Offenburg
vom 20. April 1971

Star des Konzertes war Joan Kennedy

Ein Jumbo mit Freunden aus Boston — „Egmont" zum Essen / Von dpa-Korrespondent Holger Quiring

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden. Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Mästoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock . . .". Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskis erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

*

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbot-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißem Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowski-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz. Letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 30,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Schleswig-Holsteinische Landeszeitung, Rendsburg
vom 19. April 1971

Egmont zum Abendessen

Gala-Konzert mit Joan Kennedy in Bonn

Bonn (dpa). Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue – allerdings etwas zwitterhafte – Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte.

Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte.

Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer – für weniger Geld – auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock . . .".

Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen.

Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskis erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die – in fließendem weißem Maxi – den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malloom Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowski-Konzerts so souverän bwältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Prominente Gäste im Bonner Rathaus: Joan Kennedy und Arthur Fiedler, der einen Feuerwehrhelm erhielt, nachdem er die Kapelle der Bonner Feuerwehr dirigiert hatte

134

ROME, Tuesday, April 20, 1971

DAILY AMERICAN, Tuesday, April 20, 1971

MRS JOAN KENNEDY scored a great success in Bonn doing the narrative of Prokofiev's children's fantasy "Peter and the Wolf." Arthur Fiedler was the conductor (AP Photo)

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 67,9 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —

Ausschnitt aus: Münster'sche Zeitung, Münster

vom 19. April 1971

3/281

Ein neues Spiel für feine Leute vom Rhein

Galakonzert in Bonn — Egmont zum Essen

Bonn (dpa). Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik

Joan Kennedy

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston-Symphony-Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St.-Louis-Blues-March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für wenig Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: Weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgsmusical „Hair".

Per Jumbo die Freunde aus Boston geholt

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbot-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston-Symphony-Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malclom Frager, der den Virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 DM für den billigsten und 150 DM für den teuersten Platz, Letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 57,3 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus: Bonner Rundschau, Bonn

vom 19. April 1971

Zum „Egmont" Mett und Sekt

3/281

Joan und Ted Kennedy mit Bostons Symphonikern in Beethovenhalle

VON EVI KEIL

Bonn. Als dem amerikanischen Botschafter Kenneth Rush während des Konzerts der Bostoner Symphoniker mehrfach eine Kamera auf den Kopf geschlagen war, da sah sich US-Attaché Hans Holzapfel seinem „Chef" gegenüber doch zu einer Erklärung verpflichtet: Der Name der Kennedys besitze eben in Deutschland immer noch eine fast mythische Bedeutung. Joan und Ted Kennedy, dem Botschafter gegenüber placiert, waren die tausendfach fotografierten Stars, als das Bostoner Symphony Orchestra, die „Boston Pops", dirigiert von Feuerwehr-Enthusiast Arthur Fiedler, gemanagt von dem Rolandsecker Bahnhofshausherrn Johannes Wasmuth, in Bonn ein Konzert bestritt, das von Beethoven bis zu den Stars and Stripes reichte.

Joan Kennedy übernahm den erzählenden Part in Prokofieffs Märchen „Peter und der Wolf". Lobte der Senator nach dem Auftritt seiner in Weiß gekleideten blondlockigen Frau: „Ein schönes Peterchen-Märchen." Außenminister Walter Scheel und Gattin Mildred waren der gleichen Meinung.

Dirigent Arthur Fiedler, der mit einer Feuerwehrdrehleiter, mit Blaulicht und ohrendurchdringendem Tütata in rasender Fahrt vom Bonner Königshof zur Beethovenhalle chauffiert wurde, hatte allerdings zuvor im Kanzlerbungalow über die künstlerischen Talente von Joan Kennedy verraten: „Sie ist ein Amateur. Aber eine schöne Frau."

Das Galakonzert in der Beethovenhalle war Abschluß und Höhepunkt eines zweitägigen Aufenthaltes des Bostoner Jet-Set in Bonn. Wer 150 DM pro Karte auf den Tisch legte, der konnte das aufwendige Spektakel von Boston Pops aus nächster Nähe miterleben. Zu Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, dem Klavierkonzert Nummer 1 in b-Moll von Peter Tschaikowsky, Prokofieff und dem St.-Louis-Blues, dem berühmtesten Jazzstück der Welt, gab es Käsebrötchen und westfälisches Mett, Niersteiner Fritzenhölle Jahrgang 1966 und Champagner Perigord Imperial Brut. Auf den billigen Plätzen auf der Galerie, Preis bis 50 DM, wurde nicht gegessen und getrunken.

Kapitalisten und Kommunisten gaben sich ein Stelldichein. Von David Rockefeller junior bis zu den Cabots, die angeblich nur noch mit den Lodges sprechen, und die nur noch mit dem lieben Gott, reichte die Passagierliste der Prominenz aus dem „Athen" der USA, der Millionenstadt Boston. Die meisten Brillanten trug die Organisatorin der Reise, Mrs. Fahnestock. Joan Kennedy hatte mehrere Karat an ihrer Linken, die sie unablässig drehte. Da verblaßte fast der neue Schmuck von Außenministergattin Mildred Scheel, die von ihrer Südamerikareise, auf der sie ihren Mann begleitet hatte, eine goldene Inka-Figur zum Anstecken mitgebracht hatte, deren männliche Attribute auf dem Busen der Außenministergattin nicht zu übersehen waren.

Beifall für Joan Kennedy (v. l.): Außenminister Walter Scheel, Mildred Scheel, Edward („Ted") Kennedy und Frau Liesenfeld. Foto: Munker

Blumen für Joan Kennedy und Arthur Fiedler. Foto: Munker

Ovationen und Rosen nach dem Auftritt von Joan Kennedy. In dem allgemeinen Enthusiasmus für den Jet-Set war es nur Sowjetbotschaftsrat Alexander Bogomolow, der bemerkt hatte, daß sich der Pianosolist mindestens dreimal auf dem Klavier vergriffen hatte (was auch stimmte). Der musikalische Sprung von Beethoven bis zum Musical „Hair" war für den Stardirigenten Arthur Fiedler übrigens keine philosophische Frage. Er hat bereits zwölf Beatles-Melodien auf Platte aufgenommen, als erste „I want to hold your hand". Und sein Kommentar zu den Beatles und zu dem verhitteten „Song of Joy", frei nach Beethoven, den er ebenfalls zu spielen pflegt: „Das popularisiert die Klassiker."

Am Donnerstagmittag war der Bostoner Jet-Set in Wahn gelandet. Mit ihm nach Bonn kamen 120 Musiker. 40 Freunde des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters begleiteten sie. Und nicht nur das. Von ihren Spenden zwischen 50 und 500 000 Dollar hängt das Wohl und Wehe der Symphonie ab. Joan Kennedy trug, als sie landete und später am Nachmittag bei Bonns OB Peter Kraemer, Pants. Doch „hot" waren sie nicht. Sie reichten, im Westernlook geschneidert, bis zu ihren Schuhen.

Beim ersten Bonner Rathausempfang bereits offenbarte Joan, daß Pünktlichkeit zwar die Höflichkeit der Könige, doch nicht der Kennedys ist. Mehr als eine Stunde ließ sie die neugierigen Bonner und den OB warten. Eine Stunde wartete abends auch US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush, der einen Empfang gab. Und gar zwei Stunden mußte auf die Schönste des Clans am nächsten Morgen Außenminister Scheel harren, der im Kanzlerbungalow für die Bostoner einen Empfang gab. Sie sei unter der Dusche, müde oder bei der Probe, entschuldigten die Manager jeweils ihr Fehlen. Und nur einem dringlichen Anruf von Ted war es zu verdanken, daß Joan doch noch bei den Scheels aufkreuzte, die ihrem blonden Gast bayerische Weißwürste und Bier anboten, aber keine rechte Gegenliebe für die Bayernkost fanden.

Stardirigent Arthur Fiedler, der, wie die meisten Bostoner, vor allem dem bei Scheel aufgebauten Rohkostbüfett zugesprochen hatte, zog indessen in Bonn, wo er ging und stand, stets die große Show ab. Der 76jährige, der zum 75. Geburtstag von seiner Frau ein echtes Feuerwehrauto bekam, fügte hier am Rhein seinen 80 Feuerwehrhelmen zwei weitere hinzu. Ein Helm kam als Geschenk von Bonns Feuerwehr. Den zweiten hatte Bonns Protokollchef, Botschafter Hans Schwarzmann, organisiert. Die Pickelhaube stammte aus Würzburg und war nachweislich im Jahre 1906 zum letzten Mal getragen worden. Denn Schwarzmann zog aus dem Helminneren eine Zeitung des Jahrhundertbeginns, die der einstige Träger hineinpraktiziert hatte, weil man schon unter alten Polizeihelmen jämmerlich schwitzen mußte.

Dafür dirigierte der Feuerwehrliebhaber Fiedler im Bonner Rathaus die Godesberger Feuerwehrkapelle, die ihm und den Kennedys zu Ehren „When the saints go marching in" spielte.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 59,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
General-Anzeiger für Bonn und Umgebung, Bonn
vom 17. April 1971

Fiedler kam mit dem Feuerwehrauto

Zum Galakonzert in der Beethovenhalle — Bei Kerzenlicht und Wein

Wa - Gestern abend erreichte der Besuch des „Boston Sinfonie Orchestra" — in seinem Gefolge Senator Edward Kennedy und Joan Kennedy sowie die Creme der Bostoner Gesellschaft — seinen Höhepunkt. Das Galakonzert wurde zum gesellschaftlichen Ereignis. Sein Auftakt war turbulent: Mit Blaulicht und Martinshorn fuhr ein Feuerwehrauto vor die Beethovenhalle; ihm entstieg der Dirigent der Bostoner, Arthur Fiedler, an dessen Feuerwehrauto-Leidenschaft Bonn mit Freuden einige Zugeständnisse gemacht hatte. Es folgte die Vorfahrt der Wagen. Smoking war laut Einladung erwünscht, das Bild war dementsprechend:Man kam im Galakleid.

In der Preisgestaltung für die Karten hatte sich der Veranstalter, das Festival Pro, nicht zimperlich gezeigt. Wer sich während des Kunstgenusses bei Kerzenlicht an Wein und Partyhappen laben wollte, wurde mit 150 oder 130 Mark zur Kasse gebeten; wer bereit war, sich das Vergnügen, dabei gewesen zu sein, 50 Mark kosten zu lassen, durfte auf den Rang; selbst mit 25 Mark war man dabei, allerdings hochoben auf der Empore, doch mit dem Vorteil, die „gesellschaftliche Arena" mit einem Blick überschauen zu können.

Das Programm war populär. Es begann mit der Egmont-Ouvertüre von Beethoven. Sobald die verklungen war, schritt ein Heer von Kellnern ins Parkett, den Wein zu kredenzen. Es folgte das bekannte Klavierkonzert Nr. 1 b-Moll von Peter Tschaikowski, Solist Malcolm Frager. Nach der Pause führte Joan Kennedy als Sprecherin durch Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf". Eine zweite Pause gab Gelegenheit, zu sehen und gesehen zu werden; dann erfüllten Auszüge aus dem Musical „Hair" und der „St. Louis-Blues-March" den Konzertsaal.

Man sah: Außenminister Walter Scheel und Frau Mildred, Altbundespräsident Heinrich Lübke und Frau Wilhelmine Lübke, Protokollchef Dr. Schwarzmann, Vertreter des Diplomatischen Korps — das Galakonzert stand unter dem Patronat des Botschafters der USA Kenneth Rush —, hohe Bundesbeamte, Vertreter der Wirtschaft und der Bankwelt und, wie Johannes Wasmuth es formulierte, „Künstler und sonstige nette Leute, die wir auch so gerne bei uns haben wollten."

Branddirektor Heinz Diekmann kommentierte die neuerliche Feuerwehrüberraschung für Dirigent Fiedler: „Der Fiedler war ganz begeistert und kletterte blitzschnell in das Auto. Bei einem Staatsempfang im Bahnhof Rolandseck hatte am Nachmittag der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Dr. Helmut Kohl Kennedy und die Solisten der Bostoner Philharmoniker willkommen geheißen. Kennedy erklärte, er vermerke mit besonderer Freude, daß er in Ministerpräsident Kohl einen noch jungen Politiker begrüßen könne, denn der Jugend gehöre die Zukunft. Sie sei der beste Garant für eine tiefe Verständigung.

Dirigent und Feuerwehrfan Fiedler auf dem Trittbrett eines Feuerwehrautos

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 59,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
General-Anzeiger für Bonn und Umgebung, Bonn
vom 19. April 1971

BONN

Exklusiv

—hh— In Bonn fand Donnerstag und Freitag letzter Woche ein Spektakulum statt, das mit Fug und Recht als „exklusiv" bezeichnet werden kann. Bahnhofsbesitzer Johannes Wasmuth aus Rolandseck hatte in seinem und im Namen der „Freunde des Bahnhofs" die „Freunde des Orchesters" und die Musiker der Bostoner Symphoniker in die Bundeshauptstadt eingeladen. Weil mit dem Orchester Edward und Joan Kennedy und 38 andere Reiche aus den Staaten kamen, folgten auch Außenminister Walter Scheel und Frau Mildred, Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke und die deutsche High-Society dieser Einladung.

Die große Gesellschaft jedenfalls traf sich auf der Bonher Bühne: im Alten Rathaus, im Kanzlerbungalow, im Bahnhof Rolandseck und schließlich zum Gala-Konzert in der Beethovenhalle.

Überall war die „Hig-Fidelity" unter sich. Vor dem Alten Rathaus bildete das Volk ehrfürchtig einen Halbkreis und wartete 45 Minuten darauf, daß die Gattin von Senator Kennedy ihm ein huldvolles Lächeln gönne. OB Kraemer und die Stadtprominenz harrten derweil geduldig im Gobelinsaal auf das große Shake-hands. Joan Kennedy, die eigentlich Bonns Oberbürgermeister am Donnerstag nicht die Ehre hatte geben wollen und es sich dann doch anders überlegte, bedankte sich später im Fernsehen für die Sympathiekundgebungen der Bonner Bürger: „Es scheinen nicht viele prominente Leute nach Bonn zu kommen, wenn ich hier so großartig empfangen werde."

Das gemütliche Bierrestaurant! — Wo!
KAISERECK BONN
Jeden Abend Unterhaltungsmusik

Nett empfangen wurde die Frau des jüngsten Bruders des ermordeten USA-Präsidenten am Freitag auch von Außenminister Scheel beim Empfang im Kanzlerbungalow, als sie dort gegen 13 Uhr (offizieller Beginn 11 Uhr) Ende 12.30 Uhr eintraf. Die Freunde des Orchesters und des Bahnhofs, an ihrer Spitze Dirigent Arthur Fiedler und Johannes Wasmuth, hatten bis dahin mit den Ministern Konversation getrieben.

Am Nachmittag wurde im Bahnhof zum Plauderstündchen gebeten. Dann warf man sich in Schale, um in der ausverkauften Beethovenhalle das Konzert bei Sekt und Häppchen zu genießen.

Die stolzen Eintrittspreise, (bis zu 150 Mark) so mutmaßten die frustrierten Kunstfreunde mit dünnen Brieftaschen, seien wohl deshalb erhoben worden, weil die Beethovenhalle mit 1600 Plätzen relativ klein sei: Die Kosten für das Orchester seien nur so hereinzubringen gewesen. „Hier kann es nicht die Masse bringen, meinte auch ein Vertreter der Agentur und Konzertdirektion Schmied, die die Bostoner betreute.

Um so erstaunter muß man sein, wenn man erfährt, daß die 40 „Freunde des Orchesters" je 1000 Dollar auf den Tisch blätterten, um den Symphonikern (sie werden in den Staaten kaum subventioniert) die Tournee durch Europa zu ermöglichen. Vollends perplex muß der Bonner Musikfreund sein, wenn er hört, daß in den Vereinigten Staaten der Höchstpreis für ein Konzert der Bostoner sechs Dollar (Mindestpreis in der Beethovenhalle 25 Mark), beträgt. Orchester-Manager David Rockefeller junior nannte den Grund, warum Kunstgenuß in den USA so wohlfeil ist: „Unsere Musik ist für alle da!' In Bonn — und das stieß vielen sauer auf — war sie nur für eine exclusive, finanzstarke Gruppe da.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 30,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ostfriesenzeitung, Leer
20. April 1971

Egmont-Ouvertüre zum Essen

Galakonzert des Bostoner Sinfonieorchesters in Bonn

Joan Kennedy (Mitte), die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle, wo sie in Sergej Prokofieffs Märchen mit Musik „Peter und der Wolf" den Text sprach. Rechts der Dirigent des Bostoner Sinfonieorchesters, Athur Fiedler.

Bonn. Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt ist um eine neue — allerdings zwiterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Zum Promotor dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens hatte sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber nur ein „populäres" Programm, wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malclom Frager.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 DM für den billigsten und 150 DM für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

Holger Quiring

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 347,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Expreß, Köln
vom 19. April 1971

Alle hingen an Joans Lippen

Star des Abends war die blonde Joan Kennedy (rechts: Dirigent Arthur Fiedler) in der Bonner Beethovenhalle. Bei einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Symphoniker trug sie den Text von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vor — und das Publikum hing an ihren Lippen. Ehemann Ted Kennedy zu seiner Frau: „So gut warst du noch nie." Etwa 1000 Gäste, Politiker, Diplomaten, Industrielle aus der High Society von Rhein und Ruhr lauschten dem populären Programm von Beethoven, Tschaikowsky und Melodien aus „Hair" bei belegten Brötchen, Wein und Sekt. Joan hatte den Bonner Auftritt London und Paris vorgezogen, weil sie eine Verehrerin Willy Brandts ist. Bild: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 59,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
General-Anzeiger für Bonn und Umgebung, Bonn
vom 19. April 1971

St. Louis Blues zum Nachtisch

JUBEL UM DIE BOSTON POPS IN DER BEETHOVENHALLE

Das gesellschaftliche Ereignis war vollkommen, und darüber ist in dieser Zeitung ausführlich berichtet worden. Dennoch dürften ein paar Worte speziell über die Musik angebracht sein, die an diesem Galaabend in der Beethovenhalle gewiß nicht das Primäre war und — fast wie in höfischen Zeiten (selbst das bloß zuschauende „Volk" auf den Rängen fehlte ja nicht) — lediglich den luxuriösen akustischen Background abzugeben hatte für small talk (oder Big Talk, je nachdem) bei Wein (Sekt, Kaffee) und Partyhappen. Freilich wurde die nach Beethovens „Egmont"-Ouvertüre zum Entree beflissen hereinschwärmende Kellnerschar vom Hörnersignal des b-moll-Konzerts Tschaikowskys spontan wieder von der Szene gefegt, und lauschte die Creme der gemischten Boston-Bonner High Society still und aufmerksam den klassischen Klangdemonstrationen vom Podium — deren Brillanz und fesselnde, hinreißende orchestrale Finesse auch kaum eine andere Wahl ließ.

Denn wenn das Boston Pops Orchestra auch dadurch entsteht, daß sich die Konzertmeister und ersten Solisten des Boston Symphony Orchestra absentieren, bleibt es eines der besten Orchester nicht nur der Neuen Welt, ein Klangkörper von überragender technischer Perfektion und musikalisch-musikantischer Kraft. Es gibt in ihm von der strengen Dichte und farbigen Differenziertheit des Streicherklangs über die schlanke Schönheit des Holzbläsertons bis zur sonoren, stabilen Pracht der Blechbläser, zwischen fein durchleuchtetem Piano und klanggewaltiger Fortekraft keine schwachen Stellen. Jedenfalls reichten die „Egmont"-Ouvertüre, die Begleitung zum Tschaikowsky-Konzert und die naive (aber keineswegs anspruchslose) Instrumentaletüde von Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" hin, um eine ziemlich exakte Vorstellung von dieser Tatsache zu erhalten. Und daß die Bostoner Musiker mit Elan und Engagement sich nachher auch der Schlagerfolge aus dem Musical „Hair" oder dem St. Louis Blues March widmeten und dabei mit spielerischem Gusto wieder alle Register ihres brillanten Könnens zogen, kann nicht gegen sie sprechen.

Arthur Fiedler, seit nun vierzig Jahren Leiter der Boston Pops und mit dem Orchester dementsprechend bestens vertraut, zeigte sich als der ideale, wenig Aufwand brauchende dirigierende Mittler solcher Klänge in solcher Umgebung. Der junge Pianist Malcolm Frager demonstrierte am b-moll-Konzert, daß er die großartige, weitgriffig akkordhämmernde und effektbewußte Klaviergeste Tschaikowskys aus dem ff beherrscht und die rechte Kraft und Virtuoseneleganz dafür mitbringt. Joan Kennedy machte ihre Sache als Sprecherin in Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen sehr gut und einfühlsam — nicht verwunderlich nach allem, daß ihr und dem Dirigenten Fiedler, dem Klaviersolisten und nicht zuletzt dem ganzen Orchester die Herzen der Zuhörer zuflogen und große Klatschovationen den Raum noch lange erfüllten.

—ür

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 199,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Die Rheinpfalz, Ludwigshafen
vom 17. April 1971

Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred empfingen gestern im Kanzlerbungalow den US-Senator Edward Kennedy (links) und dessen Frau Joan (zweite von rechts). Foto: DPA

Joan kam angeschwebt

Empfänge im Kanzlerbungalow und Bahnhof Rolandseck

Von unserem Bonner Korrespondenten

sm. Bonn. „She is coming, she is coming" (Sie kommt, sie kommt) riefen ein paar dienstbare Geister durch den Kanzlerbungalow. Joan Kennedy, Gattin des Senators Edward (Ted) Kennedy, kam angeschwebt. Und wieder spät. Schon am Vortage hatte Joan Kennedy den Bonner Oberbürgermeister Peter Krämer leicht vergrämt, als sie das feierlich wartende Empfangskomitee der Stadt bange Viertelstunden über die Zeit hatte harren lassen.

Edward und Joan Kennedy sind die prominentesten Gäste bei einem Gala-Konzert, das das Bostoner „Symphony Orchestra" am Freitagabend in der Bundeshauptstadt gab. Senator Kennedy nutzte den Bonner Aufenthalt zu Begegnungen mit Außenminister Walter Scheel und Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke. „Wir haben eine Tour d'Horizont gemacht, es war ein sehr nützliches Gespräch," vertraute Ehmke ein paar um ihn herum stehenden Journalisten im Kanzler-Bungalow an.

Als Joan Kennedy eintraf, oblagen die Hausherren-Pflichten Walter und Mildred Scheel. Das Gerücht, die modebewußte blonde Joan Kennedy werde sich in Bonn mit „heißen Höschen" zeigen, wollte auch auf dem fröhlichen gelockerten Vormittagsempfang nicht verstummen. Es hielt sich auch noch am Nachmittag bei dem Empfang, den der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Helmut Kohl den Kennedys und den anderen mitgereisten US-Prominenten im Künstlerbahnhof Rolandseck gab. Am Abend sollte Joan auf andere Weise im Mittelpunkt stehen: Für sie war in dem Gala-Konzert die Sprechrolle in Prokofieffs Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" vorgesehen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 14,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Oldenburgische Volkszeitung, Vechta
vom 19. April 1971

Abendessen in Bonn mit Musik und Joan Kennedy

Der teuerste Platz kostete 150 Mark — Amerikanische Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens

BONN (dpa). Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue' — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Edward Kennedy gemacht hatte.

Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte.

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbot-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr.

Joan Kennedy (links) während ihrer Mitwirkung im Orchester

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 20,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Darmstädter Tagblatt, Darmstadt
vom 21. April 1971

JOAN KENNEDY, die Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy, war der unbestrittene Star des Konzertes des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am Freitag in der Bonner Beethovenhalle. Sie hatte den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Das Orchester mußte mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahlreichen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin im fließenden weißen Maxi „geschossen" hatten. Das Gala-Konzert bot ein populäres Programm. Die Gäste saßen an Tischen und konnten sich während der Darbietungen mit Sandwiches, Sekt und Flaschenwein stärken.

Foto: AP

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 57,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Bonner Rundschau, Bonn
vom 17. April 1971

Stardirigent Arthur Fiedler war begeistert: Mit einem Bonner Feuerwehrauto wurde er zur Beethovenhalle gefahren. Foto: Munker

US-Stardirigent kam mit Tatütata

Boston Symphonie-Orchester lockte Milliardäre und Kommunisten an

VON EVI KEIL

Bonn. Kapital und Kommunisten, Milliardäre und Musiker, beim Festival des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters in der Bonner Beethovenhalle am Freitagabend waren sie alle vereinigt.

Johannes Wasmuth machte es möglich. Von Rockefeller bis Kennedy reichte die Gästeliste der Prominenz aus den USA. Von Ludwig van Beethoven bis zum Musical „Hair" das Programm von Bostons Pops unter Stardirigent Arthur Fiedler. Der große Orchestermanager kam mit Blaulicht auf einem Feuerwehr-Drehleiter-Wagen mit lautem Tatütata zur Bonner Beethovenhalle gebraust, neben sich Bonns Feuerwehrchef Diekmann.

Bei Kerzenlicht, Käsebrötchen und Sekt wurde musiziert und flaniert. An Tisch 17 US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush und Gattin, Außenminister Walter Scheel und Frau und der internationale Finanzier Herbert Liesenfeld und Gattin Brigitte. Links davon die Russen, Geschäftsträger Alexander Bondarenko, rechts davon die Israelis, der Botschafter Ben-Horin persönlich. Wasmuth versicherte, auch David Rockefeller sei hier. Und dezent placiert gaben sich eine ganze Reihe von Hoheiten ein Stelldichein. Jet-Set, Banken und Adel waren unter einem Dach.

Weißwürste und bayerisches Bier präsentierte Außenminister Walter Scheel der blonden Joan Kennedy. Doch als der Minister seinem Gast den Teller zurechtrückte, gab es weit und breit weder Messer noch Gabel. Bonns Protokollchef, Botschafter Dr. Hans Schwarzmann, eilte zum Büfett, um Bestecke zu suchen. Joan aber rührte auch dann die Bayern-Kost nicht an. Mehr Glück hatte gestern Gastgeber Scheel mit Joans Ehemann Ted Kennedy. Der Senator verspeiste auf der Terrasse des Kanzler-Bungalows mit sichtlichem Vergnügen deutschen Schaschlik. Diesmal hatte Walter Scheel mit der Schaschlik-Stäbchen-Politik Schwierigkeiten.

Eigentlich nur auf zwei Stunden lang hatten sich der deutsche Außenminister und Gattin Mildred auf einen großen Empfang im Kanzler-Bungalow, dem jetzigen Gästehaus der Bundesregierung, „präpariert". Alle Gäste kamen, Ted, der weltberühmte Dirigent des Boston Pops Orchesters, Arthur Fiedler, und die Boston Pops Freunde, der Bostoner Jet-Set. Nur eine fehlte: Joan. Nach zwei Stunden Wartezeit telefonierte Ted Kennedy schließlich seine Frau herbei. Sie sei auf der Probe gewesen, hieß es.

Die Freunde jedoch des Boston Pops Orchesters und die Pulks der Journalisten, die ihnen auf den Fersen seit der Ankunft am Donnerstag gefolgt waren, fanden trotzdem ein immer heiteres Gastgeberehepaar: Walter Scheel ließ die Amerikaner mit Rohkost bewirten. Es gab Selleriesalat, rohe Möhren, Gurken, grünen Salat. Aus Fässern floß gut gekühltes Bier.

Dirigent Arthur Fiedler bekam erneut Feuerwehr-Souvenirs: Dieses Mal aus der Hand von Bonns Protokollchef Schwarzmann, der in Würzburg einen uralten Feuerwehrhelm aufgestöbert hatte.

Er sah aus wie eine Pickelhaube. Und das Alter demonstrierte der Bonner Protokollchef, als er aus dem Innern eine Zeitung aus dem Jahr 1906 zog. Der frühere Haubenträger hatte sie hineinpraktiziert, weil er unter dem Blechding schwitzte.

Fiedler, begeistert von dem Helm, eilte damit zum Außenminister und fragte unverblümt: „Was sammeln Sie eigentlich? Vielleicht nur Geld?" Der Minister fand den Dirigentenwitz urkomisch. Arthur Fiedler begrüßte im Kanzlerbungalow auch seinen Musikfreund, den Chopin-Interpreten Stefan Askenase. Der Pianist Askenase hatte am Abend zuvor in seiner Turmwohnung in Rolandseck für Fiedler und Joan Kennedy ein kleines Privatkonzert gegeben. Zu Ehren von Fiedler spielte er einen Blues aus einer Krenek-Oper und für Joan ein Wiegenlied von Mozart.

Beim Scheel-Empfang erklärte der Dirigent seinem Gastgeber auch noch, warum deutscher Kaffee keineswegs so gut sei wie der in Australien: „In Australien ist die Sahne so dick, daß der Löffel drin steht." Im deutschen Kaffee stand der Löffel natürlich nicht und plumpste zur Seite. Der Dirigentenstar war übrigens auch nicht pingelig, als er über die künstlerischen Fähigkeiten seines prominentesten Orchestermitgliedes Joan Kennedy befragt wurde, die in „Peter und der Wolf" eine Rolle übernommen hat. Fiedler über die klavierspielende Joan: „Sie ist ein Amateur. Aber eine schöne Frau."

Während des Konzerts wurde gefachsimpelt: US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush (rechts) und Außenminister Walter Scheel. Foto: Munker

3/7 81 13

Beim Empfang im Kanzleramtsbungalow

Bostoner Ladies fanden alles „charming"

Edward Kennedy plauderte mit Horst Ehmke — Bonn-Erinnerungen Arthur Fiedlers

ch – „I am glad to meet you here", versicherte Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel Joan Kennedy, als sie eine gute halbe Stunde nach dem offiziellen Ende eines Empfanges „zu Ehren amerikanischer Persönlichkeiten, die Bonn anläßlich eines Konzerts des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters besuchen", im Kanzleramtsbungalow eintraf. Ihr Mann, der Senator des Staates Massachusetts Edward Kennedy, war schon eine halbe Stunde zuvor gekommen, geleitet von Horst Ehmke, dem zeitweiligen Hausherrn des Kanzleramtes.

Freundschaftlicher Händedruck zwischen dem amerikanischen Senator Edward Kennedy und Bonns Außenminister Walter Scheel. In der Mitte Dr. Mildred Scheel
Aufn.: Engels (3)

Viele Prominente waren der Einladung der Scheels gefolgt, die Freunde des Boston Symphonie Orchestra, vor allem aber wohl die Kennedys zu sehen, und mit ihnen über Musik, Beethoven und Bonn zu plaudern.

„Das letzte Mal, daß ich in Bonn war, ist vor dem Weltkrieg gewesen, vor dem ersten", erzählte Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent der Gala-Vorführung seines Orchesters gestern abend in der Beethovenhalle. „Als Student, wissen Sie. Damals baute man noch keine U-Bahnen." Ob ihm das Bonn von damals besser gefallen habe? „Ach wissen Sie, das ist schwer zu sagen. Ein alter Mann wie ich hat so seine sentimentalen Erinnerungen." Auf dem Drachenfels jedenfalls sei er auch damals nicht gewesen. „Oder würden Sie zu Fuß da hinauflaufen?"

Arthur Fiedler, der außer in Bonn auch in Berlin Musik studiert hat, um dann vor mehr als vierzig Jahren nach Boston auszuwandern („Da war gerade eine Stelle im Orchester frei, wissen Sie"), schlichtete einen Streit, der um sein Alter entstanden war. „Weder siebzig noch achtzig, etwas mehr als die Mitte dazwischen: sechsundsiebzig." Und von seinem Fünfundsiebzigsten berichtete er, Freunde hätten ihm „nach langem Überlegen" einen kleinen Hund geschenkt, einen Chihuahua, „mit einem blauen und einem braunen Auge".

Von seinem Orchestermitglied Joan Kennedy schwärmte Arthur Fiedler. „Sie macht ihren Part sehr gut. Sie hat ein großes Einfühlungsvermögen." Er erkundigte sich, wie man in Deutschland zu „populärer Musik" stehe. Er selber liebt die modernen Versionen von Bach oder Beethovens Neunter nicht so sehr, räumt aber ein, daß sie vielleicht dazu beitragen könnten, bei jungen Menschen das Verständnis für die klassische Musik zu wecken.

Helle Begeisterung lösten inzwischen „die Scheels" bei den älteren Damen aus Boston aus. „Charming, lovely", fanden sie nicht nur Frau Mildred in ihrem goldgelben Kleid, auch den Herrn Minister, und natürlich vor allem den Park des Kanzleramtsbungalows. „Wie vor dem White House", konstatierte eine der offenbar weitgereisten Ladies. Und von den Münchner Bierseideln war bald kaum noch einer zu entdecken. Küchenchef-Direktor Prange von der Beethovenhalle nahm es mit der ihm eigenen Gelassenheit hin. Etwas mußte man der Souvenir-Leidenschaft der Amerikaner schon opfern.

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 59,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
General-Anzeiger für Bonn und Umgebung, Bonn
vom 17. April 1971

Charmanter Gast: Joan Kennedy

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 347,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Expreß, Köln
vom 17. April 1971

Joan Kennedy ließ Kohl sitzen!

Ehemann Edward bei Ehmke

Von PETER KUTSCHKE

exp Bonn — Pünktlichkeit ist nicht ihre Zier: Nachdem die blonde Joan Kennedy schon am Donnerstag zu Bonns Oberbürgermeister zu spät gekommen war, ließ sie gestern auch Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred zwei Stunden warten.

Gegen 13 Uhr erschien sie schließlich zum Cocktailplausch im Kanzlerbungalow. Ihr Mann Edward war — nach einem Gespräch mit Minister Ehmke — schon vorher da.

Bei einem Empfang des rheinland-pfälzischen Ministerpräsidenten Kohl für die amerikanischen Gäste im Bahnhof Rolandseck erschien die schöne Joan überhaupt nicht. Ted, durch ein Gespräch mit Außenminister Scheel aufgehalten, kam über eine Stunde später als vorgesehen. Dort verriet ihm Bonns Prominenten-Wahrsagerin, Madame Buchela: „Sie werden Präsident von Amerika, aber noch nicht. Ich wünsche Ihnen Gottes Segen."

Grund für Joans „Körbe": Sie sieht ihren Bonner Besuch vor allem unter künstlerischem Gesichtspunkt.

Joan, die drei Paar „Hot Pants" im Koffer hatte, sich aber nicht traute, sie in Bonn zu tragen, verriet „Express" vor dem Kohl-Empfang: „Mein Mann hat mir verboten, dort hinzugehen." Sie müsse sich für den Abend schonen.

Höhepunkt des zweitägigen Besuchs war gestern abend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle das Galakonzert mit dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester, während etwa 900 Gäste aus Finanzwelt, Industrie, Diplomatie und Adel speisten.

Minister Scheel und Joan Kennedy

US-Senator Kennedy (l.) und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke unterhalten sich im Palais Schaumburg

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 171,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Kölnische Rundschau, Köln
vom 18. April 1971

Arthur Fiedler, weltberühmtem Bostoner Dirigent, überraschte das Bonner Konzertpublikum mit dem Beatles-Song „Yesterday", den das Boston-Pop-Orchester in der Beethovenhalle spielte. Nach Beethoven und Prokofieff ließ sich der Klassiker am Dirigentenpult diesen Gag nicht nehmen. Fiedler hat inzwischen zwölf Beatles-Melodien auf Platte aufnehmen lassen, von ihm dirigiert. Als erstes übrigens: „I want to hold your hand". Fand der 76jährige Dirigent: „Viel besser, man popularisiert die Musik, als daß man sie überhaupt nicht spielt."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 186,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Osnabrücker Zeitung, Osnabrück
vom 19. April 1971

Joan, Peter und der Wolf

Zu Hilfe kamen dem um gesellschaftlichen Glanz bemühten Bonn am Wochenende der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan. Während der demokratische Senator in Gesprächen mit den Ministern Scheel und Ehmke dafür sorgte, daß auch die Politik ihr Recht behielt, betätigte sich die 33jährige Senatorenfrau künstlerisch. In der Beethoven-Halle las sie den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" (Bild) während eines Gastspiels des Boston Symphona Orchestra, das der 76-jährige Arthur Fiedler dirigierte. Wer dabeisein wollte, mußte bis zu 150 DM für eine Karte ausgeben oder aber zur Prominenz gehören – die freien Eintritt hatte. Funkfoto: upi/dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 24,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Landeszeitung für die Lüneburger Heide, Lüneburg
vom 19. April 19

GALAKONZERT IN BONN:

Egmont, Sekt und Sandwiches

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer – für weniger Geld – auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die – in fließendem weißen Maxi den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar.

HEISSE HÖSCHEN „salonfähig". Außenminister Scheel beim Galakonzert im Gespräch mit einer jungen Dame in Hot Pants.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 347,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Expreß, Köln
vom 17. April 1971

Joan Kennedy ließ Kohl sitzen!

Ehemann Edward bei Ehmke

Von PETER KUTSCHKE

exp Bonn — Pünktlichkeit ist nicht ihre Zier: Nachdem die blonde Joan Kennedy schon am Donnerstag zu Bonns Oberbürgermeister zu spät gekommen war, ließ sie gestern auch Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred zwei Stunden warten.

Gegen 13 Uhr erschien sie schließlich zum Cocktailplausch im Kanzlerbungalow. Ihr Mann Edward war — nach einem Gespräch mit Minister Ehmke — schon vorher da.

Bei einem Empfang des rheinland-pfälzischen Ministerpräsidenten Kohl für die amerikanischen Gäste im Bahnhof Rolandseck erschien die schöne Joan überhaupt nicht. Ted, durch ein Gespräch mit Außenminister Scheel aufgehalten, kam über eine Stunde später als vorgesehen. Dort verriet ihm Bonns Prominenten-Wahrsagerin, Madame Buchela: „Sie werden Präsident von Amerika, aber noch nicht. Ich wünsche Ihnen Gottes Segen."

Grund für Joans „Körbe": Sie sieht ihren Bonner Besuch vor allem unter künstlerischem Gesichtspunkt.

Joan, die drei Paar „Hot Pants" im Koffer hatte, sich aber nicht traute, sie in Bonn zu tragen, verriet „Express" vor dem Kohl-Empfang: „Mein Mann hat mir verboten, dort hinzugehen." Sie müsse sich für den Abend schonen.

Höhepunkt des zweitägigen Besuchs war gestern abend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle das Galakonzert mit dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester, während etwa 900 Gäste aus Finanzwelt, Industrie, Diplomatie und Adel speisten.

Minister Scheel und Joan Kennedy

US-Senator Kennedy (l.) und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke unterhalten sich im Palais Schaumburg

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 171,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Kölnische Rundschau, Köln
vom 18. April 1971

Arthur Fiedler, weltberühmter Bostoner Dirigent, überraschte das Bonner Konzertpublikum mit dem Beatles-Song „Yesterday", den das Boston-Pop-Orchester in der Beethovenhalle spielte. Nach Beethoven und Prokofieff ließ sich der Klassiker am Dirigentenpult diesen Gag nicht nehmen. Fiedler hat inzwischen zwölf Beatles-Melodien auf Platte aufnehmen lassen, von ihm dirigiert. Als erstes übrigens: „I want to hold your hand". Fand der 76jährige Dirigent: „Viel besser, man popularisiert die Musik, als daß man sie überhaupt nicht spielt."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 186,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Osnabrücker Zeitung, Osnabrück
vom 19. April 1971

Joan, Peter und der Wolf

Zu Hilfe kamen dem um gesellschaftlichen Glanz bemühten Bonn am Wochenende der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan. Während der demokratische Senator in Gesprächen mit den Ministern Scheel und Ehmke dafür sorgte, daß auch die Politik ihr Recht behielt, betätigte sich die 33jährige Senatorenfrau künstlerisch. In der Beethoven-Halle las sie den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" (Bild) während eines Gastspiels des Boston Symphona Orchestra, das der 76-jährige Arthur Fiedler dirigierte. Wer dabeisein wollte, mußte bis zu 150 DM für eine Karte ausgeben oder aber zur Prominenz gehören – die freien Eintritt hatte. Funkfoto: upi/dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 24,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Landeszeitung für die Lüneburger Heide, Lüneburg
vom 19. April 19

GALAKONZERT IN BONN:

Egmont, Sekt und Sandwiches

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer – für weniger Geld – auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die – in fließendem weißen Maxi den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar.

HEISSE HÖSCHEN „salonfähig". Außenminister Scheel beim Galakonzert im Gespräch mit einer jungen Dame in Hot Pants.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 110,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Kieler Nachrichten, Kiel
vom 17. April 1971

JOAN KENNEDY, Ehefrau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, kam in Begleitung des Direktors des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, Arthur Fiedler, nach Bonn. Bei der Ankunft erhielt Fiedler diesen Feuerwehrhelm als Geschenk. Gestern, einen Tag nach seiner Frau, traf dann auch der Senator ein. Beide hatten sie ein großes Programm zu bewältigen: Joan Kennedy mischte aktiv bei den Symphonikern mit, die gestern abend ein Galakonzert in Bonn gaben. „Ted" Kennedy traf mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und Außenminister Scheel zusammen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 167,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Mannheimer Morgen, Mannheim
vom 19. April 1971

Im Gefolge des Boston Symphony Orchestra

Die Kennedys und Rockefellers im Hauptstädtchen

Bahnhof Rolandseck bewährte sich als Wartesaal / Image-Polierer hatten Hochkonjunktur

Von Wolfgang von Gropper

Bonn/Rolandseck. Am Freitagfrüh 7 Uhr landete der Senator Edward Kennedy in Köln-Wahn. Seine Frau Joan war schon drei Tage vorher gekommen. David Rockefeller jr. mit Gattin tummelten sich ebenfalls am Rhein. Nach Zusammenkünften „Ted" Kennedys mit Außenminister Scheel, Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und dem rheinland-pfälzischen Ministerpräsidenten Helmut Kohl versammelten sich Amerikas Jet set-Mitglieder am Freitagabend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle zu einem Konzert des „Boston Pops"-Orchesters. Als ob sie das nicht zu Hause hören könnten. Wie kam es zu diesem Auflauf in unserem Bundeshauptstädtchen?

Am Anfang stand – wieder einmal – Johannes Wasmuth. Wer das ist? Oh, Kenner kennen ihn. Seit langem. Versuch einer Darstellung für Nichtkenner: Zwei-Zentner-Mann, um die Vierzig, marzipangesichtig, wasserblauäugig. Löwenmähne vom Kopf bis zum Nacken. Beruf? – Ja, da wird's schwierig. Nach allem, was man hört, würde ich sagen: international geläufiger Bildersammler, Organisator und Arrangeur. Die Angaben über Herkunft schwanken zwischen ehemaligem Buchbinder-, Schreiner- und Tüncherlehrling. Es gibt Leute, die Wasmuth ernsthaft für ein Genie halten. Andere rühmen ihm wenigstens einen genialischen Sinn für Qualität schlechthin nach. Die Gemälde, die er im stillgelegten Bahnhof Rolandseck im nördlichsten Zipfel von Rheinland-Pfalz in seiner Galerie „PRO" zusammengetragen hat, sprechen tatsächlich für einen ungewöhnlichen „Riecher". Er wohnt auch in diesem Bahnhof. Zusammen mit dem Pianisten Stefan Askenase. Zu seinen Freunden und regelmäßigen Gästen gehören Künstler vom Kaliber Marcel Marceau. Und die große Gesellschaft gibt sich im Bahnhof dann und wann ein Stelldichein. Zu Silvester oder so. Jedenfalls dann, wenn Johannes Wasmuth, dessen Fäden nach Westen in San Francisco und nach Osten in Tokio erst zu enden scheinen, es will.

Für letzten Freitag hatte er das Boston Symphony Orchestra zu einem „Pops Concert" in die Bonner Beethovenhalle dirigiert. Doch im Wesen des Genies liegt es, immer gleich mehrere Fliegen mit einer Klappe zu schlagen. Wasmuth schlug. Nur die Fliegen gebärdeten sich – frecherweise – ein wenig eigenwillig. Joan Kennedy wäre offenbar überhaupt nicht zu einem Empfang, den Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred am Freitagmittag ihr und ihrem Mann zu Ehren im Kanzler-Bungalow gaben, erschienen, wenn Gatte Ted sie nicht nach zwei Stunden herbeitelefoniert hätte.

Am Nachmittag, 16.30 Uhr, freuten sich (laut Einladung) der Ministerpräsident des Landes Rheinland-Pfalz und Frau Kohl zu Ehren der Solisten und Freunde des Boston Symphony Orchestra den und jenen zu einem Empfang im Bahnhof Rolandseck begrüßen zu können. Der Bahnhof wurde zum Wartesaal. Etwa sechszig bis achtzig Gäste und ebensoviele Kameramänner und Journalisten harrten und harrten. Hier Helmut Kohl, dort Bernhard Timm, der BASF-General. Dort die Frau des Bonner Protokollchefs Schwarzmann, hier der stellvertretende US-Botschafter Fessenden. Das Kalte Büffet stellte bereits die Ohren. David Rockefeller jr., Neffe des New Yorker Gouverneurs und Sohn des Chefs der Chase Manhattan Bank, war mit Gattin da. Aber wer kennt die schon in Rolandseck?

Von den gebetenen Solisten des Orchesters kam niemand. Nur ein paar Förderer aus Boston und Umgebung waren erschienen. Und endlich – fünfviertel Stunden zu spät – Ted Kennedy (ohne Frau). Er war dann da und doch stets „abwesend". Er redete, nach Kohl, einige belanglose Sätze ins Mikrofon. Ohne Lautsprecher mit Professor Timm, um schließlich noch mit seinem Gastgeber, dem CDU-Rekken aus Mainz, einige Worte über die Schwierigkeit, jung gewählt zu werden, zu wechseln. Und schon war er wieder weg. Ein Ministerialbeamter erzählte mir, sein Sohn habe kritisch bemerkt, er mißbillige, daß sein Vater da hingehe. Der Kennedy wolle doch nur sein angeschlagenes Image aufpolieren. – Ein kluges Kind, der Bub. Frau Kohl hatte wohl Ahnungen. Sie war erst gar nicht präsent. Dafür aber die Hellseherin Buchela und eine, wie es hieß, echte Zigeunerprinzessin. Als eigentliche Attraktion in Rolandseck erwies sich das Zigeuner-Quintett Schnuckenack-Reinhardt aus Haßloch. Da es auf dem Balkon plaziert war, hatten wenigstens die vielen Polizisten in der Umgebung des Bahnhofs etwas von seiner Musik.

Endlich am Abend war Joan Kennedy zu sehen. Am Prominententisch in der Beethovenhalle und auf der Bühne. Sie fungierte als Sprecherin zu „Peter und der Wolf" von Prokofieff. Dazu hatte sie viel Ruhe zuvor nötig. Versteht sich: Künstlerin, Auftrittsfieber. Doch sie spricht, wie sie eben spricht. Studiert hat sie Musik. Sie war jedenfalls die Giraffe des Abends. Nichtsdestoweniger verstanden sich die Pops-Musiker durchzusetzen. Es sind die gleichen wie die, die als Symphony Orchestra auftreten. Nur der Dirigent, Arthur Fiedler, ist ausschließlich für leichtere „pop"-uläre Unterhaltungsmusik zuständig. Dazu zählen die Amerikaner neben Melodien aus „Hair" und „St. Louis Blues"-Märschen auch Tschaikowskys b-moll-Klavierkonzert. Ja, wenn man es so, wie dort gespielt, auffaßt! Dazu saß das illustre Publikum, besmokingt, an Tischen mit Kerzen, aß, trank und rauchte. Shocking!? Anfangs ja, später nein. Spätestens nach der „Hair"-Musik wurden aus den feinen Leuten Menschen. Es zog Stimmung in die Halle ein. Man war froh und heiter, vom Gemeinschaftserlebnis getragen und inspiriert. „Das kann die beste Fernsehsendung zu Hause nicht ersetzen", sagte einer im Rausgehen. Den Eintrittspreis von 150 Mark hatte er – in ehrlicher Begeisterung allerdings – schon vergessen.

Joan Kennedy und A. Fiedler beim „Pops Concert" in Bonns Beethovenhalle
dpa/UPI-Bild

ROME, Sunday- Monday, April 18-19, 1971

JOAN KENNEDY and Arthur Fielder arriving in Bonn

Boston Pops 'swings' in Bonn concert

Fire engine fancier Arthur Fiedler set the pace for a swinging Boston Pops performance in Bonn by arriving for the concert in a gleaming hook and ladder truck.

"Great ride," the snowy-haired conductor beamed to the laughing and applauding crowd in front of Bonn's Beethoven Hall before disappearing through a side entrance to give West Germany its first taste of his relaxed approach to the classics, tunes from "Hair" and the St. Louis Blues.

Prolonged applause following the gala performance in which U.S. Sen. Edward Kennedy's wife, Joan, narrated Serge Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" left no doubt about this national capital's reaction.

The Massachusetts senator, West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel and ex-President Heinrich Luebke were among the dressy audience who relaxed around candle-lit dinner tables while pianist Malcolm Frager played Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto.

140

Bonner Rundschau

Kennedy führt Gespräche mit Ehmke

US-Senator Edward Kennedy, der am Freitag zu einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker nach Bonn gekommen war, führte mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke (rechts) vor einem Empfang im Kanzleramt politische Gespräche. Foto: dpa

Generalinspekteur rügt Verhalten Middeldorfs

ws. Bonn. In einer Stellungnahme zur Hauptmanns-Studie aus Unna äußert sich der Generalinspekteur der Bundeswehr, General Ulrich de Maizère, kritisch über das Verhalten des Generals Eicke Middeldorf, dem als zuständigem Divisionskommandeur die Verantwortung für das Zustandekommen dieser Studie zukommt.

General de Maizère würdigt das Engagement der Hauptleute und ihre Besorgnis um das Wohl der Streitkräfte. „Mit Schwierigkeiten, die sich aus der Gesamtstruktur unserer Gesellschaft ergeben, müssen wir jedoch leben und fertig zu werden versuchen. Es ist nicht Aufgabe der Streitkräfte, die Gesellschaft zu reformieren."

Deutlich mißbilligt der Generalinspekteur auch die Zweifel der Hauptleute an der Loyalität der Führung gegenüber dem Auftrag der Streitkräfte.

Die Veröffentlichung der Studie habe die Disziplin geschädigt und durch Verallgemeinerungen und Unterstellungen zu einem falschen Bild der Streitkräfte in der Öffentlichkeit beigetragen. Schließlich bittet er die Kommandeure, die Ausbildungsforderungen der — angespannten — Personallage anzupassen.

Ausdrücklich bestätigt de Maizière, daß das Gespräch zwischen Vorgesetzten und Untergebenen ein Führungsmittel sei.

Stardirigent Arthur Fiedler war begeistert: Mit einem Bonner Feuerwehrauto wurde er zur Beethovenhalle gefahren. Foto: Munker

Samstag, 17. April 1971 Bonner Rundschau

US-Stardirigent kam mit Tatütata

Boston Symphonie-Orchester lockte Milliardäre und Kommunisten an

VON EVI KEIL

Bonn. Kapital und Kommunisten, Milliardäre und Musiker, beim Festival des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters in der Bonner Beethovenhalle am Freitagabend waren sie alle vereinigt.

Johannes Wasmuth machte es möglich. Von Rockefeller bis Kennedy reichte die Gästeliste der Prominenz aus den USA. Von Ludwig van Beethoven bis zum Musical „Hair" das Programm von Bostons Pops unter Stardirigent Arthur Fiedler. Der große Orchestermanager kam mit Blaulicht auf einem Feuerwehr-Drehleiter-Wagen mit lautem Tatütata zur Bonner Beethovenhalle gebraust, neben sich Bonns Feuerwehrchef Diekmann.

Bei Kerzenlicht, Käsebrötchen und Sekt wurde musiziert und flaniert. An Tisch 17 US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush und Gattin, Außenminister Walter Scheel und Frau und der internationale Finanzier Herbert Liesenfeld und Gattin Brigitte. Links davon die Russen, Geschäftsträger Alexander Bondarenko, rechts davon die Israelis, der Botschafter Ben-Horin persönlich. Wasmuth versicherte, auch David Rockefeller sei hier. Und dezent placiert gaben sich eine ganze Reihe von Hoheiten ein Stelldichein. Jet-Set, Banken und Adel waren unter einem Dach.

Weißwürste und bayerisches Bier präsentierte Außenminister Walter Scheel der blonden Joan Kennedy. Doch als der Minister seinem Gast den Teller zurechtrückte, gab es weit und breit weder Messer noch Gabel. Bonns Protokollchef, Botschafter Dr. Hans Schwarzmann, eilte zum Büfett, um Bestecke zu suchen. Joan aber rührte auch dann die Bayern-Kost nicht an. Mehr Glück hatte gestern Gastgeber Scheel mit Joans Ehemann Ted Kennedy. Der Senator verspeiste auf der Terrasse des Kanzler-Bungalows mit sichtlichem Vergnügen deutschen Schaschlik. Diesmal hatte Walter Scheel mit der Schaschlik-Stäbchen-Politik Schwierigkeiten.

Eigentlich nur auf zwei Stunden lang hatten sich der deutsche Außenminister und Gattin Mildred auf einen großen Empfang im Kanzler-Bungalow, dem jetzigen Gästehaus der Bundesregierung, „präpariert". Alle Gäste kamen, Ted, der weltberühmte Dirigent des Boston Pops Orchesters, Arthur Fiedler, und die Boston Pops Freunde, der Bostoner Jet-Set. Nur eine fehlte: Joan. Nach zwei Stunden Wartezeit telefonierte Ted Kennedy schließlich seine Frau herbei. Sie sei auf der Probe gewesen, hieß es.

Die Freunde jedoch des Boston Pops Orchesters und die Pulks der Journalisten, die ihnen auf den Fersen seit der Ankunft am Donnerstag gefolgt waren, fanden trotzdem ein immer heiteres Gastgeberehepaar: Walter Scheel ließ die Amerikaner mit Rohkost bewirten. Es gab Selleriesalat, rohe Möhren, Gurken, grünen Salat. Aus Fässern floß gut gekühltes Bier.

Dirigent Arthur Fiedler bekam erneut Feuerwehr-Souvenirs: Dieses Mal aus der Hand von Bonns Protokollchef Schwarzmann, der in Würzburg einen uralten Feuerwehrhelm aufgestöbert hatte.

Er sah aus wie eine Pickelhaube. Und das Alter demonstrierte der Bonner Protokollchef, als er aus dem Innern eine Zeitung aus dem Jahr 1906 zog. Der frühere Haubenträger hatte sie hineinpraktiziert, weil er unter dem Blechding schwitzte.

Fiedler, begeistert von dem Helm, eilte damit zum Außenminister und fragte unverblümt: „Was sammeln Sie eigentlich? Vielleicht nur Geld?" Der Minister fand den Dirigentenwitz urkomisch. Arthur Fiedler begrüßte im Kanzlerbungalow auch seinen Musikfreund, den Chopin-Interpreten Stefan Askenase. Der Pianist Askenase hatte am Abend zuvor in seiner Turmwohnung in Rolandseck für Fiedler und Joan Kennedy ein kleines Privatkonzert gegeben. Zu Ehren von Fiedler spielte er einen Blues aus einer Krenek-Oper und für Joan ein Wiegenlied von Mozart.

Beim Scheel-Empfang erklärte der Dirigent seinem Gastgeber, auch noch, warum deutscher Kaffee keineswegs so gut sei wie der in Australien: „In Australien ist die Sahne so dick, daß der Löffel drin steht." Im deutschen Kaffee stand der Löffel natürlich nicht und plumpste zur Seite. Der Dirigentenstar war übrigens auch nicht pingelig, als er über die künstlerischen Fähigkeiten seines prominentesten Orchestermitgliedes Joan Kennedy befragt wurde, die in „Peter und der Wolf" eine Rolle übernommen hat. Fiedler über die klavierspielende Joan: „Sie ist ein Amateur. Aber eine schöne Frau."

Während des Konzerts wurde gefachsimpelt: US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush (rechts) und Außenminister Walter Scheel. Foto: Munker

Schreie in der Nacht

WPS Bonn. Schreie schreckten in der Nacht zum Freitag einige Ippendorfer Bürger aus dem wohlverdienten Schlaf. Nachdem eine 55jährige Frau und ein 51-jähriger Mann bis eine Stunde nach Mitternacht in der Gaststätte gezecht hatten, hegte der Mann den Wunsch nach einem Schäferstündchen im Freien und setzte seine Wünsche mit Drohungen und Gewalt auch fast durch. Auf die Schreie der Frau wurde die Polizei alarmiert, die dem Schäferstündchen abrupt ein Ende setzte, dem Mann eine Blutprobe entnahm und ihn der Kripo übergab.

Rasender Mofa-Fahrer

WPS Bonn. Wie ein Steilwandfahrer von Pützchens Markt raste ein 44jähriger Bonner Installateur am Donnerstagabend durch die Bonner Innenstadt. Allerdings ohne Netz, dafür aber mit Alkohol im Blut. Auf der Nordstraße schließlich wurde ihm seine Fahrweise zum Verhängnis; er stürzte und mußte sich mit leichten Verletzungen in die Obhut eines Arztes begeben, der auch gleich die Entnahme einer Blutprobe besorgte. Wenig früher war auf der Nordstraße ein angetrunkener Radfahrer gestürzt und leblos auf der Straße liegen geblieben. Er mußte ins Krankenhaus gebracht werden.

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus: Deister u Leszeitung, Hameln

vom 17. April 1971

F3

Ted und Joan Kennedy in Bonn

Empfang im Bundeskanzleramt / Senatoren-Frau als Rezitatorin

ap Bonn, 16. April. Geld, Kunst und Politik gaben sich am Freitagmittag im Bonner Bundeskanzleramt ein Stelldichein: Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy, seine Frau Joan, die Bostoner Symphoniker und eine Reihe dollarschwerer Mitglieder der Bostoner High Society waren zu einem Empfang geladen. Offizieller Anlaß war ein für den Abend angesetztes Gala-Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Bonner Beethovenhalle mit Werken von Beethoven, Tschaikowsky, Auszügen aus dem Musical „Hair" und dem „St. Louis Blues March".

Im Mittelpunkt des Programms unter der Stabführung von Arthur Fiedler: die Senatoren-Frau Joan als Rezitatorin in „Peter und der Wolf" von Serge Prokofieff. Joan Kennedy, die bei ähnlichen Gelegenheiten auch schon als Pianistin geglänzt hat, stahl im Bundeskanzleramt natürlich sowohl den Musikern und den die Tournee finanzierenden Landsleuten als auch ihrem Mann die Schau. Und so blieb fast unbeachtet, daß Ted Kennedy mit dem Minister im Kanzleramt, Horst Ehmke, ein längeres Gespräch geführt hatte, von dem beide nachher meinten, es sei „nützlich" gewesen, und anschließend mit Außenminister Walter Scheel zusammentraf.

Nach Mitteilung des Auswärtigen Amtes sprach Scheel mit seinem amerikanischen Gast über Berlin und über die Ostpolitik der Bundesregierung und erörterte mit ihm sicherheits- und verteidigungspolitische Fragen, wobei die beiden Politiker besonders auf die Stationierung amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik eingegangen seien. Weitere Einzelheiten aus der Unterredung wurden nicht bekanntgegeben. Die Kennedys werden Bonn am Samstagvormittag wieder verlassen und nach London weiterfliegen.

argus Seit 1867
Auflage (i. Ts.): 171,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Kölnische Rundschau, Köln
vom 19. April 1971

Zum „Egmont" Mett und Sekt

Joan und Ted Kennedy mit Bostons Symphonikern in Beethovenhalle

VON EVI KEIL

Bonn. Als dem amerikanischen Botschafter Kenneth Rush während des Konzerts der Bostoner Symphoniker mehrfach eine Kamera auf den Kopf geschlagen war, da sah sich US-Attaché Hans Holzapfel seinem „Chef" gegenüber doch zu einer Erklärung verpflichtet: Der Name der Kennedys besitze eben in Deutschland immer noch eine fast mythische Bedeutung. Joan und Ted Kennedy, dem Botschafter gegenüber placiert, waren die tausendfach fotografierten Stars, als das Bostoner Symphony Orchestra, die „Boston Pops", dirigiert von Feuerwehr-Enthusiast Arthur Fiedler, gemanagt von dem Rolandsecker Bahnhofshausherrn Johannes Wasmuth, in Bonn ein Konzert bestritt, das von Beethoven bis zu den Stars and Stripes reichte.

Joan Kennedy übernahm den erzählenden Part in Prokofieffs Märchen „Peter und der Wolf". Lobte der Senator nach dem Auftritt seiner in Weiß gekleideten blondlockigen Frau: „Ein schönes Peterchen-Märchen." Außenminister Walter Scheel und Gattin Mildred waren der gleichen Meinung.

Dirigent Arthur Fiedler, der mit einer Feuerwehrdrehleiter, mit Blaulicht und ohrendurchdringendem Tütata in rasender Fahrt vom Bonner Königshof zur Beethovenhalle chauffiert wurde, hatte allerdings zuvor im Kanzlerbungalow über die künstlerischen Talente von Joan Kennedy verraten: „Sie ist ein Amateur. Aber eine schöne Frau."

Das Galakonzert in der Beethovenhalle war Abschluß und Höhepunkt eines zweitägigen Aufenthaltes des Bostoner Jet-Set in Bonn. Wer 150 DM pro Karte auf den Tisch legte, der konnte das aufwendige Spektakel von Boston Pops aus nächster Nähe miterleben. Zu Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, dem Klavierkonzert Nummer 1 in b-Moll von Peter Tschaikowsky, Prokofieff und dem St.-Louis-Blues, dem berühmtesten Jazzstück der Welt, gab es Käsebrötchen und westfälisches Mett, Niersteiner Fritzenhölle Jahrgang 1966 und Champagner Perigord Imperial Brut. Auf den billigen Plätzen auf der Galerie, Preis bis 50 DM, wurde nicht gegessen und getrunken.

Kapitalisten und Kommunisten gaben sich ein Stelldichein. Von David Rockefeller junior bis zu den Cabots, die angeblich nur noch mit den Lodges sprechen, und die nur noch mit dem lieben Gott, reichte die Passagierliste der Prominenz aus dem „Athen" der USA, der Millionenstadt Boston. Die meisten Brillanten trug die Organisatorin der Reise, Mrs. Fahnestock. Joan Kennedy hatte mehrere Karat an ihrer Linken, die sie unablässig drehte. Da verblaßte fast der neue Schmuck von Außenministergattin Mildred Scheel, die von ihrer Südamerikareise, auf der sie ihren Mann begleitet hatte, eine goldene Inka-Figur zum Anstecken mitgebracht hatte, deren männliche Attribute auf dem Busen der Außenministergattin nicht zu übersehen waren.

Blumen für Joan Kennedy und Arthur Fiedler. Foto: Munker

Ovationen und Rosen nach dem Auftritt von Joan Kennedy. In dem allgemeinen Enthusiasmus für den Jet-Set war es nur Sowjetbotschaftsrat Alexander Bogomolow, der bemerkt hatte, daß sich der Pianosolist mindestens dreimal auf dem Klavier vergriffen hatte (was auch stimmte). Der musikalische Sprung von Beethoven bis zum Musical „Hair" war für den Stardirigenten Arthur Fiedler übrigens keine philosophische Frage. Er hat bereits zwölf Beatles-Melodien auf Platte aufgenommen, als erste „I want to hold your hand". Und sein Kommentar zu den Beatles und zu dem verhiteten „Song of Joy", frei nach Beethoven, den er ebenfalls zu spielen pflegt: „Das popularisiert die Klassiker."

Am Donnerstagmittag war der Bostoner Jet-Set in Wahn gelandet. Mit ihm nach Bonn kamen 120 Musiker. 40 Freunde des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters begleiteten sie. Und nicht nur das. Von ihren Spenden zwischen 50 und 500 000 Dollar hängt das Wohl und Wehe der Symphonie ab. Joan Kennedy trug, als sie landete und später am Nachmittag bei Bonns OB Peter Kraemer, Pants. Doch „hot" waren sie nicht. Sie reichten, im Westernlook geschneidert, bis zu ihren Schuhen.

Beim ersten Bonner Rathausempfang bereits offenbarte Joan, daß Pünktlichkeit zwar die Höflichkeit der Könige, doch nicht der Kennedys ist. Mehr als eine Stunde ließ sie die neugierigen Bonner und den OB warten. Eine Stunde wartete abends auch US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush, der einen Empfang gab. Und gar zwei Stunden mußte auf die Schönste des Clans am nächsten Morgen Außenminister Scheel harren, der im Kanzlerbungalow für die Bostoner einen Empfang gab. Sie saß unter der Dusche, müde oder bei der Probe, entschuldigten die Manager jeweils ihr Fehlen. Und nur einem dringlichen Anruf von Ted war es zu verdanken, daß Joan doch noch bei den Scheels aufkreuzte, die ihrem blonden Gast bayerische Weißwürste und Bier anboten, aber keine rechte Gegenliebe für die Bayernkost fanden.

Stardirigent Arthur Fiedler, der, wie die meisten Bostoner, vor allem dem bei Scheel aufgebauten Rohkostbüfett zugesprochen hatte, zog indessen in Bonn, wo er ging und stand, stets die große Show ab. Der 76jährige, der zum 75. Geburtstag von seiner Frau ein echtes Feuerwehrauto bekam, fügte hier am Rhein seinen 80 Feuerwehrhelmen zwei weitere hinzu. Ein Helm kam als Geschenk von Bonns Feuerwehr. Den zweiten hatte Bonns Protokollchef, Botschafter Hans Schwarzmann, organisiert. Die Pickelhaube stammte aus Würzburg und war nachweislich im Jahre 1906 zum letzten Mal getragen worden. Denn Schwarzmann zog aus dem Helminneren eine Zeitung des Jahrhundertbeginns, die der einstige Träger hineinpraktiziert hatte, weil man schon unter alten Polizeihelmen jämmerlich schwitzen mußte.

Dafür dirigierte der Feuerwehrliebhaber Fiedler im Bonner Rathaus die Godesberger Feuerwehrkapelle, die ihm und den Kennedys zu Ehren „When the saints go marching in" spielte.

Beifall für Joan Kennedy (v. l.): Außenminister Walter Scheel, Mildred Scheel, Edward („Ted") Kennedy und Frau Liesenfeld. Foto: Munker

argus Seit 1867
Auflage (i. Ts.): 110,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Kieler Nachrichten, Kiel
vom 19. April 1971

141

Sekt und Sinfonisches - Mettwurst und Maestoso

Randnotizen zum Bonner Gala-Konzert des Bostoner Orchesters in der Beethovenhalle

Bonn (dpa) Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock . . ." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: Weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es bot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys Erstem Klavierkonzert und Serge Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Joan Kennedy und Arthur Fiedler während des Konzerts. Foto: dpa

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 DM für den billigsten und 150 DM für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

HOLGER QUIRING

argus Seit 1867
Auflage (i. Ts.): 17,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Pirmasenser Zeitung, Pirmasens
19. April 1971

Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy war der prominenteste Zuhörer seiner Frau: Joan Kennedy hatte in der Bonner Beethovenhalle bei einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker den Sprechpart in Sergej Prokofiews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen (unser dpa-Bild links). Rechts der Dirigent des amerikanischen Orchesters Arthur Fiedler. Eine weitere Besonderheit dieser Galavorstellung war die Tatsache, daß sich die Konzertbesucher während der Darbietung an Tischen im Saal mit belegten Broten, Sekt und Wein stärken konnten. (Bericht auf Seite 2).

142

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 199,1 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus: Rhein-Zeitung, Koblenz

vom 17. April 1971

Ted fand nur noch leere Platten

Unhöfliche Kennedys – Joan erschien überhaupt nicht

VON CHRISTL FRANK

ROLANDSECK. Pünktlichkeit scheint die Tugend derKennedys nicht zu sein.90Minuten ließ gestern abend Joan Kennedy (33) Zaungäste und versammelte Prominenz im Künstlerbahnhof Rolandseck auf sich warten, ehe durchdrang, daß sie unterdessen bei einem Bonner Figaro unter der Haube saß.

Auch die munter aufspielende Zigeunerkapelle, von Gastgeber Helmut Kohl angefeuert: „Spielen Sie ein flottes Lied", konnte die sich ausbreitende Ungeduld wenig dämpfen.

Als der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident in Abwesenheit der Hauptperson seine Ansprache an die Freunde des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters richtete und die Verbundenheit seines Landes mit der NATO bekundete, war ein Teil der Prominenz bereits im Aufbruch. Immerhin hatten die Ladies und Gentlemen, überwiegend in Midi und Cut erschienen, das angerichtete kalte Büfett mit dem Ausdruck des Entzückens fast abgespeist. Senator Ted Kennedy, der eine Viertelstunde vor dem angekündigten Ende des Empfangs, umgeben von einem Schwarm von Leibwächtern, im wilhelminischen Prunkbau eintraf, sah nur noch leere Silberplatten.

Doch obwohl die Schönste aus dem Kennedy-Clan unentschuldigt fehlte – es sei denn, man hält ihr das anstrengende Tagesprogramm von nicht weniger als vier Repräsentationsterminen zugute –, hatte die Prominenz aus Rolandseck, Bonn und Umgebung ihr Ereignis. Ermöglicht hatte es der Besitzer des Bahnhofs, Johannes Wasmuth (34), der damit seinen Ruf als Katalysator des Bonner Gesellschaftslebens bestätigte.

Seinem Förderungsprojekt für junge Künstler kommt auch der Reinerlös des Galaabends zugute, den sich die Auserwählten in der Bonner Beethovenhalle immerhin zwischen 120 und 150 Mark kosten ließen. Hier konnte auch Joan Kennedy nicht passen: Sie hatte beim Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker, geleitet von Chefdirigent Arthur Fiedler, den Sprechpart in Serge Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 57,3 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus: Bonner Rundschau, Bonn

vom 20. April 1971

... von der Tribüne.

■ Dr. Heinrich Lübke, ehemaliger Bundespräsident und Gattin Wilhelmine, haben ihre gesellschaftlichen Verpflichtungen in Bonn wieder aufgenommen. Nach längerem Erholungsaufenthalt sah man das frühere Präsidentenpaar jetzt zum ersten Mal wieder beim Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker. Die frühere First Lady war elegant gekleidet und voll jugendlichen Elans. Im Gedränge der Prominenz kamen beide jedoch nicht dazu, Joan und Ted Kennedy zu begrüßen, obwohl der einstige Präsident sowohl den früheren Präsidenten John F. Kennedy empfangen hatte als auch dessen Bruder Robert.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 10,3 — lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –

Ausschnitt aus: Main-Spitze, Rüsselsheim

vom 19. April 1971

Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy war der prominenteste Zuhörer seiner Frau: Joan Kennedy hatte am Wochenende in der Bonner Beethovenhalle bei einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker den Sprechpart in Prokofiews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Neben Joan Kennedy der Dirigent des Orchesters A. Fiedler. (dpa)

sako — Zeitungsausschnitte Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172

Information aus: KURIER

Wien — Datum 17. April 1971

sako — Zeitungsausschnitte Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172

Information aus: NEUE ZEIT

Graz — Datum 18. April 1971

Für Amerika und den Kennedy-Clan, insbesondere natürlich für trotz Dementis nach Präsidentenehren strebenden Edward, warb Joan Kennedy in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle: Zur Musik der Bostoner Philharmoniker sprach sie den Text Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf".

Kennedys besuchen Bonn

Herzlicher Empfang für die Kennedys in Deutschland. Während Joan Kennedy in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle (Auf dem Bild mit Dirigent Arthur Fiedler) einer Gala-Vorstellung der Bostoner Symphoniker beiwohnt, führt Gatte Edward politische Gespräche. Auf einer Party mit Rheinland-Pfalz-Ministerpräsident Helmut Kohl unterhielt sich der jüngste Kennedy bestens.

argus Seit 1887

Ausschnitt aus: Honnefer Volkszeitung, Honnef

vom 19. April 1971

Gala-Konzert des Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchesters in Bonn

In der ausverkauften Bonner Beethoven-Halle fand am Freitagabend das Gala-Konzert des Boston-Sinfony Orchestra unter der Leitung von Arthur Fiedler statt. Joan Kennedy, Frau des jüngsten Kennedy-Bruders Edward, sprach in Serge Prokofiews „Peter und der Wolf" den Text-Teil. Auf unserem HVZ-Bild: Joan Kennedy während des Konzerts mit Dirigent Arthur Fiedler.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 37,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hildesheimer Allgemeine Zeitung, Hildesheim
vom 19. April 1971

Mit Beifall und Interesse wurde Joan Kennedys Sprechrolle in Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" aufgenommen. Eigener Funkdienst dpa/upi

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172
Information aus:
TAGBLATT
Linz Datum 19. April 1971

WIEN/BONN. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra, eines der prominentesten amerikanischen Symphonieorchester, gab am Wochenende im großen Wiener Musikvereinssaal zwei vom Publikum mit großem Beifall aufgenommene Konzerte. Das Orchester befindet sich derzeit aus Anlaß seiner vor 90 Jahren erfolgten Gründung auf einer ausgedehnten Europatournee. Dieses „Promenadenorchester" der Bostoner konzertierte am Wochenende in Bonn, dessen Kulturleben durch eine neue Variante bereichert wurde: Abendessen mit Musik. Während das Orchester unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler auf dem Podium ein Programm zu Gehör brachte, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum schon klassischen St.-Louis-Blues reichte, saßen die Zuhörer im Saal an weißgedeckten Tischen bei Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt. Unbestrittener Star des Konzertes war Joan Kennedy, die den Sprechpart in Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Unser Bild zeigt sie und Senator Edward Kennedy. AP-Funkbild

Beethoven bei Sekt und Brötchen

Neue Party-Masche auf Bonner Parkett / Prominenteste Gäste: Ehepaar Kennedy

Bonn (dpa/upi). Die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten des gesellschaftlichen Lebens zwischen Stehempfang und Staatsbankett ist in Bonn um eine neue Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik. Jetzt also ist auch das Publikum in der Bundeshauptstadt mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut gemacht worden! Prominenteste Sendboten waren das Ehepaar Senator Edward Kennedy.

Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm, das von Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum St. Louis Blues March von Williams Christopher Handy und natürlich – dabei hatte Frau Kennedy ihren Sprech-Auftritt – zu Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" reichte.

Im Saal saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer – für weniger Geld – auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso – das Ganze für rund 150 Mark Eintritt.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren üblich, und speziell Joan Kennedy kennt ihren Part aus dem Prokofjew-Musikmärchen von vielen, vielen öffentlichen Auftritten. Der Erlös fließt fast immer karitativen Zwecken zu.

Das Programm enthüllte: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt der 76jährige Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, nämlich solange, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war.

Politische Prominenz machte sich rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo Jet eine Schar von Freunden des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die – in fließendem weißen Maxi – ihre Rolle sprach. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 26,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Presse, Coburg
vom 20. April 1971

Joan Kennedy sprach „Peter und der Wolf"

Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy war der prominenteste Zuhörer seiner Frau: Joan Kennedy hatte am Freitag abend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle bei einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker den Sprechpart in Sergej Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen (unser Bild links). Rechts der Dirigent des amerikanischen Orchesters, Arthur Fiedler, aufgenommen während des Konzerts in der Beethovenhalle. Eine weitere Besonderheit dieser Galavorstellung war die Tatsache, daß sich die Konzertbesucher während der Darbietung an Tischen im Saal mit Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein stärken konnten.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 199,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Rhein-Zeitung, Koblenz
vom 19. April 1971

Beethoven mit kalter Platte Heiße Musik aus „Hair"

Galaabend im Festival PRO mit den Bostonern und Joan Kennedy

VON HARRY LERCH

Das Riesending, die Vierzigmeterleiter der Bonner Feuerwehr, fährt mit zuckend blauen Lichtblitzen vors Portal der Beethovenhalle. Blinder Alarm: keine Katze auf dem heißen Blechdach, keine Bombe versteckt. Die APO hat an deisem Abend etwas anderes vor und zeigt nicht einmal müdes Interesse am Pop- und Beethovenabend der Bostoner Symphoniker. Dabei könnte die Abendtafel - Prager Saftschinken mit Spargelspitzen - ein gefundenes Fressen für sie sein. Die jungen Helden werden müde.

Wenn, wie unlängst, Stockhausens Wandelkonzert die Gäste bummeln läßt - hier zu ein paar Geigern im Saal, zu den Schlagzeugern im kleinen Salon - ist diese Beethoven-Abendtafel kein Schock. Sechshundert Gäste langen zu für einen Preis von 150 Mark - und haben keineswegs vor, geheiligte Gefühle unserer Nation zu verletzen. Es ist ein amerikanischer Abend.

Weißmähnig und gebräuntes Gesicht: Leopold Fiedler hebt den weißen Dirigentenstab. Seine Bostoner Sinfoniker leben von privaten Subventionen, sie müssen drüben, überm Teich, ihren Freunden etwas bieten - und spielen Pop in riesenhaft besuchten Freilichtkonzerten. Nicht, daß Beethoven zu kurz käme: die Egmontouvertüre klingt brillant auf, verdichtet und preziös, erst recht das Klavierkonzert Nr. 1 von Tschaikowsky.

Dazwischen hat Dr. med. Mildred Scheel die Show des Abends, gerade rechtzeitig peilt Edward Kennedy sie an, um mit aufs Bild zu kommen, während draußen die Bönnscher Zaungäste einander angesehen haben: Sieht so ein kommender Präsident von Amerika aus?

Malcom Frager der Solist. Sein klavieristischer Part ist orientiert an der Tschaikowsky-Interpretation von Sjatoslav Richter: so traumhaft die Rhythmik. Keine gigantische Gestik, kein Oktavendonner, gleichviel strömende, mitreißende, atemberaubende Artikulation. Unter seinen Händen zaubert sich das Motiv des ukrainischen Volksliedes blühend auf, die beiden Kadenzen des Andanteausklangs, die funkelnden Arabesken des Andante semplice, lyrisch der Walzer nach dem französischen Chanson, brillant das Finale. Soloapplaus für den Pianisten, ein Orkan von Blumen. Weißbehandschuhte Kellner schenken unterdeß Niersteiner Fritzenhölle, 1966er Spätlese, nach. Man langt zu Wildbachforellenfilet. Mit Kaviarsahne übergossen.

Joan Kennedy spricht den Prolog zu Prokofieffs Märchen „Peter und der Wolf". Arthur Fiedler hebt graziös das Märchen vom Ausreißer aus seinem Ensemble von neunzig Instrumenten mit Soli der Knabenflötenstimme zum Fagott des Wolfs. Duftigste Orchesterführung, der Maestro am Pult sichert ab und behält die Ballettmusik bei in ihrem gleitenden Melos.

Zu kalter Platte die heiße von „Hair"! Perigod Imperial Brut heißt der Champagner zu Pop. Leopold Fiedler heizt das Orchester auf und zaubert schwingende Rhythmik zutage wie Kaninchen aus dem Zylinder. Der St.-Louis-Blues-Marsch verzückt das Parkett. Trommler schwitzen, Kellner flitzen, aus des Maestro Mähne schüttelt das Musical herab wie einen Orkan. Auch Heinrich Lübke, völlig unbemerkt, klatscht. Musenchef Johannes Wasmuth lächelt.

Vier Zugaben. Die letzte: der Marsch „Unter den Sternen".

Amerika, Amerika.

Rauschender Beifall und ein Blumenmeer für Joan Kennedy und Arthur Fiedler. Foto: ap 144

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 43,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälischer Anzeiger und Kurier, Hamm/Westf.
vom 19. April 1971

3/281

Sandwichs, Sekt und Sinfonien

Bonns gesellschaftliches Leben um Spielart reicher: Essen mit Musik

Von HOLGER QUIRING

Bonn. Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte.

Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 139,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfalen-Post, Hagen
vom 19. April 1971

150 Mark Eintritt für Sekt und Sinfonie

Stürmisch gefeiert wurden in der Bonner Beethovenhalle nach dem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker Dirigent Arthur Fiedler und Joan Kennedy (links), die Frau des US-Senators Edward. Das Programm reichte vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St.-Louis-Blues von W. C. Handy. Joan Kennedy, die in einem weißen Maxi auftrat, hatte den Sprechpart in dem musikalischen Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Die Konzertbesucher im Saal saßen an Tischen und konnten sich mit Sandwich, Sekt und Wein stärken. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht ein Butterbrot mitgebracht hatte. In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren üblich. Die Premiere des 107 Mann starken Orchesters auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzterer inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, der Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen müsse, betrage sechs Dollar. Beim Galakonzert trugen Besucherinnen „heiße Höschen" (rechts).

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 65,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Main-Echo, Aschaffenburg
vom 20. April 1971

JOAN KENNEDY und Arthur Fiedler während des Konzerts des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Bonner Beethovenhalle.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 10,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ibbenbürener Volkszeitung, Ibbenbüren
vom 19. April 1971

3/281

Ein neues Spiel für feine Leute vom Rhein

Galakonzert in Bonn — Egmont zum Essen

Bonn (dpa). Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Joan Kennedy

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston-Symphony-Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St.-Louis-Blues-March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für wenig Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: Weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgsmusical „Hair".

Per Jumbo die Freunde aus Boston geholt

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbot-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston-Symphony-Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malclom Frager, der den Virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 DM für den billigsten und 150 DM für den teuersten Platz, Letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 487,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Welt am Sonntag, Hamburg
vom 18. April 1971

Joan Kennedy sprach den Text zu Prokofieffs Musik-Märchen „Peter und der Wolf", Arthur Fiedler dirigiert das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester. Senator Edward Kennedy lobte nach dem Konzert seine Gattin: „Mein Darling, das war dein größter Erfolg seit langem."

Beim Umtrunk nach dem Konzert trafen sich in der Bar des Hotels „Königshof" Senator Edward Kennedy, Mildred Schee Dirigent Arthur Fiedler, vortragende Joan Kennedy und Außenminister Walter Scheel. Anschließend reisten die Kenned nach London weiter.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 199,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Die Rheinpfalz, Ludwigshafen
vom 17. April 1971

Bostoner Symphoniker in Bonn

3

Konzert mit Brötchen

Bonn (DPA). Senator Edward Kennedy wird der prominenteste Zuhörer sein, wenn seine Frau Joan in der Bonner Beethovenhalle den Text von Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen (Peter und der Wolf) spricht. Das Galakonzert der 130 Bostoner Symphoniker, die unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein populäres Programm („Boston Pops") mit Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskys erstem Klavierkonzert (Solist: Earl Wild) sowie Melodien aus dem Musical „Hair" aufwarten, fällt auch deshalb aus dem Rahmen, weil die Konzertbesucher im Saal an Tischen sitzen und sich während des Konzerts an Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein laben können.

Edward Kennedy: Darling, das war ein großer Erfolg

Bonn, 17. April

Frenetisch applaudierten 1200 Reiche und Prominente am Freitagabend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle nach einem ungewöhnlichen Kunsterlebnis: Begleitet vom Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester hatte Senatoren-Gattin Joan Kennedy (33) den Text zu Prokofieffs Musik-Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" gesprochen.

Zum Eintrittspreis von 150 Mark — den freilich nur die feinen Leute aus Bocholt und Castrop-Rauxel bezahlt hatten, denn die Feinen von Bonn hatten Ehrenkarten — durften die Besucher nach Bostoner Art während des Konzerts essen und trinken: Belegte Brötchen, rheinhessischen „1966er Niersteiner Fritzenhölle Spätlese" und Champagner „Perigord Imperial Brut".

Aus Sympathie für Willy Brandt, der seit seiner Berliner Bürgermeisterzeit ein Freund des Hauses Kennedy ist, hatte sich die Hobby-Künstlerin entschlossen, während der Wohltätigkeitsgastspielreise des Bostoner Orchesters durch Westeuropa in Bonn aufzutreten statt in Paris, London, Wien oder Hamburg.

Glücklich über den Applaus sank sie hinter der Bühne ihrem mitgereisten Ehemann in die Arme. Edward Kennedy (39) gab Küßchen und gratulierte: „Mein Darling, das war dein größter Erfolg seit langem."

In Bonn trat Joan Kennedy nach Benefiz-Konzerten für ihren wahlkämpfenden Mann und ein neues Bostoner Konzerthaus sowie Weihnachtsfeiern in Washington und einer Piano-Darbietung in der Andy-Williams-Fernsehshow zum elftenmal öffentlich auf. Der Bostoner Chef-Dirigent Arthur Fiedler (76) über die kunstsinnige Kennedy-Frau: „Sie ist ein Amateur. Aber eine schöne Frau."

Vor „Peter und der Wolf" hatten Fiedlers Bostoner das Klavierkonzert Nr. 1 von Tschaikowsky gespielt. Der Beifall war genauso groß wie für die Kennedy. Tschaikowsky-Landsmann Sascha Bojomolow, Sprecher der Sowjet-Botschaft, mokierte sich: „Das Orchester ist erst im zweiten Satz aufgewacht, und der Pianist hat sich dreimal vergriffen."

Nach dem klassischen Märchen tobte sich das große Symphonie-Orchester (107 Musiker) mit einem Potpourri aus dem Musical „Hair" aus. Spontan stürzte Außenminister Walter Scheel ans Dirigentenpult und drückte Arthur Fiedler die Hand. Scheel: „Wenn diese Musik von solch einem Orchester gespielt wird, dann merkt man erst, wie schön sie ist."

Beim Umtrunk nach dem Konzert in der Bar des Hotels „Königshof" zausten sich die Eheleute Kennedy über ihr weiteres Europa-Programm. Der Senator: „Laß uns doch nach München abhauen. Das ist eine schöne Stadt." Seine Frau: „Nein, wir müssen morgen früh nach London, das haben wir fest versprochen."

Manfred Kohnke / Jochen Kummer

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 202,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Abendpost-Nachtausgabe
Frankfurt/Main 19. April 19

3

Ein Hauch von Nerz in Bonn: Joan, Peter und der Wolf

wl Bonn. — Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan haben Bonn am Freitag gegeben, um was es sich immer so besorgt bemüht: gesellschaftliche Reputation mit einem Hauch von Nerz.

Während sich der demokratische Politiker in Gesprächen mit Außenminister Scheel und Kanzleramts-Chef Ehmke bemühte, seine eigene Position und die der USA deutlich zu machen, ihn Ehmke dazu brachte, für das protokollarisch unverzichtbare Besucherfoto einen Hund in den Arm zu nehmen, bereitete sich seine Frau — wie angekündigt — für einen Auftritt in der Beethoven-Halle vor: Sie sollte den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" übernehmen. Doch nicht nur der Name der politischen Dynastie Kennedy machte das aus, was die Bundeshauptstadt unter einem gesellschaftlichen Ereignis versteht: Es spielte das „Boston Symphony Orchestra" unter dem 76jährigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler.

● Wer dabei sein wollte, mußte bis zu 150 Mark für eine Karte ausgeben oder aber zur Prominenz gehören — die freien Eintritt hatte —, um die 33jährige blonde Senatorenfrau sprechen zu hören, wenn sie nicht gerade vom 107-Mann-Orchester überspielt wurde.

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 1,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –

Ausschnitt aus:
Borkumer Zeitung und Badezeitung, Borkum

vom 19. April 197

Abendessen in Bonn mit Musik und Joan Kennedy

Der teuerste Platz kostete 150 Mark — Amerikanische Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens

BONN (dpa). Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Edward Kennedy gemacht hatte.

Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte.

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbot-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr.

Joan Kennedy (links) während ihrer Mitwirkung im Orchester

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 17,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Kreiszeitung für die Grafschaft Hoya, Hoya

vom 19. April 1971

Bostoner Symphonie Orchestra spielte auf

Ehepaar Kennedy als prominenteste Gäste

Ein neues gesellschaftliches Ereignis in Bonn

dpa. Bonn. Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich, Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock ..."

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt 23 DM. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei.

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.):
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Herne

vom 17. April 1971

Arthur Fiedler stülpte sich seinen 81. Helm sofort auf

Vor den Symphonikern erst noch die Feuerwehrkapelle dirigiert

Weiß-blauer Wirbel mit Leberkäs und Bier um drei Amerikaner in Bonn

Von WAZ-Chefreporter ERNST NEY

Drei Amerikaner machten Wirbel in Bonn: Die Dame zuerst: blonde, langhaarige Senatorengattin Joan Kennedy. Zweitens: Senator Edward Kennedy, ehrgeiziger Politiker, möglicherweise präsidentschaftsverdächtig, skandalumwitterter Unfallfahrer in jener Affäre, bei der seine Sekretärin nachts in Florida den Tod fand. Schließlich: der 75jährige Dirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, vor vielen Jahren und zwei Weltkriegen Student der Musik in Berlin.

Anlaß des Prominentenbesuches war eines der größten gesellschaftlichen Spektakel im bisherigen Bonner Hauptstadtleben: ein Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker am Freitagabend in der Beethovenhalle. Mit Beethoven fing es an, mit „Hair" hörte es auf. Joan Kennedy sprach die Texte zu „Peter und der Wolf" von Prokofieff. Ein für Deutschland völlig neues Konzertgefühl, denn auf den teuren Plätzen im Parkett wurde gleichzeitig diniert.

Bevor der Große Abend in Szene ging, wurden die immer lächelnden Kennedys und der putzmuntere Mittsiebziger Arthur mit Ehrungen, Einladungen und Empfängen überhäuft. Bonns Oberbürgermeister Krämer eröffnete den Reigen. Sekt und goldenes Buch im Rathaus.

Bei den anderen Auftritten bevorzugte sie einen fliederfarbenen Hosenanzug, einen ebensolchen Midimantel lässig um die Schultern gelegt. Ich würde sagen, die Hosen waren zu kostbar, um zu sagen: Joan trug Jeans.

270mal Ehrenmitglied

Krämers Überraschung: Er ließ im Festsaal die Feuerwehrkapelle blasen, denn aus irgendeinem Grunde hat der alte Arthur eine Schwäche für die Feuerwehr. Er ist Ehrenmitglied von rund 270 Feuerwehren in aller Welt und besitzt 80 Feuerwehrhelme, denen in Bonn der 81. hinzugefügt wurde. Er stülpte sich das Geschenk sofort auf das schlohweiße Haar, lieh sich vom Dirigenten dessen Stab und feuerte die Feuerwehr zum Marsch von den „Altem Kameraden" an.

Mister Arthur brachte seinen Helm auch mit, als am Freitagvormittag Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred sich die Ehre gaben, die Kennedys und den Dirigenten im Kanzlerbungalow des Schaumburgparks zu empfangen.

Die Gäste wurden mit einem rustikalen Büfett bewirtet: Leberkäs, Würstchen, Münchner Bier, Laugenbrezel und andere Spezialitäten aus dem weißblauen Teil Süddeutschlands. In Stellvertretung des Bundeskanzlers, der am Gardasee seinen letzten Osterurlaubstag verbrachte, hatte Horst Ehmke mit „Ted" ein politisches Gespräch.

US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush verschob für einige Stunden seinen Abflug nach Berlin, zum 18. Botschaftertreffen, um in seiner Residenz die Landsleute willkommen zu heißen. Joan in einem mädchenhaften schneeweißen Wolle-Mini. Man könnte auch sagen: Wonne-Mini.

Bankräuber starb in Kölner Haftzelle

KÖLN (dpa

13 Stunden nach seinem mißglückten Überfall auf eine Bankfiliale in Köln ist ein 47jähriger Familienvater am Freitag gestorben. Bei einer Routinekontrolle der Haftzellen im Kölner Polizeipräsidium fand ein Beamter den Mann nur noch schwach atmend auf seiner Pritsche. Auf dem Weg zum Krankenhaus starb der 47jährige. Nach den Feststellungen der Polizei ist der Mann mit größter Wahrscheinlichkeit eines natürlichen Todes gestorben. Die genaue Todesursache müsse die Obduktion ergeben. Der 47jährige Auftragsschriftsteller aus Düsseldorf hinterläßt fünf Kinder, davon das jüngste im Alter von fünf Jahren. Bei dem Überfall hatte er schon 151 000 DM erbeutet, war jedoch schnell gefaßt worden.

MIT SEINEM NEUEN WEISSEN FEUERWEHRHELM genoß der Dirigent Arthur Fiedler den Empfang im Festsaal des Bonner Rathauses. Zwischen Fiedler und Joan Kennedy: der Bonner Oberbürgermeister Peter Krämer. dpa/upi-Funkbild

„ETWAS MÜSSEN WIR FÜR UNS ALLEIN HABEN"

Peter Brügge über die Kennedys in Bonn

Kaum etwas dient der Darstellung ungetrübter deutsch-amerikanischer Harmonie so volkstümlich wie ein herzlich photogenes Shakehands mit den Kennedys. Da kam es für Bonn wie gerufen, daß Joan, die Ehefrau des glücklosen Senators Edward Kennedy, vergangenen Freitag in der Beethoven-Halle bei einer musikalischen Gala mit dem 93köpfigen Pop-Ensemble des Boston Symphony Orchestra die Vorlese-Tante in Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf" gab. Obwohl das ein musikalisch eher bescheidener Part ist, verursachte das Erscheinen der 33jährigen Laienspielerin in der nachösterlichen Szenerie der Klein-Hauptstadt Wirbel wie der Besuch einer Königin.

Vorleserin Joan Kennedy, Dirigent Fiedler: Wirbel wie bei einer Königin

Der drei Zentner schwere Veranstalter Johannes Wasmuth, den man gemeinhin kennt als den Retter des wilhelminischen Prachtbahnhofs Rolandseck, brauchte nur das Wort Kennedy auszusprechen, da erblühte am Weg zu seiner Gala eine solche Serie von politischen Empfängen, daß Arthur Fiedler, der 76jährige Dirigent der Boston Pops, und ein halbes Hundert mitreisender Kleinmäzene des Orchesters zwischen Bonn und Rolandseck gesellschaftlich nahezu verschlissen wurden. Die in Wahrheit überall erwartete Vorleserin Joan freilich zog es vor, mit der rheinischen Prominenz eine Dauerübung in Geduld zu vollziehen.

Nachdem sie schon in Hamburg einen ihr zugedachten Empfang verschlafen hatte, ließ die früher vor allem für modische Extravaganzen berühmte Hausfrau aus dem Kennedy-Clan Bonns Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer und seine Räte und seine Feuerwehrkapelle 40 Minuten warten, ehe sie den immer pünktlichen, cocktailfeinen und wenig Kennedy-freundlichen Orchester-Förderern aus Boston in einem blauen Jeans-Anzug nachzügelte, sich taufrisch auf eine unüberwindliche Reisemattigkeit berief und mit furiosen Unterbögen ins Goldene Buch einschrieb. Sodann erschien sie in einem Mini von jener Kürze, mit der sie eine Soiree der Patricia Nixon einst beeinträchtigt hatte, eine volle Stunde verspätet zum Cocktail des Bonner US-Botschafters.

Der Landesregent von Rheinland-Pfalz, Helmut Kohl, umständlich angereiste Wirtschaftskapitäne wie der BASF-Chef Timm und eine Zigeunerkapelle geduldeten sich auf dem sanierten Prachtbahnhof Rolandseck 90 Minuten. Dann kam Edward Kennedy, der sich zu dem bevorstehenden Auftritt seiner Frau ebenfalls aus den Staaten herbeibemüht hatte, und zog es vor, über deren Fernbleiben gar nicht erst etwas Entschuldigendes zu sagen. „Kennedys waren hier immer willkommen", sprach er steinern lächelnd, ein Glas Saft in der nervösen Rechten, „und heute ist das nicht anders." Diskret warb ein Prälat aus Boston unter den murrenden Gästen um Verständnis für die Eigenwilligkeit der Weiber dieses Clans, mit denen bekanntlich nicht einmal John F., der Präsident, einst fertig geworden sei.

Walter Scheel, als Vizekanzler amtierend, bestellte für die musischen Menschen aus Boston ein Bierfrühstück in den unbewohnten Kanzler-Bungalow und begann — „such is business" — damit glatt noch einmal, als mit 120 Minuten Verspätung Joan Kennedy kam: wieder in einem Hosenanzug aus blauem Drell, wieder schläfrig-strahlend, bittend um eine Tasse Kaffee.

Zwei Stunden zuvor war Edward Kennedy mit kaum noch erwähnenswerten 20 Minuten Verzögerung auf den unruhig vor dem Portal des Palais Schaumburg wartenden Kanzleramts-Ehmke gestoßen. In dessen Zimmer vor dem Lenbach-Porträt vom alten Moltke, über den der Gast ein paar aufklärende Worte zu hören bekam, bewegte ihn nur die eine, die Kennedy-Frage: „Was he successful?"

Ihn selber schien es zu irritieren, daß die Publicity, an der er hier dankbar teilhatte, in ihm nur den Begleiter einer seit den Wehen von Chappaquiddick bei den Deutschen hochangeschriebenen Ehefrau sah und nicht einen kommenden Mann der Macht. Horst Ehmke spielte darauf wohl an, als er ihm — auf Wunsch der Kameraleute — den Zwergschnauzer eines Gastes an die Brust zu drücken suchte: „Sie brauchen die Stimmen der Tierfreunde!"

Es war eine Kirchweih des Goodwill, geeignet, der Opposition ihren Vorwurf in den Hals zurückzustopfen, diese Regierung begieße zuwenig die transatlantische Waffenbrüderschaft. Einen arbeitslosen Vormittag lang beugte sich der Vizekanzler über die Hand von Damen, denen das sensationell erschien. „Küß die Hand", ahmten sie voreinander nach, „charming!" Einen alten Feuerwehrhelm dedizierte er dem alten Dirigenten Fiedler, den 258., zu dessen Sammlung, zu der die Bonner Feuerwehr kurz zuvor den 257. beitragen konnte.

Alle freuten sich über dieses Sammelhobby des schlohweißen Kennedy-Freundes, der sich rühmt, nach Möglichkeit keinen Brand auszulassen, wiewohl er kein Pyromane sei.

Im Feuerwehrauto, das war ihm des Rummels schon zuviel, wurde der Maestro zu seinem Kennedy-Konzert kutschiert, dessen Eintrittspreise ihm selber peinlich hoch erschienen. Etwas Wein, belegte Brötchen und eben für 20 Minuten des Programms die Stimme von Mrs. Kennedy, das, fand der Veranstalter Wasmuth, sei pro Galagast 150 Mark wohl wert. Und 900 Andächtige gaben ihm ärgerlich zahlend recht.

Mr. und Mrs. Kennedy kamen auch ins Konzert zu spät. Joans Lampenfieber war diesmal der gute Grund. Deswegen zeigte auch Edward sich erst bei ihrem Auftritt dem schon beunruhigten Publikum. Emanzipation bedeute ihr dies Vorlesen im noblen Englisch einer noblen Mutter aus Massachusetts, verriet sie der Düsseldorfer Society-Schönheit Brigitte Liesenfeld, die neben Edward saß und so etwas verstehen kann, denn sie selber dilettiert in gleichem Streben als Aquarellistin. „Etwas müssen wir", sagte Joan von Jet-Frau zu Jet-Frau, „für uns allein haben."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 1059,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Der Spiegel, Hamburg
vom 19. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 56,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Darmstädter Echo, Darmstadt
vom 19. April 1971

Ein Konzert zum Mitessen

Gesellschaftliche Novität mit hohem Preis in Bonn

Von dpa-Korrespondent Quiring, Bonn

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Möglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Edward Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March reichte. Im Saal saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte; Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock ..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war.

Joan Kennedy (AP-Foto)

Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein populäres Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskys erstes Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüberr der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von Freunden des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht ganz ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 DM für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inkluse Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller jr., Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

Joan kam, sprach und siegte

Für 150 Mark in der Beethovenhalle: Sandwiches und Sekt mit Musik – Die Stippvisite der Kennedys am Rhein

Bonn — Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das „Boston Symphony Orchestra" unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: Weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm, wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys Erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgsmusical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißem Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

Holger Quiring

Stars aus Boston in der Bonner Beethovenhalle: Joan Kennedy (links), die Frau des US-Senators, und der Dirigent des „Boston Symphony Ochestra", Arthur Fiedler. (Foto: dpa)

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 98,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Aachener Volkszeitung, Aachen
19. April 1971

„ETWAS MÜSSEN WIR FÜR UNS ALLEIN HABEN"

Peter Brügge über die Kennedys in Bonn

Kaum etwas dient der Darstellung ungetrübter deutsch-amerikanischer Harmonie so volkstümlich wie ein herzlich photogenes Shakehands mit den Kennedys. Da kam es für Bonn wie gerufen, daß Joan, die Ehefrau des glücklosen Senators Edward Kennedy, vergangenen Freitag in der Beethoven-Halle bei einer musikalischen Gala mit dem 93köpfigen Pop-Ensemble des Boston Symphony Orchestra die Vorlese-Tante in Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf" gab. Obwohl das ein musikalisch eher bescheidener Part ist, verursachte das Erscheinen der 33jährigen Laienspielerin in der nachösterlichen Szenerie der Klein-Hauptstadt Wirbel wie der Besuch einer Königin.

Vorleserin Joan Kennedy, Dirigent Fiedler: Wirbel wie bei einer Königin

Der drei Zentner schwere Veranstalter Johannes Wasmuth, den man gemeinhin kennt als den Retter des wilhelminischen Prachtbahnhofs Rolandseck, brauchte nur das Wort Kennedy auszusprechen, da erblühte am Weg zu seiner Gala eine solche Serie von politischen Empfängen, daß Arthur Fiedler, der 76jährige Dirigent der Boston Pops, und ein halbes Hundert mitreisender Kleinmäzene des Orchesters zwischen Bonn und Rolandseck gesellschaftlich nahezu verschlissen wurden. Die in Wahrheit überall erwartete Vorleserin Joan freilich zog es vor, mit der rheinischen Prominenz eine Dauerübung in Geduld zu vollziehen.

Nachdem sie schon in Hamburg einen ihr zugedachten Empfang verschlafen hatte, ließ die früher vor allem für modische Extravaganzen berühmte Hausfrau aus dem Kennedy-Clan Bonns Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer und seine Räte und seine Feuerwehrkapelle 40 Minuten warten, ehe sie den immer pünktlichen, cocktailfeinen und wenig Kennedy-freundlichen Orchester-Förderern aus Boston in einem blauen Jeans-Anzug nachzügelte, sich taufrisch auf eine unüberwindliche Reisemattigkeit berief und mit furiosen Unterbögen ins Goldene Buch einschrieb. Sodann erschien sie in einem Mini von jener Kürze, mit der sie eine Soiree der Patricia Nixon einst beeinträchtigt hatte, eine volle Stunde verspätet zum Cocktail des Bonner US-Botschafters.

Der Landesregent von Rheinland-Pfalz, Helmut Kohl, umständlich angereiste Wirtschaftskapitäne wie der BASF-Chef Timm und eine Zigeunerkapelle geduldeten sich auf dem sanierten Prachtbahnhof Rolandseck 90 Minuten. Dann kam Edward Kennedy, der sich zu dem bevorstehenden Auftritt seiner Frau ebenfalls aus den Staaten herbeibemüht hatte, und zog es vor, über deren Fernbleiben gar nicht erst etwas Entschuldigendes zu sagen. „Kennedys waren hier immer willkommen", sprach er steinern lächelnd, ein Glas Saft in der nervösen Rechten, „und heute ist das nicht anders." Diskret warb ein Prälat aus Boston unter den murrenden Gästen um Verständnis für die Eigenwilligkeit der Weiber dieses Clans, mit denen bekanntlich nicht einmal John F., der Präsident, einst fertig geworden sei.

Walter Scheel, als Vizekanzler amtierend, bestellte für die musischen Menschen aus Boston ein Bierfrühstück in den unbewohnten Kanzler-Bungalow und begann — „such is business" — damit glatt noch einmal, als mit 120 Minuten Verspätung Joan Kennedy kam: wieder in einem Hosenanzug aus blauem Drell, wieder schläfrig-strahlend, bittend um eine Tasse Kaffee.

Zwei Stunden zuvor war Edward Kennedy mit kaum noch erwähnenswerten 20 Minuten Verzögerung auf den unruhig vor dem Portal des Palais Schaumburg wartenden Kanzleramts-Ehmke gestoßen. In dessen Zimmer vor dem Lenbach-Porträt vom alten Moltke, über den der Gast ein paar aufklärende Worte zu hören bekam, bewegte ihn nur die eine, die Kennedy-Frage: „Was he successful?"

Ihn selber schien es zu irritieren, daß die Publicity, an der er hier dankbar teilhatte, in ihm nur den Begleiter einer seit den Wehen von Chappaquiddick bei den Deutschen hochangeschriebenen Ehefrau sah und nicht einen kommenden Mann der Macht. Horst Ehmke spielte darauf wohl an, als er ihm — auf Wunsch der Kameraleute — den Zwergschnauzer eines Gastes an die Brust zu drücken suchte: „Sie brauchen die Stimmen der Tierfreunde!"

Es war eine Kirchweih des Goodwill, geeignet, der Opposition ihren Vorwurf in den Hals zurückzustopfen, diese Regierung begieße zuwenig die transatlantische Waffenbrüderschaft. Einen arbeitslosen Vormittag lang beugte sich der Vizekanzler über die Hand von Damen, denen das sensationell erschien. „Küß die Hand", ahmten sie voreinander nach, „charming!" Einen alten Feuerwehrhelm dedizierte er dem alten Dirigenten Fiedler, den 258., zu dessen Sammlung, zu der die Bonner Feuerwehr kurz zuvor den 257. beitragen konnte.

Alle freuten sich über dieses Sammelhobby des schlohweißen Kennedy-Freundes, der sich rühmt, nach Möglichkeit keinen Brand auszulassen, wiewohl er kein Pyromane sei.

Im Feuerwehrauto, das war ihm des Rummels schon zuviel, wurde der Maestro zu seinem Kennedy-Konzert kutschiert, dessen Eintrittspreise ihm selber peinlich hoch erschienen. Etwas Wein, belegte Brötchen und eben für 20 Minuten des Programms die Stimme von Mrs. Kennedy, das, fand der Veranstalter Wasmuth, sei pro Galagast 150 Mark wohl wert. Und 900 Andächtige gaben ihm ärgerlich zahlend recht.

Mr. und Mrs. Kennedy kamen auch ins Konzert zu spät. Joans Lampenfieber war diesmal der gute Grund. Deswegen zeigte auch Edward sich erst bei ihrem Auftritt dem schon beunruhigten Publikum. Emanzipation bedeute ihr dies Vorlesen im noblen Englisch einer noblen Mutter aus Massachusetts, verriet sie der Düsseldorfer Society-Schönheit Brigitte Liesenfeld, die neben Edward saß und so etwas verstehen kann, denn sie selber dilettiert in gleichem Streben als Aquarellistin. „Etwas müssen wir", sagte Joan von Jet-Frau zu Jet-Frau, „für uns allein haben."

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 1059,9
— lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Der Spiegel, Hamburg
vom 19. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 56,7
— lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Darmstädter Echo, Darmstadt
vom 19. April 1971

147

Ein Konzert zum Mitessen

Gesellschaftliche Novität mit hohem Preis in Bonn

Von dpa-Korrespondent Quiring, Bonn

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Möglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Edward Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March reichte. Im Saal saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte; Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock ..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war.

Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein populäres Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskys erstes Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüberr der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von Freunden des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht ganz ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 DM für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inkluse Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller jr., Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

Joan Kennedy (AP-Foto)

Joan kam, sprach und siegte

Für 150 Mark in der Beethovenhalle: Sandwiches und Sekt mit Musik – Die Stippvisite der Kennedys am Rhein

Bonn — Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das „Boston Symphony Orchestra" unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: Weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm, wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys Erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgsmusical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißem Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

Holger Quiring

Stars aus Boston in der Bonner Beethovenhalle: Joan Kennedy (links), die Frau des US-Senators, und der Dirigent des „Boston Symphony Ochestra", Arthur Fiedler. (Foto: dpa)

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 98,7
— lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Aachener Volkszeitung, Aachen
19. April 1971

„ETWAS MÜSSEN WIR FÜR UNS ALLEIN HABEN"

Peter Brügge über die Kennedys in Bonn

Kaum etwas dient der Darstellung ungetrübter deutsch-amerikanischer Harmonie so volkstümlich wie ein herzlich photogenes Shakehands mit den Kennedys. Da kam es für Bonn wie gerufen, daß Joan, die Ehefrau des glücklosen Senators Edward Kennedy, vergangenen Freitag in der Beethoven-Halle bei einer musikalischen Gala mit dem 93köpfigen Pop-Ensemble des Boston Symphony Orchestra die Vorlese-Tante in Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf" gab. Obwohl das ein musikalisch eher bescheidener Part ist, verursachte das Erscheinen der 33jährigen Laienspielerin in der nachösterlichen Szenerie der Klein-Hauptstadt Wirbel wie der Besuch einer Königin.

Vorleserin Joan Kennedy, Dirigent Fiedler: Wirbel wie bei einer Königin

Der drei Zentner schwere Veranstalter Johannes Wasmuth, den man gemeinhin kennt als den Retter des wilhelminischen Prachtbahnhofs Rolandseck, brauchte nur das Wort Kennedy auszusprechen, da erblühte am Weg zu seiner Gala eine solche Serie von politischen Empfängen, daß Arthur Fiedler, der 76jährige Dirigent der Boston Pops, und ein halbes Hundert mitreisender Kleinmäzene des Orchesters zwischen Bonn und Rolandseck gesellschaftlich nahezu verschlissen wurden. Die in Wahrheit überall erwartete Vorleserin Joan freilich zog es vor, mit der rheinischen Prominenz eine Dauerübung in Geduld zu vollziehen.

Nachdem sie schon in Hamburg einen ihr zugedachten Empfang verschlafen hatte, ließ die früher vor allem für modische Extravaganzen berühmte Hausfrau aus dem Kennedy-Clan Bonns Oberbürgermeister Peter Kraemer und seine Räte und seine Feuerwehrkapelle 40 Minuten warten, ehe sie den immer pünktlichen, cocktailfeinen und wenig Kennedy-freundlichen Orchester-Förderern aus Boston in einem blauen Jeans-Anzug nachzügelte, sich taufrisch auf eine unüberwindliche Reisemattigkeit berief und mit furiosen Unterbögen ins Goldene Buch einschrieb. Sodann erschien sie in einem Mini von jener Kürze, mit der sie eine Soiree der Patricia Nixon einst beeinträchtigt hatte, eine volle Stunde verspätet zum Cocktail des Bonner US-Botschafters.

Der Landesregent von Rheinland-Pfalz, Helmut Kohl, umständlich angereiste Wirtschaftskapitäne wie der BASF-Chef Timm und eine Zigeunerkapelle geduldeten sich auf dem sanierten Prachtbahnhof Rolandseck 90 Minuten. Dann kam Edward Kennedy, der sich zu dem bevorstehenden Auftritt seiner Frau ebenfalls aus den Staaten herbeibemüht hatte, und zog es vor, über deren Fernbleiben gar nicht erst etwas Entschuldigendes zu sagen. „Kennedys waren hier immer willkommen", sprach er steinern lächelnd, ein Glas Saft in der nervösen Rechten, „und heute ist das nicht anders." Diskret warb ein Prälat aus Boston unter den murrenden Gästen um Verständnis für die Eigenwilligkeit der Weiber dieses Clans, mit denen bekanntlich nicht einmal John F., der Präsident, einst fertig geworden sei.

Walter Scheel, als Vizekanzler amtierend, bestellte für die musischen Menschen aus Boston ein Bierfrühstück in den unbewohnten Kanzler-Bungalow und begann — „such is business" — damit glatt noch einmal, als mit 120 Minuten Verspätung Joan Kennedy kam: wieder in einem Hosenanzug aus blauem Drell, wieder schläfrig-strahlend, bittend um eine Tasse Kaffee.

Zwei Stunden zuvor war Edward Kennedy mit kaum noch erwähnenswerten 20 Minuten Verzögerung auf den unruhig vor dem Portal des Palais Schaumburg wartenden Kanzleramts-Ehmke gestoßen. In dessen Zimmer vor dem Lenbach-Porträt vom alten Moltke, über den der Gast ein paar aufklärende Worte zu hören bekam, bewegte ihn nur die eine, die Kennedy-Frage: „Was he successful?"

Ihn selber schien es zu irritieren, daß die Publicity, an der er hier dankbar teilhatte, in ihm nur den Begleiter einer seit den Wehen von Chappaquiddick bei den Deutschen hochangeschriebenen Ehefrau sah und nicht einen kommenden Mann der Macht. Horst Ehmke spielte darauf wohl an, als er ihm — auf Wunsch der Kameraleute — den Zwergschnauzer eines Gastes an die Brust zu drücken suchte: „Sie brauchen die Stimmen der Tierfreunde!"

Es war eine Kirchweih des Goodwill, geeignet, der Opposition ihren Vorwurf in den Hals zurückzustopfen, diese Regierung begieße zuwenig die transatlantische Waffenbrüderschaft. Einen arbeitslosen Vormittag lang beugte sich der Vizekanzler über die Hand von Damen, denen das sensationell erschien. „Küß die Hand", ahmten sie voreinander nach, „charming!" Einen alten Feuerwehrhelm dedizierte er dem alten Dirigenten Fiedler, den 258., zu dessen Sammlung, zu der die Bonner Feuerwehr kurz zuvor den 257. beitragen konnte.

Alle freuten sich über dieses Sammelhobby des schlohweißen Kennedy-Freundes, der sich rühmt, nach Möglichkeit keinen Brand auszulassen, wiewohl er kein Pyromane sei.

Im Feuerwehrauto, das war ihm des Rummels schon zuviel, wurde der Maestro zu seinem Kennedy-Konzert kutschiert, dessen Eintrittspreise ihm selber peinlich hoch erschienen. Etwas Wein, belegte Brötchen und eben für 20 Minuten des Programms die Stimme von Mrs. Kennedy, das, fand der Veranstalter Wasmuth, sei pro Galagast 150 Mark wohl wert. Und 900 Andächtige gaben ihm ärgerlich zahlend recht.

Mr. und Mrs. Kennedy kamen auch ins Konzert zu spät. Joans Lampenfieber war diesmal der gute Grund. Deswegen zeigte auch Edward sich erst bei ihrem Auftritt dem schon beunruhigten Publikum. Emanzipation bedeute ihr dies Vorlesen im noblen Englisch einer noblen Mutter aus Massachusetts, verriet sie der Düsseldorfer Society-Schönheit Brigitte Liesenfeld, die neben Edward saß und so etwas verstehen kann, denn sie selber dilettiert in gleichem Streben als Aquarellistin. „Etwas müssen wir", sagte Joan von Jet-Frau zu Jet-Frau, „für uns allein haben."

argus Seit 1857

Auflage (i. Ts.): 1059,9 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Der Spiegel, Hamburg

vom 19. April 1971

argus Seit 1857

Auflage (i. Ts.): 56,7 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Darmstädter Echo, Darmstadt

vom 19. April 1971

147

Ein Konzert zum Mitessen

Gesellschaftliche Novität mit hohem Preis in Bonn

Von dpa-Korrespondent Quiring, Bonn

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Möglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Edward Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March reichte. Im Saal saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte; Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock ..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war.

Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein populäres Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskys erstes Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüberr der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von Freunden des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht ganz ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 DM für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inkluse Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller jr., Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

Joan Kennedy (AP-Foto)

Joan kam, sprach und siegte

Für 150 Mark in der Beethovenhalle: Sandwiches und Sekt mit Musik – Die Stippvisite der Kennedys am Rhein

Bonn — Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das „Boston Symphony Orchestra" unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: Weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm, wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys Erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgsmusical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißem Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inkiusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

Holger Quiring

Stars aus Boston in der Bonner Beethovenhalle: Joan Kennedy (links), die Frau des US-Senators, und der Dirigent des „Boston Symphony Ochestra", Arthur Fiedler.

(Foto: dpa)

IS 857

Auflage (i. Ts.): 98,7 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

aus:

ner Volkszeitung, Aachen

19. April 1971

148

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 24,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Rhein-Zeitung, Düsseldorf
vom 19. April 1971

„Galakonzert" mit Joan Kennedy in Bonn war ein perfekt provinzielles Ereignis

Große Welt aß zur Musik

Von NRZ-Redakteurin SUSANNE MATERLEITNER

Bonn. Die Bonner Beethovenhalle war Schauplatz eines Ereignisses, das größeren Mengen von High-Snobiety und deren Trabanten aus Groß-Amerika und Klein-Deutschland vielfältige Genüsse bot. Höhepunkt des Nobel-Spektakels: Mrs. Joan Kennedy las, begleitet von der volkstümlichen Sektion des legendären Boston Symphony Orchestra, den Text von Serge Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf", indes das Publikum an festlich gedeckten Zehnertischen sich an Niersteiner Fritzenhölle Spätlese, Périgord Imperial Brût und Edel-„Schnittchen" ebenso labte wie an der angenehmen Empfindung, Senator Edward Kennedy nebst etlichen Dollarmillionären sozusagen auf Tuchfühlung bei sich zu wissen.

Blick punkt

Es begann mit Blaulicht und Sirene. Herren liefen ganz unweltmännisch fix zum Eingang, Damen, das gute Goldene lüpfend, taten es ihnen flatternden Nerzes nach. War aber nichts passiert außer umwerfendem amerikanisch-deutschem Gemeinschaftshumor: Arthur Fiedler, der weißhaarige Dirigent des Abends, ist Feuerwehr-Fan. Ehrenmitglied von 110 Feuerwehren (nun auch der Bonner, versteht sich), pflegt er zum Vergnügen der Einwohner mit einem Uralt-Feuerwehrwagen privat durch Boston zu kutschieren, und genoß es sichtlich, nun mit einer modernen „Drehleiter" an der Beethovenhalle vorgefahren zu werden.

Außenminister Walter Scheel mit Frau Mildred ließ vor dem Auftritt der Kennedys, die dann neben ihm saßen, die Blitze der Fotografen seelenruhig über sich ergehen: „Warum muß denn ein Konzert immer nach Schema F ablaufen? So haben wenigstens auch unmusikalische Leute was davon."

Die Sehleute kurvten herum

Die — und vor allem die — hatten „Papa" Lübke kritzelte unentwegt Autogramme, seine Wilhelmine strahlte in ungebrochener Vitalität, die Sehleute kurvten herum, entzückt, wenn sie wieder eine VIP (very important person) erwischen konnten. Deren gab es gut und reichlich.

Es gab natürlich auch Musik. Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, das 1. Klavierkonzert von Tschaikowsky, später noch „Hair" und mehr. Die Künstler wollten vor Beginn jeweils Ruhe im Saal abwarten. Schleuderten Augenblitze nach den trappelnden Kellnern, die (offenbar musikalisch geschult) schon bei der Coda der Beethoven-Ouvertüre ihren Weinflaschen-Einzug wie auf einer Startpiste vorbereitet hatten. Doch der geübte abwesende Kellner-Blick siegte: Tschaikowsky begann trotz Drink-Service.

Senator Edward Kennedy und Ehefrau Joan standen im Mittelpunkt des Nobel-Spektakels.

Auch Mrs. Kennedy wollte nicht auftreten, solange der Fotografen-Pulk noch zu scheußlichen Klumpen geballt vor dem Podium herumstand. Doch was blieb ihr übrig? Sie las dann die Story ab; ein beträchtlich hübsches, ambitioniertes Schulmädchen, höhere Tochter par excellence. Später umstanden sie Leibwächter, Bullen in todschicken Spitzenkragen. Daß das Orchester sehr gut war — wer hat's begriffen?

Veranstalter ist zufrieden

Die Karten kosteten 25 und 50 Mark auf der Galerie. Deren Inhaber konnten sich in den Pausen mit Würstchen und Bier zu gehobenen Preisen an einem Büfett stärken. Wer unten saß, kam für 120 und 150 Mark „gratis" in den Genuß von Wein, Champagner etc.

Veranstalter Johannes Wasmuth (Galerie „pro", Bahnhof Rolandseck) zeigte sich vor dem Konzert unruhig, nach dem Konzert beglückt schwitzend zufrieden: Scherzworte mit Scheel tauschend, meinte er, er sei auf seine Kosten gekommen.

Eine Bonner Dame in Gold und Nerz sagte entzückt: „Endlich das Ereignis hier! Sonst ist Bonn doch so schrecklich provinziell!" Die Dame irrte. Das „Galakonzert" war ein perfekt provinzielles Ereignis. Nur daß Provinz (Boston) zu Provinz (Bonn) fand. Und der Smoking, der zum anderen Smoking meinte: „Sagensemal, wie finden Sie denn das Platzkonzert?" — der dürfte doch wohl die Ausnahme gewesen sein.

Autogrammjäger und Wächter umlagerten Joan Kennedy

NRZ-Fotos: Hennes Multhaup

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 171,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Kölnische Rundschau, Köln
vom 18. April 1971

Joan Kennedy, blonde Gattin des US-Senators und zur Zeit Star des Boston-Pops-Galakonzertes, gestand, als sie in Bonn auf der Rathaustreppe im Kreuzfeuer von Hunderten von Fotografen stand: „Am liebsten wäre ich mit meiner schwarzen Perücke und meinen schwarzen Hot pants nach Bonn gekommen. Dann wäre ich völlig anonym geblieben, und keiner hätte mich erkannt." Die schöne Joan kam zwar in Hosen, aber die waren keineswegs „hot", sondern gingen bis zu den Schuhen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 12,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Dill-Zeitung, Dillenburg
vom 19. April 197

Sekt und Sinfonisches – Mettwurst und Maestoso

Für 150 Mark durfte man in Bonn zum Abendessen das Boston Symphony Orchestra genießen

Von Holger Quiring

Bonn. Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Bonner Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra und seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte.

Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt am grün-goldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock . . ." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowski-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar.

Joan Kennedy und der Dirigent des Bostoner Orchesters, Arthur Fiedler.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 74,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Der Abend, Berlin
vom 17. April 1971

Die Kennedys ließen warten

Kunst und Politik beim Bonner Besuch

Von unserem Bonner Büro
MI. BONN, 17. April

„Sie kommt, sie kommt", riefen ein paar dienstbare Geister durch den Kanzlerbungalow. Joan Kennedy, Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy, kam aber wiederum zu spät. Diesmal zum Empfang von Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred. Schon am Vortage hatte sie den Bonner Oberbürgermeister Krämer leicht vergrätzt, als sie das Begrüßungskomitee der Stadt eine Viertelstunde über die Zeit hatte harren lassen.

Edward und Joan Kennedy waren die prominentesten Gäste beim Galakonzert, das das Bostoner „Symphony Orchestra" gestern abend in Bonn gab. Joan Kennedy hatte in dem Galakonzert die Sprechrolle in Prokofieffs Märchenoper „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen.

Senator Kennedy wurde von der Bonner Politik mit Beschlag belegt. Er konferierte mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und Außenminister Scheel. Ehmke sagte nach der Unterredung mit Kennedy, es sei bekannt, daß es nach Meinung des Senators auf lange Sicht eine gewisse Reduzierung der US-Truppen in Europa geben werde. Schwerpunkt der Diskussion sei die Frage, wenn überhaupt Reduzierung, dann wieviel. Scheel sprach mit Kennedy über die Berlin-Frage und die Ost-Politik.

Für das Galakonzert in der Bonner Beethovenhalle hatte die Prominenz Karten zwischen 25 und 150 Mark gekauft. Verstimmt über die hohen Eintrittspreise war der Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, David Rockefeller jun. In Bonn sei man so versnobt, daß man zu jedem Preis bereit sei.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 255,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälische Rundschau, Dortmund
vom 19. April 1971

Gastspiel der Bostoner Sinfoniker war gesellschaftliches Ereignis

Bonn. (Eig. B.) Mehr gesellschaftliches Ereignis als Konzert war das Gastspiel der Bostoner Sinfoniker in der Beethoven-Halle. Wer nicht zur Prominenz gehörte, mußte bis zu 150 DM Eintritt bezahlen, um die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan Kennedy (rechts), den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" rezitieren zu hören. Arthur Fiedler (links) dirigierte das Orchester, das für die Egmont-Ouvertüre, einen „Hair"-Querschnitt und das Klavierkonzert Nr. 1 von Tschaikowski vom Publikum gefeiert wurde. Starken Beifall erhielt auch der Solist am Flügel, Malcolm Traqer, für seine Tschaikowski-Interpretation.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 48,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Wetzlarer Neue Zeitung, Wetzlar
vom 17. April 1971

3

Joan Kennedy war der Star

Bonner Empfang für Politiker und Geldadel aus den USA

Edward Kennedy (links) und seine Frau Joan (zweite von rechts) im Gespräch mit Bundesaußenminister Scheel und dessen Frau Mildred.
(dpa/upi-Funkbild)

Bonn (ap). Geld, Kunst und Politik gaben sich am Freitagmittag im Bonner Bundeskanzleramt ein Stelldichein: Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy, seine hübsche Frau Joan, die Bostoner Symphoniker und eine Reihe dollarschwerer Mitglieder der Bostoner High-Society waren zu einem Empfang geladen. Offizieller Anlaß war ein für den Abend angesetztes Gala-Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Bonner Beethovenhalle mit Werken von Beethoven, Tschaikowsky, Auszügen aus dem Musical „Hair" und dem „St. Louis Blues March". Joan Kennedy, die bei ähnlichen Gelegenheiten auch schon als Pianistin geglänzt hatte, stahl im Bundeskanzleramt natürlich sowohl den Musikern und den die Tournee finanzierenden Landsleuten als auch ihrem Mann die Schau. Und so blieb fast unbeachtet, daß Ted Kennedy mit dem Minister im Kanzleramt, Horst Ehmke, ein längeres Gespräch geführt hatte, von dem beide nachher meinten, es sei „nützlich" gewesen, und daß er anschließend mit Außenminister Walter Scheel zusammentraf.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): o. A.
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Bergische Landeszeitung, Bergisch Gladbach
vom 19. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 4,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Der Artist, Düsseldorf
vom 18. Mai 1971

15

Kritik übte der Manager des Boston Symphony Orchestra, das jüngst in der Bonner Beethovenhalle ein Konzert gab, an den Eintrittspreisen. Während in Boston der höchste Eintritt sechs Dollar (22 DM) kostet, verlangte man in Bonn 25 bis 150 DM. — Snob-Society!

PC 7

Zum „Egmont" Mett und Sekt

Joan und Ted Kennedy mit Bostons Symphonikern in Beethovenhalle

VON EVI KEIL

Bonn. Als dem amerikanischen Botschafter Kenneth Rush während des Konzerts der Bostoner Symphoniker mehrfach eine Kamera auf den Kopf geschlagen war, da sah sich US-Attaché Hans Holzapfel seinem „Chef" gegenüber doch zu einer Erklärung verpflichtet: Der Name der Kennedys besitze eben in Deutschland immer noch eine fast mythische Bedeutung. Joan und Ted Kennedy, dem Botschafter gegenüber placiert, waren die tausendfach fotografierten Stars, als das Bostoner Symphony Orchestra, die „Boston Pops", dirigiert von Feuerwehr-Enthusiast Arthur Fiedler, gemanagt von dem Rolandsecker Bahnhofshausherrn Johannes Wasmuth, in Bonn ein Konzert bestritt, das von Beethoven bis zu den Stars and Stripes reichte.

Joan Kennedy übernahm den erzählenden Part in Prokofieffs Märchen „Peter und der Wolf". Lobte der Senator nach dem Auftritt seiner in Weiß gekleideten blondlockigen Frau: „Ein schönes Peterchen-Märchen." Außenminister Walter Scheel und Gattin Mildred waren der gleichen Meinung.

Dirigent Arthur Fiedler, der mit einer Feuerwehrdrehleiter, mit Blaulicht und ohrendurchdringendem Tütata in rasender Fahrt vom Bonner Königshof zur Beethovenhalle chauffiert wurde, hatte allerdings zuvor im Kanzlerbungalow über die künstlerischen Talente von Joan Kennedy verraten: „Sie ist ein Amateur. Aber eine schöne Frau."

Das Galakonzert in der Beethovenhalle war Abschluß und Höhepunkt eines zweitägigen Aufenthaltes des Bostoner Jet-Set in Bonn. Wer 150 DM pro Karte auf den Tisch legte, der konnte das aufwendige Spektakel von Boston Pops aus nächster Nähe miterleben. Zu Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, dem Klavierkonzert Nummer 1 in b-Moll von Peter Tschaikowsky, Prokofieff und dem St.-Louis-Blues, dem berühmtesten Jazzstück der Welt, gab es Käsebrötchen und westfälisches Mett, Niersteiner Fritzenhölle Jahrgang 1966 und Champagner Perigord Imperial Brut. Auf den billigen Plätzen auf der Galerie, Preis bis 50 DM, wurde nicht gegessen und getrunken.

Kapitalisten und Kommunisten gaben sich ein Stelldichein. Von David Rockefeller junior bis zu den Cabots, die angeblich nur noch mit den Lodges sprechen, und die nur noch mit dem lieben Gott, reichte die Passagierliste der Prominenz aus dem „Athen" der USA, der Millionenstadt Boston. Die meisten Brillanten trug die Organisatorin der Reise, Mrs. Fahnestock. Joan Kennedy hatte mehrere Karat an ihrer Linken, die sie unablässig drehte. Da verblaßte fast der neue Schmuck von Außenministergattin Mildred Scheel, die von ihrer Südamerikareise, auf der sie ihren Mann begleitet hatte, eine goldene Inka-Figur zum Anstecken mitgebracht hatte, deren männliche Attribute auf dem Busen der Außenministergattin nicht zu übersehen waren.

Ovationen und Rosen nach dem Auftritt von Joan Kennedy. In dem allgemeinen Enthusiasmus für den Jet-Set war es nur Sowjetbotschaftsrat Alexander Bogomolow, der bemerkt hatte, daß sich der Pianosolist mindestens dreimal auf dem Klavier vergriffen hatte (was auch stimmte). Der musikalische Sprung von Beethoven bis zum Musical „Hair" war für den Stardirigenten Arthur Fiedler übrigens keine philosophische Frage. Er hat bereits zwölf Beatles-Melodien auf Platte aufgenommen, als erste „I want to hold your hand". Und sein Kommentar zu den Beatles und zu dem verhitteten „Song of Joy", frei nach Beethoven, den er ebenfalls zu spielen pflegt: „Das popularisiert die Klassiker."

Am Donnerstagmittag war der Bostoner Jet-Set in Wahn gelandet. Mit ihm nach Bonn kamen 120 Musiker. 40 Freunde des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters begleiteten sie. Und nicht nur das. Von ihren Spenden zwischen 50 und 500 000 Dollar hängt das Wohl und Wehe der Symphonie ab. Joan Kennedy trug, als sie landete und später am Nachmittag bei Bonns OB Peter Kraemer, Pants. Doch „hot" waren sie nicht. Sie reichten, im Westernlook geschneidert, bis zu ihren Schuhen.

Beim ersten Bonner Rathausempfang bereits offenbarte Joan, daß Pünktlichkeit zwar die Höflichkeit der Könige, doch nicht der Kennedys ist. Mehr als eine Stunde ließ sie die neugierigen Bonner und den OB warten. Eine Stunde wartete abends auch US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush, der einen Empfang gab. Und gar zwei Stunden mußte auf die Schönste des Clans am nächsten Morgen Außenminister Scheel harren, der im Kanzlerbungalow für die Bostoner einen Empfang gab. Sie sei unter der Dusche, müde oder bei der Probe, entschuldigten die Manager jeweils ihr Fehlen. Und nur einem dringlichen Anruf von Ted war es zu verdanken, daß Joan doch noch bei den Scheels aufkreuzte, die ihrem blonden Gast bayerische Weißwürste und Bier anboten, aber keine rechte Gegenliebe für die Bayernkost fanden.

Stardirigent Arthur Fiedler, der, wie die meisten Bostoner, vor allem dem bei Scheel aufgebauten Rohkostbüfett zugesprochen hatte, zog indessen in Bonn, wo er ging und stand, stets die große Show ab. Der 76jährige, der zum 75. Geburtstag von seiner Frau ein echtes Feuerwehrauto bekam, fügte hier am Rhein seinen 80 Feuerwehrhelmen zwei weitere hinzu. Ein Helm kam als Geschenk von Bonns Feuerwehr. Den zweiten hatte Bonns Protokollchef, Botschafter Hans Schwarzmann, organisiert. Die Pickelhaube stammte aus Würzburg und war nachweislich im Jahre 1906 zum letzten Mal getragen worden. Denn Schwarzmann zog aus dem Helminneren eine Zeitung des Jahrhundertbeginns, die der einstige Träger hineinpraktiziert hatte, weil man schon unter alten Polizeihelmen jämmerlich schwitzen mußte.

Dafür dirigierte der Feuerwehrliebhaber Fiedler im Bonner Rathaus die Godesberger Feuerwehrkapelle, die ihm und den Kennedys zu Ehren „When the saints go marching in" spielte.

Beifall für Joan Kennedy (v. l.): Außenminister Walter Scheel, Mildred Scheel, Edward („Ted") Kennedy und Frau Liesenfeld. Foto: Munker

Blumen für Joan Kennedy und Arthur Fiedler. Foto: Munker

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 255,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälische Rundschau, Dortmund
vom 19. April 1971

Gastspiel der Bostoner Sinfoniker war gesellschaftliches Ereignis

Bonn. (Eig. B.) Mehr gesellschaftliches Ereignis als Konzert war das Gastspiel der Bostoner Sinfoniker in der Beethoven-Halle. Wer nicht zur Prominenz gehörte, mußte bis zu 150 DM Eintritt bezahlen, um die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan Kennedy (rechts), den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" rezitieren zu hören. Arthur Fiedler (links) dirigierte das Orchester, das für die Egmont-Ouvertüre, einen „Hair"-Querschnitt und das Klavierkonzert Nr. 1 von Tschaikowski vom Publikum gefeiert wurde. Starken Beifall erhielt auch der Solist am Flügel, Malcolm Traqer, für seine Tschaikowski-Interpretation.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 48,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Wetzlarer Neue Zeitung, Wetzlar
vom 17. April 1971

Joan Kennedy war der Star

Bonner Empfang für Politiker und Geldadel aus den USA

Edward Kennedy (links) und seine Frau Joan (zweite von rechts) im Gespräch mit Bundesaußenminister Scheel und dessen Frau Mildred.
(dpa/upi-Funkbild)

Bonn (ap). Geld, Kunst und Politik gaben sich am Freitagmittag im Bonner Bundeskanzleramt ein Stelldichein: Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy, seine hübsche Frau Joan, die Bostoner Symphoniker und eine Reihe dollarschwerer Mitglieder der Bostoner High-Society waren zu einem Empfang geladen. Offizieller Anlaß war ein für den Abend angesetztes Gala-Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Bonner Beethovenhalle mit Werken von Beethoven, Tschaikowsky, Auszügen aus dem Musical „Hair" und dem „St. Louis Blues March". Joan Kennedy, die bei ähnlichen Gelegenheiten auch schon als Pianistin geglänzt hatte, stahl im Bundeskanzleramt natürlich sowohl den Musikern und den die Tournee finanzierenden Landsleuten als auch ihrem Mann die Schau. Und so blieb fast unbeachtet, daß Ted Kennedy mit dem Minister im Kanzleramt, Horst Ehmke, ein längeres Gespräch geführt hatte, von dem beide nachher meinten, es sei „nützlich" gewesen, und daß er anschließend mit Außenminister Walter Scheel zusammentraf.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): o. A.
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Bergische Landeszeitung, Bergisch Gladbach
vom 19. April 1971

Zum „Egmont" Mett und Sekt

Joan und Ted Kennedy mit Bostons Symphonikern in Beethovenhalle

VON EVI KEIL

Bonn. Als dem amerikanischen Botschafter Kenneth Rush während des Konzerts der Bostoner Symphoniker mehrfach eine Kamera auf den Kopf geschlagen war, da sah sich US-Attaché Hans Holzapfel seinem „Chef" gegenüber doch zu einer Erklärung verpflichtet: Der Name der Kennedys besitze eben in Deutschland immer noch eine fast mythische Bedeutung. Joan und Ted Kennedy, dem Botschafter gegenüber placiert, waren die tausendfach fotografierten Stars, als das Bostoner Symphony Orchestra, die „Boston Pops", dirigiert von Feuerwehr-Enthusiast Arthur Fiedler, gemanagt von dem Rolandsecker Bahnhofshausherrn Johannes Wasmuth, in Bonn ein Konzert bestritt, das von Beethoven bis zu den Stars and Stripes reichte.

Joan Kennedy übernahm den erzählenden Part in Prokofieffs Märchen „Peter und der Wolf". Lobte der Senator nach dem Auftritt seiner in Weiß gekleideten blondlockigen Frau: „Ein schönes Peterchen-Märchen." Außenminister Walter Scheel und Gattin Mildred waren der gleichen Meinung.

Dirigent Arthur Fiedler, der mit einer Feuerwehrdrehleiter, mit Blaulicht und ohrendurchdringendem Tütata in rasender Fahrt vom Bonner Königshof zur Beethovenhalle chauffiert wurde, hatte allerdings zuvor im Kanzlerbungalow über die künstlerischen Talente von Joan Kennedy verraten: „Sie ist ein Amateur. Aber eine schöne Frau."

Das Galakonzert in der Beethovenhalle war Abschluß und Höhepunkt eines zweitägigen Aufenthaltes des Bostoner Jet-Set in Bonn. Wer 150 DM pro Karte auf den Tisch legte, der konnte das aufwendige Spektakel von Boston Pops aus nächster Nähe miterleben. Zu Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, dem Klavierkonzert Nummer 1 in b-Moll von Peter Tschaikowsky, Prokofieff und dem St.-Louis-Blues, dem berühmtesten Jazzstück der Welt, gab es Käsebrötchen und westfälisches Mett, Niersteiner Fritzenhölle Jahrgang 1966 und Champagner Perigord Imperial Brut. Auf den billigen Plätzen auf der Galerie, Preis bis 50 DM, wurde nicht gegessen und getrunken.

Kapitalisten und Kommunisten gaben sich ein Stelldichein. Von David Rockefeller junior bis zu den Cabots, die angeblich nur noch mit den Lodges sprechen, und die nur noch mit dem lieben Gott, reichte die Passagierliste der Prominenz aus dem „Athen" der USA, der Millionenstadt Boston. Die meisten Brillanten trug die Organisatorin der Reise, Mrs. Fahnestock. Joan Kennedy hatte mehrere Karat an ihrer Linken, die sie unablässig drehte. Da verblaßte fast der neue Schmuck von Außenministergattin Mildred Scheel, die von ihrer Südamerikareise, auf der sie ihren Mann begleitet hatte, eine goldene Inka-Figur zum Anstecken mitgebracht hatte, deren männliche Attribute auf dem Busen der Außenministergattin nicht zu übersehen waren.

Beifall für Joan Kennedy (v. l.): Außenminister Walter Scheel, Mildred Scheel, Edward („Ted") Kennedy und Frau Liesenfeld. Foto: Munker

Blumen für Joan Kennedy und Arthur Fiedler. Foto: Munker

Ovationen und Rosen nach dem Auftritt von Joan Kennedy. In dem allgemeinen Enthusiasmus für den Jet-Set war es nur Sowjetbotschaftsrat Alexander Bogomolow, der bemerkt hatte, daß sich der Pianosolist mindestens dreimal auf dem Klavier vergriffen hatte (was auch stimmte). Der musikalische Sprung von Beethoven bis zum Musical „Hair" war für den Stardirigenten Arthur Fiedler übrigens keine philosophische Frage. Er hat bereits zwölf Beatles-Melodien auf Platte aufgenommen, als erste „I want to hold your hand". Und sein Kommentar zu den Beatles und zu dem verhitteten „Song of Joy", frei nach Beethoven, den er ebenfalls zu spielen pflegt: „Das popularisiert die Klassiker."

Am Donnerstagmittag war der Bostoner Jet-Set in Wahn gelandet. Mit ihm nach Bonn kamen 120 Musiker. 40 Freunde des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters begleiteten sie. Und nicht nur das. Von ihren Spenden zwischen 50 und 500 000 Dollar hängt das Wohl und Wehe der Symphonie ab. Joan Kennedy trug, als sie landete und später am Nachmittag bei Bonns OB Peter Kraemer, Pants. Doch „hot" waren sie nicht. Sie reichten, im Westernlook geschneidert, bis zu ihren Schuhen.

Beim ersten Bonner Rathausempfang bereits offenbarte Joan, daß Pünktlichkeit zwar die Höflichkeit der Könige, doch nicht der Kennedys ist. Mehr als eine Stunde ließ sie die neugierigen Bonner und den OB warten. Eine Stunde wartete abends auch US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush, der einen Empfang gab. Und gar zwei Stunden mußte auf die Schönste des Clans am nächsten Morgen Außenminister Scheel harren, der im Kanzlerbungalow für die Bostoner einen Empfang gab. Sie sei unter der Dusche, müde oder bei der Probe, entschuldigten die Manager jeweils ihr Fehlen. Und nur einem dringlichen Anruf von Ted war es zu verdanken, daß Joan doch noch bei den Scheels aufkreuzte, die ihrem blonden Gast bayerische Weißwürste und Bier anboten, aber keine rechte Gegenliebe für die Bayernkost fanden.

Stardirigent Arthur Fiedler, der, wie die meisten Bostoner, vor allem dem bei Scheel aufgebauten Rohkostbüfett zugesprochen hatte, zog indessen in Bonn, wo er ging und stand, stets die große Show ab. Der 76jährige, der zum 75. Geburtstag von seiner Frau ein echtes Feuerwehrauto bekam, fügte hier am Rhein seinen 80 Feuerwehrhelmen zwei weitere hinzu. Ein Helm kam als Geschenk von Bonns Feuerwehr. Den zweiten hatte Bonns Protokollchef, Botschafter Hans Schwarzmann, organisiert. Die Pickelhaube stammte aus Würzburg und war nachweislich im Jahre 1906 zum letzten Mal getragen worden. Denn Schwarzmann zog aus dem Helminneren eine Zeitung des Jahrhundertbeginns, die der einstige Träger hineinpraktiziert hatte, weil man schon unter alten Polizeihelmen jämmerlich schwitzen mußte.

Dafür dirigierte der Feuerwehrliebhaber Fiedler im Bonner Rathaus die Godesberger Feuerwehrkapelle, die ihm und den Kennedys zu Ehren „When the saints go marching in" spielte.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 4,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Der Artist, Düsseldorf
vom 18. Mai 1971

Kritik übte der Manager des Boston Symphony Orchestra, das jüngst in der Bonner Beethovenhalle ein Konzert gab, an den Eintrittspreisen. Während in Boston der höchste Eintritt sechs Dollar (22 DM) kostet, verlangte man in Bonn 25 bis 150 DM. — Snob-Society!

150

argus Seit 1887
Ausschnitt aus:
Odenwälder Heimatzeitung, Erbach
vom 21. April 1971

JOAN KENNEDY, die Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy, war der unbestrittene Star des Konzertes des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am Freitag in der Bonner Beethovenhalle. Sie hatte den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Das Orchester mußte mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahlreichen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin im fließenden weißen Maxi „geschossen" hatten. Das Gala-Konzert bot ein populäres Programm. Die Gäste saßen an Tischen und konnten sich während der Darbietungen mit Sandwiches, Sekt und Flaschenwein stärken. Foto: AP

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 22,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Heidelberger Tagblatt, Heidelberg
19. April 1971
vom

Im Gefolge des Boston Symphony Orchestra

Die Kennedys und Rockefellers im Hauptstädtchen

Bahnhof Rolandseck bewährte sich als Wartesaal / Image-Polierer hatten Hochkonjunktur

Von Wolfgang von Gropper

Bonn/Rolandseck. Am Freitagfrüh 7 Uhr landete der Senator Edward Kennedy in Köln-Wahn. Seine Frau Joan war schon drei Tage vorher gekommen. David Rockefeller jr. mit Gattin tummelten sich ebenfalls am Rhein. Nach Zusammenkünften „Ted" Kennedys mit Außenminister Scheel, Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und dem rheinland-pfälzischen Ministerpräsidenten Helmut Kohl versammelten sich Amerikas Jet set-Mitglieder am Freitagabend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle zu einem Konzert des „Boston Pops"-Orchesters. Als ob sie das nicht zu Hause hören könnten. Wie kam es zu diesem Auflauf in unserem Bundeshauptstädtchen?

Am Anfang stand – wieder einmal – Johannes Wasmuth. Wer das ist? Oh, Kenner kennen ihn. Seit langem. Versuch einer Darstellung für Nichtkenner: Zwei-Zentner-Mann, um die Vierzig, marzipangesichtig, wasserblauäugig. Löwenmähne vom Kopf bis zum Nacken. Beruf? – Ja, da wird's schwierig. Nach allem, was man hört, würde ich sagen: international geläufiger Bildersammler, Organisator und Arrangeur. Die Angaben über Herkunft schwanken zwischen ehemaligem Buchbinder-, Schreiner- und Tüncherlehrling. Es gibt Leute, die Wasmuth ernsthaft für ein Genie halten. Andere rühmen ihm wenigstens einen genialischen Sinn für Qualität schlechthin nach. Die Gemälde, die er im stillgelegten Bahnhof Rolandseck im nördlichsten Zipfel von Rheinland-Pfalz in seiner Galerie „PRO" zusammengetragen hat, sprechen tatsächlich für einen ungewöhnlichen „Riecher". Er wohnt auch in diesem Bahnhof. Zusammen mit dem Pianisten Stefan Askenase. Zu seinen Freunden und regelmäßigen Gästen gehören Künstler vom Kaliber Marcel Marceau. Und die große Gesellschaft gibt sich im Bahnhof dann und wann ein Stelldichein. Zu Silvester oder so. Jedenfalls dann, wenn Johannes Wasmuth, dessen Fäden nach Westen in San Francisco und nach Osten in Tokio erst zu enden scheinen, es will.

Für letzten Freitag hatte er das Boston Symphony Orchestra zu einem „Pops Concert" in die Bonner Beethovenhalle dirigiert. Doch im Wesen des Genies liegt es, immer gleich mehrere Fliegen mit einer Klappe zu schlagen. Wasmuth schlug. Nur die Fliegen gebärdeten sich – frecherweise – ein wenig eigenwillig. Joan Kennedy wäre offenbar überhaupt nicht zu einem Empfang, den Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred am Freitagmittag ihr und ihrem Mann zu Ehren im Kanzler-Bungalow gaben, erschienen, wenn Gatte Ted sie nicht nach zwei Stunden herbeitelefoniert hätte.

Am Nachmittag, 16.30 Uhr, freuten sich (laut Einladung) der Ministerpräsident des Landes Rheinland-Pfalz und Frau Kohl zu Ehren der Solisten und Freunde des Boston Symphony Orchestra den und jenen zu einem Empfang im Bahnhof Rolandseck begrüßen zu können. Der Bahnhof wurde zum Wartesaal. Etwa sechszig bis achtzig Gäste und ebensoviele Kameramänner und Journalisten harrten und harrten. Hier Helmut Kohl, dort Bernhard Timm, der BASF-General. Dort die Frau des Bonner Protokollchefs Schwarzmann, hier der stellvertretende US-Botschafter Fessenden. Das Kalte Büffet stellte bereits die Ohren. David Rockefeller jr., Neffe des New Yorker Gouverneurs und Sohn des Chefs der Chase Manhattan Bank, war mit Gattin da. Aber wer kennt die schon in Rolandseck?

Von den gebetenen Solisten des Orchesters kam niemand. Nur ein paar Förderer aus Boston und Umgebung waren erschienen. Und endlich – fünfviertel Stunden zu spät – Ted Kennedy (ohne Frau). Er war dann da und doch stets „abwesend". Er redete, nach Kohl, einige belanglose Sätze ins Mikrofon. Ohne Lautsprecher mit Professor Timm, um schließlich noch mit seinem Gastgeber, dem CDU-Rekken aus Mainz, einige Worte über die Schwierigkeit, jung gewählt zu werden, zu wechseln. Und schon war er wieder weg. Ein Ministerialbeamter erzählte mir, sein Sohn habe kritisch bemerkt, er mißbillige, daß sein Vater da hingehe. Der Kennedy wolle doch nur sein angeschlagenes Image aufpolieren. – Ein kluges Kind, der Bub. Frau Kohl hatte wohl Ahnungen. Sie war erst gar nicht präsent. Dafür aber die Hellseherin Buchela und eine, wie es hieß, echte Zigeunerprinzessin. Als eigentliche Attraktion in Rolandseck erwies sich das Zigeuner-Quintett Schnuckenack-Reinhardt aus Haßloch. Da es auf dem Balkon plaziert war, hatten wenigstens die vielen Polizisten in der Umgebung des Bahnhofs etwas von seiner Musik.

Endlich am Abend war Joan Kennedy zu sehen. Am Prominententisch in der Beethovenhalle und auf der Bühne. Sie fungierte als Sprecherin zu „Peter und der Wolf" von Prokofieff. Dazu hatte sie viel Ruhe zuvor nötig. Versteht sich: Künstlerin, Auftrittsfieber. Doch sie spricht, wie sie eben spricht. Studiert hat sie Musik. Sie war jedenfalls die Giraffe des Abends. Nichtsdestoweniger verstanden sich die Pops-Musiker durchzusetzen. Es sind die gleichen wie die, die als Symphony Orchestra auftreten. Nur der Dirigent, Arthur Fiedler, ist ausschließlich für leichtere „pop"-uläre Unterhaltungsmusik zuständig. Dazu zählen die Amerikaner neben Melodien aus „Hair" und „St. Louis Blues"-Märschen auch Tschaikowskys b-moll-Klavierkonzert. Ja, wenn man es so, wie dort gespielt, auffaßt! Dazu saß das illustre Publikum, besmokingt, an Tischen mit Kerzen, aß, trank und rauchte. Shocking!? Anfangs ja, später nein. Spätestens nach der „Hair"-Musik wurden aus den feinen Leuten Menschen. Es zog Stimmung in die Halle ein. Man war froh und heiter, vom Gemeinschaftserlebnis getragen und inspiriert. „Das kann die beste Fernsehsendung zu Hause nicht ersetzen", sagte einer im Rausgehen. Den Eintrittspreis von 150 Mark hatte er – in ehrlicher Begeisterung allerdings – schon vergessen.

Joan Kennedy und A. Fiedler beim „Pops Concert" in Bonns Beethovenhalle
dpa/UPI-Bild

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 205,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Berliner Morgenpost, Berlin
18. April 1971
vom

3

Schöne Sprecherin Joan Kennedy

Sinn für Märchen: Joan Kennedy (links), die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, war die Solistin des Konzertes, das die Bostoner Symphoniker am Freitag in Bonn gaben. Sie sprach den Text bei der Aufführung des musikalischen Märchens „Peter und der Wolf" von Sergej Prokofieff. Der Dirigent war Arthur Fiedler. Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 36,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Gießener Anzeiger, Gießen
19. April 1971
vom

Sekt und Sinfonisches – Mettwurst und Maestoso

3

Für 150 Mark durfte man in Bonn zum Abendessen das Boston Symphony Orchestra genießen

Von Holger Quiring

Bonn. Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Stch-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Bonner Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra und seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte.

Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt am grün-goldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock ..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowski-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar.

Joan Kennedy und der Dirigent des Bostoner Orchesters, Arthur Fiedler

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 273,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Ruhrzeitung, Essen
vom 19. April 1971

„Galakonzert" mit Joan Kennedy in Bonn war ein perfekt provinzielles Ereignis

Große Welt aß zur Musik

Von NRZ-Redakteurin SUSANNE MATERLEITNER

Bonn. Die Bonner Beethovenhalle war Schauplatz eines Ereignisses, das größeren Mengen von High-Snobiety und deren Trabanten aus Groß-Amerika und Klein-Deutschland vielfältige Genüsse bot. Höhepunkt des Nobel-Spektakels: Mrs. Joan Kennedy las, begleitet von der volkstümlichen Sektion des legendären Boston Symphony Orchestra, den Text von Serge Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf", indes das Publikum an festlich gedeckten Zehnertischen sich an Niersteiner Fritzenhölle Spätlese, Périgord Imperial Brüt und Edel-„Schnittchen" ebenso labte wie an der angenehmen Empfindung, Senator Edward Kennedy nebst etlichen Dollarmillionären sozusagen auf Tuchfühlung bei sich zu wissen.

Blick punkt

Es begann mit Blaulicht und Sirene. Herren liefen ganz unweltmännisch fix zum Eingang, Damen, das gute Goldene lüpfend, taten es ihnen flatterniden Nerzes nach. War aber nichts passiert außer umwerfendem amerikanisch-deutschem Gemeinschaftshumor: Arthur Fiedler, der weißhaarige Dirigent des Abends, ist Feuerwehr-Fan. Ehrenmitglied von 110 Feuerwehren (nun auch der Bonner, versteht sich), pflegt er zum Vergnügen der Einwohner mit einem Uralt-Feuerwehrwagen privat durch Boston zu kutschieren, und genoß es sichtlich, nun mit einer modernen „Drehleiter" an der Beethovenhalle vorgefahren zu werden.

Außenminister Walter Scheel mit Frau Mildred ließ vor dem Auftritt der Kennedys, die dann neben ihm saßen, die Blitze der Fotografen seelenruhig über sich ergehen: „Warum muß denn ein Konzert immer nach Schema F ablaufen? So haben wenigstens auch unmusikalische Leute was davon."

Die Sehleute kurvten herum

Die — und vor allem die — hatten. „Papa" Lübke kritzelte unentwegt Autogramme, seine Wilhelmine strahlte in ungebrochener Vitalität, die Sehleute kurvten herum, entzückt, wenn sie wieder eine VIP (very important person) erwischen konnten. Deren gab es gut und reichlich.

Es gab natürlich auch Musik. Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, das 1. Klavierkonzert von Tschaikowsky, später noch „Hair" und mehr. Die Künstler wollten vor Beginn jeweils Ruhe im Saal abwarten. Schleuderten Augenblitze nach den trappelnden Kellnern, die (offenbar musikalisch geschult) schon bei der Coda der Beethoven-Ouvertüre ihren Weinflaschen-Einzug wie auf einer Startpiste vorbereitet hatten. Doch der geübte abwesende Kellner-Blick siegte: Tschaikowsky begann trotz Drink-Service.

Senator Edward Kennedy und Ehefrau Joan standen im Mittelpunkt des Nobel-Spektakels.

Auch Mrs. Kennedy wollte nicht auftreten, solange der Fotografen-Pulk noch zu scheußlichen Klumpen geballt vor dem Podium herumstand. Doch was blieb ihr übrig? Sie las dann die Story ab; ein beträchtlich hübsches, ambitioniertes Schulmädchen, höhere Tochter par excellence. Später umstanden sie Leibwächter, Bullen in todschicken Spitzenkragen. Daß das Orchester sehr gut war — wer hat's begriffen?

Veranstalter ist zufrieden

Die Karten kosteten 25 und 50 Mark auf der Galerie. Deren Inhaber konnten sich in den Pausen mit Würstchen und Bier zu gehobenen Preisen an einem Büfett stärken. Wer unten saß, kam für 120 und 150 Mark „gratis" in den Genuß von Wein, Champagner etc.

Veranstalter Johannes Wasmuth (Galerie „pro", Bahnhof Rolandseck) zeigte sich vor dem Konzert unruhig, nach dem Konzert beglückt schwitzend zufrieden: Scherzworte mit Scheel tauschend, meinte er, er sei auf seine Kosten gekommen.

Eine Bonner Dame in Gold und Nerz sagte entzückt: „Endlich das Ereignis hier! Sonst ist Bonn doch so schrecklich provinziell!" Die Dame irrte. Das „Galakonzert" war ein perfekt provinzielles Ereignis. Nur daß Provinz (Boston) zu Provinz (Bonn) fand. Und der Smoking, der zum anderen Smoking meinte: „Sagensemal, wie finden Sie denn das Platzkonzert?" — der dürfte doch wohl die Ausnahme gewesen sein.

Autogrammjäger und Wächter umlagerten Joan Kennedy

NRZ-Fotos: Hennes Multhaup

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 77,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Telegraf, Berlin
vom 17. April 19

Joan stahl allen die Schau

Bonn (AP)

Geld, Kunst und Politik gaben sich gestern im Bonner Bundeskanzleramt ein Stelldichein: Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy, seine hübsche Frau Joan, die Bostoner Symphoniker und eine Reihe dollarschwerer Mitglieder der Bostoner High-Society waren zu einem Empfang geladen. Offizieller Anlaß war ein für den Abend angesetztes Galakonzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle.

Im Mittelpunkt des Programms: die Senatorenfrau Joan als Rezitatorin in „Peter und der Wolf" von Serge Prokofieff. Joan Kennedy, die auch schon als Pianistin geglänzt hat, stahl natürlich sowohl den Musikern und den die Tournee finanzierenden Landsleuten als auch ihrem Mann die Schau. Und so blieb fast unbeachtet, daß Ted Kennedy mit dem Minister im Kanzleramt, Horst Ehmke, ein längeres Gespräch geführt hatte, von dem beide nachher meinten, es sei „nützlich" gewesen, und anschließend mit Außenminister Walter Scheel zusammentraf.

Die Kennedys werden Bonn heute wieder verlassen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 160,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Neue Presse, Frankfurt/Main
vom 19. April 1971

Egmont mit Sandwiches – und bei den Preisen nicht zimperlich

Von unserem dpa-Korrespondenten Holger Quiring

Bonn, 18. April (dpa)

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Luis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war; weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskis erstem Klavierkonzert und Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Joan Kennedy spricht in Bonn von „Peter und Wolf". dpa-Foto

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malylom Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowski-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letztes inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 23,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Pfälzer Tagblatt, Landau
vom 19. April 1971

Bonn, Mettwurst und Maestoso

NEUES VON DEN FEINEN LEUTEN ZU BONN: ABENDESSEN MIT MUSIK

Bonn. Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbildes auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei...

Joan Kennedy als Sprecherin bei Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf", rechts der Dirigent der Bostoner Philharmoniker, Arthur Fiedler.

152

Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy war der prominenteste Zuhörer seiner Frau: Joan Kennedy hatte am Wochenende in der Bonner Beethovenhalle bei einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker den Sprechpart in Prokofiews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Neben Joan Kennedy der Dirigent des Orchesters A. Fiedler. (dpa)

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 5,8 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 — Ausschnitt aus: Butzbacher Zeitung, Butzbach
vom 19. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 205,4 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 — Ausschnitt aus: Berliner Morgenpost, Berlin
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Herne
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 71,9 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Bochum
17. April 1971

Arthur Fiedler stülpte sich seinen 81. Helm sofort auf

Vor den Symphonikern erst noch die Feuerwehrkapelle dirigiert

Weiß-blauer Wirbel mit Leberkäs und Bier um drei Amerikaner in Bonn

Von WAZ-Chefreporter ERNST NEY

Drei Amerikaner machten Wirbel in Bonn: Die Dame zuerst: blonde, langhaarige Senatorengattin Joan Kennedy. Zweitens: Senator Edward Kennedy, ehrgeiziger Politiker, möglicherweise präsidentschaftsverdächtig, skandalumwitterter Unfallfahrer in jener Affäre, bei der seine Sekretärin nachts in Florida den Tod fand. Schließlich: der 75jährige Dirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, vor vielen Jahren und zwei Weltkriegen Student der Musik in Berlin.

Anlaß des Prominentenbesuches war eines der größten gesellschaftlichen Spektakel im bisherigen Bonner Hauptstadtleben, ein Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker am Freitagabend in der Beethovenhalle. Mit Beethoven fing es an, mit „Hair" hörte es auf. Joan Kennedy sprach die Texte zu „Peter und der Wolf" von Prokofieff. Ein für Deutschland völlig neues Konzertgefühl, denn auf den teuren Plätzen im Parkett wurde gleichzeitig diniert.

Bevor der Große Abend in Szene ging, wurden die immer lächelnden Kennedys und der putzmuntere Mittsiebziger Arthur mit Ehrungen, Einladungen und Empfängen überhäuft. Bonns Oberbürgermeister Krämer eröffnete den Reigen. Sekt und goldenes Buch im Rathaus.

270mal Ehrenmitglied

Krämers Überraschung: Er ließ im Festsaal die Feuerwehrkapelle blasen, denn aus irgendeinem Grunde hat der alte Arthur eine Schwäche für die Feuerwehr. Er ist Ehrenmitglied von rund 270 Feuerwehren in aller Welt und besitzt 80 Feuerwehrhelme, denen in Bonn der 81. hinzugefügt wurde. Er stülpte sich das Geschenk sofort auf das schlohweiße Haar, lieh sich vom Dirigenten dessen Stab und feuerte die Feuerwehr zum Marsch von den „Altem Kameraden" an.

Mister Arthur brachte seinen Helm auch mit, als am Freitagvormittag Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred sich die Ehre gaben, die Kennedys und den Dirigenten im Kanzlerbungalow des Schaumburgparks zu empfangen.

Die Gäste wurden mit einem rustikalen Büfett bewirtet: Leberkäs, Würstchen, Münchner Bier, Laugenbrezel und andere Spezialitäten aus dem weißblauen Teil Süddeutschlands. In Stellvertretung des Bundeskanzlers, der am Gardasee seinen letzten Osterurlaubstag verbrachte, hatte Horst Ehmke mit „Ted" ein politisches Gespräch.

US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush verschob für einige Stunden seinen Abflug nach Berlin, zum 18. Botschaftertreffen, um in seiner Residenz die Landsleute willkommen zu heißen. Joan in einem mädchenhaften schneeweißen Wolle-Mini. Man könnte auch sagen: Wonne-Mini.

Bei den anderen Auftritten bevorzugte sie einen fliederfarbenen Hosenanzug, einen ebensolchen Midimantel lässig um die Schultern gelegt. Ich würde sagen, die Hosen waren zu kostbar, um zu sagen: Joan trug Jeans.

Bankräuber starb in Kölner Haftzelle

KÖLN (dpa)

13 Stunden nach seinem mißglückten Überfall auf eine Bankfiliale in Köln ist ein 47jähriger Familienvater am Freitag gestorben. Bei einer Routinekontrolle der Haftzellen im Kölner Polizeipräsidium fand ein Beamter den Mann nur noch schwach atmend auf seiner Pritsche. Auf dem Weg zum Krankenhaus starb der 47jährige. Nach den Feststellungen der Polizei ist der Mann mit größter Wahrscheinlichkeit eines natürlichen Todes gestorben. Die genaue Todesursache müsse die Obduktion ergeben. Der 47jährige Auftragsschriftsteller aus Düsseldorf hinterläßt fünf Kinder, davon das jüngste im Alter von fünf Jahren. Bei dem Überfall hatte er schon 151 000 DM erbeutet, war jedoch schnell gefaßt worden.

MIT SEINEM NEUEN WEISSEN FEUERWEHRHELM genoß der Dirigent Arthur Fiedler den Empfang im Festsaal des Bonner Rathauses. Zwischen Fiedler und Joan Kennedy: der Bonner Oberbürgermeister Peter Krämer. dpa/upi-Funkbild

Bonn hatte seinen „großen Tag": Die Kennedys beim Sektfrühstück

Bostoner Symphoniker brachten Amerikas High Society mit

Von unserem Bonner Korrespondenten
Claus Dreher

Bonn, 17. April

„Wie heißt der nächste Präsident der USA?" wurde Senator Edward Kennedy despektierlich gefragt. Edward, in einem geknitterten Anzug mit Kerzenwachs auf der Schulter, lächelt kurz, ein wenig verlegen, auf der Terrasse des Kanzler-Bungalows: „Überlegen Sie, wer der nächste Präsident ist", sagt er und sieht zu, wie er die Würstchen los wird, die er auf dem Teller schon gut zehn Minuten vor sich hin trägt.

Und dabei wird er vor allem von den Damen der High Society, die Außenminister Walter Scheel nebst Ehegatten zu diesem sogenannten Sektfrühstück in den Kanzler-Bungalow eingeladen hat, förmlich angehimmelt. „Ach, schauen Sie nur, ganz der Bruder", lispelt eine seidenbestickte und brillantierte Dame so um die Sechzig. Sie schiebt sich näher heran, erhascht ein Lächeln aus den blauen Augen von Ted und ist restlos glücklich.

In der Tat: Noch am Donnerstag, als das Boston-Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des humorvollen Dirigenten Fiedler, der in Berlin studiert hat und 1915 nach Amerika ausgewandert ist, im Bonner Rathaus empfangen wurde, war von Edward Kennedy nicht die Rede; nur davon, daß seine sommersprossige Gattin Joan am Abend darauf in der Beethovenhalle auftreten werde.

Das Büfett gestern im Kanzler-Bungalow war nach dem Motto angelegt: Die Kultur fängt erst dort an, wo Kartoffelsalat warm angemacht wird, also südlich des Mains. Man trank neben dem vornehm-obligaten Whisky vor allem Münchener Bier, aß Leberkäse und Laugenbrezeln, delikate Salate. Man trank und aß zunächst ohne die Kennedys. „Nur" Außenminister Walter Scheel und Frau Mildred widmeten sich den Gästen. Sie in midi-gelb.

Derweilen parlierten Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke und Senator Kennedy im Kanzleramt. „Tour d'Horizont" kommentierte Ehmke hernach den politischen Inhalt des längeren Gesprächs, was soviel sagen will: Ich sage nichts, wir haben über alles und jeden gesprochen. Was er denn davon halte, daß Oppositionschef Barzel beruhigter aus Amerika zurückkehre als er hingefahren sei, wollten wir von Ehmke wissen. Der Kanzleramtsminister murmelte vor sich hin. Man meinte so etwas wie „Hysterie" zu hören und erhielt alsbald die offizielle Beurteilung: „Wenn Herr Barzel zur Beruhigung extra nach Amerika fahren muß, so zeigt das nur, wie steril aufgeregt er ist."

Großer Empfang für die amerikanischen Gäste. Von l. n. r.: Senator Edward Kennedy, Mildred Scheel, Joan Kennedy und Außenminister Walter Scheel.

Bis dahin war die Hobby-Pianistin Joan Kennedy noch nicht im Kanzler-Etablissement eingetroffen. Sie käme gar nicht, sagte Minister Scheel, alldieweil sie unpäßlich sei. Sie käme sehr wohl, sagte Ehemann Edward, und der müßte es ja wohl besser wissen. Und siehe da, sie kam. Im hellblauen Hosenanzug und dunkelblauen Rollkragenpulli und stahl allen die Schau. Sie lächelte über den Bericht einer Hamburger Zeitung, wonach sie in Hot Pants in der Bonner Beethovenhalle die Bostoner Symphoniker begleiten (oder verwirren?) werde. „Meine Frau kann Hot Pants sehr gut tragen", wußte Hausherr Edward.

Prominent waren übrigens nicht nur Fiedlers Musikanten, die Creme de la Creme bildete die Begleitung. Der Künstler-Förderer Wasmuth durfte stolz sein: Die Rockefellers waren da, in Old Germany immer noch der Inbegriff von Wohlstand. Die Cabots kennt man schon weniger. Aber sie waren auch da und tranken Bier. In Amerika sagt man, die milliardenschweren Cabots würden, wenn überhaupt, höchstens mit der Familie Cabot-Lodge reden. Und diese wiederum nur mit dem lieben Gott. Die Cabot-Lodges waren auch da. Sie sprachen mit Ehmke.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 79,3 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Duisburg
17. April 1971
vom

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 133,0 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Westdeutsche Allgemeine, Ausgabe Essen
vom 17. April 1971

153

argus
Seit 1857

Auflage (i. Ts.): 1192,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –

Ausschnitt aus:

Frau im Spiegel, Lübeck

vom 2. Mai 1971

Als Joan Kennedy mit ihrem Mann nach Deutschland kam, um ein Wohltätigkeitskonzert zu geben, begegnete sie der Wahrsagerin von Bonn. Die Buchela prophezeite ihr eine große Zukunft

Beim nächstenmal als Frau des Präsidenten

Von den Bonnern umjubelt: Joan Kennedy und ihr Mann Edward. Im knöchellangen Silberkleid erschien Joan als strahlende Schönheit.

Bei einem Empfang im Bonner Kanzlerbungalow sagte die Buchela, bekannt als „Wahrsagerin von Bonn", Ted Kennedy voraus, daß er eines Tages doch noch Präsident der USA würde.

In kleiner Runde bei lebhaftem Gespräch vereint sah man in Bonn Senator

continued on next page

153

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 1192,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –

Ausschnitt aus:
Frau im Spiegel, Lübeck

vom 2. Mai 1971

Als Joan Kennedy mit ihrem Mann nach Deutschland kam, um ein Wohltätigkeitskonzert zu geben, begegnete sie der Wahrsagerin von Bonn. Die Buchela prophezeite ihr eine große Zukunft

Beim nächstenmal als Frau des Präsidenten

Von den Bonnern umjubelt: Joan Kennedy und ihr Mann Edward. Im knöchellangen Silberkleid erschien Joan als strahlende Schönheit.

Bei einem Empfang im Bonner Kanzlerbungalow sagte die Buchela, bekannt als „Wahrsagerin von Bonn", Ted Kennedy voraus, daß er eines Tages doch noch Präsident der USA würde.

In kleiner Runde bei lebhaftem Gespräch vereint sah man in Bonn Senator

continued on next page

154

continued from preceding page

Zuerst kam sie nach Hamburg. Da sah man aber nicht viel von ihr, denn sie war müde. Als höflicher Gast erklärte sie jedoch: „Hamburg is beautiful — sehr schön."

Dann reiste sie nach Bonn weiter und hatte dort, an der Seite ihres Mannes Edward Kennedy, ihren ganz großen Tag. Bonns Bewohner jubelten der schönen blonden Joan Kennedy zu wie einer Königin, und bei einem Empfang nach dem anderen versuchte Bonner Prominenz und Halbprominenz der 34jährigen Amerikanerin die Hand zu drücken.

An einem Abend ihres Deutschlandaufenthalts dann „ihr" Wohltätigkeitskonzert, bei dem die begabte Pianistin Joan Kennedy allerdings nicht am Flügel saß, sondern als Rezitatorin auftrat.

Es spielte das Bostoner Pop-Orchester unter dem 75-jährigen Chefdirigenten Arthur Fiedler. Die Musik war — zwischen Beethoven und dem Mode-Musical „Hair" — populär zusammengestellt. Viel Beifall für die Interpreten, der zum Orkan anschwoll, als Joan als Star des Abends auf der Bühne der Beethovenhalle erschien und zur Musik von Prokofieff aus dem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" rezitierte — im langen Silberkleid eine strahlende Schönheit. Den 900 Gästen tat es nicht leid, zwischen 120 und 150 Mark für den Eintritt zu der Wohltätigkeitsveranstaltung gezahlt zu haben. Zumal so ziemlich alles dabei war, was in Bonn Rang und Namen hat, von Außenminister Scheel bis zu Ex-Präsident Lübke.

Die eindrucksvollste Begegnung indes hatten die Kennedys bei einem Empfang im Kanzler-Bungalow. Dort tauchte auch die Buchela auf, bekannt als „Wahrsagerin von Bonn". Sie ergriff spontan Ted Kennedys Hand und sagte: „Sie werden Präsident der USA werden."

Ted Kennedy war das ganze offenbar nicht sehr angenehm. Gewiß hat er nichts dagegen, doch noch Präsident zu werden. Doch von Wahrsagen hält er nicht viel.

Nicht so seine Frau Joan, die von der Weissagung offensichtlich erschüttert war — und sie ernst nahm. Ja, Joan Kennedy ist seither überzeugt, ihren nächsten Deutschland-Besuch als First Lady der USA zu absolvieren.

Gleichzeitig kam in Joan Kennedy aber auch die alte Angst um ihren Mann wieder hoch. Die Angst, ihn zu verlieren — so wie die Schwägerinnen Jackie und Ethel ihre Männer John und Robert verloren. „Von Tod und Unglück", tröstete Ted seine Frau, „hat die Seherin nicht gesprochen!" ■

Höhepunkt des Wohltätigkeitskonzerts in der Beethoven-Halle: Joan Kennedy rezitierte aus dem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" zu der Musik von Serge Prokofieff. Es spielte das Boston-Pop-Orchester.

Blumen für Chefdirigent Arthur Fiedler und die Rezitatorin Joan Kennedy. 900 Gäste, die 150 Mark Eintritt pro Karte gezahlt hatten, bedachten die Interpreten mit einem Beifallsorkan.

Edward Kennedy mit (von links) Dr. Mildred Scheel, Dirigent Arthur Fiedler, Joan Kennedy und Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel.

154

continued from preceding page

Zuerst kam sie nach Hamburg. Da sah man aber nicht viel von ihr, denn sie war müde. Als höflicher Gast erklärte sie jedoch: „Hamburg is beautiful — sehr schön."

Dann reiste sie nach Bonn weiter und hatte dort, an der Seite ihres Mannes Edward Kennedy, ihren ganz großen Tag. Bonns Bewohner jubelten der schönen blonden Joan Kennedy zu wie einer Königin, und bei einem Empfang nach dem anderen versuchte Bonner Prominenz und Halbprominenz der 34jährigen Amerikanerin die Hand zu drücken.

An einem Abend ihres Deutschlandaufenthalts dann „ihr" Wohltätigkeitskonzert, bei dem die begabte Pianistin Joan Kennedy allerdings nicht am Flügel saß, sondern als Rezitatorin auftrat.

Es spielte das Bostoner Pop-Orchester unter dem 75-jährigen Chefdirigenten Arthur Fiedler. Die Musik war — zwischen Beethoven und dem Mode-Musical „Hair" — populär zusammengestellt. Viel Beifall für die Interpreten, der zum Orkan anschwoll, als Joan als Star des Abends auf der Bühne der Beethovenhalle erschien und zur Musik von Prokofieff aus dem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" rezitierte — im langen Silberkleid eine strahlende Schönheit. Den 900 Gästen tat es nicht leid, zwischen 120 und 150 Mark für den Eintritt zu der Wohltätigkeitsveranstaltung gezahlt zu haben. Zumal so ziemlich alles dabei war, was in Bonn Rang und Namen hat, von Außenminister Scheel bis zu Ex-Präsident Lübke.

Die eindrucksvollste Begegnung indes hatten die Kennedys bei einem Empfang im Kanzler-Bungalow. Dort tauchte auch die Buchela auf, bekannt als „Wahrsagerin von Bonn". Sie ergriff spontan Ted Kennedys Hand und sagte: „Sie werden Präsident der USA werden."

Ted Kennedy war das ganze offenbar nicht sehr angenehm. Gewiß hat er nichts dagegen, doch noch Präsident zu werden. Doch von Wahrsagen hält er nicht viel.

Nicht so seine Frau Joan, die von der Weissagung offensichtlich erschüttert war — und sie ernst nahm. Ja, Joan Kennedy ist seither überzeugt, ihren nächsten Deutschland-Besuch als First Lady der USA zu absolvieren.

Gleichzeitig kam in Joan Kennedy aber auch die alte Angst um ihren Mann wieder hoch. Die Angst, ihn zu verlieren — so wie die Schwägerinnen Jackie und Ethel ihre Männer John und Robert verloren. „Von Tod und Unglück", tröstete Ted seine Frau, „hat die Seherin nicht gesprochen!" ■

Höhepunkt des Wohltätigkeitskonzerts in der Beethoven-Halle: Joan Kennedy rezitierte aus dem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" zu der Musik von Serge Prokofieff. Es spielte das Boston-Pop-Orchester.

Blumen für Chefdirigent Arthur Fiedler und die Rezitatorin Joan Kennedy. 900 Gäste, die 150 Mark Eintritt pro Karte gezahlt hatten, bedachten die Interpreten mit einem Beifallsorkan.

Edward Kennedy mit (von links) Dr. Mildred Scheel, Dirigent Arthur Fiedler, Joan Kennedy und Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hersfelder Zeitung, Bad Hersfeld
vom 19. April 1971

Joan Kennedy sprach „Peter und der Wolf" in Bonn
Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy war der prominenteste Zuhörer seiner Frau: Joan Kennedy hatte in der Beethovenhalle bei einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker den Sprechpart in Sergej Prokofiews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen (unser dpa-Bild links). Rechts der Dirigent des amerikanischen Orchesters Arthur Fiedler, aufgenommen während des Konzerts in der Beethovenhalle. (dpa)

Egmont zu Sandwiches und Sekt

Gesellschaftliches Ereignis in Bonn — Das Boston Symphony-Orchestra spielte auf Ehepaar Kennedy als prominenteste Gäste

Bonn, 19. April (dpa)
Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb bei dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grün-goldenen Tischen Platz. bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock . . ."

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. N. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 20,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Delmenhorster Kreisblatt, Delmenhorst
vom 19. April 1971

Abendessen in Bonn mit Musik und Joan Kennedy

Der teuerste Platz kostete 150 Mark — Amerikanische Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens

BONN (dpa). Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Edward Kennedy gemacht hatte.

Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte.

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbot-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr.

Joan Kennedy (links) während ihrer Mitwirkung im Orchester

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 261,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ruhr-Nachrichten, Dortmund
vom 19. April 1971

150 Mark Eintritt für Sekt und Sinfonie

Stürmisch gefeiert wurden in der Bonner Beethovenhalle nach dem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker Dirigent Arthur Fiedler und Joan Kennedy (links), die Frau des US-Senators Edward. Das Programm reichte vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St.-Louis-Blues von W. C. Handy. Joan Kennedy, die in einem weißen Maxi auftrat, hatte den Sprechpart in dem musikalischen Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Die Konzertbesucher im Saal saßen an Tischen und konnten sich mit Sandwich, Sekt und Wein stärken. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht ein Butterbrot mitgebracht hatte. In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren üblich. Die Premiere des 107 Mann starken Orchesters auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzterer inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, der Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen müsse, betrage sechs Dollar. Beim Galakonzert trugen Besucherinnen „heiße Höschen" (rechts).

Beim Festbankett umlagerten immer wieder Autogrammjäger die Senatorenfrau.

Joan Kennedy kam kaum zur Ruhe.

Joan Kenndy bedankt sich bei dem begeisterten Bonner Publikum in der Beethoven-Halle

Zuviel Rummel für Edward Kennedy: Verärgert über die bedrängenden Zuschauer wandte sich der Senator ab

„Joan, das war Klasse"

Jubel und Ärger bei Kennedy-Auftritt in Bonn

n. w. Bonn, 18. April

„Das war deine beste Aufführung, die du je mit diesem Stück hattest, Joan." Strahlend empfing Senator Edward Kennedy mit diesem Kompliment seine Frau hinter der Bühne der Bonner Beethoven-Halle.

Joan Kennedy war die Attraktion des exklusiven Abends: Sie hatte beim Festival des Boston Symphony-Orchestra den Sprechpart von Prokofjews Märchenoper „Peter und der Wolf" rezitiert.

Um Mitternacht stand Ted Kennedy in der Halle des Bonner Hotels „Königshof" und sagte zu BILD am SONNTAG: „Ich komme bestimmt in nächster Zeit wieder, ohne meine Frau. Dann habe ich Zeit für meine Freunde."

Sein jahrelanger Berater, Freund und Rechtsanwalt, William van der Heuvel, war eigens vorausgereist, um diese Freunde nach Bonn einzuladen. Darunter auch eine junge hübsche Dame aus Süddeutschland, mit der Ted vor Jahren eng befreundet war.

Befragt, was er bei seinem 24stündigen Aufenthalt in Bonn am meisten genossen hatte, meinte er: „Ein privates Mittagessen im Weinhaus Maternus." Bei norwegischem Lachs, Schildkrötensuppe, London Derry, gespicktem Filetbraten, heißen Kirschen mit Eis und „67iger Waldracher Jesuitengarten", war der Senator — wie er sagte — „einmal Mensch".

Die übrige Zeit des Tages hatten seine amerikanischen Leibwächter und die deutschen Sicherheitsbeamten Mühe, ihm die Riesenschar von Fotografen und Autogrammjägern vom Leib zu halten.

Fast zur Verzweiflung brachte das Ehepaar Kennedy die deutschen Protokoll-Beamten. Den Rheinland-Pfalz-Ministerpräsidenten Dr. Helmut Kohl, der für Kennedy im Bahnhof Rolandseck einen Empfang gab, ließ er eine Stunde warten. Auf dem Empfang des Außenministers Scheel im Kanzlerbungalow erschien der Gast mit 45 Minuten Verspätung. Er hatte es vorgezogen, sich mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke intensiv über Gesundheitspolitik zu unterhalten.

Joan Kennedy wäre auf dem Scheel-Empfang überhaupt nicht erschienen, wenn Protokoll-Chef Schwarzmann sie nicht mit sanfter Gewalt aus dem Hotel geholt hätte, wo sie — von Lampenfieber geplagt — immer wieder ihre Rolle probte.

Sie machte ihre Sache am Abend dann so gut, daß sie nicht nur von ihrem Mann Komplimente bekam, sondern sogar ein russisches Lob. Prokofjew-Landsmann Bondarenko, sowjetischer Geschäftsträger am Rhein, sprach es aus: „Gnädige Frau, mein Kompliment, das haben Sie sehr gut gemacht."

Gala-Abend in Bonn: Joan Kennedy spricht die Zwischentexte zu „Peter und der Wolf". Rechts Dirigent Arthur Fiedler.

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 530,3
— lt. „Leitfaden 1969" —

Ausschnitt aus: Es 3 Li n gen
Bildzeitung, ~~Hamburg~~, Südd. Ausgabe

vom 18. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 342,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Rheinische Post, Düsseldorf
vom 19. April 1971

157

In Bonn klangen Geigen und Gläser

Gala-Happening mit Kunst und Käse

Von unserem Redaktionsmitglied Heinz Schweden

Bonn — Was in Amerika, dem Land der unbegrenzten Möglichkeiten, möglich ist, in Bonn ist es offenbar nur begrenzt möglich: Ein Gala-Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters bei Kerzenlicht, belegten Brötchen und Sekt. Kunst und Käse, Musik und Mokka, genossen von tausend Angehörigen der High Society (oder was sich dafür hält) in Smoking, Abendrobe, Freizeithemd und heißen Höschen. Und zu den Dinner-Happen hier ein Häppchen Beethoven, da ein Häppchen Prokofieff, einen tüchtigen Batzen aus „Hair" und zum Schluß den St. Louis-Marsch. Tä-tätätätätätä! — „Noch ein Täß'chen Kaffee, die Dame?"

Nein, nein und nochmals nein, so darf man das nicht sehen, was da am Wochenende in Bonn passierte. Wenn Walter Scheel kam, und Heinrich Lübke und Ted Kennedy und Gabriele Henkel und David Rockefeller — und wenn Joan Kennedy höchstpersönlich (und nur in und für Bonn) den Text zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" rezitierte, musikalisch überlagert von 120 Musikern unter Arthur Fiedler, dann war das — bitte schön — ein musikalischer Hochgenuß mit Imbiß und kein Häppchen-Happening mit Musik.

Amerika ist eben anders. „Gala-Dinner-Konzert" nennt man so etwas laut Programm: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenden Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock..."

Arthur Fiedler hob in Bonn zunächst nicht den Taktstock, sondern kam mit Sirenengeheul und Blaulicht in einem echten Bonner Feuerwehrwagen vors Portal der Beethovenhalle angesaust, er der Feuerwehr-Fan, Ehrenvorsitzender von 270 Feuerwehren in aller Welt und Besitzer von 81 Ehren-Feuerwehrhelmen. Und dann hob er noch immer nicht den Taktstock, weil die Kellner im Saal zuviel mit den Gläsern schepperten und die Fotografen den Tisch der Scheels und Kennedys fast erdrückten, statt sich versonnen musikalisch einzustimmen. „Das hier ist ein Gala-Konzert und keine Kennedy-Show." Aber es war doch eine, weil Ted's Frau Joan zu hübsch ist und auch ihre Stimme zu einschmeichelnd, als daß man bei „Peter und der Wolf" allein der Musik gebührenden Respekt gezollt hätte.

Oben auf dem Rang der Beethovenhalle, wo das gewöhnliche Volk für nur 25 Mark Platz gefunden, mag man den Abend künstlerischer empfunden haben. Aber da gab's auch keine Prominenz auf 150-Mark-Plätzen bei Bierhäppchen und Sekt. Die Geigen klangen und auch die Gläser, auf dem Podium griff Malcolm Trager in die Tasten, die Gäste unten im Saal nach den Tassen. Als dann die „Hair-Melodien" erklangen, wurde es gar heiß im Saal. Der Sekt perlte, und nur oben auf der Empore ging der Coca-Cola-Mann eiskalt durch die Reihen. Es war schon sehr beeindruckend, was Bonn auf hoher und höchster gesellschaftlicher Ebene noch alles lernen muß, ehe es seinen Beethoven lukullisch verkaufen lernt. Doch man sollte nicht zu hart urteilen: Sportpalast-Niveau hatte das Arrangement im „festival pro"-Stil schon, man müßte nur noch den „Guck-mal-da-ist-der-Kennedy-Effekt" in vernünftige Relationen zu einem musikalisch so ausgefeilten und Häppchen-frei zu genießendem Orchester zu bringen versuchen.

Allerdings registrierte der Presse-Attaché der Sowjetbotschaft, Bogomolow, drei Fehlgriffe von Malcolm Trager, als es um Tschaikowskys (Sowjetunion) Klavierkonzert Nr. 1 ging. Doch vielleicht tat Bogomolow nur seine Pflicht, weil David Oistrach bis dato in Bonn noch nie die Chance gegeben wurde, bei Kaviar und Wodka aufzutreten. Im übrigen war auch Ted Kennedy nicht sehr von dem Klasse-Konzert mit Kau-Effekt angetan. Autogramme gab er nur widerwillig und war erst nach dem Auftritt seiner Frau versöhnt: „Mein Darling, das war dein größter Erfolg seit langem." Kurz zuvor hatte Bonns Prominenten-Wahrsagerin Buchella dem letzten Kennedy-Sproß händeschüttelnd prophezeit, ihr dünke, nach allem, was sie voraussehe, daß er eines Tages Präsident der USA sein werde. Solch sybillinische Sprüche waren allerdings nicht nach Teds Geschmack: „Ich habe es nicht eilig, ich habe genug Zeit", entgegnete er unwirsch.

All dies erlebte man am Wochenende im nicht ganz besetzten Beethoven-Saal von Bonn, sofern man die Kleinigkeit von 150 Mark für Pop(uläre)-Musik mit Imbiß nicht gescheut hatte. Den mit ihrem Orchester angereisten 50 millionenschweren Förderern des auf Privatbasis konzertierenden Ensembles erschien freilich der Preis von 150 Mark zu hoch. In Boston, so hörte man, koste ein solches Gala-Konzert mit Dinner höchstens sechs Dollar.

Doch Bonn ist nicht Boston. Da muß man sich seine High Society aus der ganzen Bundesrepublik zusammensuchen. Und solche Prominenz, wie sie an diesem Abend zu beobachten war, kommt offensichtlich nur, wenn es recht teuer ist — gleich was und wie es geboten wird. Freilich: gut die Hälfte aller Appetit-Häppchen blieben liegen. Dafür gab es herzlichen Beifall für die Bostoner Symphoniker, fantastische Blumengebinde und manchen Stoßseufzer: „Hätte man nicht diese herrliche Musk genießen können und wäre anschließend Essen gegangen?"

Vielleicht, aber dann hätte alles nicht den Flair der Bonner Society gehabt. Ein Snob, wer da nur saß und sein Häppchen nicht aß.

Im eleganten weißen Maxi-Kleid war Joan Kennedy der Star des Galakonzerts in der Bonner Beethovenhalle. Sie hatte die Sprechrolle in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Rechts der Dirigent Arthur Fiedler. Bild: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 255,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälische Rundschau, Dortmund
vom 19. April 1971

Gastspiel der Bostoner Sinfoniker war gesellschaftliches Ereignis

Bonn. (Eig. B.) Mehr gesellschaftliches Ereignis als Konzert war das Gastspiel der Bostoner Sinfoniker in der Beethoven-Halle. Wer nicht zur Prominenz gehörte, mußte bis zu 150 DM Eintritt bezahlen, um die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, Joan Kennedy, den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" rezitieren zu hören. Arthur Fiedler dirigierte das Orchester, das für die Egmont-Ouvertüre, einen „Hair"-Querschnitt und das Klavierkonzert Nr. 1 von Tschaikowski vom Publikum gefeiert wurde. Starken Beifall erhielt auch der Solist am Flügel, Malcolm Trager, für seine Tschaikowski-Interpretation.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 12,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Dill-Zeitung, Dillenburg
vom 17. April 1971

Nur zum Lesen...

... kam diese Dame nach Bonn. Aber sie ist prominent genug, um mit Blumen und Riesen-Fotografenaufgebot begrüßt zu werden: Joan, Ehefrau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, war Star eines Konzertabends des Boston-Symphonie-Orchesters, das gestern in der Beethovenhalle stattfand. Die prominente Politiker-Frau las den Text des musikalischen Märchens „Peter und der Wolf". Unter den Zuhörern Ehemann Edward, der die Gelegenheit der Bonn-Visite zu politischen Gesprächen nutzte.

158

argus Seit 1857 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 41,1 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Oberhausen
vom 19. April 1971

argus Seit 1857 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 71,9 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Bochum
vom 19. April 1971

argus Seit 1857 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 85,7 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus: Rhein-Neckar-Zeitung, Heidelberg
vom 19. April 1971

Aus dem Westen

DIE STARS DER BONNER GALA MIT DEN BOSTON POPS: Joan Kennedy und Dirigent Arthur Fiedler. ap-Telebild

Beethoven mit Brötchen und ein heißes Höschen

Galakonzert mit Joan Kennedy in Bonn — Dirigent kam mit Feuerwehr

Von WAZ-Chefreporter ERNST NEY — BONN

Die Einladung schimmerte golden. Die Plätze im Parkett kosteten 120 bis 150 DM, je nach Lage. Dafür gab es außer Beethoven, Tschaikowsky den Kennedys und den Rockefellers belegte Brötchen, einen Wein aus Rheinhessen, später ein Glas Sekt und zum Schluß noch einen Kaffee. Wer „nur" 25 oder 50 Mark für eine Karte anzulegen bereit war, konnte — außer Blatzheims Verpflegung — alles andere von den „trockenen" Balkonplätzen aus genießen. In den Pausen mischen sich dann „oben" und „unten".

Das Spektakel um Joan und Ted Kennedy und um die Bostoner Philharmoniker samt ihrem 75jährigen rustikalen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler erreichte mit einem Galakonzert in der Beethovenhalle einen teils rauschenden, teils komischen Höhepunkt.

Dieses noch vorweg: Es stimmt nicht, daß das Parkett voller „Geldadel" saß. Auch die politische Prominenz war nur schwach vertreten. In Sachen Schmuck, Eleganz, Garderoben hatte man sich mehr versprochen, obwohl es unbestreitbar das eine oder andere fürs Auge gab. Aber im großen und ganzen war es eine recht solide Versammlung. Es gibt eben heute viele Leute, auch unterhalb der gern zitierten „Finanzgewaltigen von Rhein und Ruhr", die für eine solche Sache mehr als einen Blauen hinblättern. Außerdem hatte Johannes Wasmuth, der ideenreiche Künstlervorstand vom Bahnhof Rolandseck, in letzter Minute mit Freikarten „gestopft", damit es auch „schön voll" aussah.

Ein festlicher Abend war es schon. Selbst den halbierten, belegten Brötchen hatte das Management klingende Namen gegeben: Prager Saftschinken mit Spargelspitzen, Mastputenfleisch, Lachsschinken mit gefüllten Oliven, Wildbachforellenfilet mit Kaviarsahne, Burgunder Rücken mit Ananas. Ich bin durchaus einverstanden, denn das läßt sich hübsch schreiben, aber, wenn man das Zeug so zwischen den Zähnen hatte, war es genau das, was es zu Hause auch gibt, wenn „Kaltverpflegung" im Kalender steht.

An unserem 10-Personen-Tisch kamen wir mit den zwei Brötchenplatten ganz gut weg, denn drei Plätze blieben leer. Aber auch bei voller Besetzung der Tische reichte es, denn die Gäste hatten allgemein eine gewisse Scheu, so richtig nach Herzenslust zuzugreifen, während das Orchester und die Solisten sich auf der Bühne strapazierten. Bostoner Bräuche sind eben keine Bonner Bräuche. Beethoven und Brötchen, das will uns nicht so recht schmecken.

Der wirkungsvoll weißhaarige Dirigent, seine genau 107 Mannen und dazu noch der schlanke, schwarzhaarige Malcolm Frager, Solist in Tschaikowskys Klavierkonzert Nr. 1 b-Moll, zeigten sich in dem kunterbunt zusammengestellten Programm vielseitig und temperamentvoll, vor allem aber zeigten sie eine bravouröse Exaktheit, äußerste Perfektion.

Ein Hauch von Jazzerei

Die Burschen aus Boston scheuen sich nicht, bei den großen Meistern, wo schnelle, kantige Passagen es zulassen, einen Hauch von Jazzerei unterzumischen. Serge Prokofiefs Musikmärchen von Peter und dem Wolf machte Fiedler ganz sanft und lyrisch. Und bei den Auszügen aus „Hair" schließlich, da zeigte das Orchester was drinsteckt. Einfach Klasse! Es fehlten nur noch ein paar Susaphone. „Hair" noch nie so gehört. Unvermeidlich: „Stars and Stripes", streckenweise vom Händeklatschen des mächtig in Fahrt gekommenen Publikums begleitet. Eine Zugabe von Bizet, minutenlanger Beifall und Ende.

Mittelpunkt: Joan Kennedy, keine im landläufigen Sinne schöne Frau, aber eine großartige Erscheinung, liebenswürdig elegant in jeder Bewegung, temperamentvoll, gesprächseifrig. Höhepunkt: ebenfalls Joan Kennedy, als sie mit angenehmer, nicht zu hoher, einfühlsamer Stimme, mitten im Orchester stehend, die Rezitationen zu „Peter und der Wolf" vortrug. Das war schon etwas ausgesprochen Besonderes. Ted nachher zu Joan: „Das hast du wundervoll gemacht."

Tisch 17 war der Prominententisch: die Kennedys und die Scheels, US-Botschafter Rush mit Familie, der sowjetische Geschäftsträger Bondarenko und an den Tischen ringsum einige Dutzend finanzkräftige Amerikaner aus dem „Freundeskreis" des Orchesters, der zugleich der Kreis der Mäzene, der Spender ist. Denn die „Boston Pops" sind ein privatwirtschaftlich betriebenes Unternehmen, kein staatlich subventioniertes Orchester.

Trägerin des einzigen „heißen Höschens" im Saale: eine der jüngeren aus der Familie Rockefeller, Nancy mit Vornamen, schwarz das Höschen, eng der Pullover. Feuerwehrfan Arthur Fiedler hatte mit Freuden die Offerte der Bonner Feuerwehr angenommen, mit Blaulicht und Martinshorn auf einen Drehleiterwagen zum Galakonzert zu fahren. Erschreckte Passanten meinten zuerst, es brenne in der Halle oder es sei gar Bombenalarm, das Ganze werde nicht stattfinden — aber es war „nur" der spleenige Dirigent, der im Frack vom Leiterwagen kletterte und offenbar gerade wieder einmal „eine der schönsten Minuten" (so sagte er ständig) seines Lebens beim Wickel hatte.

DIE EINZIGE TRÄGERIN heißer Höschen wurde auf der Bonner Gala von Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel in ein Gespräch verwickelt. ap-Telebild

JOAN KENNEDY sprach „Peter und der WOLF" in Bonn. Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy war der prominenteste Zuhörer seiner Frau, die in der Bonner Beethovenhalle bei einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker den Sprechpart in Sergej Prokofiews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte (unser Bild links). Rechts der Dirigent des amerikanischen Orchesters Arthur Fiedler, aufgenommen während des Konzerts in der Beethovenhalle. Eine weitere Besonderheit dieser Galavorstellung war die Tatsache, daß sich die Konzertbesucher während der Darbietung an Tischen im Saal mit Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein stärken konnten. (Foto: dpa)

INTERNATIONAL HERALD TRIBUNE, MONDAY, APRIL 19, 1971

PEOPLE:

Fiedler, Joan Kennedy Boffo in Bonn

Fire-engine fancier Arthur Fiedler set the pace for a swinging Boston Pops weekend performance in Bonn by arriving for the concert in a gleaming hook-and-ladder rig. "Great ride!" the conductor told a laughing, applauding crowd in front of Beethoven Hall before disappearing through a side entrance to give West Germany its first taste of his relaxed approach to the classics. Prolonged applause followed the gala show, in which Joan Kennedy narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before Joan's husband, Sen. Edward Kennedy, Foreign Minister Walter Scheel, ex-West German President Heinrich Luebke and a dressy audience who relaxed around candle-lit dinner tables. Fiedler, however, drew the biggest hand for his spirited versions of the "St. Louis Blues" and a medley of tunes from the musical "Hair," and ending with a rousing version of "The Stars and Stripes Forever."

* * *

Arthur Fiedler

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 132,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Badische Zeitung, Freiburg
19. April 1971

Ein gesellschaftliches Ereignis war in Bonn ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter dem 76 Jahre alten Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler und mit Joan Kennedy als Sprecherin in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf".

Joan, Peter und der Wolf

Konzert mit Sekt und belegten Brötchen in Bonn

UPI Bonn. Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan haben Bonn am Freitag gegeben, worum es sich stets bemüht: gesellschaftliche Reputation mit einem Hauch von Nerz. Die Frau des demokratischen Politikers hatte die Sprechrolle in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Es spielte das Bostoner Symphonieorchester unter Arthur Fiedler.

Wer in der Beethovenhalle dabeisein wollte, mußte bis zu 150 Mark für eine Karte ausgeben oder aber zur Prominenz gehören — die freien Eintritt hatte. Die Besucher feierten Joan Kennedy ebenso wie Arthur Fiedler, die Musiker und die Solisten für einen „Hair"-Querschnitt, für die Ouvertüre zu Beethovens „Egmont" oder für das Klavierkonzert Nummer eins von Tschaikowski (Solist: Malcolm Trager). Manche Besucher waren enttäuscht, daß Frau Kennedy nicht „Hot Pants" oder eine durchsichtige Bluse trug: Trotzdem war das Konzert nach Bostoner Art mit belegten Brötchen auf silbernen Tabletts, rheinhessischem Wein und Champagner zusammen mit den Kennedys ein Hit für Bonn. Zum Schluß, als Signal für den Kaffee, dirigierte Arthur Fiedler „The stars und stripes forever".

Als Fan von Feuerwehrausrüstungen gab sich Arthur Fiedler auch in Bonn zu erkennen. Der Dirigent der berühmten Bostoner Symphoniker kam zum Galaabend in der Beethovenhalle im Frack — auf einem Feuerwehrwagen. (Bericht auf Seite 2.)

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): o.A.
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Nassauische Landeszeitung, Limburg
vom 19. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 261,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ruhr-Nachrichten, Dortmund
vom 19. April 1971

150 Mark Eintritt für Sekt und Sinfonie

Stürmisch gefeiert wurden in der Bonner Beethovenhalle nach dem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker Dirigent Arthur Fiedler und Joan Kennedy (linke), die Frau des US-Senators Edward. Das Programm reichte vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St.-Louis-Blues von W. C. Handy. Joan Kennedy, die in einem weißen Maxi auftrat, hatte den Sprechpart in dem musikalischen Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Die Konzertbesucher im Saal saßen an Tischen und konnten sich mit Sandwich, Sekt und Wein stärken. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht ein Butterbrot mitgebracht hatte. In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren üblich. Die Premiere des 107 Mann starken Orchesters auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzterer inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, der Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen müsse, betrage sechs Dollar. Beim Galakonzert trugen Besucherinnen „heiße Höschen" (rechts).

EXPRESS
1 2 Wochenende, 17./18. April 1971

Joan kam unter die Haube

Joan Kennedy mit Star-Figaro Willi Michels.

Barfuß saß die Lady beim Friseur

Von RÜDIGER VON WOIKOWSKY

exp Bonn — Das war im Programm nicht vorgesehen. Vor ihrem großen Auftritt in der Beethovenhalle ließ sich Joan Kennedy bei dem Bonner Figaro Michels hübsch machen. Und während die Lady unter der Haube saß, kam ihr persönlicher Begleiter ganz schön ins Schwitzen.

Die Idee, sich schnell noch einmal die Haare waschen und legen zu lassen, war der Senatorgattin bei der Probe für ihren Sprechpart in der Beethovenhalle gekommen.

„Komm, nicht nach rechts und links schauen, wir fahren schnell mal zum Friseur", flüsterte Joan plötzlich zu ihrem Chauffeur Karl-Heinz Stein.

Gesagt, getan. Schon wenig später bearbeiten Willi Michels und Rainer Zilke die langen blonden Strähnen der Kennedy-Gattin, während sich Joan barfuß von den morgendlichen Strapazen im Kanzleramt im Friseursessel ausruhte.

Fast anderthalb Stunden dauerte die Prozedur an Joans Haaren.

Während Joan unter der Haube saß, kam ihr persönlicher Begleiter, Dieter Lange, in Terminnot. Er mußte, nachdem er die Lady zurück ins Hotel gebracht hatte, ihren Gatten Ted bei Außenminister Scheel abholen und zum Bahnhof Rolandseck bringen. Joan Kennedy verzichtete auf den Empfang bei Ministerpräsident Kohl. Ihr Mann hatte ihr Ruhe vor dem Konzert verordnet.

Mit von der Partie bei Kohl indes war Star-Dirigent Arthur Fiedler, der den Mini-„Napoleon" aus einem bayerischen Bierkrug trinken ließ.

Dirigent Fiedler mit Hund

160

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 160,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Neue Presse, Frankfurt/Main
vom 19. April 1971

Als Fan von Feuerwehrausrüstungen gab sich Arthur Fiedler auch in Bonn zu erkennen. Der Dirigent der berühmten Bostoner Symphoniker kam zum Galaabend in der Beethovenhalle im Frack — auf einem Feuerwehrwagen. (Bericht auf Seite 2.)

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 36,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Gießener Anzeiger, Gießen
vom 17. April 1971

Nur zum Lesen...

... kam diese Dame nach Bonn. Aber sie ist prominent genug, um mit Blumen und Riesen-Fotografenaufgebot begrüßt zu werden: Joan, Ehefrau des US-Senators Edward Kennedy, war Star eines Konzertabends des Boston-Symphonie-Orchesters, das gestern in der Beethovenhalle stattfand. Die prominente Politiker-Frau las den Text des musikalischen Märchens „Peter und der Wolf". Unter den Zuhörern Ehemann Edward, der die Gelegenheit der Bonn-Visite zu politischen Gesprächen nutzte.

Joan Kennedy ließ Kohl sitzen!

Wochenende, 17./18. April

Ehemann Edward bei Ehmke

Von PETER KUTSCHKE

exp Bonn — Pünktlichkeit ist nicht ihre Zier: Nachdem die blonde Joan Kennedy schon am Donnerstag zu Bonns Oberbürgermeister zu spät gekommen war, ließ sie gestern auch Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred zwei Stunden warten.

Gegen 13 Uhr erschien sie schließlich zum Cocktailplausch im Kanzlerbungalow. Ihr Mann Edward war — nach einem Gespräch mit Minister Ehmke — schon vorher da.

Bei einem Empfang des rheinland-pfälzischen Ministerpräsidenten Kohl für die amerikanischen Gäste im Bahnhof Rolandseck erschien die schöne Joan überhaupt nicht. Ted, durch ein Gespräch mit Außenminister Scheel aufgehalten, kam über eine Stunde später als vorgesehen. Dort verriet ihm Bonns Prominenten-Wahrsagerin, Madame Buchela: „Sie werden Präsident von Amerika, aber noch nicht. Ich wünsche Ihnen Gottes Segen."

Grund für Joans „Körbe": Sie sieht ihren Bonner Besuch vor allem unter künstlerischem Gesichtspunkt.

Joan, die drei Paar „Hot Pants" im Koffer hatte, sich aber nicht traute, sie in Bonn zu tragen, verriet „Express" vor dem Kohl-Empfang: „Mein Mann hat mir verboten, dort hinzugehen." Sie müsse sich für den Abend schonen.

Höhepunkt des zweitägigen Besuchs war gestern abend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle das Galakonzert mit dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester, während etwa 900 Gäste aus Finanzwelt, Industrie, Diplomatie und Adel speisten.

Minister Scheel und Joan Kennedy

ST Samstag/Sonntag, 17./18. April 1971 — Seite 26

QUER DURCH BONN

Heiße Würstchen gab es auch für Joan und Dirigent Fiedler.

Hot pants im Koffer

Fortsetzung von der vorigen Seite

Abends dinierten die amerikanischen Gäste in der US-Botschaft. Und dann fuhren sie zum Abendessen mit Tafelmusik in die Beethovenhalle. Joan Kennedy —, ihre Hot pants lagen noch immer im Koffer — rezitierte zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf". Derweil Arthur Fiedlers Mannen aus Boston nach den Noten des Meisters bliesen und fiedelten. Weiter im Programm des Galakonzerts: Werke von Beethoven und Tschaikowsky, ein Marsch und Weisen aus dem Neo-Klassiker „Hair".

US-Senator Kennedy (l.) und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke unterhalten sich im Palais Schaumburg

Schöne Sprecherin Joan Kennedy

Sinn für Märchen: Joan Kennedy (links), die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, war die Solistin des Konzertes, das die Bostoner Symphoniker am Freitag in Bonn gaben. Sie sprach den Text bei der Aufführung des musikalischen Märchens „Peter und der Wolf" von Sergej Prokofieff. Der Dirigent war Arthur Fiedler. Foto: dpa

MP 18.4

BONN

Frei Haus

Haben Sie, lieber Leser, noch einen Brötchenjungen? Wir haben einen. Sogar einen absolut zuverlässigen, der mit Uhrwerksgenauigkeit kommt und anscheinend nie krank ist. Staunenswert, nicht wahr? Gesehen haben wir ihn freilich noch nie. Er kommt heimlich wie der Osterhase und in aller Herrgottsfrühe. Von seiner Tätigkeit zeugen lediglich vier frische knusprige Brötchen, die jeden Morgen in einer gestreiften Tüte vor der Haustür liegen. Erfreulich, daß sich in unserer Zeit, noch jemand aufmacht, um uns etwas ins Haus zu bringen. Im allgemeinen läuft heute der Kunde zum Lieferanten und nicht umgekehrt. Darum ist uns der Brötchenjunge immer herzlich willkommen. Dank seiner Kundendienstbereitschaft profitieren wir von den Resten einer angenehmen Tradition, die dem Druck der Ökonomie bisher widerstanden hat.

*

Früher, vor 50 Jahren, als es in herrschaftlichen Häusern noch einen besonderen „Eingang für Lieferanten" gab, aber auch noch Jahrzehnte danach wurden dem Kunden viele Waren „frei Haus" zugestellt. Mit dem Brötchenjungen wetteiferte das Milchmädchen. Unser Milchmädchen hieß Mariechen. Mariechen war rothaarig, sommersprossig und schenkte aus der großen Kanne das Litermaß so großzügig voll, daß sein Daumennagel in der Milch verschwand und ein paar Tropfen immer auf die Erde fielen. Zweimal in der Woche polterte der Metzgergeselle in adrett gestreiftem Kittel die Treppe herauf, um die bestellte Ware zu bringen. Suppenfleisch, Koteletts, Schinken und Aufschnitt enthielt sein weißer, mit einem rotgemusterten Tuch bedeckter Korb. Von fernhin kam mit dem Fahrrad die Butterfrau. Sie brachte jede Woche weißliche, brotförmige Butterklumpen aus eigener Herstellung und bot der Mutter vor dem Kauf immer eine Kostprobe an.

*

Daneben gab es den Gemüsemann, der mit dem Wagen vor dem Haus anhielt und die Kundinnen, die er mit einem charakteristischen Klingelsignal auf die Straße rief, draußen bediente. Ferner den Bäcker, der im Wagen Brot, Kuchen und anderes Backwerk brachte. Und den Eiermann mit seiner zerbrechlichen Ware. Zu diesen Dauerlieferanten stießen die Hausierer, die Schuhriemen, Druckknöpfe, aber auch Decken oder Strickwaren an der Tür feilhielten, und die Stuhlflechter, Kesselflicker und Scherenschleifer, die arbeitend durchs Land zogen. So war im Haus ständig etwas los. Vom Zustrom der Freiwilligen, die Waren oder Dienste anboten, ist als Dauerbesucher nur der Brötchenjunge übriggeblieben. Eines Tages wird an seiner Stelle ein Schreiben kommen, in dem der Bäckermeister der sehr geehrten Kundschaft zu wissen gibt, daß er wegen Personalmangels den Jungen leider nicht mehr schicken könne. Wir Kunden werden es bedauern, aber nicht daran zerbrechen. Ist uns doch seit langem klar, daß wir kleinere Brötchen backen müssen, meint

GOTTLIEB WEISE

Das gemütliche Bierrestaurant! — Wo!
KAISERECK BONN
Jeden Abend Unterhaltungsmusik

Beim Empfang im Kanzleramtsbungalow

Bostoner Ladies fanden alles „charming"

Edward Kennedy plauderte mit Horst Ehmke — Bonn-Erinnerungen Arthur Fiedlers

ch - „I am glad to meet you here", versicherte Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel Joan Kennedy, als sie eine gute halbe Stunde nach dem offiziellen Ende eines Empfanges „zu Ehren amerikanischer Persönlichkeiten, die Bonn anläßlich eines Konzerts des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters besuchen", im Kanzleramtsbungalow eintraf. Ihr Mann, der Senator des Staates Massachusetts Edward Kennedy, war schon eine halbe Stunde zuvor gekommen, geleitet von Horst Ehmke, dem zeitweiligen Hausherrn des Kanzleramtes.

Freundschaftlicher Händedruck zwischen dem amerikanischen Senator Edward Kennedy und Bonns Außenminister Walter Scheel. In der Mitte Dr. Mildred Scheel
Aufn.: Engels (3)

Viele Prominente waren der Einladung der Scheels gefolgt, die Freunde des Boston Symphonie Orchestra, vor allem aber wohl die Kennedys zu sehen, und mit ihnen über Musik, Beethoven und Bonn zu plaudern.

„Das letzte Mal, daß ich in Bonn war, ist vor dem Weltkrieg gewesen, vor dem ersten", erzählte Arthur Fiedler, Dirigent der Gala-Vorführung seines Orchesters gestern abend in der Beethovenhalle. „Als Student, wissen Sie. Damals baute man noch keine U-Bahnen." Ob ihm das Bonn von damals besser gefallen habe? „Ach wissen Sie, das ist schwer zu sagen. Ein alter Mann wie ich hat so seine sentimentalen Erinnerungen." Auf dem Drachenfels jedenfalls sei er auch damals nicht gewesen. „Oder würden Sie zu Fuß da hinauflaufen?"

Arthur Fiedler, der außer in Bonn auch in Berlin Musik studiert hat, um dann vor mehr als vierzig Jahren nach Boston auszuwandern („Da war gerade eine Stelle im Orchester frei, wissen Sie"), schlichtete einen Streit, der um sein Alter entstanden war. „Weder siebzig noch achtzig, etwas mehr als die Mitte dazwischen: sechsundsiebzig." Und von seinem Fünfundsiebzigsten berichtete er, Freunde hätten ihm „nach langem Überlegen" einen kleinen Hund geschenkt, einen Chihuahua, „mit einem blauen und einem braunen Auge".

Von seinem Orchestermitglied Joan Kennedy schwärmte Arthur Fiedler. „Sie macht ihren Part sehr gut. Sie hat ein großes Einfühlungsvermögen." Er erkundigte sich, wie man in Deutschland zu „populärer Musik" stehe. Er selber liebt die modernen Versionen von Bach oder Beethovens Neunter nicht so sehr, räumt aber ein, daß sie vielleicht dazu beitragen könnten, bei jungen Menschen das Verständnis für die klassische Musik zu wekken.

Helle Begeisterung lösten inzwischen „die Scheels" bei den älteren Damen aus Boston aus. „Charming, lovely", fanden sie nicht nur Frau Mildred in ihrem goldgelben Kleid, auch den Herrn Minister, und natürlich vor allem den Park des Kanzleramtsbungalows. „Wie vor dem White House", konstatierte eine der offenbar weitgereisten Ladies. Und von den Münchner Bierseideln war bald kaum noch einer zu entdecken. Küchenchef-Direktor Prange von der Beethovenhalle nahm es mit der ihm eigenen Gelassenheit hin. Etwas mußte man der Souvenir-Leidenschaft der Amerikaner schon opfern.

additional story from this paper on the following page

162

Fiedler kam mit dem Feuerwehrauto

Zum Galakonzert in der Beethovenhalle — Bei Kerzenlicht und Wein

Wa - Gestern abend erreichte der Besuch des „Boston Sinfonie Orchestra" — in seinem Gefolge Senator Edward Kennedy und Joan Kennedy sowie die Creme der Bostoner Gesellschaft — seinen Höhepunkt. Das Galakonzert wurde zum gesellschaftlichen Ereignis. Sein Auftakt war turbulent: Mit Blaulicht und Martinshorn fuhr ein Feuerwehrauto vor die Beethovenhalle; ihm entstieg der Dirigent der Bostoner, Arthur Fiedler, an dessen Feuerwehrauto-Leidenschaft Bonn mit Freuden einige Zugeständnisse gemacht hatte. Es folgte die Vorfahrt der Wagen. Smoking war laut Einladung erwünscht, das Bild war dementsprechend: Man kam im Galakleid.

In der Preisgestaltung für die Karten hatte sich der Veranstalter, das Festival Pro, nicht zimperlich gezeigt. Wer sich während des Kunstgenusses bei Kerzenlicht an Wein und Partyhappen laben wollte, wurde mit 150 oder 130 Mark zur Kasse gebeten; wer bereit war, sich das Vergnügen, dabei gewesen zu sein, 50 Mark kosten zu lassen, durfte auf den Rang; selbst mit 25 Mark war man dabei, allerdings hochoben auf der Empore, doch mit dem Vorteil, die „gesellschaftliche Arena" mit einem Blick überschauen zu können.

Das Programm war populär. Es begann mit der Egmont-Ouvertüre von Beethoven. Sobald die verklungen war, schritt ein Heer von Kellnern ins Parkett, den Wein zu kredenzen. Es folgte das bekannte Klavierkonzert Nr. 1 b-Moll von Peter Tschaikowski, Solist Malcolm Frager. Nach der Pause führte Joan Kennedy als Sprecherin durch Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf". Eine zweite Pause gab Gelegenheit, zu sehen und gesehen zu werden; dann erfüllten Auszüge aus dem Musical „Hair" und der „St. Louis-Blues-March" den Konzertsaal.

Man sah: Außenminister Walter Scheel und Frau Mildred, Altbundespräsident Heinrich Lübke und Frau Wilhelmine Lübke, Protokollchef Dr. Schwarzmann, Vertreter des Diplomatischen Korps — das Galakonzert stand unter dem Patronat des Botschafters der USA Kenneth Rush —, hohe Bundesbeamte, Vertreter der Wirtschaft und der Bankwelt und, wie Johannes Wasmuth es formulierte, „Künstler und sonstige nette Leute, die wir auch so gerne bei uns haben wollten."

Branddirektor Heinz Diekmann kommentierte die neuerliche Feuerwehrüberraschung für Dirigent Fiedler: „Der Fiedler war ganz begeistert und kletterte blitzschnell in das Auto. Bei einem Staatsempfang im Bahnhof Rolandseck hatte am Nachmittag der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Dr. Helmut Kohl Kennedy und die Solisten der Bostoner Philharmoniker willkommen geheißen. Kennedy erklärte, er vermerke mit besonderer Freude, daß er in Ministerpräsident Kohl einen noch jungen Politiker begrüßen könne, denn der Jugend gehöre die Zukunft. Sie sei der beste Garant für eine tiefe Verständigung.

Dirigent und Feuerwehrfan Fiedler auf dem Trittbrett eines Feuerwehrautos

Zehn Vorschläge zur Tieflage

Wettbewerbsfrist ist abgelaufen

rau- Zehn dicke versiegelte Umschläge stapeln sich im Dezernat für Stadterneuerung. Einer von ihnen ist möglicherweise 50 000 Mark wert. Am Donnerstag lieg die Einsendefrist für den Tieflagewettbewerb der Stadt Bonn ab. Es ging um neue technische Möglichkeiten der Bundesbahnteiflegung. 41 Interessenten hatten sich die Bewerbungsunterlagen vor fünf Monaten geben lassen. Die Aktionsgemeinschaft Tieflage hat sich an dem Wettbewerb nicht beteiligt, um ihre Unbefangenheit nicht zu verlieren, teilte einer ihrer Sprecher mit.

Fünf Experten aus der Bundesrepublik und der Schweiz treffen sich am 7. Mai, um sich einen ersten Überblick über die Vorschläge zu verschaffen. Mit ihrem abschließenden Urteil ist nicht vor Anfang Juni zu rechnen.

Teurer Boykott Rechtfertigung verlangt

Interessen nicht genügend gewahrt

-fr Die Rechnung für den Boykott der Arbeitsgemeinschaften und Klausuren zu Beginn dieses Jahres präsentiert der Oberlandesgerichtspräsident in Köln jetzt den Bonner, Kölner und Düsseldorfer Gerichtsreferendaren. In einem Schreiben fordert er die Referendare auf, sich innerhalb einer Woche zu ihrem Fernbleiben von der Arbeit zu äußern. In dem Schriftstück ist ferner ein Hinweis enthalten, daß für die Zeit des Boykotts kein Anspruch auf Unterhaltszuschuß besteht.

Die Referendare wollen sich jedoch nicht ohne weiteres zur Kasse bitten lassen. Nach ersten Äußerungen gestern folgen sie der Empfehlung des Landesverbandes Junger Juristen, das Schreiben nicht zu beantworten. Ferner streben sie ein ordentliches Disziplinarverfahren gegen den „Akt des Oberlandesgerichtspräsidenten" an.

Mit den Boykott vor wenigen Monaten protestierten die Gerichtsreferendare gegen den Röwer-Entwurf, der ihrer Meinung nach nicht genügend ihre Interessen in der Ausbildung wahrte.

Charmanter Gast: Joan Kennedy

General-Anzeiger
für Bonn und Umgegend

BONNER STADTANZEIGER — Unabhängige Tageszeitung — RHEIN-SIEG-ZEITUNG

Z 3201 A

80. Jahrgang — Nr. 24 740 | Samstag/Sonntag, 17./18. April 1971 | G | Einzel-Nr. 50 Pf

the kennedys in bonn

US-Senator Edward Kennedy bei Ehmke und Scheel

EDWARD KENNEDY und Minister Ehmke vor ihrem Gespräch — Foto: dpa

Gespräch über Truppenpräsenz

Bonn. (dpa) Die Stärke amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik stand im Mittelpunkt der Gespräche, die der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy gestern mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und Bundesaußenminister Scheel führte. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten amerikanischen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hält sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan und etwa 40 Amerikanern zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonn auf.

Während Bundesaußenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred bei einem Vormittagsempfang im Park-Bungalow des Palais Schaumburg die prominentesten amerikanischen Gäste bewirteten, führten Ehmke und Kennedy im Bundeskanzleramt einen Gedankenaustausch. Ehmke sagte nach dem Gespräch in einem Interview, es sei bekannt, daß es nach Kennedys Meinung auf lange Sicht eine gewisse Reduzierung der amerikanischen Truppen in Europa geben werde. Der Schwerpunkt dieser Diskussionen liegt nach Worten Ehmkes in der Frage: wenn überhaupt, dann wieviel? „Wir sind sehr froh, daß die Regierung in Washington die Politik der Bundesregierung unterstützt, nach der kein einseitiger amerikanischer Truppenabzug vorgenommen werden soll, solange die Frage der gegenseitigen gleichmäßigen Truppenreduzierung zwischen Ost und West zur Verhandlung stehen", erklärte der Kanzleramtsminister. Scheel besprach außer Stationierungsfragen mit seinem amerikanischen Gast die Berlin-Frage, die Ostpolitik der Bundesregierung sowie nach Mitteilung des Auswärtigen Amtes sicherheits- und verteidigungspolitische Fragen. (Siehe ausführlichen Bericht im Lokalteil.)

argus Seit 1857 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 57,6 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus: Wiesbadener Kurier, Wiesbaden

vom 17. April 1971

Plaudereien bei Bier und Brezeln

Kennedys im Kanzler-Bungalow / Edwards Gattin tritt mit Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester auf

Von unserem Korrespondenten CLAUS DREHER, Bonn

BONN „Wie heißt der nächste Präsident der USA?" wurde Edward Kennedy, umstrittener Senator und letzter Überlebender des Clans der Kennedy-Brüder, despektierlich gefragt. Edward, lange nicht mehr beim Friseur gewesen, in einem zerknitterten Anzug mit Kerzenwachs auf der Schulter, lächelt nur kurz: „Überlegen Sie, wer der nächste Präsident ist", sagt er, und sieht zu, wie er die Würstchen los wird, die er auf einen Teller vor sich hin trägt. Versonnen wirkt er, unsicher, möchte man meinen.

Und dabei wird er vor allem von den Damen der High-Society, die Außenminister Scheel nebst Ehegatten zu diesem Sektfrühstück in den Kanzler-Bungalow eingeladen hat, angehimmelt.

Noch am Vortage, als das Boston-Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung seines Dirigenten Fiedler im Bonner Rathaus empfangen wurde, war von Edward nicht die Rede. Nur davon, daß seine sommersprossige Gattin Joan in der Bonner Beethovenhalle im Rahmen eines Konzertes der Symphoniker aus Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf" lesen werde.

Das Buffet im Kanzlerbungalow war nach dem Motto angelegt: Die Kultur fängt erst dort an, wo Kartoffelsalat warm angemacht wird, also südlich des Mains. Man trank neben dem obligaten Whisky vor allem Bier, aß Leberkäse und Laugenbrezeln, delikate Salate und was immer so aus dem Süden an Leckerem geboten wird. Man trank und aß zunächst ohne die Kennedys. Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred widmeten sich den Gästen. Derweilen parlierten Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und Senator Kennedy im Kanzleramt.

Edward Kennedy war zu seinem Ärger stets von vielen Fotografen umlagert, lauschte den Worten des Außenministers und weigerte sich beharrlich, einen Hund anzufassen. Bonns Klatsch-Tante, Evi Keil, hatte sich nämlich eine Image-Aufbesserung angedeihen lassen und einen winzig kleinen Yorkshire-Hund statt Handtasche über den Arm gehängt.

Bis dato war die Joan Kennedy noch nicht im Kanzler-Etablissement eingetroffen. Sie käme gar nicht, sagte Minister Scheel. Sie käme sehr wohl, sagte Ehemann Edward, und der müßte es ja wissen. Und sie kam. In bleuem Hosenanzug mit gleichfarbenem Mantel und dunkelblauem Rollkragenpulli.

Prominent waren übrigens nicht nur Fiedlers Musikanten, die Creme de la Creme bildete die Begleitung. Die Rockefellers waren da, und die Cabots. In Amerika sagt man, die milliardenschweren Cabots würden, wenn überhaupt, höchstens mit der Familie Cabot-Lodge reden. Und diese wiederum nur mit dem lieben Gott. Die Cabot-Lodges waren auch da. Sie sprachen mit Ehmke.

Edward Kennedy, US-Senator, kam im Rahmen seines Besuches in der Bundeshauptstadt auch mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke zu Gesprächen zusammen. Über den Inhalt dieser Unterredungen wurde nichts bekanntgegeben. KURIER-Funkbild (AP)

164

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 133,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westdeutsche Allgemeine, Ausgabe Essen
vom 17. April 1971

Mit Bier und Brezel bewirtete Bundesaußenminister Scheel am Freitag seine amerikanischen Gäste im Kanzlerbungalow: Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan waren als Zuhörer und als Solistin des Konzertes nach Bonn gekommen, das die Bostoner Symphoniker gestern abend in der Beethoven-Halle gaben. Dabei las Joan Kennedy, wie schon berichtet, den Text zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf". Hier im Gespräch Joan Kennedy, und Minister Scheel (rechts) sowie Mildred Scheel und Edward Kennedy. dpa-Funkbild

Siehe Aus dem Westen: Vor den Symphonikern erst die Feuerwehrkapelle dirigiert

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172
Information aus:
SALZBURGER VOLKSBLATT
Salzburg
Datum 17. April 1971

„Berlin-Papier" lag auf dem Tisch

Botschafter vereinbarten bei ihrem 18. Treffen eine weitere Zusammenkunft für den 7. Mai Bonn/Berlin/Washington. (Reuter, DPA, AP, ED) Die Botschafter der vier Großmächte haben bei ihrem 18. Treffen im ehemaligen Gebäude des Alliierten Kontrollratsgebäude in West-Berlin vereinbart, am 7. Mai wieder zusammenzukommen. Wie üblich, wurden Einzelheiten nicht mitgeteilt. Ein sowjetischer Sprecher bestätigte, daß es um das „Berlin-Papier" gegangen ist, das Botschafter Abrassimow seinerzeit vorgelegt hat. Dieser Plan ist, wie erinnerlich, von der polnischen Zeitung „Warschauer Leben" veröffentlicht worden, was der Bonner Regierungssprecher von Wechmar als „gezielte Indiskretion" wertete. Gleichzeitig stelle er fest, daß die Publikation nicht vollständig sei und daß durch die fehlenden Zusammenhänge „ein positiveres Bild entstanden sei als gerechtfertigt" erscheine.

Inzwischen ist die Veröffentlichung von „Zycie Warszawy" vom SED-Zentralorgan „Neues Deutschland" und, ebenfalls kommentarlos, von der „TASS" übernommen worden. In Moskau sind westliche Beobachter der Ansicht, daß die Warschauer Veröffentlichung zweifellos die „Erlaubnis" hoher sowjetischer Stellen gehabt hat.

Zum Ergebnis des Botschaftergespräches äußerte der französische Missionschef Sauvagnargues beim Verlassen des Kontrollratsgebäudes auf Fragen der Journalisten: „Bei Verhandlungen kann man nie von Eindrücken reden. Wichtig ist, daß wir weiter arbeiten, beharrlich und geduldig." Auf die Frage, ob es in dieser Runde Fortschritte gegeben habe, erwiderte der Diplomat: „Ja, wir müssen abwarten."

US-Botschafter Rush meinte: „Unsere Positionen sind noch weit voneinander entfernt. Wir versuchen, den Abstand zu verkleinern."

Der britische Botschafter Sir Roger Jackling antwortet nur kurz: „Es ist nichts speziell Ungewöhnliches gewesen."

Abrassimow kleidete seine Meinung in die Formulierung: „Fortschritte sind möglich."

WASHINGTON BETROFFEN

Der Sprecher des State Department, McCloskey, zeigte sich über die Veröffentlichung des sowjetischen Positions-Papiers für eine Berlin-Regelung „betroffen". In der Publikation sieht man im übrigen eine Verletzung des Grundsatzes der Vertraulichkeit, die vereinbart wurde.

Senator Edward Kennedy (dessen Frau Joan einen Sprechpart bei einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonn übertragen erhielt) traf zu Unterredungen mit Außenminister Scheel und Staatssekretär Ehmke zusammen.

„Ach ja — und nehmen Sie Berlin nicht so wichtig: Europa hat ja Paris als Hauptstadt!"

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 4,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Saar-Zeitung, Saarlouis
vom 17. April 1971

Edward Kennedy in Bonn

Bonn (dpa). Die Stärke amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik stand im Mittelpunkt der Gespräche, die der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy am Freitag mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und Bundesaußenminister Scheel führte. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten amerikanischen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hält sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan und etwa 40 millionenschweren Amerikanern zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonn auf.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 16,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Lüdenscheider Nachrichten, Lüdenscheid
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Burgdorfer Kreisblatt, Burgdorf
vom 17. April 1971

Kennedy bei Ehmke und Scheel

Bonn (dpa). Die Stärke amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik stand im Mittelpunkt der Gespräche, die der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy am Freitag mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke und Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel führte. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten amerikanischen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hält sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan und etwa 40 millionenschweren Amerikanern zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonn auf.

Während Bundesaußenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred bei einem Vormittagsempfang im Park-Bungalow des Palais Schaumburg die prominentesten amerikanischen Gäste bewirteten, führten Ehmke und Kennedy im Bundeskanzleramt einen Gedankenaustausch. Nach dem Gespräch sagte Ehmke in einem Interview, es sei bekannt, daß es nach Kennedys Meinung auf lange Sicht eine gewisse Reduzierung der amerikanischen Truppen in Europa geben werde. Der Schwerpunkt dieser Diskussionen liegt nach Worten Ehmkes in der Frage, wenn überhaupt, dann wieviel?

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 255,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälische Rundschau, Dortmund
vom 17. April 1971

Vor einem Konzert mit Senatorgattin Joan Kennedy in der Bonner Beethovenhalle gab es einen Empfang im Kanzleramt: Senator Edward Kennedy (links) im Gespräch mit der Frau des Bundesaußenministers, Mildred Scheel. Ihr Mann (rechts) unterhielt sich mit Mrs. Kennedy.

Politische Gespräche führten gestern US-Senator Edward Kennedy und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke am Rande eines Empfangs für das Bostoner Symphonieorchester. dka/UPI-Funkbilder

Empfang im Bundeskanzleramt vor Konzert mit Joan Kennedy

Bonn. Geld, Kunst und Politik gaben sich gestern mittag im Bonner Bundeskanzleramt ein Stelldichein: der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy, seine attraktive Frau Joan, das Bostoner Symphonieorchester und eine Reihe dollarschwerer Mitglieder der Bostoner High-Society waren zu einem Empfang geladen. Offizieller Anlaß war ein Galakonzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" in der Beethovenhalle.

Im Mittelpunkt des Programms unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler stand Joan Kennedy: die Senatorengattin rezitierte Textpartien in „Peter und der Wolf" von Serge Prokofieff. Joan Kennedy hat bei ähnlichen Gelegenheiten auch schon als Pianistin geglänzt.

Es blieb fast unbeachtet, daß Edward Kennedy auch politische Gespräche führte. Mit Außenminister Scheel und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke diskutierte er über Ostpolitik und über das Berlin-Problem. Die Gespräche wurden als „nützlich" bezeichnet . . .

Rockefeller jr. über hohe Eintrittspreise verstimmt

Edward und Joan Kennedy kamen ins versnobte Bonn

Politischer Gedankenaustausch des Senators mit Ministern

dpa. Bonn. Die Stärke amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik stand im Mittelpunkt der Gespräche, die der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy gestern mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke und Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel führte.

Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten amerikanischen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hält sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan und etwa 40 millionen-schweren Amerikanern zu einem Gala-Konzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonn auf.

Während Bundesaußenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred bei einem Vormittagsempfang im Park-Bungalow des Palais Schaumburg die prominentesten amerikanischen Gäste bewirteten, führten Ehmke und Kennedy im Bundeskanzleramt einen Gedankenaustausch.

Ehmke sagte nach dem Gespräch in einem Interview, es sei bekannt, daß es nach Kennedys Meinung auf lange Sicht eine gewisse Reduzierung der amerikanischen Truppen in Europa geben werde. Der Schwerpunkt dieser Diskussion liegt nach Worten Ehmkes in der Frage, wenn überhaupt, dann wieviel?

Für das Gala-Konzert gestern abend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle hatte die Prominenz aus Politik, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft Karten zwischen 25 und 150 DM gekauft. Der Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, David Rockefeller junior, ist allerdings etwas über die hohen Eintrittspreise verstimmt. In Bonn, meinte Rockefeller, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man zu jedem Preis bereit sei.

Senator Kennedy traf auch mit Kanzleramtsminister Prof. Ehmke zusammen.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 314,2 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Hamburger Abendblatt, Hamburg
vom 17. April 1971

Joan war der Star des Abends

Edward Kennedy und Frau Scheel

Von unserer Bonner Redaktion
wst. Bonn, 17. April

Alles, was in Bonn Rang und Namen und den Oster-Urlaub schon hinter sich gebracht hat, versammelte sich Freitag abend in der Beethovenhalle. Für einen Eintrittspreis von 50 bis 150 DM wurde der Bonner Prominenz bei Kerzenlicht und einem erlesenen Dinner ein bisher einmaliges Ereignis geboten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra gab ein Galakonzert.

Star des Abends, Joan Kennedy, die Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy und Schwägerin des ermordeten US-Präsidenten, hatte den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Frau Kennedy war schon am Donnerstag in Köln eingetroffen. Ihr Mann traf am Freitag früh in Bonn ein.

Am Vormittag führte der Senator ein fast eineinhalbstündiges Gespräch unter vier Augen mit Kanzleramts-Minister Ehmke. Dann holte er telefonisch seine Frau herbei. Zusammen mit Ehmke gingen die Kennedys dann in den Kanzler-Bungalow, wo das Ehepaar Scheel auf sie wartete.

Man trank Kaffee und aß dazu gebratene Weißwürstchen, bis Senator Kennedy dann doch einen anderen Wunsch äußerte: Er wollte ein bayerisches Bier.

Nach einem Mittagessen im Godesberger Prominentenlokal Maternus gab der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Kohl im „Künstlerbahnhof" Rolandseck einen Empfang für die Kennedys. Unter den Gästen befand sich auch die „Hellseherin von Bonn", Margarethe Goussantier — bekannter unter ihrem Zigeunernamen Buchela. Sie stürzte sich plötzlich auf den Senator, nahm seine rechte Hand und flüsterte ihm zu: „Herr Kennedy, aus Ihrer Hand lese ich, Sie werden Präsident. Jetzt noch nicht, aber Sie werden Präsident. Gott schütze Sie — und alles Gute."

Joan Kennedy und Bundesaußenminister Scheel — Fotos: DPA

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 18,4 — lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Iserlohner Kreisanzeiger, Iserlohn
vom 17. April 1971

Senator Kennedy in Bonn

Gedankenaustausch über Truppenabzug / Galakonzert für „Snobs"

Bonn. (dpa) Die Stärke amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik stand im Mittelpunkt der Gespräche, die der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy (Foto) am Freitag mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und Bundesaußenminister Scheel in Bonn führte. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten amerikanischen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hielt sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan und etwa 40 millionenschweren Amerikanern zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonn auf.

Während Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred bei einem Vormittagsempfang im Park-Bungalow des Palais Schaumburg die prominentesten amerikanischen Gäste bewirteten, führten Ehmke und Kennedy im Bundeskanzleramt einen „Gedankenaustausch". Ehmke sagte nach dem Gespräch, es sei bekannt, daß es nach Kennedys Meinung auf lange Sicht eine gewisse Reduzierung der amerikanischen Truppen in Europa geben werde. Der Schwerpunkt dieser Diskussionen liegt nach Worten Ehmkes „in der Frage, wenn überhaupt, dann wieviel?"

Für das Galakonzert am Freitagabend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle hatte die Prominenz aus Politik, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft Karten zwischen 25 und 150 Mark gekauft. Der Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, David Rockefeller jun., ist allerdings etwas über die hohen Eintrittspreise verstimmt. In Bonn, meinte Rockefeller, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man „zu jedem Preis bereit" sei.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 17,8 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Pirmasenser Zeitung, Pirmasens
vom 17. April 1971

Ted Kennedy in Bonn

Bonn (dpa) - Die Stärke amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik stand im Mittelpunkt der Gespräche, die der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy am Freitag mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke und Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel führte. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten amerikanischen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hält sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan und etwa 40-Millionenschweren Amerikanern zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonn auf.

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 32,7 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Pforzheimer Zeitung, Pforzheim
vom 17. April 1971

Die Woche in Bonn

Alles oder nichts für Barzel

Bonns größtes Spektakulum — Jet-Set aus Boston

Von dmt-Korrespondent Alexander W. Porr

BONN. Für Rainer Candidus Barzel geht es jetzt um alles oder nichts. Denn in diesen Wochen entscheidet sich, ob der langjährige CDU/CSU-Fraktionsvorsitzende im Bundestag das Traumziel seiner politischen Karriere erreicht: Erster Mann seiner Partei zu werden! Barzel kämpft dafür mit der ihm eigenen Zähigkeit und Entschlossenheit. Während alle anderen Bonner Politiker sich einige Tage Osterurlaub genehmigten, sich der Familie widmeten oder ihre Steckenpferdchen ritten, absolvierte Rainer Barzel einen hochpolitischen Besuch in den USA.

Seine Frau Kriemhild („Timmchen") mußte die Osterfeiertage allein im Familienbungalow in Bad Godesberg verbringen. Ihr Mann hatte sich schon am Samstag vor dem Fest auf den Weg gemacht. Die Feiertage selbst verbrachte er in Nassau auf den Bahamas, nicht als sonnenhungriger und badevergnügter Tourist, sondern in geradezu asketischer Klausur. Er bereitete sich auf die Reise in die USA, vor allem auf die Zusammenkunft mit Präsident Nixon vor und feilte an einer Rede, die er in New York vor dem „Council of Foreign Relations" zu halten hatte.

Der große Schweiger . . .

Was Barzels Freunde so verbittert, ist, daß Gerhard Schröder, nach jahrelangem Schweigen und absoluter Zurückhaltung urplötzlich als Konkurrent im Kampf um die Nominierung zum CDU-Kanzler-Kandidaten in die Arena sprang, in der sich, gemessen an den bisherigen Mitbewerbern Rainer Barzel schon als der sichere Sieger fühlen konnte. Nun, der große Schweiger schweigt nicht mehr. Barzel ist, wie man so treffend zu sagen pflegt, „echt sauer". Und in Bonn macht die Behauptung die Runde, Barzel habe „im privaten Kreis" schon gedroht: „Wenn mich der Parteitag in Saarbrücken nicht zum CDU-Kanzlerkandidaten wählt, lege ich den Fraktionsvorsitz im Bundestag nieder!"

Jongleur der Kanzler-Aspiranten

Rainer Barzel, der es jetzt wissen will, verzichtete nicht nur auf ein beschauliches Osterfest, er verkniff sich auch, so rechtzeitig wieder aus den USA zurück zu sein, um an einem Ereignis teilzunehmen, von dem zu sagen ist, daß es sich um ein in Bonn bisher nicht erlebtes Spektakulum handelt. 40 amerikanische Millionäre, unter ihnen Edward und Joan Kennedy, begleiteten das Bostoner Philharmonische Orchester, das am Freitagabend in der Beethovenhalle ein Konzert gab. Joan Kennedy rezitierte dabei den Text zu Prokofieffs Märchen „Peter und der Wolf".

Empfang im Bungalow

Bundesaußenminister und Vizekanzler Walter Scheel hatte am Mittag für den „Jet-Set" aus den USA einen Empfang im Kanzler-Bungalow gegeben, stellvertretend für den Regierungschef Willy Brandt, der erst am Wochenende vom Gardasee zurückkehrt. Der „liebenswürdige Herr Scheel" entledigte sich dieser Aufgabe selbstredend mit Charme, Routine und Eleganz. Der FDP-Vorsitzende gehört nun einmal zu den perfektesten Könnern auf dem Parkett der Bonner Gesellschaft.

Erstaunliches — und für viele deutsche Mutterherzen Betrübliches — wußten Journalisten zu berichten, die zur Ankunft der illustren amerikanischen Reisegesellschaft auf den Köln/Bonner Flughafen geeilt waren. Während sich Fotografen, Kameramänner und Schaulustige um die High Society aus Boston drängten, saß Publikumsliebling Heintje, von niemandem beachtet und von keinem einzigen Blitzlicht gewürdigt, im Warteraum. Am Sonntag nun trifft auf diesem Flughafen Rainer Barzel ein. Bleibt die Frage: Wie wird man ihn empfangen?

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 52,3 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Offenbach-Post, Offenbach
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 165,5 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Saarbrücker Zeitung, Saarbrücken
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 173,5 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Westfälische, Bielefeld
vom 17. April 1971

EDWARD KENNEDY, amerikanischer Senator, hält sich gegenwärtig mit seiner Frau Joan in Bonn auf. Seine Frau trat gestern abend in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle in einem Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" auf. Gestern vormittag wurde der demokratische Senator von Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke zu einem Informationsgespräch empfangen.

Senator Kennedy sprach mit Scheel und Ehmke

Bonn – Zu getrennten Gesprächen traf der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy (Bild) gestern in Bonn mit Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel und Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke zusammen. Der demokratische Politiker hält sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan in der Bundeshauptstadt auf, die gestern abend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle in einem Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" auftrat. (upi)

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 25,1 — lt. „Leitfaden 19 0 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Cellesche Zeitung, Celle
vom 17. April 1971

Kennedy bei Ehmke und Scheel

Bonn (dpa). — Die Stärke amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik stand im Mittelpunkt der Gespräche, die der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy gestern mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke und Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel führte. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten amerikanischen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hält sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan und etwa 40 millionen-schweren Amerikanern zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonn auf.

KANZLERAMTSMINISTER EHMKE hat am Freitagvormittag den amerikanischen Senator Edward Kennedy zu einem Informationsgespräch empfangen. Der demokratische Senator hält sich gegenwärtig mit seiner Frau Joan in Bonn auf, die am Freitagabend in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle in einem Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" auftritt. Telefoto: SZ/AP

166

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (l. Ts.): 51,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Schwäbische Donau-Zeitung, Ulm

vom 17. April 1971

59

Kennedy bei Leberkäs und Münchner Bier

Senator Edward und Frau Joan machten eine Stippvisite am Rhein - Am Rande ein politisches Gespräch

3

Von unserem Redaktionsmitglied Claus Dreher

Ein Gastkonzert der Bostoner Symphoniker (Dirigent Arthur Fiedler) in der Bonner Beethovenhalle lockte amerikanische High-Society an den Rhein, zumal Joan Kennedy den Text zu Prokoffieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" sprach.

„Wie heißt der nächste Präsident der USA?" wurde Edward Kennedy, umstrittener Senator und letzter Überlebender des Clans der Kennedy-Brothers, despektierlich gefragt. Edward, mit langem Haar, in einem zerknitterten Anzug, Kerzenwachs auf der Schulter, lächelt nur kurz, ein wenig verlegen, linkisch: „Überlegen Sie, wer der nächste Präsident ist", sagt er, und sieht zu, wie er die Würstchen los wird, die er auf dem Teller schon gut zehn Minuten vor sich her trägt. Versonnen wirkt er auf der Terrasse des Kanzler-Bungalows, unsicher, möchte man meinen.

Und dabei wird er vor allem von den Damen der High-Society, die Außenminister Walter Scheel nebst Ehegatten zu diesem sogenannten Sektfrühstück in den Kanzler-Bungalow eingeladen hat, förmlich angehimmelt. „Ach schauen Sie nur, ganz der Bruder", lispelt eine seidenbestickte Dame so um die Sechzig. Sie schiebt sich näher heran, erhascht ein Lächeln aus den blauen Augen des letzten Kennedy dieser Generation. Und ist restlos glücklich.

In der Tat: Noch am Vortag, als das Boston-Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des humorvollen Dirigenten Fiedler, der in Berlin studiert hat und 1915 nach Amerika ausgewandert ist, im Bonner Rathaus empfangen wurde, war von Edward Kennedy nicht die Rede; nur davon, daß seine Frau Joan am Abend darauf in der Bonner Beethovenhalle den Text zu Prokoffieffs „Peter und der Wolf" sprechen werde.

Fiedler, fidel in allen Lebenslagen („Ach, wissen Sie, ich finde die Beethoven nachempfundene Schallplatte ‚Song of joy' sehr gut, auch wenn ich sie ein wenig anders arrangiert hätte"), ist ein Feuerwehrfan und zeigte sowohl im Bonner Rathaus als auch im Kanzler-Bungalow stolz seinen neuen Feuerwehrhelm, den er gerade in Bonn geschenkt bekam.

Er hat keinen Lieblingskomponisten, sagt er, ein wenig schrullig, noch nicht einmal eine Lieblingssymphonie, fügt er ein wenig amerikanisch hinzu. „Die Symphonie, die ich am Abend zuvor gespielt habe, ist mir jeweils die liebste."

Das Büfett im Kanzler-Bungalow war nach dem Motto angelegt: Die Kultur fängt erst dort an, wo Kartoffelsalat warm angemacht wird, also südlich des Mains. Man trank neben dem obligaten Whisky vor allem Münchner Bier, aß Leberkäs und Laugenbrezeln, delikate Salate und was immer aus dem Süden des Landes an Leckerem geboten wird.

Man trank und aß zunächst ohne die Kennedys. „Nur" Außenminister Walter Scheel und Frau Mildred widmeten sich den Gästen. Sie in Midi-Gelb.

Derweilen parlierten Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke und Senator Kennedy im Kanzleramt. „Tour d'Horizont" kommentierte Ehmke hernach den politischen Inhalt des längeren Gesprächs. Was soviel sagen will: Ich sage nichts, wir haben über alles und jeden gesprochen.

Was er denn davon halte, daß Oppositionschef Barzel beruhigter aus Amerika zurückkehre, als er hingefahren sei, wollte ich von Ehmke wissen, jetzt, da doch ein Stück Amerika gerade in Bonn hospitiere. Der Kanzleramtsminister murmelte vor sich hin. Man meinte so etwas wie „Hysterie" zu hören und erhielt alsbald die offizielle Beurteilung: „Wenn Herr Barzel zur Beruhigung extra nach Amerika fahren muß, so zeigt das nur, wie aufgeregt er ist."

Das waren Randgespräche auf der Terrasse des Bungalows im Kanzlerpark, der einmal für teures Geld vom Münchner Architekten Sepp Ruf für Ludwig Erhard gebaut wurde und jetzt so eine Art Gasthaus für Prominente geworden ist. (Auch König Bauduin und Königin Fabiola sollen Ende des Monats dort wohnen.) Edward Kennedy war zu seinem Ärger stets von vielen Fotografen umlagert, lauschte dem Venusberg-Englisch des Außenministers („Let's go in the bright side of sun") und weigerte sich beharrlich, einen Hund anzufassen. Bonns Klatsch-Tante Number one, Evi Keil, hatte sich nämlich eine Image-Aufbesserung angedeihen lassen und einen winzig kleinen Yorkshire-Hund statt Handtasche mitgebracht: „Napoleon".

Bis dato war Joan Kennedy noch nicht im Kanzler-Etablissement eingetroffen. Sie käme gar nicht, sagte Minister Scheel. Sie käme sehr wohl, sagte Ehemann Edward. Und siehe da: sie kam. In hellem blauen Hosenanzug mit gleichfarbenem Mantel und dunkelblauem Rollkragenpulli. Sie strahlte aus ihren Sommersprossen und lächelte über den Bericht einer auflagenstarken Hamburger Zeitung, wonach sie am selben Abend in Hot Pants in der Bonner Beethovenhalle auftreten werde. „Meine Frau kann Hot Pants sehr gut tragen", sagte Edward.

Senator Edward Kennedy, Mildred Scheel, Joan Kennedy, Außenminister Walter Scheel vor dem Kanzler-Bungalow in Bonn: „Ach, schauen Sie nur, ganz der Bruder" Funkbild: dpa/UPI

sako

Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172

Information aus:

OBERÖSTERR. NACHRICHTEN

Linz

Datum 19. April 1971

Senator und Wahrsagerin

DER EUROPA BESUCHENDE amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy wurde bei einem Empfang in der Bundesrepublik mit der deutschen Wahrsagerin Buchela bekanntgemacht. Ihr durchdringender Blick war offenbar für ihn eine Warnung, denn er versicherte nachher, daß er sich keinesfalls als Präsidentschaftskandidat bewerben will. Damit entspricht er auch einem Wunsche seiner musischen Frau Joan, deren Beethovenhallen-Auftritt in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" ein gesellschaftliches Ereignis für Bonn war. Telephoto: OÖN/AP

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (l. Ts.): 11,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –

Ausschnitt aus:

Segeberger Zeitung, Bad Segeberg

vom 17. April 1971

3

Senator Kennedy bei Scheel und Ehmke in Bonn

Bonn (dpa). Die Stärke amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik stand im Mittelpunkt der Gespräche, die der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy gestern mit Kanzleramtsminister Prof. Ehmke und Bundesaußenminister Scheel führte.

Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hält sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan und etwa 40 Millionen-schweren Amerikanern zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonn auf.

Während Bundesaußenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred bei einem Vormittagsempfang im Park-Bungalow des Palais Schaumburg die prominentesten amerikanischen Gäste bewirteten, führten Ehmke und Kennedy im Bundeskanzleramt einen Gedankenaustausch.

Ehmke sagte nach dem Gespräch in einem Interview, es sei bekannt, daß es nach Kennedys Meinung auf lange Sicht eine gewisse Reduzierung der amerikanischen Truppen in Europa geben werde. Der Schwerpunkt dieser Diskussionen liegt nach Worten Ehmkes in der Frage: „Wenn überhaupt, wieviel?"

Für das Galakonzert gestern abend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle hatte die Prominenz aus Politik, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft Karten zwischen 25 und 150 Mark gekauft.

467

3/28

Joan Kennedy in Deutschland

Warum ihre heißen Höschen im Koffer blieben

Die hübsche Kennedy-Frau enttäuschte in Bonn und Hamburg nicht nur wegen Übermüdung

Auf eigenen Partys glänzt sie in heißen Hosen – in Deutschland trug die blonde Joan Kennedy „lang"

Für diesen Anblick griffen reiche Bonner tief in die Tasche: Joan Kennedy und Dirigent Fiedler, Stars in „Peter und der Wolf"

„Ich mag Joan in ‚Hot Pants'", sagte Edward Kennedy, hier im Gespräch mit NEUE REVUE-Redakteurin Inge Schmidt

Strahlender Mittelpunkt einer Bonner Gala-Nacht bei Sekt und belegten Brötchen für 150 Mark: Von Verehrern belagert, klatscht die schöne Joan nach eigenem Auftritt Beifall für die „Bostoner"

Statt heißer Höschen lieferte sie Diskussionsstoff: Mit mehr als zwei Stunden Verspätung kam Joan Kennedy zum Scheel-Empfang. Ehemann Edward rief sie per Telefon zur Ordnung

Ein Bericht von Inge Schmidt, Fotos: Wolfgang Bera

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 2057,8 – lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –

Ausschnitt aus: Neue Revue, Hamburg

vom -2. Mai 1971

Mit Super-Minis, in heißen und ledernen Höschen schockiert sie seit langem die amerikanische Prominenz. Als die schönste der Kennedy-Frauen, Joan (33), jetzt nach Deutschland kam, blieben die drei mitgebrachten „Hot Pants" im Koffer – sehr zum Ärger ihrer Bewunderer.

Dafür schockierte Joan die Hamburger und Bonner Prominenz durch ständige Abwesenheit und Verspätung. Als Freundin, Förderin und Solistin des berühmten Bostoner Symphonieorchesters war sie extra von Amerika nach Bonn gereist. Tatsächlich verschlief die Senators-Gattin ihren Deutschland-Aufenthalt: Wegen Müdigkeit „schmiß" sie (trotz Zusage) den Gala-Empfang der „Bostoner" in Hamburg. Die geladenen Gäste warteten vergeblich. Über eine Stunde mußte sich der Oberbürgermeister von Bonn gedulden, weil Joan Kennedy sich im Kölner Dom und beim privaten Essen verplauderte und später in der Badewanne die Zeit vergaß. Und selbst Außenminister Scheel und Gattin Mildred warteten lange und verärgert auf die hübsche Joan, die lieber ausschlief, als auf der ersten Garten-Party im Kanzler-Bungalow in Bonn zu erscheinen. Erst als der inzwischen angereiste Ehemann Edward (36) per Telefon ein Machtwort sprach, erschien Joan – kaum frisiert, verschlafen, verlegen, nach Party-Ende. Den Ministerpräsidenten von Rheinland-Pfalz, Dr. Kohl, konnte beim Empfang im Bahnhof Rolandseck schließlich nur noch ein verspäteter Edward Kennedy versöhnen: Für zehn Minuten schaute er vorbei, während Ehefrau Joan sich barfuß und aufgeregt beim Friseur für den Abend verschönern ließ.

„Bei dieser Hitze würde ich am liebsten in ‚Hot Pants' durch Bonn spazieren", hatte die hübsche Kennedy-Frau bei ihrer Ankunft am Rhein noch verkündet. Doch auch in Sachen „heiße Höschen" hatte sie zuviel versprochen – ihr Anblick fiel wegen Müdigkeit aus. „Meine Frau hat drei Paar im Koffer. Sie trägt sie gern – und ich mag sie sehr darin", verriet Ehemann Ted NEUE REVUE. Statt heißer trug Joan jedoch nur lange Hosen im Jeans-Look – und auf dem Höhepunkt der Reise eine hübsche Stimme zur Schau. Beim Gala-Wohltätigkeitskonzert der „Boston Pops" glänzte sie als „Märchenfee" mit dem Text zu „Peter und der Wolf". „Ich lese es wie eine Gutenachtgeschichte für meine Kinder", hatte sie dem Star-Dirigenten und Kennedy-Freund Arthur Fiedler (77) verraten. Ehemann Edward, der anreiste, um seine Frau zu bewundern, lobte denn auch: „Du warst großartig, Darling." Die verliebten Blicke zwischen Joan und Ted Kennedy ließen später Verärgerung und auch Scheidungsgerüchte schmelzen. Schwärmte der Senator, der von Politik und Wahlkämpfen nichts wissen wollte: „Jetzt ganz privat mit Joan bei Rheinwein oder Münchner Bier – das wäre eine herrliche Sache." ■

argus
Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 2057,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Revue, Hamburg
vom -2. Mai 1971

Joan Kennedy in Deutschland

Warum ihre heißen Höschen im Koffer blieben

Die hübsche Kennedy-Frau enttäuschte in Bonn und Hamburg nicht nur wegen Übermüdung

Auf eigenen Partys glänzt sie in heißen Hosen – in Deutschland trug die blonde Joan Kennedy „lang"

Für diesen Anblick griffen reiche Bonner tief in die Tasche: Joan Kennedy und Dirigent Fiedler, Stars in „Peter und der Wolf"

„Ich mag Joan in ‚Hot Pants'", sagte Edward Kennedy, hier im Gespräch mit NEUE REVUE-Redakteurin Inge Schmidt

Strahlender Mittelpunkt einer Bonner Gala-Nacht bei Sekt und belegten Brötchen für 150 Mark: Von Verehrern belagert, klatscht die schöne Joan nach eigenem Auftritt Beifall für die „Bostoner"

Statt heißer Höschen lieferte sie Diskussionsstoff: Mit mehr als zwei Stunden Verspätung kam Joan Kennedy zum Scheel-Empfang. Ehemann Edward rief sie per Telefon zur Ordnung

Ein Bericht von Inge Schmidt,
Fotos: Wolfgang Bera

Mit Super-Minis, in heißen und ledernen Höschen schockiert sie seit langem die amerikanische Prominenz. Als die schönste der Kennedy-Frauen, Joan (33), jetzt nach Deutschland kam, blieben die drei mitgebrachten „Hot Pants" im Koffer – sehr zum Ärger ihrer Bewunderer.

Dafür schockierte Joan die Hamburger und Bonner Prominenz durch ständige Abwesenheit und Verspätung. Als Freundin, Förderin und Solistin des berühmten Bostoner Symphonieorchesters war sie extra von Amerika nach Bonn gereist. Tatsächlich verschlief die Senators-Gattin ihren Deutschland-Aufenthalt: Wegen Müdigkeit „schmiß" sie (trotz Zusage) den Gala-Empfang der „Bostoner" in Hamburg. Die geladenen Gäste warteten vergeblich. Über eine Stunde mußte sich der Oberbürgermeister von Bonn gedulden, weil Joan Kennedy sich im Kölner Dom und beim privaten Essen verplauderte und später in der Badewanne die Zeit vergaß. Und selbst Außenminister Scheel und Gattin Mildred warteten lange und verärgert auf die hübsche Joan, die lieber ausschlief, als auf der ersten Garten-Party im Kanzler-Bungalow in Bonn zu erscheinen. Erst als der inzwischen angereiste Ehemann Edward (36) per Telefon ein Machtwort sprach, erschien Joan – kaum frisiert, verschlafen, verlegen, nach Party-Ende. Den Ministerpräsidenten von Rheinland-Pfalz, Dr. Kohl, konnte beim Empfang im Bahnhof Rolandseck schließlich nur noch ein verspäteter Edward Kennedy versöhnen: Für zehn Minuten schaute er vorbei, während Ehefrau Joan sich barfuß und aufgeregt beim Friseur für den Abend verschönern ließ.

„Bei dieser Hitze würde ich am liebsten in ‚Hot Pants' durch Bonn spazieren", hatte die hübsche Kennedy-Frau bei ihrer Ankunft am Rhein noch verkündet. Doch auch in Sachen „heiße Höschen" hatte sie zuviel versprochen – ihr Anblick fiel wegen Müdigkeit aus. „Meine Frau hat drei Paar im Koffer. Sie trägt sie gern – und ich mag sie sehr darin", verriet Ehemann Ted NEUE REVUE. Statt heißer trug Joan jedoch nur lange Hosen im Jeans-Look – und auf dem Höhepunkt der Reise eine hübsche Stimme zur Schau. Beim Gala-Wohltätigkeitskonzert der „Boston Pops" glänzte sie als „Märchenfee" mit dem Text zu „Peter und der Wolf". „Ich lese es wie eine Gutenachtgeschichte für meine Kinder", hatte sie dem Star-Dirigenten und Kennedy-Freund Arthur Fiedler (77) verraten. Ehemann Edward, der anreiste, um seine Frau zu bewundern, lobte denn auch: „Du warst großartig, Darling." Die verliebten Blicke zwischen Joan und Ted Kennedy ließen später Verärgerung und auch Scheidungsgerüchte schmelzen. Schwärmte der Senator, der von Politik und Wahlkämpfen nichts wissen wollte: „Jetzt ganz privat mit Joan bei Rheinwein oder Münchner Bier – das wäre eine herrliche Sache." ■

168

Ted und Joan Kennedy: Gastspiel am Rhein

Zwei Tage lang drehte sich in Bonn alles um sie: Joan Kennedy, 34, die Frau des US-Senators für den Staat Massachusetts, und Edward „Ted" Kennedy, 39 (große Bilder). Joan kam als Künstlerin, der Senator offiziell, weil er sich um seine Frau kümmern wollte — inoffiziell, um politische Gespräche zu führen. Daß Joan Kennedy mit einstündiger Verspätung vor dem alten Bonner Rathaus erschien, wo Oberbürgermeister Peter Krämer sie begrüßte (links), nahm ihr die Bonner Prominenz nicht krumm: „Einer so schönen und charmanten Frau kann man nicht zürnen!" sagte man.

Neu für Deutschland: Sinfoniekonzert mit Essen. Rund 900 prominente Gäste in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle genossen beides: Das Musikprogramm des Boston Popular Symphony Orchestra — und Sandwiches, zu denen Wein und Sekt gereicht wurden. Nach der Egmont-Ouvertüre von Beethoven und dem Klavierkonzert Nr. 1 von Tschaikowski trat eine Pause ein — und dann kam sie, deren Auftritt das verwöhnte Publikum entgegengefiebert hatte: Joan Kennedy. Sie hatte den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" von Serge Prokofjew übernommen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 1998,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Bunte Deutsche Illustrierte, Offenburg
vom 27. April 19..

Auf den Hund brachte Kanzleramts-minister Horst Ehmke das Gespräch. Genau gesagt: auf einen drei Monate alten Yorkshire-Terrier mit Namen Napoleon. Ted amüsierte sich (Bild oben) — aber nur kurz. Dann ging er zielstrebig zur Politik über. Die weiblichen Teilnehmer an diesem Empfang: „Ted sieht ja toll aus!“

seiner großen
einen tokollchef, ann, chen Kost-ller
zigster.“

FOTOS: ULI SKORUPPA

Politische Töne brachte Ted Kennedy ins Gastspiel am Rhein. Der fröhlichen Begrüßung durch Außenminister Walter Scheel und dessen Frau Mildred im Kanzler-Bungalow (Bild oben) folgte ein ernstes Gespräch. Es ging um Berlin (Kennedy: „Die Lebensfähigkeit Berlins darf nicht eingeschränkt werden“), die amerikanischen Truppen in der Bundesrepublik und um das Thema, das die ganze Welt interessierte: US-Tischtennisspieler in China.

„Ich finde die Bilder wunderbar! Schade, daß ich den Bericht nicht lesen kann!“ schwärmte Joan Kennedy auf der Fahrt vom Flughafen Köln-Bonn ins Hotel. Das Kanzleramt hatte ihr zum Empfang die neueste Ausgabe der BUNTEN überreichen lassen, mit Joan und Ted auf dem Titel und einem Farbbericht über die Familie Kennedy. Stolz zeigte sie die BUNTE Arthur Fiedler (Bild), dem Dirigenten des Bostoner Sinfonieorchesters.

Auf den Hund brachte Kanzleramts-minister Horst Ehmke das Gespräch. Genau gesagt: auf einen drei Monate alten Yorkshire-Terrier mit Namen Napoleon. Ted amüsierte sich (Bild oben) — aber nur kurz. Dann ging er zielstrebig zur Politik über. Die weiblichen Teilnehmer an diesem Empfang: „Ted sieht ja toll aus!“

seiner großen
einen okollchef, ann,
chen Kostdler zigster.“

FOTOS: ULI SKORUPPA

Politische Töne brachte Ted Kennedy ins Gastspiel am Rhein. Der fröhlichen Begrüßung durch Außenminister Walter Scheel und dessen Frau Mildred im Kanzler-Bungalow (Bild oben) folgte ein ernstes Gespräch. Es ging um Berlin (Kennedy: „Die Lebensfähigkeit Berlins darf nicht eingeschränkt werden“), die amerikanischen Truppen in der Bundesrepublik und um das Thema, das die ganze Welt interessierte: US-Tischtennisspieler in China.

„Ich finde die Bilder wunderbar! Schade, daß ich den Bericht nicht lesen kann!“ schwärmte Joan Kennedy auf der Fahrt vom Flughafen Köln-Bonn ins Hotel. Das Kanzleramt hatte ihr zum Empfang die neueste Ausgabe der BUNTEN überreichen lassen, mit Joan und Ted auf dem Titel und einem Farbbericht über die Familie Kennedy. Stolz zeigte sie die BUNTE Arthur Fiedler (Bild), dem Dirigenten des Bostoner Sinfonieorchesters.

168

Auf den Hund brachte Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke das Gespräch. Genau gesagt: auf einen drei Monate alten Yorkshire-Terrier mit Namen Napoleon. Ted amüsierte sich (Bild oben) — aber nur kurz. Dann ging er zielstrebig zur Politik über. Die weiblichen Teilnehmer an diesem Empfang: „Ted sieht ja toll aus!“

Der berühmte Dirigent Fiedler ist ein Feuerwehr-Fan. Sein liebstes Stück: ein altes Feuerwehrauto. In Bonn wurde er von einer Feuerwehrkapelle empfangen. Und nachdem er sie dirigiert hatte (rechtes Bild), überreichte ihm der Kapellmeister einen Feuerwehrhelm (o. links). Zu seiner großen Freude erhielt er später noch einen zweiten Helm. Der Bonner Protokollchef, Botschafter Dr. Hans Schwarzmann, überraschte ihn mit einer historischen Kostbarkeit aus dem Jahre 1906. Fiedler (links Mitte): „Mein fünfundachtzigster.“

FOTOS: ULI SKORUPPA

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 1998,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Bunte Deutsche Illustrierte, Offenburg
vom 27. April 19

Auf den Hund brachte Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke das Gespräch. Genau gesagt: auf einen drei Monate alten Yorkshire-Terrier mit Namen Napoleon. Ted amüsierte sich (Bild oben) — aber nur kurz. Dann ging er zielstrebig zur Politik über. Die weiblichen Teilnehmer an diesem Empfang: „Ted sieht ja toll aus!"

Der berühmte Dirigent Fiedler ist ein Feuerwehr-Fan. Sein liebstes Stück: ein altes Feuerwehrauto. In Bonn wurde er von einer Feuerwehrkapelle empfangen. Und nachdem er sie dirigiert hatte (rechtes Bild), überreichte ihm der Kapellmeister einen Feuerwehrhelm (o. links). Zu seiner großen Freude erhielt er später noch einen zweiten Helm. Der Bonner Protokollchef, Botschafter Dr. Hans Schwarzmann, überraschte ihn mit einer historischen Kostbarkeit aus dem Jahre 1906. Fiedler (links Mitte): „Mein fünfundachtzigster."

FOTOS: ULI SKORUPPA

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 1998,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Bunte Deutsche Illustrierte, Offenburg
vom 27. April 19

Der berühmte Dirigent Fiedler ist ein Feuerwehr-Fan. Sein liebstes Stück: ein altes Feuerwehrauto. In Bonn wurde er von einer Feuerwehrkapelle empfangen. Und nachdem er sie dirigiert hatte (rechtes Bild), überreichte ihm der Kapellmeister einen Feuerwehrhelm (o. links). Zu seiner großen Freude erhielt er später noch einen zweiten Helm. Der Bonner Protokollchef, Botschafter Dr. Hans Schwarzmann, überraschte ihn mit einer historischen Kostbarkeit aus dem Jahre 1906. Fiedler (links Mitte): „Mein fünfundachtzigster."

Auf den Hund brachte Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke das Gespräch. Genau gesagt: auf einen drei Monate alten Yorkshire-Terrier mit Namen Napoleon. Ted amüsierte sich (Bild oben) — aber nur kurz. Dann ging er zielstrebig zur Politik über. Die weiblichen Teilnehmer an diesem Empfang: „Ted sieht ja toll aus!"

FOTOS: ULI SKORUPPA

argus
Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 1998,3
— lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Bunte Deutsche Illustrierte, Offenburg
vom 27. April 19

Auf den Hund brachte Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke das Gespräch. Genau gesagt: auf einen drei Monate alten Yorkshire-Terrier mit Namen Napoleon. Ted amüsierte sich (Bild oben) — aber nur kurz. Dann ging er zielstrebig zur Politik über. Die weiblichen Teilnehmer an diesem Empfang: „Ted sieht ja toll aus!“

Der berühmte Dirigent Fiedler ist ein Feuerwehr-Fan. Sein liebstes Stück: ein altes Feuerwehrauto. In Bonn wurde er von einer Feuerwehrkapelle empfangen. Und nachdem er sie dirigiert hatte (rechtes Bild), überreichte ihm der Kapellmeister einen Feuerwehrhelm (o. links). Zu seiner großen Freude erhielt er später noch einen zweiten Helm. Der Bonner Protokollchef, Botschafter Dr. Hans Schwarzmann, überraschte ihn mit einer historischen Kostbarkeit aus dem Jahre 1906. Fiedler (links Mitte): „Mein fünfundachtzigster.“

FOTOS: ULI SKORUPPA

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 1998,3
— lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Bunte Deutsche Illustrierte, Offenburg
vom 27. April 19

Die Tragödie des Hundes Titus:

Ein treuer Freund bis in den Tod

In den französischen Alpen rettete er seinen Herrn und ging selber zugrunde ...

Die Tragödie des Hundes Titus:

Ein treuer Freund bis in den Tod

In den französischen Alpen rettete er seinen Herrn und ging selber zugrunde ...

165

81280

Politische Töne bra
Kennedy ins Gastsp
Rhein. Der fröhli
ßung durch Außer
Walter Scheel und
Mildred im Kanz
Bungalow (Bild ein ernstes Gesp
Es ging um Ber
„Die Lebensfäh
Berlins darf nic werden"), die nischen Trupp desrepublik u Thema, das d interessierte:
spieler in Ch

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 1998,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Bunte Deutsche Illustrierte, Offenburg
vom 27. April 19

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 1998,3
— lt. „Leitfaden 1970 —

Ausschnitt aus:
Bunte Deutsche Illustrierte, Offenburg

vom 20. April 1971

Was auch geschieht: Nie werden die Kennedys ihr großes Ziel aus den Augen verlieren

Einträchtig marschieren sie am Ufer entlang: Joan, Edward, sein gleichnamiger Sohn, 9, und Cara Anne, 11. Was immer das Familienglück in den vergangenen Jahren überschattet und bedroht haben mag — es ist vergessen. Das ist typisch für den Clan der Kennedys: Die allzumenschlichen Probleme verlieren an Gewicht, wenn es um hohe Ziele geht. Und das hat Ted (links im Wahlkampf) nie aus den Augen verloren: John's Amt für die Kennedys zurückzuerobern.

Strahlende Sonne über dem Strand von Hyannis Port — und doch ein Hauch von Wehmut in diesem Bild: Rose Kennedy, 80 Jahre alt, und Ted, der letzte, der ihr von vier Söhnen geblieben ist. Aber das Leid hat Rose Kennedy nicht gebrochen. Eine Idee beherrscht sie: Ted soll Präsident werden.

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 1998,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Bunte Deutsche Illustrierte, Offenburg

vom 20. April 1971

Was auch geschieht: Nie werden die Kennedys ihr großes Ziel aus den Augen verlieren

Einträchtig marschieren sie am Ufer entlang: Joan, Edward, sein gleichnamiger Sohn, 9, und Cara Anne, 11. Was immer das Familienglück in den vergangenen Jahren überschattet und bedroht haben mag — es ist vergessen. Das ist typisch für den Clan der Kennedys: Die allzumenschlichen Probleme verlieren an Gewicht, wenn es um hohe Ziele geht. Und das hat Ted (links im Wahlkampf) nie aus den Augen verloren: John's Amt für die Kennedys zurückzuerobern.

Strahlende Sonne über dem Strand von Hyannis Port — und doch ein Hauch von Wehmut in diesem Bild: Rose Kennedy, 80 Jahre alt, und Ted, der letzte, der ihr von vier Söhnen geblieben ist. Aber das Leid hat Rose Kennedy nicht gebrochen. Eine Idee beherrscht sie: Ted soll Präsident werden.

che Bericht vom und Niedergang
r Fürstenhäuser
Igor von Percha

rohung:
lem
-
en!

Die zerbrochene KRONE

Die große Exklusiv-Serie

Athen, Frühjahr 1967. Die Bäume und Sträucher des großen Parks um die königliche Residenz Tatoi haben leuchtendes Grün aufgesetzt. Der Posten vor dem Schilderhäuschen an der Zufahrt blinzelt schläfrig in die warme Mittagssonne.

„Meine Mutter kommt am Nachmittag vorbei", sagt König Konstantin I. zu seiner Frau Anne-Marie während des Mittagessens im Speiseraum der Residenz. „Sie will mit mir sprechen."

„Worüber?" fragt Anne-Marie.

Der junge König zuckt mit den Schultern. Das weiß man bei seiner Mutter Friederike nie. Sie meldet sich an oder auch nicht, sie kommt wann sie will, sie spricht worüber sie will — und mit ihr zieht in Tatoi auch stets eine merkwürdig gereizte Atmosphäre ein . . .

Tatoi — das ist mehr eine großbürgerliche Villa als ein königlicher Palast. Anne-Marie hat sie mit bemerkenswerter Zielstrebigkeit und zum Entsetzen ihrer Schwiegermutter Friederike neu eingerichtet. Statt auf kunstvoll geschnitzten Stühlchen aus der Zeit Ludwigs XIV. sitzt man jetzt auf behäbig-soliden dänischen Sesseln; statt auf kostbaren, vor ehrwürdigem Alter zerschlissenen Orientteppichen läuft man auf flauschigweichen Teppichen aus dänischen Webereien.

Anne-Marie empfängt die Schwiegermutter in der Eingangshalle. Sie steht in der typischen Haltung hochschwangerer Frauen da, mit Hohlkreuz und vorgewölbtem Leib.

„Du siehst blaß aus, Pam", sagt Friederike und tätschelt flüchtig Anne-Maries Wange. „Geht's dir nicht gut? Wo ist Tino?"

„Er wartet in seinem Arbeitszimmer."

Auch als Friederike im Arbeitszimmer des Königs verschwindet, scheint sie mit ihrer Anwesenheit ganz Tatoi auszufüllen.

Anne-Marie blickt ihr leicht aufseufzend nach. Sie fühlt sich dieser Frau einfach nicht gewachsen. Sie findet, daß sich ihre Schwiegermutter viel zu sehr in ihr Familienleben einmischt. Daß sie auf Konstantin einen viel zu starken Einfluß ausübt. Daß sie Konstantin zu politischen Entscheidungen zwingt, die nicht immer klug und angebracht sind — und dies zu einer Zeit, da Griechenland, von inneren Wirren zerrissen, mehr denn je auf kluge und weitblickende Entscheidungen angewiesen ist . . .

Anne-Marie ist mit ihrer Meinung nicht allein. Ein Mann aus Konstantins engster Umgebung

Bitte umblättern

Zum Besuch von Mitgliedern der berühmtesten amerikanischen Familie in Deutschland

Für Amerika heute schon eine Legende: Leben und Sterben der ermordeten Brüder John und Robert Kennedy. Für die Kennedys: Ansporn, in ihrem Geist zu kämpfen.

DIE KENNEDYS:

Das Schicksal hat sie nicht bezwungen

Zum Besuch von Mitgliedern der berühmtesten amerikanischen Familie in Deutschland

Für Amerika heute schon eine Legende: Leben und Sterben der ermordeten Brüder John und Robert Kennedy. Für die Kennedys: Ansporn, in ihrem Geist zu kämpfen.

DIE KENNEDYS:

Das Schicksal hat sie nicht bezwungen

Langnese
EISKREM

LA 4/71

Eiskrem essen. Ist das die Möglichkeit!

Zarter Schmelz
mit einem Herz aus

Sie geben niemals auf, und deshalb lächeln sie für die Öffentlichkeit auch dann, wenn ihnen vielleicht nicht danach ums Herz ist — die meistbeachteten Kennedys von heute: Senator Edward Kennedy, 39, seine Frau Joan, 34 (r.), und Roberts Witwe Ethel, 43 (links).

Der jüngste Kennedy im politischen Kampf: „Ich wirke im Geiste meiner Brüder!“

„Dieses Schiff soll im Geiste des Mannes, dessen Namen es führt, dazu beitragen, Frieden und Freiheit zu sichern“, sagte Senator Edward Kennedy, als im Kriegshafen Newport News die „John F. Kennedy“, der größte Flugzeugträger der Welt, in Dienst gestellt wurde (Bild oben). Links neben Edward seine Schwägerin Jackie zwischen ihren Kindern John-John und Caroline, rechts von ihm seine Frau Joan. Im Geiste seiner ermordeten Brüder John und Robert zu wirken, betrachtet Edward, der letzte Kennedy seiner Generation, als seine Lebensaufgabe. Und: seiner Familie den alten Glanz zu erhalten . . .

Kennedy im
pf. „Ich wirke iner Brüder!“

Die Toten bl unvergessen:
Die Familie a Gräbern von
John F. und Ro

Im Wahlkampf ist Edward ganz im echten Kennedy-Element. Und wo er auftaucht, um Reden zu halten, Hände zu schütteln, die Menschen mit Argumenten und mit Gefühlsappellen zu bewegen, daß sie für ihn stimmen — da umdrängen ihn im Nu Massen von Zuhörern. Links: Edward Kennedy in einer Bostoner Straße während des Kampfes um die Wiederwahl als Senator seines Heimatstaates Massachusetts. (Er siegte.) Nicht alle, die um ihn zustammenströmen, sind seine Anhänger. Viele wollen nur einmal einen leibhaftigen Kennedy aus nächster Nähe sehen und ihn berühren: Magie des Namens!

Strahlend winkt Wahlkämpfer Edward Kennedy — bewährte Kennedy-Art, schon dann eine fröhliche Siegerpose einzunehmen, wenn der Erfolg längst noch nicht feststeht. Darin zeigt sich nicht nur die Selbstsicherheit von Menschen, die sich mit größter Selbstverständlichkeit für die geborenen Führer ihrer Nation halten. Es raubt auch dem Gegner mit weniger glanzvollem Namen einiges von seiner Zuversicht . . .
Zweites erprobtes Rezept: „Ich habe die Freude, Ihnen die Menschen vorzustellen, die mir am nächsten stehen und so fühlen und denken wie Sie!“
O. r.: Teds Frau Joan mit Kindern Edward und Cara.

Die Toten ble
unvergessen:
Die Familie an Gräbern von
John F. und Rob

Im Wahlkampf ist Edward ganz im echten Kennedy-Element. Und wo er auftaucht, um Reden zu halten, Hände zu schütteln, die Menschen mit Argumenten und mit Gefühlsappellen zu bewegen, daß sie für ihn stimmen — da umdrängen ihn im Nu Massen von Zuhörern. Links: Edward Kennedy in einer Bostoner Straße während des Kampfes um die Wiederwahl als Senator seines Heimatstaates Massachusetts. (Er siegte.) Nicht alle, die um ihn zustammenströmen, sind seine Anhänger. Viele wollen nur einmal einen leibhaftigen Kennedy aus nächster Nähe sehen und ihn berühren: Magie des Namens!

Strahlend winkt Wahlkämpfer Edward Kennedy — bewährte Kennedy-Art, schon dann eine fröhliche Siegerpose einzunehmen, wenn der Erfolg längst noch nicht feststeht. Darin zeigt sich nicht nur die Selbstsicherheit von Menschen, die sich mit größter Selbstverständlichkeit für die geborenen Führer ihrer Nation halten. Es raubt auch dem Gegner mit weniger glanzvollem Namen einiges von seiner Zuversicht . . . Zweites erprobtes Rezept: „Ich habe die Freude, Ihnen die Menschen vorzustellen, die mir am nächsten stehen und so fühlen und denken wie Sie!“ O. r.: Teds Frau Joan mit Kindern Edward und Cara.

Die Toten bleiben unvergessen: Die Familie an den Gräbern von John F. und Robert

Sie gedenken eines Mannes, den sie liebten und verehrten: die Kennedy-Familie (oberes Bild, rechts) bei einem Gottesdienst für Robert Kennedy auf dem Heldenfriedhof Arlington. Vor dem Grab spricht der New Yorker Kardinal Cooke ein Gebet. Ergriffen beten über 5000 Menschen mit. Das Motto der Gedenkfeier war neben dem Altar zu lesen: „Glücklich sind diejenigen, die im Herrn sterben." Bewegt folgen John-John und seine Schwester Caroline (links: oben und unten)) und ihre Mutter Jacqueline (unten) der Zeremonie. Für sie war die Gedenkmesse besonders schmerzlich: Auch sie haben ihren liebsten Menschen durch ein Attentat verloren.

An diesem Tag übermannte sie der Schmerz: Ethel, die Witwe Roberts, und Joan, die Frau Ted Kennedys, konnten ihre Tränen nicht zurückhalten (unteres Bild: links Joan, rechts Ethel). Gemeinsam mit ihren Kindern Cara Anne und Mary Kathleen singen sie die traditionelle Hymne: „Old Soldiers Never Die — Alte Soldaten sterben nie." Als Zeichen ihrer Zuneigung für den toten Gatten legte Ethel eine Rose auf das Grab Robert Kennedys.

Die Toten bleiben unvergessen: Die Familie an den Gräbern von John F. und Robert

Sie gedenken eines Mannes, den sie liebten und verehrten: die Kennedy-Familie (oberes Bild, rechts) bei einem Gottesdienst für Robert Kennedy auf dem Heldenfriedhof Arlington. Vor dem Grab spricht der New Yorker Kardinal Cooke ein Gebet. Ergriffen beten über 5000 Menschen mit. Das Motto der Gedenkfeier war neben dem Altar zu lesen: „Glücklich sind diejenigen, die im Herrn sterben." Bewegt folgen John-John und seine Schwester Caroline (links: oben und unten)) und ihre Mutter Jacqueline (unten) der Zeremonie. Für sie war die Gedenkmesse besonders schmerzlich: Auch sie haben ihren liebsten Menschen durch ein Attentat verloren.

An diesem Tag übermannte sie der Schmerz: Ethel, die Witwe Roberts, und Joan, die Frau Ted Kennedys, konnten ihre Tränen nicht zurückhalten (unteres Bild: links Joan, rechts Ethel). Gemeinsam mit ihren Kindern Cara Anne und Mary Kathleen singen sie die traditionelle Hymne: „Old Soldiers Never Die — Alte Soldaten sterben nie." Als Zeichen ihrer Zuneigung für den toten Gatten legte Ethel eine Rose auf das Grab Robert Kennedys.

„Mit Musik ins Weiße Haus“: Für ihren Ted gibt Joan 500 Konzerte ne Frau (Bild ihrem Debüt ertpianistin, das sie angenen Oktober großem Erfolg in Philaphia gab. Bis dahin galt Joan als die schüchternste aller Kennedy-Frauen.

Doch nach dem Autounfall ihres Mannes, wobei dessen Sekretärin den Tod fand, hat sie ihre Zurück-haltung aufgegeben. Tapfer stellte sie Seite und heimlich in Dann verp 500 Wohlt zerten im R werbung für

„Mit Musik ins Weiße Haus“: Für ihren Ted gibt Joan 500 Konzerte

INFORMATION OBSCURED

„Mammi“, ine Frau (Bild n ihrem Debüt nzertpianistin, das sie ergangenen Oktober t großem Erfolg in Philadelphia gab. Bis dahin galt Joan als die schüchternste aller Kennedy-Frauen. Doch nach dem Autounfall ihres Mannes, wobei dessen Sekretärin den Tod fand, hat sie ihre Zurückhaltung aufgegeben. Tapfer stellte sie sich an seine Seite und vervollkommnete heimlich ihr Klavierspiel. Dann verpflichtete sie sich zu 500 Wohltätigkeitskonzerten im Rahmen der Wahlwerbung für ihren Mann.

Eine Kennedy als Pianistin des berühmten Bostoner Sinfonieorchesters: Joan bei einem Debussy-Konzert (Bild oben). Mit diesem Orchester und seinem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler gastiert sie in Bonn. Allerdings spielt sie dort nicht Klavier, sondern trägt die Texte von Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf“ vor. Joan, Tochter eines New Yorker Werbefachmanns, hat Musik studiert, ehe sie Ted durch eine seiner Schwestern kennenlernte. Jetzt hilft sie mit, die Kassen seiner Partei zu füllen: Der Reingewinn ihres ersten Auftritts betrug 40 000 Dollar. Getreu dem Wahlspruch „Mit Musik ins Weiße Haus“ hat sie es sich zur Aufgabe gemacht, zum Ansehen ihrer berühmten Familie beizutragen. Links: Joan Kennedy gibt in Boston ein Mozart-Konzert.

„Mit Musik ins Weiße Haus“. Für ihren Ted gibt Joan 500 Konzerte

INFORMATION OBSCURED

„Mammi“, eine Frau (Bild ihrem Debüt zertpianistin, das sie ergangenen Oktober großem Erfolg in Philadelphia gab. Bis dahin galt Joan als die schüchternste aller Kennedy-Frauen. Doch nach dem Autounfall ihres Mannes, wobei dessen Sekretärin den Tod fand, hat sie ihre Zurückhaltung aufgegeben. Tapfer stellte sie sich an seine Seite und vervollkommnete heimlich ihr Klavierspiel. Dann verpflichtete sie sich zu 500 Wohltätigkeitskonzerten im Rahmen der Wahlwerbung für ihren Mann.

Eine Kennedy als Pianistin des berühmten Bostoner Sinfonieorchesters: Joan bei einem Debussy-Konzert (Bild oben). Mit diesem Orchester und seinem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler gastiert sie in Bonn. Allerdings spielt sie dort nicht Klavier, sondern trägt die Texte von Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf“ vor. Joan, Tochter eines New Yorker Werbefachmanns, hat Musik studiert, ehe sie Ted durch eine seiner Schwestern kennenlernte. Jetzt hilft sie mit, die Kassen seiner Partei zu füllen: Der Reingewinn ihres ersten Auftritts betrug 40 000 Dollar. Getreu dem Wahlspruch „Mit Musik ins Weiße Haus“ hat sie es sich zur Aufgabe gemacht, zum Ansehen ihrer berühmten Familie beizutragen. Links: Joan Kennedy gibt in Boston ein Mozart-Konzert.

BLANK PAGE

170

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): o.A.
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Osteroder Kreisanzeiger, Osterode
vom 17. April 1971

Empfang für die Kennedys in Bonn

Geld, Kunst und Politik gaben sich am Freitagmittag im Bonner Bundeskanzleramt ein Stelldichein: Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy, seine hübsche Frau Joan, die Bostoner Symphoniker und eine Reihe dollarschwerer Mitglieder der Bostoner High-Society waren zu einem Empfang von Bundesaußenminister Scheel geladen.

Offizieller Anlaß war ein für den Abend angesetztes Gala-Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Bonner Beethovenhalle mit Werken von Beethoven, Tschaikowsky, Auszügen aus dem Musical „Hair" und dem „St. Louis Blues March".

Im Mittelpunkt des Programms unter der Stabführung von Arthur Fiedler: Die Senatoren-Frau Joan als Rezitatorin in „Peter und der Wolf" von Serge Prokofieff. Joan Kennedy (auf unserem Bild im Gespräch mit Scheel) die bei ähnlichen Gelegenheiten auch schon als Pianistin geglänzt hat, stahl im Bundeskanzleramt natürlich sowohl den Musikern und den die Tournee finanzierenden Landsleuten als auch ihrem Mann (links mit Frau Scheel) die Schau. Und so blieb fast unbeachtet, daß Ted Kennedy mit dem Minister im Kanzleramt, Horst Ehmke, ein längeres Gespräch geführt hatte, von dem beide nachher meinten, es sei „nützlich" gewesen, und anschließend mit Außenminister Walter Scheel zum politischen Meinungsaustausch zusammentraf. Die Kennedys werden Bonn am Sonnabend wieder verlassen und nach London weiterfliegen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 96,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Lübecker Nachrichten, Lübeck
vom 18. April 1971

Kennedy ist immer noch ein Name voller Attraktion. Als jetzt Kanzler-Vize Scheel „zu Ehren amerikanischer Persönlichkeiten, die Bonn anläßlich eines Konzerts des Bostoner Synphonieorchesters besuchen", im Kanzleramt einen Empfang gab, hatte sich ein reich-liches Hundert Prominenter aus Wirtschaft, Kunst und Diplomatie eingefunden, um mehr noch als Bostons ehrwürdiges Orchester die Kennedys zu bewundern. Und mit ihnen über Musik, Beethoven und Bonn zu plaudern. Während Ehmke, derzeitiger Hausherr des Kanzleramtes, „politic talks" mit Edward Kennedy, dem sehr ehrenwerten Senator des Staates Massachusets, führte. „I am glad to see you here", versicherte derweil Walter Scheel der Kennedy-Gattin Joan, die Ehmkes politischen Stündchen offenbar nicht beiwohnen mochte.

Im Palais Schaumburg empfingen gestern Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel (ganz rechts) und seine Frau Mildred (2. v. links) US-Senator Edward Kennedy (ganz links) und dessen Frau Joan (2. von rechts), die am Abend bei einem Gala-Konzert mit den Bostoner Symphonikern unter Arthur Fiedler als Sprecherin in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" mitwirkte.

Edward Kennedy in Bonn

Truppenreduzierungs-Gespräche · Galakonzert mit Snob-Preisen

Bonn, 17. April (dpa)

Die Stärke amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik stand im Mittelpunkt der Gespräche, die der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy gestern mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke und Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel führte. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten amerikanischen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hält sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonn auf.

Während Bundesaußenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred bei einem Vormittagsempfang im Park-Bungalow des Palais Schaumburg die prominenten amerikanischen Gäste bewirteten, führten Ehmke und Kennedy im Bundeskanzleramt einen Gedankenaustausch. Ehmke sagte nach dem Gespräch in einem Interview, es sei bekannt, daß es nach Kennedys Meinung auf lange Sicht eine gewisse Reduzierung der amerikanischen Truppen in Europa geben werde. Der Schwerpunkt dieser Diskussion liegt nach Worten Ehmkes in der Frage, wenn überhaupt, dann wieviel?

Für das Galakonzert gestern abend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle hatte die Prominenz aus Politik, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft Karten zwischen 25 und 150 Mark gekauft. Der Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, David Rockefeller Junior, ist allerdings etwas über die hohen Eintrittspreise verstimmt.

In Bonn, meinte Rockefeller, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man zu jedem Preis bereit sei.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hersfelder Zeitung, Bad Hersfeld
vom 17. April 197

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 186,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Osnabrücker Zeitung, Osnabrück
vom 17. April 1971

Im Park-Bungalow bewirteten am Freitagmittag Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel (rechts) und seine Frau Mildred (zweite von links) prominente Gäste aus den USA: Senator Edward Kennedy (links) und dessen Frau (zweite von rechts). Joan Kennedy sprach am Abend in einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Symphoniker den Text zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf". Die Karten kosteten 25 bis 150 DM. In Gesprächen mit Scheel und Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke erörterte Senator Kennedy unter anderem die Ost- und Berlinpolitik sowie die Stationierung von US-Truppen in Europa.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 116,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Düsseldorfer Nachrichten, Düsseldorf
vom 17. April 1971

Die Bostoner Symphoniker gaben gestern abend in Bonn ein Galakonzert. Aus diesem Anlaß kam auch US-Senator Edward Kennedy, dessen Frau Joan zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" den Text spricht, in die Bundeshauptstadt. Unser Bild zeigt ihn im Gespräch mit dem Ehepaar Scheel, das zu Ehren der amerikanischen Gäste am Nachmittag im Kanzlerbungalow einen Empfang gab. Foto: dpa

172

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 46,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Die Glocke, Oelde/Westf.
vom 17. April 1971

Die Kennedys Gäste der Regierung

Bonn. Senator Edward Kennedy, der sich in Begleitung seiner Frau Joan zu einem privaten Besuch in der Bundesrepublik aufhält, wurde Freitag morgen von Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und Außenminister Scheel zu politischen Gesprächen empfangen. Themen der Aussprache waren neben der Ost- und Berlinpolitik Fragen der Sicherheit und Verteidigung.

Freitag abend waren die Kennedys Mittelpunkt eines Gala-Konzertes, das die Bostoner Symphoniker in der Bonner Beethovenhalle gaben. Joan Kennedy erhielt für ihren Sprechauftritt in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" stürmischen Beifall. Unser Bild zeigt den demokratischen Senator (links) im Gespräch mit Frau Dr. Mildred Scheel. Außenminister Scheel unterhält sich angeregt mit der Frau des amerikanischen Politikers. „Glocke"-Funkbild: dpa

Edward Kennedy

und seine Frau wurden gestern in Bonn von Bundesaußenminister Scheel im Kanzlerbungalow empfangen. Anlaß des Besuchs von Edward Kennedy in Bonn ist ein Galakonzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, bei dem seine Frau Joan auftritt. Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke führte gestern nachmittag mit dem US-Senator ein Gespräch über die Stärke der amerikanischen Truppen in der Bundesrepublik. Unser Bild zeigt von links nach rechts: Kennedy, die Frau des Bundesaußenministers, Mildred Scheel, Joan Kennedy und Scheel. (dpa/upi-Funkbild)

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 151,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hessische Allgemeine, Kassel
vom 17. April 1971

Außenminister Scheel gab Empfang für Senator Kennedy

Bundesaußenminister Scheel gab gestern im Park-Bungalow des Palais Schaumburg in Bonn einen Empfang zu Ehren des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy (links im Bild). In der Mitte Frau Mildred Scheel. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten USA-Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hielt sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in der Bundeshauptstadt auf. In politischen Besprechungen zwischen Scheel und Kennedy wurden unter anderem die Berlin-Frage, die Ostpolitik der Bundesregierung sowie Sicherheits- und Verteidigungsfragen erörtert. Auch der Devisen-Ausgleich für die Stationierung amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik war Thema des Gesprächs zwischen dem Bundesaußenminister und seinem amerikanischen Gast.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 77,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
General-Anzeiger der Stadt Wuppertal, Wuppertal
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 43,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälischer Anzeiger und Kurier, Hamm/Westf.
vom 17. April 1971

In Bonn hat der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy gestern mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und Bundesaußenminister Scheel Gespräche über die deutsch-amerikanischen Beziehungen geführt. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten amerikanischen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy war zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan und etwa 40 millionenschweren Amerikanern nach Bonn gekommen, um dort gestern abend einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker beizuwohnen. — Unser Bild zeigt (von links nach rechts) Edward Kennedy, Frau Mildred Scheel, Frau Joan Kennedy und Minister Scheel.

(dpa-Funkbild)

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 16,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Lüdenscheider Nachrichten, Lüdenscheid
vom 17. April 1971

Vor dem Galakonzert der Bostoner Symphoniker in Bonn, bei dem Joan Kennedy gestern den Text zu „Peter und der Wolf" sprach, waren sie und ihr Mann, Senator Edward Kennedy, Gäste von Außenminister Scheel und seiner Frau im Kanzler-Bungalow. (Siehe Bericht im Innern.)

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 78,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Braunschweiger Zeitung, Braunschweig
vom 17. April 1971

Empfang für die Kennedys in Bonn

Geld, Kunst und Politik gaben sich am Freitagmittag im Bonner Bundeskanzleramt ein Stelldichein: Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy, seine hübsche Frau Joan, die Bostoner Symphoniker und eine Reihe dollarschwerer Mitglieder der Bostoner High-Society waren zu einem Empfang von Bundesaußenminister Scheel geladen.

Offizieller Anlaß war ein für den Abend angesetzes Gala-Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Bonner Beethovenhalle mit Werken von Beethoven, Tschaikowsky, Auszügen aus dem Musical „Hair" und dem „St. Louis Blues March".

Im Mittelpunkt des Programms unter der Stabführung von Arthur Fiedler: Die Senatoren-Frau Joan als Rezitatorin in „Peter und der Wolf" von Serge Prokofieff. Joan Kennedy (auf unserem Bild im Gespräch mit Scheel) die bei ähnlichen Gelegenheiten auch schon als Pianistin geglänzt hat, stahl im Bundeskanzleramt natürlich sowohl den Musikern und den die Tournee finanzierenden Landsleuten als auch ihrem Mann (links mit Frau Scheel) die Schau. Und so blieb fast unbeachtet, daß Ted Kennedy mit dem Minister im Kanzleramt, Horst Ehmke, ein längeres Gespräch geführt hatte, von dem beide nachher meinten, es sei „nützlich" gewesen, und anschließend mit Außenminister Walter Scheel zum politischen Meinungsaustausch zusammentraf. Die Kennedys werden Bonn am Sonnabend wieder verlassen und nach London weiterfliegen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 153,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfälische Nachrichten, Münster
vom 17. April 1971

EINE PARTY gab gestern Außenminister Scheel (rechts) und seine Frau für US-Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau. Offizieller Anlaß war ein für den Abend angesetztes Gala-Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Bonner Beethovenhalle mit Werken von Beethoven, Tschaikowsky und Auszügen aus dem Musical „Hair".

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 261,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ruhr-Nachrichten, Dortmund
17. April 1971

Zu Besuch beim Außenminister

In Bonn waren am Freitag der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy (links, mit Frau Scheel) und dessen Frau Joan (2. von rechts). Kennedy führte auch politische Gespräche mit Scheel. Joan Kennedy trat am selben Abend in einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker als Sprecherin in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" auf. Boston ist die amerikanische Heimatstadt der Familie Kennedy. Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 19,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Grafschafter Nachrichten, Nordhorn
vom 17. April 1971

USA-Senator Edward Kennedy (links) und seine Frau Joan (rechts) werden von Bundesaußenminister Scheel und dessen Frau Mildred im Palais Schaumburg empfangen. dpa-Telebild

USA-Senator Kennedy bei Ehmke und Scheel

Galakonzert im „versnobten" Bonn

dpa Bonn. Die Stärke amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik stand im Mittelpunkt der Gespräche, die der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy gestern mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und Bundesaußenminister Scheel führte. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten amerikanischen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hält sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan und etwa vierzig millionenschweren Amerikanern zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonn auf.

Während Bundesaußenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred bei einem Vormittagsempfang im Park-Bungalows Palais Schaumburg die prominentesten amerikanischen Gäste feierten, führten Ehmke und Kennedy im Bundeskanzleramt einen Gedankenaustausch. Ehmke sagte nach dem Gespräch in einem Interview, es sei bekannt, daß es nach Kennedys Meinung auf lange Sicht eine gewisse Reduzierung der amerikanischen Truppen in Europa geben werde. Der Schwerpunkt dieser Diskussionen liegt nach Ehmkes Worten in der Frage, wenn überhaupt, dann wieviel?

Für das Galakonzert am Freitagabend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle hatte die Prominenz aus Politik, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft Karten zwischen 25 und 150 DM gekauft. Der Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, David Rockefeller Junior, ist allerdings etwas über die hohen Eintrittspreise verstimmt. In Bonn, meinte Rockefeller, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man zu jedem Preis bereit sei.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Pfälzischer Merkur, Zweibrücken
vom 17. April 1971

Die Kennedys vor dem Kanzlerbungalow

Im Kanzlerbungalow empfingen am gestrigen Vormittag Außenminister Scheel und seine Gattin US-Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan. Mrs. Kennedy sprach am Abend bei einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Symphoniker zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" den Text. Senator Kennedy führte im Verlauf des Tages auch ein Gespräch mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke, bevor er am Nachmittag vom rheinland-pfälzischen Ministerpräsidenten Helmut Kohl im Bahnhof Rolandseck begrüßt wurde. Kennedy gab seiner besonderen Freude darüber Ausdruck, mit Dr. Kohl einen noch jungen Politiker zu treffen, denn der Jugend gehöre die Zukunft. Auf unserem Bild von links: Senator Kennedy, Mildred Scheel, Joan Kennedy und Außenminister Scheel.

174

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 8,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Gevelsberger Zeitung, Gevelsberg

vom 17. April 1971

3 281

Außenminister Scheel gab Empfang für Senator Kennedy

Bundesaußenminister Scheel gab gestern im Park-Bungalow des Palais Schaumburg in Bonn einen Empfang zu Ehren des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy (links im Bild). In der Mitte Frau Mildred Scheel. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten USA-Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hielt sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in der Bundeshauptstadt auf. In politischen Besprechungen zwischen Scheel und Kennedy wurden unter anderem die Berlin-Frage, die Ostpolitik der Bundesregierung sowie Sicherheits- und Verteidigungsfragen erörtert. Auch der Devisen-Ausgleich für die Stationierung amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik war Thema des Gesprächs zwischen dem Bundesaußenminister und seinem amerikanischen Gast.

sako

Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172

Information aus:

TIROLER TAGESZEITUNG

Innsbruck Datum 17. April 1971

Der demokratische Senator Edward Kennedy wurde gestern in Bonn von Außenminister Scheel empfangen, der für die Kennedy-Familie ein Essen gab. Kennedy hält sich privat in der Bundesrepublik auf. Seine Frau Joan trat gestern in der Beethoven-Halle in einem Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" auf. („TT"/AP)

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 110,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Allgemeine Zeitung, Mainz

17. April 1971

Nach einem Informationsgespräch mit Kanzleramtsminister H. Ehmke ist der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy (links) am Freitag mit Bundesaußenminister Scheel (rechts) in Bonn zusammengetroffen. Nach Angaben des Auswärtigen Amtes ging es bei der Unterredung sowohl um die Ost- und Berlinpolitik, als auch um Sicherheits- und Verteidigungsfragen sowie um die Stationierung der US-Streitkräfte in der Bundesrepublik. Kennedy hält sich mit seiner Frau Joan (zwischen Scheel und dessen Frau) in Bonn auf, die am Freitagabend in der Beethoven-Halle in einem Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" auftrat.

Funkbild: dpa

argus Seit 1887

– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Recklinghäuser Zeitung, Recklinghausen

vom 17. April 1971

ZU EINEM INFORMATIONSGESPRÄCH empfing gestern Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke den US-Senator Edward Kennedy, der sich mit seiner Frau Joan in Bonn aufhält. Joan Kennedy trat gestern abend in einem Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" in der Beethoven-Halle auf. Zuvor wurde das Ehepaar von Bundesaußenminister Scheel und seiner Gattin empfangen (Bild).

Funkbild: dpa/UPI

Die Bostoner Symphoniker, die aus Anlaß ihres 90jährigen Bestehens gegenwärtig eine Europa-Tournee unternehmen, gaben gestern abend in Bonn ein Galakonzert. Außenminister Walter Scheel und Frau Mildred empfingen am Vormittag im Kanzlerbungalow die Gäste aus den Vereinigten Staaten mit Senator Edward Kennedy und seiner Frau Joan, die zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" den Text spricht.

dpa/UPI-Bildfunk

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 14,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Velberter Zeitung, Velbert

vom 17. April 1971

3 281

Außenminister Scheel gab Empfang für Senator Kennedy

Bundesaußenminister Scheel gab gestern im Park-Bungalow des Palais Schaumburg in Bonn einen Empfang zu Ehren des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy (links im Bild). In der Mitte Frau Mildred Scheel. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten USA-Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hielt sich zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in der Bundeshauptstadt auf. In politischen Besprechungen zwischen Scheel und Kennedy wurden unter anderem die Berlin-Frage, die Ostpolitik der Bundesregierung sowie Sicherheits- und Verteidigungsfragen erörtert. Auch der Devisen-Ausgleich für die Stationierung amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik war Thema des Gesprächs zwischen dem Bundesaußenminister und seinem amerikanischen Gast.

argus Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 26,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Mindener Tagblatt, Minden

vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 23,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Pfälzer Tagblatt, Landau
vom 17. April 1971

Die Kennedys vor dem Kanzlerbungalow

Im Kanzlerbungalow empfingen am gestrigen Vormittag Außenminister Scheel und seine Gattin US-Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan. Mrs. Kennedy sprach am Abend bei einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Symphoniker zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" den Text. Senator Kennedy führte im Verlauf des Tages auch ein Gespräch mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke, bevor er am Nachmittag vom rheinland-pfälzischen Ministerpräsidenten Helmut Kohl im Bahnhof Rolandseck begrüßt wurde. Kennedy gab seiner besonderen Freude darüber Ausdruck, mit Dr. Kohl einen noch jungen Politiker zu treffen, denn der Jugend gehöre die Zukunft. Auf unserem Bild von links: Senator Kennedy, Mildred Scheel, Joan Kennedy und Außenminister Scheel.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 17,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Holsteinischer Courier, Neumünster
vom 17. April 1971

Die Kennedys beim Empfang im Kanzlerbungalow

Bundesaußenminister Scheel (rechts) und seine Frau Mildred (zweite von links) empfingen gestern im Kanzlerbungalow US-Senator Edward Kennedy (links) und seine Frau Joan (neben Scheel) zusammen mit den Bostoner Symphonikern, die am Abend in Bonn ein Galakonzert gaben. Frau Kennedy sprach auf dem Galaabend zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" den Text. Der Senator führte mit Scheel und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke politische Gespräche.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 67,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Münster'sche Zeitung, Münster
vom 17. April 197

DIE BOSTONER SYMPHONIKER gaben am Freitagabend in Bonn ein Galakonzert. Außenminister Walter Scheel (rechts) und seine Frau Mildred (Zweite von links) empfingen im Kanzlerbungalow die Gäste aus den USA mit Senator Edward Kennedy (links) und seine Frau Joan (neben Scheel). Kennedy traf auch mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke zusammen. Es wurden aktuelle politische Fragen besprochen. Funkbild: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 10,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ibbenbürener Volkszeitung, Ibbenbüren
vom 17. April 1971

DIE BOSTONER SYMPHONIKER gaben am Freitagabend in Bonn ein Galakonzert. Außenminister Walter Scheel (rechts) und seine Frau Mildred (Zweite von links) empfingen im Kanzlerbungalow die Gäste aus den USA mit Senator Edward Kennedy (links) und seine Frau Joan (neben Scheel). Kennedy traf auch mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke zusammen. Es wurden aktuelle politische Fragen besprochen. Funkbild: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 73,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hannoversche Presse, Hannover
vom 17. April 1971

EINEN KURZBESUCH stattet US-Senator Edward Kennedy der Bundesrepublik ab. Anlaß ist ein Galakonzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters. Allerdings traf Kennedy auch mit Außenminister Scheel und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke (unser Foto) zusammen. Eigener Funkdienst / ap-Fotofax

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 37,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hildesheimer Allgemeine Zeitung, Hildesheim
vom 17. April 1971

Empfang im Kanzler-Bungalow: Rechts Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred (zweite von links) mit den Gästen aus USA, Senator Edward Kennedy (links) und seine Frau Joan (zweite von rechts).
NRZ-Funkfoto: dpa/UPI

Die Kennedys zu Besuch in Bonn

NRZ-Nachrichtendienst

Bonn. Geld, Kunst und Politik gaben sich gestern mittag im Bonner Bundeskanzleramt ein Stelldichein: US-Senator Edward Kennedy, seine hübsche Frau Joan, die Bostoner Symphoniker und eine Reihe dollarschwerer Mitglieder der Bostoner Gesellschaft waren zu einem Empfang geladen. Offizieller Anlaß: das Galakonzert des Orchesters in der Beethovenhalle am gestrigen Abend, in dessen Mittelpunkt die Senatorenfrau Joan als Rezitatorin in „Peter und der Wolf" von Serge Prokofieff stand. Heute fliegen die Kennedys nach London weiter.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 273,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Ruhrzeitung, Essen
vom 17. April 1971

Ein Sinfoniekonzert

ist der Anlaß eines Bonn-Besuchs des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy. Kennedy begleitet seine Frau Joan, die beim Galakonzert der Bostoner Symphoniker in der Bonner Beethovenhalle den Text zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" spricht. Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred (zweite von links) empfingen am Vormittag im Kanzlerbungalow die Gäste aus den USA. Eigener Funkdienst/dpa-upi

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 23,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Pfälzer Tagblatt, Landau
vom 17. April 1971

Die Kennedys vor dem Kanzlerbungalow

Im Kanzlerbungalow empfingen am gestrigen Vormittag Außenminister Scheel und seine Gattin US-Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan. Mrs. Kennedy sprach am Abend bei einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Symphoniker zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" den Text. Senator Kennedy führte im Verlauf des Tages auch ein Gespräch mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke, bevor er am Nachmittag vom rheinland-pfälzischen Ministerpräsidenten Helmut Kohl im Bahnhof Rolandseck begrüßt wurde. Kennedy gab seiner besonderen Freude darüber Ausdruck, mit Dr. Kohl einen noch jungen Politiker zu treffen, denn der Jugend gehöre die Zukunft. Auf unserem Bild von links: Senator Kennedy, Mildred Scheel, Joan Kennedy und Außenminister Scheel.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 17,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Holsteinischer Courier, Neumünster
vom 17. April 1971

Die Kennedys beim Empfang im Kanzlerbungalow

Bundesaußenminister Scheel (rechts) und seine Frau Mildred (zweite von links) empfingen gestern im Kanzlerbungalow US-Senator Edward Kennedy (links) und seine Frau Joan (neben Scheel) zusammen mit den Bostoner Symphonikern, die am Abend in Bonn ein Galakonzert gaben. Frau Kennedy sprach auf dem Galaabend zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" den Text. Der Senator führte mit Scheel und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke politische Gespräche.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 67,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Münster'sche Zeitung, Münster
vom 17. April 197

DIE BOSTONER SYMPHONIKER gaben am Freitagabend in Bonn ein Galakonzert. Außenminister Walter Scheel (rechts) und seine Frau Mildred (Zweite von links) empfingen im Kanzlerbungalow die Gäste aus den USA mit Senator Edward Kennedy (links) und seine Frau Joan (neben Scheel). Kennedy traf auch mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke zusammen. Es wurden aktuelle politische Fragen besprochen. Funkbild: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 10,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ibbenbürener Volkszeitung, Ibbenbüren
vom 17. April 1971

DIE BOSTONER SYMPHONIKER gaben am Freitagabend in Bonn ein Galakonzert. Außenminister Walter Scheel (rechts) und seine Frau Mildred (Zweite von links) empfingen im Kanzlerbungalow die Gäste aus den USA mit Senator Edward Kennedy (links) und seine Frau Joan (neben Scheel). Kennedy traf auch mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke zusammen. Es wurden aktuelle politische Fragen besproc[illegible] Funkbild: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 73,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hannoversche Presse, Hannover
vom 17. April 1971

EINEN KURZBESUCH stattet US-Senator Edward Kennedy der Bundesrepublik ab. Anlaß ist ein Galakonzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters. Allerdings traf Kennedy auch mit Außenminister Scheel und Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke (unser Foto) zusammen. Eigener Funkdienst / ap-Fotofax

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 37,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hildesheimer Allgemeine Zeitung, Hildesheim
vom 17. April 1971

Empfang im Kanzler-Bungalow: Rechts Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred (zweite von links) mit den Gästen aus USA, Senator Edward Kennedy (links) und seine Frau Joan (zweite von rechts).
NRZ-Funkfoto: dpa/UPI

Die K[illegible] zu Besu[illegible]

NRZ-Nach[illegible]

Bonn. Geld, [illegible] gaben sich gest[illegible] ner Bundeskanz[illegible] ein: US-Senato[illegible] dy, seine hübs[illegible] Bostoner Sym[illegible] Reihe dollarsc[illegible] der Bostoner G[illegible] einem Empfang [illegible] Anlaß: das Gal[illegible] sters in der [illegible] gestrigen Abe[illegible] punkt die Sen[illegible] Rezitatorin in „[illegible] von Serge Prok[illegible] fliegen die Ken[illegible] weiter.

[illegible]gebers a[illegible] Das kü[illegible] glied Bei[illegible] Voigt [illegible] dung des [illegible] erster L[illegible] freundlic[illegible] spätester [illegible] schieden [illegible] intermin[illegible] über ' ei[illegible] gleichsm[illegible] recht" w[illegible] derten [illegible] Mieten b[illegible] sehen, di[illegible] seien. S[illegible] Mieterhö[illegible]

Städt[illegible] von K[illegible]

NRZ-[illegible]

Köln. [illegible] Köln hat [illegible] rium a[illegible] von der K[illegible]

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 273,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Ruhrzeitung, Essen
vom 17. April 1971

Ein Sinfoniekonzert

ist der Anlaß eines Bonn-Besuchs des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy. Kennedy begleitet seine Frau Joan, die beim Galakonzert der Bostoner Symphoniker in der Bonner Beethovenhalle den Text zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" spricht. Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred (zweite von links) empfingen am Vormittag im Kanzlerbungalow die Gäste aus den USA. Eigener Funkdienst/dpa-upi

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 19,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Trierische Landeszeitung, Trier
vom 17. April 1971

US-Senator Edward Kennedy, der gestern zu einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker nach Bonn gekommen war — seine Frau Joan spricht zu Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" den Text —, führte mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke (rechts) vor einem Empfang im Kanzleramt politische Gespräche. „Ein herzliches Willkommen des Landes Rheinland-Pfalz" entbot später Ministerpräsident Dr. Helmut Kohl bei einem Staatsempfang im Bahnhof Rolandseck dem Senator Edward Kennedy und den Solisten des Boston Symphonie Orchestra.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 171,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Kölnische Rundschau, Köln
vom 17. April 1971

Kennedy führt Gespräche mit Ehmke

US-Senator Edward Kennedy, der am Freitag zu einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker nach Bonn gekommen war, führte mit Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke (rechts) vor einem Empfang im Kanzleramt politische Gespräche. Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 221,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Kölner Stadtanzeiger, Köln
vom 17. April 1971

Politik war Nebensache . . .

. . . bei einem Empfang im Bundeskanzleramt für das „Boston Symphony Orchestra", das gestern abend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle gastierte. Am Rande des Empfangs traf US-Senator Edward Kennedy (links) mit Außenminister Scheel und seiner Frau Mildred zusammen. Bild: ap

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 6,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Bergsträßer Anzeiger, Bensheim
vom 17. April 1971

Im PALAIS SCHAUMBURG empfingen gestern Bundesaußenminister W. Scheel (ganz rechts) und seine Frau Mildred (2. von links) US-Senator Edward Kennedy (ganz links) und dessen Frau Joan (2. von rechts), die am Abend bei einem Gala-Konzert mit den Bostonern Symphonikern unter Arthur Fiedler als Sprecherin in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" mitwirkte. Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 19,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hanauer Anzeiger, Hanau
vom 17. April 1971

Im Palais Schaumburg empfingen am Freitag Bundesaußenminister Walter Scheel (ganz rechts) und seine Frau Mildred (2. von links) US-Senator Edward Kennedy (ganz links) und dessen Frau Joan (2. von rechts), die am Abend bei einem Gala-Konzert mit dem Bostonern Symphonikern unter Arthur Fiedler als Sprecherin in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" mitwirkte.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 52,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Bremer Nachrichten, Bremen
vom 17. April 1971

Zu Ehren Edward Kennedys und seiner Frau Joan gaben Bundesaußenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred am Freitag im Park-Bungalow des Palais Schaumburg einen Empfang. Die prominenten amerikanischen Gäste weilen aus Anlaß eines Gala-Konzertes der Bostoner Sinfoniker in der Bundeshauptstadt. Joan Kennedy wirkt bei dieser Aufführung mit. Siehe auch Bericht Seite 13

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 24,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Rhein-Zeitung, Düsseldorf
vom 17. April 1971

Empfang im Kanzler-Bungalow: Rechts Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred (zweite von links) mit den Gästen aus USA, Senator Edward Kennedy (links) und seine Frau Joan (zweite von rechts).
NRZ-Funkfoto: dpa/UPI

Die Kennedys zu Besuch in Bonn

NRZ-Nachrichtendienst

Bonn. Geld, Kunst und Politik gaben sich gestern mittag im Bonner Bundeskanzleramt ein Stelldichein: US-Senator Edward Kennedy, seine hübsche Frau Joan, die Bostoner Symphoniker und eine Reihe dollarschwerer Mitglieder der Bostoner Gesellschaft waren zu einem Empfang geladen. Offizieller Anlaß: das Galakonzert des Orchesters in der Beethovenhalle am gestrigen Abend, in dessen Mittelpunkt die Senatorenfrau Joan als Rezitatorin in „Peter und der Wolf" von Serge Prokofieff stand. Heute fliegen die Kennedys nach London weiter.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 139,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfalen-Post, Hagen
vom 17. April 1971

Zu Besuch beim Außenminister in Bonn waren am Freitag der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy (links, mit Frau Scheel) und dessen Frau Joan (2. von rechts). Kennedy führte auch politische Gespräche mit Scheel. Joan Kennedy trat am selben Abend in einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker als Sprecherin in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" auf. Boston ist die amerikanische Heimatstadt der Familie Kennedy. Foto: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Ausschnitt aus:
Odenwälder Heimatzeitung, Erbach
17. April 1971

Nach einem Informationsgespräch mit Kanzleramtsminister H. Ehmke ist der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy (links) am Freitag mit Bundesaußenminister Scheel (rechts) in Bonn zusammengetroffen. Nach Angaben des Auswärtigen Amtes ging es bei der Unterredung sowohl um die Ost- und Berlinpolitik, als auch um Sicherheits- und Verteidigungsfragen sowie um die Stationierung der US-Streitkräfte in der Bundesrepublik. Kennedy hält sich mit seiner Frau Joan (zwischen Scheel und dessen Frau) in Bonn auf, die am Freitagabend in der Beethoven-Halle in einem Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra". Der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Kohl gab am Abend für die Kennedys und die Musiker im Bahnhof Rolandseck einen Staatsempfang. Funkbild: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 20,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Darmstädter Tageblatt, Darmstadt
vom 17. April 1971

Nach einem Informationsgespräch mit Kanzleramtsminister H. Ehmke ist der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy (links) am Freitag mit Bundesaußenminister Scheel (rechts) in Bonn zusammengetroffen. Nach Angaben des Auswärtigen Amtes ging es bei der Unterredung sowohl um die Ost- und Berlinpolitik, als auch um Sicherheits- und Verteidigungsfragen sowie um die Stationierung der US-Streitkräfte in der Bundesrepublik. Kennedy hält sich mit seiner Frau Joan (zwischen Scheel und dessen Frau) in Bonn auf, die am Freitagabend in der Beethoven-Halle in einem Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra". Der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Kohl gab am Abend für die Kennedys und die Musiker im Bahnhof Rolandseck einen Staatsempfang. Funkbild: dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 21,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ruhr-Anzeiger, Hattingen
vom 17. April 1971

In Bonn hat der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy gestern mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und Bundesaußenminister Scheel Gespräche über die deutsch-amerikanischen Beziehungen geführt. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten amerikanischen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy war zusammen mit seiner Frau Joan und etwa 40 millionenschweren Amerikanern nach Bonn gekommen, um dort gestern abend einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker beizuwohnen. — Unser Bild zeigt (von links nach rechts) Edward Kennedy, Frau Mildred Scheel, Frau Joan Kennedy und Minister Scheel. (dpa-Funkbild)

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): o.A.
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Salzgitter-Zeitung, Salzgitter-Lebenstedt
vom 17. April 1971

Empfang für die Kennedys in Bonn

Geld, Kunst und Politik gaben sich am Freitagmittag im Bonner Bundeskanzleramt ein Stelldichein: Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy, seine hübsche Frau Joan, die Bostoner Symphoniker und eine Reihe dollarschwerer Mitglieder der Bostoner High-Society waren zu einem Empfang von Bundesaußenminister Scheel geladen.

Offizieller Anlaß war ein für den Abend angesetztes Gala-Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra in der Bonner Beethovenhalle mit Werken von Beethoven, Tschaikowsky, Auszügen aus dem Musical „Hair" und dem „St. Louis Blues March".

Im Mittelpunkt des Programms unter der Stabführung von Arthur Fiedler: Die Senatoren-Frau Joan als Rezitatorin in „Peter und der Wolf" von Serge Prokofieff. Joan Kennedy (auf unserem Bild im Gespräch mit Scheel) die bei ähnlichen Gelegenheiten auch schon als Pianistin geglänzt hat, stahl im Bundeskanzleramt natürlich sowohl den Musikern und den die Tournee finanzierenden Landsleuten als auch ihrem Mann (links mit Frau Scheel) die Schau. Und so blieb fast unbeachtet, daß Ted Kennedy mit dem Minister im Kanzleramt, Horst Ehmke, ein längeres Gespräch geführt hatte, von dem beide nachher meinten, es sei „nützlich" gewesen, und anschließend mit Außenminister Walter Scheel zum politischen Meinungsaustausch zusammentraf. Die Kennedys werden Bonn am Sonnabend wieder verlassen und nach London weiterfliegen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 20,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Delmenhorster Kreisblatt, Delmenhorst
vom 17. April 1971

US-Senator Kennedy führte in Bonn politische Gespräche

Die Stärke amerikanischer Truppen in der Bundesrepublik stand im Mittelpunkt der Gespräche, die der amerikanische Senator Kennedy (Bild links) gestern mit Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und Außenminister Scheel führte. Der jüngste Bruder des ermordeten amerikanischen Präsidenten John F. Kennedy hält sich mit seiner Frau Joan (dritte v. l.) zu einem Galakonzert der Bostoner Philharmoniker in Bonn auf. Außenminister Scheel gab für die amerikanischen Gäste einen Empfang (Bild). Bei einem Staatsempfang im Bahnhof Rolandseck hieß der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Kohl die Kennedys und die Solisten der Bostoner Philharmoniker gestern nachmittag willkommen. dpa/UPI-Funkbilder

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 25,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Cellesche Zeitung, Celle
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 79,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Trierischer Volksfreund, Trier
vom 21. April 1971

„Egmont-Ouvertüre" zum Abendessen

Bonner Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds mit illustren Gästen und höchsten Preisen

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock ..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn aber den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: Weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys Erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malclom Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 DM für den billigsten und 150 DM für den teuersten Platz, letztere inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller Junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

Holger Quiring

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 116,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Düsseldorfer Nachrichten, Düsseldorf
vom 19. April 1971

Egmont zum Essen

Konzert und Gesellschaft in Bonn

Bonn. Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Edward Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos von Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum St.-Louis-Blues-March von William Christopfer Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westdeutsche Rundschau, Wuppertal
vom 19. April 1971

Die Woche in Bonn

Alles oder nichts für Rainer Barzel — Keine Osterferien für den Oppositionsführer — Bonns größtes Spektakulum — Viel Wirbel um Jet-Set aus Boston

Von unserem Sonderkorrespondenten

Bonn (dmt). — Für Rainer Candidus Barzel geht es jetzt um alles oder nichts. Denn in diesen Wochen entscheidet sich, ob der langjährige CDU/CSU-Fraktionsvorsitzende im Bundestag das Traumziel seiner politischen Karriere erreicht: erster Mann seiner Partei zu werden! Barzel kämpft dafür mit der ihm eigenen Zähigkeit, Selbstdisziplin und Entschlossenheit. Während alle anderen Bonner Politiker sich einige Tage Osterurlaub genehmigten, sich der Familie widmeten oder ihre Steckenpferdchen ritten, absolvierte Rainer Barzel einen hochpolitischen Besuch in den USA.

Seine Frau Kriemhild („Timmchen") mußte die Osterfeiertage allein im Familienbungalow in Bad Godesberg verbringen. Ihr Mann hatte sich schon am Samstag vor dem Fest auf den Weg gemacht. Die Feiertage selbst verbrachte er in Nassau auf den Bahamas, nicht als sonnenhungriger und badevergnügter Tourist, sondern in geradezu asketischer Klausur. Er bereitete sich auf die Reise in die USA, vor allem auf die Zusammenkunft mit Präsident Nixon vor und feilte an einer Rede, die er in New York vor dem „Council of Foreign Relations" zu halten hatte.

Der große Schweiger ...

Was Barzels Freunde so verbittert, ist, daß Gerhard Schröder, nach jahrelangem Schweigen und absoluter Zurückhaltung, urplötzlich als Konkurrent im Kampf um die Nominierung zum CDU-Kanzlerkandidaten in die Arena sprang, in der sich, gemessen an den bisherigen Mitbewerbern, Rainer Barzel schon als der sichere Sieger fühlen konnte.

Nun, der große Schweiger schweigt nicht mehr. Der Fraktionsvorsitzende und sein Anhang empfinden Schröders Vorgehen und Taktik als wenig fair. Barzel ist, wie man so treffend zu sagen pflegt, „echt sauer". Und in Bonn macht die Behauptung die Runde, Barzel habe „im privaten Kreis" schon gedroht: „Wenn mich der Parteitag in Saarbrücken nicht zum CDU-Kanzlerkandidaten wählt, lege ich den Fraktionsvorsitz im Bundestag nieder!"

Rainer Barzel, der es jetzt wissen will, verzichtete nicht nur auf ein beschauliches Osterfest, er verkniff sich auch, so rechtzeitig wieder aus den USA zurück zu sein, um an einem Ereignis teilzunehmen, von dem zu sagen ist, daß es sich um ein in Bonn bisher nicht erlebtes Spektakulum handelte. 40 amerikanische Millionäre, unter ihnen Edward und Joan Kennedy, begleiteten das Bostoner Philharmonische Orchester, das am Freitagabend in der Beethovenhalle ein Konzert gab. Joan Kennedy rezitierte dabei den Text zu Prokofieffs Märchen „Peter und der Wolf".

Empfang im Bungalow

Bundesaußenminister und Vizekanzler Walter Scheel hatte am Mittag für den „Jet-Set" aus den USA einen Empfang im Kanzler-Bungalow gegeben, stellvertretend für den Regierungschef Willy Brandt, der erst am Wochenende vom Gardasee und Forellenangeln zurückkehrt. Der „liebenswürdige Herr Scheel" entledigte sich dieser Aufgabe selbstredend mit Charme, Routine und Eleganz. Der FDP-Vorsitzende gehört nun einmal zu den perfektesten Könnern auf dem Parkett der Bonner Gesellschaft.

Erstaunliches — und für viele deutsche Mutterherzen Betrübliches — wußten Journalisten zu berichten, die zur Ankunft der illustren amerikanischen Reisegesellschaft auf den Köln-Bonner Flughafen geeilt waren. Während sich Fotografen, Kameramänner und Schaulustige um die High Society aus Boston drängten, saß Publikumsliebling Heintje, von niemandem beachtet und von keinem einzigen Blitzlicht gewürdigt, im Warteraum. Am Sonntag nun trifft auf diesem Flughafen Rainer Barzel ein. Bleibt die Frage: Wie wird man ihn empfangen?

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 15,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Schwetzinger Zeitung, Schwetzingen
vom 19. April 1971

Im Gefolge des Boston Symphony Orchestra

Die Kennedys und Rockefellers im Hauptstädtchen

Bahnhof Rolandseck bewährte sich als Wartesaal / Image-Polierer hatten Hochkonjunktur

Von Wolfgang von Gropper

Bonn/Rolandseck. Am Freitagfrüh 7 Uhr landete der Senator Edward Kennedy in Köln-Wahn. Seine Frau Joan war schon drei Tage vorher gekommen. David Rockefeller jr. mit Gattin tummelten sich ebenfalls am Rhein. Nach Zusammenkünften „Ted" Kennedys mit Außenminister Scheel, Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke und dem rheinland-pfälzischen Ministerpräsidenten Helmut Kohl versammelten sich Amerikas Jet set-Mitglieder am Freitagabend in der Bonner Beethovenhalle zu einem Konzert des „Boston Pops"-Orchesters. Als ob sie das nicht zu Hause hören könnten. Wie kam es zu diesem Auflauf in unserem Bundeshauptstädtchen?

Am Anfang stand – wieder einmal – Johannes Wasmuth. Wer das ist? Oh, Kenner kennen ihn. Seit langem. Versuch einer Darstellung für Nichtkenner: Zwei-Zentner-Mann, um die Vierzig, marzipangesichtig, wasserblauäugig. Löwenmähne vom Kopf bis zum Nacken. Beruf? – Ja, da wird's schwierig. Nach allem, was man hört, würde ich sagen: international geläufiger Bildersammler, Organisator und Arrangeur. Die Angaben über Herkunft schwanken zwischen ehemaligem Buchbinder-, Schreiner- und Tüncherlehrling. Es gibt Leute, die Wasmuth ernsthaft für ein Genie halten. Andere rühmen ihm wenigstens einen genialischen Sinn für Qualität schlechthin nach. Die Gemälde, die er im stillgelegten Bahnhof Rolandseck im nördlichsten Zipfel von Rheinland-Pfalz in seiner Galerie „PRO" zusammengetragen hat, sprechen tatsächlich für einen ungewöhnlichen „Riecher". Er wohnt auch in diesem Bahnhof. Zusammen mit dem Pianisten Stefan Askenase. Zu seinen Freunden und regelmäßigen Gästen gehören Künstler vom Kaliber Marcel Marceau. Und die große Gesellschaft gibt sich im Bahnhof dann und wann ein Stelldichein. Zu Silvester oder so. Jedenfalls dann, wenn Johannes Wasmuth, dessen Fäden nach Westen in San Francisco und nach Osten in Tokio erst zu enden scheinen, es will.

Für letzten Freitag hatte er das Boston Symphony Orchestra zu einem „Pops Concert" in die Bonner Beethovenhalle dirigiert. Doch im Wesen des Genies liegt es, immer gleich mehrere Fliegen mit einer Klappe zu schlagen. Wasmuth schlug. Nur die Fliegen gebärdeten sich – frecherweise – ein wenig eigenwillig. Joan Kennedy wäre offenbar überhaupt nicht zu einem Empfang, den Außenminister Scheel und Frau Mildred am Freitagmittag ihr und ihrem Mann zu Ehren im Kanzler-Bungalow gaben, erschienen, wenn Gatte Ted sie nicht nach zwei Stunden herbeitelefoniert hätte.

Am Nachmittag, 16.30 Uhr, freuten sich (laut Einladung) der Ministerpräsident des Landes Rheinland-Pfalz und Frau Kohl zu Ehren der Solisten und Freunde des Boston Symphony Orchestra den und jenen zu einem Empfang im Bahnhof Rolandseck begrüßen zu können. Der Bahnhof wurde zum Wartesaal. Etwa sechszig bis achtzig Gäste und ebensoviele Kameramänner und Journalisten harrten und harrten. Hier Helmut Kohl, dort Bernhard Timm, der BASF-General. Dort die Frau des Bonner Protokollchefs Schwarzmann, hier der stellvertretende US-Botschafter Fessenden. Das Kalte Büffet stellte bereits die Ohren. David Rockefeller jr., Neffe des New Yorker Gouverneurs und Sohn des Chefs der Chase Manhattan Bank, war mit Gattin da. Aber wer kennt die schon in Rolandseck?

Von den gebetenen Solisten des Orchesters kam niemand. Nur ein paar Förderer aus Boston und Umgebung waren erschienen. Und endlich – fünfviertel Stunden zu spät – Ted Kennedy (ohne Frau). Er war dann da und doch stets „abwesend". Er redete, nach Kohl, einige belanglose Sätze ins Mikrofon. Ohne Lautsprecher mit Professor Timm, um schließlich noch mit seinem Gastgeber, dem CDU-Rekken aus Mainz, einige Worte über die Schwierigkeit, jung gewählt zu werden, zu wechseln. Und schon war er wieder weg. Ein Ministerialbeamter erzählte mir, sein Sohn habe kritisch bemerkt, er mißbillige, daß sein Vater da hingehe. Der Kennedy wolle doch nur sein angeschlagenes Image aufpolieren. – Ein kluges Kind, der Bub. Frau Kohl hatte wohl Ahnungen. Sie war erst gar nicht präsent. Dafür aber die Hellseherin Buchela und eine, wie es hieß, echte Zigeunerprinzessin. Als eigentliche Attraktion in Rolandseck erwies sich das Zigeuner-Quintett Schnuckenack-Reinhardt aus Haßloch. Da es auf dem Balkon plaziert war, hatten wenigstens die vielen Polizisten in der Umgebung des Bahnhofs etwas von seiner Musik.

Endlich am Abend war Joan Kennedy zu sehen. Am Prominententisch in der Beethovenhalle und auf der Bühne. Sie fungierte als Sprecherin zu „Peter und der Wolf" von Prokofieff. Dazu hatte sie viel Ruhe zuvor nötig. Versteht sich: Künstlerin, Auftrittsfieber. Doch sie spricht, wie sie eben spricht. Studiert hat sie Musik. Sie war jedenfalls die Giraffe des Abends. Nichtsdestoweniger verstanden sich die Pops-Musiker durchzusetzen. Es sind die gleichen wie die, die als Symphony Orchestra auftreten. Nur der Dirigent, Arthur Fiedler, ist ausschließlich für leichtere „pop"-uläre Unterhaltungsmusik zuständig. Dazu zählen die Amerikaner neben Melodien aus „Hair" und „St. Louis Blues"-Märschen auch Tschaikowskys b-moll-Klavierkonzert. Ja, wenn man es so, wie dort gespielt, auffaßt! Dazu saß das illustre Publikum, besmokingt, an Tischen mit Kerzen, aß, trank und rauchte. Shocking!? Anfangs ja, später nein. Spätestens nach der „Hair"-Musik wurden aus den feinen Leuten Menschen. Es zog Stimmung in die Halle ein. Man war froh und heiter, vom Gemeinschaftserlebnis getragen und inspiriert. „Das kann die beste Fernsehsendung zu Hause nicht ersetzen", sagte einer im Rausgehen. Den Eintrittspreis von 150 Mark hatte er – in ehrlicher Begeisterung allerdings – schon vergessen.

Joan Kennedy und A. Fiedler beim „Pops Concert" in Bonns Beethovenhalle
dpa/UPI-Bild

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 30,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Fuldaer Zeitung, Fulda
vom 20. April 1971

3

Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Wein und Sekt

Galakonzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in Bonn — Joan Kennedy als Solistin

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue – allerdings etwas zwitterhafte – Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock . . ." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: Weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl nur ein „populäres" Programm, wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskis erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die – in weißem Maxi – den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowski-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bonstoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 19,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Trierische Landeszeitung, Trier
vom 22. April 1971

3

Egmont zum Essen

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett wurde jetzt um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gebe. Das Programmheft des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock. . ." Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißem Maxikleid — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Gastspiels auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller Junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei.

dpa

180

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG

Montag, 19. April 1971 / Nr. 90

Vom Senator un siiner Fru

Die Kennedys mit den Boston-Symphonikern in Bonn / Bericht von Walter Henkels

Der Prälat am Kölner Dom mußte warten. Der Bonner Oberbürgermeister Krämer schaute eine Dreiviertelstunde lang im Rathaus auf die Uhr. Der Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke wartete unruhig am Eingang des Palais Schaumburg. Der Kanzler-Diensttuer, Außenminister Scheel, sonst gelassen und in gefaßt liebenswürdiger Haltung, hatte eine wolkige Stirn, als er im Kanzlerbungalow wartete. Der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Kohl wartete in seinem wilhelminisch-gußeisernen Bahnhof Rolandseck, wohin er geladen hatte; fast zwei Stunden wartete er. Dann kam der Herr Senator, kam, sah und — siegte nicht, sah vielmehr, daß er wieder weiterkam. Seine Frau kam erst gar nicht mit nach Rolandseck.

Auch die Senatorin schien strikte Order gegeben zu haben, überall mindestens eine Stunde zu spät zu kommen, die Leute warten zu lassen. Das, sagte ein amerikanischer Diplomat, sei bei den Kennedys üblich und eingeplant. Die Wartenden müßten in Spannung gesetzt werden.

Aber dieser Trick verfing hier am Rhein nicht. Eine feine Wand von Fremdheit und Distanz schien sich zwischen den Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan einerseits und das Bonner Publikum andererseits gelegt zu haben. Die Leute aus den Staaten, zwei edle Blätter am Baum der Kennedys, mit den Bostoner Symphonikern auf einem Privattrip in der Bundeshauptstadt, faßten nicht recht Fuß am Rhein. Ohne richtige Lust sah man den Kennedys zu, etwas Argwohn gegen die Art, wie sie sich gerierten. Die Kennedys erinnerten an die Brüder Grimm, an den Fischer un sine Fru: Mandje, Mandje! Timpe Te!

Wir fragten den Senator Kennedy im Kanzlerbungalow, ob er Präsident der Vereinigten Staaten werden wolle. Der Senator schaute zu seiner Frau hinüber, und es schien, als ob er vorher eines Konventikels von ihr bedürfe. Er werde dazu nichts sagen, erwiderte er, es gelte, was er früher gesagt habe. Mandje, Mandja, Timpe Te!

Die Bostoner Symphoniker lieferten in einem Galakonzert in der Beethovenhalle bei belegten Brötchen „Boston Pops" für 100 bis 150 DM je Eintrittskarte. Für einen musikalischen Normalverbraucher ist das eine ganze Menge, auch wenn man hört, der Reinerlös werde guten Zwecken zugeführt. Das verbreitete ein junger Mann, der auch die Bostoner nach hier geholt hat, Wohlfahrt, wie es heißt, für Kinderdörfer und bedürftige Künstler, und läßt sich gern als Wohltäter feiern. Der Rolandsecker Bahnhof, halb Galerie, halb Kunsthalle, erfordert Zeit und Mühe. Man hört aufmerksam hin und hängt sich gerne an den Mund, wenn da die Rede ist vom großen Schnorren für die Gemeinnützigkeit.

Ein Alt-Bonner, der schon deswegen kein Intellektueller sein konnte, wurde gefragt, was er von der Musik der „Boston Pops" halte. Der Alt-Bonner erwiderte, er könne es nur soweit bringen wie jener Rittmeister, den eine Dame fragt, ob er die Musik von Wagner liebe. „Gnädige Frau", antwortete er, „ich fürchte sie nicht." Man brauchte sie auch, wie sich erwies, nicht zu fürchten.

Dieses Orchester wir wirklich ein Klasseorchester; das war Magie und Gloria, das war polierte Musik. (Dieser Pianist Malcom Frager!) Natürlich Beethoven, dann Tschaikowski, auch ein Stück aus dem Musical „Hair". In Serge Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" hatte Joan Kennedy den Sprechpart. Vom Platz weg hätte man die germanenblonde Senatorin engagieren mögen, so gut sah sie aus mit ihrer Mähne, so gut stand ihr das bißchen Lampenfieber, obschon die Sprechdilettantin an die fünfhundertmal schon auf der Bühne stand. Sie kam im Silberbrokat.

Und im Silberbrokat kam zu des Ministerpräsidenten Kohl Party in Rolandseck auch die Zigeunerin Margarete Gussantier, genannt Buchela aus Remagen. Die delphischen Schäkereien der Wahrsagerin Buchela enthüllten sich in diesen Worten an Edward Kennedy: „Sie werden Präsident von Amerika, aber noch nicht." Dann wünschte die Frau mit dem zweiten Gesicht und dem sechsten Sinn, aber von etwas primitiver Machart, dem Senator alles Gute und Gottes Segen.

Einige Dutzend Mäzene und Mäzeninnen waren aus Amerika mit den Kennedys und dem Bostoner Orchester angereist, die Damen mit viel Wohlwollen und aparten Hütchen. Die wichtigsten, sagte man, hießen Cabod, Fahnestock, Sargent, Thompson, Rockefeller. Und ein Prälat war auch mit von der Partie, wie das in der Ordnung ist.

Eine Eskorte mit weißen Mäusen bekam Edward Kennedy nicht, aber genügend Polizeischutz, denn der ist jetzt in der Bundeshauptstadt angebracht. Die Bostoner in Bonn sind verstummt, mit dem großen Damentroß nach Wien und Rom weitergereist. Und auch Edward und Joan, der Senator un siine Fru, sind gen Süden gefahren.

---

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 17,8 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Pirmasenser Zeitung, Pirmasens

vom 19. April 1971

Das Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker am Rhein

Von Weillington Long

Bonn (upi) - Der amerikanische Senator Edward („Ted") Kennedy und seine Frau Joan haben Bonn am Wochenende gegeben, um was es sich immer so besorgt bemüht: gesellschaftliches Ansehen mit einem Hauch von Herz. Während sich der demokratische Politiker in Gesprächen mit Außenminister Walter Scheel und Kanzleramts-Chef Horst Ehmke bemühte, seine eigene Position und die der USA deutlich zu machen und Ehmke ihn dazu brachte, für das protokollarisch unverzichtbare Besucherfoto einen Hund in den Arm zu nehmmen, bereitete sich seine Frau für einen Auftritt in der Beethoven-Halle vor: Sie sollte den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" übernehmen. Doch nicht nur der Name der politischen Dynastie Kennedy machte das aus, was die Bundeshauptstadt unter einem gesellschaftlichen Ereignis versteht: Es spielte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter dem 76jährigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler.

Wer dabei sein wollte, mußte bis zu 150 Mark für eine Karte ausgeben oder aber zur Prominenz gehören — die freien Eintritt hatte — um die 33jährige blonde Senatorenfrau sprechen zu hören, wenn sie nicht gerade vom 107-Mann-Orchester überspielt wurde. Der Beifall war gleichmäßig verteilt: die Besucher feierten Joan Kennedy ebenso wie Arthur Fiedler, die Musiker und die Solisten für einen „Hair"-Querschnitt, für die Ouvertüre zu Beethovens „Egmont" oder für das Klavierkonzert Nummer eins von Tschaikowski (Solist: Malcolm Trager)..Auch wenn der Sprecher der sowjetischen Botschaft, Alexander Bogomolow, Griffehler des Pianisten bemängelte, manche enttäuscht waren, daß Frau Kennedy nicht „Heiße Hößchen" oder eine durchsichtige Bluse trug: Walter Scheel war begeistert ein Konzert nach Bostoner Art mit belegten Brötchen auf silbernen Platten, rheinhessischem Wein „Niersteiner Fritzenhölle Spätlese" und Champagner „Périgord Imperial Brut" waren zusammen mit den Kennedys ein Hit für Bonn.

---

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 52,9 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Bremer Nachrichten, Bremen

vom 17. April 1971

High Life im Bungalow: Kennedys sind da

Das gesellschaftliche Bonn erlebte gestern die Renaissance einer Ära

Von unserem Redaktionsmitglied
Claus Dreher

Bonn. „Wie heißt der nächste Präsident der USA?" wurde Edward Kennedy, umstrittener Senator und letzter Überlebender des Clans der Kennedy-Brothers, despektierlich gefragt. Edward, lange nicht mehr beim Friseur gewesen, in einem geknitterten Anzug mit Kerzenwachs auf der Schulter, lächelt nur kurz, ein wenig verlegen, linkisch: „Überlegen Sie, wer der nächste Präsident ist", sagt er, und sieht zu, wie er die Würstchen los wird, die er auf dem Teller schon gute zehn Minuten vor sich hin trägt. Versonnen wirkt er auf der Terrasse des Kanzler-Bungalows — unsicher, möchte man meinen.

Und dabei wird er vor allem von den Damen der High-Society, die Außenminister Walter Scheel nebst Ehegatten zu diesem sogenannten Sektfrühstück in den Kanzler-Bungalow eingeladen hat, förmlich angehimmelt. „Ach schauen Sie nur, ganz der Brüder", lispelt eine seidenbestickte und brillantierte Dame so um die Sechzig. Sie schiebt sich näher heran, erhascht ein Lächeln aus den blauen Augen des Kennedy-Filou und ist restlos glücklich.

In der Tat: noch am Vortage, als das Boston-Sinfonie-Orchester unter Leitung des humorvollen Dirigenten Fiedler, der in Berlin studiert hat und 1915 nach Amerika ausgewandert ist (im Troß seiner Eltern natürlich), im Bonner Rathaus empfangen wurde, war von Edward Kennedy nicht die Rede; nur davon, daß seine sommersprossige Gattin Joan am Abend drauf in der Bonner Beethovenhalle autreten werde. Fiedler, fidel in allen Lebenslagen („Ach wissen Sie, ich finde die Beethoven nachempfundene Schallplatte ‚Song of Joy' sehr gut, auch wenn ich sie ein wenig anders arrangiert hätte), ist ein Feuerwehrfan und zeigte sowohl im Bonner Rathaus als auch im Kanzler-Bungalow stolz seinen neuen Feuerwehrhelm, gerade in Bonn geschenkt bekommen. Er hat keinen Lieblingskomponisten, sagt er, ein wenig schrullig, noch nicht einmal eine Lieblingssinfonie, fügt er ein wenig amerikanisch hinzu.

Das Büfett im Kanzler-Bungalow war nach dem Motto angelegt: die Kultur fängt erst dort an, wo Kartoffelsalat warm angemacht wird, also südlich des Mains. Man trank neben dem vornehm-obligaten Whisky vor allem Münchner Bier, aß Leberkäse und Brezeln, delikate Salate und was immer sonst im Süden an Leckerem geboten wird. Man trank und aß zunächst ohne die Kennedys. „Nur" Außenminister Walter Scheel und Frau Mildred widmeten sich den Gästen. Sie in Midi-Gelb. Derweilen parlierten Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke und Senator Kennedy im Kanzleramt. „Tour d'horizont" kommentierte Ehmke hernach den politischen Inhalt des längeren Gesprächs, was soviel sagen will: ich sage nichts, wir haben über alles und jeden gesprochen. Was er denn davon halte, daß Oppositionschef Barzel beruhigter aus Amerika zurückkehre als er hingefahren sei, wollten wir von Ehmke wissen — jetzt, da doch ein Stück Amerika gerade in Bonn hospitiere. Der Kanzleramtsminister murmelte vor sich hin. Man meinte so etwas wie „Hysterie" zu hören und erhielt alsbald die offizielle Beurteilung: „Wenn Herr Barzel zur Beruhigung extra nach Amerika fahren muß, so zeigt das nur, wie steril aufgeregt er ist."

Das waren Randgespräche auf der Terrasse des Bungalows im Kanzlerpark, der einmal für teures Geld vom Münchner Architekten Sepp Ruf für Ludwig Erhard gebaut wurde und jetzt so eine Art Gasthaus für Prominente geworden ist. Auch König Baudouin und Königin Fabiola sollen ja Ende des Monats dort wohnen. Edward Kennedy war zu seinem Ärger stets von vielen Fotografen umlagert, lauschte dem Venusberg-Englisch des Außenministers („Let's go in the bright side of sun") und weigerte sich beharrlich, einen Hund anzufassen. Bonns Klatschtante Nr. 1, Evi Keil, hatte sich nämlich eine Image-Aufbesserung angedeihen lassen und einen winzig kleinen Yorkshire-Hund statt Handtasche über die Elle gehängt. „Napoleon" heißt er. Und ein echter Kennedy gibt sich doch nicht mit einem Nachfahren des Korsen ab, schon gar nicht, wenn solcher auf eine Insel verbannt war. Kennedys haben was gegen Inseln.

Bis dato war die Schmalspur-Pianistin Joan Kennedy noch nicht im Kanzler-Etablissement eingetroffen. Sie käme gar nicht, sagte Minister Scheel, weil sie unpäßlich sei; sie käme sehr wohl, sagte Ehemann Edward, und der müßte es ja wohl wissen. Und siehe da: sie kam. In hellem Hosenanzug in Bleu mit gleichfurniertem Mantel und dunkelblauem Rollkragenpulli. Sie strahlte aus ihren Sommersprossen und lächelte über den Bericht einer Hamburger Zeitung, wonach sie am selben Abend in „heißen Höschen" in der Bonner Beethovenhalle die Bostoner Sinfoniker begleiten (oder verwirren?) werde. „Meine Frau kann hot pants sehr gut tragen", politisierte oder polemisierte Hausherr Edward. Bei Redaktionsschluß dieser Seite hatte das Prominentenkonzert (Eintritt nicht unter 110 Mark) noch nicht begonnen.

Prominent waren übrigens nicht nur Fiedlers Musikanten, die Creme de la creme bildete die Begleitung. Sieht man davon ab, daß Amerikas große Damen samt und sonders über sechzig zu sein scheinen, sieht man davon ab, daß sich seit Buffalo Bill und den Saloongirls der Pionierzeit in der Mode Amerikas nur wenig geändert hat, durfte der Künstler-Förderer Wasmuth, der den historischen Bahnhof Rolandseck zu neuer Blüte gebracht hat (auch ohne Schaffner), stolz sein: Die Rockefellers waren da, in old Germany immer noch der Inbegriff von Wohlstand. Die Cabots kennt man schon weniger. Aber sie waren auch da und tranken Bier. In Amerika sagt man, die milliardenschweren Cabots würden, wenn überhaupt, höchstens mit der Familie Cabot-Lodge reden. Und diese wiederum nur mit dem lieben Gott. Die Cabot-Lodges waren auch da. Sie sprachen mit Ehmke.

841 Millionen Mark „Schnaps-Steuer"

Bonn. Der gestiegene Verbrauch von harten Getränken in der Bundesrepublik verhalf auch dem Fiskus zu einer Steigerung seiner Einnahmen. Insgesamt fielen aus den Verkäufen der Bundesmonopolverwaltung für Branntwein im Geschäftsjahr vom 1. Oktober 1969 bis zum 30. September 1970 nahezu 841 Millionen DM an Branntweinsteuer an gegenüber gut 810 Millionen im voraufgegangenen Geschäftsjahr. Diese Zahl wird im neuen Geschäftsbericht der Bundesmonopolverwaltung genannt. Der Bilanzgewinn der Monopolverwaltung erhöhte sich in der gleichen Zeit von 27 Millionen auf 33,3 Millionen DM. In zwei monopoleigenen und elf Vertrags-„Reinigungsanstalten" sind insgesamt 932 142 Hektoliter Sprit hergestellt worden.

---

argus Seit 1887 — Auflage (i. Ts.): 80,0 — lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —

Ausschnitt aus:

Heilbronner Stimme, Heilbronn

vom 19. April 1971

Von den feinen Leuten in Bonn ist Neues zu berichten:

Sekt und Sinfonisches — Mettwurst und Maestoso

Konzert mit einem Gala-Essen / Die Prominenz der Politik machte sich rar / Fotografen-Sturm auf Joan Kennedy

Bonn: Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt des Erfolgs-Musicals „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malclom Frager, der den Virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsyky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, das das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller Junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 5,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Rheinhessische Landeszeitung, Oppenheim
vom 19. April 1971

Mit Kohl und Kennedy

Impressionen vom Bahnhof Rolandseck

Verbindungen zwischen Politik und Kunst sind immer von der Gefahr bedroht, durch divergierende Beweggründe korrumpiert zu werden. Das zeigte sich auch bei dem Empfang, den Ministerpräsident Dr. Kohl den Solisten und den Freunden des Boston Symphony Orchestra im Bahnhof Rolandseck gab. Und so wollte keine rechte Feststimmung und auch nicht das Gefühl aufkommen, an einem unvergeßlichen Ereignis teilzunehmen.

Was war der Grund, daß der Ministerpräsident in den äußersten Nordzipfel seines Landes eingeladen hatte, eben in jenen, nun schon fast sagenumwobenen Bahnhof Rolandseck, der ursprünglich einmal liquidiert werden sollte, dann rasch von dem Trio Askenase-Wasmuth-Menuhin (in diesem Fall der Schwester des Violinvirtuosen) gerettet wurde und nun vom Land übernommen wird? Etwa aus landsmannschaftlicher Verbundenheit mit den Bostonern, da zu den Gründern dieses Orchesters ein Pfälzer gehörte und „ich ja auch ein Pfälzer bin" (Kohl)? Oder aber, daß der Ministerpräsident von Rheinland-Pfalz die Wirksamkeit des Rolandsecker Balkons als politische Plattform vor den Toren Bonns ausprobieren wollte, dazu noch mit dem verlockenden Schlenker in die Außenpolitik, da zufällig auch Senator Edward Kennedy mit Gattin nach Bonn gekommen war und eine Stunde vorher mit den Herren Scheel und Ehmke konferiert hatte? Dr. Kohl kam in seiner Begrüßung flugs vom Mackenbacher Musikanten auf seine Zuneigung zu den amerikanischen Soldaten zu sprechen. Eine direkte Antwort bekam er nicht zu hören. So blieb es bei einigen Artigkeiten, einem Blick hinüber zum Siebengebirge, einem viertelstündigen Plausch und dem faden Nachgeschmack, daß es eigentlich ganz anders hätte werden sollen. Als der amerikanische Senator wieder abgerauscht war, nicht ohne sich vorher bei den paar Rolandseckern, die ihm vor dem Bahnhof einen „kleinen Bahnhof" bereitet hatten, durch Händeschütteln zu bedanken, blieb man noch ein wenig zusammen, nahm wohl auch etwas Musik der Zigeunerkapelle Schnuckenack Reinhardt (auch aus der Pfalz) auf und verkrümelte sich dann — einer nach dem anderen — unbemerkt in Richtung Landeshauptstadt oder Bonn, um dort dem Konzert der Bostoner mit Frau Joan Kennedy als Sprecherin in Prokofiews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" unter der Leitung von Arthur Fiedler beizuwohnen.

Das Haus, wo solches geschah, der Bahnhof Rolandseck, ist ein recht merkwürdiges Gebilde. Euphorisch hat man ihm die aktuelle Ehrenplakette Jugendstil verliehen. Das Haus baut sich am Hang auf, hat zum Rhein hin zwei Balkons, vom oberen einen Zugang zum einstigen Wartesaal, der mit Kronleuchtern und dem neuen Parkett erste Ansätze, ein Festsaal zu werden, zeigt. Um der Absicht der GmbH „art and music", hier einen Treffpunkt der Künste zu inszenieren, sichtbaren Ausdruck zu verleihen, hängen hoch an hohen Wänden Bilder (viele Oskar Moll). Als Restbestände einer beendeten Ausstellung oder einfach nur so?

Noch ist vieles Provisorium. Eine liebenswerte Idee; was daraus wird, wissen die Götter oder Herr Wasmuth, der Geschäftsführer des Vereins, oder Herr Dr. Kohl, der baldige Hausherr ... bo

JOAN KENNEDY, die Frau des Senators Edward Kennedy, war der unbestrittene Star des Konzertes des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am Freitag in der Bonner Beethovenhalle. Sie hatte den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Das Orchester mußte mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahlreichen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin im fließenden weißen Maxi „geschossen" hatten. Das Gala-Konzert bot ein populäres Programm. Die Gäste saßen an Tischen und konnten sich während der Darbietungen mit Sandwiches, Sekt und Flaschenwein stärken.

Foto: AP

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 110,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Allgemeine Zeitung, Mainz
vom 19. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 14,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Oldenburgische Volkszeitung, Vechta
vom 19. April 1971

Egmont zu Sandwiches und Sekt

Ein neues gesellschaftliches Ereignis in Bonn

Bonn (dpa) — Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden: Die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett ist um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem Promoter Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich.

Politische Prominenz machte sich rar: Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten Bondarenko vertreten.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 147,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Westfalen-Blatt, Bielefeld
vom 20. April 1971

Musik, Sekt, Wein und Sandwiches

(dpa) — Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy war der prominenteste Zuhörer seiner Frau: Joan Kennedy hatte in der Bonner Beethovenhalle bei einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker den Sprechpart in Sergej Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen. Das Galakonzert des amerikanischen Orchesters, das unter seinem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein populäres Programm bot — Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, Peter Tschaikowskis Erstes Klavierkonzert mit Earl Wild als Solisten sowie Melodien aus dem Erfolgs-Musical „Hair" — fiel auch in anderer Hinsicht aus dem Rahmen: Die Konzertbesucher saßen währenddessen an Tischen im Saal und konnten sich mit Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein stärken.

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
W. S. Sauer 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 – Tel. 93 88 172
Ausschnitt aus:
SALZBURGER NACHRICHTEN
Salzburg Datum 19. April 1971

Galakonzert mit Sandwiches

Der amerikanische Senator Edward Kennedy war der prominenteste Zuhörer seiner Frau: Joan Kennedy hatte am Freitag abend in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle bei einem Konzert der Bostoner Symphoniker den Sprechpart in Prokofieffs musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" ausgeführt. Das Galakonzert des amerikanischen Orchesters, das unter seinem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein kunterbuntes Programm bot — Beethovens „Egmont"-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskijs Klavierkonzert Nr. 1, mit Earl Wild als Solisten, sowie Melodien aus dem Musical „Hair" — fiel auch in anderer Hinsicht aus dem Rahmen: Die Konzertbesucher saßen währenddessen an Tischen im Saal und konnten sich mit Sandwiches, Sekt und Wein stärken. Die Eintrittspreise betrugen 25 bis 150 DM.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 21,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Ruhr-Anzeiger, Hattingen
vom 20. April 197

Sandwichs, Sekt und Sinfonien

Bonns gesellschaftliches Leben um Spielart reicher: Essen mit Musik

Von HOLGER QUIRING

Bonn. Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte.

Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 26,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Oberhessische Presse, Marburg
vom 19. April 1971

Sekt und Sinfonisches – Mettwurst und Maestoso

Für 150 Mark durfte man in Bonn zum Abendessen das Boston Symphony Orchestra genießen

Von Holger Quiring

Bonn. Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Bonner Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra und seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte.

Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt am grün-goldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock ..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowski-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar.

Joan Kennedy und der Dirigent des Bostoner Orchesters, Arthur Fiedler.

182

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 37,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Saarbrücker Landeszeitung, Saarbrücken
vom 20. April 1971

Egmont zum Essen

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett wurde jetzt um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programmheft des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock..." Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißem Maxikleid — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Gastspiels auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller Junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei.

dpa

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 65,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Main-Echo, Aschaffenburg
vom 20. April 1971

Egmont zum Essen

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten. das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Bonner Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: Über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

Holger Quiring

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 7,1
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Taunus-Zeitung, Oberursel
vom 19. April 1971

Egmont mit Sandwiches – und bei den Preisen nicht zimperlich

Von unserem dpa-Korrespondenten Holger Quiring

Bonn, 18. April (dpa)

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war; weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskis erstem Klavierkonzert und Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Joan Kennedy spricht in Bonn von „Peter und Wolf". dpa-Foto

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malylom Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowski-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letztes inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

Egmont gab's zu Sandwiches und Sekt

Neues gesellschaftliches Ereignis in Bonn / Boston Symphony Orchestra spielt auf / Ehepaar Kennedy als prominenteste Gäste

dpa Bonn. Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, als deren prominenteste Sendboten in Bonn das Ehepaar Kennedy aufkreuzte.

Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte.

Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock ..."

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschlossen hatten.

Das Bostoner Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht garade zimperlich verfahren: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller jun., Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Bostoner Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt 23 DM.

Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 19,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Grafschafter Nachrichten, Nordhorn
vom 20. April 1971

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 199,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Nordwest-Zeitung, Oldenburg
19. April 1971

Egmont-Ouvertüre zum Essen

Galakonzert des Bostoner Sinfonieorchesters in Bonn

Joan Kennedy (Mitte), die Frau des amerikanischen Senators Edward Kennedy, in der Bonner Beethoven-Halle, wo sie in Sergej Prokofieffs Märchen mit Musik „Peter und der Wolf" den Text sprach. Rechts der Dirigent des Bostoner Sinfonieorchesters, Athur Fiedler.

Bonn. Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt ist um eine neue — allerdings zwiterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Zum Promotor dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens hatte sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber nur ein „populäres" Programm, wie das Bostoner Orchester es darbot: über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malcolm Frager.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich verfahren: 25 DM für den billigsten und 150 DM für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt. Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchestra bezahlen muß, beträgt sechs Dollar. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei. Die Frage bleibt: Was muß man in Bonn bezahlen, um „in" zu sein?

Holger Quiring

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 273,2
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Ruhrzeitung, Essen
vom 19. April 1971

Musik und elegante Brötchen

ge Aufspießt

Es gibt Dinge, die Balthasar ärgern. Zu ihnen gehört die seiner Ansicht nach blödsinnige Trennung in „ernsthafte" und „populäre" Konzerte. Je mehr sich nämlich die „ernsthafte" von der „populären" Musik entfernt, desto weniger kann sich der sogenannte Normalbürger heute damit zurechtfinden.

Wenn „moderne" Komponisten wie Stockhausen, Kagel, Schnebel die sogenannte offene Form der Wandelkonzerte propagieren, dann regt sich das Publikum sofort auf, sieht heilige Werte in Frage gestellt. Wenn aber, wie am letzten Wochenende, das für „leichte klassische Musik" zuständige Teilorchester der großen Bostoner Symphoniker Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre, Tschaikowskys 1. Klavierkonzert, Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" (ist das denn alles so „leicht"?) zusammen mit manch lustigeren Dingen galakonzertwürdig in Bonns Beethovenhalle präsentiert, bei Wildbachforellenfilet mit Kaviarsahne, gutem Wein, gutem Sekt und jeder Menge Prominenz, wenn da lustig herumgeschmatzt wird während der werten Musik, Prominente zur Besichtigung freigegeben sind, Kellner hin und her laufen dürfen mitten in einer Klavierkonzert-Kadenz — da regt sich kein Mensch auf.

Sollte es denn nur möglich sein, neue Formen des „Musikverbrauchs" mittels eleganter Brötchen, Weine und Prominenz hinzukriegen?

Balthasar fragt: In welcher Welt leben wir denn? Es scheint ihm: immer noch in der von Anno Tobak.

Balthasar

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 19,4
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Grafschafter Nachrichten, Nordhorn
17. April 1971
vom

Alles oder nichts für Rainer Barzel

Bonns größtes Spektakulum kam aus Boston

Von Alexander W. Porr

Für Rainer Barzel geht es jetzt um alles oder nichts. Denn in diesen Wochen entscheidet sich, ob der langjährige CDU/CSU-Fraktionsvorsitzende im Bundestag das Traumziel seiner politischen Karriere erreicht: Erster Mann seiner Partei zu werden! Barzel kämpft dafür mit der ihm eigenen Zähigkeit, Selbstdisziplin und Entschlossenheit. Während alle anderen Bonner Politiker sich einige Tage Osterurlaub genehmigten, sich der Familie widmeten oder ihre Steckenpferdchen ritten, absolvierte Rainer Barzel einen hochpolitischen Besuch in den USA.

Seine Frau Kriemhild („Timmchen") mußte die Osterfeiertage allein im Familienbungalow in Bad Godesberg verbringen. Ihr Mann hatte sich schon am Sonnabend vor dem Fest auf den Weg gemacht. Die Feiertage selbst verbrachte er in Nassau auf den Bahamas, nicht als sonnenhungriger und badevergnügter Tourist, sondern in geradezu asketischer Klausur. Er bereitete sich auf die Reise in die USA, vor allem auf die Zusammenkunft mit Präsident Nixon vor und feilte an einer Rede, die er in New York vor dem „Council of Foreign Relations" zu halten hatte.

Ferien ohne Grenzen.
Durch unser Ferienkonto.
VOLKSBANK
Wir bieten mehr als Geld und Zinsen.

ward und Joan Kennedy, begleiteten das Bostoner Philharmonische Orchester, das gestern abend in der Beethovenhalle ein Konzert gab. Joan Kennedy rezitierte dabei den Text zu Prokofieffs Märchen „Peter und der Wolf".

● Empfang im Bungalow

Bundesaußenminister und Vizekanzler Walter Scheel hatte am Mittag für den „Jet-Set" aus den USA einen Empfang im Kanzler-Bungalow gegeben, stellvertretend für den Regierungschef Willy Brandt, der erst am Wochenende vom Forellenangeln am Gardasee zurückkehrt. Der „liebenswürdige Herr Scheel" entledigte sich dieser Aufgabe selbstredend mit Charme, Routine und Eleganz. Der FDP-Vorsitzende gehört nun einmal zu den perfektesten Könnern auf dem Parkett der Bonner Gesellschaft.

Erstaunliches — und für viele deutsche Mutterherzen Betrübliches — wußten Journalisten zu berichten, die zur Ankunft der illustren amerikanischen Reisegesellschaft auf den Köln/Bonner Flughafen geeilt waren. Während sich Fotografen, Kameramänner und Schaulustige um die High Society aus Boston drängten, saß Publikumsliebling Heintje, von niemandem beachtet und von keinem einzigen Blitzlicht gewürdigt, im Warteraum. Am Sonntag nun trifft auf diesem Flughafen Rainer Barzel ein. Bleibt die Frage: Wie wird man ihn empfangen?

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 316,6
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Frankfurter Allgemeine, Frankfurt/Main
19. April 1971
vom

183
argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 165,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Saarbrücker Zeitung, Saarbrücken
20. April 1971
vom

Was ihnen schmeckt

Ein Bonner Nachhall

Der Stardirigent kam also im Feuerwehrauto und ließ sich musikalisch per Martinshorn ankündigen. Milliardär David Rockefeller erfreute sich der Gesellschaft von UdSSR-Geschäftsträger Alexander Bodorenko. Senator Edward Kennedy plauschte mit Außenminister Walter Scheel. Und Joan Kennedy stellte rund tausend Konsumfreudige mit der musikalischen Geschichte von „Peter und dem Wolf" zufrieden.

In der Bonner Beethoven-Halle – wir hatten bereits in der Montagausgabe darüber berichtet – schien für einen Abend die Welt in Ordnung. Bei Kerzenlicht und gegen Eintrittspreise von 150 DM gab das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Arthur Fiedler ein Galakonzert, dessen merkwürdiges Sammelsurium wohl nur unter dem Titel „Boston Pop" einigermaßen vertretbar unterzubringen war.

Zu Beethovens Egmont-Ouvertüre steckte man sich schnell ein Stück Holsteiner Katenrauchwurst mit Cornichons in den Mund und spülte zu Tschaikowskis Erstem Klavierkonzert mit einem Schluck 66er Niersteiner Fritzenhölle nach. Daß es Spätlese war, versteht sich.

Spritziger mußte es bei Prokofjews „Peter und der Wolf" zugehen: Ein Gläschen Perigord Imperial brut machte selbst Joan Kennedys Englisch verständlich.

Und wer das alles arrangiert hatte, Johannes Wasmuth, Adenauer-Kokoschka-Verkuppler, Bonner „Hofnarr" oder „Hochstapler", „Halbheiliger" oder „Kulturmäzen", stand schweißgebadet, bleich und engelsgesichtig bis zum Ende am Eingang und schüttelte Händchen. Wer hatte hier eigentlich wen genasführt?

Daß Lukullus der Gott der Musik gewesen sei, hat uns keine historische Quelle übermittelt. Woran also sollte man messen, was dieses von privaten Mäzenen getragene Orchester da in Bonns Beethoven-Halle zum besten gab? Dieser gewaltige Klangkörper zählt ja sicherlich zu den perfektesten und diszipliniertesten der Welt. Aber was heißt denn das bei Rostbeef rosa oder Wildbachforellenfilet? Kann man da im Allegro den Freiheitsgedanken noch glauben?

Aber was bedeuten hier schon kritische Einwände? Alles drängte zum Saint-Louis-Blues-Marsch. Und als das Publikum rhythmisch klatschend einstimmte, war man im Pop-Himmel angekommen. Zufrieden jauchzte groß und klein. Hier durften sie Konsumenten sein.

Lothar Schmidt-Mühlisch

Vom Senator un siiner Fru

Die Kennedys mit den Boston-Symphonikern in Bonn / Bericht von Walter Henkels

Der Prälat am Kölner Dom mußte warten. Der Bonner Oberbürgermeister Krämer schaute eine Dreiviertelstunde lang im Rathaus auf die Uhr. Der Kanzleramtsminister Ehmke wartete unruhig am Eingang des Palais Schaumburg. Der Kanzler-Diensttuer, Außenminister Scheel, sonst gelassen und in gefaßt liebenswürdiger Haltung, hatte eine wolkige Stirn, als er im Kanzlerbungalow wartete. Der rheinland-pfälzische Ministerpräsident Kohl wartete in seinem wilhelminisch-gußeisernen Bahnhof Rolandseck, wohin er geladen hatte; fast zwei Stunden wartete er. Dann kam der Herr Senator, kam, sah und — siegte nicht, sah vielmehr, daß er wieder weiterkam. Seine Frau kam erst gar nicht mit nach Rolandseck.

Auch die Senatorin schien strikte Order gegeben zu haben, überall mindestens eine Stunde zu spät zu kommen, die Leute warten zu lassen. Das, sagte ein amerikanischer Diplomat, sei bei den Kennedys üblich und eingeplant. Die Wartenden müßten in Spannung gesetzt werden.

Aber dieser Trick verfing hier am Rhein nicht. Eine feine Wand von Fremdheit und Distanz schien sich zwischen den Senator Edward Kennedy und seine Frau Joan einerseits und das Bonner Publikum andererseits gelegt zu haben. Die Leute aus den Staaten, zwei edle Blätter am Baum der Kennedys, mit den Bostoner Symphonikern auf einem Privattrip in der Bundeshauptstadt, faßten nicht recht Fuß am Rhein. Ohne richtige Lust sah man den Kennedys zu, etwas Argwohn gegen die Art, wie sie sich gerierten. Die Kennedys erinnerten an die Brüder Grimm, an den Fischer un sine Fru: Mandje, Mandje! Timpe Te!

Wir fragten den Senator Kennedy im Kanzlerbungalow, ob er Präsident der Vereinigten Staaten werden wolle. Der Senator schaute zu seiner Frau hinüber, und es schien, als ob er vorher eines Konventikels von ihr bedürfe. Er werde dazu nichts sagen, erwiderte er, es gelte, was er früher gesagt habe. Mandje, Mandja, Timpe Te!

Die Bostoner Symphoniker lieferten in einem Galakonzert in der Beethovenhalle bei belegten Brötchen „Boston Pops" für 100 bis 150 DM je Eintrittskarte. Für einen musikalischen Normalverbraucher ist das eine ganze Menge, auch wenn man hört, der Reinerlös werde guten Zwecken zugeführt. Das verbreitete ein junger Mann, der auch die Bostoner nach hier geholt hat, Wohlfahrt, wie es heißt, für Kinderdörfer und bedürftige Künstler, und läßt sich gern als Wohltäter feiern. Der Rolandsecker Bahnhof, halb Galerie, halb Kunsthalle, erfordert Zeit und Mühe. Man hört aufmerksam hin und hängt sich gerne an den Mund, wenn da die Rede ist vom großen Schnorren für die Gemeinnützigkeit.

Ein Alt-Bonner, der schon deswegen kein Intellektueller sein konnte, wurde gefragt, was er von der Musik der „Boston Pops" halte. Der Alt-Bonner erwiderte, er könne es nur soweit bringen wie jener Rittmeister, den eine Dame fragt, ob er die Musik von Wagner liebe. „Gnädige Frau", antwortete er, „ich fürchte sie nicht." Man brauchte sie auch, wie sich erwies, nicht zu fürchten.

Dieses Orchester wir wirklich ein Klasseorchester; das war Magie und Gloria, das war polierte Musik. (Dieser Pianist Malcom Frager!) Natürlich Beethoven, dann Tschaikowski, auch ein Stück aus dem Musical „Hair". In Serge Prokofjews musikalischem Märchen „Peter und der Wolf" hatte Joan Kennedy den Sprechpart. Vom Platz weg hätte man die germanenblonde Senatorin engagieren mögen, so gut sah sie aus mit ihrer Mähne, so gut stand ihr das bißchen Lampenfieber, obschon die Sprechdilettantin an die fünfhundertmal schon auf der Bühne stand. Sie kam im Silberbrokat.

Und im Silberbrokat kam zu des Ministerpräsidenten Kohl Party in Rolandseck auch die Zigeunerin Margarete Gussantier, genannt Buchela aus Remagen. Die delphischen Schäkereien der Wahrsagerin Buchela enthüllten sich in diesen Worten an Edward Kennedy: „Sie werden Präsident von Amerika, aber noch nicht." Dann wünschte die Frau mit dem zweiten Gesicht und dem sechsten Sinn, aber von etwas primitiver Machart, dem Senator alles Gute und Gottes Segen.

Einige Dutzend Mäzene und Mäzeninnen waren aus Amerika mit den Kennedys und dem Bostoner Orchester angereist, die Damen mit viel Wohlwollen und aparten Hütchen. Die wichtigsten, sagte man, hießen Cabod, Fahnestock, Sargent, Thompson, Rockefeller. Und ein Prälat war auch mit von der Partie, wie das in der Ordnung ist.

Eine Eskorte mit weißen Mäusen bekam Edward Kennedy nicht, aber genügend Polizeischutz, denn der ist jetzt in der Bundeshauptstadt angebracht. Die Bostoner in Bonn sind verstummt, mit dem großen Damentroß nach Wien und Rom weitergereist. Und auch Edward und Joan, der Senator un siine Fru, sind gen Süden gefahren.

argus Seit 1667
Auflage (i. Ts.): 41,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Göttinger Tagblatt, Göttingen
vom 19. April 1971

Egmont zum Essen

Politische Prominenz war rar vertreten

Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock ..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen. Der Rahmen einer solchen Veranstaltung verträgt aber wohl auch nur ein „populäres" Programm wie das Bostoner Orchestra es darbot: über die Egmont-Ouvertüre zu Tschaikowskys erstem Klavierkonzert und Sergej Prokofieffs „Peter und der Wolf" bis hin zu einem Querschnitt durch das Erfolgs-Musical „Hair".

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stippvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten. Das Boston Symphony Orchestra bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malclom Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

argus Seit 1667
Auflage (i. Ts.): 11,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1969" –
Ausschnitt aus:
Segeberger Zeitung, Bad Segeberg
vom 19. April 1971

„Egmont" zu Sandwiches und Sekt in Bonn Ehepaar Kennedy als prominenteste Gäste Dazu spielte das „Boston Symphony Orchestra"

Bonn (dpa). Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist etwas Neues zu vermelden: Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Steh-Empfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue — allerdings etwas zwitterhafte — Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival Pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte.

Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das „Boston Symphony Orchestra" unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues von Christopher Handy reichte.

Im Saale drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer — für weniger Geld — auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grüngoldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock . . ."

Politische Prominenz machte sich rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner USA-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stipvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

Unbestrittener Star des Konzerts war Joan Kennedy, die — in fließendem weißen Maxi — den Sprechpart in „Peter und der Wolf" übernommen hatte. Hier mußte das Orchester mit seinem Einsatz warten, bis die zahllosen Fotografen ausreichend Bilder der prominenten Solistin geschossen hatten.

Das „Boston Symphony Orchestra" bot makellose technische Präzision, ebenso der Pianist Malclom Frager, der den virtuosen und prunkvollen Solopart des Tschaikowsky-Konzerts so souverän bewältigte, daß das Publikum anhaltend applaudierte.

Die Premiere des Bostoner Vorbilds auf deutschem Boden verlief allerdings nicht völlig ohne Mißtöne. Bei der Festlegung der Eintrittspreise war man nicht gerade zimperlich: 25 Mark für den billigsten und 150 Mark für den teuersten Platz, letzteres inklusive Verzehr. Über diese Preise zeigte sich David Rockefeller junior, Manager des Bostoner Orchesters, etwas verstimmt.

Der höchste Preis, den man in den USA für ein Konzert des „Boston Symphony Orchestra" bezahlen muß, beträgt 23 Mark. Aber in Bonn, so meinte der Manager, sei man wohl so versnobt, daß man jeden Preis zu zahlen bereit sei.

argus Seit 1667
Auflage (i. Ts.): 173,5
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Westfälische, Bielefeld
vom 19. April 1971

Galakonzert mit Sandwich in der Beethovenhalle

Von Holger Quiring

Bonn (dpa). Von den feinen Leuten zu Bonn am Rhein ist Neues zu vermelden. Wie um die Klage zu widerlegen, das gesellschaftliche Leben in der Bundeshauptstadt sei eintönig und wenig abwechslungsreich, ist jetzt die Skala der Entfaltungsmöglichkeiten zwischen Stehempfang und Staatsbankett um eine neue – allerdings etwas zwitterhafte – Variante bereichert worden: Abendessen mit Musik.

Es blieb dem „Festival pro" und seinem rührigen Promoter Johannes Wasmuth vorbehalten, das Bonner Publikum mit dieser in Amerika längst üblichen Spielart gesellschaftlichen Verhaltens vertraut zu machen, zu deren prominentesten Sendboten in Bonn sich das Ehepaar Kennedy gemacht hatte. Auf dem Podium der Beethovenhalle brachte das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter seinem weißhaarigen Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler ein Programm zu Gehör, das vom klassischen Pathos der Egmont-Ouvertüre bis zum auch schon klassischen St. Louis Blues March von William Christopher Handy reichte. Im Saal drunten saßen die Gäste derweil an weißgedeckten Tischen und hatten Sandwiches, Wein und Sekt vor sich. Wer – für weniger Geld – auf der Empore saß, mußte leiblichen Genüssen entsagen, sofern er nicht vielleicht ein Butterbrot bei sich hatte: Sekt und Sinfonisches, Mettwurst und Maestoso.

In Boston ist dergleichen seit Jahren gang und gäbe. Das Programm des Konzerts weiß zu enthüllen: „Das Publikum nimmt an grün-goldenen Tischen Platz, bestellt Getränke, Tagesneuigkeiten machen die Runde. Dann, gefeiert von herzlichem Beifall, hebt Arthur Fiedler den Taktstock ..." Bevor Fiedler in Bonn den Taktstock heben konnte, mußte er allerdings auch noch warten, bis das Publikum mit Getränken versorgt war: Weißbehandschuhte Kellner eilten durch den Saal, um die Gäste an den Tischen mit einem 1969er Rheinhessen, später mit Champagner und Kaffee zu versorgen.

Politische Prominenz machte sich vergleichsweise rar an diesem Abend. Neben dem Ehepaar Kennedy, das sich vor Autogrammwünschen kaum zu retten wußte, saßen Außenminister Walter Scheel und seine Frau Mildred am Tisch, gegenüber der Schirmherr der Veranstaltung, der Bonner US-Botschafter Kenneth Rush. Die andere Supermacht war durch den sowjetischen Gesandten A. P. Bondarenko vertreten. Und schließlich war auch aus Boston per Jumbo-Jet eine Schar von „Freunden" des Orchesters zu einer Stipvisite an den Rhein gekommen.

In der Tat: Noch am Donnerstag, als das Boston-Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung des humorvollen Dirigenten Fiedler, der in Berlin studiert hat und 1915 nach Amerika ausgewandert ist, im Bonner Rathaus empfangen wurde, war von Edward Kennedy nicht die Rede; nur davon, daß seine sommersprossige Gattin Joan am Abend darauf in der Beethovenhalle auftreten werde.

Das Büfett gestern im Kanzler-Bungalow war nach dem Motto angelegt: Die Kultur fängt erst dort an, wo Kartoffelsalat warm angemacht wird, also südlich des Mains. Man trank neben dem vornehm-obligaten Whisky vor allem Münchener Bier, aß Leberkäse und Laugenbrezeln, delikate Salate. Man trank und aß zunächst ohne die Kennedys. „Nur" Außenminister Walter Scheel und Frau Mildred widmeten sich den Gästen. Sie in mid-gelb.

Derweilen parlierten Kanzleramtsminister Horst Ehmke und Senator Kennedy im Kanzleramt. „Tour d'Horizont" kommentierte Ehmke hernach den politischen Inhalt des längeren Gesprächs, was soviel sagen will: Ich sage nichts, wir haben über alles und jeden gesprochen. Was er denn davon halte, daß Oppositionschef Barzel beruhigter aus Amerika zurückkehre als er hingefahren sei, wollten wir von Ehmke wissen. Der Kanzleramtsminister murmelte vor sich hin. Man meinte so etwas wie „Hysterie" zu hören und erhielt alsbald die offizielle Beurteilung: „Wenn Herr Barzel zur Beruhigung extra nach Amerika fahren muß, so zeigt das nur, wie steril aufgeregt er ist."

Bis dahin war die Hobby-Pianistin Joan Kennedy noch nicht im Kanzler-Etablissement eingetroffen. Sie käme gar nicht, sagte Minister Scheel, alldieweil sie unpäßlich sei. Sie käme sehr wohl, sagte Ehemann Edward, und der müßte es ja wohl besser wissen. Und siehe da, sie kam. Im hellblauen Hosenanzug und dunkelblauen Rollkragenpulli und stahl allen die Schau. Sie lächelte über den Bericht einer Hamburger Zeitung, wonach sie in Hot Pants in der Bonner Beethovenhalle die Bostoner Symphoniker begleiten (oder verwirren?) werde. „Meine Frau kann Hot Pants sehr gut tragen", wußte Hausherr Edward.

Prominent waren übrigens nicht nur Fiedlers Musikanten, die Creme de la Creme bildete die Begleitung. Der Künstler-Förderer Wasmuth durfte stolz sein: Die Rockefellers waren da, in Old Germany immer noch der Inbegriff von Wohlstand. Die Cabots kennt man schon weniger. Aber sie waren auch da und tranken Bier. In Amerika sagt man, die milliardenschweren Cabots würden, wenn überhaupt, höchstens mit der Familie Cabot-Lodge reden. Und diese wiederum nur mit dem lieben Gott. Die Cabot-Lodges waren auch da. Sie sprachen mit Ehmke.

POLITIK

Bonn hatte seinen „großen Tag": Die Kennedys beim Sektfrühstück

Bostoner Symphoniker brachten Amerikas High Society mit

Von unserem Bonner Korrespondenten
Claus Dreher

Bonn, 17. April

„Wie heißt der nächste Präsident der USA?" wurde Senator Edward Kennedy despektierlich gefragt. Edward, in einem geknitterten Anzug mit Kerzenwachs auf der Schulter, lächelt kurz, ein wenig verlegen, auf der Terrasse des Kanzler-Bungalows: „Überlegen Sie, wer der nächste Präsident ist", sagt er und sieht zu, wie er die Würstchen los wird, die er auf dem Teller schon gut zehn Minuten vor sich hin trägt.

Und dabei wird er vor allem von den Damen der High Society, die Außenminister Walter Scheel nebst Ehegatten zu diesem sogenannten Sektfrühstück in den Kanzler-Bungalow eingeladen hat, förmlich angehimmelt. „Ach, schauen Sie nur, ganz der Bruder", lispelt eine seidenbestickte und brillantierte Dame so um die Sechzig. Sie schiebt sich näher heran, erhascht ein Lächeln aus den blauen Augen von Ted und ist restlos glücklich.

Großer Empfang für die amerikanischen Gäste. Von l. n. r.: Senator Edward Kennedy, Mildred Scheel, Joan Kennedy und Außenminister Walter Scheel.

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (i. Ts.): 8,5 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Heidenheimer Neue Presse, Heidenheim
vom 17. April 1971
286

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (i. Ts.): 35,7 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
NWZ Göppinger Kreisnachrichten, Göppingen
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (i. Ts.): 8,8 – lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Kreisnachrichten, Calw
vom 17. April 1971

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (i. Ts.): 13,9 – lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Waiblinger Kreiszeitung, Waiblingen
vom 17. April 1971

Ein Orchester von Weltrang

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra auf Konzerttournee durch Europa

Zu seiner dritten Europa-Tournee ist eines der Spitzenorchester der Welt über den großen Teich gekommen: das Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nach dem Beginn in London trat das Orchester vergangene Woche in Stuttgart eine Gastspielreise durch die Bundesrepublik an. Heute und morgen geben die Bostoner in Wien ein Konzert, die nächsten Stationen sind Rom, Barcelona und Paris.

Eigentlich sind es drei Orchester, die das hohe Niveau amerikanischer Musikinterpretation dokumentieren, denn die „Bostonians" präsentieren drei Besetzungen: als Symphonie-Orchester unter der Leitung von William Steinberg und dem erst 26jährigen Nachwuchsdirigenten Michael Tilson Thomas, als Boston Pops mit Arthur Fiedler und als Symphony Chamber Players (Kammerorchester).

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

Ein Jahr älter als das Berliner Philharmonische Orchester wurde das Boston Symphony Orchestra 1881 von dem Finanzmann Henry L. Higginson gegründet. Er stiftete eine Million Dollar als finanzielle Basis für das erste ständige hochqualifizierte Orchester Amerikas. Mit solcher finanzieller Rückendeckung ließ sich gut musizieren, hervorragend musizieren aber erst, als der Leipziger Theaterkapellmeister Arthur Nikisch 1889 die Leistung der Bostoner übernahm. Von da ab war dem Orchester die Weltrangstellung sicher. Die Reihe berühmter Dirigenten ist zugleich die Reihe der großen Erfolge. Wir nennen einige Namen: den Wagner-Spezialisten Karl Muck, der von der Königlichen Oper Berlin kam; Pierre Monteux, der von 1919 bis 1925 Chefdirigent war; Serge Kussewitzky, der Kompositionsaufträge an die bedeutendsten Komponisten der Zeit erteilte, an den jetzt gestorbenen Strawinsky, an Béla Bartók zum Beispiel; Charles Munch und Erich Leinsdorf, dessen Nachfolge nun William Steinberg angetreten hat.

Als William Steinberg bei der Pressekonferenz in Stuttgart zu Beginn der Deutschland-Tournee von der „Demonstration" sprach, der sein Orchester bei der Gastspielreise verpflichtet sei, zeigte er sich der Tradition der Bostoner würdig; denn schon immer sah es dieses Orchester als seine vornehmste Aufgabe an, zeitgenössische Musik zu demonstrieren: das amerikanische Publikum mit europäischen Zeitgenossen bekannt zu machen, dem deutschen Publikum jetzt neben großen Europäern Vertreter amerikanischer Musik vorzustellen.

Die Europa-Tournee des Boston Symphony Orchestra fällt zusammen mit einer frohen Meldung für die deutschen Schallplattenfreunde: Die Deutsche Grammophon-Gesellschaft, die die Bostoner unter Exklusivvertrag genommen hat, legt die ersten Einspielungen vor: Peter Tschaikowskys Symphonie Nr. 1, „Trois Nocturnes" und drei Sonaten von Claude Debussy, „Daphnis et Chloe" von Maurice Ravel sowie Werke von Charles Ives und Carl Ruggles. Weitere Einspielungen kommen in Kürze auf den Markt, es handelt sich um Werke von Alexander Skrjabin (Poème de l'Extase), Friedrich Smetana (Mein Vaterland), Peter Tschaikowsky (Romeo und Julia), Claude Debussy (Prélude und Images).

Es ist das erstemal in der 90jährigen Geschichte des Boston Symphony Orchestra, daß diese mit über 200 Konzerten pro Saison überaus fleißigen Musiker nicht auf Platten einer amerikanischen Firma zu hören sind. do-

WILLIAM STEINBERG

WILLIAM STEINBERG ist seit 1969 Chefdirigent. Er wurde 1899 in Köln geboren, studierte bei Hermann Abendroth und assistierte Otto Klemperer. Er war Direktor des Deutschen Theaters in Prag, wirkte an den Opernhäusern von Frankfurt und Berlin, setzte sich für Bergs „Wozzeck", Weills „Mahagonny" und Schoenbergs „Von Heute auf Morgen" ein, gründete die Israelische Philharmonie, folgte 1938 einer Einladung Arturo Toscaninis nach den USA. Steinberg ist überzeugt, daß nur aus einer langen und engen Bindung der Musiker an einen Dirigenten eine gute Zusammenarbeit und außerordentliche Leistungen entstehen.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS mußte mitten in einem Konzert für den plötzlich erkrankten Steinberg einspringen und hatte einen sensationellen Erfolg. Damit begann der steile Aufstieg des 1944 in Hollywood Geborenen. Seine Erfahrungen sammelte er u. a. bei Pierre Boulez in Bayreuth. Seine bevorzugten Komponisten sind Strawinsky, Mahler, Ravel, Debussy.

186

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 1998,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Bunte Deutsche Illustrierte, Offenburg

vom 11. Mai 1971

Höhepunkte

Hans Hollmanns Inszenierung von Muschg/Goethes „Die Aufgeregten" im Berliner Schloßpark-Theater.

Will Quadflieg in Schillers „Wallenstein" im Staatstheater Hannover.

Uraufführung von Volker David Kirchners Kompositionen beim Wiesbadener „Ensemble 70".

Tournee des Boston Symphony Orchestra — Dirigent: William Steinberg — durch die Bundesrepublik.

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 34,9
– lt. „Leitfaden 1970 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Eßlinger Zeitung, Eßlingen

vom 11. Mai 1971

Gerillte Visitenkarten

Orchesterporträts aus Boston, London und Bamberg auf Schallplatten

Eine Nachlese zu den Stuttgarter Erfolgskonzerten der vergangenen Wochen bieten die Frühjahrsneuerscheinungen bei Decca. Drei bekannte Orchester, die unlängst ihre Visitenkarten abgegeben haben, lassen sich in repräsentativen Porträts an der häuslichen Stereoanlage überprüfen. Die Qualitätsmerkmale des Konzertsaals finden sich dabei weitgehend bestätigt.

Unter dem Titel „Boston Symphony in Europe" hat RCA schnell entschlossen die spektakuläre Tournee der Bostoner mit einer Kassette begleitet, deren Inhalt noch aus den Jahren stammt, da Erich Leinsdorf Chefdirigent des amerikanischen Superorchesters war. Den auf zwei Langspielplatten vorgestellten Aufnahmen aus den sechziger Jahren (Mozarts Sinfonien Nr. 36 C-Dur „Linzer" und Nr. 39 Es-Dur; Gustav Mahlers Symphonie Nr. 1 „Der Titan") ist vor allem zu entnehmen, daß die Klangtradition der Bostoner Symphoniker eine Konstante ist, die alle Orchesterchefs zur Arbeitsgrundlage machten, ob sie nun Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf oder William Steinberg heißen. Die Hochglanzpolitur des „Boston sound" steht Mahlers stürmisch bewegter erster Sinfonie etwas besser zur Partitur als den beiden Mozartsinfonien, deren schwelgerische Aufmachung den Europäer doch überrascht. (RK 11 507/1-2 Stereo)

Zwei neue Einspielungen von Neville Marriners „Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields" verdeutlichen, was den Rang dieses großartigen, in einem Blitzanlauf zur Weltspitze vorgestoßenen Londoner Ensembles ausmacht. Es ist das imponierende Vertrauen auf die Überzeugungskraft eines „Molto eleganto-Stiles", der dieses Kammerorchester wie englische Tanzpaare zu Turniersiegen beflügelt. Was sie anfassen, wird zu reinstem Golde. Die hochromantische Streicherserenade Dvoraks, gekoppelt mit Griegs populärer Suite „Aus Holbergs Zeit" ergibt eines der feinsinnigsten Dokumente für zeitgemäße Wahrheitsfindung im romantischen Bereich (SXL 21 221-B). Für Bartóks „Musik für Saiteninstrumente, Schlagzeug und Celesta" und das Divertimento für Streichorchester haben die Londoner zu Recht den Edison-Preis erhalten: Besser kann man nicht darlegen, daß Bartóks Werke bruchlos aus dem neunzehnten Jahrhundert in das zwanzigste führt. (SXL 21 216-B)

Vor wenigen Jahren, als die großen Schallplattengesellschaften noch nicht zum Wettstreit angetreten waren, in einer Art Bibliothek von Alexandria die gesamte musikalische Hinterlassenschaft der letzten Jahrhunderte zu sammeln, hätte man einen Auftrag für unmöglich gehalten, den die Philharmonia Hungarica in Marl unter der Leitung des Landsmannes Antal Dorati jetzt auszuführen hat: sämtliche einhundertundvier Sinfonien Joseph Haydns einzuspielen. Dorati sieht die Riesenaufgabe in rosigem Optimismus: „Alles sind Meisterwerke, und selbst die frühesten bieten wesentlich bessere Musik als beispielsweise die ersten Mozartsinfonien." Ob die klangliche Beweisführung diese These stützen wird, bleibt abzuwarten, denn uns liegen bis jetzt erst die Sinfonien Nr. 49 bis Nr. 64 in Kassette vor und damit eine Schaffensepoche Haydns, aus der gelegentlich auch im Konzertsaal ein Beispiel zu hören ist. Die Philharmonia Hungarica jedenfalls geht diesen mittleren Haydn bereits im Stile der großen klassischen Sinfonik an, mit breitem dynamischem Spektrum und bedeutungsstarken, fast beethovenschen Akzenten. Es ist zu spüren, daß hier an Haydns Größe bewußt gearbeitet wird. (Decca SHE 25 053-D/1-8)

Erwin Schwarz

vienna

pre-concert publicity

SAKO
Zeitungs - Ausschnittdienst / Wien ~~III., Schützeng. 9, Ruf 7310929~~

Ausschnitt aus:
Die Presse
Wien
17. April 1971

In einer Mission unterwegs

„Presse"-Gespräch mit dem Dirigenten William Steinberg

William Steinberg in Wien. Im Hotel Imperial empfängt ein eher kleiner, sich sehr gerade haltender Herr mit der natürlichen Würde und Höflichkeit eines Mannes, der von seinem Wert weiß. Und sich auch so gibt. Beim Gespräch, von dem vorher nicht feststeht, ob es vielleicht sogar ein Interview wird.

Steinberg, vor 1933 Generalmusikdirektor in Frankfurt, ist der Chef zweier großer amerikanischer Orchester. In Pittsburgh und in Boston gilt sein Wort, was die Wahl der Programme seiner eigenen wie der von Gastdirigenten geleiteten Konzerte angeht. Weil man in Amerika eben immer noch den artistischen Leiter anerkennt, dem in künstlerischen Fragen niemand dreinreden darf. Nicht die Ansammlung von „Friends", den Gönnern, den Mäzenen, den Freunden im besten Sinn des Wortes und auch nicht die „Directors" oder „Trustees", die ihn bestellen. Es gibt einen finanziellen Manager, der eine Art von Einspruchsrecht hat, wenn für irgendwelche Pläne einfach keine finanzielle Bedeckung mehr vorhanden ist.

„Es ist großartig, dieses System. Als ich in Frankfurt General war, da wurden wir alle von den Steuerzahlern finanziert und immerhin gab es manchmal Versuche, Einfluß auf das Programm auszuüben. In Amerika, wo privates Geld den Hintergrund darstellt, gibt es das nicht. Man bringt mir Vertrauen entgegen und ich hafte mit meiner Person für die Qualität." Das Gespräch über falsche Ansichten von Amerika, wie sie in Europa immer noch grassieren, ist fortzusetzen. „Man meint im Grunde immer noch, in den Staaten kämen die Wilden unbekleidet hinter den Büschen hervor. Um dieses Vorurteil, diese Abwehrreaktion oder was immer es ist zu zerstreuen, fahren amerikanische Ensembles nach Europa. Mit den besten Musikern, den besten Instrumenten. Das ist eine Mission, der wir uns gern unterziehen, wenngleich es strapaziös ist und außer der Freude des Wiedersehens mit dem treuen europäischen Publikum nichts einbringt."

Steinberg hätte auch Zahlen zur Verfügung, um die Kultur des amerikanischen Publikums zu untermauern. Die Anzahl der ausverkauften Konzerte in größeren als europäischen Konzertsälen, das Interesse an neuerer Musik, die hervorragende Stellung der Musiker in der Gesellschaft — wenigstens ein Faktum soll näher besprochen werden.

Amerikas Publikum scheint Steinberg dem Neuen gegenüber eher aufgeschlossen. „Wenn man die Publikationen von Schott oder Universal Edition oder sonst einem Verlag liest, hat man den bestimmten Eindruck, in Europa bläst man zeitgenössische Komponisten bereits auf der Straße. Ich weiß nun, daß dem nicht so ist. In Amerika dagegen hört man sich diese Musiken immerhin an. Und zwar nicht nur, wenn man zu den berühmten 500 Menschen einer Stadt gehört." Immerhin war Steinberg der Vorkämpfer für Mahler und Bruckner in den USA und meint, nun der einzige Kämpfer für Bruckner zu sein — er weiß, daß seine Kollegen diese Symphonien ihrer Länge wegen nicht gern auf das Programm setzen.

Mit Gustav Mahler ist er nun auch in Wien. Er dirigiert das Bostoner Orchester und die VII. Symphonie, von der er weiß, daß sie auch hier nicht zum täglichen Brot gehört. „Wir werden nach dem ersten Satz die Pause machen. Ich habe das immer so gehalten, die Anspannung nach dem ersten Satz einer Mahler-Symphonie ist so groß, daß Publikum, Orchester und Dirigent sich eine Pause verdient haben. Es ist dies von Mahler durchaus gestattet und bisher hat noch keiner der schärfsten amerikanischen Kritiker etwas dagegen einzuwenden gehabt."

Nach dem aufrichtigen Lob der amerikanischen Orchester und der Darlegung der Gründe, warum er nun mit den Bostonern auf Tournee ist — siehe oben, Stichwort Mission — erhält William Steinberg eine Frage, mit der man ein Gespräch gut schließen kann. Ob er sich vorstellen könnte, wieder nach Europa zu übersiedeln und seine Position als großer alter Mann am Dirigentenpult zu leben. Er denkt nach, allerdings nicht über die Frage, sondern nur über eine eindeutig formulierte Antwort. Sie lautet selbstverständlich „Nein". Steinberg hat in den USA zwei Orchester zu betreuen — er hat im Vorjahr ein reduziertes Programm von nur 70 Konzerten selbst geleitet — und ein von ihm erzogenes Publikum. Er hat seine Wohnungen und sein Landhaus, er hat jede Form von finanzieller Unabhängigkeit und er hat die Chance, nach Europa auf Besuch zu kommen. Auf Besuche, die ihm durchaus genügen. Denn neben der Anhänglichkeit des musikalischen Publikums merkt er auch die merkwürdige Einstellung der Europäer gegenüber den Amerikanern. Der Kreis hat sich geschlossen, das Gespräch ist vorbei. Ein Herr verabschiedet seinen Gesprächspartner formvollendet.

F. E.

SAKO Zeitungsausschn
Wien ~~III., Schützengas~~
Tel. 42 18 384 / ~~73-6~~

Ausschnitt aus:
~~DER JUGENDLICHE ARBEITER~~
KURIER
Wien Datum 14. März 1971

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
Susi W. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 — Tel. 93 38 172

Ausschnitt aus:
OBER ~~NIEK~~-ÖSTERR. NACHRICHTEN ~~RHEINTEX~~
Linz ~~RXX~~ Datum 30. März 1971

Der Welt fleißigstes Orchester

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra wieder auf Europa-Tournee

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra, das in diesem Jahr sein 90jähriges Bestehen feiert, unternimmt im April seine 3. Europatournee. Im Rahmen der Gastspielreise wird das Orchester unter der Leitung von William Steinberg am 17. und 18. April im „Goldenen Saal" des Musikvereins in Wien konzertieren. Weitere Stationen der Tournee sind London, Stuttgart, Berlin, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Rom, Barcelona, Paris.

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra kam 1952 unter seinem damaligen Chefdirigenten Charles Munch erstmals nach Europa. 1956 gastierten die Bostoner als erster westlicher Klangkörper in der Sowjetunion.

Das Orchester, das am 22. Oktober 1881 in der Boston Music Hall debutierte, ist eines der fleißigsten der Welt. Es wird in der Saison 1970/71 nicht weniger als 215 Konzerte bestreiten.

Der Dirigent William Steinberg, ein gebürtiger Kölner, steht heute an der Spitze zweier bedeutender Orchester: er ist auf Lebenszeit Chef des Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra und leitet seit 1968 auch die Bostoner — ein einzigartiges Faktum in der Musikgeschichte Amerikas. In Wien wird er in beiden Konzerten Mozarts Linzer Symphonie und Gustav Mahlers Siebente Symphonie dirigieren.

SAKO
Zeitungs - Ausschnittdienst / Wien ~~III., Schützeng. 9, Ruf 7310929~~

Ausschnitt aus:
Die Presse
Wien
15. April 1971

MIT MAHLER AUF DEM WEG NACH WIEN: WILLIAM STEINBERG
Der USA nobelstes Orchester, die Bostoner Philharmonie, ist auf Europatournee. Unter William Steinberg werden die Musiker, die in diesen Tagen Jubelhymnen in Deutschland einheimsen, am Wochenende im Musikverein gastieren. Auf dem Programm: Mahlers VII. Symphonie.

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172

Information aus:
WIENER ZEITUNG
Wien Datum 15. April 1971

Der Dirigent William Steinberg, ein gebürtiger Kölner, steht an der Spitze zweier bedeutender Orchester: er ist auf Lebenszeit Chef des Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra und leitet seit 1968 auch das Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mit Letztgenanntem, das heuer sein 90jähriges Bestehen feiert, unternimmt Steinberg derzeit eine Europatournee. Das Orchester wird am 17. und 18. d. auch im Musikverein in Wien konzertieren

Thomas dirigiert im Konzerthaus

Michael Tilson Thomas, „Assistant Conductor" beim Boston Symphony Orchestra, von der Zeitschrift „Musical America" zum „Musician of the year" für 1970 gewählt, wird am 27. November in Wien debütieren und ein Konzert der Wiener Symphoniker im Konzerthaus leiten.

Der junge „Musiker des Jahres", dessen erste Plattenaufnahmen in den vergangenen Monaten erschienen sind, gilt als eine der größten Dirigentenbegabungen, die in den letzten Jahren von sich reden machten. Er war vor seiner Bostoner Position Assistent bei Bernstein gewesen, der von dem jungen Kollegen nur mit Worten des größten Enthusiasmus berichtet.

155

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172

Information aus:
KURIER

Wien Datum

Boston unterwegs zum Musikverein

Nächstes Wochenende gastiert in Wien das heuer 90 Jahre alte Boston Symphony Orchestra. Gemessen an Qualität und Brillanz der amerikanischen Orchester gehört Boston gewiß noch immer zu den Musikhauptstädten der USA – heute etwa neben Cleveland, Philadelphia, New York und Los Angeles. Der Name dieses Ensembles ist mit dem eines Dirigenten verbunden: Kussevitzky. Er hat „Boston Symphony" ein Vierteljahrhundert geleitet, von 1924 bis 1949. Was Tradition ist an diesem Orchester, stammt von ihm.

Zahllos sind die Plattenaufnahmen (die ersten entstanden schon 1917!) – zwei Neuerscheinungen der jüngsten Zeit seien hier herausgegriffen:

Für RCA hat Seiji Ozawa Strawinskys „Feuervogel" (Suite 1919) und „Petruschka" (Fassung 1947) aufgenommen. Dort wird die Nähe des Impressionismus betont, hier die Jahrmarktatmosphäre. Ozawa differenziert sehr genau im Klang, in den Farbwerten, er läßt die „Feuervogel"-Musik zuweilen gleichsam märchenhaft irisieren und der Marionette Petruschka keine rhythmische Freiheit. Beide Partituren sind elegant poliert. Den Klavierpart spielt bravourös Michael Tilson Thomas, der Assistant Conductor des Orchesters (LSC 3167).

Seit dem Vorjahr nimmt „Boston Symphony" für die Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft auf. Eine der ersten Produktionen galt Werken von Debussy („Trois Nocturnes") und Ravel („Pavane" und „Daphnis et Cloe II") mit Chorassistenz, dirigiert von Claudio Abbado. Es ist eine der aufnahme- und preßtechnisch, vor allem aber auch musikalisch besten und schönsten Platten mit symphonischer Musik geworden, die mir in letzter Zeit untergekommen sind (DGG 2561 012). Die perfekte Virtuosität des Orchesters ist von allen Seiten zu bewundern, man spürt Temperament, Wärme, Anteilnahme, Abbado disponiert die Stücke ruhig, souverän, ohne sie deshalb abzukühlen, und das Team der Technik sorgt dafür, daß die Musik plastisch, genau und auch in extremen dynamischen Bereichen noch so klingt, als gäbe es Reserven, die ungenützt blieben.

Karl Löbl

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
Susi W. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 — Tel. 93 88 172

Ausschnitt aus:
~~DER KLEINE~~ ARBEITER ZEITUNG
27. März 1971

Wien Datum

Boston Symphony Orchestra nach Wien

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra, das in diesem Jahr sein 90jähriges Bestehen feiert, unternimmt im April seine dritte Europatournee. Im Rahmen der Gastspielreise wird das Orchester auch in Wien gastieren.

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
Susi W. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 — Tel. 93 88 172

Ausschnitt aus:
EXPRESS ~~AM ABEND~~

Wien Datum

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester wird im Rahmen seiner Europatournee am 17. und 18. April in Wien gastieren.

sako Zeitungsausschn
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 W
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 8

Information aus:
KURIER
27. März 1971

Wien Datum

William Steinberg und sein Boston Symphony Orchestra geben am 17. und 18. April im Musikverein zwei Konzerte mit Mozarts „Linzer Symphonie" und der „Siebenten" von Mahler.

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
1080 Wien, Langegasse 11
Tel. 42 18 384 / 55 73 576

Ausschnitt aus:
~~EXPRESS~~
KURIER
16. März 1971

Wien Datum

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
W. S. Sauer 1070 W
Neubaugasse 1 – Tel. 93 88 17

Ausschnitt aus:
ÖSTERR. VOLKSSTIMME
18. März 1971

Wien Datum

Die Bostoner kommen

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra wird im Rahmen seiner bevorstehenden Europatournee am 17. und 18. April auch in Wien gastieren. Das Orchester wird von den Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler, William Steinberg und Michael Tilson Thomas geleitet. Vor den beiden Konzerten in Wien werden die Bostoner unter anderem in Bonn, Frankfurt, Hamburg, Hannover, Berlin und Stuttgart gastieren.

Orchestergäste aus Boston

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra wird im Rahmen seiner bevorstehenden Europatournee am 17. und am 18. April auch in Wien gastieren. Das Orchester wird von den Dirigenten Arthur Fiedler, William Steinberg und Michael Tilson Thomas geleitet.

Vor den Wiener Konzerten gastieren die Bostoner in mehreren Städten Westdeutschlands.

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
Wien ~~III., Schützengasse 9~~
Tel. 42 18 384 / ~~73 86 142~~

Ausschnitt aus:
~~INTERNATIONALE WIRTSCHAFT~~
DIE PRESSE 16. März 1971

Wien Datum

DREI DIRIGENTEN kommen mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra nach Wien, das hier am 17. und 18. April gastieren wird: Arthur Fiedler, William Steinberg und der Bernstein-Schüler Michael Tilson Thomas, dem ein blendender Ruf als Nachwuchsdirigent vorausgeht.

SAKO
Zeitungs - Ausschnitt-
dienst / Wien III.
Schlachthausgasse 8, Ruf 7310923

Ausschnitt aus:
Die Presse
Wien

19. April 1971

Gleichgesinnte zu Gast

William Steinberg und das Boston Symphony Orchestra in Wien

Warum die siebente Symphonie Gustav Mahlers seltener gespielt wird als die sechste? Obgleich man ihr Übersichtlichkeit und, sonst allgemein als Grundlage für einen Erfolg angesehen, positive Haltung nachzusagen pflegt? Man wird es auch nach dieser Aufführung im Musikverein, die aus mehreren Gründen außerordentlich war, nicht sagen können.

William Steinberg und das auf Tournee eher gehetzte Boston Symphony Orchestra gastierten in Wien. Und spielten so, daß man einerseits ihre besonderen Vorzüge und zugleich auch die natürlichen Abnützungserscheinungen merken konnte, die sich auf Orchestertourneen einfach nicht verheimlichen lassen: Die Qualität des homogenen Klanges, die Sicherheit im Zusammenspiel, die Eingestimmtheit auf den Dirigenten erfreuten ebenso wie die minimalen Schwankungen — nicht nur beim Horn — im Orchester, die anzeigten, daß in Boston keineswegs Maschinen musizieren.

Auf dem Programm stand die Linzer Symphonie von W. A. Mozart als eine Art Introduktion. Man spielte sie zwar nicht in größter Besetzung, doch mit überaus vollem, romantischem Ton, nicht zu schnell und nicht zu durchsichtig, sehr elegant und gleichzeitig sehr auf vollen Klang bedacht. Luxuriös. Hierzulande hört man Mozart anders, doch hat das wenig zu sagen. Solange nur alles in einer Einheit bleibt, muß man mit kleinlichen Einwänden sparen.

Steinberg, der wenig gestischen Aufwand betreibt, kann sich auf seine Musiker verlassen. Sie wissen, wie er Mozart gespielt haben will und kommen mit einigen anfeuernden Bewegungen durchaus zurecht. Und haben, man merkt es, Freude an der Linzer Symphonie. Und, man wird auch davon überzeugt, ehrliche Begeisterung für Gustav Mahler. Sonst gäbe es nicht dieses Riesenwerk auf einer Reise, diese auch physische Belastung auf Tournee: Und dermaßen exakt gespielt, es ist für einen Musikfreund schon erstaunlich, da mit der Partitur nachzuprüfen, wieviel von den exakten Anweisungen des Komponisten befolgt werden und wie unauffällig dies geschieht. Allein der strahlende erste Satz war von besonderem Format.

Nach ihm gab es die Pause. Eine Atempause, die nicht nur den Ausführenden half. Die drei Innensätze waren derart merklich gegen den in sich geschlossenen ersten Teil abgesetzt, und für die Steigerung zuletzt sorgte ja der C-Dur-Jubel, den man bei Mahler wohl als ungewohnt empfindet — womit noch einmal auf die Frage nach der Ursache der so oberflächlichen Bekanntschaft mit dem Werk geantwortet sein soll.

Die Vorzüge des Boston Symphony Orchestra hätte man mit einem simpleren Programm wohl effektvoller dartun können. Doch man weiß sie. Effektiver aber als mit Mahler wären sie wohl nicht zu beweisen gewesen. Höchste Deutlichkeit und dennnoch europäische Homogenität, das haben nicht alle amerikanischen Spitzenensembles aufzuweisen. Das ist mitunter zugunsten blendender Virtuosität vernachlässigt. Das macht die Sympathie aus, die man hier in Wien diesem Orchester wie selbstverständlich entgegenbringt. Auf Wiedersehen, und möglichst auf eines mit William Steinberg an der Spitze.

Franz Endler

vienna reviews

EXCERPTS

DIE PRESSE, Vienna

Review by /Franz Endler

The BSO's particular qualitites were easily remarked upon: the splendor of the total sound, their absolute security in playing together, their concentration on the conductor -- all these pleased us as much as their small mistakes (not only in the horn section) This orchestra shows that in Boston at least the musicians do not play like machines.

Mozart's Linz symphony was played with full romantic sound, not too fast and not too transparent, very elegant, and at the same time with a warm and luxuriant tone. In Vienna, we are accustomed to hearing Mozart played in a different way, but that has nothing to do with it, as long as the interpretation is convincing on its own merits.

*** ***

And it is obvious they have genuine enthusiasm for Gustav Mahler, otherwise they would not be playing this huge work on tour, a work which is also physically exhausting for the musicans. It was given with such precision (astoundingly so if one followed the score) and all the various careful indications of the composer were followed easily and surely.

SAKO
Zeitungs - Ausschnitt-
dienst / Wien III.
Schützengg. 9, Ruf 7340923

Ausschnitt aus:
Die Presse
Wien

19. April 1971

Gleichgesinnte zu Gast

William Steinberg und das Boston Symphony Orchestra in Wien

Warum die siebente Symphonie Gustav Mahlers seltener gespielt wird als die sechste? Obgleich man ihr Übersichtlichkeit und, sonst allgemein als Grundlage für einen Erfolg angesehen, positive Haltung nachzusagen pflegt? Man wird es auch nach dieser Aufführung im Musikverein, die aus mehreren Gründen außerordentlich war, nicht sagen können.

William Steinberg und das auf Tournee eher gehetzte Boston Symphony Orchestra gastierten in Wien. Und spielten so, daß man einerseits ihre besonderen Vorzüge und zugleich auch die natürlichen Abnützungserscheinungen merken konnte, die sich auf Orchestertourneen einfach nicht verheimlichen lassen: Die Qualität des homogenen Klanges, die Sicherheit im Zusammenspiel, die Eingestimmtheit auf den Dirigenten erfreuten ebenso wie die minimalen Schwankungen — nicht nur beim Horn — im Orchester, die anzeigten, daß in Boston keineswegs Maschinen musizieren.

Auf dem Programm stand die Linzer Symphonie von W. A. Mozart als eine Art Introduktion. Man spielte sie zwar nicht in größter Besetzung, doch mit überaus vollem, romantischem Ton, nicht zu schnell und nicht zu durchsichtig, sehr elegant und gleichzeitig sehr auf vollen Klang bedacht. Luxuriös. Hierzulande hört man Mozart anders, doch hat das wenig zu sagen. Solange nur alles in einer Einheit bleibt, muß man mit kleinlichen Einwänden sparen.

Steinberg, der wenig gestischen Aufwand betreibt, kann sich auf seine Musiker verlassen. Sie wissen, wie er Mozart gespielt haben will und kommen mit einigen anfeuernden Bewegungen durchaus zurecht. Und haben, man merkt es, Freude an der Linzer Symphonie. Und, man wird auch davon überzeugt, ehrliche Begeisterung für Gustav Mahler. Sonst gäbe es nicht dieses Riesenwerk auf einer Reise, diese auch physische Belastung auf Tournee: Und dermaßen exakt gespielt, es ist für einen Musikfreund schon erstaunlich, da mit der Partitur nachzuprüfen, wieviel von den exakten Anweisungen des Komponisten befolgt werden und wie unauffällig dies geschieht. Allein der strahlende erste Satz war von besonderem Format.

Nach ihm gab es die Pause. Eine Atempause, die nicht nur den Ausführenden half. Die drei Innensätze waren derart merklich gegen den in sich geschlossenen ersten Teil abgesetzt, und für die Steigerung zuletzt sorgte ja der C-Dur-Jubel, den man bei Mahler wohl als ungewohnt empfindet — womit noch einmal auf die Frage nach der Ursache der so oberflächlichen Bekanntschaft mit dem Werk geantwortet sein soll.

Die Vorzüge des Boston Symphony Orchestra hätte man mit einem simpleren Programm wohl effektvoller dartun können. Doch man weiß sie. Effektiver aber als mit Mahler wären sie wohl nicht zu beweisen gewesen. Höchste Deutlichkeit und dennnoch europäische Homogenität, das haben nicht alle amerikanischen Spitzenensembles aufzuweisen. Das ist mitunter zugunsten blendender Virtuosität vernachlässigt. Das macht die Sympathie aus, die man hier in Wien diesem Orchester wie selbstverständlich entgegenbringt. Auf Wiedersehen, und möglichst auf eines mit William Steinberg an der Spitze.

Franz Endler

vienna reviews

EXCERPTS

DIE PRESSE, Vienna

Review by /Franz Endler

The BSO's particular qualitites were easily remarked upon: the splendor of the total sound, their absolute security in playing together, their concentration on the conductor -- all these pleased us as much as their small mistakes (not only in the horn section) This orchestra shows that in Boston at least the musicians do not play like machines.

Mozart's Linz symphony was played with full romantic sound, not too fast and not too transparent, very elegant, and at the same time with a warm and luxuriant tone. In Vienna, we are accustomed to hearing Mozart played in a different way, but that has nothing to do with it, as long as the interpretation is convincing on its own merits.

*** ***

And it is obvious they have genuine enthusiasm for Gustav Mahler, otherwise they would not be playing this huge work on tour, a work which is also physically exhausting for the musicans. It was given with such precision (astoundingly so if one followed the score) and all the various careful indications of the composer were followed easily and surely.

190

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172

Information aus:
KRONEN ZEITUNG
Wien Datum 19. April 1971

Hochzeitsreise nach Europa

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra machte in Wien Station

Man könnte die gegenwärtige Tournee des Boston Symphony Orchestra auch eine Hochzeitsreise nennen. Jungvermählt mit einer deutschen Plattenfirma, die sich aus dieser Verbindung gute Chancen in Amerika erhofft, sind die Musiker aus Boston nach Europa gereist, um sich der Verwandtschaft des Ehepartners vorzustellen. Nebenbei feiert man noch den neunzigsten Geburtstag des Ensembles. Für ein Orchester der Schritt ins beste Mannesalter.

Entscheidend geformt von Leuten wie Monteux, Koussevitzky, Münch und Leinsdorf, präsentiert sich das Boston Symphony Orchestra als ein vortrefflicher Klangkörper. Hochgezüchtetes Raffinement der instrumentalen Kultur ist seine Tugend nicht. In dieser Hinsicht hat die Konkurrenz aus Philadelphia, Cleveland und New York zweifellos mehr zu bieten. Was die Bostoner Gäste auszeichnet, ist eine sympathische Geradlinigkeit. Ihr Musikantentum wirkt unverbildet, kräftig, knorrig.

William Steinberg, der neue Chef des Orchester, scheint diese rauhe Schale sehr zu schätzen. Er ist ein Mann der guten alten Schule. Unaufwendig, unaufdringlich. Die Show ist ihm ein Greuel. Dirigieren ist für William Steinberg kein Akt des Narzißmus, sondern Dienst am Werk. Es tut wohl, von Zeit zu Zeit wieder an diese Tatsache erinnert zu werden.

Am Samstagabend dauerte es im Musikverein freilich ziemlich lange, ehe man Steinbergs spröde Sachlichkeit zu schätzen begann. Mozarts „Linzer Symphonie" war, bei aller Korrektheit, für meine Begriffe zu steif, zu farblos und zu trocken musiziert.

Mahlers Siebente Symphonie, ein wahrhaft generöses Gastgeschenk an Wien, gedieh besser. Allerdings niemals bis in die Regionen des Außerordentlichen. Vielleicht machte gerade dieses Werk in seiner gefühlsbetonten Überschwenglichkeit eher die Grenzen als die Talente Steinbergs deutlich. Strenge, Zurückhaltung und Nüchternheit sind nun einmal nicht die besten Mittel, der grandiosen Lustigkeit der ersten Nachtmusik, der bizarren Phantastik des Scherzos oder der schwärmerischen Zärtlichkeit der zweiten Nachtmusik nachzuspüren. Erst im „pompösen" Finale wuchs die Aufführung.

Ihr respektabler Rang stand dennoch nie in Frage. Ein bißchen verwunderlich fand ich bloß die Einschaltung einer (durchaus entbehrlichen) Pause nach dem ersten Satz. Wäre es nicht richtiger gewesen, die Mozart-Symphonie wegzulassen, um die Spannung hochzuhalten? Sind fünf Viertelstunden anspruchsvoller Musik nicht mehr als genug für einen Konzertabend?

Gerhard Brunner

EXCERPTS

Vienna review by Gerhard Brunner

The Boston Symphony came through as an excellent-sounding orchestra. Highly refined instrumental texture is not one of their foremost virtues. From this point of view, the Philadelphia, Cleveland, and New York orchestras doubtless have more to offer. What marks our guests from Boston is a warm and friendly straightforwardness. Their music making is uncomplicated, strong, and hardy.

William Steinberg seems to treasure these qualities; he is a conductor of the good old school, unimposing and unshowmanlike. Conducting for him is no act of narcissism but a job to do....

It certainly took us a little while on Saturday evening before we began to appreciate Steinberg's straightforward, matter-of-factness. Mozart's Linz symphony, though correctly played, was for my taste too stiff, colorless, and dry....

Mahler's Seventh symphony, a really generous present from our guests to Vienna, went better. But one could hardly call it an outstanding performance....Its musicianly qualities were never in question. But only in the finale, however, did the interpretation come to life.

190

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172

Information aus:
KRONEN ZEITUNG
Wien Datum 15. April 1971

Hochzeitsreise nach Europa

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra machte in Wien Station

Man könnte die gegenwärtige Tournee des Boston Symphony Orchestra auch eine Hochzeitsreise nennen. Jungvermählt mit einer deutschen Plattenfirma, die sich aus dieser Verbindung gute Chancen in Amerika erhofft, sind die Musiker aus Boston nach Europa gereist, um sich der Verwandtschaft des Ehepartners vorzustellen. Nebenbei feiert man noch den neunzigsten Geburtstag des Ensembles. Für ein Orchester der Schritt ins beste Mannesalter.

Entscheidend geformt von Leuten wie Monteux, Koussevitzky, Münch und Leinsdorf, präsentiert sich das Boston Symphony Orchestra als ein vortrefflicher Klangkörper. Hochgezüchtetes Raffinement der instrumentalen Kultur ist seine Tugend nicht. In dieser Hinsicht hat die Konkurrenz aus Philadelphia, Cleveland und New York zweifellos mehr zu bieten. Was die Bostoner Gäste auszeichnet, ist eine sympathische Geradlinigkeit. Ihr Musikantentum wirkt unverbildet, kräftig, knorrig.

William Steinberg, der neue Chef des Orchester, scheint diese rauhe Schale sehr zu schätzen. Er ist ein Mann der guten alten Schule. Unaufwendig, unaufdringlich. Die Show ist ihm ein Greuel. Dirigieren ist für William Steinberg kein Akt des Narzißmus, sondern Dienst am Werk. Es tut wohl, von Zeit zu Zeit wieder an diese Tatsache erinnert zu werden.

Am Samstagabend dauerte es im Musikverein freilich ziemlich lange, ehe man Steinbergs spröde Sachlichkeit zu schätzen begann. Mozarts „Linzer Symphonie" war, bei aller Korrektheit, für meine Begriffe zu steif, zu farblos und zu trocken musiziert.

Mahlers Siebente Symphonie, ein wahrhaft generöses Gastgeschenk an Wien, gedieh besser. Allerdings niemals bis in die Regionen des Außerordentlichen. Vielleicht machte gerade dieses Werk in seiner gefühlsbetonten Überschwenglichkeit eher die Grenzen als die Talente Steinbergs deutlich. Strenge, Zurückhaltung und Nüchternheit sind nun einmal nicht die besten Mittel, der grandiosen Lustigkeit der ersten Nachtmusik, der bizarren Phantastik des Scherzos oder der schwärmerischen Zärtlichkeit der zweiten Nachtmusik nachzuspüren. Erst im „pompösen" Finale wuchs die Aufführung.

Ihr respektabler Rang stand dennoch nie in Frage. Ein bißchen verwunderlich fand ich bloß die Einschaltung einer (durchaus entbehrlichen) Pause nach dem ersten Satz. Wäre es nicht richtiger gewesen, die Mozart-Symphonie wegzulassen, um die Spannung hochzuhalten? Sind fünf Viertelstunden anspruchsvoller Musik nicht mehr als genug für einen Konzertabend?

Gerhard Brunner

EXCERPTS

Vienna review by Gerhard Brunner

The Boston Symphony came through as an excellent-sounding orchestra. Highly refined instrumental texture is not one of their foremost virtues. From this point of view, the Philadelphia, Cleveland, and New York orchestras doubtless have more to offer. What marks our guests from Boston is a warm and friendly straightforwardness. Their music making is uncomplicated, strong, and hardy.

William Steinberg seems to treasure these qualities; he is a conductor of the good old school, unimposing and unshowmanlike. Conducting for him is no act of narcissism but a job to do....

It certainly took us a little while on Saturday evening before we began to appreciate Steinberg's straightforward, matter-of-fact-ness. Mozart's Linz symphony, though correctly played, was for my taste too stiff, colorless, and dry....

Mahler's Seventh symphony, a really generous present from our guests to Vienna, went better. But one could hardly call it an outstanding performance....Its musicianly qualities were never in question. But only in the finale, however, did the interpretation come to life.

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
Susi W. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 — Tel. 93 88 172

Ausschnitt aus:
EXPRESS AM ABEND
Wien Datum 19. April 1971

Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Steinberg im Musikverein

Denn Geschmack ist nicht seine Stärke

Die Anweisung, bei der Aufführung von Mahlers „Siebenter" nach dem ersten Satz notfalls eine Pause zu machen, stammt zwar vom Komponisten selbst. Und William Steinberg und seine „Bostoner" haben sich an diese Anweisung gehalten. Die Trennung stört dennoch. Vor allem, wenn Mozarts C-Dur-Symphonie (KV 425) unmittelbar davor gespielt wird. Sie wird zu einem Einspielstück degradiert, Mahler scheint „nicht abendfüllend". Das Problem ist leicht zu lösen: Man entschließe sich endlich, Mahlers große Symphonien wie die Bruckners ohne alles Rahmenwerk aufzuführen.

Davon abgesehen war's eine imponierende Begegnung mit der Boston Symphony, dem US-Spitzenorchester, das heuer sein 90jähriges Jubiläum feiert und nun auf Europatournee auch Wien besuchte.

William Steinberg leitet sie seit 1969, nach Monteux, Kussewitzky, Münch und Leinsdorf. Ein echtes Präzisionsinstrument, im Klang, vor allem der Bläser, natürlich typisch amerikanisch, aber im ganzen ungemein exakt, frisch und in den einzelnen Instrumentengruppen fabelhaft homogen. Ein Orchester, das für viel Geld Spitzenkräfte einkauft...

Die Wiedergaben: Steinberg, ein Routinier von Graden, könnte auch ein Mann der Show sein. Nur ist er nicht mehr der Jüngste. Sein Mahler hat noch Tempo und Brisanz, aber so manches rutscht in Filmmusik aus. Dezenz ist nicht seine Stärke. Geschmack auch nicht.

Die Rahmensätze klangen atmosphärisch aufgetankt, die Wunderhornreminiszenzen der beiden Nachtmusiken blieben an der Oberfläche. Mozart wirkte steif und unpersönlich. KHR

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
Susi W. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 — Tel. 93 88 172

Ausschnitt aus:
~~KRONEN~~ ARBEITER ZEITUNG
Wien Datum 20. April 1971

Von Wien nach Boston, von Stein zu Steinberg:

Reise eines Konzerttages in die Nacht

VON FRITZ WALDEN

Philharmonisches mit Horst Stein am Dirigentenpult: Eingangs in memoriam Strawinski das Adagio aus „Apollon Musagète", in dem der genialste Proteus der Musikgeschichte jener Klassik am nächsten kam, die unser Meisterorchester seinen übrigen Phasen vorzog.

Brahms' Haydn-Variationen — in denen sich orchestrale Brillanz und Substanz in einem ganz seltenen Glücksfall verbinden — kamen so, als ob sie anders gar nicht denkbar wären: Größeres Lob ist kaum noch zu vergeben.

Als Uraufführung die Musik für Orchester des Philharmonikers Alfred Prinz, ein prächtiges Werk, das gewissermaßen quer durch die Musik zur Moderne vorstößt: Sowohl die Melodik als auch der aparte Orchesterklang findet über schwungvollen Gesang beziehungsweise impressionistische Wirkungen zu stabiler Strukturierung des Tonmaterials; linear etwa in den Intervallen der herabstürzenden Sext und Septime gleich der ersten Takte, die in allen drei Sätzen wiederkehren, indes das harmonische Massiv auch in allen dynamischen Ostinatostürmen — die Einleitung zum Finale erinnert an das rhythmische Ungestüm etwa der Geschwindmärsche Schostakowitschs — seinen formalen Beitrag glanzvoll behauptet. Strukturen, auch durch das Ohr leicht faßbar, die diese Orchestermusik aus einem Guß hervorquellen lassen.

Nach der Pause Bruckners Sechste: Stein trägt in sie viel klangliche Helle, er lichtet gewissermaßen den mystischen Bruckner-Wald; gerade bei der Sechsten kein Nachteil, weil es sie aus dem Schatten ihrer symphonischen Nachbarn rückt. Auch ist die etwas nördlicher angesiedelte Wagner-Romantik — mitunter glaubte man ein überdimensioniertes „Siegfried"-Idyll zu hören — bekanntlich kein wesensfremdes Bruckner-Register. Zu kurz kommt hiebei, durch die Vorwegnahme letzter Steigerungsmöglichkeiten, der weite architektonische Bogen. Dafür hat Stein ein heißes Herz für die große Bruckner-Melodie, die, auch dank den großartigen philharmonischen Weggefährten, sinnberükkend aufblühte.

Am Abend desselben Tages im selben Saal des Musikvereins, das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter William Steinberg, ein Erlebnis eigener Art: In diesem Lager ist Amerika! Spitzenmusiker aus dem Angebot eines ungeheuren Reservoirs, scheinen sie erst in engster Nachbarschaft des Ensembles ihre Individualität voll entfalten zu können. Das ergibt, über jede Computerperfektion hinaus, eine Vollendung des Zusammenspiels, die fast etwas Beklemmendes hat. In Mahlers Siebenter trifft das mit nachtwandlerischer Sicherheit scheinbar ohne Zutun des Dirigenten die kompliziertesten dynamischen, agogischen und rhythmischen Übergänge; das spult sich wie eine Hi-Fi-Schallplatte in einer klanglichen Ausgewogenheit ab, die mit den geringsten Möglichkeiten aufräumt, Mahler noch immer Pathos oder Banalität vorzuwerfen, die hundert Ekstasen des Riesenwerks allerdings auch vereist. Man hatte am Schluß das etwas unheimliche Gefühl, die Gäste könnten mit gleicher Vollendung noch ein paar weitere Mahler-Symphonien zum besten geben...

Und Steinberg? Ein Taktstocksouverän. Distanziert und dennoch temperamentgeladen. Scheinbar gar nicht mehr nötig, und doch der geheimnisvolle Energiekern. Er spielt mit der Linken wie beiläufig auf dem Revers seines Fracks eine pianistische Passage und aus dem Orchester sprüht makellos eine ungeheuer schwierige Klangrakete in die Höhe. Er regiert das ihm anvertraute instrumentale Massenaufgebot mit einer dezenten Grimasse, bald mit einem Schmunzeln, dann wieder mit der gespielten Strenge eines lustigen Onkels: Und alle Instrumente schmunzeln beziehungsweise parieren in eiserner Disziplin. Passagenweise schlägt die ihnen vom Dirigenten abgenötigte Präzision in groteske Komik um...

Die einleitende Linzer Symphonie Mozarts, übliche Verbeugung vor den Gastgebern, funktionierte sich ein wenig zu einer Bostoner Symphonie um. Nicht einmal durch amerikanische Superpräzision; Boston gab sich eher betont leger. Sondern über einen gewissen Entzug von Mozart-Nestwärme. Die klang nur aus dem Chorus der ersten Geigen gleich in der Adagio-Einleitung in der Zaubergeige des Konzertmeisters auf.

translation notes on the following page.

BERLITZ TRANSLATION SERVICE
A DIVISION OF THE BERLITZ SCHOOLS OF LANGUAGES OF AMERICA, INC.
No.
437 BOYLSTON STREET
BOSTON, MASS. 02116

Boston Symphony Orchestra under Steinberg in the Musical Society

BUT TASTE IS NOT HIS FORTE

The direction in Mahler's Siebenter to necessarily pause after the first movement comes, indeed, from the composer himself. And so, William Steinberg and his "Bostonians" obeyed this direction. The hesitation was, however, disturbing, especially since Mozart's Symphony in C-Major (KV 425) immediately preceeded it. Both composistion were reduced to one balanced work. Mahler didn't seem to fill up the evening. There is a simple solution to this problem: perform Mahler's great symphony, like Bruckner's, alone.

In spite of this, it was an impressive encounter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the leading U.S. Orchestra which is celebrating its 90th anniversary, and visited Vienna on its current tour of Europe.

William Steinberg has been conducting since 1969, following Monteux, Kussewitzky, Munch and Leinsdorf. The orchestra is a truly precise sounding instrument, especially the wind section which is typically American. Overall, they are extraordinarily precise, fresh and, in individual groups, imaginatively homogeneous. An orchestra that obtains the best talent at top rates.....

The performance: Steinberg, with his methodical routine, could also have been a show man. He is no longer a youngster. His Mahler still had tempo and brisance, but somethings tended to slip into film music. Discretion is not his strong point. Neither is taste.

The sope of the movements echoed accoustically; reminiscences of the magic horn in Nachtmusic remained superficial. Mozart seemed rigid and impersonal.

And so, the force diminished and the reality of the performance once again evoked some pros and cons concerning Mahler. His exact style was captured in the creation of sound, whereby the orchestra established important qualities; its members, its discipline and its liveness in intonations.

further translation notes on the following page

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
Susi W. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 — Tel. 93 88 172

Ausschnitt aus:

EXPRESS AM ABEND

19. April 1971

Wien Datum

Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Steinberg im Musikverein

Denn Geschmack ist nicht seine Stärke

Die Anweisung, bei der Aufführung von Mahlers „Siebenter" nach dem ersten Satz notfalls eine Pause zu machen, stammt zwar vom Komponisten selbst. Und William Steinberg und seine „Bostoner" haben sich an diese Anweisung gehalten. Die Trennung stört dennoch. Vor allem, wenn Mozarts C-Dur-Symphonie (KV 425) unmittelbar davor gespielt wird. Sie wird zu einem Einspielstück degradiert, Mahler scheint „nicht abendfüllend". Das Problem ist leicht zu lösen: Man entschließe sich endlich, Mahlers große Symphonien wie die Bruckners ohne alles Rahmenwerk aufzuführen.

Davon abgesehen war's eine imponierende Begegnung mit der Boston Symphony, dem US-Spitzenorchester, das heuer sein 90jähriges Jubiläum feiert und nun auf Europatournee auch Wien besuchte.

William Steinberg leitet sie seit 1969, nach Monteux, Kussewitzky, Münch und Leinsdorf. Ein echtes Präzisionsinstrument, im Klang, vor allem der Bläser, natürlich typisch amerikanisch, aber im ganzen ungemein exakt, frisch und in den einzelnen Instrumentengruppen fabelhaft homogen. Ein Orchester, das für viel Geld Spitzenkräfte einkauft...

Die Wiedergaben: Steinberg, ein Routinier von Graden, könnte auch ein Mann der Show sein. Nur ist er nicht mehr der Jüngste. Sein Mahler hat noch Tempo und Brisanz, aber so manches rutscht in Filmmusik aus. Dezenz ist nicht seine Stärke. Geschmack auch nicht.

Die Rahmensätze klangen atmosphärisch aufgetankt, die Wunderhornreminiszenzen der beiden Nachtmusiken blieben an der Oberfläche. Mozart wirkte steif und unpersönlich. KHR

BERLITZ TRANSLATION SERVICE
A DIVISION OF THE BERLITZ SCHOOLS OF LANGUAGES OF AMERICA, INC.

No.

437 BOYLSTON STREET
BOSTON, MASS. 02116

Boston Symphony Orchestra under Steinberg in the Musical Society

BUT TASTE IS NOT HIS FORTE

The direction in Mahler's Siebenter to necessarily pause after the first movement comes, indeed, from the composer himself. And so, William Steinberg and his "Bostonians" obeyed this direction. The hesitation was, however, disturbing, especially since Mozart's Symphony in C-Major (KV 425) immediately preceeded it. Both composistion were reduced to one balanced work. Mahler didn't seem to fill up the evening. There is a simple solution to this problem: perform Mahler's great symphony, like Bruckner's, alone.

In spite of this, it was an impressive encounter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the leading U.S. Orchestra which is celebrating its 90th anniversary, and visited Vienna on its current tour of Europe.

William Steinberg has been conducting since 1969, following Monteux, Kussewitzky, Munch and Leinsdorf. The orchestra is a truly precise sounding instrument, especially the wind section which is typically American. Overall, they are extraordinarily precise, fresh and, in individual groups, imaginatively homogeneous. An orchestra that obtains the best talent at top rates.....

The performance: Steinberg, with his methodical routine, could also have been a show man. He is no longer a youngster. His Mahler still had tempo and brisance, but somethings tended to slip into film music. Discretion is not his strong point. Neither is taste.

The sope of the movements echoed accoustically; reminiscences of the magic horn in Nachtmusic remained superficial. Mozart seemed rigid and impersonal.

And so, the force diminished and the reality of the performance once again evoked some pros and cons concerning Mahler. His exact style was captured in the creation of sound, whereby the orchestra established important qualities; its members, its discipline and its liveness in intonations.

further translation notes on the following page

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
Susi W. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 — Tel. 93 38 172

Ausschnitt aus:

~~KERNTNER~~ ARBEITER ZEITUNG

20. April 1971

Wien Datum

Von Wien nach Boston, von Stein zu Steinberg:

Reise eines Konzerttages in die Nacht

VON FRITZ WALDEN

Philharmonisches mit Horst Stein am Dirigentenpult: Eingangs in memoriam Strawinski das Adagio aus „Apollon Musagète", in dem der genialste Proteus der Musikgeschichte jener Klassik am nächsten kam, die unser Meisterorchester seinen übrigen Phasen vorzog.

Brahms' Haydn-Variationen — in denen sich orchestrale Brillanz und Substanz in einem ganz seltenen Glücksfall verbinden — kamen so, als ob sie anders gar nicht denkbar wären: Größeres Lob ist kaum noch zu vergeben.

Als Uraufführung die Musik für Orchester des Philharmonikers Alfred Prinz, ein prächtiges Werk, das gewissermaßen quer durch die Musik zur Moderne vorstößt: Sowohl die Melodik als auch der aparte Orchesterklang findet über schwungvollen Gesang beziehungsweise impressionistische Wirkungen zu stabiler Strukturierung des Tonmaterials; linear etwa in den Intervallen der herabstürzenden Sext und Septime gleich der ersten Takte, die in allen drei Sätzen wiederkehren, indes das harmonische Massiv auch in allen dynamischen Ostinatostürmen — die Einleitung zum Finale erinnert an das rhythmische Ungestüm etwa der Geschwindmärsche Schostakowitschs — seinen formalen Beitrag glanzvoll behauptet. Strukturen, auch durch das Ohr leicht faßbar, die diese Orchestermusik aus einem Guß hervorquellen lassen.

Nach der Pause Bruckners Sechste: Stein trägt in sie viel klangliche Helle, er lichtet gewissermaßen den mystischen Bruckner-Wald; gerade bei der Sechsten kein Nachteil, weil es sie aus dem Schatten ihrer symphonischen Nachbarn rückt. Auch ist die etwas nördlicher angesiedelte Wagner-Romantik — mitunter glaubte man ein überdimensioniertes „Siegfried"-Idyll zu hören — bekanntlich kein wesensfremdes Bruckner-Register. Zu kurz kommt hiebei, durch die Vorwegnahme letzter Steigerungsmöglichkeiten, der weite architektonische Bogen. Dafür hat Stein ein heißes Herz für die große Bruckner-Melodie, die, auch dank den großartigen philharmonischen Weggefährten, sinnberükkend aufblühte.

Am Abend desselben Tages im selben Saal des Musikvereins, das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter William Steinberg, ein Erlebnis eigener Art: In diesem Lager ist Amerika! Spitzenmusiker aus dem Angebot eines ungeheuren Reservoirs, scheinen sie erst in engster Nachbarschaft des Ensembles ihre Individualität voll entfalten zu können. Das ergibt, über jede Computerperfektion hinaus, eine Vollendung des Zusammenspiels, die fast etwas Beklemmendes hat. In Mahlers Siebenter trifft das mit nachtwandlerischer Sicherheit scheinbar ohne Zutun des Dirigenten die kompliziertesten dynamischen, agogischen und rhythmischen Übergänge; das spult sich wie eine Hi-Fi-Schallplatte in einer klanglichen Ausgewogenheit ab, die mit den geringsten Möglichkeiten aufräumt, Mahler noch immer Pathos oder Banalität vorzuwerfen, die hundert Ekstasen des Riesenwerks allerdings auch vereist. Man hatte am Schluß das etwas unheimliche Gefühl, die Gäste könnten mit gleicher Vollendung noch ein paar weitere Mahler-Symphonien zum besten geben...

Und Steinberg? Ein Taktstocksouverän. Distanziert und dennoch temperamentgeladen. Scheinbar gar nicht mehr nötig, und doch der geheimnisvolle Energiekern. Er spielt mit der Linken wie beiläufig auf dem Revers seines Fracks eine pianistische Passage und aus dem Orchester sprüht makellos eine ungeheuer schwierige Klangrakete in die Höhe. Er regiert das ihm anvertraute instrumentale Massenaufgebot mit einer dezenten Grimasse, bald mit einem Schmunzeln, dann wieder mit der gespielten Strenge eines lustigen Onkels: Und alle Instrumente schmunzeln beziehungsweise parieren in eiserner Disziplin. Passagenweise schlägt die ihnen vom Dirigenten abgenötigte Präzision in groteske Komik um...

Die einleitende Linzer Symphonie Mozarts, übliche Verbeugung vor den Gastgebern, funktionierte sich ein wenig zu einer Bostoner Symphonie um. Nicht einmal durch amerikanische Superpräzision; Boston gab sich eher betont leger. Sondern über einen gewissen Entzug von Mozart-Nestwärme. Die klang nur aus dem Chorus der ersten Geigen gleich in der Adagio-Einleitung in der Zaubergeige des Konzertmeisters auf.

translation notes on the following page.

translation notes for articles on the preceding page

EXCERPTS

Vienna review by K.H.R.

The BSO is a real precision instrument, particularly the woodwinds, naturally typically American, but overall unusually precise, fresh-sounding, and blended in their individual sound. An orchestra which uses its considerable financial resources to acquire the very best talent... (NB-the '...' is in the original; this very Viennese remark ((crack, that is)) defies an exact translation, but it isn't entirely cordial).

Vienna review by Fritz Walden

...The BSO's concert was an experience of a particular kind: These musicians are absolutely top class, selected from among an enormous (American) reservoir of orchestral talent. However precise the ensemble of the orchestra seems, each musician nevertheless appears to be able to express his individuality to the full. This results in a perfection beyond that of pure precision, the ultimate in ensemble playing....

And Steinberg? A king of the baton. Aloof and yet full of temperament. Apparently no longer necessary, and yet the secret source of all energy. He plays with his left hand continuously on his lapel, piano passages, and from the orchestra there surges flawlessly, a huge and powerful rocket of sound upwards into the heavens....

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
Susi W. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 — Tel. 93 88 172

Ausschnitt aus:

WR. NEUSTÄDTER ZEITUNG

Nr. 296 Datum 20. April 1971

Daheim und zu Gast

„Philharmonisches" unter Horst Stein — Das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Steinberg im Musikverein

Die Wiener Philharmoniker gaben am Wochenende ihr 7. Abonnementkonzert dieser Saison; Dirigent war Horst Stein, und das mittlere Stück der Programmfolge galt der Uraufführung eines philharmonischen Orchesterkollegen: der „Musik für Orchester" von Alfred Prinz. Zu Beginn des Konzertes wurde mit dem Adagio aus „Apollon Musagète" und einer Schweigeminute des Heimganges Igor Strawinskys gedacht.

Der Klarinettist Prinz, Jahrgang 1930, ist im kompositorischen Handwerk sehr gut geschult, reiche Erfahrungen der Orchesterpraxis treten hinzu, und diese sowie eine rege Musikalität, die sich gemäßigt modern kundtut, ließen ein Werk entstehen, dessen Ecksätze lebhaft entwickelt und recht wirksam sind, während das Lento, offen gesagt, ziemlich langweilig wirkt. Die Philharmoniker setzten das Werk ins bestmögliche Licht.

Vor dieser Novität dirigierte Horst Stein, dieser im besten Sinne des Wortes solide Musiker, die Haydn-Variationen von Brahms, und zum Abschluß brachte er die „Sechste" von Bruckner, die ein echtes Kind ihres Schöpfers ist, wie ihre Schwestern viel schöne Musik enthält, auch Eigenart unter ihnen hat, im Gesamten aber vielleicht doch nicht zu voller Größe der Aussage anderer Bruckner-Symphonien vorstößt, so daß ihr relativ seltenes Aufscheinen auf den Programmen begründet sein mag. Inniges, richtig gestimmtes Bruckner-Musizieren war auf das Konto des Orchesters ebenso zu verbuchen wie auf jenes des Dirigenten, der das Werk mit Sorgfalt ausbreitete, ausmusizierte und steigerte.

*

Am Abend desselben Tages war dann das Boston Symphony Orchestra im Internationalen Orchester- und Chorzyklus des Musikvereins zu Gast. William Steinberg, ein höchst metiersicherer Mann der alten Schule, dirigierte.

Das Orchester ist so gut eingespielt, daß Steinberg bei der einleitenden Mozart-Symphonie der Zeichengebung, des Taktschlagens bisweilen kurz enthalten konnte. Es funktionierte auch so alles exakt. Freilich: ganz überzeugte uns diese Wiedergabe der „Linzer Symphonie" Mozarts nicht. Sie hatte zuwenig Fluidum. Im Engagement des Musizierens herrschte eine gewisse Sachlichkeit, es fehlte die sublime sinnliche Frische, das empfand man beim Piano fast noch mehr als beim Forte, das durch kernigen, oft nahezu großräumig festlichen Klang wirkte.

Dann folgte Mahlers siebente Symphonie, nach deren erstem Satz Steinberg, sich auf eine Anweisung Mahlers berufend, die Pause des Konzertes einschaltete. (Doch hatte der Komponist den Begriff „Pause" gewiß nicht in diesem Sinne gemeint.)

Steinberg gehört zu jenen, die von Mahler überzeugt sind, die ihm daher mit allen Kräften — und das sind bei Steinberg „strategische" wie künstlerische — wirksam dienen. Jene maximale emotionelle Intensität, die ein so ausgedehntes Mahler-Opus in permanenter Spannung zu halten vermag, ist diesem Dirigenten allerdings nicht gegeben, und so schwankte auch die Eindringlichkeit, die Wirksamkeit dieser Aufführung und rief damit wieder einmal so manches Mahler betreffende Pro und Kontra in Erinnerung. In der klanglichen Ausformung wurde der richtige Stil getroffen, das Orchester dokumentierte hier bedeutende Qualitäten seiner Besetzung, seiner Disziplin, seiner Aktivität des Einsatzes.

-t-k

BERLITZ TRANSLATION SERVICE
A DIVISION OF THE BERLITZ SCHOOLS OF LANGUAGES OF AMERICA, INC

No.

437 BOYLSTON STREET
BOSTON, MASS. 02116

AT HOME AND ON TOUR

"Philharmonisches" under Horst Stein- The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Steinberg in the Musical Society

The Vienna Philharmonic performed its seventh concert of the season last weekend; Horst Stein was conducting and the highlight of the performance was an original work by a member of the Philharmonic Orchestra: "Musik fur Orchester" by Alfred Prinz. The performance began with an adagio from "Apollon Musagète" and a moment of meditation for the deceased Igor Stravinsky.

Clarinetist Prinz,1930, has had much experience composing and in orchetra performances. This together with his lively musicality, which reveals itself as moderately modern, combine to produce a work with vividly developing and very effective movements. However, to be honest, the lento is rather boring. The Philharmonic Orchestra brought out the best in this work.

Prior to this novelty, Horst Stein, a sound musician in the best sense of the word, conducted Variations of Haydn by Brahms and chose for his finale the "Sechste" by Bruckner. This composition is a true child of its creator, like his other works, containing much beautiful music with an individuality. However, overall it doesn't exert the full grandeur of expression the other Bruckner symphonies do,so its relatively rare appearance may be based on the program. A sincere, accurately performed production of Bruckner's music was credited as much to the orchestra as to the conductor, who spreadout, played and intensified that work with precision.

The same evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a guest with the International Orchestra and Chorus Circle of the Musical Society. William Steinberg, a very confident man of the old school, conducted.

The orchestra played so well that Steinberg was able to briefly refrain from signaling the beat. It carried out everything was just such precision. But Mozart's "Linzer Symphonie" didn't entirely satisfy us. It had too little atmosphere. A certain realism governed the performance and it lacked the sublime, sensitive freshness which is acheived with a "piano" more often than with a "forte", which produces a strong resonating effect.

Next came Mahler's Seventh Symphony. Steinberg obeyed Mahler's direction and inserted a pause. (But the composer couldn't have meant a pause like that.)

Steinberg belongs to those devotees of Mahler, who therefore give him their all and for Steinberg that's strategicially as well as artistically. That maximal emotional intensiveness that could keep the vast Mahler-Opus in permanent suspense, was not acheived by this conductor.

Every care is taken to insure the accuracy of all translations. However, The Berlitz Schools of Languages of America, Inc., its divisions, affiliates, agents and employees shall not be liable in respect of any claims of error or negligence in translation or typing.

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
Susi W. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 — Tel. 93 38 172

Ausschnitt aus:

WR. NEUSTÄDTER ZEITUNG

20. April 1971

Nr. Datum

Daheim und zu Gast

„Philharmonisches" unter Horst Stein — Das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Steinberg im Musikverein

Die Wiener Philharmoniker gaben am Wochenende ihr 7. Abonnementkonzert dieser Saison; Dirigent war Horst Stein, und das mittlere Stück der Programmfolge galt der Uraufführung eines philharmonischen Orchesterkollegen: der „Musik für Orchester" von Alfred Prinz. Zu Beginn des Konzertes wurde mit dem Adagio aus „Apollon Musagète" und einer Schweigeminute des Heimganges Igor Strawinskys gedacht.

Der Klarinettist Prinz, Jahrgang 1930, ist im kompositorischen Handwerk sehr gut geschult, reiche Erfahrungen der Orchesterpraxis treten hinzu, und diese sowie eine rege Musikalität, die sich gemäßigt modern kundtut, ließen ein Werk entstehen, dessen Ecksätze lebhaft entwickelt und recht wirksam sind, während das Lento, offen gesagt, ziemlich langweilig wirkt. Die Philharmoniker setzten das Werk ins bestmögliche Licht.

Vor dieser Novität dirigierte Horst Stein, dieser im besten Sinne des Wortes solide Musiker, die Haydn-Variationen von Brahms, und zum Abschluß brachte er die „Sechste" von Bruckner, die ein echtes Kind ihres Schöpfers ist, wie ihre Schwestern viel schöne Musik enthält, auch Eigenart unter ihnen hat, im Gesamten aber vielleicht doch nicht zu voller Größe der Aussage anderer Bruckner-Symphonien vorstößt, so daß ihr relativ seltenes Aufscheinen auf den Programmen begründet sein mag. Inniges, richtig gestimmtes Bruckner-Musizieren war auf das Konto des Orchesters ebenso zu verbuchen wie auf jenes des Dirigenten, der das Werk mit Sorgfalt ausbreitete, ausmusizierte und steigerte.

*

Am Abend desselben Tages war dann das Boston Symphony Orchestra im Internationalen Orchester- und Chorzyklus des Musikvereins zu Gast. William Steinberg, ein höchst netiersicherer Mann der alten Schule, dirigierte.

Das Orchester ist so gut eingespielt, daß Steinberg bei der einleitenden Mozart-Symphonie der Zeichengebung, des Taktschlagens bisweilen kurz enthalten konnte. Es funktionierte auch so alles exakt. Freilich: ganz überzeugte uns diese Wiedergabe der „Linzer Symphonie" Mozarts nicht. Sie hatte zuwenig Fluidum. Im Engagement des Musizierens herrschte eine gewisse Sachlichkeit, es fehlte die sublime sinnliche Frische, das empfand man beim Piano fast noch mehr als beim Forte, das durch kernigen, oft nahezu großräumig festlichen Klang wirkte.

Dann folgte Mahlers siebente Symphonie, nach deren erstem Satz Steinberg, sich auf eine Anweisung Mahlers berufend, die Pause des Konzertes einschaltete. (Doch hatte der Komponist den Begriff „Pause" gewiß nicht in diesem Sinne gemeint.)

Steinberg gehört zu jenen, die von Mahler überzeugt sind, die ihm daher mit allen Kräften — und das sind bei Steinberg „strategische" wie künstlerische — wirksam dienen. Jene maximale emotionelle Intensität, die ein so ausgedehntes Mahler-Opus in permanenter Spannung zu halten vermag, ist diesem Dirigenten allerdings nicht gegeben, und so schwankte auch die Eindringlichkeit, die Wirksamkeit dieser Aufführung und rief damit wieder einmal so manches Mahler betreffende Pro und Kontra in Erinnerung. In der klanglichen Ausformung wurde der richtige Stil getroffen, das Orchester dokumentierte hier bedeutende Qualitäten seiner Besetzung, seiner Disziplin, seiner Aktivität des Einsatzes.

-t-k

BERLITZ TRANSLATION SERVICE
A DIVISION OF THE BERLITZ SCHOOLS OF LANGUAGES OF AMERICA, INC

No.

437 BOYLSTON STREET
BOSTON, MASS. 02116

AT HOME AND ON TOUR

"Philharmonisches" under Horst Stein- The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Steinberg in the Musical Society

The Vienna Philharmonic performed its seventh concert of the season last weekend; Horst Stein was conducting and the highlight of the performance was an original work by a member of the Philharmonic Orchestra: "Musik fur Orchester" by Alfred Prinz. The performance began with an adagio from "Apollon Musagète" and a moment of meditation for the deceased Igor Stravinsky.

Clarinetist Prinz,1930, has had much experience composing and in orchetra performances. This together with his lively musicality, which reveals itself as moderately modern, combine to produce a work with vividly developing and very effective movements. However, to be honest, the lento is rather boring. The Philharmonic Orchestra brought out the best in this work.

Prior to this novelty, Horst Stein, a sound musician in the best sense of the word, conducted Variations of Haydn by Brahms and chose for his finale the "Sechste" by Bruckner. This composition is a true child of its creator, like his other works, containing much beautiful music with an individuality. However, overall it doesn't exert the full grandeur of expression the other Bruckner symphonies do,so its relatively rare appearance may be based on the program. A sincere, accurately performed production of Bruckner's music was credited as much to the orchestra as to the conductor, who spreadout, played and intensified that work with precision.

The same evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a guest with the International Orchestra and Chorus Circle of the Musical Society. William Steinberg, a very confident man of the old school, conducted.

The orchestra played so well that Steinberg was able to briefly refrain from signaling the beat. It carried out everything was just such precision. But Mozart's "Linzer Symphonie" didn't entirely satisfy us. It had too little atmosphere. A certain realism governed the performance and it lacked the sublime, sensitive freshness which is acheived with a "piano" more often than with a "forte", which produces a strong resonating effect.

Next came Mahler's Seventh Symphony. Steinberg obeyed Mahler's direction and inserted a pause. (But the composer couldn't have meant a pause like that.)

Steinberg belongs to those devotees of Mahler, who therefore give him their all and for Steinberg that's strategicially as well as artistically. That maximal emotional intensiveness that could keep the vast Mahler-Opus in permanent suspense, was not acheived by this conductor.

Every care is taken to insure the accuracy of all translations. However, The Berlitz Schools of Languages of America, Inc., its divisions, affiliates, agents and employees shall not be liable in respect of any claims of error or negligence in translation or typing.

194

argus
Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 41,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Göttinger Tagblatt, Göttingen
vom 23. April 1971

Die Bostoner Symphoniker bestanden den Test

Das Bostoner Symphonische Orchester eroberte die Herzen der Wiener. Nach seinem ersten Konzert im Wiener Musikvereinsaal gab es für das Orchester und seinen Dirigenten, den aus Köln stammenden William Steinberg, eine viertel Stunde lang begeisterte Ovationen.

Die amerikanischen Gäste hatten für ihre beiden Wiener Konzerte im Rahmen der gegenwärtigen Europa-Tournee des Orchesters ein rein österreichisches Programm zusammengestellt. Sie spielten Mozarts Linzer Symphonie in C-Dur und als rauschende Klangapotheose Mahlers 7. Symphonie in e-Moll. Viele Wiener Musikfreunde hatten sich vor dem Konzert über die Programmauswahl skeptisch geäußert, da es in der Regel für ausländische Orchester als gefährlich gilt, mit österreichischem Programm in Wien aufzutreten und so den Vergleich mit den Wiener Philharmonikern heraufzubeschwören. Die Bostoner jedoch bestanden den Test ausgezeichnet.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY PASSED THE TEST

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conquered the hearts of the Viennese. After his first concert in the Vienna Musikvereinssaal the orchestra and its conductor - who was born in Cologne - received a fifteen minute long enthusiastic ovation.

The American guests put together a pure Austrian program for both concerts on their European tour of this orchestra. They played Mozart's Linz Symphony in C Major and as thundering sound glorification, Mahler's Seventh Symphony in E Minor. Many Viennese music friends displayed skepticism for the choice of the program, before the concert. It is dangerous, as a rule, for foreign orchestras to appear with an Austrian program in Vienna to cause comparison with the Vienna Philharmonic. However, the Bostonians passed the test with excellence.

VIENNA

Vienna Wochenpresse, April 21, 1971

to sum up: "A first class Orchestra under a really weak director. William Steinberg is what one used to call a solid time-beater."

marvelous capabilities of the winds, strings seemed thin, transparent - every once in a while something really good, but on the whole terribly uneven and in some parts just unaccomplished.

Wochenpresse
Wien, 21.4.71

KULTUR Seite 11

Konzerte

Raritäten

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Philharmoniker, Berberian, „Kußoper"

Ein Wochenende der selten gespielten Symphonien: Mahlers VII. und Bruckners VI.

Mit Mahler gastierte das „Boston Symphony Orchestra", das als eines der „vornehmsten" Orchester der Vereinigten Staaten gilt, unter seinem Chefdirigenten William Steinberg. Um den Abend möglichst kurz zu charakterisieren: ein erstklassiges Orchester unter einem recht schwachen Dirigenten. William Steinberg ist das, was man früher einmal einen soliden Taktschläger nannte. Sein Einsatz für Mahler ist sicher dankenswert, aber er bringt nicht die interpretatorischen Superfähigkeiten mit, diese Musik wirklich so zu gestalten, daß man von ihr mitgerissen wäre. Man bewundert die Fähigkeiten der Bläser dieses Ensembles, man konstatiert den schlanken, durchsichtigen Streicherklang, man freut sich an diesem und jenem, doch man stolpert immer wieder über Unebenheiten und unbewältigte Partien in der Interpretation. Leider ein zwiespältiges Gastspiel.

194

argus
Seit 1887

Auflage (i. Ts.): 41,8
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Göttinger Tagblatt, Göttingen

vom 23. April 1971

Die Bostoner Symphoniker bestanden den Test

Das Bostoner Symphonische Orchester eroberte die Herzen der Wiener. Nach seinem ersten Konzert im Wiener Musikvereinsaal gab es für das Orchester und seinen Dirigenten, den aus Köln stammenden William Steinberg, eine viertel Stunde lang begeisterte Ovationen.

Die amerikanischen Gäste hatten für ihre beiden Wiener Konzerte im Rahmen der gegenwärtigen Europa-Tournee des Orchesters ein rein österreichisches Programm zusammengestellt. Sie spielten Mozarts Linzer Symphonie in C-Dur und als rauschende Klangapotheose Mahlers 7. Symphonie in e-Moll. Viele Wiener Musikfreunde hatten sich vor dem Konzert über die Programmauswahl skeptisch geäußert, da es in der Regel für ausländische Orchester als gefährlich gilt, mit österreichischem Programm in Wien aufzutreten und so den Vergleich mit den Wiener Philharmonikern heraufzubeschwören. Die Bostoner jedoch bestanden den Test ausgezeichnet.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY PASSED THE TEST

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conquered the hearts of the Viennese. After his first concert in the Vienna Musikvereinssaal the orchestra and its conductor - who was born in Cologne - received a fifteen minute long enthusiastic ovation.

The American guests put together a pure Austrian program for both concerts on their European tour of this orchestra. They played Mozart's Linz Symphony in C Major and as thundering sound glorification, Mahler's Seventh Symphony in E Minor. Many Viennese music friends displayed skepticism for the choice of the program, before the concert. It is dangerous, as a rule, for foreign orchestras to appear with an Austrian program in Vienna to cause comparison with the Vienna Philharmonic. However, the Bostonians passed the test with excellence.

VIENNA

Vienna Wochenpresse, April 21, 1971

to sum up: "A first class Orchestra under a really weak director. William Steinberg is what one used to call a solid time-beater."

marvelous capabilities of the winds, strings seemed thin, transparent - every once in a while something really good, but on the whole terribly uneven and in some parts just unaccomplished.

Wochenpresse
Wien, 21. 4. 71

KULTUR Seite 11

Konzerte

Raritäten

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Philharmoniker, Berberian, „Kußoper"

Ein Wochenende der selten gespielten Symphonien: Mahlers VII. und Bruckners VI.

Mit Mahler gastierte das „Boston Symphony Orchestra", das als eines der „vornehmsten" Orchester der Vereinigten Staaten gilt, unter seinem Chefdirigenten William Steinberg. Um den Abend möglichst kurz zu charakterisieren: ein erstklassiges Orchester unter einem recht schwachen Dirigenten. William Steinberg ist das, was man früher einmal einen soliden Taktschläger nannte. Sein Einsatz für Mahler ist sicher dankenswert, aber er bringt nicht die interpretatorischen Superfähigkeiten mit, diese Musik wirklich so zu gestalten, daß man von ihr mitgerissen wäre. Man bewundert die Fähigkeiten der Bläser dieses Ensembles, man konstatiert den schlanken, durchsichtigen Streicherklang, man freut sich an diesem und jenem, doch man stolpert immer wieder über Unebenheiten und unbewältigte Partien in der Interpretation. Leider ein zwiespältiges Gastspiel.

Die Furche - 24.4.71

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Philharmoniker, Kontrapunkte

Von Mozart bis Berio

Wien hatte eine Musikwoche, wie man sie sich öfter wünscht: gehaltvoll und interessant. An zwei Abenden gastierte im Großen Musikvereinssaal unter der Leitung von William Steinberg das berühmte Bostoner Orchester; im 7. Abonnementkonzert der Philharmoniker unter Horst Stein gab es eine Uraufführung; Peter Keuschnig präsentierte im Mozartsaal eines seiner interessanten Programme mit neuer Musik und hatte Cathy Berberian als Mitwirkende gewonnen; und auch beim Abend des Senegal-Balletts kam der Musikfreund voll und ganz auf seine Rechnung.

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra wurde 1881 gegründet und hatte folgende ständige Dirigenten: Arthur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Serge de Kussewitzky, Charles Münch und Erich Leinsdorf. Se. zwei Jahren ist William Steinberg sein „Direktor". Er stammt aus Köln und war in führender Stellung in seiner Heimatstadt, in Prag, Frankfurt, in Palästina, New York und zuletzt in Buffalo tätig. — Ein Blick auf die Namensliste der Orchestermitglieder erweckt den Eindruck, daß man es mit einem durchaus „europäischen" Klangkörper zu tun hat. Das bewies dann auch die Interpretation der „Linzer Symphonie", C-Dur, von Mozart, mit der Steinberg sein Programm eröffnete. Echtes Verständnis, Ruhe und richtige Tempi zeichneten diese Interpretation aus, die nur klanglich etwas dick geriet, was wohl vor allem darauf zurückzuführen ist, daß Dirigent und Musiker an größere Säle gewöhnt sind. — Bei der VII. Symphonie von Gustav Mahler hingegen klang alles deutlich und transparent. In dem selten gehörten Riesenwerk, das fast 80 Minuten dauert (Steinberg schaltete nach dem ersten Satz eine große Pause ein), bewunderte man die aparte, von höchster Meisterschaft und einem überaus sensiblen Ohr bestimmte Instrumentierung, und man müßte ein ganzes Register aufstellen, um alle jene wunderbaren Dinge zu vermerken, die es da zu bewundern gab, besonders im ersten Satz und in den beiden Nocturni. Das Finale ist Mahler ein wenig lärmend geraten und klingt nach Schostakowitschs Zehnter.

Steinberg ist ein feiner Musiker, der es sich leisten kann, das Orchester mit lockerem Zügel zu lenken. Wie Knappertsbusch läßt er es gern ein wenig allein musizieren, ist aber immer parat, wenn es drauf ankommt. — Der sonore, substanzielle und noble Klang der einzelnen Instrumente sowie des Ensembles sind besonders zu rühmen. Orchester und Dirigent ist dafür zu danken, daß sie die Mühen dieser gigantischen Siebenten nicht gescheut haben, die Mahler im Sommer des Jahres 1905 in Maiernigg am Wörthersee „wie in einem Rausch" komponiert hat und deren Uraufführung drei Jahre später in Prag vor einem — begreiflicherweise — verblüfften Publikum stattfand ...

*

195

KURIER - 21.4.71

Hohe Begeisterungsgrade

Die „Bostoner" unter William Steinberg im Musikvereinssaal

Mit einem Programm zweier wesensverschiedener Werke stellten sich die Bostoner Symphoniker ein. In Mozarts Linzer Symphonie (K.-V. 425) wollten sich die Wärme des Adagios und die rustikale Einfärbung des Trios in der Ausdeutung William Steinbergs nicht so leicht einstellen.

Desto besser verstand sich der Dirigent, energiegeladen, mit dem Fuß aufstampfend und dann wieder von souveräner Ruhe, auf die Tonsprache Mahlers in dessen 7. Symphonie. Eine großartige, verständnisvolle Wiedergabe, entsprechend einem Ausspruch Korngolds: „In diesem Werk gehe der Beginn des 20. Jahrhunderts mit seinem Drängen und seinen Nerven vor sich."

Zur Realisierung dieser besonders im Adagio und im Allegro des ersten Teiles hervortretenden Momente, aber auch bedacht auf die romantischen Züge der „Nachtmusiken", stand Steinberg im Boston Symphony Orchestra ein Klangkörper von technisch exzellenten Bläsern, auf herrliche Gesanglichkeit eingestellten Streichern und einem Phänomen von Paukisten zur Verfügung. Unerhört die klangliche Präzision des Orchesters und seine mit letzter Genauigkeit sich einstellende Reaktion auf alle Intentionen des Dirigenten.

Das Begeisterungsthermometer im Großen Musikvereinssaal erklomm höchste Grade.

Paul Lorenz

196

Salzburger Nachrichten · 21.4.71

Die Aufhellung der „Nachtwache"

Vorbildliche Mahler-Interpretation durch Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Steinberg in Wien

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra, das im Großen Saal des Wiener Musikvereins Triumphe feierte, verdankt sein Entstehen nicht zuletzt einem Österreicher. 1884 wurde der Dessoff-Schüler Wilhelm Gericke, ein enger Freund von Brahms, der zehn Jahre lang als zweiter Kapellmeister der Hofoper das Repertoire betreut und von 1880 bis 1884 die Gesellschaftskonzerte der Musikfreunde geleitet hatte, nach Boston berufen, um das Orchester aufzubauen. Als Gericke 1889 nach Wien zurückkehrte, hinterließ er in Boston einen gut organisierten Klangkörper, mit dem er während seines zweiten Bostoner Aufenthalts (1898 bis 1906) größte Erfolge ernten konnte.

In 25jähriger Tätigkeit (1924 bis 1949) hat dann Serge Koussevitzky das Orchester zum perfekten Interpreten zeitgenössischer Musik erzogen. Auf diesem Fundament konnte William Steinberg, der 1969 das traditionsreiche Amt des Chefdirigenten von Erich Leinsdorf übernommen hat, aufbauen. Steinberg lag nicht zuletzt die Mahler-Pflege am Herzen. Als kostbares Ergebnis seiner Bemühungen hörte man nun in Wien eine wahrhaft exemplarische Wiedergabe der VII. Symphonie in e-Moll.

Steinbergs Mahler-Auffassung ist unpathetisch und unromantisch, den musikalischen Valeurs mehr zugewandt als literarischen Stimmungshintergründen. Wenn man bisher den zweiten Satz gern mit Rembrandts „Nachtwache" in Verbindung brachte, so hat Steinberg den „Galerieton" abgedeckt. Die Figuren sind nun nicht mehr „schemenhaft", sondern klar umrissen. Die koloristischen Akzente werden mit großer Deutlichkeit und Präzision gesetzt. Das Zwiegespräch zwischen Horn und Mandoline im Andante amoroso war ein Muster an lyrischer Zartheit, Durchsichtigkeit und Anmut.

Steinberg läßt seinen Musikern Zeit, jede Nuance ins rechte Licht zu bringen. Das klangschöne und sichere Blech der Bostoner erregt in Wien natürlich Bewunderung und Neid. Die tiefen Streicher dürften in ihrer Klangqualität den Violinen etwas überlegen sein. Es gibt kein „picksüßes Hölzl". Die Holzbläser befleißigen sich einer wohltuenden Sprödigkeit.

Als Einleitung hörte man Mozarts Symphonie in C-Dur, KV 425, die sogenannte „Linzer Symphonie". Sie wurde etwas beiläufig gespielt und zeigte, daß dieses herrliche Orchester auch seine schwachen Stellen hat. Die Pause fand — nach Mahlers Vorschrift — nach dem Allegro con fuoco statt, eine Tradition, die man nicht unbedingt unter ganz veränderten Verhältnissen bewahren sollte.

Der Jubel war laut und verdient.

Ruediger Engerth

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172

Information aus:

ÖSTERR. VOLKSSTIMME

Wien Datum 20. April 1971

Aus dem Konzertsaal

Eindrucksvoll war die Begegnung mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra unter William Steinberg im Musikvereinssaal. Es ist ein in spielerischer und klanglicher Kultur hohe Ansprüche befriedigender Klangkörper, dessen Streicher dunkle und weiche Klangfarben bevorzugen und in dem immer wieder hervorragende Bläser, manchmal mit grellen Farben und etwas überraschender Schärfe, auffallen. Alles in allem ein sorgfältig zurechtgeschliffener Präzisionsapparat, der wie eine Orgel mit großer Registerdisposition für einen guten „Steuermann" eben „alle Stücke spielt".

Steinberg ist einer jener Dirigenten, die ein wenig dazu tendieren, selbst größere Aufmerksamkeit anzuziehen als die Musik. Er hat eine suggestive, etwas eigenwillige Gestik, die sich weit mehr an der Gestaltung von Details engagiert, als an strengerer Kontrolle des Metrums (wodurch sich bei Tempoübergängen manchmal Unsicherheiten ergeben) und am Herausarbeiten größerer Episoden. Er ist ein eher statischer Musiker, der im einzelnen Momen stehenbleibt und ihn ausspielen läßt.

Mit Mozarts C-dur-Symphonie (K.-V. 425) gelangen ihm gute Wirkungen, wenn man sich auch einiges etwas leichter und dynamischer hätte vorstellen können. Es war jedoch insgesamt eine geglückte Wiedergabe.

Mahlers Siebente Symphonie ist eine anstrengende Sache, die schon allein abendfüllend wäre. Sie verlangt jedem der Beteiligten (dem Orchester, dem Dirigenten und dem Publikum) große Konzentration ab und enttäuscht diese bisweilen ein wenig. Es ist dem Dirigenten nicht sehr geglückt, das Ganze zu raffen, um es etwas übersichtlicher zu machen. Die besten Momente gab es bei aller Tendenz zur Überzeichnung von Details in den beiden Rahmensätzen, während vor allem die zweite „Nachtmusik" äußerst spröd blieb und zerfahren wirkte.

O. Pi.

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172

Information aus:

SALZBURGER VOLKSBLATT

Salzburg Datum 21. April 1971

Bostoner Symphoniker in Wien

WERKE VON MOZART UND MAHLER IM MUSIKVEREIN

Das vor 90 Jahren gegründete Boston Symphony Orchestra gastierte unter der Leitung seines Chefdirigenten William Steinberg im Internationalen Orchester- und Chorzyklus der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde im Großen Musikvereinssaal. Mit der Programmwahl — Symphonien von Mozart und Mahler — hat sich das bedeutende amerikanische Orchester allerdings etwas zuviel zugemutet. Der über 70jährige, aus Köln gebürtige Dirigent verfügt zudem über eine stellenweise recht undeutliche Schlagtechnik; er neigt zu den kreisrunden Handbewegungen, die auch ein bekannter österreichischer Dirigent zum Leidwesen der Musiker des öfteren bevorzugt. Seinen Namen sollt ihr nie erfahren. So war das zweitägige amerikanische Gastspiel kein reines Vergnügen für das anspruchsvolle Wiener Publikum.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozarts C-Dur-Symphonie (KV 425), auch „Linzer Symphonie" genannt, nimmt im symphonischen Schaffen des Meisters eine besondere Stellung ein; folgte ihr doch nach dreijähriger Pause die als „Prager Symphonie" bekannte und dieser sodann zwei Jahre später nur noch die großartigen Schlußtrias in Es-Dur, g-Moll und C-Dur („Jupiter"). Das Boston Symphony Orchestra verfügt zwar über satten Streicherklang, gerundetes, einschmeichelndes Holz und schmetterndes, strahlendes Blech; aber bei Mozart läßt es die erforderliche Transparenz vermissen. Gleich der erste Satz gelang nicht ganz so „spirituoso", wie ihn sich der Komponist wohl vorgestellt hat. In der „äußeren Anlage und in der Instrumentation — Trompeten im langsamen Satz! — auf festlichen Glanz gestimmt, dabei aber reich an den für den Meister charakteristischen Gegensätzen zwischen rauschender Fröhlichkeit und schwärmerischer Kantabilität" (B. Paumgartner), wurde das 1783 entstandene Werk von den Amerikanern besonders im dritten Satz nicht richtig verstanden: das war kein graziöses Menuett, sondern ein derber, schwerfälliger Tanz.

Unmittelbar (ohne Pause) schloß Steinberg an den Finalsatz der Mozart-Symphonie den ersten Satz der rund 75 Minuten dauernden VII. Symphonie in e-Moll. Der Dirigent hielt sich an die Originalanweisung des Komponisten Gustav Mahler zur Aufführungspraxis dieses Werkes und schaltete nach dem ersten Satz die Pause des Konzerts ein. Steinberg gestaltete auch dieses vermeintliche Gastgeschenk an die Wiener zu trokken und nüchtern. Am überzeugendsten gelang der zwischen zwei unterschiedlichen Nachtmusiken stehende dritte Satz („Schattenhaft. Fließend, aber nicht schnell"). Der fünfte und letzte fiel ein wenig zu pompös aus.

Das zweifellos überdurchschnittliche Orchester und sein Chef ernteten gemäßigten Beifall. Walter F. Goebel

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
1080 Wien, Langegasse 11
Tel. 42 18 384 / 55 73 576

Ausschnitt aus:

EXPRESS
KURIER

Wien Datum 21. April 1971

Hohe Begeisterungsgra

Die „Bostoner" unter William Steinberg im Musikvereinssaal

Mit einem Programm zweier wesensverschiedener Werke stellten sich die Bostoner Symphoniker ein. In Mozarts Linzer Symphonie (K.-V. 425) wollten sich die Wärme des Adagios und die rustikale Einfärbung des Trios in der Ausdeutung William Steinbergs nicht so leicht einstellen.

Desto besser verstand sich der Dirigent, energiegeladen, mit dem Fuß aufstampfend und dann wieder von souveräner Ruhe, auf die Tonsprache Mahlers in dessen 7. Symphonie. Eine großartige, verständnisvolle Wiedergabe, entsprechend einem Ausspruch Korngolds: „In diesem Werk gehe der Beginn des 20. Jahrhunderts mit seinem Drängen und seinen Nerven vor sich."

Zur Realisierung dieser besonders im Adagio und im Allegro des ersten Teiles hervortretenden Momente, aber auch bedacht auf die romantischen Züge der „Nachtmusiken", stand Steinberg im Boston Symphony Orchestra ein Klangkörper von technisch exzellenten Bläsern, auf herrliche Gesanglichkeit eingestellten Streichern und einem Phänomen von Paukisten zur Verfügung. Unerhört die klangliche Präzision des Orchesters und seihe mit letzter Genauigkeit sich einstellende Reaktion auf alle Intentionen des Dirigenten.

Das Begeisterungsthermometer im Großen Musikvereinssaal erklomm höchste Grade. Paul Lorenz

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (i. Ts.): 17,4 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Buersche Zeitung, Gelsenkirchen-Buer

vom 22. April 1971

Bostoner Symphoniker in Wien umjubelt

Wien. Das Bostoner Symphonische Orchester eroberte die Herzen der Wiener. Nach seinem ersten Konzert im Wiener Musikvereinssaal gab es für das Orchester und seinen Dirigenten, den aus Köln stammenden William Steinberg eine Viertelstunde lang begeisterte Ovationen.

Die amerikanischen Gäste hatten für ihre beiden Wiener Konzerte im Rahmen der gegenwärtigen Europa-Tournee des Orchesters ein rein österreichisches Programm zusammengestellt. Sie spielten Mozarts Linzer Symphonie in C-Dur und als rauschende Klangapotheose Mahlers 7. Symphonie in e-Moll. Viele Weiner Musikfreunde hatten sich vor dem Konzert über die Programmauswahl skeptisch geäußert, da es in der Regel für ausländische Orchester als gefährlich gilt, mit österreichischem Programm in Wien aufzutreten und so den Vergleich mit den Wiener Philharmonikern heraufzubeschwören. Die Bostoner jedoch bestanden den Test ausgezeichnet.

argus Seit 1887 Auflage (i. Ts.): 64,5 – lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:

Recklinghäuser Zeitung, Recklinghausen

vom 22. April 1971

198

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
W. S. Sauer 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 – Tel. 93 88 172

Ausschnitt aus:
SALZBURGER NACHRICHTEN

21. April 1971

Salzburg Datum

Die Aufhellung der „Nachtwache"

Vorbildliche Mahler-Interpretation durch Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Steinberg in Wien

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra, das im Großen Saal des Wiener Musikvereins Triumphe feierte, verdankt sein Entstehen nicht zuletzt einem Österreicher. 1884 wurde der Dessoff-Schüler Wilhelm Gericke, ein enger Freund von Brahms, der zehn Jahre lang als zweiter Kapellmeister der Hofoper das Repertoire betreut und von 1880 bis 1884 die Gesellschaftskonzerte der Musikfreunde geleitet hatte, nach Boston berufen, um das Orchester aufzubauen. Als Gericke 1889 nach Wien zurückkehrte, hinterließ er in Boston einen gut organisierten Klangkörper, mit dem er während seines zweiten Bostoner Aufenthalts (1898 bis 1906) größte Erfolge ernten konnte.

In 25jähriger Tätigkeit (1924 bis 1949) hat dann Serge Koussevitzky das Orchester zum perfekten Interpreten zeitgenössischer Musik erzogen. Auf diesem Fundament konnte William Steinberg, der 1969 das traditionsreiche Amt des Chefdirigenten von Erich Leinsdorf übernommen hat, aufbauen. Steinberg lag nicht zuletzt die Mahler-Pflege am Herzen. Als kostbares Ergebnis seiner Bemühungen hörte man nun in Wien eine wahrhaft exemplarische Wiedergabe der VII. Symphonie in e-Moll.

Steinbergs Mahler-Auffassung ist unpathetisch und unromantisch, den musikalischen Valeurs mehr zugewandt als literarischen Stimmungshintergründen. Wenn man bisher den zweiten Satz gern mit Rembrandts „Nachtwache" in Verbindung brachte, so hat Steinberg den „Galerieton" abgedeckt. Die Figuren sind nun nicht mehr „schemenhaft", sondern klar umrissen. Die koloristischen Akzente werden mit großer Deutlichkeit und Präzision gesetzt. Das Zwiegespräch zwischen Horn und Mandoline im Andante amoroso war ein Muster an lyrischer Zartheit, Durchsichtigkeit und Anmut.

Steinberg läßt seinen Musikern Zeit, jede Nuance ins rechte Licht zu bringen. Das klangschöne und sichere Blech der Bostoner erregt in Wien natürlich Bewunderung und Neid. Die tiefen Streicher dürften in ihrer Klangqualität den Violinen etwas überlegen sein. Es gibt kein „picksüßes Hölzl". Die Holzbläser befleißigen sich einer wohltuenden Sprödigkeit.

Als Einleitung hörte man Mozarts Symphonie in C-Dur, KV 425, die sogenannte „Linzer Symphonie". Sie wurde etwas beiläufig gespielt und zeigte, daß dieses herrliche Orchester auch seine schwachen Stellen hat. Die Pause fand — nach Mahlers Vorschrift — nach dem Allegro con fuoco statt, eine Tradition, die man nicht unbedingt unter ganz veränderten Verhältnissen bewahren sollte.

Der Jubel war laut und verdient.

Ruediger Engerth

SAKO Zeitungsausschnitte
Susi W. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 — Tel. 93 88 172

Ausschnitt aus:
OBER NACHRICHTEN
~~NIED.~~-ÖSTERR. ~~BILDBÖTE~~

Linz
~~M.G.~~

20. April 1971
Datum

Boston und Wien und zweierlei Extraklang ...

Schillernde Klangkultur des Boston Symphony Orchestra überbot diesmal Wiens Philharmoniker

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra gastierte unter seinem künstlerischen Leiter William Steinberg am Wochenende im Musikverein. Die „Bostoner" gelten als eines der besten Orchester Amerikas. Keine Geringeren als Monteux, Kussewitzky, Münch und Leinsdorf zählten zu den Chefdirigenten des 1881 gegründeten Orchesters, und das Wiener Konzert mit Mozarts „Linzer Symphonie", KV 425, und der VII. Symphonie von Mahler bestätigte den außergewöhnlich hohen Standard dieses Orchesters.

Samtiger Glanz der Holzbläser, Reinheit und Dezenz des Blechs und der satte Ton der Streicher verschmelzen untereinander ohne die geringsten Reibungen und bewirken eine fabelhafte Homogenität des Klanges. Dazu gesellt sich ein kraftvoller musikalischer Impetus, dem Brillanz und Perfektion gleichermaßen eigen ist.

Steinberg beschränkte sich auf das Wesentliche. Er schlug nicht den Takt, sondern lenkte mit wenigen Handbewegungen großzügig die Orchestergruppen, formte kontrastreich und nützte mit feinem Gefühl den Klangreichtum des Ensembles, der sich besonders in Mahlers spätromantischer Welt — voll wechselvoller Farbkombinationen und klanglicher Dichte — mit all seinen Qualitäten herrlich ausleben konnte.

In ihrem 7. Abonnementkonzert konnten die Wiener Philharmoniker unter Horst Stein mit dem schillernden Klangspiel der Amerikaner diesmal nicht ganz mithalten. Stein, kein Dirigent der Sonderklasse, aber einer, der sein Metier wohl vorzüglich versteht, stellte exaktes Taktieren in den Vordergrund und fand nur in wenigen Momenten zu einem beseelten Ausdruck, der nun einmal für romantische Musik eine Notwendigkeit darstellt.

In Brahms' kunstvollen „Haydn-Variationen" und in der selten gespielten VI. Symphonie von Bruckner wurden die Formen in überschaubarer Disposition klar dargestellt und die Details scharf nachgezeichnet. Herbheit dominierte.

Die „Musik für Orchester" (1969) von Alfred Prinz, Jahrgang 1930, Erster Klarinettist der Philharmoniker, ist ein handwerklich solides Orchesterwerk. Sehr gut instrumentiert, formal aber etwas unübersichtlich, entspricht es in seiner Haltung einer Hindemith nahestehenden und nicht über diesen hinausgehenden Musiziergesinnung. Meinhard Rüdenauer

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
Wilma S. Sauer, 1070 Wien
Neubaug. 1/I – Tel. 93 88 172

Information aus:

KURIER

Wien Datum 25. April 1971

blick zurück von karl löbl

Boston Symphony Orchestra im Musikverein

Besser als sein Dirigent Mahler ohne Hintergrund

William Steinberg, 72, ist in Amerikas Musikgeschichte der einzige Dirigent, der gleichzeitig zwei sogenannte „erste" Orchester leitet: jenes in Pittsburgh schon seit 1952 und das Bostoner seit 1969.

In Europa ist künstlerische Polygamie häufiger. (Gemessen an Steinberg, ist etwa Sawallisch mit seinen Verpflichtungen in München, Hamburg und Genf beinahe ein Mormone.)

Mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra war Steinberg vergangenes Wochenende in Wien – er zum drittenmal seit Kriegsende.

Ein souveräner, versierter Kapellmeister der alten Schule, ist er als Orchestererzieher und Probenökonom gewiß höher einzuschätzen denn als Gestalter. Mit der Musik, die er interpretiert, macht er nicht viel Geschichten. Sie klingt – egal, ob Mozart („Linzer Symphonie") oder Mahler (VII. Symphonie) – geradlinig, sachlich, nach Noten und Taktstrichen, die sorgfältig gespielt und eingehalten werden. Daß Musik auch eine Sache der Phantasie, der Empfindung sein kann – davon merkt man bei Steinberg nicht viel.

Interessant seine Schlagtechnik, weil diese großen Signale des rechten Armes, diese auf Details bezogene Zeichensprache, diese Gelassenheit gegenüber dem, was die Musik ausdrückt, heute selten geworden sind. Typisch für Steinberg ist ein vom linken Schulterblatt zur rechten Fußspitze zielender Diagonalschlag, der die Luft über dem Podium zerschneidet und aus der Parkettperspektive für die Musiker nicht ungefährlich zu sein scheint. Doch die Damen und Herren zeigen sich unerschrocken. Sie kennen sich offenbar aus, sie wissen, was verlangt wird und gemeint ist. Wohl ihnen.

Daß Steinberg einmal gesagt haben soll: „Je mehr sie tanzen, desto ruhiger stehe ich" – das glaube ich gern, obwohl er oft genug sein linkes Bein nicht ohne (unbewußte) Koketterie anhebt. Doch zum Bernstein-Sprung kommt es nicht. In keiner Weise.

Auch nicht zum Höhenflug. Steinbergs Musizieren ist irdisch, handfest, solide. Für Mahler ist das entschieden zuwenig: die „Siebente" wurde zwar tadellos gespielt, fand jedoch trotzdem nicht statt.

Den „Bostonern", die 18 Jahre älter sind als ihr jetziger Chef, wünschte man einen Dirigenten, der dem luxuriösen Klang und virtuosen Können dieses Orchesters noch jene Dimension hinzufügte, die unwägbar ist und sich der Beschreibung entzieht, aber doch den entscheidenden Schritt vom perfekten Funktionieren zum perfekten Spielen markiert.

Der Streicherklang dieses Orchesters ist dunkel timbriert, hat Fülle, Wärme und Glanz. Bläsersoli werden mit einer fabelhaften Eleganz und Leichtigkeit gespielt. Der Mann an der Pauke vollzieht mit Hingabe das Ritual des Rhythmus. Die Homogenität des Ensembles ist vorbildlich. Die dynamischen Schattierungen, die es zuwege bringt, scheinen keinerlei Begrenzung zu kennen. Man sitzt und staunt diese wunderbare Orchesterkultur an.

Mehr war diesmal leider nicht zu bestaunen.

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
W. S. Sauer 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 – Tel. 93 88 172

Ausschnitt aus:
ÖSTERR. VOLKSSTIMME

Wien Datum

Aus dem Konzertsaal

Eindrucksvoll war die Begegnung mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra unter William Steinberg im Musikvereinssaal. Es ist ein in spielerischer und klanglicher Kultur hohe Ansprüche befriedigender Klangkörper, dessen Streicher dunkle und weiche Klangfarben bevorzugen und in dem immer wieder hervorragende Bläser, manchmal mit grellen Farben und etwas überraschender Schärfe, auffallen. Alles in allem ein sorgfältig zurechtgeschliffener Präzisionsapparat, der wie eine Orgel mit großer Registerdisposition für einen guten „Steuermann" eben „alle Stücke spielt".

Steinberg ist einer jener Dirigenten, die ein wenig dazu tendieren, selbst größere Aufmerksamkeit anzuziehen als die Musik. Er hat eine suggestive, etwas eigenwillige Gestik, die sich weit mehr an der Gestaltung von Details engagiert, als an strengerer Kontrolle des Metrums (wodurch sich bei Tempoübergängen manchmal Unsicherheiten ergeben) und am Herausarbeiten größerer Episoden. Er ist ein eher statischer Musiker, der im einzelnen Momen stehenbleibt und ihn ausspielen läßt.

Mit Mozarts C-dur-Symphonie (K.-V. 425) gelangen ihm gute Wirkungen, wenn man sich auch einiges etwas leichter und dynamischer hätte vorstellen können. Es war jedoch insgesamt eine geglückte Wiedergabe.

Mahlers Siebente Symphonie ist eine anstrengende Sache, die schon allein abendfüllend wäre. Sie verlangt jedem der Beteiligten (dem Orchester, dem Dirigenten und dem Publikum) große Konzentration ab und enttäuscht diese bisweilen ein wenig. Es ist dem Dirigenten nicht sehr geglückt, das Ganze zu raffen, um es etwas übersichtlicher zu machen. Die besten Momente gab es bei aller Tendenz zur Überzeichnung von Details in den beiden Rahmensätzen, während vor allem die zweite „Nachtmusik" äußerst spröd blieb und zerfahren wirkte.

O. Pi.

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Messaggero (Il) Roma	Ordine (L') Como
Messaggero Veneto Udine	Osservatore (L') Romano Roma
Momento Sera Roma	Paese Sera Roma
Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Ediz. Sicilia Roma
Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 - 3 MAG 1971 - 4 MAG 1971

I ritardi di Joan Kennedy

E' PERLOMENO CURIOSO constatare la quantità di proteste sollevate in Germania per i ritardi continui di Joan e Edward Kennedy che erano andati a Berlino con la Boston Pops Orchestra e dove Joan si presentava (seguendo la tournee europea dell'orchestra) come dicitrice in «Pierino e il lupo» di Stravinsky. I coniugi Kennedy (che hanno fatto loro un criticatissimo sistema di una certa aristocrazia meridionale europea), si sono presentati con ore di ritardo a tutte le manifestazioni in loro onore e la stampa tedesca li ha severamente criticati (e la stampa americana ha ripreso le critiche). Solo noi qui a Roma non ci siamo risentiti. A Roma Joan ha fatto il suo ritardo più clamoroso. E' giunta addirittura l'indomani! La Boston Simphony Orchestra con il giovane direttore Michael Tilsen Thomas, che è un protetto dei Kennedy, si esibiva in un concerto nella Capitale la scorsa settimana. Era il suo esordio italiano. La sera prima Simonetta Lippi aveva organizzato un cocktail imponente al Grand Hotel dove la presenza più attesa era quella di Joan. Ma Joan non si è vista. Thomas, il direttore della casa discografica che lo sostiene, la PR Nadia Stancioff, la stessa Simonetta Lippi... si sono tutti scusati: «Joan arriverà domani, forse... Ci ha incaricati di scusarci da parte sua!». Nessuno se ne è avuto. Forse nessuno se n'è accorto. Il passaggio romano di Joan è avvenuto l'indomani, senza clamore.

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Fiorino (Il) Roma	Giornale (Il) d'Italia Roma
Gazzetta di Mantova Mantova	Giornale di Vicenza Vicenza
Gazzetta di Parma Parma	Giornale di Pavia Pavia
Gazzetta di Reggio Reggio Emilia	Giornale di Bergamo Bergamo
Gazzetta di Vigevano Vigevano	Giorno (Il) Milano
Gazzetta del Popolo Torino	Globo (Il) Roma
Gazzetta (La) dello Sport Milano	Lavoro (Il) Nuovo Genova
Gazzetta (La) del Sud Messina	Libertà Piacenza
Gazzettino (Il) Venezia	Luna Sera Roma
Giornale di Brescia Brescia	Mattino (Il) Napoli
Giornale di Sicilia Palermo	Mondo (Il) Milano

2 20 APR 1971

A Roma l'orchestra Boston Symphony

Roma, 19 aprile

Domani sera alle ore 21,15 la Boston Symphony Orchestra, che è ospite dell'Accademia nazionale di Santa Cecilia, suonerà all'auditorio di via della Conciliazione in un concerto diretto dal suo giovanissimo maestro sostituto Michael Tilson Thomas e comprendente i seguenti brani:

Beethoven: Sinfonia n. 8; Schoenberg: Cinque pezzi per orchestra op. 16; Mozart: Concerto in si bemolle maggiore KV 191 per fagotto e orchestra (solista Sherman Walt, primo fagotto dell'orchestra); Ravel: La Valse.

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Messaggero (Il) Roma	Ordine (L') Como
Messaggero Veneto Udine	Osservatore (L') Romano Roma
Momento Sera Roma	Paese Sera Roma
Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Ediz. Sicilia Roma
Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 17 APR 1971 18 APR 1971

Spiacente

Alle numerose telefonate che l'Ambasciata Americana di Roma riceve in questi giorni circa la partecipazione della moglie di Edward Kennedy all'imminente concerto della Boston Symphony Orchestra la risposta è (in italiano) «Spiacente, non è vero, Mrs. Edward Kennedy non prenderà parte al concerto. Può darsi che venga a Roma, privatamente». (Poi ci sono anche quelli che confondendo le carte domandano «quando arriva a Roma la signora Jacqueline Kennedy?». E ci vuole il tatto delle telefoniste dell'Ambasciata per sostenere un breve dibattito sull'argomento). Comunque è «ufficiale» la notizia che Mrs. Edward Kennedy non si esibirà con la celebre orchestra. Un folto gruppo di gente-bene, ch'è particolarmente informata sulle cose dell'America, aspetta con ansia di «vedere» (perché è anche da vedere) il nuovo direttore della Boston Symphony: ha solo 26 anni il maestro Michael Tilson Thimas e appartiene ad una delle «grandi famiglie» degli israeliti d'America: il suo bisnonno fondò il teatro Yiddish. Dopo aver diretto un'orchestra di Los Angeles (egli è californiano, nato ad Hollywood) è stato «maestro sostituto» con l'orchestra di Boston per la stagione scorsa. Le fotografie lo rappresentano elegantemente vestito e di simpatico aspetto. Si dice che abbia conquistato rapidamente l'appoggio di tutti i componenti l'orchestra.

(BOLOGNA)

AVANTI (ROMA)

Concerto della «Boston Symphony»

Roma, 17 aprile

Per la prima volta la «Boston Symphony Orchestra», che è ospite dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia, si esibisce a Roma: eseguirà musiche di Beethoven, Schoenberg, Mozart, Ravel. Il concerto sarà diretto dal giovanissimo sostituto di William Steinberg, il maestro Michael Tilson Thomas; avrà luogo martedì prossimo all'auditorium di via della Conciliazione.

La «Boston», formata da 106 professori d'orchestra, è uno degli organismi musicali più conosciuti e apprezzati in tutto il mondo. Fu costituita nel 1881. Nel corso della sua gloriosa storia è stata guidata da illustri direttori d'orchestra.

Martedì sera all'Auditorio

L'orchestra di Boston per la prima volta a Roma

Martedì prossimo l'orchestra sinfonica di Boston, che è ospite della Accademia nazionale di Santa Cecilia, suonerà all'Auditorio di via della Conciliazione in un concerto diretto dal suo giovanissimo maestro sostituto, Michael Tilson Thomas e comprendente i seguenti brani: l'Ottava sinfonia di Beethoven, Cinque pezzi per orchestra di Schoenberg, il Concerto per fagotto e orchestra di Mozart e la Valse di Ravel.

E' la prima volta che questa orchestra americana, la cui data di nascita risale al 1881, si esibirà nella nostra città nell'ambito di una lunga tournee europea e l'avvenimento merita di essere segnalato, perchè si tratta di un complesso strumentale di larga fama che nel corso della sua gloriosa storia è stato guidato da illustri direttori d'orchestra, come, ad esempio, Arthur Nikisch (1889-1893), Pierre Monteux (1919-1924), Sergio Koussevitzky (1924-1949), Charles Münch (1949-1962) e Erich Leindorf (1962-1969). Attualmente la Boston Symphonie è diretta da William Steinberg, che il pubblico romano già conosce per aver partecipato in più occasioni ai concerti dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia.

Il complesso di Boston, che è formato da 106 professori di orchestra e uno degli organismi musicali più conosciuti e apprezzati in tutto il mondo e svolge una notevole attività, anche alla radio e alla televisione americana, per la diffusione del migliore repertodio sinfonico sia classico che moderno e contemporaneo.

Michael Tilson Thomas, il giovanissimo direttore della Boston Symphonie

rome pre-concert publicity

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Fiorino (Il) Roma	Giornale (Il) d'Italia Roma
Gazzetta di Mantova Mantova	Giornale di Vicenza Vicenza
Gazzetta di Parma Parma	Giornale di Pavia Pavia
Gazzetta di Reggio Reggio Emilia	Giornale di Bergamo Bergamo
Gazzetta di Vigevano Vigevano	Giorno (Il) Milano
Gazzetta del Popolo Torino	Globo (Il) Roma
Gazzetta (La) dello Sport Milano	Lavoro (Il) Nuovo Genova
Gazzetta (La) del Sud Messina	Libertà Piacenza
Gazzettino (Il) Venezia	Luna Sera Roma
Giornale di Brescia Brescia	Mattino (Il) Napoli
Giornale di Sicilia Palermo	Mondo (Il) Milano

2 19 APR. 1971

Concerto a Roma della Boston Symphony

ROMA, 18. — Per la prima volta la «Boston Symphony Orchestra», che è ospite dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia, si esibisce a Roma. Eseguirà musiche di Beethoven, Schoenberg, Mozart, Ravel. Il concerto sarà diretto dal giovanissimo sostituto di William Steinberg, il maestro Michael Tilson Thomas; avrà luogo martedì prossimo all'auditorio di via della Conciliazione.

La «Boston», formata da 106 professori d'orchestra, è uno degli organismi musicali più conosciuti e apprezzati in tutto il mondo. Fu costituita nel 1881. Nel corso della sua gloriosa storia è stato guidato da illustri direttori d'orchestra come, ad esempio, Arthur Nikisch (1889-1893), Pierre Monteux (1919-1924), Serge Koussevitzky (1924-1949), Charles Munch (1949-1962), Erich Leinsdorf (1962-1969).

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Messaggero (Il) Roma	Ordine (L') Como
Messaggero Veneto Udine	Osservatore (L') Romano Roma
Momento Sera Roma	Paese Sera Roma
Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Ediz. Sicilia Roma
Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 19 APR 1971 20 APR 1971

A ROMA LA "BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA"

Domani alle ore 21,15 la Boston Symphony Orchestra, che è a Roma ospite dell'Accademia Nazionale di Santa Cecilia, suonerà all'Auditorio di Via della Conciliazione in un concerto diretto dal suo giovanissimo Maestro sostituto Michael Tilson Thomas.

E' la prima volta che questa orchestra americana, la cui data di nascita risale al 1881, si esibisce nella nostra città nell'ambito di una lunga tournèe europea e l'avvenimento merita di essere segnalato perchè si tratta di un complesso strumentale di larga fama che nel corso della sua gloriosa storia è stato guidato da illustri direttori d'orchestra come, ad esempio, Arthur Nikisch, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf (1962-1969).

Attualmente la Boston Symphony è diretta da William Steinberg.

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Messaggero (Il) Roma	Ordine (L') Como
Messaggero Veneto Udine	Osservatore (L') Romano Roma
Momento Sera Roma	Paese Sera Roma
Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Ediz. Sicilia Roma
Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 - 3 MAG 1971 - 4 MAG 1971

I ritardi di Joan Kennedy

E' PERLOMENO CURIOSO constatare la quantità di proteste sollevate in Germania per i ritardi continui di Joan e Edward Kennedy che erano andati a Berlino con la Boston Pops Orchestra e dove Joan si presentava (seguendo la tournee europea dell'orchestra) come dicitrice in «Pierino e il lupo» di Stravinsky. I coniugi Kennedy (che hanno fatto loro un criticatissimo sistema di una certa aristocrazia meridionale europea), si sono presentati con ore di ritardo a tutte le manifestazioni in loro onore e la stampa tedesca li ha severamente criticati (e la stampa americana ha ripreso le critiche). Solo noi qui a Roma non ci siamo risentiti. A Roma Joan ha fatto il suo ritardo più clamoroso. E' giunta addirittura l'indomani! La Boston Simphony Orchestra con il giovane direttore Michael Tilsen Thomas, che è un protetto dei Kennedy, si esibiva in un concerto nella Capitale la scorsa settimana. Era il suo esordio italiano. La sera prima Simonetta Lippi aveva organizzato un cocktail imponente al Grand Hotel dove la presenza più attesa era quella di Joan. Ma Joan non si è vista. Thomas, il direttore della casa discografica che lo sostiene, la PR Nadia Stancioff, la stessa Simonetta Lippi... si sono tutti scusati: «Joan arriverà domani, forse... Ci ha incaricati di scusarci da parte sua!». Nessuno se ne è avuto. Forse nessuno se n'è accorto. Il passaggio romano di Joan è avvenuto l'indomani, senza clamore.

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Fiorino (Il) Roma	Giornale (Il) d'Italia Roma
Gazzetta di Mantova Mantova	Giornale di Vicenza Vicenza
Gazzetta di Parma Parma	Giornale di Pavia Pavia
Gazzetta di Reggio Reggio Emilia	Giornale di Bergamo Bergamo
Gazzetta di Vigevano Vigevano	Giorno (Il) Milano
Gazzetta del Popolo Torino	Globo (Il) Roma
Gazzetta (La) dello Sport Milano	Lavoro (Il) Nuovo Genova
Gazzetta (La) del Sud Messina	Libertà Piacenza
Gazzettino (Il) Venezia	Luna Sera Roma
Giornale di Brescia Brescia	Mattino (Il) Napoli
Giornale di Sicilia Palermo	Mondo (Il) Milano

2 20 APR 1971

A Roma l'orchestra Boston Symphony

Roma, 19 aprile

Domani sera alle ore 21,15 la Boston Symphony Orchestra, che è ospite dell'Accademia nazionale di Santa Cecilia, suonerà all'auditorio di via della Conciliazione in un concerto diretto dal suo giovanissimo maestro sostituto Michael Tilson Thomas e comprendente i seguenti brani:

Beethoven: Sinfonia n. 8; Schoenberg: Cinque pezzi per orchestra op. 16; Mozart: Concerto in si bemolle maggiore KV 191 per fagotto e orchestra (solista Sherman Walt, primo fagotto dell'orchestra); Ravel: La Valse.

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Messaggero (Il) Roma	Ordine (L') Como
Messaggero Veneto Udine	Osservatore (L') Romano Roma
Momento Sera Roma	Paese Sera Roma
Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Ediz. Sicilia Roma
Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 17 APR 1971 18 APR 1971

Spiacente

Alle numerose telefonate che l'Ambasciata Americana di Roma riceve in questi giorni circa la partecipazione della moglie di Edward Kennedy all'imminente concerto della Boston Symphony Orchestra la risposta è (in italiano) «Spiacente, non è vero, Mrs. Edward Kennedy non prenderà parte al concerto. Può darsi che venga a Roma, privatamente». (Poi ci sono anche quelli che confondendo le carte domandano «quando arriva a Roma la signora Jacqueline Kennedy?». E ci vuole il tatto delle telefoniste dell'Ambasciata per sostenere un breve dibattito sull'argomento). Comunque è «ufficiale» la notizia che Mrs. Edward Kennedy non si esibirà con la celebre orchestra. Un folto gruppo di gente-bene, ch'è particolarmente informata sulle cose dell'America, aspetta con ansia di «vedere» (perché è anche da vedere) il nuovo direttore della Boston Symphony: ha solo 26 anni il maestro Michael Tilson Thimas e appartiene ad una delle «grandi famiglie» degli israeliti d'America: il suo bisnonno fondò il teatro Yiddish. Dopo aver diretto un'orchestra di Los Angeles (egli è californiano, nato ad Hollywood) è stato «maestro sostituto» con l'orchestra di Boston per la stagione scorsa. Le fotografie lo rappresentano elegantemente vestito e di simpatico aspetto. Si dice che abbia conquistato rapidamente l'appoggio di tutti i componenti l'orchestra.

(BOLOGNA)

AVANTI (ROMA) 18

Concerto della «Boston Symphony»

Roma, 17 aprile

Per la prima volta la «Boston Symphony Orchestra», che è ospite dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia, si esibisce a Roma: eseguirà musiche di Beethoven, Schoenberg, Mozart, Ravel. Il concerto sarà diretto dal giovanissimo sostituto di William Steinberg, il maestro Michael Tilson Thomas; avrà luogo martedì prossimo all'auditorium di via della Conciliazione.

La «Boston», formata da 106 professori d'orchestra, è uno degli organismi musicali più conosciuti e apprezzati in tutto il mondo. Fu costituita nel 1881. Nel corso della sua gloriosa storia è stata guidata da illustri direttori d'orchestra.

Martedì sera all'Auditorio

L'orchestra di Boston per la prima volta a Roma

Martedì prossimo l'orchestra sinfonica di Boston, che è ospite della Accademia nazionale di Santa Cecilia, suonerà all'Auditorio di via della Conciliazione in un concerto diretto dal suo giovanissimo maestro sostituto, Michael Tilson Thomas e comprendente i seguenti brani: l'Ottava sinfonia di Beethoven, Cinque pezzi per orchestra di Schoenberg, il Concerto per fagotto e orchestra di Mozart e la Valse di Ravel.

E' la prima volta che questa orchestra americana, la cui data di nascita risale al 1881, si esibirà nella nostra città nell'ambito di una lunga tournee europea e l'avvenimento merita di essere segnalato, perchè si tratta di un complesso strumentale di larga fama che nel corso della sua gloriosa storia è stato guidato da illustri direttori d'orchestra, come, ad esempio, Arthur Nikisch (1889-1893), Pierre Monteux (1919-1924), Sergio Koussevitzky (1924-1949), Charles Münch (1949-1962) e Erich Leindorf (1962-1969). Attualmente la Boston Symphonie è diretta da William Steinberg, che il pubblico romano già conosce per aver partecipato in più occasioni ai concerti dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia.

Il complesso di Boston, che è formato da 106 professori di orchestra e uno degli organismi musicali più conosciuti e apprezzati in tutto il mondo e svolge una notevole attività, anche alla radio e alla televisione americana, per la diffusione del migliore repertorio sinfonico sia classico che moderno e contemporaneo.

Michael Tilson Thomas, il giovanissimo direttore della Boston Symphonie

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Messaggero (Il) Roma	Ordine (L') Como
Messaggero Veneto Udine	Osservatore (L') Romano Roma
Momento Sera Roma	Paese Sera Roma
Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Ediz. Sicilia Roma
Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 19 APR 1971 20 APR 1971

A ROMA LA "BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA"

Domani alle ore 21,15 la Boston Symphony Orchestra, che è a Roma ospite dell'Accademia Nazionale di Santa Cecilia, suonerà all'Auditorio di Via della Conciliazione in un concerto diretto dal suo giovanissimo Maestro sostituto Michael Tilson Thomas.

E' la prima volta che questa orchestra americana, la cui data di nascita risale al 1881, si esibisce nella nostra città nell'ambito di una lunga tournèe europea e l'avvenimento merita di essere segnalato perchè si tratta di un complesso strumentale di larga fama che nel corso della sua gloriosa storia è stato guidato da illustri direttori d'orchestra come, ad esempio, Arthur Nikisch, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf (1962-1969).

Attualmente la Boston Symphony è diretta da William Steinberg.

rome pre-concert publicity

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Fiorino (Il) Roma	Giornale (Il) d'Italia Roma
Gazzetta di Mantova Mantova	Giornale di Vicenza Vicenza
Gazzetta di Parma Parma	Giornale di Pavia Pavia
Gazzetta di Reggio Reggio Emilia	Giornale di Bergamo Bergamo
Gazzetta di Vigevano Vigevano	Giorno (Il) Milano
Gazzetta del Popolo Torino	Globo (Il) Roma
Gazzetta (La) dello Sport Milano	Lavoro (Il) Nuovo Genova
Gazzetta (La) del Sud Messina	Libertà Piacenza
Gazzettino (Il) Venezia	Luna Sera Roma
Giornale di Brescia Brescia	Mattino (Il) Napoli
Giornale di Sicilia Palermo	Mondo (Il) Milano

2 19 APR. 1971

Concerto a Roma della Boston Symphony

ROMA, 18. — Per la prima volta la «Boston Symphony Orchestra», che è ospite dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia, si esibisce a Roma. Eseguirà musiche di Beethoven, Schoenberg, Mozart, Ravel. Il concerto sarà diretto dal giovanissimo sostituto di William Steinberg, il maestro Michael Tilson Thomas; avrà luogo martedì prossimo all'auditorio di via della Conciliazione.

La «Boston», formata da 106 professori d'orchestra, è uno degli organismi musicali più conosciuti e apprezzati in tutto il mondo. Fu costituita nel 1881. Nel corso della sua gloriosa storia è stato guidato da illustri direttori d'orchestra come, ad esempio Arthur Nikisch (1889-1893), Pierre Monteux (1919-1924), Serge Koussevitsky (1924-1949), Charles Munch (1949-1962), Erich Leinsdorf (1962-1969).

202

DAILY AMERICAN, Tuesday, April 20, 1971

LEND ME YOUR EARS

By IRENE FLEMING

Best bids and tuckers come out this evening as Rome music-lovers welcome one of the finest musical organizations in the world, the Boston Symphony. Celebrating its ninetieth anniversary this year, the Boston rose to the top ranks of American orchestras under the long (25-year) and able leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, retaining its eminence under Charles Munch and today, with William Steinberg as conductor.

The orchestra's concert at the Santa Cecilia Academy is part of a month-long, 12-city European tour underwritten by several industrial organizations and numerous private donors, including, for the Rome concert, New York Governor Nelson Rockefeller and Mrs. Edward Kennedy. The Massachuestts senator's wife, who was narrator for "Peter and the Wolf" at the Boston Pops appearance last week in Bonn, is expected to attend this evening's concert. The following works are programed: Beethoven's Eighth Sympony; Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 16; Mozart's Bassoon Concerto in G Flat Major, Sherman Walt, soloist; and Ravel's La Valse.

Directing this evening's concert will be the orchestra's brilliant 27-year-old associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas. In conjunction with the single Italian concert of the orchestra's tour, Deutsche Grammaphon Gesellschaft has just issued Thomas's first Boston recording to appear in Italy: a stereo LP of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 1 in G Minor.

Michael Tilson Thomas

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

	Messaggero (Il) Roma	Ordine (L') [illegible]
	Messaggero Veneto Udine	Quotidiano (Il) Popolo Roma
	Momento Sera Roma	Paese Sera Roma
	Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
	Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
X	Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Ediz. Sicilia Roma
	Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
	Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
	Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
	Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
	Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 19 APR 1971 20 APR. 1971

La Boston Symphony a Roma

ROMA, 19

La «Boston Symphony Orchestra» che è ospite dell'Accademia nazionale di Santa Cecilia, suonerà all'Auditorio di Via della Conciliazione in un concerto diretto dal giovanissimo maestro sostituto Michael Tilson Thomas e comprendente i seguenti brani: Beethoven - Sinfonia n. 8; Schoenberg - Cinque pezzi per orchestra op. 16; Mozart Concerto in Si bemolle maggiore KV 191 per fagotto ed orchestra (solista Sherman Walt, primo fagotto dell'orchestra); Ravel - La Valse.

E' la prima volta che questa orchestra americana, la cui data di nascita risale al 1881, si esibisce a Roma nell'ambito di una lunga tournée europea.

Si tratta di un complesso strumentale di larga fama che nel corso della sua gloriosa storia è stato guidato da illustri direttori d'orchestra come, ad esempio, Arthur Nikisch (1889-1893), Pierre Monteaux (1919-1924, Serge Koussevitzky (1924-1949), Charles Munch (1949-1962), Erich Leinsdorf (1962-1969).

Attualmente la «Boston Symphony» è diretta da William Steinberg, che il pubblico romano già conosce per aver partecipato in più occasioni ai concerti dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia.

Il complesso di Boston, che è formato da 106 professori d'orchestra, è uno degli organismi musicali più conosciuti e apprezzati in tutto il mondo e svolge una notevole attività, anche alla Radio e alla Televisione, per la diffusione dei miglior repertori [illegible]

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

	Calabria d'Oggi Roma	Informazioni (S. S. e R. P.) Roma
	Domenica del Corriere Milano	Intimità Milano
	Epoca Milano	Intrepido Milano
	Fatto Nuovo Lucca	Italia Mondo Roma
	Gioia Milano	Italia (L') Roma
	Grand Hotel Milano	Luna Park Milano
X	Gas Liquefatti Roma	Mia Roma
	Grazia Milano	Nuovo (Il) Adige Verona
	Guerin Sportivo Milano	Presepio (Il) Roma
	Gazzetta Aversana Aversa	Settimana Piacenza
	Gazzetta dei Lavoratori Roma	Week-End Milano
	Gazzettino del Sud Acireale	Zoom Genova

36 13 MAG. 1971

La moglie di Ted Kennedy nell'orchestra

BONN - Joan Kennedy, moglie del senatore Ted Kennedy (fratello, come tutti sanno, dei due Kennedy americani assassinati) è stata al centro di una serata musicale a Bonn (Germania) nella quale ella ha fatto da narratrice in una esecuzione di «Pierino e il lupo» di Prokofiev. La signora Joan fa parte di un'orchestra di Boston.

Altra puntata

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

	Fiorino (Il) Roma	Giornale (Il) d'Italia Roma
	Gazzetta di Mantova Mantova	Giornale di Vicenza Vicenza
	Gazzetta di Parma Parma	Giornale di Pavia Pavia
	Gazzetta di Reggio Reggio Emilia	Giornale di Bergamo Bergamo
	Gazzetta di Vigevano Vigevano	Giorno (Il) Milano
	Gazzetta del Popolo Torino	Globo (Il) Roma
	Gazzetta (La) dello Sport Milano	Lavoro (Il) Nuovo Genova
	Gazzetta (La) del Sud Messina	Libertà Piacenza
	Gazzettino (Il) Venezia	Luna Sera Roma
	Giornale di Brescia Brescia	Mattino (Il) Napoli
	Giornale di Sicilia Palermo	Mondo (Il) Milano

2 20 APR. 1971

Primo concerto a Roma della «Boston simphony orchestra»

Roma, 19 aprile (Ansa)

La Boston symphony orchestra, che è ospite dell'accademia nazionale di Santa Cecilia, suonerà oggi all'auditorio di via della Conciliazione in un concerto diretto dal suo giovanissimo maestro sostituto Michael Tilson Thomas e comprendente i seguenti brani: Beethoven: sinfonia n. 8; Schoenberg: cinque pezzi per orchestra op. 16; Mozart: concerto in si bemolle maggiore kv 191 per fagotto e orchestra (solista Sherman Walt, primo fagotto dell'orchestra); Ravel: la valse.

E' la prima volta che questa orchestra americana, si esibisce a Roma nell'ambito di una lunga tournee europea.

202

DAILY AMERICAN, Tuesday, April 20, 1971

LEND ME YOUR EARS

By IRENE FLEMING

Best bids and tuckers come out this evening as Rome music-lovers welcome one of the finest musical organizations in the world, the Boston Symphony. Celebrating its ninetieth anniversary this year, the Boston rose to the top ranks of American orchestras under the long (25-year) and able leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, retaining its eminence under Charles Munch and today, with William Steinberg as conductor.

The orchestra's concert at the Santa Cecilia Academy is part of a month-long, 12-city European tour underwritten by several industrial organizations and numerous private donors, including, for the Rome concert, New York Governor Nelson Rockefeller and Mrs. Edward Kennedy. The Massachuestts senator's wife, who was narrator for "Peter and the Wolf" at the Boston Pops appearance last week in Bonn, is expected to attend this evening's concert. The following works are programed: Beethoven's Eighth Sympony; Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 16; Mozart's Bassoon Concerto in G Flat Majoy, Sherman Walt, soloist; and Ravel's La Valse.

Directing this evening's concert will be the orchestra's brilliant 27-year-old associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas. In conjunction with the single Italian concert of the orchestra's tour, Deutsche Grammaphon Gesellschaft has just issued Thomas's first Boston recording to appear in Italy: a stereo LP of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 1 in G Minor.

Michael Tilson Thomas

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

	Messaggero (Il) Roma	Ordine (L')
	Messaggero Sera	Paese Sera Roma
	Momento Sera Roma
	Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
	Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
X	Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Sicilia Roma
	Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
	Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
	Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
	Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
	Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 | 19 APR. 1971 | 20 APR. 1971

La Boston Symphony a Roma

ROMA, 19

La «Boston Symphony Orchestra» che è ospite dell'Accademia nazionale di Santa Cecilia, suonerà all'Auditorio di Via della Conciliazione in un concerto diretto dal giovanissimo maestro sostituto Michael Tilson Thomas e comprendente i seguenti brani: Beethoven - Sinfonia n. 8; Schoenberg - Cinque pezzi per orchestra op. 16; Mozart Concerto in Si bemolle maggiore KV 191 per fagotto ed orchestra (solista Sherman Walt, primo fagotto dell'orchestra); Ravel - La Valse.

E' la prima volta che questa orchestra americana, la cui data di nascita risale al 1881, si esibisce a Roma nell'ambito di una lunga tournée europea.

Si tratta di un complesso strumentale di larga fama che nel corso della sua gloriosa storia è stato guidato da illustri direttori d'orchestra come, ad esempio, Arthur Nikisch (1889-1893), Pierre Monteaux (1919-1924), Serge Koussevitzky (1924-1949), Charles Munch (1949-1962), Erich Leinsdorf (1962-1959).

Attualmente la Boston Symphony è diretta da William Steinberg, che il pubblico romano già conosce per aver partecipato in più occasioni ai concerti dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia.

Il complesso di Boston, che è formato da 106 professori d'orchestra, è uno degli organismi musicali più conosciuti e apprezzati in tutto il mondo e svolge una notevole attività anche alla Radio e alla Televisione, per la diffusione dei migliori [illegible]

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

	Calabria d'Oggi Roma	Informazioni (S.S. e R. P.) Roma
	Domenica del Corriere Milano	Intimità Milano
	Epoca Milano	Intrepido Milano
	Esate Nuovo Lucca	Italia Mondo Roma
	Gente Milano	Italia (L') Roma
	Grand Hotel Milano	Luna Park Milano
X	Gas Liquefatti Roma	Mia Roma
	Grazia Milano	Nuovo (Il) Adige Verona
	Guerin Sportivo Milano	Presepio (Il) Roma
	Gazzetta Aversana Aversa	Settimana Piacenza
	Gazzetta dei Lavoratori Roma	Week-End Milano
	Gazzettino del Sud Acireale	Zoom Genova

36 | 19 APR. 1971

La moglie di Ted Kennedy nell'orchestra

BONN - Joan Kennedy, moglie del senatore Ted Kennedy (fratello, come tutti sanno, dei due Kennedy americani assassinati) è stata al centro di una serata musicale a Bonn (Germania) nella quale ella ha fatto da narratrice in una esecuzione di «Pacino e il lupo» di Prokofiev. La signora Joan fa parte di un'orchestra di Boston.

Altra puntata

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

	Fiorino (Il) Roma	Giornale (Il) d'Italia Roma
	Gazzetta di Mantova Mantova	Giornale di Vicenza Vicenza
	Gazzetta di Parma Parma	Giornale di Pavia Pavia
	Gazzetta di Reggio Reggio Emilia	Giornale di Bergamo Bergamo
	Gazzetta di Vigevano Vigevano	Giorno (Il) Milano
	Gazzetta del Popolo Torino	Globo (Il) Roma
	Gazzetta (La) dello Sport Milano	Lavoro (Il) Nuovo Genova
	Gazzetta (La) del Sud Messina	Libertà Piacenza
	Gazzettino (Il) Venezia	Luna Sera Roma
	Giornale di Brescia Brescia	Mattino (Il) Napoli
	Giornale di Sicilia Palermo	Mondo (Il) Milano

2 | 20 APR. 1971

Primo concerto a Roma

della «Boston simphony orchestra»

Roma, 19 aprile (Ansa)

La Boston symphony orchestra, che è ospite dell'accademia nazionale di Santa Cecilia, suonerà oggi all'auditorio di via della Conciliazione in un concerto diretto dal suo giovanissimo maestro sostituto Michael Tilson Thomas e comprendente i seguenti brani: Beethoven: sinfonia n. 8; Schoenberg: cinque pezzi per orchestra op. 16; Mozart: concerto in si bemolle maggiore kv 191 per fagotto e orchestra (solista Sherman Walt, primo fagotto dell'orchestra); Ravel: la valse.

E' la prima volta che questa orchestra americana, si esibisce a Roma nell'ambito di una lunga tournée europea.

rome
the reviews

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Messaggero (Il) Roma	Ordine (L') Como
Messaggero Veneto Udine	Osservatore (L') Romano Roma
Momento Sera Roma	Paese Sera Roma
Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Ediz. Sicilia Roma
Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 | 21 APR 1971 22 APR 1971

I CONCERTI 80

La "Boston Symphony Orchestra" all'Auditorio Pio

Una buona orchestra e un buon direttore è questo telegraficamente il consuntivo del concerto tenuto, sotto l'egida dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia, all'Auditorio Pio dalla «Boston Symphony Orchestra» diretta dal suo «altro direttore» Michael Tilson Thomas. E non abbiamo usato il superlativo proprio per sottolineare il carattere un po' «routiniere» del complesso americano; che è appunto una buona orchestra, in possesso di un bel suono, assai intonata e pronta al gesto del direttore, ma proprio nulla di più. Siamo lontani, vogliamo dire, dall'eccellenza di un complesso come la Filarmonica di New York o come quella di Leningrado, come siamo lontani dalla civiltà e dalla tradizione che si sommano ai meriti puramente tecnici, facendo dell'Orchestra di Vienna o di Berlino quei veri e propri organismi viventi che sono. Un buon violino ma certamente non uno Stradivario: un'orchestra insomma che non abbiamo sentito diversa dalle migliori orchestre italiane che quotidianamente ascoltiamo nei teatri e nelle sale da concerto.

Quando poi diciamo che Michael Tilson Thomas è un buon direttore vogliamo dire di una natura musicale senza dubbio dotatissima, di un amore alla musica che si esprime perfino in un gesto teatralmente estroverso e suggestivo anche quando lo si desidererebbe più misurato; ma anche di un direttore che ha bisogno ancora di maturare queste sue qualità, di frenare questi talvolta eccessivi entusiasmi prima di potersi dire eccellente. Anche se le qualità ci sono perchè lo diventi.

Il programma della manifestazione di cui vi abbiamo riferito comprendeva la Sinfonia n. 8 di Beethoven, i Cinque Pezzi per orchestra di Schoenberg, il Concerto per fagotto e orchestra K. 191 di Mozart (solista Sherman Walt) e La valse di Ravel.

Un pubblico numerosissimo — era presente una foltissima rappresentanza della colonia americana di Roma — ha a lungo applaudito. E un «bis» ha concluso in gloria la serata musicale.

G. D. R.

Momento Sera (Rome), April 21, 1971: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE PIO AUDITORIUM

A good orchestra and a good conductor was, in short, the consensus for the concert held, under the auspices of the Accademy of Saint Cecilia at the Pio Auditorium, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra lead by its "other conductor" Michael Tilson Thomas. And the superlative has purposely not been used in order to emphasize the somewhat "routine" character of the American ensemble, which is precisely a good orchestra, possessed of a beautiful sound, ~~precise~~ well tuned and attentive to the ~~xxxxx~~ commands of the conductor, but really nothing more. In other words, a far cry from the excellence of a group like the New York ~~Philharmonic~~ or the Leningrad Philharmonic, and a far cry from the good breeding and tradition which, in purely technical terms, make the Vienna and Berlin Philharmonics the vital organisms that they are. A good violin, but certainly not a Stradivarius: an orchestra, in sum, which is no different from the best Italian orchestras ~~which~~ we hear every day in our theaters and concert halls.

And when we say that Michael Tilson Thomas is a good conductor we mean that he is without a doubt very talented musically, that his love for the music goes so far as to express itself in gestures which are theatrically extroverted and suggestive, even when it might be a bit more precise; but he is also a conductor who still needs to mature these qualities, to restrain this sometimes excessive enthusiasm before he can be called excellent. Even if the potential is there for him to become excellent.

The program for this concert included the Symphony No. 8 of Beethoven, the Five Pieces for Orchestra, op. 16 of Schoenberg, the Concerto for Bassoon and Orchestra, K. 191, of Mozart, and Ravel's La Valse.

A large crowd -- amongst ~~which~~ them a numerous representation from Rome's American colony -- applauded vociferously. And an encore crowned the evening in glory.

rome
the reviews

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Messaggero (Il) Roma	Ordine (L') Como
Messaggero Veneto Udine	Osservatore (L') Romano Roma
Momento Sera Roma	Paese Sera Roma
Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Ediz. Sicilia Roma
Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 | 21 APR 1971 22 APR 1971

I CONCERTI

La "Boston Symphony Orchestra" all'Auditorio Pio

Una buona orchestra e un buon direttore è questo telegraficamente il consuntivo del concerto tenuto, sotto l'egida dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia, all'Auditorio Pio dalla «Boston Symphony Orchestra» diretta dal suo «altro direttore» Michael Tilson Thomas. E non abbiamo usato il superlativo proprio per sottolineare il carattere un po' «routiniere» del complesso americano; che è appunto una buona orchestra, in possesso di un bel suono, assai intonata e pronta al gesto del direttore, ma proprio nulla di più. Siamo lontani, vogliamo dire, dall'eccellenza di un complesso come la Filarmonica di New York o come quella di Leningrado, come siamo lontani dalla civiltà e dalla tradizione che si sommano ai meriti puramente tecnici, facendo dell'Orchestra di Vienna o di Berlino quei veri e propri organismi viventi che sono. Un buon violino ma certamente non uno Stradivario: un'orchestra insomma che non abbiamo sentito diversa dalle migliori orchestre italiane che quotidianamente ascoltiamo nei teatri e nelle sale da concerto.

Quando poi diciamo che Michael Tilson Thomas è un buon direttore vogliamo dire di una natura musicale senza dubbio dotatissima, di un amore alla musica che si esprime perfino in un gesto teatralmente estroverso e suggestivo anche quando lo si desidererebbe più misurato; ma anche di un direttore che ha bisogno ancora di maturare queste sue qualità, di frenare questi talvolta eccessivi entusiasmi prima di potersi dire eccellente. Anche se le qualità ci sono perchè lo diventi.

Il programma della manifestazione di cui vi abbiamo riferito comprendeva la Sinfonia n. 8 di Beethoven, i Cinque Pezzi per orchestra di Schoenberg, il Concerto per fagotto e orchestra K. 191 di Mozart (solista Sherman Walt) e La valse di Ravel.

Un pubblico numerosissimo — era presente una foltissima rappresentanza della colonia americana di Roma — ha a lungo applaudito. E un «bis» ha concluso in gloria la serata musicale.

G. D. R.

Momento Sera (Rome), April 21, 1971: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE PIO AUDITORIUM

A good orchestra and a good conductor was, in short, the consensus for the concert held, under the auspices of the Accademy of Saint Cecilia at the Pio Auditorium, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra lead by its "other conductor" Michael Tilson Thomas. And the superlative has purposely not been used in order to emphasize the somewhat "routine" character of the American ensemble, which is precisely a good orchestra, possessed of a beautiful sound, well tuned and attentive to the commands of the conductor, but really nothing more. In other words, a far cry from the excellence of a group like the New York Philharmonic or the Leningrad Philharmonic, and a far cry from the good breeding and tradition which, in purely technical terms, make the Vienna and Berlin Philharmonics the vital organisms that they are. A good violin, but certainly not a Stradivarius: an orchestra, in sum, which is no different from the best Italian orchestras we hear every day in our theaters and concert halls.

And when we say that Michael Tilson Thomas is a good conductor we mean that he is without a doubt very talented musically, that his love for the music goes so far as to express itself in gestures which are theatrically extroverted and suggestive, even when it might be a bit more precise; but he is also a conductor who still needs to mature these qualities, to restrain this sometimes excessive enthusiasm before he can be called excellent. Even if the potential is there for him to become excellent.

The program for this concert included the Symphony No. 8 of Beethoven, the Five Pieces for Orchestra, op. 16 of Schoenberg, the Concerto for Bassoon and Orchestra, K. 191, of Mozart, and Ravel's La Valse.

A large crowd -- amongst them a numerous representation from Rome's American colony -- applauded vociferously. And an encore crowned the evening in glory.

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Messaggero (Il) Roma	Ordine (L') Como
Messaggero Veneto Udine	Osservatore (L') Romano Roma
Momento Sera Roma	Paese Sera Roma
Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Ediz. Sicilia Roma
Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 22 APR. 1979

400

LA STAGIONE DEI CONCERTI

Boston Symphony e Mander-Casadesus

ALL'AUDITORIO

Il giovane maestro della Boston Symphony, M. Tilson Thomas

La Boston Symphony Orchestra, attualmente in tournée in Europa, si è presentata al pubblico romano dell'Auditorium di via della Conciliazione sotto la guida del giovanissimo maestro Michael Tilson Thomas, assistente alla direzione del complesso (di cui è direttore stabile il maestro Steinberg, ben noto anche in Italia)

Avevamo già avuto modo di apprezzare le eminenti qualità sia dell'orchestra che del maestro Tilson Thomas in un disco della Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft, contenente un'incisione della Sinfonia n. 1 di Ciaikowski. All'ascolto diretto ne abbiamo avuto conferma. Indubiamente la Boston Symphony Orchestra è un organismo di alto valore, efficientissimo in tutti i suoi settori, sia negli archi che mantengono sempre un suono pieno e caldo nella intera gamma, sia negli ottoni, squillanti e robusti, ma senza asprezze, sia nei legni impeccabili nell'intonazione e nel fraseggio, sia nella percussione. La compatezza, la potenza e insieme l'equilibrio di questa orchestra indubbiamente destano ammirazione.

Il maestro Michael Tilson Thomas è una personalità ancora in formazione, che non sempre riesce a controllare la sua energia. Ci riferiamo non soltanto al suo atteggiamento esteriore (sul podio si agita un po' troppo), ma anche a taluni eccessi che si notano nelle sue interpretazioni e che sono apparsi soprattutto evidenti nell'Ottava sinfonia di Beethoven. Qui, soprattutto nel primo tempo (ma anche nell'ultimo) certe alternative di sonorità forti e tenui sono risultate troppo crude e certi colori troppo netti. Tuttavia l'estrema acutezza dei particolari, emessi in assoluta limpidezza e, nel secondo e terzo movimento, delle parti condotte con maggiore misura ed anche con fine sensibilità, hanno fornito una chiara dimostrazione della musicalità e del temperamento di questo giovane direttore.

Dimostrazione che si è rinnovata, ed in modo più convincente, nelle altre composizioni in programma. Le diverse espressioni dei cinque pezzi per orchestra di Arnold Schoenberg, l'agitazione, che giunge ad impeti drammatici nei Presentimenti, la tagliente asprezza di Peripezie, la tormentata angoscia di Recitatino obbligato, come l'abbandono lirico di Cose passate e di Mattina d'estate sul lago (questi ultimi pezzi non privi di echi debussyani) sono state trasmesse fedelmente, con un lucido senso dei rapporti timbrici e dinamici.

Nel Concerto in si bemolle maggiore K 191 di Mozart per fagotto e orchestra, il ruolo di solista è stato sostenuto da Sherman Walt, componente dell'orchestra, strumentista di bravura veramente eccezionale. La sua sicurezza e la sua agilità nei brani virtuosistici, la dolcezza e la purezza di suono nell'Andante — pagina questa di incantevole soavità — sembravano quasi superare le possibilità dello strumento. Il maestro Thomas ha ottenuto dall'orchestra — e soprattutto dagli archi, dai quali era in gran parte costituito l'organico strumentale — sonorità d'una mirabile delicatezza in una eterea trasparenza.

Chiudeva il programma La valse di Ravel in una esecuzione che ha conferito a questo celebre « poema coreografico » (questa è la sua denominazione) il suo trascinante slancio e la sua esasperata tensione e ne ha realizzato la varietà coloristica. Il successo, caloroso di tutti i brani eseguiti, ha qui assunto toni entusiastici con ripetuti applausi per cui è stato poi eseguito un brano fuori programma.

◆

Il concerto di domenica, sempre all'Auditorio, si apriva col nome di un autore che ora non appare troppo spesso nei programmi delle istituzioni musicali, quello di Vincent D'Indy, del quale è stata eseguita la Symphonie sur un chant montagnard français per pianoforte e orchestra. Opera che attesta la forte preparazione e la vasta cultura del musicista francese nella sua poderosa architettura, questa sinfonia è anche una conferma dell'affermazione del Dumesnil, secondo il quale la musica di d'Indy riflette il paesaggio delle Cevennes, paese della famiglia di lui, con il suo fascino austero e i suoi larghi orizzonti. In essa infatti si notano appunto l'austerità dello stile e la grande ampiezza di respiro, oltre che la robustezza delle frasi, che spesso hanno un vigoroso empito lirico.

Il pianoforte è, si può dire, incorporato nell'orchestra, ciò nonostante Robert Casadesus — al quale crediamo si debba il merito dell'inclusione nel programma di questa sinfonia — ha avuto modo di porre in luce la sua finissima arte, che sa giungere anche a forti accenti, come si è constatato all'inizio del terzo tempo, dove lo strumento solista si pone nettamente in primo piano con decisi disegni.

Certo, il grande pianista ha potuto maggiormente brillare nel Concerto n. 2 per pianoforte e orchestra di Franz Liszt. La sua chiarezza e la sua mirabile sicurezza nei passi virtuosistici, il suo fervore lirico negli impeti e negli abbandoni cantabili della opera lisztiana, le sue preziose sonorità (di rara bellezza l'inizio, con un tocco estremamente morbido) hanno dato vita ad una magnifica interpretazione, che il pubblico ha entusiasticamente acclamato, ottenendo una esecuzione fuori programma.

Di Casadesus è stato eccellente collaboratore il maestro Francesco Mander, soprattutto nella Sinfonia di D'Indy che è risultata compatta e incisivamente delineata, grazie ad una energica e viva direzione. A conclusione del concerto, il maestro Mander ha ottenuto un chiaro successo nella Prima sinfonia di Brahms, della cui monumentale partitura ha tenuto in pugno con sicurezza le complesse trame. Esecuzione sempre nitida ed accurata, con taluni episodi finemente lavorati, soprattutto pregevole nel finale, che è stato condotto con vero senso di grandiosità.

EN. MONT.

FADED TEXT

[illegible] Sinfonica [illegible] in Italia, è presentata al pubblico romano dell'Auditorium di via della Conciliazione sotto la guida del giovane maestro Michael Tilson Thomas, [illegible] alla direzione dell'orchestra del maestro Stravinsky, ben noto anche in Italia.

Avevamo già avuto modo di segnalare le eminenti qualità di direttore che del maestro Tilson Thomas in un disco della Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft, contenente un'interpretazione della Sinfonia n. 1 di Ciaikovski. A [illegible] di [illegible] [illegible] e [illegible].

L'orchestra di Boston Symphony Orchestra è un complesso di arte [illegible] efficienza [illegible] di fiati e [illegible] soliti. La [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

206

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Messaggero (Il) Roma	Ordine (L') Como
Messaggero Veneto Udine	Osservatore (L') Romano — Roma
Momento Sera Roma	Paese Sera Roma
Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Ediz. Sicilia Roma
Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 22 APR. 1979

Mod

Concerti

IL PICCOLO BERNSTEIN DI HOLLYWOOD

Folti « commandos » di musicofili americani, già da tempo stanziati a Roma o giunti nella capitale per l'occasione, hanno invaso l'altra sera l'Auditorio di via della Conciliazione, per il concerto della « Boston Symphony Orchestra ». Vociavano, si salutavano scambievolmente con larghi gesti, additavano la signora Joan Kennedy, moglie del senatore Ted, presente in qualità di sostenitrice, ninfa egeria e a volte anche collaboratrice al pianoforte — ma non in quest'occasione romana — dell'orchestra. I normali abbonati di Santa Cecilia risultavano in educata, civilissima minoranza.

L'Orchestra di Boston è uno degli organismi sinfonici più illustri del mondo, carica di storia, già diretta da Sergio Kussewitzky (per tacere di Nikisch), aureolata da composizioni « appositamente scritte » da Richard Strauss e da Igor Strawinsky. Nel concerto che abbiamo ascoltato ha dimostrato d'essere pari alla sua fama. La potenza di suono della massa degli archi, l'incisività degli ottoni e soprattutto l'eccellenza degli « strumentini », ciascuno dei quali risulta a livello di « solista », hanno suscitato la più schietta ammirazione.

Ma, naturalmente, l'orchestra è strumento nelle mani del direttore: e a questo punto le impressioni ricevute si traducono in obiezioni. Chi guida l'orchestra in questa tournée europea è il maestro Michael Tilson Thomas, un ragazzo di venticinque anni, nativo di Hollywood. Piccoletto, con un gran casco di capelli neri, braccia lunghissime che agita come uno struzzo in corsa agiterebbe le ali, appartiene alla categoria dei « danzatori del podio » il cui più illustre rappresentante è oggi Bernstein. Ovviamente, data l'età, non possiede tutta l'esperienza musicale e ginnica bernsteiniana. E' un ragazzo di quelli che si usa definire « musicalissimi », per indicarne le straordinarie qualità di « dipanatori di ritmi »; senonché a qualità siffatte non s'accoppiano le altre, che sono pur essenziali, per definire una vera e completa musicalità: la sensibilità per le « forme », per il bel suono, per il « legato ».

In tali condizioni abbiamo sentito una Ottava di Beethoven ipertesa, arbitrariamente giostrata fra « scacchi » bianchi (pianissimi, eccessivi) e neri (fortissimi, eccessivi): e troppo forte, soprattutto, borbottavano gli « strumentini » all'inizio del divino allegretto scherzando. Poi i Cinque pezzi op. 16 di Schoenberg: qui, dove la musica si rinsecchisce nella pura ricerca timbrica (e la noia è in agguato), Thomas è riuscito a convincere. E' seguito il Mozart del Concerto K. 191 per fagotto e orchestra, in cui Thomas s'è limitato a modeste funzioni d'accompagnatore, mentre ha brillato, meraviglioso solista, il fagottista dell'orchestra, Sherman Walt. Infine, La Valse di Ravel, gettata al pubblico in larghe ondate, senza ironia né tragicità.

Le urla dei plaudenti hanno provocato, fuori programma, l'esecuzione d'una mazurkona di tempi andati: la cosa che il giovane saltatore ha meglio realizzato.

T. C.

(ROMA) Avanti! Apr. 22, 1971

NEL CONCERTO ALL'AUDITORIO

Successo della Boston Symphony

I pregi e i limiti del giovanissimo direttore d'orchestra Michael Tilson Thomas

Nel corso di una tournée che sta per concludersi a Barcellona la Boston Symphony Orchestra ha fatto tappa l'altra sera a Roma e ha tenuto per la prima volta nella nostra città un concerto all'Auditorio promosso dall'Accademia di Santa Cecilia. Era molto alta l'attesa tra gli appassionati di musica che sapevano conoscere dal vivo questa orchestra che ha sulle spalle novant'anni di attività ed è considerata tra i maggiori complessi sinfonici americani, anche perché sta avuto alla sua testa direttori di grande prestigio e di lunga fama, come ad esempio Monteux, Koussevitzky, Munch, Leinsdorf e attualmente William Steinberg, che sono riusciti a plasmare e ad amalgamare in un tutto unico e compatto strumentisti di varia formazione e provenienza.

Bisogna dire onestamente che l'attesa del pubblico convenuto all'Auditorio per questo concerto straordinario (la sala era piena, ma non esaurita) non è andata delusa e tutti si sono resi conto che la Boston Symphony è un organismo musicale di prim'ordine per la bravura dei suoi elementi che lo compongono e per la omogeneità e pastosità di suono che riesce a sprigionare da se stesso in ogni esecuzione. Le varie famiglie strumentali hanno raggiunto ormai un grado di efficienza e di sicurezza dove non c'è più posto per la nota imprecisa e sbagliata o per l'intonazione imperfetta: gli archi sono ottimi per intensità e consistenza di suono e anche i fiati e gli strumentini non sono da meno e riescono sempre ad esprimere il meglio delle loro possibilità in un discorso che rimane uniformemente alla stessa altezza, secondo il modello delle orchestre tedesche che hanno influenzato sensibilmente il tipo standard delle orchestre americane.

Quello che si vorrebbe per un'orchestra del valore della Boston Symphony è che fosse diretta in ogni occasione da interpreti di notevoli caratteri, meglio per mettere in luce e in rilievo le caratteristiche e i pregi della direzione». Il ventisettenne Michael Tilson Thomas, che non ha ancora la quadratura e la maturità per potenziare al massimo un complesso vasto e scattante come la Boston Symphony. Intendiamoci: il giovanissimo Tilson Thomas ha qualità di prim'ordine per senso musicale, prontezza, sicurezza e dominio dell'orchestra, ma ci sembra che ricerchi troppo l'effetto e usi eccessivamente il gesto teatrale e appariscente, con danze sulle punte dei piedi e movimenti rotatori delle braccia, secondo un modo direttoriale che ricorda molto da vicino il suo connazionale Bernstein. Per questa ragione l'esecuzione dell'Ottava sinfonia di Beethoven ci è apparsa disuguale e non perfettamente a piombo nei quattro movimenti: del resto è una sinfonia difficile su cui «cedono» anche i grossi direttori.

Una prova più convincente della sua naturale predisposizione musicale Tilson Thomas l'ha offerta con i «Cinque pezzi per orchestra» di Schoenberg, diretti con chiarezza e tensione, e con il «Concerto K 191 per fagotto e orchestra» di Mozart, interpretato da un solista di lusso che era il primo fagotto della stessa orchestra Sherman Walth, vivamente applaudito. Ottima per carica dinamica e danzante «La valse» di Ravel, dove l'orchestra ha raggiunto punte virtuosistiche di giustificato entusiasmo da parte del pubblico, che ha preteso un bis, che è stato un brano di un balletto di Ciaikovski. Per la cronaca diciamo che l'orchestra ha ottenuto un caldo successo, specie alla fine, mentre il direttore ha suscitato consensi con applausi misurati.

Dopo il concerto i dirigenti dell'Accademia di S. Cecilia hanno offerto un ricevimento ai graditi ospiti e al loro seguito di presenze, alla cui c'era la moglie di Edward Kennedy, una delle sostenitrici finanziarie della Boston Symphony ed hanno consegnato una medaglia ricordo al maestro Tilson Thomas, che per l'occasione ha suonato nel bagno

208

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Roma Napoli	Tempo (Il) Roma
Rome Daily American Roma	Tribuna del Mezzo giorno Messina
Secolo (Il) XIX Genova	Tribuna Politica Roma
Secolo (Il) d'Italia Roma	Tuttosport Torino
Sicilia (La) Catania	Umanità Roma
Sole (Il) - 24 Ore Milano	Unione (L') Sarda Cagliari
Stadio Bologna	Unità (L') Milano
Stampa (La) Torino	Unità (L') Ediz. Roma
Stampa sera Torino	Voce Adriatica Ancona
Telegrafo (Il) Livorno	Voce (La) Repubblicana Roma
Telestar Palermo	Voce (La) del Popolo Fiume (Rijeka)

4

22 APR. 1979

(400)

L'ORCHESTRA DI BOSTON ALL'AUDITORIO

Questo concerto, che fa parte di un giro europeo della Boston Symphony Orchestra, si è inserito inopinatamente nel poco ordinato svolgersi della barcollante Stagione sinfonica di Santa Cecilia. Data la fama dell'Orchestra americana strombazzata ai quattro venti, l'attesa era grande ma il risultato non è stato pari ad essa.

Se, com'è ovvio, il rendimento artistico di una orchestra dipende dal valore degli elementi che la costituiscono, va da sé che tra essi debba essere prima di tutto preso in considerazione il direttore, di decisiva importanza per il risultato dell'esecuzione.

L'Orchestra sinfonica di Boston è un magnifico complesso per bravura di singoli ed è necessariamente legata all'opera d'illustri direttori che l'hanno plasmata e raffinata in sonorità e stile. Al nome di Kussevizky si collega il periodo che ha dato ad essa maggior lustro.

Fa specie, quindi, notare che un'Orchestra ascesa a tanta fama ci venga presentata, e per la prima volta, sotto la direzione di un maestro di relativamente tenera età, Michael Tilson Thomas, il quale potrà avere tutti i meriti che si voglia — e confessiamo il nostro torto di non averli compresi — potrà avere vinto premi importanti, potrà già vantare al suo attivo una brillante carriera ma non è, certo, all'altezza del compito affidatogli di dirigere un complesso orchestrale al quale furono preposti, in passato, direttori di gran nome e di maturata esperienza. Egli sta sul podio come uno schermitore sulla pedana. S'agita e si dimena in ogni senso, si sbraccia come un forsennato ma non si capisce che cosa voglia tanto il risultato sonoro non corrisponde alle richieste dei suoi gesti confusi. In realtà egli non dirige ma viene diretto da una foga impetuosa che prorompe disordinatamente dentro di lui e rimane allo stato greggio travolgendo la musica e il buon senso. Abbiamo in Italia giovani che non hanno vinto nessun premio Kussevizky ma andrebbero additati come esempi di serietà e di interiore compostezza.

Fino dalle prime battute dell'Ottava sinfonia di Beethoven siamo rimasti stupiti e sconvolti. Ci veniva presentato un Beethoven fuori di sé, che sembrava aver molto trincato in allegre matterie, stranamente agitato: quella immagine ideale di serenità e dominio di sé, travolta in un pervertimento di contrasti isterici. Non dico, poi, dell'arruffio dell'ultimo tempo, tra momenti di confusione che non sapevi proprio come sbrogliare.

I cinque Pezzi per orchestra di Schönberg op. 16 sono stati presentati in un'atmosfera torbida di sonorità ibride, e non sapevi da che parte voltarti tra sensazioni angosciose ed esaltate ebbrezze di suono. Sarebbe stato desiderabile più ordine ed estetica moderazione.

Una nota di equilibrio e serenità ha portato il fagottista Sherman Walt con l'esecuzione precisa e di una sensata bravura del Concerto per fagotto e orchestra di Mozart K. 191. Ma è stata una breve parentesi: è venuta in ultimo La Valse di Ravel a chiudere il concerto con un baccanale di sonorità strariganti e assordanti accolte da applausi ugualmente rumorosi. Si sa che quanto più forte è il clamore tanto più il pubblico è trascinato all'applauso.

G. PAN.

208

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Roma Napoli	Tempo (Il) Roma
Rome Daily American Roma	Tribuna del Mezzo giorno Messina
Secolo (Il) XIX Genova	Tribuna Politica Roma
Secolo (Il) d'Italia Roma	Tuttosport Torino
Sicilia (La) Catania	Umanità Roma
Sole (Il) - 24 Ore Milano	Unione (L') Sarda Cagliari
Stadio Bologna	Unità (L') Milano
Stampa (La) Torino	Unità (L') Ediz. Roma
Stampa sera Torino	Voce Adriatica Ancona
Telegrafo (Il) Livorno	Voce (La) Repubblicana Roma
Telestar Palermo	Voce (La) del Popolo Fiume (Rijeka)

4

22 APR. 1979

(400)

L'ORCHESTRA DI BOSTON ALL'AUDITORIO

Questo concerto, che fa parte di un giro europeo della Boston Symphony Orchestra, si è inserito inopinatamente nel poco ordinato svolgersi della barcollante Stagione sinfonica di Santa Cecilia. Data la fama dell'Orchestra americana strombazzata ai quattro venti, l'attesa era grande ma il risultato non è stato pari ad essa.

Se, com'è ovvio, il rendimento artistico di una orchestra dipende dal valore degli elementi che la costituiscono, va da sé che tra essi debba essere prima di tutto preso in considerazione il direttore, di decisiva importanza per il risultato dell'esecuzione.

L'Orchestra sinfonica di Boston è un magnifico complesso per bravura di singoli ed è necessariamente legata all'opera d'illustri direttori che l'hanno plasmata e raffinata in sonorità e stile. Al nome di Kussevizky si collega il periodo che ha dato ad essa maggior lustro.

Fa specie, quindi, notare che un'Orchestra assessa a tanta fama ci venga presentata, e per la prima volta, sotto la direzione di un maestro di relativamente tenera età, Michael Tilson Thomas, il quale potrà avere tutti i meriti che si voglia — e confessiamo il nostro torto di non averli compresi — potrà avere vinto premi importanti, potrà già vantare al suo attivo una brillante carriera ma non è, certo, all'altezza del compito affidatogli di dirigere un complesso orchestrale al quale furono preposti, in passato, direttori di gran nome e di maturata esperienza. Egli sta sul podio come uno schermitore sulla pedana. S'agita e si dimena in ogni senso, si sbraccia come un forsennato ma non si capisce che cosa voglia tanto il risultato sonoro non corrisponde alle richieste dei suoi gesti confusi. In realtà egli non dirige ma viene diretto da una foga impetuosa che prorompe disordinatamente dentro di lui e rimane allo stato greggio travolgendo la musica e il buon senso. Abbiamo in Italia giovani che non hanno vinto nessun premio Kussevizky ma andrebbero additati come esempi di serietà e di interiore compostezza.

Fino dalle prime battute dell'Ottava sinfonia di Beethoven siamo rimasti stupiti e sconvolti. Ci veniva presentato un Beethoven fuori di sé, che sembrava aver molto trincato in allegre matterie, stranamente agitato: quella immagine ideale di serenità e dominio di sé, travolta in un pervertimento di contrasti isterici. Non dico, poi, dell'arruffio dell'ultimo tempo, tra momenti di confusione che non sapevi proprio come sbrogliare.

I cinque Pezzi per orchestra di Schönberg op. 16 sono stati presentati in un'atmosfera torbida di sonorità ibride, e non sapevi da che parte voltarti tra sensazioni angosciose ed esaltate ebbrezze di suono. Sarebbe stato desiderabile più ordine ed estetica moderazione.

Una nota di equilibrio e serenità ha portato il fagottista Sherman Walt con l'esecuzione precisa e di una sensata bravura del Concerto per fagotto e orchestra di Mozart K. 191. Ma è stata una breve parentesi: è venuta in ultimo La Valse di Ravel a chiudere il concerto con un baccanale di sonorità straripanti e assordanti accolte da applausi ugualmente rumorosi. Si sa che quanto più forte è il clamore tanto più il pubblico è trascinato all'applauso.

G. PAN.

(ROMA)

apri 1971

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

	Roma Napoli	Tempo (Il) Roma
X	Rome Daily American Roma	Tribuna del Mezzogiorno Messina
	Secolo (Il) XIX Genova	Tribuna Politica Roma
	Secolo (Il) d'Italia Roma	Tuttosport Torino
	Sicilia (La) Catania	Umanità * Roma
	Sole (Il) 24 Ore Milano	Unione (L') Sarda Cagliari
	Stadio Bologna	Unità (L') Milano
	Stampa (La) Torino	Unità (L') Ediz. Roma
	Stampa sera Torino	Voce Adriatica Ancona
	Telegrafo (Il) Livorno	Voce (La) Repubblicana Roma
	Telestar Palermo	Voce (La) del Popolo Fiume (Rijeka)

4 | 25 APR 1971 | 26 APR 1971

Musica

L'orchestra di Boston all'Auditorio

Il giovane Michael Tilson Thomas (Hollywood, 1944), sta sull'orchestra come un «gaucho» entusiasta sul cavallo selvaggio da domare, che risulta poi già addomesticato da tempo.

L'orchestra è quella di Boston, in giro per l'Europa e per la prima volta a Roma, ha novant'anni di vita e si sono succeduti nel tempo, quali direttori stabili, Henry Rabaud, Pierre Monteux, Sergio Kussevitski, Charles Münch, Erich Leinsdorf. Ora è affidata alle cure di William Steinberg (ben noto al nostro pubblico) al quale è stato affiancato, come Associate Conductor, il giovane maestro di Hollywood, direttore stabile, peraltro, dell'orchestra di Buffalo.

Questo fatto che la Boston symphony orchestra sia un complesso ben consolidato (ed è prevalentemente composto di anziani) comporta — situazione bizzarramente contraddittoria — che i professori di Boston suonino a testa bassa, quasi senza degnare d'uno sguardo la bacchetta scalmanata del direttore. Suonerebbero — i professori — anche con il podio deserto, sguarnito della fitta ginnastica di M.T. Thomas. Occorrerebbe, chissà, che i mecenati dell'orchestra (Joan Kennedy, moglie del senatore Edward Kennedy, la quale finanzia la tournée della «Boston» in Europa, nonché Nelson D. Rockefeller, governatore di New York — presenti l'una e l'altro al concerto) stabilissero una indennità straordinaria perchè almeno si finga finta di pendere dalla bacchetta del giovane maestro il quale dovrebbe togliersi dalla testa (ha ventisette anni e potrebbe riuscirci) il puntiglio sbagliato di emulare il «divo» Bernstein, alla cui esteriore danza, infatti, il Thomas atteggia la propria.

Il concerto — programma piuttosto scombinato — si è aperto con la Sinfonia n. 8, di Beethoven, in una esecuzione affatto disdicevole al carattere non diciamo «frivolo», ma certamente non così disperatamente «eroico» e senza un attimo di respiro (voluto da Thomas), quale è quello d'una Sinfonia che l'autore chiamò «Piccola». Nè, poco dopo, il Concerto di Mozart (K. 191), per fagotto e orchestra, è andato oltre la virtuosistica esibizione d'un ottimo solista (i «fiati» dell'orchestra sono particolarmente brillanti): Sherman Walt (primo fagotto della «Boston»), festeggiatissimo, anche dal direttore e dai colleghi i quali stanno in orchestra con bonaria giovialità, intoccati da preoccupazioni rituali e formali.

Il meglio si è avuto nei Cinque pezzi, op. 16, di Schoenberg, composti nel 1909, ai quali l'eccitazione del direttore ha giovato moltissimo, e ne La valse (1920), di Ravel, realizzata con un'acre furia di suoni.

Applausi intensi (notevole l'affluenza del pubblico) e, per bis (dopo Ravel, sarebbe occorsa qualcosa di più lieve), la mazurka dal Lago dei cigni, di Ciaikovski, proiettata in una singolare luce bandistica. Il clima d'una euforica, americana energia, si è protratto, dopo il concerto, nel ricevimento offerto dall'Accademia di Santa Cecilia in onore degli ospiti, dove se non dicevi «water» (un «uoter», con la pronunzia stretta e «mangiata»), i camerieri trasteverini tutto ti mettevano nei bicchiere, meno che un sorso d'acqua. Ah, l'America, che fa fa'!

e. v.

MUSIC BY JACK BUCKLEY

The Boston Symphony Concert

Probably more by accident than design, each work in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert (on Tuesday last) belonged to a year of crisis in its composer's life: a varied and challenging job for a 27-year-old conductor. Not only an opportunity to display virtuosity, but versatility.

Michael Tilson Thomas opened his Rome debut program with Beethoven's "Eighth Symphony" — composed in no less a year than 1812 and appropriately dedicated to the Empress of Russia.

Throwing himself all over the rostrum with a showmanship that would make even Bernstein blush, the young conductor rapped out all the soul searching prophetic thunder, making some startling pianissimi contrasts, but not always carefully relating the two extremes.

The second movement (allegretto scherzando) began with an easy air of almost Mozartian mischief, but towards the end became lumpy with the addition of accents not indicated in the score. The symphony's finest feature was the biting string tone which the orchestra produced for the opening of the finale.

Unlike Beethoven, Schönberg's revolution was not so much personal as professional. In the "Five Orchestral Pieces" (1920) he finally abandoned the key system (where each sound had depended on its relationship to the next) for serialism (where each sound was much more intended to be heard "in its own right").

These pieces found Thomas on happier ground. If some of the phrasing was a little ragged, the balance of instruments in the thinly-scored sections was admirable — and an ear for this kind of detail certainly shows promise in a young conductor.

For Mozart, we turned again to a personal crisis, when in 1773 (having failed to obtain work as a musician), he wrote a brief note to his mother: "Little Wolfgang has no time to write, for he has nothing to do. He is walking up and down the room like a dog with fleas."

That combination of child-like charm, humor and grace was now to blossom into genius, for Mozart, who had struck him was not to dominate [illegible] be played with and [illegible] jokes about. In 1774 he returned to his native Salzburg and a whole flood of compositions issued forth — the B-flat Bassoon concerto among them.

For Thomas, however, Mozart after 1773 remains the happy, carefree youth. All the gentler touches of pathos escaped the many movements of his baton and the evenness of tone one always enjoys in Mozart was almost entirely missing, both in soloist and orchestra. Granted that the bassoon is not the easiest instrument on which to produce a good legato, Sherman Walt's performance proved totally inadequate here. One good feature did emerge: an agreeable silvery string tone at the beginning of the slow movement.

The orchestral details of Ravel's "La Valse" (1920) brought much finer playing from the B.S.O. The work belongs to the year when the composer's mental illness (which later killed him) first began to show signs, and as a result, he withdrew into semi-retirement, began his preoccupation with mechanical toys and to work towards a much simpler melodic line.

The toy-like orchestration, flowing melodic curves and great fountains of crescendo showed both orchestra and conductor at their best.

That is all about the concert. But I ought to mention the interruption (immediately following the interval) when an unidentified American gentleman accompanied Thomas on to the platform and presented him with a medal to commemorate his visit to Rome.

The Italians were puzzled, half the Americans embarrassed and the rest of us amused by the lengths to which publicity stunts now go.

210

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Messaggero (Il) Roma	Giornale (L') Como
Messaggero Veneto (Il) Udine	Osservatore Romano Roma
Momento Sera Roma	Paese Sera Roma
X Nazione (La) Italiana Firenze	Piccolo (Il) Trieste
Nazione Sera Firenze	Popolo (Il) Roma
Napoli Notte Napoli	Popolo (Il) Edit Sicilia Roma
Notte (La) Milano	Prealpina Varese
Nuova (La) Sardegna Sassari	Provincia (La) Como
Nuovo Cittadino Genova	Provincia (La) Cremona
Ora (L') Palermo	Provincia (La) Pavese Pavia
Ore 12 Roma	Resto del Carlino Bologna

3 — 29 APR. 1971

80

I solisti della «Boston»

La Suite da l'Histoire du soldat di Strawinsky è stata il fulcro del programma che i «Boston Symphony chamber players» hanno presentato all'auditorium del Palazzo dei congressi per il penultimo concerto degli Amici della musica.

Di fatto il fascino di questa suggestiva e straordinaria partitura, concepita più di mezzo secolo fa, è stato ancora una volta capace di creare una immediata suggestione all'ascolto. E l'impronta della geniale inventiva di Strawinsky — alla cui recente scomparsa è certamente andato il pensiero di molti — è apparsa ancora più nitida in confronto alla non più che diligente abilità artigianale di Walter Piston — che pure è uno dei più importanti autori americani del Novecento — il cui Quintetto a fiati, ben eseguito a chiusura della prima parte, ne ha rivelato la composita natura di musicista.

I solisti della Boston Symphony si sono fatti inoltre ascoltare in due pagine del periodo classico romantico, presentandosi in diverse formazioni strumentali (la caratteristica del complesso, che unisce i «primi» della celebre orchestra americana, è quella di poter abbracciare un repertorio molto vasto e vario per l'adattabilità dell'organico). Si è trattato del delizioso Quartetto in fa magg. per oboe e archi K. 370 di Mozart e il giovanile Trio n. 2 in si bem. per archi di Schubert.

Gazzetta di Mantova Mantova	Giornale di Vicenza Vicenza
Gazzetta di Parma Parma	Giornale di Pavia Pavia
Gazzetta di Reggio Reggio Emilia	Giornale di Bergamo Bergamo
Gazzetta di Vigevano Vigevano	Giorno (Il) Milano
Gazzetta del Popolo Torino	Globo (Il) Rom X
Gazzetta (La) dello Sport Milano	Lavoro (Il) Nuovo Genova
Gazzetta (La) del Sud Messina	Libertà Piacenza
Gazzettino (Il) Venezia	Luna Sera Roma
Giornale di Brescia Brescia	Mattino (Il) Napoli
Giornale di Sicilia Palermo	Mondo (Il) Milano

2 — 23 APR. 1971

80

MUSICA

Michael Tilson Thomas e la Boston Symphony

La Boston Symphony Orchestra, complesso conosciuto fino ad ora in Italia attraverso innumerevoli incisioni discografiche di prestigio, si è presentato all'Auditorio di via della Conciliazione in un concerto dal programma molto differenziato, da Beethoven a Ravel attraverso Schoenberg e Mozart, sotto la direzione di Michael Tilson Thomas, giovanissimo assistente del direttore stabile, William Steinberg.

Il concerto aveva due attrattive, l'Orcestra e il direttore, l'una e l'altro al debutto in Italia. La Boston Symphony Orchestra ha confermato le doti già note, presentandosi nell'organico ridotto dell'Ottava Sinfonia beethoveniana e del Concerto per fagotto e orchestra, di Mozar, e in quello completo dei Cinque pezzi di Schoenberg e di La valse di Ravel, con l'appendice della mazurca dal Lago dei cigni di Ciaikovski, concessa come bis. Quello che colpisce, nell'orchestra, non è soltanto l'omogeneità, spinta a livelli elevatissimi, e la preparazione individuale (di cui il fagottista Walt Sherman, solista nel concerto di Mozart ha fornito un esempio), ma anche la profonda diversificazione nella qualità sonora, la facoltà di mutare registro secondo lo stile di ogni epoca e di ogni compositore, ad ogni organico corrisponde un tipo di sonorità particolare da quelle cameristiche per Mozart a quelle di media orchestra del primo Ottocento per Beethoven, da quelle post romantiche per Schoenberg a quelle, nitidissime, della grande orchestra ravelliana.

Michael Tilson Thomas, all'età di ventisei anni, è un degno direttore per un complesso così perfezionato; la sua ricca esperienza cameristica, la sua evidente sensibilità ai problemi della direzione si fanno luce con una notevole prepotenza, come tutti i giovani, indulge allo spettacolo direttoriale, di quel particolare tipo americano che ha il più illustre esempio in Leonard Bernstein. Ma al di là degli atteggiamenti, traspare una tecnica molto agguerrita, a cui manca forse l'esperimento in condizioni di minore privilegio, vale a dire con orchestre sconosciute, meno capaci, o anche soltanto di diverse abitudini.

Il concerto ha incontrato il con-

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Fiorino (Il) Roma	Giornale (Il) d'Italia Roma
Gazzetta di Mantova Mantova	Giornale di Vicenza Vicenza
Gazzetta di Parma Parma	Giornale di Pavia Pavia
Gazzetta di Reggio Reggio Emilia	Giornale di Bergamo Bergamo
Gazzetta di Vigevano Vigevano	Giorno (Il) Milano
Gazzetta del Popolo Torino	Globo (Il) Roma
Gazzetta (La) dello Sport Milano	Lavoro (Il) Nuovo Genova
Gazzetta (La) del Sud Messina	Libertà Piacenza
Gazzettino (Il) Venezia	Luna Sera Roma
Giornale di Brescia Brescia	Mattino (Il) Napoli
Giornale di Sicilia Palermo	Mondo (Il) Milano

2 | 24 APR 1971 | 25 APR 1971

le prime della musica

La Boston Simphon Orchestra a S. Cecilia

Michael Tilson Thomas, un nome da tenere a mente perchè un giuoto diventerà un protagonista delle cronache musicali. Il giovanissimo direttore americano (ha ventisei anni) si è fatto conoscere con un concerto all'Auditorio di via della Conciliazione con la Boston Symphony Orchestra, complesso assai noto grazie alle innumerevoli e pregevoli incisioni discografiche diffuse in tutto il mondo.

La serata presentava quindi due attrattive, quella di un direttore nuovo e quella di un'orchestra i cui fasti risalgono a quasi cento anni di vita musicale americana. Il programma si prestava, naturalmente, ad una presa di conoscenza più ampia possibile, dato che includeva autori molto differenti, dal Beethoven della Ottava Sinfonia allo Schoenberg dei Cinque Pezzi, dal Mozart del Concerto per fagotto e orchestra al Ravel di La Valse, più un fuori programma: la mazurca dal Lago dei Cigni di Ciaikovski, concesso dopo reiterati applausi dal numeroso pubblico presente. La Boston Symphony Orchestra ha confermato i pregi noti; in più, si è avuta la esatta percezione delle capacità di questo complesso americano finanziato da privati, è bene sottolinearlo nel nostro paese più ricco di sovvenzioni che di autentica passione per la musica, capace di smembrarsi e ricostruirsi nelle formazioni adeguate a stili di epoche differenti contemporanee ma costanti. Dalla formazione media orchestra del primo Ottocento per la sinfonia beethoveniana si è passati a quella ampia per i pezzi schoenberghiani, per tornare alla formazione cameristica del concerto di Mozart (splendidamente interpretato dal fagottista Walt Sherman, primo leggio dell'orchestra) e, di nuovo, alla grande orchestra, nitidissima e di grande smalto, della coreografia musicale raveliana.

Con uno strumento di tali capacità, Michael Tilson Thomas è apparso al grado più alto delle sue possibilità: come tutti i giovani, indulge a certo spettacolo direttoriale a cui ci ha abituati Leonard Bernstein, ma sono anche emerse tecniche di sicuro rendimento, e notevole sensibilità musicale. Tilson Thomas ha svolto attività cameristica come pianista, e ciò gli giova soprattutto nel repertorio sette-ottocentesco, come si è visto nella sinfonia di Beethoven e nell'ottima esecuzione del concerto di Mozart. Resta da vedere se, al collaudo con orchestre sconosciute, e di diverse abitudini (da Mahler al teatro lirico), le doti di Tilson Thomas conserveranno intatto il loro valore.

Per adesso, resta da sottolineare il grande successo che il pubblico romano ha decretato, con imparzialità, al direttore e alla orchestra.

r. la.

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

Roma Napoli	Tempo (Il) Roma
Roma Daily News Roma	Tribuna del Mezzogiorno Messina
Secolo (Il) XIX Genova	Tribuna Politica Roma
Secolo (Il) d'Italia Roma	Tuttosport Torino
Sicilia (La) Catania	Umanità Roma
Sole (Il) - 24 Ore Milano	Unione (L') Sarda Cagliari
Stadio Bologna	Unità (L') Milano
Stampa (La) Torino	Unità (L') Ediz. Roma
Stampa sera Torino	Voce Adriatica Ancona
Telegrafo (Il) Livorno	Voce (La) Repubblicana Roma
Telestar Palermo	Voce (La) del Popolo Fiume (Rijeka)

4 | 23 MAG

LE NOVITÀ DISCOGRAFICHE

Un Ciaicovski giovanile per un giovane direttore

Servendosi di un poderoso apparato propagandistico, è recentemente passata dall'Italia la Boston Symphony Orchestra, famoso complesso d'oltre oceano, che ha avuto i suoi anni d'oro sotto la direzione di Serge Koussevitzky. Oggi, dopo i periodi di Charles Munch e di Erich Leinsdorf, la Boston Symphony ha come direttori: William Steinberg e il giovanissimo Michael Tilson Thomas. Quest'ultimo, una specie di enfant prodige, pianista e direttore, miete da alcuni anni strepitosi successi nelle sale di concerto americane.

In concomitanza con il soggiorno romano dell'Orchestra, la Deutsche Grammophon ha presentato il primo disco di Tilson Thomas: la Sinfonia n. 1 in sol minore, op. 13 «Sogni d'inverno», di Ciaikovski.

Forse è stato un errore da parte del giovane direttore o addirittura della casa discografica tedesca, scegliere questa sinfonia per far conoscere un nuovo e promettente musicista. Ciaikovski non è certamente il compositore per il quale Tilson Thomas è portato. Nel concerto romano, dirigendo i 5 pezzi per orchestra, op. 16 di Arnold Schoenberg, egli aveva confermato la sua bravura e la sua eccezionale comprensione per la musica e di finezze interpretative degne delle migliori tradizioni dell'orchestra che gli è affidata.

Nel Ciaikovski, invece, dobbiamo subire concessioni esagerate a quelle scelte di stile del compositore russo che oggi ci è ormai difficile accettare. Peccato dunque che Tilson Thomas abbia scelto questa pagina, peccato di giovinezza di un compositore comunque non «suo», come opera che lo doveva far conoscere presso il pubblico europeo.

Queste riserve non ci impediscono di lodare il vecchio e glorioso complesso, il quale, sì, nella sinfonia di Ciaikovski dispone di un ampio materiale per far brillare le proprie capacità tecniche e quelle virtuosistiche dei singoli maestri di orchestra.

r. la.

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro 19/a - Tel. 35 93 06

[illegible] Torino	[illegible] Roma
[illegible] Mattino Napoli	[illegible] Venezia
Gazzetta di Parma Parma	Giornale di Pavia Pavia
Gazzetta di Reggio Reggio Emilia	Giornale di Bergamo Bergamo
Gazzetta di Mantova Mantova	Giornale [illegible] Milano
Gazzetta del Popolo Torino	Globo (Il) Roma
Gazzetta (La) dello Sport Milano	Lavoro (Il) Nuovo Genova
Gazzetta (La) del Sud Messina	Libertà Piacenza
Gazzettino (Il) Venezia	Luna Sera Roma
Giornale di Brescia Brescia	Mattino (Il) Napoli
Giornale di Sicilia Palermo	Mondo (Il) Milano

2 24 APR 1971 25 APR 1971

le prime della musica

La Boston Simphon Orchestra a S. Cecili

Michael Tilson Thomas, un nome da tenere a mente perchè un giorno diventerà un protagonista delle cronache musicali. Il giovanissimo direttore americano (ha ventisei anni) si è fatto conoscere con un concerto all'Auditorio di via della Conciliazione con la Boston Symphony Orchestra, complesso assai noto grazie alle innumerevoli e pregevoli incisioni discografiche diffuse in tutto il mondo.

La serata presentava quindi due attrattive, quella di un direttore nuovo e quella di un'orchestra i cui fasti risalgono a quasi cento anni di vita musicale americana. Il programma si prestava, naturalmente, ad una presa di conoscenza più ampia possibile, dato che includeva autori molto differenti, dal Beethoven dell'Ottava Sinfonia allo Schoenberg dei Cinque Pezzi, dal Mozart del Concerto per fagotto e orchestra al Ravel di La Valse, più un fuori programma, la marcia dal Lago dei Cigni di Ciaikovski, concesso dopo ripetuti applausi dal numeroso pubblico presente. La Boston Symphony Orchestra ha confermato a pieno voti: in più, si è avuta la esatta percezione delle capacità di questo complesso americano finanziato da privati, è bene sottolinearlo nel nostro paese più ricco di sovvenzioni che di autentica passione per la musica!, capace di smembrarsi e ricostruirsi nelle formazioni adeguate a stili di epoche differenti contemporanee ma costanti. Dalla formazione media orchestra del primo Ottocento per la sinfonia beethoveniana si è passati a quella ampia per i pezzi schoenberghiani, per tornare alla formazione cameristica del concerto di Mozart (splendidamente interpretato dal fagottista Walt Sherman, primo leggio dell'orchestra) e, di nuovo, alla grande orchestra, nitidissima e di grande smalto, della coreografia musicale raveliana.

Con uno strumento di tali capacità, Michael Tilson Thomas è apparso al grado più alto delle sue possibilità: come tutti i giovani, indulge a certo spettacolo direttoriale a cui ci ha abituati Leonard Bernstein, ma sono anche emerse tecniche di sicuro rendimento, e notevole sensibilità musicale. Tilson Thomas ha svolto attività cameristica come pianista e ciò gli giova soprattutto nel repertorio sette-ottocentesco, come si è visto nella sinfonia di Beethoven e nell'ottima esecuzione del concerto di Mozart. Resta da vedere se, al collaudo con orchestre sconosciute e di diverse abitudini (alla Mahler al teatro lirico), le doti di Tilson Thomas conserveranno intatto il loro valore.

Per adesso, resta da sottolineare il grande successo che il pubblico romano ha decretato, con imparzialità, al direttore e alla orchestra.

c. c.

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro 19/a - Tel. 35 93 06

Roma Roma	Lavoro (Il) Genova
Roma (Il) Roma	[illegible] Roma
Sera (La) Milano	Gazzetta [illegible] Torino
Secolo (Il) d'Italia Roma	Messaggero Torino
Sicilia (La) Catania	Paese Roma
Sole (Il) 24 Ore Milano	Unione (L') Sarda Cagliari
Stadio Bologna	Unità (L') Milano
Stampa (La) Torino	Unità (L') Ediz. Roma
Stampa sera Torino	Voce Adriatica Ancona
Telegrafo (Il) Livorno	Voce (La) Repubblicana Roma
Telestar Palermo	Voce (La) del Popolo Torino (Biella)

4 22 APR 1971

LE NOVITÀ DISCOGRAFICHE

Un Ciaicovski giovanile per un giovane direttore

Servendosi di un poderoso apparato propagandistico, è recentemente passata dall'Italia la Boston Symphony Orchestra, famoso complesso d'oltre oceano, che ha avuto i suoi anni d'oro sotto la direzione di Serge Koussevitzky. Oggi, dopo i periodi di Charles Munch e di Erich Leinsdorf, la Boston Symphony ha come direttori: William Steinberg e il giovanissimo Michael Tilson Thomas. Quest'ultimo, una specie di enfant prodige, pianista e direttore, miete da alcuni anni strepitosi successi nelle sale di concerto americane.

In concomitanza con il soggiorno romano dell'Orchestra, la Deutsche Grammophon ha presentato il primo disco di Tilson Thomas: la Sinfonia n. 1 in sol minore, op. 13 «Sogni d'inverno», di Ciaikovski.

Forse è stato un errore da parte del giovane direttore o addirittura della casa discografica tedesca, scegliere questa sinfonia per far conoscere un nuovo e promettente musicista. Ciaikovski non è certamente il compositore per il quale Tilson Thomas è portato. Nel concerto romano, dirigendo i 5 pezzi per orchestra, op. 16 di Arnold Schoenberg, egli aveva confermato la sua bravura e la sua eccezionale comprensione per la musica e di finezze interpretative degne delle migliori tradizioni dell'orchestra che gli è affidata.

Nel Ciaikovski, invece, dobbiamo subire concessioni esagerate a quelle scelte di stile del compositore russo che oggi ci è ormai difficile accettare. Peccato dunque che Tilson Thomas abbia scelto questa pagina, peccato di giovinezza di un compositore comunque non «suo», come opera che lo doveva far conoscere presso il pubblico europeo.

Queste riserve non ci impediscono di lodare il vecchio e glorioso complesso, il quale, sì, nella sinfonia di Ciaikovski dispone di un ampio materiale per far brillare le proprie capacità tecniche e quelle virtuosistiche dei singoli maestri di orchestra.

r. la.

212

SERVIZI RITAGLI STAMPA — ROMA
Via Cassiodoro, 1-a - Tel. 35.99.06

	Roma Napoli	Tempo (Il) Roma
	Rome Daily American Roma	Tribuna del Mezzogiorno Messina
	Secolo (Il) XIX Genova	Tribuna Politica Roma
X	Secolo (Il) d'Italia Roma	Tuttosport Torino
	Sicilia (La) Catania	Umanità Roma
	Sole (Il) - 24 Ore Milano	Unione (L') Sarda Cagliari
	Stadio Bologna	Unità (L') Milano
	Stampa (La) Torino	Unità (L') Ediz. Roma
	Stampa sera Torino	Voce Adriatica Ancona
	Telegrafo (Il) Livorno	Voce (La) Repubblicana Roma
	Telestar Palermo	Voce (La) del Popolo Fiume (Rijeka)

4 28 APR. 1971

★ I CONCERTI ★

L'Orchestra di Boston

80

IL CONCERTO di cui è stata protagonista la Boston Symphony Orchestra all'Auditorio Pio, sotto gli auspici dell'Accademia di S. Cecilia, ha costituito un avvenimento artistico di grande rilievo.

La compattezza, lo splendore del suono di questa grande orchestra sinfonica, le eccezionali qualità artistiche del suo direttore, il M. Michael Tilson Thomas, la sua scattante energia, il suo dominio assoluto sullo strumento orchestrale, han rappresentato motivi di ammirazione e di entusiasmo.

Una presentazione della orchestra, innanzi tutto: compie in questo 1971 il 90 anno dalla sua costituzione; e, in tutto questo lunghissimo periodo, è stata sempre affidata a mani prestigiose, ad iniziare da quelle di Arthur Nikisch, cui successero nel tempo il grande Pierre Monteux, di cui i romani rammentano con viva commozione l'ultimo concerto, qui all'Auditorio Pio, quando il Maestro già ultranovantenne, dopo un incidente miracolosamente superato, aveva ripreso daccapo la «Pavane» ravelliana e continuato fino in fondo il suo concerto, da «grande musicista». E poi dopo Monteux, l'altro famoso direttore Serge Koussewitzky, russo d'origine ed americano di elezione; quindi Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf ed ora William Steinberg. Tutta una serie di insigni maestri sotto la guida dei quali l'orchestra «si è formata» in modo da apparire quel grande complesso che è.

Conta 108 elementi, con una massa d'archi di ben 69 componenti (per chiarire meglio questo dato al lettore basti riferire che la Orchestra ceciliana ne annovera 12 di meno), e poi una compagine eccellente di «strumentini» e di «ottoni», tra i quali ultimi figura Roger Voisin, una «tromba» famosa che conosciamo quale prestigioso strumento solista di virtuosistiche composizioni. Questa compatta «massa strumentale» è stata guidata con ammirevole bravura dal M. Thomas, ventiseienne appena, che dirige con l'ardore della sua giovanile età, sorretto da una musicalità che sprizza da tutti i pori.

Thomas ha condotto l'orchestra con mano sicura attraverso i vari momenti della «VIII Sinfonia» di Beethoven, rilevandone lo scatto vivo dell'«Allegro» iniziale, riportando una atmosfera di serena giocosità nell'«Allegretto», intessendo mirabili, serici filature nel «Minuetto» e concludendo con un serrato, elettrizzante «Vivace». Dalla concertazione intelligente del Thomas hanno ricevuto vitale impulso i «Cinque pezzi op. 16» di Arnold Schoenberg, illuminati da squarci di luce che li ha «avvicinati» al pubblico.

Nel «Concerto per fagotto e orchestra K. 191» il diciottenne Mozart ha saputo far cantare con delicata eleganza lo strumento solista e Shorman Walt «con eleganza» ha dosato i suoni del suo strumento.

Un finale incandescente, con la geniale composizione di Ravel, «La Valse», nella quale lo splendore sgargiante dei suoni della bella orchestra, la elettrizzante foga del suo direttore, hanno avuto il miglior campo di espressione suscitando una ondata di entusiastici applausi, prolungatisi fino a quando la cortesia del direttore ha manifestato il suo «grazie» nel miglior modo: eseguendo ancora un pezzo, fuori programma: uno squisito brano dal «Lago dei Cigni» di Ciaikovski, accolto da rinnovate ovazioni.

CORRADO ATZERI

LA FIERA LETTERARIA
[illegible] 9, 19[illegible]

SCUDISCIATE PER BEETHOVEN

[illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] in Italia e, nonostante che [illegible] venisse da Vienna e che il giorno dopo l'audizione dell'Accademia Cecilia dovesse essere a Barcellona, non ha dimostrato il minimo segno di stanchezza: [illegible] aveva già tenuto concerti a Londra, a Stuttgart, a Wuppertal, a Berlino, ad Hannover, ad Amburgo, a Francoforte, oltre che alla più [illegible] città di Vienna. Fu [illegible] notevole, bel suono, compattezza di fiati, bravura eccezionale. Ci sono pure di fare i conti con un maestro giovane come Michael Tilson Thomas, il quale affronta Beethoven disciplinando le sensibilità, le musicalità profonde di questo sommo compositore [illegible] ampollosi, scudisciate [illegible] di ogni [illegible] [illegible] Non si dirige così la [illegible] gliose op. 95 del maestro di Bonn. Sembra che il direttore abbia l'orgoglio vivo [illegible] a volte [illegible] istrionesche, altre volte si [illegible] come un sempre e il più delle volte fa pensare non a un maestro [illegible] della musica [illegible] interpretativo, ma a qualche [illegible] di carattere [illegible] gravato [illegible] sulle spalle [illegible] della sua forza [illegible] e costretta [illegible] Poggiando [illegible] un modo di concepire la direzione orchestrale che [illegible] e contorcersi sul podio. Infatti l'aspetto più grave delle sue strane figure di direttore [illegible] un gesto e musica, tra [illegible] sua Tilson [illegible] la [illegible] fiducia troppo grande di poter [illegible] atteggiamento che a volte [illegible] di Beethoven e di Mozart, invece [illegible] Strauss sa penetrare nei misteri [illegible] e [illegible] questi [illegible] del compositore [illegible] Vienna. Peccato [illegible] Concerto [illegible] Ravel, nella quale è [illegible] il [illegible] [illegible] Chi [illegible] Si ha [illegible] il [illegible] Michael Tilson Thomas [illegible] un modello di direttore del valore di Leonard Bernstein [illegible] la [illegible] Lui si [illegible] sul podio, [illegible] di [illegible] l'ossessione. Ma, [illegible] i due interpreti [illegible] differenza [illegible] assai grande, [illegible] agitazione del [illegible] per [illegible] musica [illegible] nella stessa natura del direttore: nel Thomas si nota invece [illegible] l'imitazione.

Questa critica severa non vuole affatto [illegible] che [illegible] difficili [illegible] Età, ma troppo spesso [illegible] solo perché stranieri, vengono giudicati con eccessivo compiacimento e con troppa [illegible]. Il direttore [illegible] ha [illegible] tutto necessità di [illegible] la sua attività con [illegible] cadenza, cercando di penetrare nel [illegible] musicale [illegible] per i suoi programmi, quindi deve far [illegible] che gli [illegible] valori timbrici della sua [illegible] orchestra non vengano sminuiti o falsati, anzi dovrebbe valorizzarli [illegible] al massimo. Non siamo così crudeli da non riconoscere ai maestri alcune qualità, le quali però, debbono essere ben valutate e apprezzate, soprattutto tenendo conto che il Thomas ha soltanto ventisette anni. Bisogna vedere il giovane maestro di preparare un Beethoven, nella sua giusta [illegible], di palesare e di [illegible] le particolarità di un compositore come Schoenberg, di [illegible] al Falla, [illegible] e di un solista di [illegible] come il bravissimo Sviatoslav Richter e di [illegible] nel lato [illegible] ed [illegible], ma là dove il grande [illegible] di Cimarosa ha [illegible] i suoi più [illegible] [illegible] soltanto la [illegible] tra [illegible] e la [illegible] orchestra che [illegible] la perfetto [illegible]. Ricordiamo, perché, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] nel [illegible] [illegible].

Se [illegible] che Luigi Nono [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] l'Accademia di Santa Cecilia si [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Victor Tretiakov [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

BLANK PAGE

214

INCORRECT PAGINATION

barcelona

MIERCOLES, 21 DE ABRIL 1971 LA VANGUARDIA ESPAÑOLA

HOY NOCHE EN EL PALACIO DE LA MUSICA, UN ESPERADO ACONTECIMIENTO: LA PRESENTACION DE LA ORQUESTA SINFONICA DE BOSTON

No es exagerado decir que el anuncio de los dos conciertos que debe celebrar hoy y mañana la Orquesta Sinfónica de Boston presentada por el Patronato Pro-Música, han despertado una auténtica expectación en nuestro ambiente artístico. La curiosidad y el interés está sobradamente justificado. Son muy pocos los conjuntos sinfónicos norteamericanos que pueden efectuar «tournées» por Europa, ya que en general, cuando son orquestas de gran prestigio realizan en los Estados Unidos una labor tan constante e intensiva que les impide abandonar transitoriamente el país, lo que sólo pueden hacerlo a fuerza de elevadas compensaciones económicas que deben ser cubiertas en unos pocos conciertos organizados para estas precipitadas giras.

La Sinfónica de Boston, gran orquesta, una de las de mejor estirpe de los Estados Unidos, creada hace noventa años, moldeada y llevada al cenit de su prestigio por las batutas gloriosas de Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch y otros conductores ilustres, es una de estas entidades musicales de excepción. Como dato anecdótico pero revelador de la envergadura que alcanzan las actividades de la Sinfónica de Boston repetiremos lo dicho en el comentario que publicamos el otro día: el presupuesto de la Orquesta para la temporada 1970/71 en curso, se ha aceptado ya que rebasará la cifra de cinco millones de dólares, lo que equivale a una subvención diaria de cerca de un millón de pesetas.

Es lógico imaginar que este enorme esfuerzo pecuniario para el mantenimiento de la Orquesta tiene una compensación artística que lo equilibra. Y esta compensación es la altura excepcional de las interpretaciones logradas por el conjunto, admirado en sus habituales actuaciones en su sede del Symphony Hall de Boston, en sus visitas a los principales Festivales de los Estados Unidos, en sus actuaciones por la radio y televisión norteamericana y en sus sensacionales grabaciones para la Deutsche Grammophon (que por cierto acaba de lanzar en el mercado español la primera de ellas: la Sinfonía N.º 1 de Tchaikowsky, dirigida por Michael-Tilson Thomas).

El público melómano barcelonés podrá hoy hacerse cargo por primera vez en directo de las posibilidades de esta famosa centuria sinfónica que viene dirigida por su actual titular, el maestro William Steinberg, que conducirá el conjunto en el primer programa en el que figuran la Obertura N.º 3 de Leonora de Beethoven, la Sinfonía Boston de Hindemith, «5 Bagatelas» de Armin Schibler y la segunda Sinfonía de Brahm, de Ravel.

En el concierto de mañana conoceremos el que parece sustituirá a Steinberg en la titularidad de la orquesta, el joven maestro Michel Tilson Thomas, que dirigirá otro programa donde se han inscrito la Sinfonía Renana de Schumann, el Concierto para fagot y orquesta y la Sinfonía K. 297 de Mozart y «La Valse», de Ravel.

Patronato Pro Música de Barcelona

XIII Temporada Musical
II Ciclo

HOY, miércoles, día 21

EXTRAORDINARIO CONCIERTO DE GALA

Presentación en España de la famosísima

ORQUESTA SINFONICA DE BOSTON

bajo la dirección de

WILLIAM STEINBERG

PROGRAMA: Leonora núm. 3 (Obertura), BEETHOVEN; Música de concierto para cuerda y metal, op. 50, HINDEMITH; Cinco bagatelas, A. SCHIBLER; Sinfonía núm. 2, BRAHMS

NOTA IMPORTANTE: Para el concierto de gala se ruega traje de etiqueta

Mañana, jueves, día 22

Segundo y último concierto

ORQUESTA SINFONICA DE BOSTON

Director: MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

PROGRAMA: Sinfonía núm. 3 (Renana), SCHUMANN; Concierto para fagot y orquesta, MOZART; Sinfonía núm. 31 en re mayor K. 297 (de París), MOZART; La Valse, RAVEL

Venta anticipada de localidades: en las taquillas del Palau de la Música, de 5 a 9 de la tarde. Para el mismo día, de 11 a 1 y a partir de las 4 de la tarde.

ORQUESTA SINFONICA DE BOSTON

A partir de ahora en discos

206

PRO MUSICA

CRITICA de MUSICA

ENTACION DE LA ORQUESTA SINFONICA DE BOSTON DIRIGIDA POR WILLIAM STEINBERG

La Orquesta Sinfónica de Boston, que acaba de presentarse en el Palacio de la Música, es un conjunto excepcional, formación extraordinaria de portentosas posibilidades y medios fuera por completo de serie, en lo que a calidad y cantidad de sus instrumentistas se refiere. Si en los valores individuales nos encanta el sonido hermosísimo, por dulzura y afinación exactísima, de las flautas; la bellísima serenidad de oboes; la fluidez y limpio timbre de los clarinetes; la nitidez y buen tono de los fagotes; la redondez, seguridad y nobleza de trompas; el color grato, incisivo sin duda, de las trompetas; la pastoralidad de trombones sin sordina; el sentido de la proporción de los timbales, y la unidad casi milagrosa de una cuerda sensacional en la que la suavidad tersa de violines, el rango de las violas, la plenitud y hondura melódica de los violoncelos y el nervio de los contrabajos, forman un todo homogéneo de belleza muy cierta, en el orden del conjunto la impresión es de algo totalmente logrado, cohesionado en un conjunto sin fisuras, evidenciado hasta la transparencia, con una igualdad indiscutible de arcos, fraseo y ataques que producen una sonoridad suaveda, amplia, redonda y de poder máximo.

Se ha dicho ya en Barcelona orquestas primerísimas de Europa y América cuyo recuerdo podría incitar el asombro. Sin pudores, sin embargo, cuando la Sinfónica de Boston nos muestra cómo no puede pasar de lo difícil a lo fácil, o viceversa, sin diferencia perceptible; cómo no consigue los pasajes vivos, las transiciones y los matices; cómo no capta un sonido que se acomoda con embarazo en los «forte», que no hace sutil en los «piano», que no adorna con policromía brillante y dando el acento más dramático hasta su opuesto en un matiz fácil de Brahms. Todo en la Orquesta Sinfónica de Boston es de una naturalidad tan premeditada, calculada y estudiada, que el peligro desaparece y las sinfonías surgen con lógica.

Y calidad. Porque las interpretaciones, más o menos cercanas a lo que tenemos ortodoxo, se benefician de realización espléndida a la que el maestro William Steinberg debe haber contribuido con un majestuoso desarrollo de un orden horas de ensayos. Así, el director parece limitarse en el concierto a una especie de trabajo-recordatorio, porque sus maneras, sus gestos, sus indicaciones, muchas veces, a veces inteligibles dentro de una técnica de dirección. Pocos, pocísimos entrados, un adornos sin definir; o lo mismo un subrayar la línea de la ejecución, un apoyo al contralto, más con la mirada que con el gesto... y sin embargo los resultados son efectivos. Tuve la impresión de una cosa orquestada y dirigida [illegible] ingrédenos una concordancia de ideas que otra, con la simple insinuación del maestro en el concierto, para que la ejecución transcurra con un orden, un equilibrio y una proporción acústica infalibles. No es la imagen del director perfecto, porque incluso plásticamente resulta poco favorecida, pero como en realidad no se trata de ver, sino de escuchar, lo que hace la Orquesta Sinfónica de Boston con William Steinberg, me parece estupendo.

Lo fue por lo que respecta a la versión de «Leonora» número 3» de Beethoven, quizá más brillante que dramática, tocada con amplitud de medios sonoros y excelente línea. Hindemith, con su «Música de concierto para cuerda y metal» permitió el lucimiento virtuosístico de ambos grupos, si bien el cierre de la primera parte con esta obra, interesante pero no importante, dejó al ambiente un tanto frío. No lo templó mucho más la audición de las «Cinco bagatelas» del compositor norteamericano Schuller, trabajo totalmente intrascendente aunque bien construido. La «Segunda Sinfonía» de Brahms era, pues, el plato fuerte de la sesión. Fue una buena versión, porque una orquesta de esta talla, en el peor de los casos, no puede descender a menores calificativos, pero con todo y significar que hubo pasajes de belleza y contenido emocional muy ciertos, William Steinberg planteó la obra en un clima de legato [illegible] de un matiz cierto blandura al conjunto. Con todo, repito, fue una buena, incluso excelente interpretación que, para mi gusto, hubiera deseado más contrastada. Maestro y director fueron destinatarios de prolongados aplausos al cierre de su primer concierto. El segundo tendrá efecto esta noche, pero dirigiendo un maestro que ha conseguido destacado renombre en los Estados Unidos: Michael Tilson Thomas.

Juan ARNAU

Translated by Richard White/vca

BARCELONA Review - Concert: April 21, 1971 /Juan Arnau - Critica de Musica

PRESENTATION BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DIRECTED BY WILLIAM STEINBERG

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which has just presented itself in the Palacio de la Musica is an exceptional ensemble of extraordinary formation and marvelous possibilities reflected by the complete quality and quantity of its players. If in the heroic individuals we are enchanted by the beautiful sound of sweetness and extremely exact pitch of the flutes; the serene beauty of the oboes; and the fluid color of the clarinets; the clarity and good tone of the bassoons; the roundness, security and nobility of the trumpets; the pleasing incisive color of the brass; the pastoral trumpets; the sense of proportion of the percussion; and the almost miraculous unity of one sensational chord in the smooth violins; the range of the violas; the fullness and melodic depth of the cellos; and the nerve of the basses form a complete combination of very certain purity. It is the agreed impression that something totally accomplished was performed--cohesive as a tooth filling without fissures--shown by an outstanding quality of bowing, order and attacks which produced a mellow tone, ample roundness, maximum power.

It has been said that the major orchestras of Europe and America playing in Barcelona could be remembered as having performed with little excitement. The Boston Symphony Orchestra however shows that it can range the difficult to easy or visa versa without perceptible difference as it follows the bright passages, the transition and the shadings as it controls a sound which rings of exuberance in the "fortes" which becomes subtle in the "pianos" which are adorned with polychromatic brilliance and gives the most dramatic of accents. All the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is of a premeditated nature--calculated and studied--so that danger disappears and the music soars with logic.

BARCELONA review.

And quality.....Because the interpretations more or less come close to what we think of as being orthodox, the benefit of the splendid realizations by Maestro William Steinberg should be termed as a majestic uplift, the result of arduous hours of study; that is, the Director seemed to limit himself in the concert to a type of work-reminder because his manners, his gestures and his cues were premeditated, at times intelligible as a technical kind of direction. The purpose of few -- very few entrances--or gestures without emphasis was an underscored line of execution and a support of the melody. Nevertheless the results were effective. I got the impression that between the Orchestra and the Director all had been conceived, explained and matured in a laboratory accomplished in the form of an agreement of ideas which were correct with the simple hint that the Maestro in the concert program caused executions which occurred through order, stability, and infallible acoustic proportion. It was not the preferred imagination of a director because it was synthetic and resulted in little favor but in reality this wasn't sought after but heard; despite this the Boston Symphony Orchestra under William Steinberg to me seemed stupendous. The version of Beethoven's Leonore Overture was perhaps more brilliant that dramatic, played with fullness, fine tones and an excellent line. The Hindemith concerto for Brass and Strings exposed the lucid virtuosity of both groups. The end of the first part of this work being interesting but of no importance left one slightly cold. Nothing much more can be said for the reading of Five Baggatelles by the North American composer Gunther Schuller, a work totally unreachable although will constructed. The Brahms 2nd Symphony was the strongest piece of the concert. It was a good version because an orchestra of this stature in the worst of situations could not possibly descend to lesser qualifications, but with all considered, the beautiful pitches and certainly the emotional content William Steinberg performed the work in a legato climate with admirable results which is not easy giving a certain bland twist in concept. Over all, I repeat, it was good including interpretations which to my taste could have been more contrasted.

The maestro was addressed with prolonged applause at the close of this first concert. The second concert will take place tonight but directed by a conductor who has gained outstanding acclaim in the United States: Michael Tilson Thomas.

.....Juan Arnau

206

PRO MUSICA

CRITICA de MUSICA

ENTACION DE LA ORQUESTA SINFONICA DE BOSTON DIRIGIDA POR WILLIAM STEINBERG

La Orquesta Sinfónica de Boston, que acaba de presentarse en el Palacio de la Música, es un conjunto excepcional, formación extraordinaria de portentosas posibilidades y medios fuera por completo de serie, en lo que a calidad y cantidad de sus instrumentistas se refiere. Si en los valores individuales nos encanta el sonido hermosísimo, por dulzura y afinación exactísima, de las flautas; la belleza serena de oboes; la fluidez y timbre cálido de los clarinetes; la nitidez y buen tono de los fagotes; la redondez, seguridad y nobleza de trompas; el color grato, incisivo sin herir, de las trompetas; la pastoralidad de trombones sin aristas; el sentido de la proporción de los timbales, y la unidad casi milagrosa de una cuerda sensacional en la que la suavidad tersa de violines, el rango de las violas, la plenitud y hondura cantábile de los violoncelos y el nervio de los contrabajos, forman un todo homogéneo de belleza muy cierta, en el orden de conjunto la impresión es de algo totalmente logrado, cohesionado en un empaste sin fisuras, notable hasta lo inusuál, con una igualdad indestructible de arcos, fiatos y ataques que producen una sonoridad mullie, amplia, redonda y de poder máximo.

Se han oído ya en Barcelona orquestas primerísimas de Europa y América cuyo recuerdo podría limitar el asombro. Se produce, sin embargo, cuando la Sinfónica de Boston nos muestra cómo se puede pasar de lo difícil a lo fácil, o viceversa, sin diferencias perceptibles; cómo se consiguen los pasajes vivos, las transiciones y los matices; cómo se regula un sonido que se ensancha con exuberancia en los «fortes», que se hace sutil en los «pianos», que se adorna con policromía brillante y donde el acento más dramático halla su oponente en un matiz lleno de lirismo. Todo en la Orquesta Sinfónica de Boston es de una naturalidad tan premeditada, calculada y ensayada, que el peligro desaparece y las versiones surgen con lógica.

Y calidad. Porque las interpretaciones, más o menos cercanas a lo que creemos ortodoxo, se benefician de realización espléndida a la que el maestro William Steinberg debe haber contribuído con un magisterio desarrollado en arduas horas de ensayos. Así, el director parece limitarse en el concierto a una especie de trabajo-recordatorio, porque sus maneras, sus gestos, sus indicaciones resultan pocos; a veces inteligibles dentro de una técnica de dirección. Pocos, poquísimos entradas, un ademán sin énfasis: a lo sumo un subrayar la línea de la ejecución, un apoyo al cantábile, más con la mirada que con el gesto... y sin embargo los resultados son eficaces. Tuve la impresión de que entre orquesta y director todo se ha concebido, explicado y madurado en el laboratorio, lográndose una concordancia de ideas que sirve, con la simple insinuación del maestro en el concierto, para que la ejecución transcurra con un orden, un equilibrio y una proporción acústica infalibles. No es la imagen del director preferida, porque incluso plásticamente resulta poco favorecida, pero como en realidad no se trata de ver, sino de escuchar, lo que hace la Orquesta Sinfónica de Boston con William Steinberg me parece estupendo.

Lo fue por lo que respecta a la versión de «Leonora número 3» de Beethoven, quizá más brillante que dramática, tocada con amplitud de medios sonoros y excelente línea. Hindemith, con su «Música de concierto para cuerda y metal» permitió el lucimiento virtuosístico de ambos grupos, si bien el cierre de la primera parte con esta obra, interesante pero no importante, dejó el ambiente un tanto frío. No lo templó mucho más la audición de las «Cinco bagatelas» del compositor norteamericano Schuller, trabajo totalmente intrascendente aunque bien construído. La «Segunda Sinfonía» de Brahms era, pues, el plato fuerte de la sesión. Fue una buena versión, porque una orquesta de esta talla, en el peor de los casos, no puede descender a menores calificativos, pero con todo y significar que hubo pasajes de belleza y contenido emocional muy ciertos, William Steinberg planteó la obra en un clima de «legato» que, si resulta admirable por lo no fácil, da en conjunto cierta blandura al concepto. Con todo, repito, fue una buena, incluso excelente interpretación que, para mi gusto, hubiera deseado más contrastada. Maestro y director fueron destinatarios de prolongados aplausos al cierre de su primer concierto. El segundo tendrá efecto esta noche, pero dirigiendo un maestro que ha conseguido destacado renombre en los Estados Unidos: Michael Tilson Thomas.

Juan ARNAU

Translated by Richard White/vca

BARCELONA Review - Concert: April 21, 1971 /Juan Arnau - Critica de Musica

PRESENTATION BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DIRECTED BY WILLIAM STEINBERG

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which has just presented itself in the Palacio de la Musica is an exceptional ensemble of extraordinary formation and marvelous possibilities reflected by the complete quality and quantity of its players. If in the heroic individuals we are enchanted by the beautiful sound of sweetness and extremely exact pitch of the flutes; the serene beauty of the oboes; and the fluid color of the clarinets; the clarity and good tone of the bassoons; the roundness, security and nobility of the trumpets; the pleasing incisive color of the brass; the pastoral trumpets; the sense of proportion of the percussion; and the almost miraculous unity of one sensational chord in the smooth violins; the range of the violas; the fullness and melodic depth of the cellos; and the nerve of the basses form a complete combination of very certain purity. It is the agreed impression that something totally accomplished was performed--cohesive as a tooth filling without fissures--shown by an outstanding quality of bowing, order and attacks which produced a mellow tone, ample roundness, maximum power.

It has been said that the major orchestras of Europe and America playing in Barcelona could be remembered as having performed with little excitement. The Boston Symphony Orchestra however shows that it can range the difficult to easy or visa versa without perceptible difference as it follows the bright passages, the transition and the shadings as it controls a sound which rings of exuberance in the "fortes" which becomes subtle in the "pianos" which are adorned with polychromatic brilliance and gives the most dramatic of accents. All the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is of a premeditated nature--calculated and studied--so that danger disappears and the music soars with logic.

BARCELONA review.

And quality.....because the interpretations more or less come close to what we think of as being orthodox, the benefit of the splendid realizations by Maestro William Steinberg should be termed as a majestic uplift, the result of arduous hours of study; that is, the Director seemed to limit himself in the concert to a type of work-reminder because his manners, his gestures and his cues were premeditated, at times intelligible as a technical kind of direction. The purpose of few -- very few entrances--or gestures without emphasis was an underscored line of execution and a support of the melody. Nevertheless the results were effective. I got the impression that between the Orchestra and the Director all had been conceived, explained and matured in a laboratory accomplished in the form of an agreement of ideas which were correct with the simple hint that the Maestro in the concert program caused executions which occurred through order, stability, and infallible acoustic proportion. It was not the preferred imagination of a director because it was synthetic and resulted in little favor but in reality this wasn't sought after but heard; despite this the Boston Symphony Orchestra under William Steinberg to me seemed stupendous. The version of Beethoven's Leonore Overture was perhaps more brilliant that dramatic, played with fullness, fine tones and an excellent line. The Hindemith concerto for Brass and Strings exposed the lucid virtuosity of both groups. The end of the first part of this work being interesting but of no importance left one slightly cold. Nothing much more can be said for the reading of Five Baggatelles by the North American composer Gunther Schuller, a work totally unreachable although will constructed. The Brahms 2nd Symphony was the strongest piece of the concert. It was a good version because an orchestra of this stature in the worst of situations could not possibly descend to lesser qualifications, but with all considered, the beautiful pitches and certainly the emotional content William Steinberg performed the work in a legato climate with admirable results which is not easy giving a certain bland twist in concept. Over all, I repeat, it was good including interpretations which to my taste could have been more contrasted.

The maestro was addressed with prolonged applause at the close of this first concert. The second concert will take place tonight but directed by a conductor who has gained outstanding acclaim in the United States: Michael Tilson Thomas.

.....Juan Arnau

Pocas veces podremos repetir la magnífica experiencia de escuchar por primera vez a una orquesta importante, como la sinfónica de Boston, a través de dos criterios tan opuestos, de dos temperamentos tan contrastados como los presumibles entre un William Steinberg, de 72 años, y un Michel Tilson Thomas, de 26. Dos directores que podríamos metamorfosear en la lengua de Paul Withman, respectivamente, como «tree conductor» y «bird conductor». La sobriedad arbórea de William Steinberg, frente al aleteo constante, plenamente coreográfico, del temperamental Michael Tilson Thomas, del joven que logró conquistar al público barcelonés en el segundo concierto de la mencionada orquesta; porque a sus 26 años nos emocionó. Nos emocionó la profunda concepción mental que le llevó a desgranar, paso a paso, la «Sinfonía núm. 3», de Schumann; la «Sinfonía núm. 31», de Mozart, o la soberbia versión de «La Valse», de Ravel, en donde este joven, pero ya importante director, dio algo de su propia vida al público que luego le aplaudió durante varios minutos. Tilson Thomas evidentemente posee técnica de dirección, demuestra un total conocimiento de las obras que interpreta. Posee autoridad, energía y «tablas». Y todo eso a los 26 años es francamente encantador, admirable, prometedor. Cualquier espectador podría sospechar, y yo me encuentro entre ellos, que Tilson Thomas, además de todas esas experiencias, lleva sobre sus hombros también bastantes «horas de espejos». Pero es un lujo, si existe en realidad, que puede permitirse. Confieso sinceramente que Tilsón Thomas me descubrió otra faz de la Sinfónica de Boston. Y me quedo con ella.

Tilson Thomas también dirigió el «Concierto para fagot y orquesta», de Mozart, y aquí hubo de compartir los atronadores aplausos con Sherman Walt, fagotista fuera de serie, poseedor de un bellísimo sonido y fabulosa técnica. No olvidaré fácilmente sus picados, sus pianísimos, ni el perfecto contraste de planos sonoros.

La orquesta se presentó el pasado miércoles, por la noche, con sus 106 profesores para dar cabida a los cuales fue ampliado el escenario del «Palau». Analizada la sinfónica bostoniana por secciones, comprobamos la existencia de un instrumento «vivo», en plenas facultades, un instrumento de primera clase. Pero, para entendernos, alejado, en la escala de valores, de una Filarmónica de Viena, por ejemplo. Cuenta la orquesta con un metal segurísimo y brillante y una cuerda compacta y uniforme. Cualidades ambas dignas de envidia. Se presentó, como decíamos, bajo la dirección de William Steinberg, quien con autoridad y experiencia dirigió un programa integrado por «Leonora», de Beethoven. Aquí un inciso para alabar el extraordinario diálogo entre flauta y fagot a cargo de los magníficos solistas Doriot Anthony Dwyer y Sherman Walt. También interpretaron «Música de concierto para cuerda y metal», de Hindemith (obra compuesta para el cincuentenario de la Sinfónica de Boston), «Cinco bagatelas», de Schuller, y la «Sinfonía núm. 32», de Brahms.

Desde mi punto de vista, o por lo menos la obra que a mí más me impresionó, fue la de Hindemith; en ella pudimos apreciar una interpretación espontánea y brillante, sin minusvalorar, en absoluto, el resto de las obras interpretadas.

En resumen, estamos satisfechos por haber conocido, gracias al Patronato pro Música, a otra entre las grandes orquestas de la actualidad, que en su actual gira europea ha visitado Londres, París, Roma, Viena, varias ciudades alemanas y Barcelona. El «Palau», por lo tanto, fue estos los días auténtica capitalidad en el panorama nacional de la música.

En otro orden de cosas, pero circunscrito al concierto, lamentamos la no asistencia de todos aquellos que no podían pagar mil doscientas pesetas que costó la butaca y a lo mejor tampoco poseían el «smoking» que se recomendaba para estos conciertos. A mí esto del «smoking» no me preocupa especialmente, pero creo que podrían ofenderse todos aquellos artistas que actúan para el Patronato en cuyos conciertos no se ha recomendado tan elegante prenda y poseen, por lo menos, tanta categoría como la magnífica Orquesta Sinfónica de Boston.

Para concluir diremos que la presentación barcelonesa de la Sinfónica de Boston ha coincidido con la aparición en España de su primera grabación dirigida por el maestro adjunto de la citada sinfónica estadounidense, el joven Michael Tilson Thomas, que como hemos dicho dirigió el segundo concierto de esta orquesta en el «Palau». La grabación, magnífica por cierto, corresponde a la «Sinfonía núm. 1» de Peter Tchaikovsky, y ha sido editada por la Deutsche Grammophon.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

LA SINFONICA DE BOSTON

EN DOS VERSIONES

Martes, 27 de abril de 1971

From "El Noticiero Universal," April 27, 1971

William Steinberg, Michael Tilson Thomas, the BSO - In Two Versions
by Augusto Valera

Few times can we repeat the magnificent experience of hearing for the first time an important orchestra like the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including two standards so opposite, two temperaments so contrasting as those shown between a William Steinberg, 72 years old, and a Michael Tilson Thomas of 26. Two directors whom we might change into the language of Paul Withman, respectively, as "tree conductor" and "bird conductor." The arboreal sobriety of William Steinberg as opposed to the constant flapping [wings], fully choreographed, of temperamental Michael Tilson Thomas, the youth who succeeded in capturing the Barcelonian public in the 2nd concerto by the aforementioned orchestra; how did he move us with his 26 years? What moved us was the profound mental conception which he transmitted by thrashing out, passage by passage, the Symphony No.3 of Schumann, the Symphony No. 31 of Mozart, or the superb rendition of "La Valse" of Ravel, in which this young, but now important director, gave something of his own life to the public who later applauded him for some minutes. Tilson Thomas evidently possesses technique of direction, as well as a total knowledge of the works which he interprest. He possesses authority, energy, and "boards" (?). And all that at 26 years - he is frankly enchanting, a wonderful, promising hopeful. Any spectator might suspect, and I count myself among them, that Tilson Thomas, besides all those experiences, also carries "hours of mirrors" [?respect] over his men. But it is a luxury [extravagance], if it exists in reality, which allows it to be so. I confess sincerely that Tilson Thomas uncovered another phase of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And I am glad of that.

Tilson Thomas also directed the Concerto for Bassoon and Orchestra of Mozart, and here he shared the thunderous applause with Sherman Walt, bassoonist outside of the series [fantastic], possessor of a most beautiful sound and fabulous technique. I will not easily forget his picados [?], his pianissimos, nor the perfect contrast of sonorous level tones.

The orchestra was presented the past Wednesday, at night, with its 106 professionals, and in order to give them room the stage of the "Palau" was enlarged. The Boston Symphony Orchestra analyzed section by section proves to us the existence of a "living instrument," in full abilities, an instrument of the first class. But, in order to understand us, objectively, in the scale of values of a Philharmonic of Vienna, for example. Score the orchestra with a very certain [sure] and brilliant brass section and a string section compact and uniform. Both qualities worthy of envy. It was presented, as we were saying, under the direction of William Steinberg who directed a program integrated by "Leonora" by Beethoven with authority and experience. Here an insertion to praise the extraordinary dialogue between flute and bassoon realized by the magnificent soloists, D.A. Dwyer and Sherman Walt... [list of works performed].

From my point of view, the best, or at least the work which most impressed me, was that of Hindemith; in it we could appreciate a spontaneous and brilliant interprestation, without diminishing in value, absolutely, the rest of the works interpreted.

In summary, we are satisfied to have become acquainted with, thanks to the Foundation for Music, another of the great orchestras of today, which in its tour of Europe has visited London, Paris, Rome, Vienna, various German cities, and Barcelona. The "Palau" was, therefore, for these few days, authentic capitol in the national panorama of music.

In other matters, but aside from the concert, we lament the fact that all those who couldn't pay 1200 pesetas [$16.00], which is what the orchestra cost, and who probably didn't have the "smoking jacket" which was recommended for these concerts, could not attend. This bit about the "smoking jacket" doesn't bother me especially, but I believe that it might offend all those artists who perform for the Foundation in whose concerts such elegant wear hasn't been recommended, and who possess, at least, as much rank as the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To conclude we must say that the Barcelona presentation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has coincided with the appearance in Spain of its first recording directed by the assistant director of this United States Symphony, the young Michael Tilson Thomas, whom we have said, directed the second concert of this orchestra in the "Palau." The recording, certainly magnificent, is of Symphony No. 1 of P. Tchaikovsky, and has been recorded by DGG.

(translated by George F. Oeste, American School of Madrid)
/dow

Pocas veces podremos repetir la magnífica experiencia de escuchar por primera vez a una orquesta importante, como la sinfónica de Boston, a través de dos criterios tan opuestos, de dos temperamentos tan contrastados como los presumibles entre un William Steinberg, de 72 años, y un Michel Tilson Thomas, de 26. Dos directores que podríamos metamorfosear en la lengua de Paul Withman, respectivamente, como «tree conductor» y «bird conductor». La sobriedad arbórea de William Steinberg, frente al aleteo constante, plenamente coreográfico, del temperamental Michael Tilson Thomas, del joven que logró conquistar al público barcelonés en el segundo concierto de la mencionada orquesta; porque a sus 26 años nos emocionó. Nos emocionó la profunda concepción mental que le llevó a desgranar, paso a paso, la «Sinfonía núm. 3», de Schuman; la «Sinfonía núm. 31», de Mozart, o la soberbia versión de «La Valse», de Ravel, en donde este joven, pero ya importante director, dio algo de su propia vida al público que luego le aplaudió durante varios minutos. Tilson Thomas evidentemente posee técnica de dirección, demuestra un total conocimiento de las obras que interpreta. Posee autoridad, energía y «tablas». Y todo eso a los 26 años es francamente encantador, admirable, prometedor. Cualquier espectador podría sospechar, y yo me encuentro entre ellos, que Tilson Thomas, además de todas esas experiencias, lleva sobre sus hombros también bastantes «horas de espejo». Pero es un lujo, si existe en realidad, que puede permitirse. Confieso sinceramente que Tilsón Thomas me descubrió otra faz de la Sinfónica de Boston. Y me quedo con ella.

Tilson Thomas también dirigió el «Concierto para fagot y orquesta», de Mozart, y aquí hubo de compartir los atronadores aplausos con Sherman Walt, fagotista fuera de serie, poseedor de un bellísimo sonido y fabulosa técnica. No olvidaré fácilmente sus picados, sus pianísimos, ni el perfecto contraste de planos sonoros.

La orquesta se presentó el pasado miércoles, por la noche, con sus 106 profesores para cabida a los cuales fue ampliado el escenario del «Palau». Analizada la sinfónica bostoniana por secciones, comprobamos la existencia de un instrumento «vivo», en plenas facultades, un instrumento de primera clase. Pero, para entendernos, alejado, en la escala de valores, de una Filarmónica de Viena, por ejemplo. Cuenta la orquesta con un metal segurísimo y brillante y una cuerda compacta y uniforme. Cualidades ambas dignas de envidia. Se presentó, como decíamos, bajo la dirección de William Steinberg, quien con autoridad y experiencia dirigió un programa integrado por «Leonora», de Beethoven. Aquí un inciso para alabar el extraordinario diálogo entre flauta y fagot a cargo de los magníficos solistas Doriot Anthony Dwyer y Sherman Walt. También interpretaron «Música de concierto para cuerda y metals, de Hindemith (obra compuesta para el cincuentenario de la Sinfónica de Boston), «Cinco bagatelas», de Schuller, y la «Sinfonía núm. 32», de Brahms.

Desde mi punto de vista, o por lo menos la obra que a mí más me impresionó, fue la de Hindemith; en ella pudimos apreciar una interpretación espontánea y brillante, sin minusvalorar, en absoluto, el resto de las obras interpretadas.

En resumen, estamos satisfechos por haber conocido, gracias al Patronato pro Música, a otra entre las grandes orquestas de la actualidad, que en su actual gira europea ha visitado Londres, París, Roma, Viena, varias ciudades alemanas y Barcelona. El «Palau», por lo tanto, fue estos los días auténtica capitalidad en el panorama nacional de la música.

En otro orden de cosas, pero circunscrito al concierto, lamentamos la no asistencia de todos aquellos que no podían pagar mil doscientas pesetas que costó la butaca y a lo mejor tampoco poseían el «smoking» que se recomendaba para estos conciertos. A mí esto del «smoking» no me preocupa especialmente, pero creo que podrían ofenderse todos aquellos artistas que actúan para el Patronato en cuyos conciertos no se ha recomendado tan elegante prenda y poseen, por lo menos, tanta categoría como la magnífica Orquesta Sinfónica de Boston.

Para concluir diremos que la presentación barcelonesa de la Sinfónica de Boston ha coincidido con la aparición en España de su primera grabación dirigida por el maestro adjunto de la citada sinfónica estadounidense, el joven Michael Tilson Thomas, que como hemos dicho dirigió el segundo concierto de esta orquesta en el «Palau». La grabación, magnífica por cierto, corresponde a la «Sinfonía núm. 1» de Peter Tchaikovsky, y ha sido editada por la Deutsche Grammophon.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

LA SINFONICA DE BOSTON

EN DOS VERSIONES

Martes, 27 de abril de 1971

From "El Noticiero Universal," April 27, 1971

William Steinberg, Michael Tilson Thomas, the BSO - In Two Versions
by Augusto Valera

Few times can we repeat the magnificent experience of hearing for the first time an important orchestra like the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including two standards so opposite, two temperaments so contrasting as those shown between a William Steinberg, 72 years old, and a Michael Tilson Thomas of 26. Two directors whom we might change into the language of Paul Withman, respectively, as "tree conductor" and "bird conductor." The arboreal sobriety of William Steinberg as opposed to the constant flapping [wings], fully choreographed, of temperamental Michael Tilson Thomas, the youth who succeeded in capturing the Barcelonian public in the 2nd concerto by the aforementioned orchestra; how did he move us with his 26 years? What moved us was the profound mental conception which he transmitted by thrashing out, passage by passage, the Symphony No.3 of Schumann, the Symphony No. 31 of Mozart, or the superb rendition of "La Valse" of Ravel, in which this young, but now important director, gave something of his own life to the public who later applauded him for some minutes. Tilson Thomas evidently possesses technique of direction, as well as a total knowledge of the works which he interprest. He possesses authority, energy, and "boards" (?). And all that at 26 years - he is frankly enchanting, a wonderful, promising hopeful. Any spectator might suspect, and I count myself among them, that Tilson Thomas, besides all those experiences, also carries "hours of mirrors" [?respect] over his men. But it is a luxury [extravagance], if it exists in reality, which allows it to be so. I confess sincerely that Tilson Thomas uncovered another phase of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And I am glad of that.

Tilson Thomas also directed the Concerto for Bassoon and Orchestra of Mozart, and here he shared the thunderous applause with Sherman Walt, bassoonist outside of the series [fantastic], possessor of a most beautiful sound and fabulous technique. I will not easily forget his picados [?], his pianissimos, nor the perfect contrast of sonorous level tones.

The orchestra was presented the past Wednesday, at night, with its 106 professionals, and in order to give them room the stage of the "Palau" was enlarged. The Boston Symphony Orchestra analyzed section by section proves to us the existence of a "living instrument," in full abilities, an instrument of the first class. But, in order to understand us, objectively, in the scale of values of a Philharmonic of Vienna, for example. Score the orchestra with a very certain [sure] and brilliant brass section and a string section compact and uniform. Both qualities worthy of envy. It was presented, as we were saying, under the direction of William Steinberg who directed a program integrated by "Leonora" by Beethoven with authority and experience. Here an insertion to praise the extraordinary dialogue between flute and bassoon realized by the magnificent soloists, D.A. Dwyer and Sherman Walt... [list of works performed].

From my point of view, the best, or at least the work which most impressed me, was that of Hindemith; in it we could appreciate a spontaneous and brilliant interprestation, without diminishing in value, absolutely, the rest of the works interpreted.

In summary, we are satisfied to have become acquainted with, thanks to the Foundation for Music, another of the great orchestras of today, which in its tour of Europe has visited London, Paris, Rome, Vienna, various German cities, and Barcelona. The "Palau" was, therefore, for these few days, authentic capitol in the national panorama of music.

In other matters, but aside from the concert, we lament the fact that all those who couldn't pay 1200 pesetas [$16.00], which is what the orchestra cost, and who probably didn't have the "smoking jacket" which was recommended for these concerts, could not attend. This bit about the "smoking jacket" doesn't bother me especially, but I believe that it might offend all those artists who perform for the Foundation in whose concerts such elegant wear hasn't been recommended, and who possess, at least, as much rank as the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To conclude we must say that the Barcelona presentation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has coincided with the appearance in Spain of its first recording directed by the assistant director of this United States Symphony, the young Michael Tilson Thomas, whom we have said, directed the second concert of this orchestra in the "Palau." The recording, certainly magnificent, is of Symphony No. 1 of P. Tchaikovsky, and has been recorded by DGG.

(translated by George F. Oeste, American School of Madrid)
/dow

¡HOLA!

MADRID - BARCELONA

Fecha _____

45

7 DIAS

LAS ISLAS CANARIAS Y LA PENINSULA ENLAZAN YA DIRECTAMENTE POR TELEVISION

Con motivo de la inauguración del enlace directo entre las islas Canarias y la Península vía satélite, acto que fue presidido por el ministro de Información y Turismo, señor Sánchez Bella, directores generales de Prensa, Promoción del Turismo y Radio y Televisión y diversas personalidades especialmente invitadas, pronunció un importante mensaje S. E. el Jefe del Estado, en el que resultó, después de un emotivo recuerdo a las islas en las que ejerció el mando militar y de donde partió para ponerse al frente del glorioso Movimiento Nacional, que lo que se inauguraba era el fruto de una paz duradera «con una prosperidad que la nación no había logrado durante siglos y que ni siquiera los más optimistas se atrevían a soñar».

Su Excelencia el Jefe del Estado explicó a nuestros compatriotas isleños que una de sus preocupaciones era el poder vencer la distancia geográfica entre los puntos más alejados de nuestra geografía, algo que hoy era ya una realidad «no de una manera esporádica como la televisión mundial nos tiene acostumbrados; lo que hoy ponemos en marcha por primera vez en el mundo a esta distancia es un servicio regular y continuo por toda la gran patria española».

LA PRINCESA DOÑA SOFIA, EN VALENCIA

La princesa de España, doña Sofía, llegó el pasado lunes 26, a Valencia para asistir a diversos actos en su honor y proceder a importantes inauguraciones. Entre otros actos, celebrados en medio del mayor entusiasmo, figuraron la visita de doña Sofía a la Ciudad Sanitaria La Fe, de la Seguridad Social, una recepción en su honor en la Escuela de Ayudantes Técnicos Sanitarios, la inauguración de nuevas instalaciones sanitarias y el homenaje de la Escuela de Técnicos Sanitarios Femeninos, de la que la princesa había aceptado ser madrina de honor.

HOMENAJE FEMENINO AL PRINCIPE DON ALFONSO DE BORBON, EN ESTOCOLMO

El embajador de España en Suecia, príncipe don Alfonso de Borbón, asistió como invitado de honor a un almuerzo en beneficio de la Cruz Roja Española, organizado por el Club Internacional de Mujeres, de Estocolmo. Al final, el embajador español pronunció unas palabras, poniendo de relieve la labor humanitaria de este club femenino.

¿SE OPONE A TENER AMIGOS?

Sabio Wilson y ciudad Sevilla, viajar, idiomas, Oriente, español-Río Infinito, desearía [illegible] pasatiempo en golfo a: Las Arts de Cervantes—José Antonio Gil, 88, 2.º. Madrid-27.

ISABEL DE INGLATERRA CELEBRO SU CUARENTA Y CINCO CUMPLEAÑOS

La Reina Isabel II de Inglaterra celebró el 21 de abril su cuarenta y cinco cumpleaños, en el castillo de Windsor y dedicando toda aquella jornada a su familia. A su lado estuvieron el príncipe Felipe, la princesa Ana y los príncipes Andrés y Eduardo, participando del pastel de cumpleaños. Este y el Happy birthday to you («Feliz cumpleaños»), interpretado por la banda de los Scots Guards al montar la guardia, fueron las únicas notas extraordinarias de aquel día. El cumpleaños de la Reina Isabel no se celebra oficialmente hasta siete semanas después.

LA ORQUESTA SINFONICA DE BOSTON ACTUO EN BARCELONA

La Orquesta Sinfónica de Boston —cuya actuación en la capital de Alemania Federal, Bonn, referimos en nuestro número anterior— se presentó en el Palacio de la Música, de Barcelona..., sin la atractiva esposa del senador Robert Kennedy, como se había esperado al anunciarse, hace unas semanas, la jira artístico-benéfica de dicho conjunto orquestal por varios países europeos (también se había dicho que en Bonn tocaría el piano y, en vez de esto decidió recitar sobre la música de Prokofieff el cuento de Pedro y el lobo). La prestigiosa Sinfónica de Boston obtuvo un merecido éxito con su actuación en el Palau, bajo la dirección de William Steinberg. Tan famosa como la Sinfónica de Boston es la Boston Pops, que es la misma orquesta, pero sin los solistas de la Sinfónica. Director de la Boston Pops es Arthur Fiedler.

FALLECIMIENTO DEL MEDICO QUE PROHIBIO AL DUQUE DE WINDSOR FUMAR PUROS

El duque de Windsor debió de esbozar el otro día un melancólico gesto, en Nueva York al enterarse de que acababa de fallecer el célebre doctor sir John Weir, el que le prohibió fumar cigarros puros hace ya cincuenta años, al ser nombrado médico de la familia real inglesa. Sir John asistió al difunto Rey Jorge VI y fue médico personal de la Reina Isabel desde 1952 hasta su jubilación, en 1968. Era un experto jugador de golf, deporte que, incluso por razones salutíferas, aconsejó practicar con regularidad al padre de la actual soberana. En honor de su memoria y de la eficacia de sus métodos preventivos, que él mismo seguía puntualmente, corresponde decir que ha fallecido sir John a la edad de noventa y un años. El duque de Windsor va para los setenta y cinco.

PETER USTINOV SE PREPARA A DIRIGIR UNA PELICULA CON LOS BURTON

El extraordinario Peter Ustinov acaba de cumplir los cincuenta años en Méjico, donde estos días se hallaba preparándose para dirigir una nueva película, con Liz Taylor y Richard Burton en los principales cometidos (título provisional del film: Hammersmith is out). Dice su madre, Nadia Ustinov: «Peter anda siempre muy atareado. Es muy difícil siempre que pase su cumpleaños en familia». El mes de julio piensa publicar el actor-autor-director otra novela: Krumnagle. Después de la película con Liz y Burton piensa dirigir otra, con Paul Newman como protagonista.

GINA LOLLOBRIGIDA NO SE CASA

Después de haber sido sorprendida por un fotógrafo en afectuosas actitudes con el rico petrolero tejano Harold Joe Stak, de cuarenta y dos años, y de contemplar la gente aquellas fotos publicadas por un semanario milanés, creyóse que Gina Lollobrigida se disponía a contraer nuevas nupcias tan pronto como los jueces hubieran disuelto su matrimonio con Milko Skofic; pero la secretaria de la actriz negó tales rumores, en Roma, con un rotundo «No se casa». Las fotos habían sido tomadas cuando Gina y Joe estaban en el suntuoso Rolls de la primera, aparcado en Villa Borghese, lugar predilecto de parejas de enamorados.

EL DILEMA DE LOUIS ARMSTRONG

Louis Armstrong, el famoso «hombre de la trompeta de oro», se halla, cuando estas líneas escribimos, bastante mejorado de la enfermedad que hace poco le tuvo a punto de morir. Pero mientras convalece se le plantea un serio dilema: o vuelve a tocar el jet para Las Vegas —el famoso oasis del juego (y de la juerga), en Nevada— o se expone a enfrentarse con la reclamación de una cantidad de dólares expresada en seis cifras. Cuando cayó enfermo, Armstrong tenía firmados varios sustanciosos contratos en Las Vegas. Los que habían suscrito con él tales compromisos se manifiestan dispuestos a llevarle ante los Tribunales si no cumple lo acordado. La siempre enamorada de Louis, Lucille, ha declarado: «Lo malo con este chico es que nunca se ha tomado un día de descanso desde que tenía treinta años». Ese «chico» cumplirá setenta y un años el próximo 4 de julio.

LIZ Y MIA DICEN «NO» DEFINITIVAMENTE A LOS ABRIGOS DE PIELES

No volverá a verse más a Elizabeth Taylor con abrigo de pantera ni de cualquier otro animal salvaje, según hizo saber públicamente, por medio del Fondo para la Protección de la Naturaleza, en Morges (Suiza). Otras dos célebres actrices norteamericanas, Mia Farrow y Virginia MacKenna, han expresado igual decisión. El peletero parisiense de Liz ha confirmado la decisión de la «estrella», pero añadiendo que el «compromiso» de ésta con el referido Fondo para la Protección de la Naturaleza sólo se refería a las pieles de animales salvajes, no a las de animales criados en cautividad. En fin, que la célebre actriz no renunciará al visón negro, su piel predilecta desde hace algún tiempo.

COMO A PAT NIXON LE GUSTAN TANTO LOS «SPAGHETTI»...

Al enterarse de que la señora Pat Nixon había dicho que uno de sus platos predilectos eran los «spaghetti», el American's National Macaroni Institute ha encargado al artista Don Wheeler la ejecución de un retrato de la esposa del Presidente de los Estados Unidos... empleando fideos como material para el mismo.

EL DUQUE ALBERTO DE BAVIERA VOLVIO A CASARSE

El duque Alberto de Baviera, de sesenta y cinco años, jefe de la Casa Wittelsbach, contrajo matrimonio con la condesa húngara Marie-Jenke Keglevich von Buzin, de cincuenta. La primera esposa de Alberto de Baviera falleció a principios de junio de 1969, a los sesenta y seis años de edad y después de casi treinta de matrimonio. La nueva boda del duque se celebró en la más estricta intimidad familiar.

Toda mujer cuidada debe tener los PIES sanos y bonitos

He aquí el secreto para el cuidado de sus pies.

¡Es el más sencillo! Para embellecer y rejuvenecer los pies, hágales un buen masaje con Crema Saltratos —antiséptica—. Le aliviará los pies cansados, suprimirá irritaciones y la piel blanquecina de entre los dedos desaparecerá, cicatriza las ampollas. Comunica a la piel suavidad y finura; se le reforzarán los pies. La CREMA SALTRATOS refresca los pies y elimina el olor molesto de la transpiración. ¿Conoce usted los beneficios de un baño de pies, oxigenado y tonificante, con SALES SALTRATOS Rodell? Haga una prueba antes de aplicarse la Crema Saltratos antiséptica. En las farmacias.

PETER USTINOV SE PREPARA A DIRIGIR UNA PELICULA CON LOS BURTON

El extraordinario Peter Ustinov acaba de [illegible] los cincuenta años en [illegible], donde estos días se había preparándose para dirigir una nueva película, con Liz Taylor y Richard Burton en los principales cometidos (título provisional del film: Blanche). Dice su madre, Nadia Ustinov: «Peter está disfrutando muchísimo. Es muy difícil disfrutar que pasa su cumpleaños en familia». A mes de julio piensa publicar el actor-escritor-director otra novela humorística. Después de la película con Liz y Burton piensa dirigir otra, con Paul Newman como protagonista.

GINA LOLLOBRIGIDA NO SE CASA

Después de haber sido sorprendida por un fotógrafo en afectuosas actitudes con el rico petrolero tejano Harold Joe Stak, de cuarenta y dos años, y de contemplar la gente aquellas fotos publicadas por un semanario milanés, creyóse que Gina Lollobrigida se disponía a contraer nuevas nupcias tan pronto como los jueces hubieran disuelto su matrimonio con Milko Skofic; pero la secretaria de la actriz negó tales rumores, en Roma, con un rotundo «No se casa». Las fotos habían sido tomadas cuando Gina y Joe estaban en el suntuoso Rolls de la primera, aparcado en Villa Borghese, lugar predilecto de parejas de enamorados.

EL DILEMA DE LOUIS ARMSTRONG

Louis Armstrong, el famoso «hombre de la trompeta de oro», se halla, cuando estas líneas escribimos, bastante mejorado de la enfermedad que hace poco le tuvo a punto de morir. Pero mientras convalece se le plantea un serio dilema: o vuelve a tomar el jet para Las Vegas —el famoso oasis del juego (y de la juerga), en Nevada— o se expone a enfrentarse con la reclamación de una cantidad de dólares expresada en seis cifras. Cuando cayó enfermo, Armstrong tenía firmados varios sustanciosos contratos en Las Vegas. Los que habían suscrito con él tales compromisos se manifiestan dispuestos a llevarle ante los Tribunales si no cumple lo acordado. La siempre enamorada de Louis, Lucille, ha declarado: «Lo malo con este chico es que nunca se ha tomado un día de descanso desde que tenía treinta años». Ese «chico» cumplirá setenta y un años el próximo 4 de julio.

LIZ Y MIA DICEN «NO» DEFINITIVAMENTE A LOS ABRIGOS DE PIELES

No volverá a verse más a Elizabeth Taylor con abrigo de pantera ni de cualquier otro animal salvaje, según hizo saber públicamente, por medio del Fondo para la Protección de la Naturaleza, en Morges (Suiza). Otras dos célebres actrices norteamericanas, Mia Farrow y Virginia MacKenna, han expresado igual decisión. El peletero parisiense de Liz ha confirmado la decisión de la «estrella», pero añadiendo que el «compromiso» de ésta con el referido Fondo para la Protección de la Naturaleza sólo se refería a las pieles de animales salvajes, no a las de animales criados en cautividad. En fin, que la célebre actriz no renunciará al visón negro, su piel predilecta desde hace algún tiempo.

COMO A PAT NIXON LE GUSTAN TANTO LOS «SPAGHETTI»...

Al enterarse de que la señora Pat Nixon había dicho que uno de sus platos predilectos eran los «spaghetti», el American's National Macaroni Institute ha encargado al artista Don Wheeler la ejecución de un retrato de la esposa del Presidente de los Estados Unidos... empleando fideos como material para el mismo.

EL DUQUE ALBERTO DE BAVIERA VOLVIO A CASARSE

El duque Alberto de Baviera, de sesenta y cinco años, jefe de la Casa Wittelsbach, contrajo matrimonio con la condesa húngara Marie-Jenke Keglevich von Buzin, de cincuenta. La primera esposa de Alberto de Baviera falleció a principios de junio de 1969, a los sesenta y seis años de edad y después de casi treinta de matrimonio. La nueva boda del duque se celebró en la más estricta intimidad familiar.

FALLECIMIENTO DEL MEDICO QUE PROHIBIO AL DUQUE DE WINDSOR FUMAR PUROS

El duque de Windsor debió de esbozar el otro día un melancólico gesto, en Nueva York al enterarse de que acababa de fallecer el célebre doctor sir John Weir, el que le prohibió fumar cigarros puros hace ya cincuenta años, al ser nombrado médico de la familia real inglesa. Sir John asistió al difunto Rey Jorge VI y fue médico personal de la Reina Isabel desde 1952 hasta su jubilación, en 1968. Era un experto jugador de golf, deporte que, incluso por razones salutíferas, aconsejó practicar con regularidad al padre de la actual soberana. En honor de su memoria y de la eficacia de sus métodos preventivos, que él mismo seguía puntualmente, corresponde decir que ha fallecido sir John a la edad de noventa y un años. El duque de Windsor va para los setenta y cinco.

[illegible] DON ALFONSO [illegible] EN ESTOCOLMO

El embajador de España en Suecia, príncipe don Alfonso de Borbón asistió como invitado de honor a un almuerzo en beneficio de la Cruz Roja Española, organizado por el Club Inter-

¿LE GUSTA TENER AMIGOS?

Sabe Vd. [illegible] y [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

From "El Noticiero Universal", April 23, 1971

Fantastic Success of Michael Tilson Thomas with the BSO

Last night the grand success was produced which had been expected from the presentation in Barcelona of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, although evidently very well-received the night before last, did not produce the triumph of last night to which we may attest. The young Michael Tilson Thomas, 26 years old, "emotionalized" the audience which totally filled our number one concert hall, by offering magnificent renditions of Symphony No.3 of Schumann, Symphony No.31 of Mozart, the Concerto for Bassoon and Orchestra of Mozart and La Valse of Ravel.

Also must be pointed out an extraordinary success for the soloist Sherman Walt's exceptional interpretation of the aforementioned Concerto for Bassoon.

Noticiero Universal

Viernes, 23 de abril de 1971

CINE · TEATRO · MUSICA · CINE · TEATRO · MUSIC

EXITO APOTEOSICO DE MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS CON LA SINFONICA DE BOSTON

Anoche se produjo el éxito apoteósico que cabía de esperar de la presentación en Barcelona de la sinfónica de Boston, que si evidentemente fue muy bien acogida anteayer, en su presentación no consiguió el éxito de que anoche fuimos testigos. El joven Michael Tilson Thomas, de veintiséis años, emocionó al auditorio que llenaba totalmente nuestra primera sala de conciertos, tras ofrecer magníficas versiones de la «Sinfonía núm. 3» de Schumann, la «Sinfonía núm. 31» de Mozart, el «Concierto para fagot y orquesta» de Mozart y «La Valse» de Ravel.

Cabe apuntar también un éxito extraordinario para el solista Sherman Walt intérprete excepcional del concierto para fagot mencionado, del que igualmente ampliaremos información en nuestra página de música.—A.V.

(translated by George F. Oeste, American School of Madrid)
/dow

From "El Noticiero Universal", April 23, 1971

Fantastic Success of Michael Tilson Thomas with the BSO

Last night the grand success was produced which had been expected from the presentation in Barcelona of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, although evidently very well-received the night before last, did not produce the triumph of last night to which we may attest. The young Michael Tilson Thomas, 26 years old, "emotionalized" the audience which totally filled our number one concert hall, by offering magnificent renditions of Symphony No.3 of Schumann, Symphony No.31 of Mozart, the Concerto for Bassoon and Orchestra of Mozart and La Valse of Ravel.

Also must be pointed out an extraordinary success for the soloist Sherman Walt's exceptional interpretation of the aforementioned Concerto for Bassoon.

Noticiero Universal

Viernes, 23 de abril de 1971

CINE · TEATRO · MUSICA · CINE · TEATRO · MUSIC

EXITO APOTEOSICO DE MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS CON LA SINFONICA DE BOSTON

Anoche se produjo el éxito apoteósico que cabía de esperar de la presentación en Barcelona de la sinfónica de Boston, que si evidentemente fue muy bien acogida anteayer, en su presentación no consiguió el éxito de que anoche fuimos testigos. El joven Michael Tilson Thomas, de veintiséis años, emocionó al auditorio que llenaba totalmente nuestra primera sala de conciertos, tras ofrecer magníficas versiones de la «Sinfonía núm. 3» de Schumann, la «Sinfonía núm. 31» de Mozart, el «Concierto para fagot y orquesta» de Mozart y «La Valse» de Ravel.

Cabe apuntar también un éxito extraordinario para el solista Sherman Walt intérprete excepcional del concierto para fagot mencionado, del que igualmente ampliaremos información en nuestra página de música.—A.V.

(translated by George F. Oeste, American School of Madrid)
/dow

BLANK PAGE

paris

pre-concert publicity

L'AURORE

50 CENTIMES — VENDREDI 25 DECEMBRE 1970 — N° 8.195 — 29e ANNEE

Deux Boeing pour transporter en Europe l'orchestre de Boston

Il faudra deux Boeing spéciaux pour transporter les 108 musiciens (et leurs instruments) de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston qui effectuera au printemps prochain une grande tournée de trois semaines qui lui permettra de se produire à Paris, Londres, Berlin, Vienne, Hambourg, Francfort, Rome et Madrid.

La célèbre formation que Charles Munch dirigea de nombreuses années (avant de prendre en main, en 1967, notre jeune Orchestre de Paris), n'est pas venue à Paris depuis quatorze ans. A l'époque d'ailleurs c'est Munch qui vint, accompagné de Pierre Monteux, avec l'orchestre.

Dirigé par son chef actuel, William Steinberg, le Boston Symphony Orchestra donnera un unique concert parisien le 27 avril dans la grande salle du palais de Chaillot et dans le cadre de la série « Musique au TNP ». Au programme figureront l'ouverture Leonore III de Beethoven, la suite en si mineur de Bach et la 7e symphonie de Mahler. Les solistes de l'orchestre se produiront une seconde fois, le 2 mai, à l'abbaye de Royaumont, où ils donneront un concert au profit de l'American Library.

On peut se demander pourquoi l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston (aussi bien d'ailleurs que ses homologues américains de Philadelphie, Cleveland, New York et Chicago) vient aussi rarement en France :

« Tout simplement parce que nos musiciens n'ont pas le temps de voyager », nous a répondu son administrateur, Harry Kraut, qui est de passage à Paris pour l'organisation de la tournée. Ils assurent en effet cent vingt concerts au cours de la saison d'hiver, cinquante-quatre au cours de celle de printemps. Cela représente déjà vingt-deux programmes différents. En outre ils donnent vingt-quatre concerts lors du festival d'été de Tanglewood et quatorze concerts gratuits de plein air pour les habitants de Boston. Et naturellement il faut en plus compter les répétitions. »

On comprend après cela que les musiciens de Boston n'aient guère la possibilité de courir le monde. On le regrette car ils sont, avec ceux de l'Orchestre symphonique de Berlin, parmi les meilleurs du monde.

Une anecdote en dit d'ailleurs assez long sur les qualités musicales que l'on réclame à Boston des instrumentistes. C'est Harry Kraut qui nous l'a racontée et ce n'est donc pas une galéjade. Elle concerne le recrutement des musiciens.

« Quand un candidat concourt pour un poste, il vient déchaussé sur le plateau, lequel est séparé par un rideau de la salle où ont pris place le chef, son adjoint et quelques autres responsables de l'état-major de l'orchestre. Ainsi personne ne peut être influencé par son aspect et chacun a sa chance. Sexe, jeunesse, séduction ne pèsent en rien dans la balance. Seul compte le talent, et le meilleur des concurrents gagne. »

P. J.

paris

pre-concert publicity

L'AURORE

50 CENTIMES VENDREDI 25 DECEMBRE 1970 N° 8.186 29e ANNEE

Deux Boeing pour transporter en Europe l'orchestre de Boston

Il faudra deux Boeing spéciaux pour transporter les 108 musiciens (et leurs instruments) de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston qui effectuera au printemps prochain une grande tournée de trois semaines qui ne le permettra de se produire à Paris, Londres, Berlin, Vienne, Hambourg, Francfort, Milan et Madrid.

[illegible] Bizet, par son esprit et [illegible] chance. Se [illegible] jeunesse, [illegible] séduction [illegible] pesait en rien dans la balance. Seul compte le talent, et le meilleur des concurrents gagne.

P. J.

Tout simplement, parce que les musiciens n'ont pas le temps de voyager.

[illegible] Ils assurent en effet cent vingt concerts au cours de la saison [illegible] et cinquante-quatre au cours de celle de [illegible] temps. Cela représente dix-vingt deux programmes différents. En outre, ils donnent vingt-quatre concerts lors du festival d'été de Tanglewood et quatorze concerts gratuits de plein air pour les habitants de Boston. Et naturellement il faut en plus compter les répétitions. »

On comprend après cela que les musiciens de Boston n'aient guère la possibilité de courir le monde. On le regrette car ils sont [illegible]

P.

[illegible] fit de l'American Library.

On peut se demander pourquoi l'Orchestre [illegible]

Quand un candidat concourt pour un poste [illegible] chaussé sur le plateau [illegible] est séparé par un rideau de la salle où ont aussi place le chef [illegible] national et quelques autres responsables de l'état-major de l'orchestre. Ainsi personne ne peut être [illegible]

DIAPASON

N° 156 - Avril 1971 - 3 F - Belgique 35 FB - Suisse 3,50 FS

COMPTE RENDU DU FESTIVAL DU SON

paris

pre-concert publicity

L'AURORE

50 CENTIMES 29e ANNEE

Deux Boeing pour

Avril - Mai : Tournée européenne du
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

DISCOGRAPHIE

MAURICE RAVEL

Daphnis et Chloé (2e suite)
Pavane pour une Infante défunte

CLAUDE DEBUSSY

3 Nocturnes : Nuages - Fêtes - Sirènes
Direction : Claudio Abbado
"Prestige" 2530 028

CLAUDE DEBUSSY

Sonate pour violon et orchestre
Sonate pour violoncelle et piano
Sonate pour flûte, alto et harpe - Syrinx
"Prestige" 2530 049

CHARLES IVES

Three Places in New England

CARL RUGGLES

Sun-Treader
Direction : Michael Tilson Thomas
"Prestige" 2530 048

P. I. TCHAIKOWSKY

Symphonie nº 1 "Rêves d'hiver"
Direction : Michael Tilson Thomas
"Prestige" 2530 078

GUSTAV HOLST

Les Planètes
Direction : William Steinberg
2530 102

WALTER PISTON

Symphonie nº 2

WILLIAM SCHUMANN

Concerto pour violon
Paul Zukofsky, violon
Direction : Michael Tilson Thomas
2530 103

ELLIOT CARTER

Sonate pour flûte

CHARLES IVES

Largo pour violon, clarinette et piano

QUINCY PORTER

Quintette pour hautbois et quatuor à cordes 2530 104

paris

pre-concert publicity

L'AURORE

50 CENTIMES VENDREDI 25 DECEMBRE 1970 N° 8.186 29e ANNEE

Deux Boeing pour

transporter en Europe

IL Y A

2

GRANDES MARQUES CLASSIQUES...

...L'AUTRE C'EST RCA

EN VOICI LA PREUVE

OZAWA

BEETHOVEN : Symphonie 5
SCHUBERT : Symphonie 8
644.553 Ⓐ

RUBINSTEIN

SCHUMANN
Kreisleriana
645.112 Ⓐ

LE TROUVERE

L. PRICE - P. DOMINGO
S. MILNES - Z. MEHTA
645.108/9/10 Ⓐ

Grand Prix
ACADEMIE C. CROS

ALMEIDA

CHAUSSON : Viviane
DUPARC : Léonore
F. SCHMITT
Tragédie de Salomé
644.552 Ⓐ

Grand Prix MONDIAL
du Disque - MONTREUX
1ère Mondiale

ORMANDY

CHOSTAKOVITCH
Symphonie nº 13
644.550 Ⓐ

Avril - Mai : Tournée européenne du
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

DISCOGRAPHIE

MAURICE RAVEL

Daphnis et Chloé (2e suite)
Pavane pour une Infante défunte

CLAUDE DEBUSSY

3 Nocturnes : Nuages - Fêtes - Sirènes
Direction : Claudio Abbado
"Prestige" 2530 028

CLAUDE DEBUSSY

Sonate pour violon et orchestre
Sonate pour violoncelle et piano
Sonate pour flûte, alto et harpe - Syrinx
"Prestige" 2530 049

CHARLES IVES

Three Places in New England

CARL RUGGLES

Sun-Treader
Direction : Michael Tilson Thomas
"Prestige" 2530 048

P. I. TCHAIKOWSKY

Symphonie nº 1 "Rêves d'hiver"
Direction : Michael Tilson Thomas
"Prestige" 2530 078

GUSTAV HOLST

Les Planètes
Direction : William Steinberg
2530 102

WALTER PISTON

Symphonie nº 2

WILLIAM SCHUMANN

Concerto pour violon
Paul Zukofsky, violon
Direction : Michael Tilson Thomas
2530 103

ELLIOT CARTER

Sonate pour flûte

CHARLES IVES

Largo pour violon, clarinette et piano

QUINCY PORTER

Quintette pour hautbois et quatuor à cordes
2530 104

LE FIGARO

Un Boeing de supporters pour l'Orchestre de Boston

A Boston, dans quelques jours, Jean Kennedy, belle-sœur du président disparu, sera la récitante de « Pierre et le loup » de Prokofiev. La jeune femme figure parmi les supporters les plus actifs du célèbre orchestre symphonique de Boston, dont la tournée européenne s'achèvera à Paris, le 24 avril, par un grand concert donné au Palais de Chaillot.

Les musiciens du Massachusetts n'ont apparemment rien à envier aux joueurs de rugby les plus adulés : leurs « fans » ont affrété un Boeing spécial, afin de les suivre durant les trois semaines où ils vont se produire en Grande-Bretagne, en Italie, en Allemagne, en Espagne et en France.

Dans le Boeing de l'orchestre prendront place aux côtés des virtuoses et leur chef, William Steinberg, qui dirige avec la grande formation de Pittsburgh, mais aussi un directeur des relations publiques, un directeur des voyages, l'éditeur du programme et deux surintendants.

Vous vous doutez bien qu'avec un tel « brain trust » aucun détail de l'organisation n'est laissé au hasard. Avant chaque tournée une mission exploratrice prospecte les villes choisies, allant jusqu'à relever la température des salles de concert, afin que les musiciens ne souffrent du froid.

Ainsi le contrat prévoyant la venue du « Boston Symphony Orchestra » en l'église de Saint-Bonaventure de Lyon le 23 avril, n'a-t-il été signé qu'à la condition que la société serait préalablement aménagée en vestiaire, étude que la représentation lyonnaise était annulée pour incompatibilité de goût (les organisateur réclamaient du Bruckner et les musiciens proposaient du Bach).

Les supporters, groupés très légalement en association, ne se bornent pas à voyager à leurs frais.

Ils contribuent aussi au budget de l'orchestre pour quelque trois cent cinquante mille dollars par an. Ce ne sont d'ailleurs pas, comme vous devez vous en douter, des « économiquement faibles ».

A Paris, ils seront logés à l'Hôtel Crillon, et ils ont déjà retenu une table de cinquante couverts chez Maxim's. Successivement, le président de la République ouest-allemande, le speaker de la Chambre des lords et le président du Conseil de Paris leur accorderont audience.

Ajoutons-je que le budget alloué aux cent huit musiciens de l'orchestre a atteint l'an passé le somme coquette de cinq millions de dollars (deux [illegible]

SHOW-BUSINESS

19 Mars 1971

Orchestre De Boston

Sous contrat avec la D.G.G. l'orchestre de Boston va entreprendre au mois d'avril une tournée qui le conduira dans les principaux pays européens. Il ne faudra pas moins de deux Boeings pour amener cette remarquable formation à pied d'œuvre. Rappelons aux mélomanes français, ce qui est une bonne carte de visite, l'enregistrement que cet orchestre avait réalisé avec Claudio Abbado des "Nocturnes" de Debussy couplé avec "Daphnis et Chloé" et la "Pavane" de Ravel.

Le 24 avril le Boston donnera un concert au T.N.P. sous la direction de W. Steinberg ; au programme, la septième symphonie de Mahler, l'ouverture de Léonord 3 et une suite de Bach. Concert de gala le 26 avril au Château de la Muette avec des œuvres de Piston, Mozart et Stravinsky.

L'orchestre se produira également en province à Royaumont et à Bordeaux notamment.

LE FIGARO

L'Orchestre de Boston avec ses 106 instrumentistes retrouve Paris

L'ORCHESTRE symphonique de Boston donnera le 24 avril, sous la direction de William Steinberg, un concert au palais de Chaillot. L'événement est d'importance, car l'illustre formation américaine n'est pas venue à Paris depuis quatorze ans. Or elle est doublement chère au cœur des mélomanes français : d'une part, elle dispose du plus bel ensemble de « cordes » actuellement réuni dans le monde ; d'autre part, son envergure comme sa réputation universelle n'ont pas cessé de croître depuis sa fondation, en 1881, grâce aux talents de Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky et Charles Munch, dont les noms s'identifient au génie musical de notre temps.

L'Orchestre de Boston est un cas. Il représente une organisation dont la puissance repose sur des infrastructures inimaginables en Europe. Il groupe cent six instrumentistes et dispose d'un budget de vingt-cinq millions de francs, c'est-à-dire plus élevé que celui de l'Opéra Royal de Covent Garden.

A Boston, il est propriétaire d'un auditorium de deux mille six cents places spécialement destiné à une origine et [illegible] pour donner aux auditeurs l'impression d'être placés au centre d'un stradivarius. A Tanglewood il a édifié en 1938 un théâtre de plein air où, traditionnellement, en juillet, il va clore sa saison.

Ses instrumentistes recrutés sur concours consacrent à l'orchestre l'exclusivité de leurs activités. Ils habitent selon la mode américaine dans des villas ensoleillées dans la verdure. La journée entière se passe en répétitions et cercles d'étude. Parfois ils se groupent en petites formations de chambre qui se produisent dans des récitals. C'est ainsi qu'un sextuor et un trio, émanations de l'orchestre, participeront en mai aux festivals de Royaumont et de Bordeaux.

Les deux « Boeing » spéciaux qui transportent l'orchestre et son matériel se sont posés dimanche dernier à Londres. Lundi matin, répétition au Festival Hall de la 7e Symphonie de Mahler.

Outre le plaisir musical qu'il suscite, un tel concert a l'avantage de rappeler quels sommets artistiques un orchestre peut atteindre et, en rétablissant une juste échelle des valeurs, de rendre bien des [illegible] [illegible] la [illegible] en la propagande.

HARMONIE :

Avril 1971

L'Orchestre de Boston en Europe

L'Orchestre de Boston fait une grande tournée de concerts en Europe, ce printemps. Musiciens, administrateurs et responsables ont frété deux Boeing spéciaux ; 35 réceptions sont prévues dont une par le président de l'Allemagne fédérale, et sept chez des ambassadeurs... En France, l'ancien orchestre de Charles Münch jouera le 24 avril au T.N.P. sous la direction de W. Steinberg. Au programme, Bach, Beethoven et Mahler. Le 26 avril, l'Orchestre de Boston jouera en gala au château de la Muette, et, le 1er mai, à Royaumont.

En février, la formation américaine enregistrait pour la D.G.G. le Poème de l'Extase, de Scriabine, et Roméo et Juliette, de Tchaïkovsky, sous la direction de C. Abbado, ainsi que le Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune et les Images pour orchestre de Debussy, sous la direction de M.T. Thomas.

FRANCE-SOIR

9 Avril 1971

4.4.71

AFP038

PARIS .- NOUVELLES DE LA MUSIQUE ..... -(DEUX)-

TOURNEE EN EUROPE DE L'ORCHESTRE DE BOSTON

L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON QUI EUT TREIZE ANS A SA TETE CHARLE MUNCH, DONNERA, LE 24 AVRIL AU T.N.P., UN CONCERT DIRIGE PAR SON CHEF ACTUEL WILLIAM STEINBERG. POUR LES 108 MUSICIENS AMERICAINS, LA FRANCE SERA LA DERNIERE ETAPE D'UNE TOURNEE QUI, A PARTIR DU 5 AVRIL, LES MENERA EN GRANDE-BRETAGNE, EN ALLEMAGNE, EN AUTRICHE, EN ITALIE ET EN ESPAGNE. DEUX BOEINGS LES TRANSPORTENT AINSI QUE LEURS ADMIRATEURS. LES SOLISTES REUNIS EN FORMATION DE CHAMBRE, SE PRODUIRONT AUSSI, LE 26 AVRIL AU CHATEAU DE LA MUETTE AU PROFIT DE L'AMERICAN LIBRARY, LE 1ER MAI A L'ABBAYE DE ROYAUMONT, LE 6 MAI A MONTPELLIER ET LE 8 MAI AU FESTIVAL DE BORDEAUX. L'ORCHESTRE DE BOSTON INTERPRETERA A PARIS, L'OUVERTURE DE LEONORE III DE BEETHOVEN, LA SUITE EN SI DE BACH ET LA 7EME SYMPHONIE DE MAHLER.

L'AURORE

7 Avril 1971

● L'ORCHESTRE DE BOSTON EN FRANCE

L'ORCHESTRE symphonique de Boston qui eut treize ans à sa tête Charles Munch donnera, le 24 avril, au TNP, un concert dirigé par son chef actuel, William Steinberg. Pour les cent huit musiciens américains, la France sera la dernière étape d'une tournée qui, à partir du 5 avril, les mènera en Grande-Bretagne, en Allemagne, en Autriche, en Italie et en Espagne. Deux Boeing les transportent, ainsi que leurs admirateurs. Les solistes réunis en formation de chambre se produiront aussi, le 26 avril, au château de la Muette, au profit de l'American Library, le 1er mai à l'abbaye de Royaumont, le 6 mai à Montpellier, et le 8 mai au festival de Bordeaux. L'orchestre de Boston interprétera, à Paris, l'ouverture de Léonore III de Beethoven, la Suite en si de Bach et la 7e Symphonie de Mahler.

L'orchestre de Boston au T.N.P.

L'orchestre de Boston, l'un des plus prestigieux aux Etats-Unis et que Charles Munch dirigea pendant treize ans, est en Europe et la France l'accueillera bientôt : le 24 avril, la grande salle du T.N.P. recevra les 108 musiciens et leur chef, William Steinberg, pour un concert Beethoven (ouverture de « Léonore »), Bach (« Suite en si ») et Mahler (« 7e Symphonie »).

Les solistes réunis en formation d'orchestre de chambre joueront, eux, le 26 avril au château de la Muette, le 1er mai à l'abbaye de Royaumont, le 6 à Montpellier et le 8 au Festival de Bordeaux.

LE FIGARO
MERCREDI 24 FEVRIER 1971

Un Boeing de supporters pour l'Orchestre de Boston

A Boston, dans quelques jours, Joan Kennedy, belle-sœur du président disparu, sera la récitante de « Pierre et le loup » de Prokofiev. La jeune femme figure parmi les supporters les plus actifs du célèbre orchestre symphonique de Boston, dont la tournée européenne s'achèvera à Paris, le 24 avril, par un grand concert donné au Palais de Chaillot.

Les musiciens du Massachusetts n'ont apparemment rien à envier aux joueurs de rugby les plus adulés : leurs « fans » ont affrété un Boeing spécial afin de les suivre durant les trois semaines où ils vont se produire en Grande-Bretagne, en Italie, en Allemagne, en Espagne et en France.

Dans le Boeing de l'orchestre prendront place non seulement les virtuoses et leur chef, William Steinberg, qui dirige aussi la grande formation de Pittsburgh, mais aussi un directeur des relations publiques, un directeur des voyages, l'éditeur du programme et deux surintendants.

Vous vous doutez bien qu'avec un tel « brain trust » aucun détail de l'organisation n'est laissé au hasard. Avant chaque tournée une mission exploratrice prospecte les villes choisies, allant jusqu'à relever la topographie des [illegible] d'hôtels et des restaurants d'hôtel. Cette [illegible] comprend un médecin [illegible] de 35 [illegible] et un [illegible] chargé du confort des musiciens.

Ainsi le contrat prévoyant la venue du « Boston Symphony Orchestra » en l'église de Saint-Bonaventure de Lyon le 23 avril, n'a-t-il été signé qu'à la condition que la sacristie serait provisoirement aménagée en vestiaire, tandis que la représentation lyonnaise était annulée pour incompatibilité de goût (les organisateur réclamaient du Bruchner et les musiciens proposaient du Bach).

Les supporters, groupés très légalement en association, ne se bornent pas à voyager à leurs frais.

Ils contribuent aussi au budget de l'orchestre pour quelque trois cent cinquante mille dollars par an. Ce ne sont d'ailleurs pas, comme vous devez vous en douter, des « économiquement faibles ».

A Paris, ils seront logés à l'hôtel Crillon, et ils ont déjà retenu une table de cinquante couverts chez Maxim's. Successivement, le président de la République ouest-allemande, le speaker de la Chambre des lords et le président du Conseil de Paris leur accorderont audience.

Ajouterai-je que le budget alloué aux cent huit musiciens de l'orchestre a atteint l'an passé la somme coquette de cinq millions de dollars (deux millions et demi [illegible]) ? Une [illegible] pour [illegible] problème...

SHOW-BUSINESS

19 Mars 1971

Orchestre De Boston

Sous contrat avec la D.G.G. l'orchestre de Boston va entreprendre au mois d'avril une tournée qui le conduira dans les principaux pays européens. Il ne faudra pas moins de deux Boeings pour amener cette remarquable formation à pied d'œuvre. Rappelons aux mélomanes français, ce qui est une bonne carte de visite, l'enregistrement que cet orchestre avait réalisé avec Claudio Abbado des "Nocturnes" de Debussy couplé avec "Daphnis et Chloé" et la "Pavane" de Ravel.

Le 24 avril le Boston donnera un concert au T.N.P. sous la direction de W. Steinberg ; au programme, la septième symphonie de Mahler, l'ouverture de Léonord 3 et une suite de Bach. Concert de gala le 26 avril au Château de la Muette avec des œuvres de Piston, Mozart et Stravinsky.

L'orchestre se produira également en province à Royaumont et à Bordeaux notamment.

4.4.71

AFP032

P A R I S .- NOUVELLES DE LA MUSIQUE ..... -(DEUX)-

TOURNEE EN EUROPE DE L'ORCHESTRE DE BOSTON

L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON QUI EUT TREIZE ANS A SA TETE CHARLE MUNCH, DONNERA, LE 24 AVRIL AU T.N.P., UN CONCERT DIRIGE PAR SON CHEF ACTUEL WILLIAM STEINBERG. POUR LES 108 MUSICIENS AMERICAINS, LA FRANCE SERA LA DERNIERE ETAPE D'UNE TOURNEE QUI, A PARTIR DU 5 AVRIL, LES MENERA EN GRANDE-BRETAGNE, EN ALLEMAGNE, EN AUTRICHE, EN ITALIE ET EN ESPAGNE. DEUX BOEINGS LES TRANSPORTENT AINSI QUE LEURS ADMIRATEURS. LES SOLISTES REUNIS EN FORMATION DE CHAMBRE, SE PRODUIRONT AUSSI, LE 26 AVRIL AU CHATEAU DE LA MUETTE AU PROFIT DE L'AMERICAN LIBRARY, LE 1ER MAI A L'ABBAYE DE ROYAUMONT, LE 6 MAI A MONTPELLIER ET LE 8 MAI AU FESTIVAL DE BORDEAUX. L'ORCHESTRE DE BOSTON INTERPRETERA A PARIS, L'OUVERTURE DE LEONORE III DE BEETHOVEN, LA SUITE EN SI DE BACH ET LA 7EME SYMPHONIE DE MAHLER.

LE FIGARO
VENDREDI 9 AVRIL 1971

L'Orchestre de Boston avec ses 106 instrumentistes retrouve Paris

L'ORCHESTRE symphonique de Boston donnera le 24 avril, sous la direction de William Steinberg, un concert au palais de Chaillot. L'événement est d'importance, car l'illustre formation américaine n'est pas venue à Paris depuis quatorze ans. Or elle est doublement chère au cœur des mélomanes français : d'une part, elle dispose du plus bel ensemble de « cordes » actuellement réuni dans le monde ; d'autre part, son envergure comme sa réputation universelle n'ont pas cessé de croître depuis sa fondation, en 1881, grâce aux talents de Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky et Charles Munch, dont les noms s'identifient au génie musical de notre temps.

L'Orchestre de Boston est un cas. Il représente une organisation dont la puissance repose sur des infrastructures inimaginables en Europe. Il groupe cent six instrumentistes et dispose d'un budget de vingt-cinq millions de francs, c'est-à-dire plus élevé que celui de l'Opéra Royal de Covent Garden.

A Boston, il est propriétaire d'un auditorium de deux mille six cents places spécialement étudié à son origine et constamment amélioré pour donner aux auditeurs l'impression d'être placés au centre d'un stradivarius. A Tanglewood il a édifié en 1938 un théâtre de plein air où, traditionnellement, en juillet, il va clore sa saison.

Ses instrumentistes recrutés sur concours consacrent à l'orchestre l'exclusivité de leurs activités. Ils habitent selon la mode américaine dans des villas essaimées dans la verdure. La journée entière se passe en répétitions et cercles d'étude. Parfois ils se groupent en petites formations de chambre qui se produisent dans des récitals. C'est ainsi qu'un sextuor et un trio, émanations de l'orchestre, participeront en mai aux festivals de Royaumont et de Bordeaux.

Les deux « Boeing » spéciaux qui transportent l'orchestre et son matériel se sont posés dimanche dernier à Londres. Lundi matin, répétition au Festival Hall de la 7e Symphony de Mahler.

Outre le plaisir musical qu'il suscite, un tel concert a l'avantage de rappeler quels sommets artistiques un orchestre peut atteindre et, en rétablissant une juste échelle des valeurs, de redresser bien des jugements corrompus par la routine ou la propagande.

HARMONIE :

Avril 1971

L'Orchestre de Boston en Europe

L'Orchestre de Boston fait une grande tournée de concerts en Europe, ce printemps. Musiciens, administrateurs et responsables ont frété deux Boeing spéciaux. 35 réceptions sont prévues dont une par le président de l'Allemagne fédérale, et sept chez des ambassadeurs... En France, l'ancien orchestre de Charles Munch jouera le 24 avril au T.N.P. sous la direction de W. Steinberg. Au programme, Bach, Beethoven et Mahler. Le 26 avril, l'Orchestre de Boston jouera en gala au château de la Muette, et, le 1er mai, à Royaumont.

En février, la formation américaine enregistrait pour la D.G.G. le Poème de l'Extase, de Scriabine, et Roméo et Juliette, de Tchaïkovsky, sous la direction de C. Abbado, ainsi que le Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune et les Images pour orchestre de Debussy, sous la direction de M.T. Thomas.

FRANCE-SOIR
9 Avril 1971

L'AURORE

7 Avril 1971

L'ORCHESTRE DE BOSTON EN FRANCE

L'ORCHESTRE symphonique de Boston qui eut treize ans à sa tête Charles Munch donnera, le 24 avril, au TNP, un concert dirigé par son chef actuel, William Steinberg. Pour les cent huit musiciens américains, la France sera la dernière étape d'une tournée qui, à partir du 5 avril, les mènera en Grande-Bretagne, en Allemagne, en Autriche, en Italie et en Espagne. Deux Boeing les transportent, ainsi que leurs admirateurs. Les solistes réunis en formation de chambre se produiront aussi, le 26 avril, au château de la Muette, au profit de l'American Library, le 1er mai à l'abbaye de Royaumont, le 6 mai à Montpellier, et le 8 mai au festival de Bordeaux. L'orchestre de Boston interprétera, à Paris, l'ouverture de Léonore III de Beethoven, la Suite en si de Bach et la 7e Symphonie de Mahler.

L'orchestre de Boston au T.N.P.

L'orchestre de Boston, l'un des plus prestigieux aux Etats-Unis et que Charles Munch dirigea pendant treize ans, est en Europe et la France l'accueillera bientôt : le 24 avril, la grande salle du T.N.P. recevra les 108 musiciens et leur chef, William Steinberg, pour un concert Beethoven (ouverture de « Leonore »), Bach (« Suite en si ») et Mahler (« 7e Symphonie »).

Les solistes réunis en formation d'orchestre de chambre joueront, eux, le 26 avril au château de la Muette, le 1er mai à l'abbaye de Royaumont, le 6 à Montpellier et le 8 au Festival de Bordeaux.

Le journal du Dimanche
N° 1.273 18 AVRIL 1971 1 F

Boston (orchestre symphonique) à Paris :

un concert à ne pas manquer

Au terme d'une tournée européenne de vingt jours, les « Bostoniens » donneront un concert au Palais de Chaillot samedi prochain 24 avril, et c'est un événement à ne pas manquer (1).

Les « Bostoniens », ce sont les membres de l'Orchestre de Boston (100 musiciens), leurs deux chefs : William Steinberg (chef permanent), Arthur Fiedler (responsable du Boston pops) et Michael Tilson Thomas, 25 ans, chef assistant du Symphonique, quelques directeurs - musiciens, plus un bon groupe d'amis de l'orchestre qui ont tenu à suivre toute la tournée. Soit près de deux cents personnes.

Voilà quinze ans que cette formation, fondée il y a plus d'un siècle et qui est l'une des quatre meilleures du pays, n'est pas venue à Paris qui elle avait donné, en 1956, le « Printemps » dirigé par Monteux. A l'époque, elle avait pour chef Charles Munch et c'est lui qui, pour la première fois, lui fit traverser l'Atlantique.

Trois formations en une

L'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston est à trois facettes avec le « Symphonique », qui groupe tous les instrumentistes, le « Boston pops », qui comprend les musiciens moins les chefs de pupitre, lesquels forment alors un groupe appelé le « Boston Symphony Chamber Players ».

Le succès du « Boston pops » est considérable en Amérique ainsi qu'en témoignent les quarante-sept millions de disques vendus depuis sa fondation ! C'est en été, sur les rives de la Charles River, que le « Boston pops » [illegible] vingt mille personnes.

Quatre Français

[illegible] cours de la tournée européenne qui s'achève (elle a commencé le 4 avril), les Bostoniens ont donné des concerts en Espagne, en Angleterre, en [illegible] en Allemagne. Pour les transporter avec leur matériel et leurs amis, il a fallu fréter un Boeing. Les musiciens, parmi lesquels il y a quatre Français (deux violonistes, un harpiste et un trompettiste), sont toujours partagés entre les deux avions. Raison officielle : si l'un des deux avions a un ennui quelconque, les organisateurs peuvent toujours présenter au public un programme de rechange avec une partie des instrumentistes ; mais on peut également penser que personne ne veut risquer que tout l'orchestre ne disparaisse dans une catastrophe aérienne toujours possible.

[illegible] l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston a un problème que les responsables de l'Orchestre de Paris ont eu eux aussi à résoudre récemment. Le chef permanent, William Steinberg (70 ans) qui dirigera à Paris, va démissionner l'an prochain pour [illegible] à Pittsburgh. A Boston on cherche fébrilement un [illegible] plaçant de prestige, mais le nom n'a encore été rendu public.

Bruno TOTVANIAN.

(1) Au programme du concert du 24 avril au Palais de Chaillot : suite en ré mineur de Bach, [illegible] III de Beethoven, Symphonie n° 7 de Mahler. Le lundi 26 avril, le Chamber Player donnera au Palais de la Muette, un concert [illegible]

VALEURS actuelles

du 19 au 25 avril 1971 — n° 1794 — 2,50 F

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Doyen des orchestres américains, le Boston Symphony n'est pas venu en France depuis quinze ans. Cet orchestre vit du mécénat. C'est à Serge Koussevitzky, directeur musical de 1924 à 1949, que l'on doit à cet orchestre son inclination pour la musique contemporaine : Roussel, Stravinsky, Bartok.

Charles Munch succéda à Koussevitzky et dirigea le Boston pendant douze ans. Donnant plus de deux cents concerts par an, le célèbre orchestre a fait peau neuve depuis 1969. Un contrat d'exclusivité a été conclu avec un éditeur de disques européen, la « Deutsche Grammophon ».

Le Boston Symphony, conduit par William Steinberg, exécutera : la suite en si mineur de Bach, l'ouverture de Léonore - III de Beethoven et la 7e symphonie de Mahler, dite « Chant de la nuit ».

TNP, palais de Chaillot. Le 24 avril à 20 h 30.

Discographie (chez DG). Debussy : « Nocturnes ». Ravel : « Daphnis et Chloé » ; 2e suite ; Pavane. Tchaïkovski : 1re symphonie ; « Don ». Gustav Holst : « Les planètes ».

Nouvel Observateur
19 Avril 1971

BOSTON SYMPHONY
Beethoven : Ouverture « Léonore III ». Bach : Suite en si mineur. Mahler : Septième Symphonie. Boston Symphony Orchestra, dir. William Streinberg.
L'un des tout premiers orchestres des Etats-Unis que Münch dirigea pendant treize ans.
Palais de Chaillot. T.N.P., le 24, à 20 h 30.

COMBAT

15 Avril 1971

LE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA : UN CONCERT AU T.N.P.

L'orchestre symphonique de Boston qui eut treize ans à sa tête Charles Munch, donnera, le 24 avril au TNP, un concert dirigé par son chef actuel William Steinberg. Pour les 108 musiciens américains, la France sera la dernière étape d'une tournée qui à partir du 5 avril les mène en Grande-Bretagne en Allemagne, en Autriche, en Italie et en Espagne. Deux Boeing les transportent ainsi que leurs admirateurs.

Les solistes réunis en formation de chambre, se produiront aussi le 26 avril au château de la Muette au profit de l'American Library, le 1er mai à l'Abbaye de Royaumont, le 6 mai à Montpellier et le 8 mai au festival de Bordeaux. L'orchestre de Boston interprètera à Paris, l'ouverture de Léonore III de Beethoven, la Suite en si de Bach et la 7e symphonie de Mahler.

Le Journal du Dimanche
N° 1.273 — 18 AVRIL 1971 — 1 F

Boston (orchestre symphonique) à Paris : un concert à ne pas manquer

AU terme d'une tournée européenne de vingt jours, les « Bostoniens » donneront un concert au Palais de Chaillot samedi prochain 24 avril, et c'est un événement à ne pas manquer (1).

Les « Bostoniens », ce sont les membres de l'Orchestre de Boston (100 musiciens), leurs trois chefs : William Steinberg (chef permanent), Arthur Fiedler (responsable du Boston pops) et Michael Tilson Thomas, 26 ans (chef assistant du Symphonique), quelques directeurs - managers plus un bon groupe d'amis de l'orchestre qui ont tenu à suivre toute la tournée. Soit près de deux cents personnes.

Voilà quinze ans que cette formation, fondée il y a plus d'un siècle et qui est l'une des quatre meilleures du monde, n'est pas venue à Paris où elle avait donné, en 1956, le « Sacre du Printemps » dirigé par Pierre Monteux. A l'époque, elle avait pour chef Charles Munch, et c'est lui qui, pour la première fois, lui fit traverser l'Atlantique.

Trois formations en une

L'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston est à trois facettes avec le « Symphonique », qui groupe tous les instrumentistes, le « Boston pops », qui comprend les musiciens moins les chefs de pupitre, lesquels forment alors un groupe appelé le « Boston Symphony Chamber Players ».

Le succès du « Boston pops » est considérable en Amérique ainsi qu'en témoignent les quarante-sept millions de disques vendus depuis sa fondation ! C'est en été, sur les rives de la Charles River, que le « Boston pops » obtient son plus grand succès : quatre-vingt-dix musiciens dirigés par Arthur Fiedler offrent depuis quarante et un ans des concerts gratuits de musique légère auxquels assistent vingt mille personnes.

Quatre Français

Au cours de la tournée européenne qui s'achève (elle a commencé le 4 avril), les Bostoniens ont donné des concerts en Espagne, en Angleterre, en Italie, en Allemagne. Pour les transporter avec leur matériel et leurs amis, il a fallu fréter un Boeing. Les musiciens, parmi lesquels il y a quatre Français (deux violonistes, un harpiste et un trompettiste), sont toujours partagés entre les deux avions. Raison officielle : si l'un des deux avions a un ré[illegible] quelconque, les organisateurs peuvent toujours présenter au public un programme de rechange avec une partie des instrumentistes ; mais on peut également penser que personne ne veut risquer que tout l'orchestre ne disparaisse dans une catastrophe aérienne toujours possible.

Mais l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston a un problème que les responsables de l'Orchestre de Paris ont eu eux aussi à résoudre récemment. Le chef permanent, William Steinberg (70 ans), qui dirigera à Paris, va quitter l'an prochain pour [illegible] à Pittsburgh. A Boston on cherche fébrilement un remplaçant de prestige, mais son nom n'a encore été re[illegible].

Bruno TOTVANIAN.

(1) Au programme du concert du 24 avril au Palais de Chaillot : suite en ré mineur de Bach, Ouverture III de Beethoven, Symphonie n° 7 de Mahler. Le lundi 26 avril, le Chamber Player donnera, au Palais de la Muette, un concert au bénéfice de la Bibliothèque américaine à Paris.

VALEURS actuelles

du 19 au 25 avril 1971 — n° 1794 — 2,50 F

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Doyen des orchestres américains, le Boston Symphony n'est pas venu en France depuis quinze ans. Cet orchestre vit du mécénat. C'est à Serge Koussevitzky, directeur musical de 1924 à 1949, que l'on doit à cet orchestre son inclination pour la musique contemporaine : Roussel, Stravinsky, Bartok.

Charles Munch succéda à Koussevitzky et dirigea le Boston pendant douze ans. Donnant plus de deux cents concerts par an, le célèbre orchestre a fait peau neuve depuis 1969. Un contrat d'exclusivité a été conclu avec un éditeur de disques européen, la « Deutsche Grammophon ».

Le Boston Symphony, conduit par William Steinberg, exécutera : la suite en si mineur de Bach, l'ouverture de Léonore - III de Beethoven et la 7e symphonie de Mahler, dite « Chant de la nuit ».

TNP, palais de Chaillot. Le 24 avril à 20 h 30.

Discographie (chez DG). Debussy : « Nocturnes ». Ravel : « Daphnis et Chloé » ; 2e suite ; Pavane. Tchaïkovski : 1re symphonie ; « Don ». Gustav Holst : « Les planètes ».

Nouvel Observateur
19 Avril 1971

BOSTON SYMPHONY
Beethoven : Ouverture « Léonore III ». Bach : Suite en si mineur. Mahler : Septième Symphonie. Boston Symphony Orchestra, dir. William Streinberg.
L'un des tout premiers orchestres des Etats-Unis que Munch dirigea pendant treize ans.
Palais de Chaillot, T.N.P., le 24, à 20 h 30.

COMBAT

15 Avril 1971

LE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA : UN CONCERT AU T.N.P.

L'orchestre symphonique de Boston qui eut treize ans à sa tête Charles Munch, donnera, le 24 avril au TNP, un concert dirigé par son chef actuel William Steinberg. Pour les 108 musiciens américains, la France sera la dernière étape d'une tournée qui à partir du 5 avril les mène en Grande-Bretagne en Allemagne, en Autriche, en Italie et en Espagne. Deux Boeing les transportent ainsi que leurs admirateurs.

Les solistes réunis en formation de chambre, se produiront aussi le 26 avril au château de la Muette au profit de l'American Library, le 1er mai à l'Abbaye de Royaumont, le 6 mai à Montpellier et le 8 mai au festival de Bordeaux. L'orchestre de Boston interprètera à Paris, l'ouverture de Léonore III de Beethoven, la Suite en si de Bach et la 7e symphonie de Mahler.

214

Le Monde

Fondateur : Hubert Beuve-Méry — JEUDI 22 AVRIL 1971 — Directeur : Jacques Fauvet

A PARIS

L'orchestre symphonique de Boston

L'ORCHESTRE symphonique de Boston, en tournée en Europe depuis le 5 avril, donnera un concert à Paris au Palais de Chaillot le 24 avril. Au programme : Léonore III, de Beethoven, la Suite en si mineur, de Bach, et la Septième Symphonie, de Mahler, dirigés par William Steinberg. Depuis quinze ans, le public français n'avait pas eu l'occasion d'entendre cet ensemble, qui compte parmi les meilleurs du monde. Mais du moins avait-il pu s'en persuader par ses nombreux enregistrements, et notamment les plus récents édités par la Deutsche Grammophon, à laquelle, depuis l'automne dernier, l'orchestre est lié par un contrat d'exclusivité.

Une entreprise prospère

Les Boston Symphony Chamber Players, ensemble de musique de chambre émanant du grand orchestre, donneront également plusieurs concerts à Paris et en province : le 26 avril, au château de la Muette, à l'occasion d'un gala organisé au profit de l'American Library, l'une des plus anciennes et des plus importantes bibliothèques de langue anglaise en Europe ; le 6 mai à Montpellier et le 8 mai à Bordeaux.

Berlin. — A 10 heures du matin, dans la salle de la philharmonie, [illegible] Conduit par un chef chaste, le Boston Symphony Orchestra va [illegible] Berlin, les capitales d'Europe. La première fois qu'il Steinberg, en bras de chemise, dirige avec une sévérité impressionnante l'ouverture des Maîtres chanteurs. Dans les gradins déserts, les sons restent suspendus un court instant avant de s'éteindre, et la musique prend un ton prophétique.

W. Steinberg, qui, depuis 1968, est à la tête du Boston Symphony Orchestra, a une technique de direction qui exclut toute éloquence. A soixante-douze ans, il a appris à ne retenir que les gestes indispensables : sa seule fantaisie consiste à frapper l'estrade du pied, de temps à autre. Les réponses sont exactes, la sonorité toujours équilibrée, au gré des jeux d'intensité.

L'assistant de Steinberg est un jeune chef de vingt-sept ans, Michael Tilson Thomas, également pianiste dans l'Orchestre de chambre de Boston. Il doit donner plusieurs concerts au cours de cette tournée, mais malheureusement aucun à Paris. Avec Thomas, qui dirige un peu à la façon de Bernstein en jouant de tout son corps, l'orchestre sonne avec une grande clarté, avec plus de franchise que de raffinement, comme en témoigne son admirable enregistrement de la Première Symphonie de Tchaïkovski (D.G.G. 2 530 078).

passa l'Atlantique, il avait à sa tête Charles Munch, qui, pendant douze ans, de 1950 à 1962, présida à ses destinées. Avant lui, deux autres Français avaient occupé ce poste, Henri Rabaud et Pierre Monteux. En un siècle ou presque d'existence, se sont succédé au pupitre des chefs aussi fameux qu'Arthur Nikisch ou Serge Koussevitsky.

Une « importante affaire »

Né de la passion musicale d'un financier américain qui l'entretenait de ses deniers, l'orchestre est devenu une « importante affaire », au budget annuel de quelque 5 millions de dollars (plus de 27 millions de francs). Une association des amis de l'Orchestre de Boston fournit la part la plus importante des crédits, auxquels s'ajoutent les recettes et les revenus de diverses donations. Outre ses deux orchestres et le célèbre ensemble des Boston Pops, qui se consacre à la musique légère, l'entreprise possède une salle de concert, le Symphony Hall, et gère une académie musicale à Tanglewood, où se déroule chaque année un festival. Preuve qu'un organisme musical privé peut non seulement vivre mais [illegible] prospérer, du moins aux [illegible]-Unis.

L. B.

No 8325 Jeudi 22 Avril 1971

COMBAT

de la Résistance à la République

SAMEDI AU T.N.P.

LE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

De retour en France après quatorze années d'absence, le Boston Symphony Orchestra donnera samedi, sous la direction de William Steinberg, un concert exceptionnel au T N P. Trois œuvres sont inscrites au programme, trois grandes œuvres du répertoire classique : « Ouverture de Léonore III », de Beethoven, « Suite N 2 en si mineur » de J. S. Bach, enfin, heureuse concession à la mode, la « Septième Symphonie » de Gustav Mahler.

Après 90 années d'existence — son premier concert eut lieu en 1881 — le Boston Symphony Orchestra s'impose encore aujourd'hui comme l'un des plus remarquables orchestres des Etats-Unis. Curieusement, c'est à une blessure qu'il doit sa naissance ; celle reçue — à la main — par l'étudiant H. L. Higginson qui voulait devenir pianiste. Il devint donc hommes d'affaires, amassa des fortunes que l'infortune défit. Un jour, enfin, le Major Henry Lee Higginson put « réaliser son rêve » doter Boston d'un grand orchestre symphonique semblable à ceux qu'il avait connus dans les capitales européennes. Pendant 40 ans il l'entretint et l'administra personnellement, avant de le confier à un groupe de mécènes.

Mais cet orchestre, s'il doit sa création à la réussite d'un homme — homme seul réalisant ses espoirs personnels par des moyens individuels, conformément au modèle porté par l'idéologie américaine — c'est aux grands chefs qui se sont succédé [illegible] depuis 1918, qu'il doit [illegible] et son prestige : Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitsky — qui le dirigea pendant 25 ans au moment où la musique passait à un nouveau stade économique, menant l'orchestre à l'enregistrement phonographique et aux concerts radiodiffusés, fondant aussi les premiers concerts de musique populaire, les « Boston pops » Pendant 13 ans Charles Munch, qui lui succéda, continua à promouvoir des compositeurs contemporains. Enfin vinrent Erich Leinsdorf et, en 1969, William Steinberg.

Infiniment mieux connu aux Etats-Unis qu'en France, Steinberg, né à Cologne, fut nommé en 1929, à 30 ans, directeur de l'Opéra de Francfort. Il y dirigea pour la première fois des opéras contemporains dont « Wozzeck » de Berg, la première mondiale de « Mahagonny » de Brecht et Kurt Weill et « Von Heute auf Morgen » de Schoenberg. Avec la montée du nazisme, il doit abandonner son poste en 1933 et le pays en 1939. Il déploie alors une grande activité en faveur des communautés juives. Assistant de Toscanini, il dirige les plus grands orchestres américains. En 1945 il est nommé directeur de l'Orchestre symphonique de Pittsburg, poste qu'il a conservé et cumule aujourd'hui avec celui de directeur du B.S.O.

Un des cinq grands orchestres d'Amérique du Nord dirigé par un chef de très grande réputation : découverte, révélation ?

J. G.

MATCH

UN AMBASSADEUR NONAGÉNAIRE : L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON

On l'attendait depuis quinze ans. Il revient en force. Il sera reçu par sept ambassadeurs, deux maires, le président de la République fédérale allemande, la Chambre des lords et le Sénat de Berlin. Paris lui remettra les clefs de la ville... Bienvenue à « Son Excellence » l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston !

Le plus célèbre des Etats-Unis. Une belle histoire. Frustré dans ses ambitions de pianiste, le Bostonien Henry Lee Higginson n'a plus qu'une idée : faire fortune et l'employer à doter sa ville natale d'un grand orchestre symphonique. Fruit de sa détresse le « Boston Symphony Orchestra » [illegible] 22 octobre 1881. Higginson l'administrera et le financera pendant quarante ans. Tout seul ! Les chefs qu'il engage s'appellent George Henschel, Artur Nikisch, Max Fielder. En 1918 l'octogénaire Higginson confie son « enfant chéri » à un conseil d'administration. Henri Rabaud, un Français, prend la direction de l'orchestre en 1919. L'année suivante et en quatre ans, Pierre Monteux, un autre Français, le réorganise entièrement. Serge Koussevitzky prend le relais en 1924. Pour un quart de siècle. Assisté d'Arthur Fielder, il inaugurera les célèbres « Esplanade concerts » gratuits, le « Boston Pops », l'académie estivale de Tanglewood. Un Français, encore un, aura le redoutable honneur de lui succéder et de s'asseoir sur « le trône ». C'est le nom que donnent les Américains au fauteuil directorial de l'Orchestre de Boston. Charles Munch l'occupera royalement pendant treize ans et ne partira qu'atteint par la limite d'âge. Chevalier servant de la musique française, il inaugurera les répétitions générales publiques et organisera la première tournée européenne de l'orchestre en 1952. Une deuxième tournée en 1956 lui fera franchir le rideau de fer.

L'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston n'a pas de secret. Il dispose simplement de grands moyens financiers (5 millions de dollars en 1971 !), il est porté à bout de bras par la fierté des Bostoniens (ses musiciens ont un statut de citoyens privilégiés), il sélectionne ses membres rigoureusement. Sans passe-droit. Les can[illegible] Steinberg (photo) depuis 1969. Un Allemand septuagénaire, formé par Klemperer et Toscanini. C'est lui, assisté du jeune espoir Michaël Tilson Thomas, qui conduira la nouvelle tournée européenne de l'Orchestre de Boston : Angleterre, Allemagne, Autriche, Italie, Espagne, Paris enfin, pour le concert d'adieu (1). Mais à Paris les adieux ont toujours un goût d'au revoir. LOUIS SERANNE

(1) Palais de Chaillot - 24 avril (Bach-Beethoven-Mahler). L'Orchestre de chambre du B.S.O. sera lui à Royaumont le 1er mai, à Montpellier le 6, à Bordeaux le 8.

L'AURORE

50 CENTIMES — VENDREDI 23 AVRIL 1971 — N° 8.288 — 30e ANNEE

L'Orchestre symphonique de BOSTON au rendez-vous de Paris

C'EST le grand événement de la saison musicale de printemps : au terme d'une tournée européenne de trois semaines commencée à Londres, l'orchestre symphonique de Boston donnera un unique concert parisien, demain, à 20 h 30, au palais de Chaillot, dans la grande salle du T.N.P.

Sous la direction de leur directeur actuel (depuis 1969 et jusqu'à l'an prochain, après quoi la place sera vacante), l'Allemand William Steinberg, qui est par ailleurs le chef à vie de l'orchestre de Pittsburg depuis 1952, les 108 musiciens américains joueront la 7e Symphonie de Mahler, puis la Suite n° 2 en si mineur de Bach et l'Ouverture de Léonore III, de Beethoven.

Le surlendemain, lundi 26 avril, à 21 heures, les douze chefs de pupitre constituant le Boston Symphony Chamber Players exé[illegible] Pierre, [illegible] vert), au [illegible] du château de la Muette.

Cette soirée, réservée à quelque trois cents « happy few », sera donnée au profit de l'American Library, la plus grande bibliothèque de langue anglaise d'Europe, qui fête cette année son cinquantenaire. Les « Chamber Players » répéteront d'ailleurs ce concert (à quelques nuances près) samedi 1er mai à Royaumont, jeudi 6 à Montpellier et samedi 8 à Bordeaux.

A peine arrivés à Paris, et avant même d'aller « tester » l'acoustique du T.N.P. (!), les instrumentistes de l'orchestre de Boston et leurs chefs (Steinberg et son « associé », le jeune et brillant Michael Tilson Thomas, 26 ans, qui est considéré outre-Atlantique comme le nouveau Bernstein), ainsi d'ailleurs qu'une quarantaine d' « amis » de l'orchestre (comprenez des mécènes, car la prestigieuse formation américaine ne reçoit aucune subvention officielle), iront samedi matin à Louveciennes [illegible]

1949 à 1962, porta aux nues la renommée mondiale de cet orchestre symphonique de Boston, grâce à la magie d'une baguette qui présida magistralement, fin 1967, à la naissance de notre Orchestre de Paris.

Fondé en 1881 par un financier bostonien mélomane qu'un accident empêcha de devenir pianiste, Henry Lee Higginson, porté à bout de bras par celui-ci au cours des trente-cinq années suivantes le relais fut alors pris par l'association des « Amis-Mécènes ») L'orchestre symphonique de Boston n'était pas venu en France depuis quinze ans (ses deux précédentes tournées il les avait faites avec Charles Munch). En 90 ans d'existence, la grande formation a compté quatorze chefs à sa tête et notamment parmi les plus prestigieux : Arthur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky et Charles Munch. Son budget annuel a de quoi faire rêver : six milliards d'anciens francs. Plus que l'Opéra de Paris. On croit rêver. Il est vrai que le bilan annuel de l'orchestre laisse rêveur lui aussi : près de 80 concerts pendant la saison d'hiver à Boston, 40 concerts en une saison de tournées, 54 concerts de musique classique légère donnés par les Boston Pops (l'orchestre symphonique moins les chefs de pupitre qui, sous la direction de son chef depuis quarante [illegible] pendant le Festival de Berkshire, etc. à quoi il faut ajouter nombre d'enregistrements de disques (depuis cette année l'orchestre a passé un contrat d'exclusivité avec la D.G.G.) d'émission à la radio et à la télévision. On ne chôme pas à l'orchestre de Boston. Mais quel orchestre aussi ! Les cordes les plus soyeuses du monde ; mais quels cuivres aussi et quels bois !

« C'est bien naturel pour le premier orchestre d'Amérique, m'a dit William Steinberg le soir du premier concert au Festival Hall de Londres (quelle splendide salle à côté de notre TNP !).

L'ex-assistant de Toscanini et Otto Klemperer, l'homme qui créa, en 1936, l'orchestre de Palestine devenu depuis l'orchestre philharmonique d'Israël, s'empressa d'ajouter, en souriant : le premier dans l'ordre alphabétique... car il y a aussi ceux de Chicago, New York, Cleveland et Philadelphie. »

Pierre JULIEN.

MATCH

UN AMBASSADEUR NONAGÉNAIRE : L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON

On l'attendait depuis quinze ans. Il revient en force. Il sera reçu par sept ambassadeurs, deux maires, le président de la République fédérale allemande, la Chambre des lords et le Sénat de Berlin. Paris lui remettra les clefs de la ville... Bienvenue à « Son Excellence » l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston !

Le plus célèbre des Etats-Unis. Une belle histoire. Frustré dans ses ambitions de pianiste, le Bostonien Henry Lee Higginson n'a plus qu'une idée : faire fortune et l'employer à doter sa ville natale d'un grand orchestre symphonique. Fruit de sa ténacité le « Boston Symphony Orchestra » [illegible] 22 octobre 1881. Higginson l'administrera et le financera pendant quarante ans. Tout seul ! Les chefs qu'il engage s'appellent George Henschel, Artur Nikisch, Max Fielder. En 1918 l'octogénaire Higginson confie son « enfant chéri » à un conseil d'administration. Henri Rabaud, un Français, prend la direction de l'orchestre en 1919. L'année suivante et en quatre ans, Pierre Monteux, un autre Français, le réorganise entièrement. Serge Koussevitzky prend le relais en 1924. Pour un quart de siècle. Assisté d'Arthur Fielder, il inaugurera les célèbres « Esplanade concerts » gratuits, le « Boston Pops », l'académie estivale de Tanglewood. Un Français, encore un, aura le redoutable honneur de lui succéder et de s'asseoir sur « le trône ». C'est le nom que donnent les Américains au fauteuil directorial de l'Orchestre de Boston. Charles Munch l'occupera royalement pendant treize ans et ne partira qu'atteint par la limite d'âge. Chevalier servant de la musique française, il inaugurera les répétitions générales publiques et organisera la première tournée européenne de l'orchestre en 1952. Une deuxième tournée en 1956 lui fera franchir le rideau de fer.

L'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston n'a pas de secret. Il dispose simplement de grands moyens financiers (5 millions de dollars en 1971 !), il est porté à bout de bras par la fierté des Bostoniens (ses musiciens ont un statut de citoyens privilégiés), il sélectionne ses membres rigoureusement. Sans passe-droit. Les candidats se [illegible] jury derrière un [illegible] dépouillé [illegible] Steinberg (photo) depuis 1969. Un Allemand sexagénaire, formé par Klemperer et Toscanini. C'est lui, assisté du jeune espoir Michaël Tilson Thomas, qui conduira la nouvelle tournée européenne de l'Orchestre de Boston : Angleterre, Allemagne, Autriche, Italie, Espagne, Paris enfin, pour le concert d'adieu (1). Mais à Paris les adieux ont toujours un goût d'au revoir. LOUIS SERANNE

(1) Palais de Chaillot - 24 avril (Bach-Beethoven-Mahler). L'Orchestre de chambre du B.S.O. sera lui à Royaumont le 1er mai, à Montpellier le 6, à Bordeaux le 8.

L'AURORE

50 CENTIMES — VENDREDI 23 AVRIL 1971 — N° 8.288 — 30e ANNEE

L'Orchestre symphonique de BOSTON au rendez-vous de Paris

C'EST le grand événement de la saison musicale de printemps : au terme d'une tournée européenne de trois semaines commencée à Londres, l'orchestre symphonique de Boston donnera un unique concert parisien, demain, à 20 h 30, au palais de Chaillot, dans la grande salle du T.N.P.

Sous la direction de leur directeur actuel (depuis 1969 et jusqu'à l'an prochain, après quoi la place sera vacante), l'Allemand William Steinberg, qui est par ailleurs le chef à vie de l'orchestre de Pittsburg depuis 1952, les 108 musiciens américains joueront la 7e Symphonie de Mahler, puis la Suite n° 2 en si mineur de Bach et l'Ouverture de Léonore III de Beethoven.

Le surlendemain, lundi 26 avril, à 21 heures, les douze chefs de pupitre constituant le Boston Symphony Chamber Players exécuteront un concert de musique de chambre (Mozart, Piston, Stravinski, Beethoven), au cours d'un gala au château de la Muette.

Cette soirée, réservée à quelque trois cents « happy few », sera donnée au profit de l'American Library, la plus grande bibliothèque de langue anglaise d'Europe, qui fête cette année son cinquantenaire. Les « Chamber Players » répéteront d'ailleurs ce concert (à quelques nuances près) samedi 1er mai à Royaumont, jeudi 6 à Montpellier et samedi 8 à Bordeaux.

A peine arrivés à Paris, et avant même d'aller « tester » l'acoustique du T.N.P. (!), les instrumentistes de l'orchestre de Boston et leurs chefs (Steinberg et son « associé », le jeune et brillant Michael Tilson Thomas, 26 ans, qui est considéré outre-Atlantique comme le nouveau Bernstein), ainsi d'ailleurs qu'une quarantaine d' « amis » de l'orchestre (comprenez des mécènes, car la prestigieuse formation américaine ne reçoit aucune subvention officielle), iront samedi matin à Louveciennes pour visiter la maison de Charles Munch, le grand chef français aujourd'hui disparu, qui pendant treize ans, de 1949 à 1962, porta aux nues la renommée mondiale de cet orchestre symphonique de Boston, grâce à la magie d'une baguette qui présida magistralement, fin 1967, à la naissance de notre Orchestre de Paris.

Fondé en 1881 par un financier bostonien mélomane qu'un accident empêcha de devenir pianiste, Henry Lee Higginson, porté à bout de bras par celui-ci au cours des trente-cinq années suivantes le relais fut alors pris par l'association des « Amis-Mécènes » L'orchestre symphonique de Boston n'était pas venu en France depuis quinze ans (ses deux précédentes tournées il les avait faites avec Charles Munch). En 90 ans d'existence, la grande formation a compté quatorze chefs à sa tête et notamment parmi les plus prestigieux : Arthur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky et Charles Munch. Son budget annuel a de quoi faire rêver : six milliards d'anciens francs. Plus que l'Opéra de Paris. On croit rêver. Il est vrai que le bilan annuel de l'orchestre laisse rêveur lui aussi : près de 80 concerts pendant la saison d'hiver à Boston. 40 concerts en une saison de tournées, 54 concerts de musique classique légère donnés par les Boston Pops (l'orchestre symphonique moins les chefs de pupitre qui, sous la direction de son chef depuis quarante ans, le célébrissime Arthur Fiedler, le seul chef au monde qui ait donné son nom à un pont de Boston) en mai et juin sur l'esplanade de Boston, 14 concerts de plein air sur les bords du Charles-River, 24 concerts pendant le Festival de Berkshire, etc. à quoi il faut ajouter nombre d'enregistrements de disques (depuis cette année l'orchestre a passé un contrat d'exclusivité avec la D.G.G.) émission à la radio et à la télévision. On ne chôme pas à l'orchestre de Boston. Mais quel orchestre aussi ! Les cordes les plus soyeuses du monde ; mais quels cuivres aussi et quels bois !

« C'est bien naturel pour le premier orchestre d'Amérique, m'a dit William Steinberg le soir du premier concert au Festival Hall de Londres (quelle splendide salle à côté de notre TNP !).

L'ex-assistant de Toscanini et Otto Klemperer, l'homme qui créa, en 1936, l'orchestre de Palestine devenu depuis l'orchestre philharmonique d'Israël, s'empressa d'ajouter, en souriant : le premier dans l'ordre alphabétique... car il y a aussi ceux de Chicago, New York, Cleveland et Philadelphie. »

Pierre JULIEN.

216

2,50 France

N° 1033 - 26 avril - 2 mai 1971

L'EXPRESS

risons: V REPOND

CONCERTS

L'orchestre violoncelle

Quinze ans après les mémorables concerts dirigés par Charles Munch et Pierre Monteux, l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston revient en France. C'est sa troisième tournée européenne depuis sa fondation, il y a quatre-vingt-dix ans, par un financier mélomane, Henry Lee Higginson, qu'une blessure à la main détourna d'une carrière de pianiste vers le mécénat. Commencée à Londres le 4 avril, poursuivie à Stuttgart, puis au Palais de Chaillot samedi, cette tournée se terminera par une série de concerts de musique de chambre. Réunis sous le nom de Boston Symphony Chamber Players, les douze chefs de pupitre de l'orchestre joueront ce soir 26 au château de la Muette, le 1er mai à Royaumont, le 6 à Montpellier, le 8 à Bordeaux.

William Steinberg. Derrière un rideau...

Cordes. Les échos des premiers concerts confirment les légendaires qualités musicales de la grande formation américaine à laquelle Arthur von Nikisch, Carl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitski et Charles Munch ont donné ses lettres de noblesse.

Le chef actuel, William Steinberg, 71 ans (également directeur « à vie » de l'Orchestre de Pittsburgh), ne laissera peut-être pas un souvenir aussi impérissable que ses illustres prédécesseurs. Le profond lyrisme de la « 7e Symphonie » de Mahler, programmée à Londres, à Stuttgart et à Paris, s'accommode assez mal de la baguette étriquée et un peu trop mécanique de cet Allemand de petite taille, dont le visage de bois évoque irrésistiblement le Mr. Magoo des dessins animés.

Dirigé de la sorte, tout autre orchestre eût sonné plat et terne. Mais « Boston » sonne comme un violoncelle. Dire qu'il possède les plus belles cordes du monde, ou les plus beaux cuivres, ou les plus beaux bois, est peut-être excessif ; il en possède d'admirables, à l'égal d'autres très grands orchestres. Mais ce qui est sans doute unique au monde, c'est l'unité de l'ensemble des instruments. Seuls le travail soutenu des cent huit musiciens, un esprit d'équipe à toute épreuve et une tradition de quatre-vingt-dix ans ont permis un tel résultat.

Lauriers. La sélection des musiciens est d'ailleurs impitoyable. Elle en dit long sur les qualités que l'on requiert. L'administrateur Harry Kraut raconte que les candidats concourent cachés derrière un rideau afin de n'influencer en rien le brain-trust de l'orchestre qui décide, le cas échéant, des engagements. « En outre, ajoute-t-il, les musiciens sont tenus à une discipline instrumentale inflexible tout au long de leur carrière. Ils ne se contentent pas d'assurer 190 concerts à Boston même et 24 lors du Festival de Tanglewood, sans parler des multiples répétitions, enregistrements, émissions de radio et de télévision... Ils pratiquent, en tête à tête avec leur instrument, un recyclage perpétuel. »

Un bel exemple à proposer aux musiciens français. Et, en particulier, à ceux de l'Orchestre de Paris, qui, depuis quelque temps, s'endorment sur des lauriers peut-être distribués un peu trop tôt.

PIERRE JULIEN

L' EXPRESS: April 26, 1971

CONCERTS: The Cello-Orchestra

Fifteen years after the memorable concerts conducted by Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to France. This is its third European tour since its founding ninety years ago by a music-loving financier, Henry Lee Higginson, who abandoned a career as a pianist for business because of a hand injury. Beginning at London April 4, continuing at Stuttgart, then at the Palais de Chaillot this Saturday, the tour will finish with a series of chamber music concerts. Under the name of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, the twelve first-chair players of the orchestra will play this evening, April 26 at the Chateau de la Muette, May 1 at Royaumont, the 6th at Montpellier, the 8th at Bordeaux.

Strings. The echoes of the first concerts confirm the legendary musical qualities of the large American ensemble which gained its aristocratic standing under Arthur Nikisch, Carl Muck, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitsky and Charles Munch.

The present maestro, William Steinberg (71, also the Music Director "for life" of the Pittsburgh Symphony) will perhaps not leave as imperishable a memory as his illustrious predecessors. The profound lyricism of the Seventh Symphony of Mahler, programmed in London, Stuttgart and Paris, suffers somewhat under the cramped and somewhat mechanical beat of this small German whose wooden face is irresistably reminiscent of the comic-strip "Mr. Magoo".

Conducted like this, any other orchestra would have sounded dull and lifeless. But the "Boston" plays like a cello. To say that it possesses the most beautiful string section in the world, or the best brass, or the best winds, is perhaps excessive; it has very admirable ones, the equal of the very great orchestras. But what is doubtless unique in the world is its unity of instrumental ensemble. Only the untiring work of one-hundred-eight musicians, a flawless team spirit, and a tradition of ninety years have brought about such a result.

Laurels. Furthermore, the auditioning of the musicians is merciless. It says a lot for the qualities which are required. The associate manager Harry Kraut tells how the candidates compete with each other hidden behind a curtain in order not to influence in the least the "Brain Trust" of the orchestra which decides, in the final analysis, whom to hire for the job. "Besides which," he adds, "the musicians are held to an unceasing instrumental discipline all through their careers. They aren't content with playing 190 concerts alone in Boston, in addition to 24 more at Tanglewood, not to speak of the many recording sessions, rehearsals, radio and television broadcasts. . . They are constantly learning and proving themselves on their instruments."

A good example to set for French musicians. And especially, those in the Orchestre de Paris, which, for some time, has been content to rest on its perhaps prematurely distributed laurels.

2,50 Francs

N° 1033 - 26 avril - 2 mai 1971

L'EXPRESS

risons: REPOND

CONCERTS

L'orchestre violoncelle

Quinze ans après les mémorables concerts dirigés par Charles Munch et Pierre Monteux, l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston revient en France. C'est sa troisième tournée européenne depuis sa fondation. Il y a quatre-vingt-dix ans, par un financier mélomane, Henry Lee Higginson, qu'une blessure à la main détourna d'une carrière de pianiste vers le mécénat. Commencée à Londres le 4 avril, poursuivie à Stuttgart, puis au Palais de Chaillot samedi, cette tournée se terminera par une série de concerts de musique de chambre. Réunis sous le nom de Boston Symphony Chamber Players, les douze chefs de pupitre de l'orchestre

WILLIAM STEINBERG.
Derrière un rideau.

joueront ce soir 26 au château de la Muette, le 1er mai à Royaumont, le 6 à Montpellier, le 8 à Bordeaux.

Cordes. Les échos des premiers concerts confirment les légendaires qualités musicales de la grande formation américaine à laquelle Arthur Von Nikisch, Carl Mack, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitski et Charles Munch ont donné ses lettres de noblesse.

Le chef actuel, William Steinberg, 71 ans (également directeur « à vie » de l'Orchestre de Pittsburgh), ne laissera peut-être pas un souvenir aussi impérissable que ses illustres prédécesseurs. Le profond lyrisme de la « 7e Symphonie » de Mahler, programmée à Londres, à Stuttgart et à Paris, s'accommode assez mal de la baguette efficace et un peu trop mécanique de cet Allemand de petite taille, dont le visage de bois évoque irrésistiblement le Mr. Magoo des dessins animés.

Dirigé de la sorte, tout autre orchestre eût sonné plat et terne. Mais Boston sonne comme un violoncelle. Dire qu'il possède les plus belles cordes du monde, ou les plus beaux cuivres, ou les plus beaux bois, est peut-être excessif : il en possède d'admirables, à l'égal d'autres très grands orchestres. Mais ce qui est sans doute unique au monde, c'est l'unité de l'ensemble des instruments. Seuls le travail soutenu des cent huit musiciens, un esprit d'équipe à toute épreuve et une tradition de quatre-vingt-dix ans ont permis un tel résultat.

Lauriers. La sélection des musiciens est d'ailleurs impitoyable. Elle en dit long sur les qualités que l'on requiert. L'administrateur Harry Kraut raconte que les candidats concourent cachés derrière un rideau afin de n'influencer en rien le trust-trust de l'orchestre qui décide, le cas échéant, des engagements. En outre, ajoute-t-il, les musiciens sont tenus à une discipline instrumentale inflexible tout au long de leur carrière. Ils ne se contentent pas d'assurer 190 concerts à Boston même et 24 lors du Festival de Tanglewood, sans parler des multiples répétitions, enregistrements, émissions de radio et de télévision... Ils pratiquent, en tête à tête avec leur instrument, un recyclage perpétuel. »

Un bel exemple à proposer aux musiciens français. Et, en particulier, à ceux de l'Orchestre de Paris, qui, depuis quelque temps, s'endorment sur des lauriers peut-être distribués un peu trop tôt.

PIERRE JULIEN ■

Sommaire n° 1323 ◆ 26 avril 1971

ELLE®

L'orchestre de Boston au T.N.P.

Deux Boeing spéciaux vont se poser à Orly le 23 avril ; il en sortira les 108 musiciens (et leurs instruments) de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston qui vient donner un concert à Paris (24 avril, 21 heures, T.N.P.), pour la première fois depuis 14 ans. L'orchestre est accompagné, comme une grande équipe de football, de supporters : des Américains, plutôt fortunés, plutôt âgés, qui suivent toute la tournée européenne de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston. C'est l'occasion pour eux d'encourager le chef, William Steinberg — au programme T.N.P. : Bach, Beethoven, Mahler — de suivre ses enregistrements (Deutsche Grammophon), mais aussi de faire une croisière musicale aérienne : l'orchestre donne des concerts en Angleterre, en Allemagne, en Autriche, en Italie, en Espagne. Et encore l'occasion de 35 réceptions officielles dont, à Paris, celle de l'Hôtel de Ville où le président du Conseil municipal leur remettra les clefs de la ville.

ELLE®
100, rue Réaumur, Paris (2e). 508.20.00

Sommaire n° 1323 ◆ 26 avril 1971

L'orchestre de Boston au T.N.P.

Deux Boeing spéciaux vont se poser à Orly le 23 avril. Il en sortira les 108 musiciens (et leurs instruments) de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston qui vient donner un concert à Paris (24 avril, 21 heures, T.N.P.), pour la première fois depuis 14 ans. L'orchestre est accompagné comme une grande équipe de football, de supporters, des Américains plutôt fortunés, plutôt âgés, qui suivent toute la tournée européenne de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston. C'est l'occasion pour eux d'encourager le chef, William Steinberg, au programme T.N.P. Bach, Beethoven, Mahler, de suivre ses enregistrements (Deutsche Grammophon) mais aussi de faire une croisière musicale aérienne. L'orchestre donne des concerts en Angleterre, en Allemagne, en Autriche, en Italie, en Espagne. Et encore l'occasion de 35 réceptions officielles dont à Paris, celle de l'Hôtel de Ville où le président du Conseil municipal leur remettra les clefs de la ville.

BLANK PAGE

LE FIGARO: Tuesday, April 27, 1971

MUSIC AT THE NATIONAL THEATRE: THE MAESTRO IS NOT ONE WITH THE ORCHESTRA

A luxury ocean liner, come from America and crossing on German waters. On board, the service is above reproach. Each person does exactly what he should, the different tasks are distributed to maximum effect, order reigns, the most perfect symmetry reassures the passenger, the weather's fine and the sea is glass. The ideal cruise, no?

Yes and no. Yes, because the crew is beyond compare. The marvelous orchestra -- rich, velvety, lyric, superbly trained, broken in to all manoeuvres, equal in all the chairs, endowed with strings which were particularly distinguished in the Mahlerian Nachtmusik where their suppleness was really marvelous! The brass have a majestic resonance and the winds are not eclipsed by the strings. Once again, the instrument is magnificent. My disagreement begins with the captain.

The Boston Symphony has been lead by Nikisch, Muck, Monteux, Koussevitsky and by our Charles Munch, the visual type of artist, hypersensitive and infectious as the devil, and has a very curious successor in the person of William Steinberg! Imagine the droll silhouette of a magister teaching a class, or better, meditating, after the fact, what he has just heard, strangely absent from what is going on in the orchestra, neutral, lost in thought, sometimes even in gesticulating. One would say that he is explaining the work, relying on those who are playing it to interpret it whichever way they please. No eloquence, not the least dynamism, an extreme platitude, no relief. The vehemence of Munch would have made the music pleasing to the deaf. I would, rather, counsel the blind to go hear Mr. Steinberg. With him, the eye doesn't hear.

¶ In these conditions, we benefitted (if I dare say so) by a Leonore Overture No. 3 which was peaceable, without fever, endowed with a rather weak trumpet sound; then by a Suite in B minor which was agreable, pastelled, offering all the assurance to the flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, a very sure virtuoso without much personality. And as if the vessel needed to find its stream, the Seventh Symphony of Mahler began to flow, inexhaustibly.

I like Mahler -- although his language does not have, as some insist upon repeating, a striking originality. His instinct for rare timbres reccomends him to the present generation who see in him the precursor of contemporary modes: which really takes a bit of forcing! As for the unbearable lengths, one makes excuse, refers, to absolve him, to the example of Wagner, not too much to the point, in my opinion. The texture of Wagnerian drama and its action command imposing dimensions. Besides, with Wagner, the thought is of another cast. Here, everything is said in the moment where Mahler continues to talk, talk, talk. . . I, myself, am quite insensible to this art of restatement and accumulation of arguments: "Just get that into your heads!" I react strongly against it in proportion to the exhaustion with which I leave the subterranean Chaillot concert hall, little ready to express my enthusiasm for the phalanx in whose wake we have effected this descent into the bowels of the earth.

paris reviews

LE FIGARO — MARDI 27 AVRIL 1971

MUSIQUE AU T.N.P.

LE CHEF S'ABSTRAIT DE L'ORCHESTRE

UN paquebot de grand luxe, venu d'Amérique et croisant sur les eaux germaniques. A bord, le service est irréprochable. Chacun fait exactement ce qu'il doit, les différents postes sont distribués au mieux, l'ordre règne, la symétrie la plus parfaite rassure le passager, le temps est beau et la mer d'huile. Belle croisière, n'est-il pas vrai ?

Oui et non. Oui, parce que l'équipage est hors de pair. Le bel orchestre — ample, moelleux, lyrique, superbement manégé, rompu à toutes les manœuvres, égal dans tous les pupitres, doté d'un quatuor qui s'est particulièrement distingué dans la Nachtmusik mahlérienne, où sa souplesse faisait merveille ! Les cuivres ont un éclat majestueux et les bois n'éclipsent pas la forêt des archets. Encore une fois, l'instrument est magnifique. Où je renâcle, c'est à l'instant de féliciter le capitaine.

L'orchestre de Boston a été tour à tour dirigé par Nikisch, Muck, Monteux, Koussevitzky et par notre Charles Münch, type de l'artiste visuel, hypersensible et contagieux en diable, a un bien curieux successeur en la personne de William Steinberg ! Imaginez une silhouette falote de magister faisant la classe, ou plutôt, méditant comme après coup ce qu'il vient d'entendre, étrangement absent de ce qui se passe à l'orchestre, décalé, dans la pensée, parfois même dans la gestique. On dirait qu'il explique l'ouvrage, faisant confiance à ceux qui l'exécutent pour l'interpréter à leur guise. Aucune éloquence, pas le moindre dynamisme, une platitude extrême, nul relief. La véhémence de Münch aurait fait aimer la musique à des sourds. Je conseillerais plutôt aux aveugles d'aller entendre M. Steinberg. Avec lui, l'œil n'écoute pas.

Dans ces conditions, nous avons bénéficié, si j'ose dire, d'une Ouverture de Léonore III paisible, sans fièvre, dotée d'une sonnerie de trompette assez molle ; puis d'une Suite en si mineur agréable, pastellisée, offrant toute sécurité à la flûtiste, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, virtuose très sûre, sans grande personnalité. Et comme il faut bien qu'un vaisseau trouve son fleuve, la 7e Symphonie de Mahler s'est mise à couler, intarissablement.

J'aime Mahler — bien que son langage soit loin d'avoir, comme certains le répètent volontiers, une originalité brûlante. Son instinct des timbres rares le recommande à la génération montante, qui voit en lui un précurseur des procédés contemporains : il faut, pour cela, une bonne vue ! Quant aux longueurs accablantes, on se réfère, pour les absoudre, à l'exemple de Wagner, fort peu significatif, à mon gré. La texture du drame wagnérien et son action commandent des dimensions imposantes. Chez Wagner, en outre, la pensée est d'une autre qualité. Ici, tout est dit au moment où Mahler continue à parler, à parler, à parler... Pour ma part, je suis très insensible à cet art de redites et d'accumulation d'arguments : « Enfoncez-vous bien cela dans la tête ! » J'y suis rebelle dans la mesure où je quitte, épuisé, la salle hypogéenne de Chaillot, mal en train pour témoigner mon enthousiasme à l'admirable phalange, à la suite de laquelle nous avons effectué cette descente dans les entrailles de la terre.

A la sortie, des jeunes gens en mal d'enquête et de référendum recueillaient les impressions des auditeurs. Une dame, résolue à dire son sentiment, sans abdiquer pour autant son snobisme, lança : « Evidemment, c'était ennuyeux : mais, enfin, tout de même... » Mais, enfin, rien du tout ! L'ennui, Madame, est un mal sans remède.

CL.

Outside, some young people, in the guise of inquest and referendum, were gathering the impressions of the auditors. One woman, resolved to say what she thought, without leaving aside her snobism, cried: "Well, of course, it's boring; but then, for all that. . ." But then, for all that, nothing! Boredom, Madame, is a malady without a remedy.

LE FIGARO: Tuesday, April 27, 1971

MUSIC AT THE NATIONAL THEATRE: THE MAESTRO IS NOT ONE WITH THE ORCHESTRA

A luxury ocean liner, come from America and crossing on German waters. On board, the service is above reproach. Each person does exactly what he should, the different tasks are distributed to maximum effect, order reigns, the most perfect symmetry reassures the passenger, the weather's fine and the sea is glass. The ideal cruise, no?

Yes and no. Yes, because the crew is beyond compare. The marvelous orchestra -- rich, velvety, lyric, superbly trained, broken in to all manoeuvres, equal in all the chairs, endowed with strings which were particularly distinguished in the Mahlerian Nachtmusik where their suppleness was really marvelous! The brass have a majestic resonance and the winds are not eclipsed by the strings. Once again, the instrument is magnificent. My disagreement begins with the captain.

The Boston Symphony has been lead by Nikisch, Muck, Monteux, Koussevitsky and by our (notre) Charles Munch, the visual type of artist, hypersensitive and infectious as the devil, and has a very curious successor in the person of William Steinberg! Imagine the droll silhouette of a magister teaching a class, or better, meditating, after the fact, what he has just heard, strangely absent from what is going on in the orchestra, neutral, lost in thought, sometimes even in gesticulating. One would say that he is explaining the work, relying on those who are playing it to interpret it whichever way they please. No eloquence, not the least dynamism, an extreme platitude, no relief. The venemence of Munch would have made the music pleasing to the deaf. I would, rather, counsel the blind to go hear Mr. Steinberg. With him, the eye doesn't hear.

¶ In these conditions, we benefitted (if I dare say so) by a Leonore Overture No. 3 which was peaceable, without fever, endowed with a rather weak trumpet sound; then by a Suite in B minor which was agreable, pastelled, offering all the assurance to the flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, a very sure virtuoso without much personality. And as if the vessel needed to find its stream, the Seventh Symphony of Mahler began to flow, inexhaustibly.

I like Mahler -- although his language does not have, as some insist upon repeating, a striking originality. His instinct for rare timbres reccomends him to the present generation who see in him the precursor of contemporary modes: which really takes a bit of forcing! As for the unbearable lengths, one makes even refer, to absolve him, to the example of Wagner, not too much to the point, in my opinion. The texture of Wagnerian drama and its action command imposing dimensions. Besides, with Wagner, the thought is of another cast. Here, everything is said in the moment where Mahler continues to talk, talk, talk. . . I, myself, am quite insensible to this art of restatement and accumulation of arguments: "Just get that into your heads!" I react strongly against it in proportion to the exhaustion with which I leave the subterranean Chaillot, consent to all little ready to express my enthusiasm for the phalanx in whose wake we have effected this descent into the bowels of the earth.

Outside, some young people, in the guise of inquest and referendum, gather the impressions of the auditors. One woman, resolved to say what she thought, without leaving aside her snobism, cried: "Well, of course, it's boring; but then, for all that. . ." But then, for all that, nothing! Boredom, Madame, is a malady without a remedy.

paris reviews

LE FIGARO — MARDI 27 AVRIL 1971

MUSIQUE AU T.N.P.

LE CHEF S'ABSTRAIT DE L'ORCHESTRE

UN paquebot de grand luxe, venu d'Amérique et croisant sur les eaux germaniques. A bord, le service est irreprochable. Chacun fait exactement ce qu'il doit, les différents postes sont distribués au mieux, l'ordre règne, la symétrie la plus parfaite rassure le passager, le temps est beau et la mer d'huile. Belle croisière, n'est-il pas vrai ?

Oui et non. Oui, parce que l'équipage est hors de pair. Le bel orchestre — ample, moelleux, lyrique, superbement manégé, rompu à toutes les manœuvres, égal dans tous les pupitres, doté d'un quatuor qui s'est particulièrement distingué dans la Nachtmusik mahlérienne, où sa souplesse faisait merveille ! Les cuivres ont un éclat majestueux et les bois n'éclipsent pas la forêt des archets. Encore une fois, l'instrument est magnifique. Où je renâcle, c'est à l'instant de féliciter le capitaine.

L'orchestre de Boston a été tour à tour dirigé par Nikisch, Muck, Monteux, Koussevitzky et par notre Charles Münch, type de l'artiste visuel, hypersensible et contagieux en diable, a un bien curieux successeur en la personne de William Steinberg ! Imaginez une silhouette falote de magister faisant la classe, ou plutôt, méditant comme après coup ce qu'il vient d'entendre, étrangement absent de ce qui se passe à l'orchestre, décalé, dans la pensée, parfois même dans la gestique. On dirait qu'il explique l'ouvrage, faisant confiance à ceux qui l'exécutent pour l'interpréter à leur guise. Aucune éloquence, pas le moindre dynamisme, une platitude extrême, nul relief. La véhémence de Münch aurait fait aimer la musique à des sourds. Je conseillerais plutôt aux aveugles d'aller entendre M. Steinberg. Avec lui, l'œil n'écoute pas.

Dans ces conditions, nous avons bénéficié, si j'ose dire, d'une Ouverture de Leonore III paisible, sans fièvre, dotée d'une sonnerie de trompette assez molle ; puis d'une Suite en si mineur agréable, pastellisée, offrant toute sécurité à la flûtiste, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, virtuose très sûre, sans grande personnalité. Et comme il faut bien qu'un vaisseau trouve son fleuve, la 7e Symphonie de Mahler s'est mise à couler, intarissablement.

J'aime Mahler — bien que son langage soit loin d'avoir, comme certains le répètent volontiers, une originalité brûlante. Son instinct des timbres rares le recommande à la génération montante, qui voit en lui un précurseur des procédés contemporains : il faut, pour cela, une bonne vue ! Quant aux longueurs accablantes, on se réfère, pour les absoudre, à l'exemple de Wagner, fort peu significatif, à mon gré. La texture du drame wagnérien et son action commandent des dimensions imposantes. Chez Wagner, en outre, la pensée est d'une autre qualité. Ici, tout est dit au moment où Mahler continue à parler, à parler, à parler... Pour ma part, je suis très insensible à cet art de redites et d'accumulation d'arguments : « Enfoncez-vous bien cela dans la tête ! » J'y suis rebelle dans la mesure où je quitte, épuisé, la salle hypogéenne de Chaillot, mal en train pour témoigner mon enthousiasme à l'admirable phalange, à la suite de laquelle nous avons effectué cette descente dans les entrailles de la terre.

A la sortie, des jeunes gens en mal d'enquête et de référendum recueillaient les impressions des auditeurs. Une dame, résolue à dire son sentiment, sans abdiquer pour autant son snobisme, lança : « Evidemment, c'était ennuyeux : mais, enfin, tout de même... » Mais, enfin, rien du tout ! L'ennui, Madame, est un mal sans remède.

Cl.

LE MONDE: Tuesday, April 27, 1971

MUSIC: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, CONDUCTED BY WILLIAM STEINBERG

Before an enthusiastic public, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a splendid demonstration, and if one were to organize a contest among the greatest orchestras in the world today, the orchestra of Koussevitsky and Munch would remain among the serious challengers.

It is quite a hopeless task to describe the beauty of this orchestra: the lightness and the silky elegance of the strings, without any dryness or sloppiness, the refined sound of the contrabasses for example; the lovely, clear resonance of the brass (less dark than those of the Berlin Philharmonic); the idyllic blend of the winds, all this has to be heard to be understood. But we should emphasize the extreme perfection of each instrument, of the triangle and the glockenspiel, of the mandoline and the guitar (played by the violists) or of the "Tenor Horn", as well as that of the concertmaster, who has the ideal purity of a Barchet; each one contributes to an "orchestral sonority" of an exceptional homogeneity.

Long before the start of the concert, the musicians come quietly onto the stage and begin to warm up, and we are amused to hear the oboe repeating studiously a theme from the Leonore Overture No. 3 as if it were some acrobatic feat from Stockhausen.

And here is the Music Director, William Steinberg (a pupil of Abendroth and former assistant of Klemperer), whose small stature is surprising (a little like Stravinsky) with a head just as bald, and a severe ~~look~~ glance. What a stange beat at the beginning of the Leonore! He traces out large, complicated arabesques, which seem to have little to do with the ~~xxxxx~~ meter ~~and~~ or even the tempo, but which chisel out perfect sounds. A little fluttering of the fingers of the left hand models the trill in the flutes; elbows thrown back guide along particularly unctuous syncopations; sometimes the baton makes a simple mirror-wiping movement to keep the tempo consistent, etc. And Leonore passes like a dream, without giving the heroic ode its full interior outline.

A blazing unanimity. The Suite in B minor of Bach next seems stiff, with curious retards, but there are so many musicological theories on the realization of the phrases in this work that it is better to ~~xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx~~ leave certain stones unturned. . . At least this intimate interpretation does not aspire to grandeur, and the charming flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, makes sure to sparkle in this pretty sprinkling of notes.

There remains the immense Seventh Symphony of Mahler, the orchestral piece, ~~xxxxxx~~ if ever there was one, in which the interpretation left us divided between admiration and disappointment; for it is hardly possible to play more supplely this multilevel masterpiece; and however, behind these large and familiar landscapes, these nocturnes so violently and thoroughly baroque, these ~~countryside~~ rustic and mountainous impressions, this strange serenade, we don't feel the shudder of the tragic mortal underpinnings, and especially the intensity of Mahler's glance which gives to each phrase, even if it is joyously lyrical, its incandesence. In

Translation continued on following page

Le Monde
Fondateur : Hubert Beuve-Méry — MARDI 27 AVRIL 1971 — Directeur : Jacques Fauvet

la musique par Jacques Lonchampt

LE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

dirigé par William Steinberg

Accueilli par un public enthousiaste, « au T.N.P. et au Tout-Paris réunis », l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston a vraiment fait une splendide démonstration, et si l'on organisait aujourd'hui un tournoi des plus grands orchestres du monde, celui de Koussevitzky et de Munch resterait parmi les plus dangereux challengers.

C'est une tâche décourageante que de décrire la beauté d'un orchestre : la légèreté, l'élégance soyeuse des cordes, sans rien de sec ni de vert, le son raffiné des contrebasses par exemple, le bel éclat clair des cuivres, moins fauves que ceux de la Philharmonique de Berlin, les concerts idylliques des bois tout cela doit être entendu pour être compris. Mais il faut dire l'extrême perfection de chaque instrument, du triangle et du glockenspiel, de la mandoline et de la guitare (joués par des altistes) ou du « tenor horn », aussi bien que du premier violon, qui a l'idéale pureté d'un Barchet, chacun contribuant à une « sonorité d'orchestre » d'une homogénéité exceptionnelle.

Longtemps avant le début du concert, les musiciens viennent tranquillement sur scène se mettre en train, et l'on s'amuse de voir le hautbois solo répéter avec application un thème de l'Ouverture de Léonore III, comme si c'était un trait acrobatique de Stockhausen...

Et voici le chef titulaire, William Steinberg (un élève d'Abendroth, et qui fut l'assistant de Klemperer), dont la taille [illegible] ne surprend (un peu [illegible] ches Stravinsky) avec une [illegible] longue tête chauve, au [illegible] sévère. Quelle étrange ba[illegible] début de Léonore ! Il dessine de larges arabesques compliquées, qui semblent avoir peu de rapports avec la mesure et même [illegible] le tempo, mais ciselé des sons parfaits. Un petit « pédaglo » [illegible] guette fait un simple mouvement d'essuie-glace pour maintenir le tempo constant, etc. Et Léonore passe comme un rêve, sans pourtant que l'ode héroïque prenne tout son relief intérieur.

Une rayonnante unanimité

- La Suite en si mineur de Bach paraît ensuite étriquée, avec de curieux retards, mais il y a tant de théories musicologiques sur la réalisation des phrases de cette œuvre qu'il vaut mieux éviter de lever certaines pierres... Du moins cette interprétation intime ne vise pas à la grandeur, et la charmante flûtiste blonde, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, se garde bien de briller avec ce joli piquetage de notes un peu guindé.

Reste l'immense Septième Symphonie, de Mahler, « morceau d'orchestre » s'il en fut, dont l'interprétation nous laisse partagés entre l'admiration et le regret ; car il n'est guère possible de jouer plastiquement mieux ce chef-d'œuvre multiple, et pourtant, derrière ces tableaux amples et familiers, ces nocturnes d'un baroque savoureux et violent, ces impressions campagnardes et montagnardes, cette étrange sérénade, on ne sent pas frémir l'arrière-plan tragique, mortel, et surtout l'intensité du regard de Mahler, qui donne à chaque phrase, fût-elle joyeusement lyrique, sa phosphorescence. Dans le scherzo fantomatique, on se prend à admirer ingénument ces merveilles orchestrales, mais comme si l'on était au niveau d'expression d'une danse de Peer Gynt ou de l'Apprenti sorcier.

Mais on saluera la réussite incomparable du final, celui-ci tout de plein air et de lumière, où manœuvrent autant de cortèges et de corporations que dans les Maîtres chanteurs, l'Ouverture académique de Brahms et les Symphonies de Ives réunis, et qui est à « la Ronde de nuit » du deuxième mouvement ce que sont au chef-d'œuvre de Rembrandt les fresques rutilantes des archers de Saint-Adrien ou de Saint-Georges de Franz Hals. Le Boston Symphony Orchestra ne pouvait nous laisser sur une impression plus [illegible]

220

LE MONDE: Tuesday, April 27, 1971

MUSIC: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, CONDUCTED BY WILLIAM STEINBERG

Before an enthusiastic public, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a splendid demonstration, and if one were to organize a contest among the greatest orchestras in the world today, the orchestra of Koussevitsky and Munch would remain among the serious challengers.

It is quite a hopeless task to describe the beauty of this orchestra: the lightness and the silky elegance of the strings, without any dryness or sloppiness, the refined sound of the contrabasses for example; the lovely, clear resonance of the brass (less dark than those of the Berlin Philharmonic); the idyllic blend of the winds, all this has to be heard to be understood. But we should emphasize the extreme perfection of each instrument, of the triangle and the glockenspiel, of the mandoline and the guitar (played by the violists) or of the "Tenor Horn", as well as that of the concertmaster, who has the ideal purity of a Barchet; each one contributes to an "orchestral sonority" of an exceptional homogeneity.

Long before the start of the concert, the musicians come quietly onto the stage and begin to warm up, and we are amused to hear the oboe repeating studiously a theme from the Leonore Overture No. 3 as if it were some acrobatic feat from Stockhausen.

And here is the Music Director, William Steinberg (a pupil of Abendroth and former assistant of Klemperer), whose small stature is surprising (a little like Stravinsky) with a head just as bald, and a severe ~~look~~ mien. What a stange beat at the beginning of the Leonore! He traces out large, complicated arabesques, which seem to have little to do with the ~~xxxxx~~ meter ~~and~~ or even the tempo, but which chisel out perfect sounds. A little fluttering of the fingers of the left hand models the trill in the flutes; elbows thrown back guide along particularly unctuous syncopations; sometimes the baton makes a simple mirror-wiping movement to keep the tempo consistent, etc. And Leonore passes like a dream, without giving the heroic ode its full interior outline.

A blazing unanimity. The Suite in B minor of Bach next seems stiff, with curious retards, but there are so many musicological theories on the realization of the phrases in this work that it is better to ~~xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx~~ leave certain stones unturned. . . At least this intimate interpretation does not aspire to grandeur, and the charming flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, makes sure to sparkle in this pretty sprinkling of notes.

There remains the immense Seventh Symphony of Mahler, the orchestral piece, ~~xxxxxx~~ if ever there was one, in which the interpretation left us divided between admiration and disappointment; for it is hardly possible to play more supplely this multilevel masterpiece; and however, behind these large and familiar landscapes, these nocturnes so violently and thoroughly baroque, these ~~countryside~~ music and mountainous impressions, this strange serenade, we don't feel the shudder of the tragic mortal underpinnings, and especially the intensity of Mahler's glance which gives to each phrase, even if it is joyously lyrical, its incandesence. In

Translation continued on following page

Le Monde

Fondateur : Hubert Beuve-Méry — MARDI 27 AVRIL 1971 — Directeur : Jacques Fauvet

la musique par Jacques Lonchampt

LE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

dirigé par William Steinberg

Accueilli par un public enthousiaste, « au T.N.P. et au Tout-Paris réunis », l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston a vraiment fait une splendide démonstration, et si l'on organisait aujourd'hui un tournoi des plus grands orchestres du monde, celui de Koussevitzky et de Munch resterait parmi les plus dangereux challengers.

C'est une tâche décourageante que de décrire la beauté d'un orchestre : la légèreté, l'élégance soyeuse des cordes, sans rien de sec ni de vert, le son raffiné des contrebasses par exemple, le bel éclat clair des cuivres, moins fauves que ceux de la Philharmonique de Berlin, les concerts idylliques des bois tout cela doit être entendu pour être compris. Mais il faut dire l'extrême perfection de chaque instrument, du triangle et du glockenspiel, de la mandoline et de la guitare (joués par des altistes) ou du « tenor horn », aussi bien que du premier violon, qui a l'idéale pureté d'un Barchet, chacun contribuant à une « sonorité d'orchestre » d'une homogénéité exceptionnelle.

Longtemps avant le début du concert, les musiciens viennent tranquillement sur scène se mettre en train, et l'on s'amuse de voir le hautbois solo répéter avec application un thème de l'Ouverture de Léonore III, comme si c'était un trait acrobatique de Stockhausen...

Et voici le chef titulaire, William Steinberg (un élève d'Abendroth, et qui fut l'assistant de Klemperer), dont la taille moyenne surprend (un peu comme chez Stravinsky) avec une aussi longue tête chauve, au regard sévère. Quelle étrange battue au début de Léonore I ! Il dessine de larges arabesques compliquées, qui semblent avoir peu de rapports avec la mesure et même avec le tempo, mais cièle des sons parfaits. Un petit « pédalage » des doigts de la main gauche modèle le trille des flûtes ; les croches rejetés en arrière commandent des syncopes particulièrement onctueuses ; parfois la baguette fait un simple mouvement d'essuie-glace pour maintenir le tempo constant, etc. Et Léonore passe comme un rêve, sans pourtant que l'ode héroïque prenne tout son relief intérieur.

Une rayonnante unanimité

La Suite en si mineur de Bach paraît ensuite étriquée, avec de curieux retards, mais il y a tant de théories musicologiques sur la réalisation des phrasés de cette œuvre qu'il vaut mieux éviter de lever certaines pierres... Du moins cette interprétation intime ne vise pas à la grandeur, et la charmante flûtiste blonde Doriot Anthony Dwyer, se garde bien de briller avec ce joli piquetage de notes un peu guindé.

Reste l'immense Septième Symphonie, de Mahler, « morceau d'orchestre » s'il en fut, dont l'interprétation nous laisse partagés entre l'admiration et le regret ; car il n'est guère possible de jouer plastiquement mieux ce chef-d'œuvre multiple, et pourtant, derrière ces tableaux amples et familiers, ces nocturnes d'un baroque savoureux et violent, ces impressions campagnardes et montagnardes, cette étrange sérénade, on ne sent pas frémir l'arrière-plan tragique, mortel, et surtout l'intensité du regard de Mahler, qui donne à chaque phrase, fût-elle joyeusement lyrique, sa phosphorescence. Dans le scherzo fantomatique, on se prend à admirer ingénument ces merveilles orchestrales, mais comme si l'on était au niveau d'expression d'une danse de Peer Gynt ou de l'Apprenti sorcier.

Mais on saluera la réussite incomparable du final, celui-ci tout de plein air et de lumière, où manœuvrent autant de cortèges et de corporations que dans les Maîtres chanteurs, l'Ouverture académique de Brahms et les Symphonies de Ives réunis, et qui est à « la Ronde de nuit » du deuxième mouvement ce que sont au chef-d'œuvre de Rembrandt les fresques rutilantes des archers de Saint-Adrien ou de Saint-Georges de Franz Hals. Le Boston Symphony Orchestra ne pouvait nous laisser sur une impression plus éblouissante où, d'un extraordinaire, tohu-bohu d'images et de couleurs, se dégage peu à peu une vision d'une rayonnante unanimité.

translation cont. from preceding page

the ghostly scherzo, we can easily content ourselves with admiring the orchestral marvels, but just as if we were at the level of expression of some dance from Peer Gynt or the Sorcerer's Apprentice.

But we must salute the incomparable success of the finale, this all of the open-air and light, which shuffles about as many processions and delegations as the Meistersinger, the Academic Festival Overture of Brahms and all of the Symphonies of Ives put together. The Boston Symphony could not leave us with a more overpowering impression where, from an enormous jumble of impressions and colors, emerges little by little a vision of a blazing unanimity.

L'AURORE

Lundi 26 avril 1971

SPECTACLES

MUSIQUE

Le Boston Symphony Orchestra au T.N.P.

UN Boeing en pilote automatique. Telle est l'impression que nous laissera le Boston Symphony Orchestra, après son unique concert de samedi soir au Palais de Chaillot.

Il y a quinze ans, la grande formation américaine avait enthousiasmé les foules sous les baguettes conjuguées de Charles Münch et Pierre Monteux. Sous celle de William Steinberg il en a été tout autrement. La preuve est faite désormais que le meilleur orchestre ne peut en aucun cas se passer d'un très grand chef.

Certes William Steinberg n'est pas n'importe qui et sa brillante carrière en porte témoignage ; il n'en est pas moins vrai qu'il nous a semblé bien terne à Chaillot et que sa direction a profondément affecté le tonus de l'orchestre. Et quel orchestre pourtant ! Magnifique de musicalité, de [illegible]

On l'a vu dès l'ouverture de Leonore III, de Beethoven : une suprême sonorité. On a immédiatement senti aussi que cet orchestre éprouvait sous la baguette étriquée de Steinberg une sorte de gêne respiratoire, qu'il était obligé de fonctionner à l'économie.

Avec la 7e Symphonie, de Mahler, cette impression n'a fait que se préciser. Steinberg a gommé la générosité, le lyrisme du « langsam » initial aussi bien que les élans du cœur et les vagues rythmiques des deux « nachtmusik » médianes. Quant au rondo final, il nous a semblé durer une éternité et ne jamais trouver sa conclusion.

Mahler y est sans doute pour quelque chose mais Steinberg n'a rien fait pour alléger son propos. Au total, un concert assez décevant eu regard de ce que l'on espérait. Le Boston Symphony Orchestra nous doit une revanche... [illegible]

Pierre [illegible]

L'AURORE: April 26, 1971

MUSIC: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE PALAIS DE CHAILLOT

A Boeing on automatic pilot. This is the impression left us by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after its single concert Saturday night at the Palais de Chaillot.

Fifteen years ago, the great American orchestra had excited crowds under the baton of Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux. Under William Steinberg, it has been quite something else. There is no longer any doubt that the best orchestras can in any case do without the very best conductors.

Certainly William Steinberg isn't a nobody, and his brilliant career is the proof of it; it is nonetheless true that he seemed very dull to us at Chaillot and that his leadership deeply affected the sound of the orchestra. But what an orchestra! Magnificent musicality and discipline.

This was immediately evident in the Beethoven Leonore Overture No. 3: a supreme sonority. It was also immediately obvious that this orchestra experienced, under the cramped beat of Steinberg, a kind of short-windedness, that it was obliged to function at the lowest level possible.

With the Mahler Seventh, this impression only deepened. Steinberg gummed up the expansiveness and the lyricism of the initial Langsam, as well as the central outbursts and rhythmic waves of the two middle Nachtmusik-movements. As for the final Rondo, it seemed to last an eternity and never to find its conclusion.

There doubtless remains something of Mahler, but Steinberg did nothing to make it apparent. On the whole, a rather disappointing concert from what one would have hoped. The Boston Symphony owes us a recompense. . . . Let's hope before another fifteen years.

translation cont. from preceding page

the ghostly scherzo, we can easily content ourselves with admiring the orchestral marvels, but just as if we were at the level of expression of some dance from Peer Gynt or the Sorcerer's Apprentice.

But we must salute the incomparable success of the finale, this all of the open-air and light, which shuffles about as many processes and delegations as the Meistersinger, the Academic Festival Overture of Brahms and all of the Symphonies of Ives put together. The Boston Symphony could not leave us with a more overpowering impression where, from an enormous jumble of impressions and colors, emerges little by little a vision of a blazing unanimity.

L'AURORE

Lundi 26 avril 1971

— SPECTACLES —

MUSIQUE

Le Boston Symphony Orchestra au T.N.P.

UN Boeing en pilote automatique. Telle est l'impression que nous laissera le Boston Symphony Orchestra, après son unique concert de samedi soir au Palais de Chaillot.

Il y a quinze ans, la grande formation américaine avait enthousiasmé les foules sous les baguettes conjuguées de Charles Münch et Pierre Monteux. Sous celle de William Steinberg il en a été tout autrement. La preuve est faite désormais que le meilleur orchestre ne peut en aucun cas se passer d'un très grand chef.

Certes William Steinberg n'est pas n'importe qui et sa brillante carrière en porte témoignage ; il s'en est pas moins vrai qu'il nous a semblé bien terne à Chaillot et que sa direction a profondément affecté le tonus de l'orchestre. Et quel orchestre pourtant ! Magnifique de musicalité, de discipline.

On l'a vu dès l'ouverture de Leonore III, de Beethoven : une suprême sonorité. On a immédiatement senti aussi que cet orchestre éprouvait sous la baguette étriquée de Steinberg une sorte de gêne respiratoire, qu'il était obligé de fonctionner à l'économie.

Avec la 7e Symphonie, de Mahler, cette impression n'a fait que se préciser. Steinberg a gommé la générosité, le lyrisme du « langsam » initial aussi bien que les flans du cœur et les vagues rythmiques des deux « nachtmusik » médianes. Quant au rondo final, il nous a semblé durer une éternité et ne jamais trouver sa conclusion.

Mahler y est sans doute pour quelque chose mais Steinberg n'a rien fait pour alléger son propos. Au total, un concert assez décevant en regard de ce que l'on espérait. Le Boston Symphony Orchestra nous doit une revanche... Rendez-vous avant quinze ans.

Pierre JULIEN.

L'AURORE: April 26, 1971

MUSIC: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE PALAIS DE CHAILLOT

A Boeing on automatic pilot. This is the impression left us by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after its single concert Saturday night at the Palais de Chaillot.

Fifteen years ago, the great American orchestra had excited crowds under the baton of Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux. Under William Steinberg, it has been quite something else. There is no longer any doubt that the best orchestras can in any case do without the very best conductors.

Certainly William Steinberg isn't a nobody, and his brilliant career is the proof of it; it is nonetheless true that he seemed very dull to us at Chaillot and that his leadership deeply affected the sound of the orchestra. But what an orchestra! Magnificent musicality and discipline.

This was immediately evident in the Beethoven Leonore Overture No. 3: a supreme sonority. It was also immediately obvious that this orchestra experienced, under the cramped beat of Steinberg, a kind of short-windedness, that it was obliged to function at the lowest level possible.

With the Mahler Seventh, this impression only deepened. Steinberg gummed up the expansiveness and the lyricism of the initial Langsam, as well as the central outbursts and rhythmic waves of the two middle Nachtmusik-movements. As for the final Rondo, it seemed to last an eternity and never to find its conclusion.

There doubtless remains something of Mahler, but Steinberg did nothing to make it apparent. On the whole, a rather disappointing concert from what one would have hoped. The Boston Symphony owes us a recompense. . . . Let's hope before another fifteen years.

222

AMITIES FRANCE ISRAEL
83, av. de la Grande Armée
PARIS XVI 698 AVRIL 1971

Le Boston Symphony Orchestra

● Précédé de la réputation la plus flatteuse, due à ses enregistrements (1) et aux souvenirs de ses précédentes apparitions, le Boston Symphony Orchestra vient d'achever à Paris une tournée qui l'a conduit dans les principales capitales européennes. Le concert que ce groupe orchestral a donné au Palais de Chaillot a connu une telle affluence que nous fûmes de ceux qui durent se contenter d'une marche d'escalier pour y assister.

Placé aujourd'hui sous la direction de William Steinberg — il le fut jadis sous celle de Charles Munch — le Boston Symphony Orchestra est connu comme une des meilleures phalanges du monde. Renom pleinement justifié et si nous avons noté le nom de Joseph Silverstein comme premier violon, nous avons aussi retenu ceux de Fredy Ostrovsky, Léo Panasevich, Noah Bielski, Herman Siberman, Sheldon Rotenberg, Gerald Gelbloom, pour ne citer que ceux-là.

(1) Voir catalogue Deutsche Grammophon.

Le programme de ce concert groupait des œuvres de Beethoven (ouverture de Léonore III), Bach (Suite en Si) et Malher (7e Symphonie). Si Beethoven et Bach pâtirent quelque peu de la disposition de la salle et de son acoustique particulière, Malher devait être le grand triomphateur de la soirée. Cela devait être dû en partie à l'énorme déploiement orchestral que cette œuvre exige et aussi de ses constants scintillements de timbres. On sait que les symphonies de Malher constituent des sortes de fresques d'une longueur imposante et mobilisent, outre les pupitres traditionnels et une nombreuse percussion, des instruments qu'on n'a pas l'habitude d'y voir figurer (cor de postillon dans la 3e, ténor horn et mandoline dans la 7e). Musique subjective malgré certaines évocations sonores dues à la magie de l'instrumentation, cette symphonie est particulièrement significative de la manière de Malher. Malgré les exégèses et peut-être en dépit des indications de l'auteur lui-même, comment ne pas ressentir l'atmosphère des Alpes de Bavière où baigne tout le second mouvement, la manière de sérénade du 3e, avec ses «entrées» de mandoline et l'éclat de cuivres du 5e qui l'apparenteraient plus à une marche militaire qu'au titre de « rondo » qu'il porte ?

Musicien toujours en porte-à-faux entre ses réminiscences juives (3e mouvement) et sa culture germanique où il trouve ses modèles, Malher nous apparaît peu à peu tel qu'il fut : le Kafka de la musique. Il n'en est que plus grand.

André VIDAL.

L'AURORE
Lundi 26 avril 1971
SPECTACLES

MUSIQUE

Le Boston Symphony Orchestra au T.N.P.

UN Boeing en pilote automatique. Telle est l'impression que nous laissera le Boston Symphony Orchestra, après son unique concert de samedi soir au Palais de Chaillot.

Il y a quinze ans, la grande formation américaine avait enthousiasmé les foules sous les baguettes conjuguées de Charles Münch et Pierre Monteux. Sous celle de William Steinberg il en a été tout autrement. La preuve est faite désormais que le meilleur orchestre ne peut en aucun cas se passer d'un très grand chef.

Certes William Steinberg n'est pas n'importe qui et sa brillante carrière en porte témoignage ; il n'en est pas moins vrai qu'il nous a semblé bien terne à Chaillot et que sa direction a profondément affaibli le tonus de l'orchestre. Et quel orchestre pourtant ! Magnifique de musicalité, de [illegible]

On l'a vu dès l'ouverture de Leonore III, de Beethoven : une suprême sonorité. On a immédiatement senti aussi que cet orchestre éprouvait sous la baguette étriquée de Steinberg une sorte de gêne respiratoire, qu'il était obligé de fonctionner à l'économie.

Avec la 7e Symphonie, de Mahler, cette impression n'a fait que se préciser. Steinberg a gommé la générosité, le lyrisme du « langsam » initial aussi bien que les élans du cœur et les vagues rythmiques des deux « nachtmusik » médianes. Quant au rondo final, il nous a semblé durer une éternité et ne jamais trouver sa conclusion.

Mahler y est sans doute pour quelque chose mais Steinberg n'a rien fait pour alléger son propos. Au total, un concert assez décevant en regard de ce que l'on espérait. Le Boston Symphony Orchestra nous doit une [illegible] Beethoven [illegible] ans.

Pierre JULIEN.

argus
Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 87,0
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Zürcher Zeitung, Zürich
vom 21. Mai 197

3

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Abschluß der Europatournee in Paris

J. T. M. Anfang Mai spielte das Boston Symphony Orchestra in Paris; es war der Abschluß der etwa dreiwöchigen Europareise des Ensembles, die in London begonnen hatte, in der Osterzeit nach Berlin führte und nachher verschiedene Städte (vor allem Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt am Main und Bonn) einschloß. Das einzige Konzert in Paris wurde in der französischen Hauptstadt als der musikalische Höhepunkt der Saison empfunden und einmütig als das überragende Ereignis dieses Frühjahrs bezeichnet. Die 108 Musiker spielten unter der Leitung des jetzt 71jährigen, in Köln geborenen William Steinberg ein Programm, das von Beethoven die dritte «Leonoren»-Ouvertüre, Bachs Orchestersuite in h-moll und die Siebente Sinfonie von Gustav Mahler brachte. Steinberg, der in den USA vor allem das Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra und das Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra führte, leitet das Bostoner Orchester seit dem Rücktritt von Erich Leinsdorf (1969/70); er erwies sich als innerhalb seiner konservativen Grundhaltung suggestiver Dirigent von einem Klangsinn, der die fast unvergleichliche Ausgeglichenheit und Brillanz der Spieler in den Vordergrund rückt.

le Nouveau Courrier de la Presse
LIT TOUT
15, rue du Colonel Driant PARIS 1er Tél. 256-25-11
RIVAROL
354, rue St-Honoré
PARIS
-6 MAI 1971

LA MUSIQUE 79

HEUREUSEMENT, LES CONCERTS...

Dans le silence de notre Opéra (aphone jusqu'à quand ?), Paris a pu accueillir au concert quelques grandes vedettes du chant. Accompagnée par l'Orchestre de Paris (après Marilyn Horn), la célèbre cantatrice Montserrat-Caballé prêtait sa voix, la semaine dernière, aux quatre derniers lieder de Richard Strauss et (peut-être même avec une retenue excessive) au grand air de concert de Beethoven jeune « Ah ! Perfido ». Une véritable leçon de lyrisme.

Déception, en revanche, avec Eric Leindsdorf, qui pourtant dirigea pendant plusieurs années l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston : les cuivres étouffaient les autres instruments, aussi bien dans le « Don Quichott » de R. Strauss que dans la « Ve » de Beethoven.

Tout en se montrant sévère pour certains chefs d'orchestre, Maurice Bourgue, hautbois solo de notre « formation de prestige », regrettait le laisser-aller de trop de nos musiciens qui ont réellement besoin d'une autorité : il espère la trouver en Georg Solti.

C'est une grève surprise des chœurs et de l'orchestre de l'O.R.T.F. qui nous avaient privés d'entendre, en 1970, Montserrat-Caballé dans « Norma ». La quinzaine musicale de l'O.R.T.F., à 18 h. 30, au Théâtre de la Ville (inaugurée avec un George Sebastian très brillant), vient de montrer les possibilités de ces ensembles de grande classe.

Rosine SERRIER

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28, 1971

MUSIC IN FRANCE

Perfection, With Heart, From Boston

Int. Herald Trib.

By David Stevens

PARIS, April 27.—Too bad the concert last night by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in the aristocratic confines of the Château de La Muette could not, by some engineering miracle, have been shared by the 2,500-plus who cheered the final concert of the full orchestra's European tour Saturday in the vast space of the Théâtre National Populaire.

For one thing, they played a more representative group of works than the Mahler-dominated program Saturday, passing from Mozart to Beethoven by way of something brought from home, Walter Piston's deftly tailored and appealing quintet for wind instruments, and the sardonic, jazzy idiom of the instrumental suite from Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat."

For another, listening to these 12 players making music with and for each other would finally have dismantled the persistent notion that the great American orchestras are sound machines of heartless perfection. The perfection was there, all right, but inseparable from the music's inner impulse.

The Chamber Players are the first desks of the Boston Symphony—the remainder is the Boston Pops, now headed home for its traditional season on the banks of the Charles River while the smaller group stays in Europe for a while.

Concertmaster

First among this group of peers is the orchestra's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, whose violin tone has much in common with his name and who seems to maintain whatever outward communication is necessary with a face in perpetuum mobile.

The finely poised flute-playing of Doriot Anthony Dwyer was better served by Mozart's quartet (K. 285) than by the Bach Suite No. 2 that got a little bit lost in the TNP Saturday.

And in the Beethoven Septet (Opus 20), not only was the blend of strings and winds beyond praise, but so was the blend among the winds themselves—Harold Wright's clarinet, Sherman Walt's bassoon and David Ohanian's horn (deputizing for the ill James Stagliano). It did not detract a bit from this final piece on the program to remember that its first performance took place in just such surroundings—a musical soirée in Prince Schwarzenberg's town house in Vienna in 1800, and that the work was one of Beethoven's early and lasting successes.

Last night it was a benefit for the American Library in Paris. And while we are naming names, let's include the rest of this squad of aristocrats of orchestral musicians—violist Burton Fine, cellist Jules Eskin, oboist Ralph Gomberg, trumpeter Armando Ghitalla, trombonist William Gibson, bass fiddler Henry Portnoi and timpanist Everett Firth. They play again at Royaumont May 1, in Montpellier May 6 and in Bordeaux May 8.

222

AMITIES FRANCE ISRAEL
83, av. de la Grande Armée
PARIS XVI 6%
AVRIL 1971

Le Boston Symphony Orchestra

● Précédé de la réputation la plus flatteuse, due à ses enregistrements (1) et aux souvenirs de ses précédentes apparitions, le Boston Symphony Orchestra vient d'achever à Paris une tournée qui l'a conduit dans les principales capitales européennes. Le concert que ce groupe orchestral a donné au Palais de Chaillot a connu une telle affluence que nous fûmes de ceux qui durent se contenter d'une marche d'escalier pour y assister.

Placé aujourd'hui sous la direction de William Steinberg — il le fut jadis sous celle de Charles Munch — le Boston Symphony Orchestra est connu comme une des meilleures phalanges du monde. Renom pleinement justifié et si nous avons noté le nom de Joseph Silverstein comme premier violon, nous avons aussi retenu ceux de Fredy Ostrovsky, Léo Panasevich, Noah Bielski, Herman Siberman, Sheldon Rotenberg, Gerald Gelbloom, pour ne citer que ceux-là.

(1) Voir catalogue Deutsche Grammophon.

Le programme de ce concert groupait des œuvres de Beethoven (ouverture de Léonore III), Bach (Suite en Si) et Mahler (7e Symphonie). Si Beethoven et Bach pâtirent quelque peu de la disposition de la salle et de son acoustique particulière, Mahler devait être le grand triomphateur de la soirée. Cela devait être dû en partie à l'énorme déploiement orchestral que cette œuvre exige et aussi de ses constants scintillements de timbres. On sait que les symphonies de Mahler constituent des sortes de fresques d'une longueur imposante et mobilisent, outre les pupitres traditionnels et une nombreuse percussion, des instruments qu'on n'a pas l'habitude d'y voir figurer (cor de postillon dans la 3e, ténor horn et mandoline dans la 7e). Musique subjective malgré certaines évocations sonores dues à la magie de l'instrumentation, cette symphonie est particulièrement significative de la manière de Mahler. Malgré les exégèses et peut-être en dépit des indications de l'auteur lui-même, comment ne pas ressentir l'atmosphère des Alpes de Bavière où baigne tout le second mouvement, la manière de sérénade du 3e, avec ses «entrées» de mandoline et l'éclat de cuivres du 5e qui l'apparenteraient plus à une marche militaire qu'au titre de « rondo » qu'il porte ?

Musicien toujours en porte-à-faux entre ses réminiscences juives (3e mouvement) et sa culture germanique où il trouve ses modèles, Mahler nous apparaît peu à peu tel qu'il fut : le Kafka de la musique. Il n'en est que plus grand.

André VIDAL.

L'AURORE
Lundi 26 avril 1971
SPECTACLES

MUSIQUE

Le Boston Symphony Orchestra au T.N.P.

UN Boeing en pilote automatique. Telle est l'impression que nous laissera le Boston Symphony Orchestra, après son unique concert de samedi soir au Palais de Chaillot.

Il y a quinze ans, la grande formation américaine avait enthousiasmé les foules sous les baguettes conjuguées de Charles Münch et Pierre Montaux. Sous celle de William Steinberg il en a été tout autrement. La preuve est faite désormais que le meilleur orchestre ne peut en aucun cas se passer d'un très grand chef.

Certes William Steinberg n'est pas n'importe qui et sa brillante carrière en porte témoignage ; il n'en est pas moins vrai qu'il nous a semblé bien terne à Chaillot et que sa direction a profondément affecté le tonus de l'orchestre. Et quel orchestre pourtant ! Magnifique de musicalité, de [illegible]

On l'a vu dès l'ouverture de Leonore III, de Beethoven : une suprême sonorité. On a immédiatement senti aussi que cet orchestre éprouvait sous la baguette étriquée de Steinberg une sorte de gêne respiratoire, qu'il était obligé de fonctionner à l'économie.

Avec la 7e Symphonie, de Mahler, cette impression n'a fait que se préciser. Steinberg a gommé la générosité, le lyrisme du « langsam » initial aussi bien que les élans du cœur et les vagues rythmiques des deux « nachtmusik » médianes. Quant au rondo final, il nous a semblé durer une éternité et ne jamais trouver sa conclusion.

Mahler y est sans doute pour quelque chose mais Steinberg n'a rien fait pour alléger son propos. Au total, un concert assez décevant en regard de ce que l'on espérait. Le Boston Symphony Orchestra nous doit une revanche. Espérons avant quinze ans.

Pierre JULIEN.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (i. Ts.): 87,0
– It. „Leitfaden 1971
Ausschnitt aus:
Neue Zürcher Zeitung, Zürich
vom 21. Mai 197

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Abschluß der Europatournee in Paris

J. T. M. Anfang Mai spielte das Boston Symphony Orchestra in Paris; es war der Abschluß der etwa dreiwöchigen Europareise des Ensembles, die in London begonnen hatte, in der Osterzeit nach Berlin führte und nachher verschiedene Städte (vor allem Hannover, Hamburg, Frankfurt am Main und Bonn) einschloß. Das einzige Konzert in Paris wurde in der französischen Hauptstadt als der musikalische Höhepunkt der Saison empfunden und einmütig als das überragende Ereignis dieses Frühjahrs bezeichnet. Die 108 Musiker spielten unter der Leitung des jetzt 71jährigen, in Köln geborenen William Steinberg ein Programm, das von Beethoven die dritte «Leonoren»-Ouvertüre, Bachs Orchestersuite in h-moll und die Siebente Sinfonie von Gustav Mahler brachte. Steinberg, der in den USA vor allem das Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra und das Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra führte, leitet das Bostoner Orchester seit dem Rücktritt von Erich Leinsdorf (1969/70); er erwies sich als innerhalb seiner konservativen Grundhaltung suggestiver Dirigent von einem Klangsinn, der die fast unvergleichliche Ausgeglichenheit und Brillanz der Spieler in den Vordergrund rückt.

le Nouveau Courrier de la Presse
LIT TOUT
15, rue du Colonel Driant PARIS 1er Tél. 236-25-11
RIVAROL
354, rue St-Honoré
PARIS
-6 MAI 1971

LA MUSIQUE 71

HEUREUSEMENT, LES CONCERTS...

Dans le silence de notre Opéra (aphone jusques à quand ?), Paris a pu accueillir au concert quelques grandes vedettes du chant. Accompagnée par l'Orchestre de Paris (après Marilyn Horn), la célèbre cantatrice Montserrat-Caballe prêtait sa voix, la semaine dernière, aux quatre derniers lieder de Richard Strauss et (peut-être même avec une retenue excessive) au grand air de concert de Beethoven jeune « Ah ! Perfido ». Une véritable leçon de lyrisme.

Déception, en revanche, avec Eric Leindsdorf, qui pourtant dirigea pendant plusieurs années l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston : les cuivres étouffaient les autres instruments, aussi bien dans le « Don Quichott » de R. Strauss que dans la « Ve » de Beethoven.

Tout en se montrant sévère pour certains chefs d'orchestre, Maurice Bourgue, hautbois solo de notre « formation de prestige », regrettait le laisser-aller de trop de nos musiciens qui ont réellement besoin d'une autorité : il espère la trouver en Georg Solti.

C'est une grève surprise des chœurs et de l'orchestre de l'O.R.T.F. qui nous avaient privés d'entendre, en 1970, Montserrat-Caballe dans « Norma ». La quinzaine musicale de l'O.R.T.F., à 18 h. 30, au Théâtre de la Ville (inaugurée avec un George Sebastian très brillant), vient de montrer les possibilités de ces ensembles de grande classe.

Rosine SERRIER

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28, 1971

MUSIC IN FRANCE

Perfection, With Heart, From Boston

By David Stevens

PARIS, April 27.—Too bad the concert last night by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in the aristocratic confines of the Château de La Muette could not, by some engineering miracle, have been shared by the 2,500-plus who cheered the final concert of the full orchestra's European tour Saturday in the vast space of the Théâtre National Populaire.

For one thing, they played a more representative group of works than the Mahler-dominated program Saturday, passing from Mozart to Beethoven by way of something brought from home, Walter Piston's deftly tailored and appealing quintet for wind instruments, and the sardonic, jazzy idiom of the instrumental suite from Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat."

For another, listening to these 12 players making music with and for each other would finally have dismantled the persistent notion that the great American orchestras are sound machines of heartless perfection. The perfection was there, all right, but inseparable from the music's inner impulse.

The Chamber Players are the first desks of the Boston Symphony—the remainder is the Boston Pops, now headed home for its traditional season on the banks of the Charles River while the smaller group stays in Europe for a while.

Concertmaster

First among this group of peers is the orchestra's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, whose violin tone has much in common with his name and who seems to maintain whatever outward communication is necessary with a face in perpetuum mobile.

The finely poised flute-playing of Doriot Anthony Dwyer was better served by Mozart's quartet (K. 285) than by the Bach Suite No. 2 that got a little bit lost in the TNP Saturday.

And in the Beethoven Septet (Opus 20), not only was the blend of strings and winds beyond praise, but so was the blend among the winds themselves—Harold Wright's clarinet, Sherman Walt's bassoon and David Ohanian's horn (deputizing for the ill James Stagliano). It did not detract a bit from this final piece on the program to remember that its first performance took place in just such surroundings—a musical soirée in Prince Schwarzenberg's town house in Vienna in 1800, and that the work was one of Beethoven's early and lasting successes.

Last night it was a benefit for the American Library in Paris. And while we are naming names, let's include the rest of this squad of aristocrats of orchestral musicians—violist Burton Fine, cellist Jules Eskin, oboist Ralph Gomberg, trumpeter Armando Ghitalla, trombonist William Gibson, bass fiddler Henry Portnoi and timpanist Everett Firth. They play again at Royaumont May 1, in Montpellier May 6 and in Bordeaux May 8.

No 8329 Mardi 27 Avril 1971

COMBAT

LA MUSIQUE par Marcel SCHNEIDER

LE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA A PARIS

Chacun sait que le Boston Symphony Orchestra est l'un des meilleurs du monde. Il y a quatorze ans qu'il ne s'était pas produit à Paris : il n'a rien perdu de sa qualité, de sa fougue, de sa discipline et de sa merveilleuse sonorité. C'est un plaisir qui nous advient rarement que d'entendre un ensemble qui sonne avec autant d'éclat et de pureté et qui soit aussi strictement exercé. Tout est admirablement dosé, mis au point, tous les effets sont calculés et réalisés avec un art extrême. On ne se lasse pas d'admirer le moelleux et la transparence des cordes, la fraîcheur et la poésie des bois, la vigueur et la virtuosité des cuivres. Dire que nous avons l'équivalent en France serait mentir : nous possédons des musiciens qui, pris individuellement, pourraient recevoir les mêmes louanges, mais point d'ensembles qui mettent si bien en valeur leurs qualités propres. Le Symphonique de Boston, formé dans les années 20 par Koussevitsky et que Charles Munch dirigea de 1950 à 1962, a eu la chance de travailler avec des chefs illustres qui étaient à la fois de grands artistes et de merveilleux techniciens.

ciens pour la flamme, la fougue, pour le génie qui conduit à illuminer et transfigurer les œuvres. C'est un analyste habile à mettre tout en place, à faire entendre chaque instrument, à en doser l'importance et les effets, à définir les mouvements et les structures. C'est d'un art scrupuleux et solide, fruit d'un long travail et d'une sévère discipline, mais rien qui enlève, qui soulève, qui mette en contact direct avec l'esprit du musicien. Qu'il s'agisse de Léonore III, de la Suite en si mineur ou de la Septième Symphonie de Mahler, nous restons toujours en deçà de ce que nous attendons. L'esprit de géométrie l'emporte sur l'esprit de finesse, pour reprendre la fameuse distinction de Pascal.

Nous écoutons le merveilleux Symphonique de Boston avec d'autant plus d'attention et de délectation, goûtant chaque sonorité, chaque trait de virtuosité de ces instrumentistes si brillants quand ils doivent jouer en solistes et si somptueusement confondus quand ils s'expriment tous ensemble. On comprend que Boston soit fier de posséder pareil orchestre et le

COMBAT: Tuesday, April 27, 1971

MUSIC: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN PARIS

Everyone knows that the Boston Symphony is one of the best in the world. It has been fourteen years since they were last heard in Paris: they have lost none of their quality, their fire, their discipline or their marvelous sonority. It is a pleasure we rarely enjoy to hear an ensemble which resounds with such brilliance and such purity, and at the same time with such discipline. Everything is calculated just right, and all the effects are realized with extreme care. One doesn't tire of admiring the velvetiness and transparence of the strings, the freshness and poetry of the winds, the vigor and virtuosity of the brass. To say that we have their equal in France would be false: we have musicians who, taken individually, would be worthy of the same praise, but we have no ensembles who possess their precise qualities. The Boston Symphony, which had its formative years in the Twenties under Koussevitsky and which Charles Munch conducted from 1950 to 1962, has had the chance to work under illustrious conductors who were at the same time great artists and marvelous technicians. Its present Music Director, William Steinberg, cannot compete with his predecessors for the fire, the spirit and the genius that go into illuminating and transforming musical works. He is a very good analyst for putting everything in its place, for making each instrumental line clearly heard, for balancing the importance of effects, for defining movements and structures. His is a very scrupulous and solid skill, the fruit of long work and a severe discipline, but there is nothing which carries you away and puts you in direct contact with the spirit of the composer. Whether it was the Leonore Overture No. 3, the Suite in B minor, or the Seventh Symphony of Mahler, we always remained somewhat deceived by what we had hoped for. The spirit of the geometer prevailed over the spirit of the artist, to borrow the famous distinction of Pascal.

We listened to the marvelous Boston Symphony with total attention and pleasure, enjoying each sonority, each virtuosic manifestation of these ~~xxxxxxxx~~ instrumentalists, so brilliant when they play as soloists, and so sumptuously blended when they play together. We understand that Boston is so rightly proud of having such an orchestra; we envy them it, and we would like to tell them of the joy we had in hearing it.

No 8329 Mardi 27 Avril 1971

COMBAT

de la Résistance à la Révolution

LA MUSIQUE par Marcel SCHNEIDER

LE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA A PARIS

Chacun sait que le Boston Symphony Orchestra est l'un des meilleurs du monde. Il y a quatorze ans qu'il ne s'était pas produit à Paris : Il n'a rien perdu de sa qualité, de sa fougue, de sa discipline et de sa merveilleuse sonorité. C'est un plaisir qui nous advient rarement que d'entendre un ensemble qui sonne avec autant d'éclat et de pureté et qui soit aussi strictement exercé. Tout est admirablement dosé, mis au point, tous les effets sont calculés et réalisés avec un art extrême. On ne se lasse pas d'admirer le moelleux et la transparence des cordes, la fraîcheur et la poésie des bois, la vigueur et la virtuosité des cuivres. Dire que nous avons l'équivalent en France serait mentir : nous possédons des musiciens qui, pris individuellement, pourraient recevoir les mêmes louanges, mais point d'ensembles qui mettent si bien en valeur leurs qualités propres. Le Symphonique de Boston, formé dans les années 20 par Koussevitsky et que Charles Munch dirigea de 1950 à 1962, a eu la chance de travailler avec des chefs illustres qui étaient à la fois de grands artistes et de remarquables techniciens.

[illegible]

ciers pour la flamme, la fougue, pour le génie qui consiste à illuminer et transfigurer les œuvres. C'est un analyste habile à mettre tout en place, à faire entendre chaque instrument, à en doser l'importance et les effets, à définir les mouvements et les structures. C'est d'un art scrupuleux et solide, fruit d'un long travail et d'une sévère discipline, mais rien qui enlève, qui soulève, qui mette en contact direct avec l'esprit du musicien. Qu'il s'agisse de Léonore III, de la Suite en si mineur ou de la Septième Symphonie de Mahler, nous restons toujours en deçà de ce que nous attendons. L'esprit de géométrie l'emporte sur l'esprit de finesse, pour reprendre la fameuse distinction de Pascal.

Nous écoutons le merveilleux Symphonique de Boston avec d'autant plus d'attention et de délectation, goûtant chaque sonorité, chaque trait de virtuosité de ces instrumentistes si brillants quand ils doivent jouer en solistes et si somptueusement confondus quand ils s'expriment tous ensemble. On comprend que Boston soit fier de posséder pareil orchestre, on le [illegible]

[illegible]

COMBAT: Tuesday, April 27, 1971

MUSIC: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN PARIS

Everyone knows that the Boston Symphony is one of the best in the world. It has been fourteen years since they were last heard in Paris: they have lost none of their quality, their fire, their discipline or their marvelous sonority. It is a pleasure we rarely enjoy to hear an ensemble which resounds with such brilliance and such purity, and at the same time with such discipline. Everything is calculated just right, and all the effects are realized with extreme care. One doesn't tire of admiring the velvetiness and transparence of the strings, the freshness and poetry of the winds, the vigor and virtuosity of the brass. To say that we have their equal in France would be false: we have musicians who, taken individually, would be worthy of the same praise, but we have no ensembles who possess their precise qualities. The Boston Symphony, which had its formative years in the Twenties under Koussevitsky and which Charles Munch conducted from 1950 to 1962, has had the chance to work under illustrious conductors who were at the same time great artists and marvelous technicians. Its present Music Director, William Steinberg, cannot compete with his predecessors for the fire, the spirit and the genius that go into illuminating and transforming musical works. He is a very good analyst for putting everything in its place, for making each instrumental line clearly heard, for balancing the importance of effects, for defining movements and structures. His is a very scrupulous and solid skill, the fruit of long work and a severe discipline, but there is nothing which carries you away and puts you in direct contact with the spirit of the composer. Whether it was the Leonore Overture No. 3, the Suite in B minor, or the Seventh Symphony of Mahler, we always remained somewhat deceived by what we had hoped for. The spirit of the geometer prevailed over the spirit of the artist, to borrow the famous distinction of Pascal.

We listened to the marvelous Boston Symphony with total attention and pleasure, enjoying each sonority, each virtuosic manifestation of these ~~xxxxxxxx~~ instrumentalists, so brilliant when they play as soloists, and so sumptuously blended when they play together. We understand that Boston is so rightly proud of having such an orchestra; we envy them it, and we would like to tell them of the joy we had in hearing it.

LE GUIDE DU CONCERT/ May 8, 1971

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra"

Preceded by a favorable and deserved reputation, surrounded by all its fans, having crossed the Atlantic, the Boston Symphony showed up in Paris at the Palais de CHaillot.

We have too high an opinion of the recordings made with the famous "Phalanx" under Munch and, more recently, under Claudio Abbado (Daphnis and Chloe) to deny its great qualities. Unfortunately, the other evening we went away with a somewhat empty stomach.

Of course, this orchestra is often perfect, it is musical "hand-embroidery". But for all that, the other evening it lacked a bit of spirit! Barely two weeks before, I had heard the Leonore Overture N° 3 directed by Karajan with the Berlin Philharmonic, and there is simply no comparison to be made between that reading and the one by the Bostonians, who seemed a bit dull in comparison.

The Suite N° 2 in B minor of Bach confirmed the perfect vigor of these musicians and the very beautiful technique of the flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, who played with velocity and musicality without ever pushing. Her tone, however, does not possess all the colorations of a Jean-Pierre Rampal.

Finally, in the Seventh Symphony of Mahler (alas, so rarely played in France) the Boston Symhony once again showed all its qualities perfectly focused, underlining how much this symphony already makes us think of Bartok and Prokofiev: unfortunately what it all lacked was that final, grand touch of lyricism without which any work of Mahler is incomplete.

William Steinberg, the Music Director of the Orchestra, and formerly chief of the Cologne Opera, is, however, an accomplished musician; the other evening he just couldn't communicate to his orchestra that Mahlerian ambiance so difficult to find. (We heard later that Mr. Steinberg was ill during the concert.) In spite of these reservations on the interpretation, we very much admire the remarkable cohesion of this orchestra, whose forthcoming recording of Holst's The Planets we await with impatience. We also regret not being able to hear, as a conductor, Mr. Michael Tilson Thomas who played the harpsichord during the Bach Suite and who seems a remarkable musician!

Le Guide du Concert
8 Mai 1971.

Orchestre symphonique de Boston

Précédé d'une réputation flatteuse et méritée, entouré de tous ses « fans », ayant passé l'Atlantique, l'Orchestre de Boston s'est produit à Paris, au Palais de Chaillot.

Nous aimons trop les enregistrements réalisés sous la célèbre « Phalange » comme ceux de Munch et plus récemment celui, admirable, où Claudio Abaddo dirigeait Daphnis et Chloé (voir Guide n° 579) pour nier ses grandes qualités. Malheureusement, nous sommes restés un peu sur notre faim l'autre soir !

Certes, cet orchestre est souvent parfait, c'est du « cousu-main » musical ! Mais tout cela manque vraiment un peu d'âme ! J'avais entendu, à peine quinze jours avant l'ouverture de Léonore III par la Philharmonie berlinoise, dirigée par Karajan, et j'avoue qu'il n'y a aucune comparaison à faire, entre cette exécution et celle des musiciens de Boston, qui semblaient un peu ternes en comparaison.

La suite en si mineur n° 2 de Jean-Sébastien Bach confirma encore la vigueur parfaite de ces musiciens, et la très belle technique de la flûtiste Doriot Antony Dwyer, jouant avec vélocité et musicalité, sans jamais « appuyer ». Sa sonorité n'a cependant pas toutes les colorations d'un Jean-Pierre Rampal.

Enfin, dans la Septième Symphonie de Mahler, que l'on joue si rarement en France, hélas ! l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston montra encore toutes ses qualités par une parfaite mise en place, nous montrant bien combien cette symphonie faisait déjà penser à Bartok et Prokofiev ; malheureusement, il manquait ce grand souffle lyrique, sans lequel toute œuvre de Mahler n'est pas complète.

William Steinberg, directeur titulaire de l'orchestre, et ancien responsable de l'Opéra de Cologne, est pourtant un musicien accompli, mais il ne sut pas ce soir-là, communiquer à son orchestre (1) cette ambiance mahlérienne si difficile à trouver ! Malgré ces réserves, sur l'interprétation, nous sommes très admiratifs envers la cohésion remarquable de cet orchestre, dont nous attendons avec impatience les prochains enregistrements dont les planètes de Holst. Nous regrettons également beaucoup de ne pas avoir pu applaudir comme chef, Michael Tilson Thomas, qui tenait le clavecin pendant la Suite de Bach et qui semble un musicien remarquable !

Clym.

(1) Nous avons appris par la suite que W. Steinberg était souffrant.

LE GUIDE DU CONCERT/ May 8, 1971

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra"

Preceded by a favorable and deserved reputation, surrounded by all its fans, having crossed the Atlantic, the Boston Symphony showed up in Paris at the Palais de CHaillot.

We have too high an opinion of the recordings made with the famous "Phalanx" under Munch and, more recently, under Claudio Abbado (Daphnis and Chloe) to deny its great qualities. Unfortunately, the other evening we went away with a somewhat empty stomach.

Of course, this orchestra is often perfect, it is musical "hand-embroidery". But for all that, the other evening it lacked a bit of spirit! Barely two weeks before, I had heard the Leonore Overture N° 3 directed by Karajan with the Berlin Philharmonic, and there is simply no comparison to be made between that reading and the one by the Bostonians, who seemed a bit dull in comparison.

The Suite N° 2 in B minor of Bach confirmed the perfect vigor of these musicians and the very beautiful technique of the flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, who played with velocity and musicality without ever pushing. Her tone, however, does not possess all the colorations of a Jean-Pierre Rampal.

Finally, in the Seventh Symphony of Mahler (alas, so rarely played in France) the Boston Symhony once again snowed all its qualities perfectly focused, underlining how much this symphony already makes us think of Bartok and Prokofiev: unfortunately what it all lacked was that final, grand touch of lyricism without which any work of Mahler is incomplete.

William Steinberg, the Music Director of the Orchestra, and formerly chief of the Cologne Opera, is, however, an accomplished musician; the other evening he just couldn't communicate to his orchestra that Mahlerian ambiance so difficult to find./ (We heard later that Mr. Steinberg was ill during the concert.) In spite of these reservations on the interpretation, we very much admire the remarkable cohesion of this orchestra, whose forthcoming recording of Holst's The Planets we await with impatience. We also regret not being able to hear, as a conductor, Mr. Michael Tilson Thomas who played the harpsichord during the Bach Suite and who seems a remarkable musician!

Le Guide du Concert
8 Mai 1971.

Orchestre symphonique de Boston

Précédé d'une réputation flatteuse et méritée, entouré de tous ses « fans », ayant passé l'Atlantique, l'Orchestre de Boston s'est produit à Paris, au Palais de Chaillot.

Nous aimons trop les enregistrements réalisés sous la célèbre « Phalange » comme ceux de Munch et plus récemment celui, admirable, où Claudio Abaddo dirigeait Daphnis et Chloé (voir Guide n° 579) pour nier ses grandes qualités. Malheureusement, nous sommes restés un peu sur notre faim l'autre soir !

Certes, cet orchestre est souvent parfait, c'est du « cousu-main » musical ! Mais tout cela manque vraiment un peu d'âme ! J'avais entendu, à peine quinze jours avant l'ouverture de Léonore III par la Philharmonie berlinoise, dirigée par Karajan, et j'avoue qu'il n'y a aucune comparaison à faire, entre cette exécution et celle des musiciens de Boston, qui semblaient un peu ternes en comparaison.

La suite en si mineur n° 2 de Jean-Sébastien Bach confirma encore la vigueur parfaite de ces musiciens, et la très belle technique de la flûtiste Doriot Antony Dwyer, jouant avec vélocité et musicalité, sans jamais « appuyer ». Sa sonorité n'a cependant pas toutes les colorations d'un Jean-Pierre Rampal.

Enfin, dans la Septième Symphonie de Mahler, que l'on joue si rarement en France, hélas ! l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston montra encore toutes ses qualités par une parfaite mise en place, nous montrant bien combien cette symphonie faisait déjà penser à Bartok et Prokofiev ; malheureusement, il manquait ce grand souffle lyrique, sans lequel toute œuvre de Mahler n'est pas complète.

William Steinberg, directeur titulaire de l'orchestre, et ancien responsable de l'Opéra de Cologne, est pourtant un musicien accompli, mais il ne sut pas ce soir-là, communiquer à son orchestre (1) cette ambiance mahlérienne si difficile à trouver ! Malgré ces réserves, sur l'interprétation, nous sommes très admiratifs envers la cohésion remarquable de cet orchestre, dont nous attendons avec impatience les prochains enregistrements dont les planètes de Holst. Nous regrettons également beaucoup de ne pas avoir pu applaudir comme chef, Michael Tilson Thomas, qui tenait le clavecin pendant la Suite de Bach et qui semble un musicien remarquable !

Clym.

(1) Nous avons appris par la suite que W. Steinberg était souffrant.

boston symphony chamber players on tour

london

Boston Arch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
THE TATLER & BYSTANDER
19, BERKELEY STREET,
LONDON, W.1
ISSUE DATED
JUN 1971

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing in the Banqueting Hall.

Lady Joubert De La Ferte and Mrs. Bliss Morris.

Sir Gilbert and Lady Inglefield.

Boston Symphony Concert

Photographs taken by Desmond O'Neill at a champagne supper which was held at Dartmouth House, Berkeley Square, the headquarters of the English-Speaking Union after a concert given by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players at the Banqueting House, Whitehall, during their European tour. The evening was held in aid of the E.S.U.

Right: Mrs. A. D. Dodds-Parker.

Lady Sherfield and Mr. William Weld.

Lady De Freitas.

Sir Leslie and Lady O'Brien.

Lady Rayleigh and Lord Sherfield.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Villiers.

Mrs. Edward Norman-Butler and Philippa Viscountess Astor.

Mr. Keith Jeffery, Lady Bromley-Davenport and Mr. Gilbert Longden, M.P.

Sally Duchess of Westminster.

Viscountess Eccles.

Mr. Talcott Banks and Mrs. C. Pertzoff.

Mr. and Mrs. William Channing.

Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Don.

Mrs. E. W. Pevere and Mr. A. D. Dodds-Parker, M.P.

Boston arch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE TATLER & BYSTANDER
15, BERKELEY STREET,
LONDON, W.1

ISSUE
DATED

JAN 1971

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing in the Banqueting Hall.

Lady Joubert De La Ferte and Mrs. Bliss Morris.

Sir Gilbert and Lady Inglefield.

Boston Symphony Concert

Photographs taken by Desmond O'Neill at a champagne supper which was held at Dartmouth House, Berkeley Square, the headquarters of the English-Speaking Union after a concert given by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players at the Banqueting House, Whitehall, during their European tour. The evening was held in aid of the E.S.U.

Right: Mrs. A. D. Dodds-Parker.

Lady Sherfield and Mr. William Weld.

Lady De Freitas.

Sir Leslie and Lady O'Brien.

Lady Rayleigh and Lord Sherfield.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Villiers.

Mrs. Edward Norman-Butler and Philippa Viscountess Astor.

Mr. Keith Jeffery, Lady Bromley-Davenport and Mr. Gilbert Longden, M.P.

Sally Duchess of Westminster.

Viscountess Eccles.

Mr. Talcott Banks and Mrs. C. Pertzoff.

Mr. and Mrs. William Channing.

Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Don.

Mrs. E. W. Pevere and Mr. A. D. Dodds-Parker, M.P.

226 munich

A VISIT THROUGH THE BACK DOOR

The Boston Symphony Players in Munich

A dozen musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came through the back door of a business performance into the Herkules Hall, which was the smaller one, belonging to the academy of the sciences. The Deutsche Grammophone called their managers and producers from Europe and overseas to Munich. This way the European tour of this famous orchestra didn't pass us without a trace. The Boston Symphony Players are a variable ensemble of gentlemen from the first chairs. Because of a strike on the airports which confused the dates, sheet music, and instruments, they were forced to improvise in street clothes; not a very easy job after three weeks of concert tours.

Mozart's Oboe Quartet sounded like a trumpet concerto. Ralph Gomberg showed a tone volume which surpasses the usual sound of an oboe. In Beethoven's Septet the strong lung power of the clarinetist Harold Wright and the Bassoonist Sherman Walt dominated. The highly praised concert-master Joseph Silverstein proved to be a violinist of the sensitive, sensous, so called "Viennese" direction. DGG's own pianist Roberto Szidon took the place of the assistant conductor of the Bostonians, Michael Tilson Thomas. It wasn't a bad replacement as Szidon played Schubert, Debussy and Villa-Lobos very poeticly and colorfully. The chamber musical essence of the Bostonians confirmed as soloists what had been said about the orchestra after the concerts in Stuttgart. Here we have a combination of idolatry of the formative and virtuoso controlled instrumental sound.

K.Sch.

argus
Seit 1867
Auflage (i. Ts.): 269,5
— lt. „Leitfaden 1971 —
Ausschnitt aus:
Süddeutsche Zeitung, München
vom 30. Apr. 1971

3

Besuch durch die Hintertüre

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players in München

Durch die Hintertüre einer Firmenveranstaltung — die Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft rief ihre Manager und Produzenten aus Europa und Übersee nach München — kam doch noch ein Dutzend Musiker des Boston Symphony Orchestra in den Herkulessaal, wenn auch in den kleinen Herkulessaal, der sonst der Akademie der Wissenschaften gehört. So ging die Europareise des berühmten Orchesters nicht ganz spurlos an uns vorbei. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players sind ein variables Ensemble von Herren an den ersten Pulten. Vom Bummelstreik auf den Flughäfen, der Termine, Notenmaterial und Instrumente durcheinander brachte, wurden sie zum Improvisieren im Straßenanzug genötigt; keine leichte Aufgabe nach drei Wochen Konzertreise.

Mozarts Oboenquartett klang fast wie ein Trompetenkonzert; Ralph Gomberg zeigte ein Tonvolumen, das den üblichen Oboenklang überschreitet. In Beethovens Septett dominierten die herkulischen Lungenkräfte des Klarinettisten Harold Wright und des Fagottisten Sherman Walt; der vielgerühmte erste Konzertmeister Joseph Silverstein zeigte sich als Geiger der sensitiven, sinnlichen, sozusagen „wienerischen" Richtung. Für Michael Tilson Thomas, den Associate Conductor der Bostoner, sprang der gleichfalls DGG-eigene Pianist Roberto Szidon ein; es war kein schlechter Tausch, denn Szidon spielte Schubert, Debussy und Villa-Lobos sehr poetisch und farbig. Der kammermusikalische Extrakt der Bostoner bekräftigte im Solistischen, was nach dem Stuttgarter Gastkonzert über das ganze Orchester gesagt wurde: Hier handelt es sich um eine Vereinigung von Fetischisten des großen, plastischen und virtuos beherrschten Instrumentaltones.

K. Sch.

L'AURORE

Mercredi 28 avril 1971

PIERRE JULIEN

au château de la Muette

Le Boston Symphony Chamber Orchestra

AYANT laissé le gros de la troupe regagner l'Amérique après trois semaines d'une tournée européenne qui s'est terminée au palais de Chaillot, samedi dernier, les douze chefs de pupitre de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston réunis sous l'étiquette de « Boston Symphony Chamber Players », se sont attardés quelques jours en France où ils donneront encore trois concerts publics : samedi 1er mai, à 17 heures, à l'Abbaye de Royaumont, et les 6 et 8 mai, à Bordeaux et Montpellier.

Pour avoir entendu les douze musiciens américains au cours d'une soirée de gala lundi soir, au château de la Muette, à Paris, j'engage chaudement les mélomanes de la région parisienne ainsi que ceux du Sud-Ouest et du Midi à ne manquer sous aucun prétexte les concerts à venir.

L'orchestre de chambre de Moscou et quelques rares autres formations réduites de grand renom comme l'Amadeus Quartet exceptés, cet ensemble de musique de chambre est peut-être le plus beau qui nous ait été donné d'entendre depuis des années.

Chacun des douze solistes possède au suprême degré une carrière de concertiste international. Le violon de Joseph Silverstein n'a rien à envier à celui d'un Gitlis ou d'un Ferras, le violoncelle de Jules Eskin résonne avec autant de chaleur que celui d'un Fournier ou d'un Gendron.

Il en est de même de l'alto, de la flûte, etc. Il y a là une conjonction de talents tout à fait exceptionnelle.

Plus étonnante encore est la cohésion de l'ensemble : elle est inespérée de la part de musiciens appartenant à un orchestre symphonique et qui, à ce titre, n'ont que peu de leur temps à consacrer à la musique de chambre.

Il faut vraiment des artistes hors de pair pour parvenir au degré de perfection sonore et d'équilibre instrumental qui ont été, l'autre soir, les éléments caractéristiques aussi bien de l'interprétation du quatuor avec flûte de Mozart que de celle de « L'Histoire du soldat », de Stravinski ou du Septuor op. 20, de Beethoven que, pour ma part, je n'avais jamais entendu interprété avec autant de suavité.

Avec de tels chefs de pupitre, il n'est plus étonnant que l'orchestre symphonique [illegible]

paris

L'AURORE: Wednesday, April 28, 1971

AT THE CHATEAU DE LA MUETTE: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

Having left the larger part of the group to return to America after a three-week European tour which finished Saturday at the Palais de Chaillot, the twelve first-chair players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the name of the "Boston Symphony Chamber Players", have stayed behind in France for several days where they will give three more public concerts: Saturday, May 1, at 5 o'clock at the Royaumont Abbey, and May 6 and 8, at Bordeaux and Montpellier.

After hearing the twelve American musicians in the course of a gala concert Monday evening at the Chateau de la Muette in Paris, I urge the music-lovers of the Parisian, as well as of the Southwest and Central regions, not to miss under any circumstances the coming concerts.

Except for the Moscow Chamber Orchestra and several other rare ensembles of this size like the Amadeus Quartet, this chamber music group is perhaps the most beautiful we have heard for years.

Each of the twelve soloists is the absolute master of his instrument and each of them could doubtless have the career of an international soloist. The violinist, Joseph Silverstein, has nothing to envy in a Gitlis or a Ferras, and the cello of Jules Eskin resounds with as much warmth as that of a Fournier or a Gendron.

The same must be said for the viola, the flute, and so on. Here is a completely exceptional association of talents.

Even more stunning is the unity of the ensemble: it is unhoped for on the part of musicians belonging to a symphony orchestra who, for this reason, have very little time to dedicate to chamber music. Really incomparable artists are needed to reach the degree of sonorous perfection and instrumental balance which characterized, the night before last, the interpretation of the Mozart flute quartet, the "Histoire du Soldat" of Stravinsky, or the Beethoven Septet, op. 20, which I, speaking for myself, have never heard played so suavely.

With first-chair players like these, it is no wonder that the Boston Symphony is what it is: one of the greatest in the world.

L'AURORE

Mercredi 28 avril 1971

PIERRE JULIEN

au château de la Muette

Le Boston Symphony Chamber Orchestra

AYANT laissé le gros de la troupe regagner l'Amérique après trois semaines d'une tournée européenne qui s'est terminée au palais de Chaillot, samedi dernier, les douze chefs de pupitre de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston réunis sous l'étiquette de « Boston Symphony Chamber Players », se sont attardés quelques jours en France où ils donneront encore trois concerts publics : samedi 1er mai, à 17 heures, à l'abbaye de Royaumont, et les 6 et 8 mai, à Bordeaux et Montpellier.

Pour avoir entendu les douze musiciens américains au cours d'une soirée de gala lundi soir, au château de la Muette, à Paris, j'engage vivement les mélomanes de la région parisienne ainsi que ceux du Sud-Ouest et du Midi à ne manquer sous aucun prétexte les concerts à venir.

L'orchestre de chambre de Moscou et quelques rares autres formations réduites de grand renom comme l'Amadeus Quartet exceptés, cet ensemble de musique de chambre est peut-être le plus beau qui nous ait été donné d'entendre depuis des années.

Chacun des douze solistes possède au suprême degré [illegible] une carrière de concertiste international. Le violon de Joseph Silverstein n'a rien à envier à celui d'un Gitlis ou d'un Ferras, le violoncelle de Jules Eskin sonne avec autant de chaleur que celui d'un Fournier ou d'un Gendron.

Il en est de même de l'alto, de la flûte, etc. Il y a là une conjonction de talents tout à fait exceptionnelle.

Plus étonnante encore est la cohésion de l'ensemble ; elle est inespérée de la part de musiciens appartenant à un orchestre symphonique et qui, à ce titre, n'ont que peu de leur temps à consacrer à la musique de chambre.

Il faut vraiment des artistes hors de pair pour parvenir au degré de perfection sonore et d'équilibre instrumental qui ont été, l'autre soir, les éléments caractéristiques aussi bien de l'interprétation du quatuor avec flûte de Mozart que de celle de « L'Histoire du soldat », de Stravinski ou du Septuor op. 20, de Beethoven que, pour ma part, je n'avais jamais entendu interprété avec autant de suavité.

Avec de tels chefs de pupitre, il n'est plus étonnant que l'orchestre symphonique de Boston soit [illegible] l'un des plus parfaits du monde.

paris

L'AURORE: Wednesday, April 28, 1971

AT THE CHATEAU DE LA MUETTE: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

Having left the larger part of the group to return to America after a three-week European tour which finished Saturday at the Palais de Chaillot, the twelve first-chair players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the name of the "Boston Symphony Chamber Players", have stayed behind in France for several days where they will give three more public concerts: Saturday, May 1, at 5 o'clock at the Royaumont Abbey, and May 6 and 8, at Bordeaux and Montpellier.

After hearing the twelve American musicians in the course of a gala concert Monday evening at the Chateau de la Muette in Paris, I urge the music-lovers of the Parisian, as well as of the Southwest and Central regions, not to miss under any circumstances the coming concerts.

Except for the Moscow Chamber Orchestra and several other rare ensembles of this size like the Amadeus Quartet, this chamber music group is perhaps the most beautiful we have heard for years.

Each of the twelve soloists is the absolute master of his instrument and each of them could doubtless have the career of an international soloist. The violinist, Joseph Silverstein, has nothing to envy in a Gitlis or a Ferras, and the cello of Jules Eskin resounds with as much warmth as that of a Fournier or a Gendron.

The same must be said for the viola, the flute, and so on. Here is a completely exceptional association of talents.

Even more stunning is the unity of the ensemble: it is unhoped for on the part of musicians belonging to a symphony orchestra who, for this reason, have very little time to dedicate to chamber music.

Really incomparable artists are needed to reach the degree of sonorous perfection and instrumental balance which characterized, the night before last, the interpretation of the Mozart flute quartet, the "Histoire du Soldat" of Stravinsky, or the Beethoven Septet, op. 20, which I, speaking for myself, have never heard played so suavely.

With first-chair players like these, it is no wonder that the Boston Symphony is what it is: one of the greatest in the world.

le Nouveau Courrier de la Presse
LIT TOUT

SUD-OUEST
8, rue de Cheverus
33 - BORDEAUX

-9 MAI 1971

Boston : c'est extraordinaire

Le sourire, la joie, le bonheur, je ne sais pas ce qui domine dans l'interprétation du Boston Symphony Orchestra ou tout au moins de ses plus illustres représentants. Très sur le volet, ils sont une douzaine à exprimer non la musique, mais la quintessence de la musique, à parler non le langage commun à tous les autres instruments, mais un idiome qui leur est particulier. Et ce salut est merveilleux, cet espéranto est divin.

Comment reconnaître sous leur doigts, comme exactement semblable aux autres versions, ce quintette en mi bémol majeur que Mozart considérait lui-même comme « la meilleure pièce de sa vie » ? Si les notes restent les mêmes, tout ce qui compose, au-delà des portées, au-delà des signes, le cadre sonore privilégié de la musique vivante est transmis ici avec un ensemble et un sentiment qui participent du génie.

Et si les phrases de Beethoven s'accordent moins bien à ces « Boston Symphony players », celles de Schubert apparaissent, à travers eux, comme un message inoubliable.

On retient parfois le souvenir d'un concerto, plus rarement celui d'une symphonie. Il faut, pour que l'imagination s'intéresse à la littérature habituelle des salles de concerts, que se produise tout à coup comme un petit déclic voluptueux.

Le déclic vient de se produire, à l'instant où je trace ces lignes, et où dans la moiteur humaine de La Brède, l'odeur de l'herbe coupée compose avec la musique comme un inestimable duo. On peut épiloguer à l'infini sur la magie schubertienne, sa manière d'opposer les accords et la mélodie, de sortir d'une marche pour dans un mystique andante, d'accompagner un thème d'aussi suaves variations. Mais on ne trouve rien à dire lorsqu'on écoute son opus 114 (Alias « La Truite »), on épouse ce sentiment de profonde béatitude.

Rien si ce n'est : « cela est extraordinaire, et pour tout dire, fascinant. »

F. M.

SUD-OUEST (Bordeaux): May 9, 1971
"Boston: Extraordinary"

Smiles, joy, happiness, I don't know which dominates in the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or at least, among its most illustrious representatives. A very select company, they are twelve musicians who express not just music, but the quintessence of music, who speak not just the common language of all other instruments, but an idiom which is unique to them. And this lingua franca is marvelous, this esperanto divine.

How to recognize in their hands, as exactly similar to other versions, the Quintet in E-flat major that Mozart himself considered "the best work of his life"? If the notes are the same, everything which adds up, beyond the single components of the music, to the sonorous framework is here transmitted with a sense of ensemble and a sentiment which speaks of genius.

And if the phrases of Beethoven are less well suited to these "Boston Symphony Players", those of Schubert appear, through them, like an unforgettable message.

We sometimes retain the memory of a concerto, less often of a symphony. For our imagination to take interest in the accustomed literature of concert halls, we need an extra, indefinable something, like a small, voluptuous trigger.

This trigger was just produced, at the moment in which I write these lines, at La Brède where the odor of the fresh-cut grass combines with the music to form an unforgettable duo. We could go on forever describing Schubertian magic, his manner of opposing harmony and melody, of accompanying a theme with variations just as sweet. But there is nothing more to be said when listening to his Opus 114 (alias "The Trout") as we experience this profound beatitude.

Nothing if it isn't: "That is extraordinary, and, in a word, fascinating".

le Nouveau Courrier de la Presse
LIT TOUT
15, Rue du Colonel Driant PARIS 1er Tél. 236-25-11

SUD-OUEST
8, rue de Cheverus
33 - BORDEAUX

-9 MAI 1971

Boston : c'est extraordinaire

LE sourire, la joie, le bonheur, je ne sais pas ce qui domine dans l'interprétation du Boston Symphony Orchestra ou tout au moins de ses plus illustres représentants. Triés sur le volet, ils sont une dizaine à exprimer non la musique, mais la quintessence de la musique, à parler non le langage commun à tous les autres instruments, mais un idiome qui leur est particulier. Et ce sabir est merveilleux, cet espéranto est divin.

Comment reconnaître sous leur doigts, comme exactement semblable aux autres versions, ce quintette en mi bémol majeur que Mozart considérait lui-même comme « la meilleure pièce de sa vie » ? Si les notes restent les mêmes, tout ce qui compose, au-delà des portées, au-delà des signes, le cadre sonore privilégié de la musique vivante est transmis ici avec un ensemble et un sentiment qui participent du génie.

Et si les phrases de Beethoven s'accordent moins bien à ces « Boston Symphony players », celles de Schubert apparaissent, à travers eux, comme un message inoubliable.

On retient parfois le souvenir d'un concerto, plus rarement celui d'une symphonie. Il faut, pour que l'imagination s'intéresse à la littérature habituelle des salles de concerts, que se produise tout à coup comme un petit déclic voluptueux.

Le déclic vient de se produire, à l'instant où je trace ces lignes, et où dans la moiteur humaine de La Brède, l'odeur de l'herbe coupée compose avec la musique comme un inestimable duo. On peut épiloguer à l'infini sur la magie schubertienne, sa manière d'opposer les accords et la mélodie, de sortir d'une marche pour dans un mystique andante, d'accompagner un thème d'aussi suaves variations. Mais on ne trouve rien à dire lorsqu'en écoutant son opus 114 (Alias « La Truite »), on épouse ce sentiment de profonde béatitude.

Rien si ce n'est : « cela est extraordinaire, et pour tout dire, fascinant. »

F. M.

SUD-OUEST (Bordeaux): May 9, 1971
"Boston: Extraordinary"

Smiles, joy, happiness, I don't know which dominates in the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or at least, among its most illustrious representatives. A very select company, they are twelve musicians who express not just music, but the quintessence of music, who speak not just the common language of all other instruments, but an idiom which is unique to them. And this lingua franca is marvelous, this esperanto divine.

How to recognize in their hands, as exactly similar to other versions, the Quintet in E-flat major that Mozart himself considered "the best work of his life"? If the notes are the same, everything which adds up, beyond the single components of the music, to the sonorous framework is here transmitted with a sense of ensemble and a sentiment which speaks of genius.

And if the phrases of Beethoven are less well suited to these "Boston Symphony Players", those of Schubert appear, through them, like an unforgettable message.

We sometimes retain the memory of a concerto, less often of a symphony. So that For our imagination to take interest in the accustomed literature of concert halls, we need ~~some~~ an extra, indefinable something, like a small, voluptuous trigger.

This trigger was just produced, at the moment in which I write these lines, at La Brède where the odor of the fresh-cut grass combines with the music to form an unforgettable duo. We could go on forever describing Schubertian magic, his manner of opposing harmony and melody, of accompanying a theme with variations just as sweet. But there is nothing more to be said when listening to his Opus 114 (alias "The Trout") as we experience this profound beatitude.

Nothing if it isn't: "That is extraordinary, and, in a word, fascinating".

LE MONDE: May 22, 1971

"The Boston Symphony Chamber Players"

A gala for the benefit of the American Library in Paris brought together, in the chambers of the Chateau de la Muette, the twelve ~~principal~~ first-chair players of the Boston Symhony Orchestra, chamber musicians just as incomparable for their individual excellence (equal for the most part to the best soloists) as for their spirit of complicity, their "social sensitivity", their accustomed attentiveness to each other, their professional conscience allied to outright modesty, all qualities innerent in the members of great orchestras.

Only this rare presence in each ~~one~~ player, attentive to rounding out, without dynamic breaks, the passages and reprises and to underlining "insignificant" details, could give the Beethoven Septet its panoply of symphonic timbres where each instrumental character colors in its own way the subject and action of the six movements. Joseph Silverstein (violin), who led this very beautiful interpretation, had before led the dance in L'histoire du soldat of Stravinsky. One would like to enumerate one by one these perfect musicians (~~differently~~ variously associated the same evening in the Mozart Flute Quartet, K. 285, and a Woodwind Quintet of Walter Piston), whose only Paris concert is luckily followed by a short tour in the provinces.

BUREAU INTERNATIONAL DE CONCERTS ET CONFÉRENCES
CH. ET C. KIESGEN
252, Faubourg Saint-Honoré, PARIS-8e
Tél. 924 - 21-25 Adr. Télégr. CLEDELA-PARIS

Justificatif d'insertion

Concert : BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS
Nom du Journal : LE MONDE
Date d'insertion : 22 MAI 1971
Signature (s'il y a lieu) : Anne REY

les concerts

LES BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

Un gala au bénéfice de la Bibliothèque américaine à Paris a réuni, dans les salons du château de la Muette, les douze chefs de pupitre de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, musiciens de chambre incomparables tant par leur valeur individuelle (égale dans la plupart des cas à celle des meilleurs solistes) que par un esprit de complicité, un « sens social », une habitude de l'écoute mutuelle, une conscience professionnelle alliée à une modestie foncière, toutes qualités propres aux membres des grands orchestres.

Seule cette présence rare de chacun, attentif à assouplir sans cassure dynamique les « passages » et les répliques, et à parfaire amoureusement d'« insignifiants » détails, pouvait rendre au Septuor de Beethoven sa nature de symphonie de timbres où chaque personnage instrumental vient colorer à sa manière le sujet et l'action des six mouvements. Joseph Silverstein (violon), qui animait cette très belle exécution, avait auparavant mené la danse dans l'Histoire du soldat, de Stravinsky. On aimerait citer un à un ces parfaits interprètes (diversement associés le même soir dans le Quatuor avec flûte K. 285 de Mozart et dans un Quintette à vent de Walter Piston), dont l'unique concert parisien est heureusement suivi d'une courte tournée en province.

LE MONDE: May 22, 1971

"The Boston Symphony Chamber Players"

A gala for the benefit of the American Library in Paris brought together, in the chambers of the Chateau de la Muette, the twelve ~~principal~~ first-chair players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chamber musicians just as incomparable for their individual excellence (equal for the most part to the best soloists) as for their spirit of complicity, their "social sensitivity", their accustomed attentiveness to each other, their professional conscience allied to outright modesty, all qualities innerent in the members of great orchestras.

Only this rare presence in each ~~one~~ player, attentive to rounding out, without dynamic breaks, the passages and reprises and to underlining "insignificant" details, could give the Beethoven Septet its panoply of symphonic timbres where each instrumental character colors in its own way the subject and action of the six movements. Joseph Silverstein (violin), who led this very beautiful interpretation, had before led the dance in L'histoire du soldat of Stravinsky. One would like to enumerate one by one these perfect musicians (~~differently~~ variously associated the same evening in the Mozart Flute Quartet, K. 285, and a Woodwind Quintet of Walter Piston), whose only Paris concert is luckily followed by a short tour in the provinces.

BUREAU INTERNATIONAL DE CONCERTS ET CONFÉRENCES
CH. ET C. KIESGEN
252, Faubourg Saint-Honoré, PARIS-8e
Tél. 924 - 21-25 Adr. Télégr. CLEDELA-PARIS

Justificatif d'insertion

Concert : BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS
Nom du Journal : LE MONDE
Date d'insertion : 22 MAI 1971
Signature (s'il y a lieu) : Anne REY

les concerts

LES BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

Un gala au bénéfice de la Bibliothèque américaine à Paris a réuni, dans les salons du château de la Muette, les douze chefs de pupitre de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, musiciens de chambre incomparables tant par leur valeur individuelle (égale dans la plupart des cas à celle des meilleurs solistes) que par un esprit de complicité, un « sens social », une habitude de l'écoute mutuelle, une conscience professionnelle alliée à une modestie foncière, toutes qualités propres aux membres des grands orchestres.

Seule cette présence rare de chacun, attentif à assouplir sans cassure dynamique les « passages » et les répliques, et à parfaire amoureusement d'« insignifiants » détails, pouvait rendre au Septuor de Beethoven sa nature de symphonie de timbres où chaque personnage instrumental vient colorer à sa manière le sujet et l'action des six mouvements. Joseph Silverstein (violon), qui animait cette très belle exécution, avait auparavant mené la danse dans l'Histoire du soldat, de Stravinsky. On aimerait citer un à un ces parfaits interprètes (diversement associés le même soir dans le Quatuor avec flûte K. 285 de Mozart et dans un Quintette à vent de Walter Piston), dont l'unique concert parisien est heureusement suivi d'une courte tournée en province.

230

BUREAU INTERNATIONAL DE CONCERTS ET CONFÉRENCES
CH. ET C. KIESGEN
252, Faubourg Saint-Honoré, PARIS-8e
Tél. 924-21-25 Adr. Télégr. CLEDELA-PARIS

Justificatif d'insertion

Concert : BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS
Nom du Journal : FIGARO
Date d'insertion : 14 Mai 1971
Signature (s'il y a lieu) : Serge BERTHOUMIEUX

Le mai de Bordeaux

"La Truite" de Schubert dans la bibliothèque de Montesquieu

DÉJÀ conditionnés par le contraste frappant entre notre vie moderne et le calme du château de la Brède auquel un précoce été apportait un merveilleux cadre de verdure et de fleurs, nous subissions l'emprise de cette beauté aussi bien que l'austérité propice à la réflexion de la bibliothèque de Montesquieu. Ce haut lieu de la pensée devenait pour un moment un haut-lieu de la musique en accueillant l'ensemble de chambre du Boston Symphony, une des plus belles formations de l'heure pour l'homogénéité absolue des cordes, la sûreté des attaques, les nuances subtilement dosées de la palette sonore.

Le quintette en mi bémol majeur K. 452 pour piano, hautbois, clarinette, cor et basson de Mozart, nous montrait ce partage rarissime d'une technique accomplie et d'une musicalité sans faille, et les différentes séquences de la sérénade pour flûte, violon et alto de Beethoven, d'une verve jeune ont ravi l'auditoire. Le quintette « La Truite », de Schubert, fut pourtant le sommet de ce concert. Il est difficile d'exécuter avec plus de finesse, d'esprit et de sensibilité profonde cette partition, un des purs joyaux du musicien viennois.

Dans cette même bibliothèque de Montesquieu, nous avons entendu Elaine Shaffer et Hephzibah Menuhin, dans un concert de sonates pour flûte et piano, dont les plus beaux moments furent la Sonate de Friedrich Kuhlau, et surtout Undine : sonate en mi mineur de Carl Reinecke, dont le romantisme léger faisait place parfois à des élans remarquablement conduits. L'interprétation d'Hephzibah Menuhin au piano fut admirable. Elaine Shaffer s'y tailla un franc succès.

Le grand orchestre de la radiodiffusion polonaise de Katowice, conduit par Kazimierz Kord, a donné deux concerts à Bordeaux dans le cadre du Mai musical. Ce jeune chef va quelquefois à l'encontre de ses recherches sonores : devant un orchestre très discipliné et d'une solidité exemplaire à tous les pupitres, on comprend difficilement que sa baguette trépidante de vie devienne aussi sèche et coupante dans les accords. Nous avons l'impression qu'il est habité avant tout par l'image métronomique. Pourtant, dans le Livre pour orchestre de Lutoslawski, il a montré une grande recherche dans les nuances. Nous avons eu un « Sacre du Printemps » lyrique, sauvage, frénétique, bien dans la ligne de Stravinsky, mais parfois avec des accords un peu durs.

Quant à la 10e Symphonie de Chostakovitch, une tension trop forte escamotait les aspects essentiels de l'œuvre. Une ampleur souveraine, une puissance généreuse ont marqué l'interprétation du Concerto n° 1 de Brahms par Youry Boukoff dont le jeu tout à tour dramatique, attendri, vibrant restituait à cette page son puissant rayonnement.

Un jeune violoniste Konstanti Kulka a montré de brillantes qualités dans le deuxième Concerto de Wieniawski, dont on peut aimer plus ou moins l'esprit, mais qui, sur le plan violonistique, est une belle partition. Une réserve. Gêné par la direction de K. Kord, peu sensible aux élans romantiques, le soliste n'a sans doute pas donné toute sa mesure.

Serge Berthoumieux.

LE FIGARO: May 14, 1971

"Schubert's 'Trout' in Montesquieu's Library"

Already conditioned by the striking contrast between our modern existence and the calm of the Chateau de la Brède to which a premature summer brought a marvelous surrounding of greenery and flowers, we gave in to this overpowering beauty as well as to the auterity favorable to the contemplation of Montesquieu's study. This high place for thought became for the moment a high place for music by receiving the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, one of the greatest ensembles of its kind at the present time for the absolute homogeniety of the strings, the security of attack, the subtlely dosed nuances of the sonorous palette.

The Mozart Quintet in E-flat major, K. 452 (for clarinet, oboe, horn, bassoon and piano) demonstrated this rare sharing of accomplished technique and unfailing musicality, and the different sequences of the Beethoven Serenade for flute, violin and viola thrilled the audience with a youthful verve. The 'Trout' Quintet of Schubert, however, was the highlight of the evening. It would be difficult to play this marvelous score with more finesse, spirit or deep sensitivity.

230

BUREAU INTERNATIONAL DE CONCERTS ET CONFÉRENCES
CH. ET C. KIESGEN
252, Faubourg Saint-Honoré, PARIS-8e
Tél. 924 - 21-25 Adr. Télégr. CLEDELA-PARIS

Justificatif d'insertion

Concert : BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS
Nom du Journal : FIGARO
Date d'insertion : 14 Mai 1971
Signature (s'il y a lieu) : Serge BERTHOUMIEUX

Le mai de Bordeaux

"La Truite" de Schubert dans la bibliothèque de Montesquieu

DÉJÀ conditionnés par le contraste frappant entre notre vie moderne et le calme du château de la Brède auquel un précoce été apportait un merveilleux cadre de verdure et de fleurs, nous subissions l'emprise de cette beauté aussi bien que l'austérité propice à la réflexion de la bibliothèque de Montesquieu. Ce haut lieu de la pensée devenait pour un moment un haut-lieu de la musique en accueillant l'ensemble de chambre du Boston Symphony, une des plus belles formations de l'heure pour l'homogénéité absolue des cordes, la sûreté des attaques, les nuances subtilement dosées de la palette sonore.

Le quintette en mi bémol majeur K. 452 pour piano, hautbois, clarinette, cor et basson de Mozart, nous montrait ce partage rarissime d'une technique accomplie et d'une musicalité sans faille, et les différentes séquences de la sérénade pour flûte, violon et alto de Beethoven, d'une verve jeune ont ravi l'auditoire. Le quintette « La Truite », de Schubert, fut pourtant le sommet de ce concert. Il est difficile d'exécuter avec plus de finesse, d'esprit et de sensibilité profonde cette partition, un des purs joyaux du musicien viennois.

Dans cette même bibliothèque de Montesquieu, nous avons entendu Elaine Shaffer et Hephzibah Menuhin, dans un concert de sonates pour flûte et piano, dont les plus beaux moments furent la Sonate de Friedrich Kuhlau, et surtout Undine : sonate en mi mineur de Carl Reinecke, dont le romantisme léger faisait place parfois à des élans remarquablement conduits. L'interprétation d'Hephzibah Menuhin au piano fut admirable. Elaine Shaffer s'y tailla un franc succès.

Le grand orchestre de la radiodiffusion polonaise de Katowice, conduit par Kazimierz Kord, a donné deux concerts à Bordeaux dans le cadre du Mai musical. Ce jeune chef va quelquefois à l'encontre de ses recherches sonores : devant un orchestre très discipliné et d'une solidité exemplaire à tous les pupitres, on comprend difficilement que sa baguette trépidante de vie devienne aussi sèche et coupante dans les accords. Nous avons l'impression qu'il est habité avant tout par l'image métronomique. Pourtant, dans le Livre pour orchestre de Lutoslawski, il a montré une grande recherche dans les nuances. Nous avons eu un « Sacre du Printemps » lyrique, sauvage, frénétique, bien dans la ligne de Stravinsky, mais parfois avec des accords un peu durs.

Quant à la 10e Symphonie de Chostakovitch, une tension trop forte escamotait les aspects essentiels de l'œuvre. Une ampleur souveraine, une puissance généreuse ont marqué l'interprétation du Concerto n° 1 de Brahms par Youry Boukoff dont le jeu tour à tour dramatique, attendri, vibrant restituait à cette page son puissant rayonnement.

Un jeune violoniste Konstant Kulka a montré de brillantes qualités dans le deuxième Concerto de Wieniawski, dont on peut aimer plus ou moins l'esprit, mais qui, sur le plan violonistique, est une belle partition. Une réserve. Gêné par la direction de K. Kord, peu sensible aux élans romantiques, le soliste n'a sans doute pas donné toute sa mesure.

Serge Berthoumieux.

LE FIGARO: May 14, 1971

"Schubert's 'Trout' in Montesquieu's Library"

Already conditioned by the striking contrast between our modern existence and the calm of the Chateau de la Brède to which a premature summer brought a marvelous surrounding of greenery and flowers, we gave in to this overpowering beauty as well as to the auterity favorable to the contemplation of Montesquieu's study. This high place for thought became for the moment a high place for music by receiving the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, one of the greatest ensembles of its kind at the present time for the absolute homogeniety of the strings, the security of attack, the subtlely dosed nuances of the sonorous palette.

The Mozart Quintet in E-flat major, K. 452 (for clarinet, oboe, horn, bassoon and piano) demonstrated this rare sharing of accomplished technique and unfailing musicality, and the different sequences of the Beethoven Serenade for flute, violin and viola thrilled the audience with a youthful verve. The 'Trout' Quintet of Schubert, however, was the highlight of the evening. It would be difficult to play this marvelous score with more finesse, spirit or deep sensitivity.

European record reviews

Boston S Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RECORDS & RECORDING
Artillery Mansions,
75, Victoria Street,
London, S.W.1
ISSUE DATED APR 1971

IVES: Three Places in New England. RUGGLES: Sun-treader. Boston Symphony Orchestra/Michael Tilson Thomas. DGG 2530048. £2.40.

THE NEW ASSOCIATION of the Boston Symphony Orchestra got off to a marvellous start with the recent issue of Abbado conducting Debussy and Ravel, but, if anything, this record is even more encouraging, for it brings us works by two of the most ruggedly individual American composers, both of whom suffered years of neglect. The story of Ives' life, with his compositional isolation, his virtual retirement from composition in his fifties, and his fortune on the stock exchange, is well known. Ruggles, born in 1876, and now 95, had a career that in some respects paralleled that of Ives. There are some important differences between them, notably in two matters; one is that, whereas Ives (by two years the senior composer) was highly prolific during his composing career, Ruggles limited his output to a small number of concentrated, extremely intense pieces; and the other main difference between them is that whereas Ives' music only became gradually known in recent years, the interest in it gaining momentum after some important premières towards the end of his life, Ruggles did have something of a success in avant-garde circles in the 1920s. He then went into severe eclipse, something epitomised by the fact that Sun-treader, completed in 1931 and first performed the following year in Paris, did not reach the USA until 1966. It is generally regarded as his major work, and we must be grateful that at last interest in Ruggles has again reached a point where such an impressive work achieves a first-class recording and performance.

I say that it is an impressive work; certainly it has a powerful majesty that runs right through it, even the lyrical interludes having a tensile strength of line and purpose. The main impact of the work derives, however, from the granitic power of the dissonances and the dynamic orchestration; the melodic lines, dominated by sevenths and ninths, encompass vast arches of sound, the textures are exultant in their massive sonority, and the whole has an extraordinary sense of urgency and forward drive. It is a remarkable and most rewarding work which, despite the harshness of the harmonies, has an almost luminous humanity that is deeply involving.

Ives' Three Places in New England is more familiar to us; indeed, it can be counted as probably his most popular work. In both this and the Ruggles, what is quite remarkable is the sheer professional accuracy with which these highly individual composers realise their unusual schemes. It is heartening to note that the performances are exceptionally sympathetic. Michael Tilson Thomas is a young American conductor, associate conductor with Steinberg of the Boston Symphony and also a noted pianist in contemporary works. In the Ives he shows himself to be fully in tune with the lyrical, soft-textured nature of much of the music, while he brings an appropriate swagger and panache to the central movement (the famous Putnam's Camp). In Sun-treader he realises admirably the strength and drive of the music, again giving the gentler interludes a melodic expressiveness that is most touching. The orchestra plays admirably in both these difficult works, while the recording, as one would expect from DGG, is beautifully balanced, with an acoustic that is clear and warm. This is certainly an outstanding contribution to the recorded discography of American music, and a fine conducting début on record for Thomas. He has some competition in the Ives, of course, for there is Ormandy's CBS recording with the Philadelphia Orchestra to be considered. This is a magnificent performance, if anything a little neater in the first movement than Thomas', but in Putnam's Camp Thomas (aided by a clearer recording) brings out more detail, and though both are splendid performances, and can be thoroughly recommended, I think on balance that Thomas' has a slight edge. Certainly it has the advantage of a much more rewarding coupling in the Ruggles. CBS give us Ormandy's performance on two separate records; on 72646 'The World of Charles Ives', including Robert Browning Overture with Stokowski and the American Symphony Orchestra, plus Bernstein with the NYPO in Washington's Birthday: an excellent all-Ives programme. The other record (72384) comprises Copland's Fanfare for the Common Man and Lincoln Portrait, both fun but not really representative of the best of Copland.

JOHN McCABE

Boston S Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE GRAMOPHONE
378, KENTON ROAD,
KENTON,
MIDDLESEX
ISSUE DATED APR 1971

IVES. Three Places in New England. RUGGLES. Sun-treader. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas. DGG 2530 048 (£2·40). Notes enclosed.

Three Places in New England: Philadelphia, Ormandy (3/68) (5/68) (R) 72646

Boston Common; Putnam's Camp, Redding, Connecticut; the Housatonic at Stockbridge: these three places in New England have come our way in Old England before, and there must be many who have made a first acquaintance with Ives's music in those atmospheric backgrounds, riverside chorales, and marching and counter-marching bands. Perhaps there is somebody who is now considering taking the plunge for the first time: if so he may be reassured that he could hardly do it in more auspicious circumstances. For here is a very good version of the music indeed, with abounding vitality in the playing, and with an exceptional quality of recording. Both rich and clear in high degree, it has also a very wide dynamic range: beware of turning up the pianissimo opening, lest later you must jump up to tame the onslaught of the marching bands.

Excellent as this new version of the Three Places is, old hands who already have the earlier CBS version listed above need by no means regret their purchase, considering Ives's music only. For that earlier disc is very nearly as well recorded, and just about as well performed, and goes on to include more of Ives's music: Washington's Birthday, and the lengthy Robert Browning Overture.

Browning makes his contribution to the backing of the new disc, too, as it happens: "Sun-treader, light and life be thine forever" he once wrote of Shelley. Carl Ruggles decided in 1931 to reflect the apostrophe in a major work which turned out to be generally considered his masterpiece, though the United States themselves postponed its first native performance until 1966. Ives, too, had in the past his share of postponements, though lost time has recently been made up for (sou[illegible] would say rather more than made up for) and it may possibly be that as the Ives revival runs out of steam a new fashion for Ruggles will take its place. America could do worse. Ruggles (still alive at 95) was, like Ives, a revolutionary in the technique of composition; but unlike Ives he functioned professionally in music, especially as a conductor. The two composers, though, certainly shared interests outside music; Ruggles was a skilled painter.

The Ruggles technical revolution in composition was one which made general acceptance difficult in the 20s and 30s, though it would not in general endanger critical acceptance, at least, today: he claimed never to have doubled a note in his harmony, nor to have repeated a note or its octave, either in the melody or in the inner parts, until the passage of from 7 to 9 different notes had taken place. To some readers (and at least one writer) this will have a forbidding ring. But to concentrate on it would be to do Ruggles an injustice; for I would suggest that Sun-treader is a splendid piece not so much on account of its revolutionary technique as in spite of it. Whether worried to death about committing a repetition or not, Ruggles achieved in this 16-minute span a powerful grandeur that Ives, by contrast, seldom achieved (and also, of course, probably seldom wanted to). Ruggles's lines are indeed angular ones: but they are assembled and organised with a touch of greatness in the result.

They do, of course, have on this occasion the advantage of an obviously first-class performance, and a recording, like that of the Ives on the reverse, among the very best. Ruggles was not as prolific as Ives; there is not as much, in quantity, to rediscover. But if it should be that during the next couple of years we are taken off Ives and set instead to learning about Ruggles then on this showing, at least, we shall have little to grumble about.

M.M.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RECORDS & RECORDING

Artillery Mansions,
75, Victoria Street,
London, S.W.1

ISSUE DATED MAY 1971

NFGS Weekend

EVERY YEAR in the first week of April the faithful come to High Leigh Manor, Hoddesdon, Hertfordshire, 25 miles in the country from London; the attraction, the annual get-together of the National Federation of Gramophone Societies. From Friday night to Monday morning, they sit patiently in none-too-comfortable chairs, listening attentively to a variety of presentations ranging from new noises on disc from Decca, CBS, RCA, EMI, to learned experts disserting upon some long-forgotten facet of Trans-Caucasian music.

High Leigh itself is an imposing country house of some 150 years vintage which was converted into a conference centre in 1921, extra accommodation being built on to it through the years. It's the mecca for all kinds of conference activities but one would never know from the actual village of Hoddesdon which displays not one single sign directing one to High Leigh. It's up a turning left of the High Street called Lord Street — miss this at your peril, for Hoddesdon now has a magnificent one-way road system which sweeps car and driver half way to Inverness before he is allowed to turn round.

The NFGS call it a musical weekend and for a paltry £7.50 any gramophile can get bed and board from Friday dinner to Monday breakfast. This year was particularly traumatic, as the Society's irrepressible chairman, Gilbert Parfitt, explained — first of all the rival attraction of Sonex over the same weekend, which threatened to seduce both potential speakers and guests, and then the postal strike. Still, he need not have worried since his faithful are not so easily deterred and, on the day, there they were eager and attentive as always.

To some it may seem perversely and stoically British to spend a sedentary weekend listening to canned music in a hostelry which will never reach the pages of Egon Ronay — one feels at times that nothing but Byrd and Vaughan Williams should be played. The NFGS weekend, too, used to be 'dry', nothing stronger than Schweppervescence being tolerated; such prohibition, naturally, merely encouraged the doughty drinkers who came fully reinforced against the rigours of a weekend without alcohol. Awesome stories are told of drunken gymnastics at four in the morning, of bells being rung at ungodly hours and certain people not materialising till lunch time, all pale and wan, to operate turntables with trembling, shaking hands.

Still the British by their schooling and their upbringing are basically suspicious of pleasure — they feel guilty if they enjoy themselves and are much happier if they have to suffer a little for their joys. La Dolce Vita is not for them — far too sybaritic and indulgent and beyond their ken. We have no Mediterranean sunshine and our cooking is scarcely haute cuisine — we're much more tolerant and many of us like a gregarious atmosphere of undisguised bonhomie; it's amazing what we'll do in groups — even sit quietly listing to records in the middle of the country far from home, some carrying our own cushions to increase posterior comfort.

However, it quickly becomes all too easy to sneer, overlooking one remarkable fact that in these days of TV, radio and other shallow entertainments force-fed to the population it is really quite a miracle to get over 150 enthusiastic souls gathered together for a weekend such as the NFGS. It is precisely what the society, its officers and its members make it. It's also an immensely friendly and attentive gathering, always inquisitive yet never hostile and, due to Chairman Parfitt's ceaseless efforts, always graced by speakers and presentations well worth attending. Indeed, some weekenders complain of an embarras de richesses, with a crowded programme and plenty of stamina required, the continuing dilemma of which of two concurrent sessions to attend, and brain and body reeling from over-exposure to sounds, facts and variable furniture. Still, after some heart-searching the committee installed bar facilities where the flagging delegate can restore his spirits whilst a judicious choice of programme options can avoid satiety. Satiety at High Leigh — rather a thought to conjure with.

This year's gathering was a nice mixture of vintage Hoddesdon and new ideas — the irreplaceable Vic Bellerby with his selections from the Decca cornucopia, Bill Newman now flying the CBS flag as indomitably as he did the EMI one, Katharine Wilkinson bringing pulchritude as well as records from Stanhope Place and Douglas Pudney unveiling Manchester Square's forthcoming secrets. I, too, did my stint for RCA, made all the more hair-raising by the discovery of a couple of real printer's howlers on the front of a new Boston Symphony leaflet; still despite an impromptu competition devised on the spot, few noticed them. Grieg's 'Last Sping' indeed — sounds like a cork for a barrel of Norwegian aquavit.

Donald Aldous was happily everywhere to be seen, as always enlivening the happenings with his wit and warm welcome and his indispensable late night programme of laughs and bawdy on record. New speakers this year included David Cairns of Philips on Tippett's The Midsummer Marriage, John Crabbe, the Editor of 'Hi-Fi News', discussing the subtleties of recording techniques, Charles Cudworth and John Duarte, both of r+r, and a talk on Elgar by a transatlantic expert, Dr Jerrold Moore; not, by the way, the renowned accompanist undergone a transmogrification. Technical sessions came from the ubiquitous Dolby organisation and the urbane and lucid technical editor of the Gramophone, John Borwick. The Society had also managed to get hold of a copy of Anna Moffo's film of La Traviata but the projector kept breaking down and the screening had finally to be abandoned.

Still, Gilbert Parfitt takes this all philosophically and is already planning for 1972 and 1973. His job's not an easy one, for the Hoddesdon weekend rests considerably upon the goodwill of the record companies who provide presentations and equipment; also upon the record magazines. He holds it together without much of a budget and keeps its slender threads intact getting the programmes and the speakers there — and the audience. Chairman Parfitt's a dab hand at annually ringing effective changes on a well tried and unalterable formula for which many of us, in or out of the business, have a genuine affection.

ROBERT ANGLES

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RECORDS & RECORDING

Artillery Mansions,
75, Victoria Street,
London, S.W.1

ISSUE DATED MAY 1971

William Steinberg has recorded 'The Planets' with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whom he conducted in London last month

HOLST: The Planets. Boston Symphony Orchestra/William Steinberg. DGG 2530102. £2.40. •

A GREAT virtuoso orchestra revelling in a virtuoso score generates excitement which is exhilarating in itself and almost irresistible. To that extent this unexpected performance of The Planets cannot be gainsaid. But those of us who have known The Planets intimately for many years and grown up with our native tradition of performance, may be forgiven for demanding something more than orchestral bravura. Steinberg takes Mars at a very brisk Allegro with a strong accent on the first beat of each bar of 5/4 rhythm and the general dynamic level at the outset is rather louder than pp and p. The music emerges with unwonted ferocity, but lacks weight. A few odd details obtrude — the horns beginning at bar 25 appear to detach their notes and the alternating brass and horns leads from bar 43 (the chromatic figure with the trochaic rhythm) also have the notes detached instead of tied. The staccato woodwind semiquavers leading up to the change to 5/2 do not come through until most of the brass lapse into silence, and even the canon for tenor tuba and trumpet does not stand out as clearly as it should. The violin melodies in Venus gleam brightly, the brief Largo cello solo sings out voluptuously as if in a romantic concerto. In short, I find this gorgeous playing rather too gorgeous. After all, Venus in Holst's astrological context is the bringer of Peace, not Love.

Steinberg points the detail with brilliant precision in Mercury, resisting the temptation to try and break a speed record. The high, tune percussion are utterly clear; but I have the impression of skilful microphone balancing here, for they sound rather close. Jupiter affords a virtuoso display of disciplined, resplendent playing which the music can take and the Andante maestoso section has a broad, Elgarian tread. When the brass are in full cry, however, accompanying detail tends to be obscured.

Saturn sounds too extrovert here for my taste, opulent and weighty, not desolate or relentless, as if a gigantic clock were ticking one's life away. Uranus has all the requisite wizardry and panache. A strange sound assailed my ears, however, in the pianissimo bars which follow the fffff climax — the high F of the solo double bass given unusual prominence by Steinberg. Neptune glitters coldly, the chorus sounds rather numerous but is suitably remote.

It would be a privilege to hear such superb playing in the concert hall; but for repeated listening at home I prefer the much more idiomatic approach of Sir Adrian Boult with the New Philharmonia Orchestra, or even Haitink and the Concertgebouw Orchestra.

The DGG recording produces that firm's characteristically warm, smooth sound, although I feel that even DGG's skilled engineers have not on this occasion been able to bring complete clarity to the reverberant acoustics of Boston's concert hall.

LIONEL MARKSON

Boston S Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

COLNE TIMES
BURNLEY,
LANCASHIRE
ISSUE DATED 16 APR 1971

Light

by Linda Hardman

TO mark the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current tour of Europe, Deutsche Grammophon has issued six new records, four of the orchestra itself and two by the orchestra's own chamber group. Under William Steinberg, making his DGG debut, on 2530-102, is "The Planets," by Holst; and on 2530-078 Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Tchaikovsky First Symphony. Thomas also conducts on 2530-048, which includes Ives's "Three Places in New England," an ideal introduction to anyone wishing to sample something of North American music. Other records in the release, all at £2.40 each, include works by Debussy, Piston, Schumann and contemporary composers.

☆ ★ ☆

The Boston orchestra to most people, however, will be associated with RCA recordings, and this company has just released a musical history of the orchestra, on one record, with tracks covering the years 1917-71. Conductors are Karl Muck, Serge Koussevitzky, Pierre Monteux, Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf, and at 99p on OP01002 this is a fascinating historical document.

☆ ★ ☆

At the same bargain price, on OP01001, is a selection compiled from the RCA recordings of Arthur Rubenstein, issued in connection with the film "L'Amor de ma Vie." Basically this is a collection of pianoforte "pops" but if the programme suits you, go ahead and buy.

☆ ★ ☆

Finally, those who treasure and collect the old 78 r.p.m. discs of the great voices of the past will be interested to learn of a scheme now under way to rescue some of these gems from the Hayes's archives. Unavailable since the HMV direct pressing service was suspended almost 20 years ago, these records will be issued to order only, in limited editions, and this could well be the last time in many years — perhaps for ever — that there will be an opportunity of this nature. Inquiries should be sent to the British Institute of Recorded Sound, 29 Exhibition Road, London, SW7.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RECORDS & RECORDING
Artillery Mansions,
75, Victoria Street,
London, S.W.1
ISSUE DATED MAY 1971

orchestral

PISTON: Symphony No 2[1]. SCHUMAN: Violin Concerto[2]. [2]Paul Zukofsky (violin), [1,2]Boston Symphony Orchestra/Michael Tilson Thomas. DGG 2530103. £2.40.

THERE IS A tendency in this country to dismiss the vast majority of the senior American composers as uninteresting academics whose music is slick, professional and entirely dull. We have heard something on record of Walter Piston, for several of his symphonies have appeared in the catalogues at different times, and the Suite from his ballet The Incredible Flutist has achieved a certain frequency of performance from time to time; but there is rather less of William Schuman available, for though some of his major works have been released in the USA, they have seldom filtered across to us. I believe this to be something of a pity; my acquaintance with Schuman's music has been even more limited than that with Piston's, but both seem to me composers of real character and power, and well worth investigating.

Of the two (though I must stress that I have only heard a couple of Schuman's works, and one was the charming but atypical New England Triptych), Piston's seems the warmer and more sympathetic musical character. His Sixth Symphony was for some time available in an RCA recording by Munch and the Boston Symphony (a strong candidate for RCA Victrola reissue, I would have thought), and is a most diverting and vigorous work. Piston was a pupil of Nadia Boulanger, who undoubtedly influenced the linear and harmonic clarity of his work; stylistically, he has been a disciple of Hindemith, whose methods remain the strongest influence on his thought. Now in his 78th year, he has been dismissed in this country as being simply a Hindemithian, yet his music always seems to have an immensely personal idiom; there are recognisable influences, certainly, but no other major composer in my experience speaks with this tone of voice. Indeed, I am quite sure that I would, without hesitation, have identified the composer of this Second Symphony within three or four bars had I not known his name.

It is in its way a thoroughly conventional piece dating from 1943, with three movements falling into standard symphonic categories (sonata-form Allegro, a lengthy, lyrical slow movement, and a boisterous finale combining the functions of scherzo and rondo), and there is nothing technically innovatory about his rhythms, contrapuntal techniques, or harmonies. Yet it is a deeply personal piece, for all the 'conventionality' of means. Piston speaks directly in the idiom that suits him and, for all the influences one can spot, every note remains entirely characteristic of him, and him alone. It is a charming work, with a richly melodic slow movement; and if its accent is American, with the syncopated rhythms, occasional jazzy ebullience and general clarity of utterance, its meaning is universal. It is a piece of pure music, uncluttered, unfanciful, but utterly convincing and thoroughly enjoyable.

Schuman's Violin Concerto (originally written in 1949, extensively revised for 1956, and again considerably rewritten in 1959) is a different kettle of fish. It is characteristic of its composer in its toughness and its aggressive tone of voice, though this does not preclude a genuine lyricism when the composer wants to conjure up a more melodic mood (though not necessarily more relaxed: Schuman's lyricism is tougher in backbone than Piston's, in keeping with the general style of a composer whose whole approach is more steely). The work's two-movement form, with the main slow section coming in the middle of the first movement, is not entirely novel (remember the Berg, whose second movement also opens with a powerful orchestral outburst, though there the resemblance ends), but it is unusual enough to draw comment. This is one of Schuman's few major works to have received public performance in this country, having been given at the Cheltenham Festival some years ago, and I remember that the critical reception was rather unfavourable, not to say snooty. The general tone was one that has been adopted on other occasions in connection with Schuman's music; it is immensely professional but merely goes through the compositional motions without a spark of real conviction. I think this does a grave disservice to him. This is certainly a very difficult work to listen to, but the difficulty arises I think because, although Schuman's style, for all its dissonance (using the term with all its tonal associations), is basically what is known as 'conservative', his approach to concerto form in this work acts as a melodic agent in itself.

The trouble is that this kind of style, with its strong melodic gestures, leads one to expect the kind of long-breathed, memorable tune that one does not get. Hence, it is too easy to conclude that Schuman's melodic gestures, because they are not immediately memorable as tunes, are empty. It is my conviction, however, that the case is simply that for Schuman the structure of the work acts in itself as the emotional and intellectual centre; he uses the melodic gestures (which, viewed in this light, do become meaningful at a lyrical level) as a structural element. Thus, the 'tunes' must not have an identity of their own outside the formal sense; and in this case, the episodic nature of the work, seen as a whole, achieves an over-all coherence (the sections balancing each other with fine judgment), and also becomes more intelligible. It is easy to dismiss this as a manufactured concerto off the assembly line; but I was immediately impressed by its strength of purpose and powerful feeling of unity despite its apparent sectional nature and lack of any strongly memorable tune, and I think the reasons given above for Schuman's deliberate adoption of this manner are convincing causes for my satisfaction with a work that superficially seems as if it ought to be unsatisfying.

Be that as it may, it remains a powerful and committed work, which well rewards concentrated listening. Neither this nor the Piston could ask for more persuasive advocacy. The young Michael Tilson Thomas conjures playing of brilliance and precision from the Boston Symphony Orchestra and, following his splendid advocacy of Ives and Ruggles in another recent DGG recording, makes one realise what a splendid interpreter of American music he is. Paul Zukofsky plays with immaculate virtuosity and devastating control in the Schuman; I hope it will not be too long before we hear him in London doing such works as the Penderecki Capriccio, of which he gave a stunning performance with the Hallé not so long ago (this work, by the way, has — as far as I know — yet to be given in London). The recording is incisively dynamic, with an excellent balance in the concerto and real perspective throughout. An important contribution both to the discography of American music and to DGG's catalogue.

JOHN McCABE

Paul Zukofsky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas recording the Schuman Violin Concerto for DGG

Boston S Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

COLNE TIMES
BURNLEY,
LANCASHIRE
ISSUE DATED 16 APR 1971

Light

by Linda Hardman

TO mark the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current tour of Europe, Deutsche Grammophon has issued six new records, four of the orchestra itself and two by the orchestra's own chamber group. Under William Steinberg, making his DGG debut, on 2530-102, is "The Planets," by Holst; and on 2530-078 Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Tchaikovsky First Symphony. Thomas also conducts on 2530-048, which includes Ives's "Three Places in New England," an ideal introduction to anyone wishing to sample something of North American music. Other records in the release, all at £2.40 each, include works by Debussy, Piston, Schumann and contemporary composers.

☆ ★ ☆

The Boston orchestra to most people, however, will be associated with RCA recordings, and this company has just released a musical history of the orchestra, on one record, with tracks covering the years 1917-71. Conductors are Karl Muck, Serge Koussevitzky, Pierre Monteux, Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf, and at 99p on OP01002 this is a fascinating historical document.

☆ ★ ☆

At the same bargain price, on OP01001, is a selection compiled from the RCA recordings of Arthur Rubenstein, issued in connection with the film "L'Amor de ma Vie." Basically this is a collection of pianoforte "pops" but if the programme suits you, go ahead and buy.

☆ ★ ☆

Finally, those who treasure and collect the old 78 r.p.m. discs of the great voices of the past will be interested to learn of a scheme now under way to rescue some of these gems from the Hayes's archives. Unavailable since the HMV direct pressing service was suspended almost 20 years ago, these records will be issued to order only, in limited editions, and this could well be the last time in many years — perhaps for ever — that there will be an opportunity of this nature. Inquiries should be sent to the British Institute of Recorded Sound, 29 Exhibition Road, London, SW7.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RECORDS & RECORDING
Artillery Mansions,
75, Victoria Street,
London, S.W.1
ISSUE DATED MAY 1971

orchestral

PISTON: Symphony No 2. SCHUMAN: Violin Concerto. Paul Zukofsky (violin), Boston Symphony Orchestra/Michael Tilson Thomas. DGG 2530103. £2.40.

THERE IS A tendency in this country to dismiss the vast majority of the senior American composers as uninteresting academics whose music is slick, professional and entirely dull. We have heard something on record of Walter Piston, for several of his symphonies have appeared in the catalogues at different times, and the Suite from his ballet The Incredible Flutist has achieved a certain frequency of performance from time to time; but there is rather less of William Schuman available, for though some of his major works have been released in the USA, they have seldom filtered across to us. I believe this to be something of a pity; my acquaintance with Schuman's music has been even more limited than that with Piston's, but both seem to me composers of real character and power, and well worth investigating.

Of the two (though I must stress that I have only heard a couple of Schuman's works, and one was the charming but atypical New England Triptych), Piston's seems the warmer and more sympathetic musical character. His Sixth Symphony was for some time available in an RCA recording by Munch and the Boston Symphony (a strong candidate for RCA Victrola reissue, I would have thought), and is a most diverting and vigorous work. Piston was a pupil of Nadia Boulanger, who undoubtedly influenced the linear and harmonic clarity of his work; stylistically, he has been a disciple of Hindemith, whose methods remain the strongest influence on his thought. Now in his 78th year, he has been dismissed in this country as being simply a Hindemithian, yet his music always seems to have an immensely personal idiom; there are recognisable influences, certainly, but no other major composer in my experience speaks with this tone of voice. Indeed, I am quite sure that I would, without hesitation, have identified the composer of this Second Symphony within three or four bars had I not known his name.

It is in its way a thoroughly conventional piece dating from 1943, with three movements falling into standard symphonic categories (sonata-form Allegro, a lengthy, lyrical slow movement, and a boisterous finale combining the functions of scherzo and rondo), and there is nothing technically innovatory about his rhythms, contrapuntal techniques, or harmonies. Yet it is a deeply personal piece, for all the 'conventionality' of means. Piston speaks directly in the idiom that suits him and, for all the influences one can spot, every note remains entirely characteristic of him, and him alone. It is a charming work, with a richly melodic slow movement; and if its accent is American, with the syncopated rhythms, occasional jazzy ebullience and general clarity of utterance, its meaning is universal. It is a piece of pure music, uncluttered, unfanciful, but utterly convincing and thoroughly enjoyable.

Schuman's Violin Concerto (originally written in 1949, extensively revised for 1956, and again considerably rewritten in 1959) is a different kettle of fish. It is characteristic of its composer in its toughness and its aggressive tone of voice, though this does not preclude a genuine lyricism when the composer wants to conjure up a more melodic mood (though not necessarily more relaxed: Schuman's lyricism is tougher in backbone than Piston's, in keeping with the general style of a composer whose whole approach is more steely). The work's two-movement form, with the main slow section coming in the middle of the first movement, is not entirely novel (remember the Berg, whose second movement also opens with a powerful orchestral outburst, though there the resemblance ends), but it is unusual enough to draw comment. This is one of Schuman's few major works to have received public performance in this country, having been given at the Cheltenham Festival some years ago, and I remember that the critical reception was rather unfavourable, not to say snooty. The general tone was one that has been adopted on other occasions in connection with Schuman's music; it is immensely professional but merely goes through the compositional motions without a spark of real conviction. I think this does a grave disservice to him. This is certainly a very difficult work to listen to, but the difficulty arises I think because, although Schuman's style, for all its dissonance (using the term with all its tonal associations), is basically what is known as 'conservative', his approach to concerto form in this work acts as a melodic agent in itself.

The trouble is that this kind of style, with its strong melodic gestures, leads one to expect the kind of long-breathed, memorable tune that one does not get. Hence, it is too easy to conclude that Schuman's melodic gestures, because they are not immediately memorable as tunes, are empty. It is my conviction, however, that the case is simply that for Schuman the structure of the work acts in itself as the emotional and intellectual centre; he uses the melodic gestures (which, viewed in this light, do become meaningful at a lyrical level) as a structural element. Thus, the 'tunes' must not have an identity of their own outside the formal sense; and in this case, the episodic nature of the work, seen as a whole, achieves an over-all coherence (the sections balancing each other with fine judgment), and also becomes more intelligible. It is easy to dismiss this as a manufactured concerto off the assembly line; but I was immediately impressed by its strength of purpose and powerful feeling of unity despite its apparent sectional nature and lack of any strongly memorable tune, and I think the reasons given above for Schuman's deliberate adoption of this manner are convincing causes for my satisfaction with a work that superficially seems as if it ought to be unsatisfying.

Be that as it may, it remains a powerful and committed work, which well rewards concentrated listening. Neither this nor the Piston could ask for more persuasive advocacy. The young Michael Tilson Thomas conjures playing of brilliance and precision from the Boston Symphony Orchestra and, following his splendid advocacy of Ives and Ruggles in another recent DGG recording, makes one realise what a splendid interpreter of American music he is. Paul Zukofsky plays with immaculate virtuosity and devastating control in the Schuman; I hope it will not be too long before we hear him in London doing such works as the Penderecki Capriccio, of which he gave a stunning performance with the Hallé not so long ago (this work, by the way, has — as far as I know — yet to be given in London). The recording is incisively dynamic, with an excellent balance in the concerto and real perspective throughout. An important contribution both to the discography of American music and to DGG's catalogue.

JOHN McCABE

Paul Zukofsky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas recording the Schuman Violin Concerto for DGG

234

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
RECORDS & RECORDING
Artillery Mansions,
75, Victoria Street,
London, S.W.1
ISSUE DATED MAY 1971

instrumental

TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No 1 in G minor, Op 13, 'Winter Daydreams'. Boston Symphony Orchestra/Michael Tilson Thomas. DGG 2530078. £2.40.

IT IS DELIGHTFUL to have another recording of this beautiful symphony, and especially to see one that is not in the context of an integral set (when it becomes obligatory, there is more than a trace of compulsoriness about Maazel's performance, for instance, for all its fine qualities). Michael Tilson Thomas, as everybody must know by now, is the young conductor who is associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, and he has already produced a couple of fine recordings of American works under DGG's new arrangement with this great orchestra. It is unusual for a young conductor to start his classical recording career (by classical, I mean in terms of repertoire) with such a neglected masterpiece, a work which, though adequately represented in the gramophone catalogues, is virtually never performed at concerts, yet which is full of lovely tunes, scintillating orchestration (among Tchaikovsky's most subtly coloured), and an easy-going but never marshmallow charm that should in a sympathetic performance make it an absolute winner with audiences. It has its weaknesses, of course, but then very few symphonies since Haydn and Mozart haven't, and for an early work it is remarkably assured and personal. Indeed, the only real weakness is in the finale (where else?), for it contains a fugato section that can seem laboured, and it certainly takes an unconscionable long time a-finishing.

Michael Tilson Thomas' performance is eminently sympathetic, and moreover extraordinarily mature. I am thinking of two things in particular. His handling of the slow movement's opening is hauntingly beautiful, more so than in anybody else's performance, with playing of astonishing finesse and some superbly caught atmosphere; this is a genuinely romantic performance in feeling, but with a supersensitive response to nuance, and totally without exaggeration. Then, the long, gradual accelerando-crescendo leading to the coda of the finale (a passage extremely difficult to bring off because of its length) is magnificently shaped and controlled by Tilson Thomas, with rare sureness of touch. He also realises that the only way to make the ending succeed is to play it hell-for-leather and make it sound really festive, which he does with great effect.

There is only one place at which I part company with him interpretatively. This is the aforesaid fugato in the finale, where he suddenly drops the tempo quite markedly. It has the advantage of giving the fugato a greater weight of impact in relation to the rest of the movement, and this does admittedly go some way towards nullifying the rather prosaic nature of the writing (along the lines of the bigger the lie the more people will believe it; in other words, by emphasising it and making it sound very grandiose, Tilson Thomas goes some way towards convincing one that it has more conviction than it really has), but the writing still seems laboured even so. It is a touch of immaturity on the composer's part, and again I am convinced that the best way is to play it right up to speed and make it sound at least vehement, which gives it an emotional character of some intensity and therefore rather more point.

However, it is a short section, and easy to make too much of. I cannot stress too strongly that Tilson Thomas' performance as a whole is a remarkable one; his handling of the scherzo is feathery and delicious, with a lilting, gently-played trio of great suavity. The slow movement sustains the marvellous start, the first movement is superbly shaped and beautifully played, and the finale, apart from the fugato, has immense verve and sense of fun, with a most convincingly gloomy introduction and a well-judged link to the main part of the movement. The orchestra play with rare skill and discipline, and altogether the performance is of exceptional quality.

It is a pity, then, that the recording has such a reverberant acoustic and that some details are lost. In the finale, for instance, at the main tempo it takes at least a bar for the reverberation to die away even after a medium-volume chord, and the impact of much of the lighter music is somewhat muted because of the acoustic. In the scherzo's trio section, for instance, I am convinced that a clearer, slightly more forward sound would have given it an extra touch of richness, which it needs; as it is, it sounds just a thought pale, and I am sure that this is not Tilson Thomas' fault. Apart from the acoustic, the recording is as finely balanced and polished as usual with DGG. But the over-reverberant sound makes this a less satisfying recording than that of HMV/Melodiya for Svetlanov, which is much less reverberant. Svetlanov's performance is one of the very best of his Tchaikovsky series, full of fire and spirit, and if his slow movement cannot match that of Tilson Thomas for the astonishing beauty of line, it is nevertheless lovely to listen to, and finely played. Svetlanov, too, plays the coda for more than it is worth, and makes it thoroughly invigorating; but he also scores over Tilson Thomas in that he does the same for the fugato. Apart from the fugato and the recording, however, both are superb performances. If my preference is for Svetlanov it is because of these two factors, and also because HMV generously give us two Liadov pieces under Ivanov as a charming fill-up. It is worth noting that Svetlanov takes the scherzo's trio section very richly indeed, with splendid results. The playing throughout is magnificent, and the recording is splendidly alive. Maazel I find too stiff in this work; there is much to admire, but his finale is merely bombastic, while he seems uncertain when to be cool and straightforward and when to be freely romantic.

It remains, then, a choice between two superb performances by Svetlanov and Tilson Thomas. It would be well worth listening to this DGG issue; if you find the recording acceptable, then you will certainly find Tilson Thomas' interpretation a deeply rewarding one. But over-all Svetlanov's must remain my first choice; I am not at all sure though that, had the DGG recording been clearer, I might not have changed my preference. JOHN McCABE

Michael Tilson Thomas recording Tchaikovsky's First Symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for DGG

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
RECORDS & RECORDING
Artillery Mansions,
75, Victoria Street,
London, S.W.1
ISSUE DATED MAY 1971

WAGNER: Lohengrin — Prelude Act 3[1]. GRIEG: Last Spring[2]. BRAHMS: Academic Festival Overture, Op 80[3]. LISZT: Les Préludes[4]. FRANCK: Le Chasseur Maudit[4]. BEETHOVEN: Leonore No 3 Overture, Op 72b[5]. Boston Symphony Orchestra/[1]Karl Muck, [2]Serge Koussevitzky, [3]Pierre Monteux, [4]Charles Munch, [5]Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Red Seal OPO 1002 (side 1 mono; side 2 stereo). 99p.

TO MARK THIS spring's European tour by one of America's most illustrious ensembles, RCA have issued this special disc entitled 'Boston Symphony Orchestra — The Sound History of a Great Orchestra on RCA'. Since this year already marks the 90th anniversary of the orchestra's founding (it made its début in 1881 under the baton of Sir George Henschel), there exists no audible documentation of its formative decades, though in October 1917 the Boston Symphony earned the distinction of being the first American orchestra to make records.

The distinguished German musician, Dr Karl Muck, was its conductor at that time and, since he was especially renowned for his Wagnerian interpretations, it is fitting that his contribution to this anthology should be the Act 3 Prelude from Lohengrin. Despite the primitive character of the acoustic recording (which comes from three sessions) there is no mistaking the authority of Muck's performance or the skill and discipline of the orchestra. In 1924 began the Boston Symphony's halcyon period — the association with Russian-born Serge Koussevitzky, who guided its fortunes for a quarter of a century and moulded it into one of the most brilliant and most flexible ensembles ever to grace a concert platform. Under Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony made innumerable recordings during the thirties and forties, and I do feel that a conductor who did so much to encourage contemporary composers might have been more fittingly represented on this disc than by Grieg's Last Spring (recorded in 1940) and the Academic Festival Overture (1947), the latter making its appearance in this country for the first time. The first of these does admittedly show us something of Koussevitzky's characteristically luminous string textures (though I find the transfer rather uncomfortable), but the Brahms is hardly a suitable vehicle for the Boston brand of brilliance.

Pierre Monteux headed the orchestra from 1919 until Koussevitzky's appointment, and frequently conducted the orchestra at the invitation of Charles Munch who, in 1949, had succeeded Koussevitzky. Monteux made many recordings in Boston, and this 1952 performance of Liszt's Les Préludes, issued here for the first time, lends uncommon distinction to a score which can so easily sound meretricious. So far we have heard only mono recordings, but on side 2, with Munch and his successor, Leinsdorf (who resigned two years ago, having led the orchestra since 1962), we reach the age of stereo.

Under the ebullient Munch, the orchestra maintained its brilliance, though it lost some of the subtlety it had enjoyed under Koussevitzky. Still, the performance here included, of Franck's jolly, spooky tone-poem, is very enjoyable and full of rumbustious energy, while the sound is pretty impressive. In Leinsdorf's 1963 recording of Leonore No 3 one is still conscious of listening to an exceptional orchestra playing under a masterful conductor, but the performance has a kind of congealed brilliance which neither moves nor excites me, notwithstanding the generally admirable, big sound.

On the whole, though, RCA have here given us an unusual and interesting bargain disc. In a sense, too, this issue rounds off another chapter in the Boston Symphony's history since, from now on, its progress will no longer be documented by RCA — instead, DGG engineers have installed their equipment at Symphony Hall and are busily recording the pride of New England. THOMAS HEINITZ

Boston Orchestra

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE GUARDIAN
192, GRAY'S INN ROAD,
LONDON, W.C.1
ISSUE DATED - 5 APR 1971

BOSTON ARISTOCRAT

gramophone records

by Edward Greenfield

"THE ARISTOCRAT of orchestras" say the publicity handouts of the Boston Symphony, and unaristocratic as the claim itself may be, it has fair truth. The Boston Orchestra appears tonight at the Royal Festival Hall in a London concert planned as part of a European tour, and the record companies (RCA the old one that recorded in Boston from 1917 until last year; Deutsche Grammophon the orchestra's new partner) have made up for that scarcity of live performances with a deluge of records.

It demonstrates the quality of Boston artistry that the records of its individual members playing under the banner of the "Boston Symphony Chamber Players" match and even surpass those of more renowned soloists. I have rarely if ever heard so satisfying a performance of the much-recorded B flat Trio of Schubert as that given by Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's leader; Jules Eskin, principal cellist and Claude Frank, the pianist (RCA LSB 4014). You have to go back to 1927 and the performance of Cortot, Thibaud and Casals to find an opening cello solo in the slow movement to match the hushed beauty of Eskin's, and in the finale the Bostonians with superb point actually outshine those old masters. Beautifully recorded on a mid-price label with the most attractive of couplings in Mozart's Oboe Quartet, I can think of few better bargains in the whole range of chamber music records.

The other record of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players comes from DGG (2530049) and conveniently gathers together Debussy's three late sonatas as well as the brief flute solo "Syrinx." Delicate but sure performances of all four works (Silverstein and Eskin again masterly) spoiled marginally by an over-reverberant acoustic.

The records by the full orchestra are a brilliant batch, headed by the most glowingly extrovert performance of Holst's suite "The Planets" I have ever heard (DGG 2530102). It is conducted by the orchestra's new musical director, William Steinberg, still in charge at Pittsburgh as well, who will also be conducting tonight's concert. Where Karajan and Haitink direct this work with a foreign accent—sometimes attractively so—Steinberg catches the ring of authenticity. He may underline points more than, say, Boult does, but the great theme of "Jupiter" has jollity as well as Elgarian nobility. Steinberg is after all a fine Elgarian himself (I should love to hear him do the symphonies) and though "Mars" may be taken faster than ever before, the understanding is sure and committed. A glorious, uninhibited performance helped by opulent recording.

The recording quality is what mars a new Boston record of Tchaikovsky's First Symphony, "Winter Daydreams" (DGG 2530078), conducted by the orchestra's brilliant young associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas. Acoustic here too fuzzes over what is plainly a most refined, beautifully controlled performance, and gives it unwanted Hollywood glamour. That same washy acoustic pervades Tilson Thomas's other new records too, but their American repertory is so important and fascinating that few will mind. Ives's well-known "Three Places in New England," including the joyful "Putnam's Camp," is coupled with a superb, tough work, "Sun-Treader" by the 95-year-old Carl Ruggles, otherwise unrepresented in the British catalogue (2530048). Ruggles may well prove as important as Ives, and this demanding music, written in 1931 but unperformed for decades, is ample evidence of genius. Tilson Thomas also conducts two more comfortable works by Americans of the following generation, Walter Piston's Symphony No. 2 and William Schuman's Violin Concerto with the young Paul Zukofsky a commanding soloist (DGG 2530103). In both works the argument is strong and memorably lyrical.

Highly recommended: an historical sampler of Boston Symphony recordings from 1917 to 1963 (RCA OPO 1002 at 99p) with items conducted by Karl Muck, Serge Koussevitzky, Pierre Monteux, Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf. A first-rate choice.

Boston Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH
135, FLEET STREET,
LONDON, E.C.4
ISSUE DATED - 3 MAY 1971

RECENT RECORDS

A neglected American

THE amount and the variety of work involved in recording an opera usually ensure the issue a place at the top of any review of a mixed batch of discs, but before I deal with a fine new recording of Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos," justice demands that a welcome be given to a recording of an exceptional work by the neglected American composer, Carl Ruggles.

Ruggles, who is still alive at 95, has from scruples of conscience about the nature of inspiration produced very little music during his long life, and has been overshadowed by his friend and contemporary Charles Ives. His granitic, powerful orchestral piece "Sun-treader" (DGG 2530 048)—so called after Browning's description of Shelley—was completed in 1931 yet was not heard in the States until 1966.

The language is of mountainous strength, the paragraphs tower up like natural phenomena as with almost bodily effort the composer pursues visionary enlightenment. The work is splendidly performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the young conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, and the interpretation of Ives's classic "Three Places in New England" on the reverse is its equal.

The new Strauss recording comes from the same company (2709 033) and is in many respects a beautiful realisation of the composer's and Hoffmanstahl's sophisticated fusion of low comedy and opera seria. Most impressive perhaps are the maturity of Karl Bohm's interpretation, with its unaffected flow and dramatic pace, and the beautiful playing of the Bavarian Radio Orchestra which has been superbly recorded.

The casting and singing, however, are a little problematical. Tatiana Troyanos's Composer is excellently conceived as spirited masculine and youthfully idealistic, but the quality of voice seems sometimes a little edgy, and intonation is doubtful. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau's Music Master and Franz Stoss's speaking part as the Major-domo are strongly taken, but Jess Thomas as Tenor/Bacchus seems to force in attempting heroic stature. Of the major roles Zerbinetta is possibly the most successful and is beautifully taken by Reri Grist, shrewd vulgarity mixed with flashes of yielding sympathy, though Hildegard Hillebrecht invests Ariadne with noble restraint—the classical figure rather than a woman to be identified with.

Two E.M.I. records of English music both feature Heather Harper and Robert Tear. In a fervent, sonorously recorded performance of Herbert Howells's "Hymnus Paradisi" (ASD 2600) they join forces with the King's College and Bach Choirs and the New Philharmonia Orchestra under David Willcocks. This is music which dates from the late 1930s, and Howells's language refurbishes a basic Georgian sweetness and smoothness with visionary moments close to Holst and Vaughan Williams and with a hint of Waltonian impetus. It is a work that is constructed against pain by a gentle but determined creative personality. Lacking the searing intensity of such as the "Hymn of Jesus" or "Sancta Civitas," it can sound spiritually weary, and has to work hard with an already well-used language, but it is a deeply felt, meticulously composed work, and in the traditional sense a beautiful one.

The second disc brings two of Britten's masterpieces for voice and chamber orchestra (CSD 3684). Miss Harper sings "Les Illuminations" to perfection, and Mr Tear follows expertly in the footsteps of Peter Pears without losing individuality in "Serenade," the horn obbligato superbly taken by Alan Civil. Neville Marriner conducts the Northern Sinfonia with the brio and style that are his hallmark.

* * *

Further aspects of the American consciousness are superbly outlined by the young pianist Roberto Szidonon on a record of concertos by Gershwin and MacDowell (DGG 2530 055), music as different as can be from Ruggles and Ives. The vitality of Gershwin's invention in simple but theatrically effective forms is inexhaustible, and is the very epitome of urban America, just as MacDowell sums up the 19th century dependence on European values. It took a Rachmaninoff to invest with a new passion the tradition that already seems tired in MacDowell, but the American achieved a sincere poetry.

A new version of Schubert's "Great C major" by Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic has for me turned out disappointingly (DGG 139 045). Although one admires the determination to avoid being side-tracked by Schubert's delicious afterthoughts, pace can surely be maintained without Karajan's unyieldingly brisk tempos. Disappointing, too, is Wilhelm Kempff's "Goldberg Variations" (DGG 139 455). Denuded of ornaments the aria itself sounds like a different piece and Bach's architectural organisation is travestied by romantic pedalling and phrasing. Technically impeccable playing to be sure, but stylistically misguided.

ANTHONY PAYNE

236

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RECORDS & RECORDING
Artillery Mansions,
75, Victoria Street,
London, S.W.1
ISSUE DATED MAY 1971

DVORAK: Symphony No 9 in E minor, Op 95, 'From the New World'. Carnival Overture, Op 92. Boston Symphony Orchestra/Arthur Fiedler RCA Victrola VICS 1598. 99*p*.

WITHOUT ARTHUR FIEDLER, many more people might have remained unaware of some of the delights of great music. Born more than 76 years ago in Boston, Fiedler has been a household word for as long as I can remember and has made countless recordings with the Boston Pops Orchestra (or Boston Promenade Orchestra as it is billed here). We all know about Fiedler's way with concerts, he meets the uninitiated more than halfway, wooing them with anything from concert versions of Lennon and McCartney songs to selections from Broadway melodies.

His recordings have confined themselves largely to 'easy listening', typically better-known Grieg, Gershwin, Sousa, Johann Strauss (often, alas, with preludes and postludes removed from those wonderful waltzes) and perhaps a snatch of Khatchaturian or Tchaikovsky.

RCA have now provided him with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra and have recorded his reading of one of the most widely performed major works in the whole of the symphonic repertoire. In view of the fact that there are 24 alternative recordings of the New World, Fiedler, a master of music in the lighter vein, has in this work to be measured against some of the world's greatest conductors past and present, and he emerges with all honour.

Frequently Fiedler's interpretation brings to mind Toscanini's wonderful conception of the music, particularly in its faithful adherence to the score. He even gives us the rarely-heard repeat in the opening movement (a point that even Toscanini overlooked), and he brushes away all the romantic cobwebs, eschewing the conventional slower pace for the second subject and hardly relaxing even for the quiet 'Swing low sweet chariot' theme. The effect is one of fiery urgency, with much brilliance and force from the brass: the trombones are quite magnificent.

The famous Largo is played coolly and with a convincing 'all-through' feeling to the relaxed tempo which allows the main climax to sound broadly expansive. The scherzo is light in touch and I should have preferred more aggression from the basses, but the swift, dancing pace of the trio is delightful. In the finale, Toscanini-like brio is again evident and Fiedler is not afraid to allow the brass their head. The broad second subject is kept firmly in tempo and, at the subsequent climax, Fiedler's ear for balance asserts itself when he lets the important fanfare theme on first trumpet override the rather banal string accompaniment, which I feel to be one of Dvořák's rare miscalculations. The coda I find thrilling in the extreme.

I suppose to put it at its most basic, this is an 'all American' performance (and why not indeed when the work was conceived, written and first performed in that country). There is brilliance, abundant energy and excitement. There is also a clear conception of the structure of the work — a great advantage in a composition which can so often sound episodic.

Perhaps there is a hint of brashness if we set this reading against one of true Slavonic subtlety such as that by Václav Talich on an old Supraphon disc. Kertesz too, proves that finesse and excitement can live side by side in a performance. On the other hand, I much prefer Fiedler's directness to the over-supple treatment of both Karajan and Kubelik in their recordings. Fiedler does not seem to set out to recreate the nostalgic atmosphere of the the Bohemian countryside, but he does persuade me that Dvořák's most popular symphony is more cogently constructed than its critics would have us believe.

In Carnival Fiedler takes advantage of the fact that he has a virtuoso orchestra at his disposal and gives a dashing, full-blooded performance. In the symphony, the Boston Symphony Orchestra make a few tiny, yet surprising slips (there are two barely audible false entries, yet I do not want to spoil it for the listener by identifying them), but the playing is full of conviction.

The recording goes some way towards matching the brilliance of the music-making: it sounds at its best with the volume up and the bass cut back a little. There are a few moments of 'engineered' balance and some of the climaxes could have been allowed a little more volume, but it is still an exciting sound, well worthy of a disc which, like the other Victrola version of the New World (under Toscanini), is a great bargain. I sincerely hope that Arthur Fiedler will be afforded further opportunities to record large-scale masterpieces.

ANTONY HODGSON

Boston S Orch

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

RECORDS & RECORDING
Artillery Mansions,
75, Victoria Street,
London, S.W.1
ISSUE DATED APR 1971

DEBUSSY: Sonata for cello and piano. Sonata for violin and piano. Sonata for flute, viola and harp. Syrinx. Boston Symphony Chamber Players: Joseph Silverstein (violin), Burton Fine (viola), Jules Eskin (cello), Doriot Anthony Dwyer (flute), Ann Hobson (harp), Michael Tilson Thomas (piano). DGG 2530049. £2.40.

THE FIRST RECORDINGS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be issued here by DGG since their recent contractual arrangement with them have included music by Ravel and Debussy, for which they have a particular affinity. Although, at first sight, this may seem surprising for an American orchestra, the explanation is simply that during the past 50-odd years, the orchestra has had three distinguished French directors — Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and Charles Munch — while Koussevitsky during his quarter-of-a-century's reign engaged many French players. This new release of Debussy's chamber music played by members of the orchestra, although unexpected, is equally understandable. Orchestral string players welcome the opportunity of playing chamber music in which they can perform as individuals, and even wind players and harpists, who are usually solo orchestral voices, are pleased to be temporarily released from the domination of a conductor. Thus the omens are propitious — French chamber music played by members of a great orchestra renowned for its sympathy with 20th-century French music.

In the event, the enterprise is successful. Unfortunately, though, it must compete with a Philips record of precisely the same programme issued exactly three years ago. The Trio Sonata, surely one of the most ethereal pieces of music ever written, receives from the Boston players a performance to match its diaphanous textures and volatile moods. The delicate instrumental tracery is beautifully and finely drawn, the minuet has its flights of fantasy and there are exquisite moments as, towards the end of the minuet, where the viola is supported by whispered harp figurations which suddenly enlarge into sweeping cascades of sound. I find little to choose between the DGG and Philips performances except that, in the latter, the finale is more forthright and resolute, as befits Allegro moderato ma risoluto.

The Sonata for cello and piano is well done by Eskin and Thomas. The passionate opening soon melts into the first melody of the Sostenuto which eventually rises to a splendid climax. In Modérément animé the players show a nice appreciation of the music's tenderness and wit, after which they display the virtuosity to impel the final Animé and drive it to a powerful climax. Much as I admire this performance, I find Maurice Gendron and Jean Françaix on Philips even more resourceful and sympathetic. Gendron's tone is gloriously rich and varied, while Françaix uses colour most imaginatively to enhance the harmonic structure. I like, too, his imitation of the cello's pizzicato at the beginning of the second movement. Such is their virtuosity that they can (and do) play the final Animé very fast with exhilarating effect. Eskin and Thomas give a fine performance; with Gendron and Françaix the performance is on a higher plane akin to artistic re-creation.

Joseph Silverstein's tone is appropriately silvery, enabling him to give with Thomas a finely poised account of the Sonata for violin and piano. The second subject of the first movement possesses rarefied sweetness and the big quasi-Spanish flourish at the end brings the movement to a resounding climax. But for me the Intermède lacks the requisite quicksilver fluidity, the sudden, darting changes of mood. Grumiaux, on Philips, has a warmer, richer tone with a wider range of shades — his feathery bowing of the lower phrases in the second subject of the Allegro vivo is particularly felicitous — and he and Hajdu find some of the humour in the Intermède, which eludes Silverstein and Thomas.

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flautist of the Boston Symphony, gives an impeccable account of that beautiful flute solo Syrinx, equalled but not surpassed by Philips' Roger Bourdin.

The DGG recording produces a pleasing, middle distance perspective with clear, bright, transparent sound. Philips' sound is closer and warmer, with pleasing fullness in the piano tone. Much as I like the new DGG issue, I think the earlier Philips version is even better and must therefore remain my first choice.

LIONEL MARKSON

Michael Tilson Thomas with score, listens with (l to r) artistic supervisor Rainer Brock, producer Karl Faust and recording engineer Gunter Hermanns, to a playback of the DGG recording of Debussy sonatas

Classic Scene Apr. 18, 1971

'antic' music should be taken lig

DISC DATA

French post-Impressionists. It is stylishly played by Stanley Drucker, clarinetist and Leonid Hambro. It is no accident that the disc also includes similar compositions by Debussy, Milhaud and Honegger, all musically Bernstein's kin, and the brazenly Romantic" Sonata by Arnold Box.

For a conductor so heavily identified with the most emotional of the Romantics, Bernstein has a particular affinity for Mozart, a surprising but constant choice in his programming.

A sampling of Bernstein's recent views of Mozart is to be heard in performances of the Symphony No. 36, "Linz" and the Symphony No. 41, "Jupiter" (both on Columbia M 30666). Bernstein leads the New York Philharmonic in what might be best described as "inspirational" readings of these works. Mozart, above all, knew about the chaos underneath the world's shiny surfaces, but child in the eighteenth century as he was, he was reticent about his visions. Not so in these performances by Bernstein, who pushes hard on Mozart's intricate forms and they gets carried away on the torrents below.

Tchaikovsky seems always to provide splendid occasions for Bernstein displays. There is hardly a passion known to man which Bernstein does not tear to tatters in the last three of Tchaikovsky's symphonies, the more popular ones. That is not necessarily bad, for the composer himself makes a pretty good start on the shredding to begin with.

The Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 1, "Winter Dreams" (Columbia M 30682) is a more tightly controlled work emotionally, although it can hardly be said to be a prime example. Michael Tilson Thomas, who came to the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a kind of object trouvee, shows what it is all about in his performance of the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 (DGG 2530078).

He adds little to the passion and outbursts that are not already there. If Bernstein can be accused of overstatement, Thomas is not guilty of the opposite. He is honest and just in a score which is not precisely either, but remains, nevertheless, effective in its own terms. All of which is to say that Tilson Thomas turns in an extraordinarily fine performance of the Tchaikovsky work. The Boston Smpphony outplays the Philharmonic by leagues, and the DGG sound is a blessing.

Coincidences. Bernstein got his start with the Boston Symphony at an age hardly older than Michael Tilson Thomas, and with something of the same excited public acclaim. Daniel Barenboim, erstwhile piano prodigy turned conductor, and still a very young man, has been guesting it with Bernstein's New York Philharmonic, has been taking over much of the Bernstein repertoire, and has been earning ecstatic praise from the Bernstein pub-

Boston S Orch.

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE GRAMOPHONE

378, KENTON ROAD,
KENTON,
MIDDLESEX.

ISSUE DATED

APRIL 1971

DEBUSSY. Chamber Works. Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein, violin; Barton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ann Hobson, harp; Michael Tilson Thomas, piano). DGG 2530 049 (£2·40).

Sonata for violin and piano. Sonata for cello and piano. Sonata for flute, viola and harp. Syrinx for solo flute.

To listen to Debussy's three sonatas seriatim on this beautiful record, is to realise the loss twentieth-century music sustained when Debussy died leaving the three others he planned unwritten. How oboists, horn-players and harpsichordists must dream of the sonata that they missed, the unfulfilled promise . . . "la 'uatrième sera pour hautbois, cor et claveçin". But the past quarter-century has seen a new assessment of the three sonatas the ailing Debussy did live to write. Although both violinists and cellists have played their respective sonatas ever since they were written, and no ensemble including flute, viola and harp has ever neglected Debussy's wistful masterpiece for that combination, pundits persisted for two decades after the composer's death that Debussy's late works showed a falling-off of his musical powers. That even so erudite a Debussyan as Edward Lockspeiser shared this view in the first edition of his Debussy (in Dent's Master Musicians series) is not surprising for the Violin Sonata, Debussy's last work, failed at the time of its first performance not only with the critics but with Debussy's own close friends. Slight carping about the first movement apart, Lockspeiser's third edition tells a different story and shows much more respect for all three sonatas. And the enthusiasm shown by Pierre Boulez today has completed the rehabilitation of the musicien français of those last years and their precious legacy. As for the fill-up, Syrinx, it remains, after nearly sixty years, perhaps the most perfect solo wind piece ever written. So much for the music.

The GRAMOPHONE

Turning to the performances, one realises the extent to which the Boston Symphony, of all American orchestras, has the greatest French affiliations. Pierre Monteux who became its conductor in 1919 reorganised the orchestra in 1920, and when Koussevitsky took over in 1924, its French personnel probably increased. Under his successor, Charles Munch, the tradition of a fair representation of the French repertoire and of French tonal ideals was maintained. And that is the background against which the six stars of this disc emerge triumphantly. To the two duo sonatas, the violinist and cellist each bring the subtle nuances of rhythm and tone-colour, of accent and dynamic that they require, and in this they are splendidly partnered by Michael Tilson Thomas's supple piano playing. He is evidently a musician of many parts, for by the time this appears in print he will have conducted the New Philharmonia Orchestra at the Royal Festival Hall in Mahler's Fifth Symphony.

There is beautiful playing, too, in the Trio Sonata, but here the over-reverberant acoustic coarsens the sound so that the lower notes of the harp have a plummy, lingering halo around them, and one is enveloped by the resonance of the bass register instead of always remaining at a discreet distance from music of such refinement. Debussy's harp chords were never meant to sound like held chords on a cathedral organ. (The cleaner, more astringent sound of the Melos Ensemble's Oiseau-Lyre version is, I am sure, closer to the composer's idea.) But the closeness of the microphone placing does nothing to enhance the intimacy of the music: on the contrary, it weights it. A pity, because the performances themselves deserve a more sensitive recording. F.A.

Boston Orch

DURRANT'S

DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733

THE GRAMOPHONE

378, KENTON ROAD,
KENTON,
MIDDLESEX.

ISSUE DATED

MAY 1971

ORCHESTRAL CONCERT. Boston Pops Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. RCA LSB4017 (£1·49).

Gold: Boston Pops March. Gershwin-Bennett: Porgy and Bess—A Symphonic Picture. Glazunov: Carnaval Overture, Op. 45. Shostakovich: Hamlet—Incidental Music, Op. 32.

An attractive souvenir record for the latest visit to London of Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra (backbench Boston Symphony). It is doubly attractive for including the two Russian rarities, neither of which is otherwise available at the moment. The Shostakovich Hamlet music is a decided oddity. Written for an apparently unconventional production of Shakespeare's play in 1932, its general tone is anything but tragic, its idiom unmistakably Russian. I am not surprised to find that Arthur Fiedler selected it for this disc entitled "Fiedler's Choice" because of the music's "great charm, wit and diversity". I would agree on those qualities, and as long as I do not have to associate it with Hamlet I am prepared to revel in the oompah rhythms, the trombone glissandos and the other pantomime effects. Even the Funeral March strikes an extrovert rather than a tragic tone, though Ophelia's Song for muted strings brings nicely judged relief. Though some of this has the ring of Khatchaturian in unbuttoned mood, there are enough Shostakovich touches to carry the suite through, particularly when it is played as brilliantly as here.

Glazunov's Carnaval Overture is exactly what one would expect with brilliant orchestration including plenty of piccolo and triangle and a 'patriotic' second subject setting off the skipping main theme. Had Walton been a Russian living a generation earlier, he would have done something very like this, though he would probably have made it even more memorable.

Walton comes to mind too in the Boston Pops March by the film-music writer (husband of Marni Nixon, the soprano) Ernest Gold. Not so much in the main-theme jollification—which is rather like Americanised Merry Widow—as in the patriotic theme, which is the closest thing imaginable to the big tune in Walton's Orb and Sceptre. None the worse for that of course. Richard Russell Bennett's suite from Porgy and Bess needs no introduction at this stage, though Fiedler takes the trouble to point out in a remark quoted on the sleeve-note that Bennett "put the suite together without changing a note of Gershwin's score"—something which I had not realised from what sounds very slick indeed. Fine playing, superb recording though at times the highly reverberant Boston acoustic is distracting. E.G.

Classic Scene Apr. 18, 1971

'antic' music should be taken lig

DISC DATA

French post-Impressionists. It is stylishly played by Stanley Drucker, clarinetist and Leonid Hambro. It is no accident that the disc also includes similar compositions by Debussy, Milhaud and Honegger—all musically Bernstein's kin, and the brazenly Romantic Sonata by Arnold Bax.

For a conductor so heavily identified with the most emotional of the Romantics, Bernstein has a particular affinity for Mozart, a surprising but constant choice in his programming.

A sampling of Bernstein's recent views of Mozart is to be heard in performances of the Symphony No. 36, "Linz" and the Symphony No. 41, "Jupiter" (both on Columbia M 30444). Bernstein leads the New York Philharmonic in what might be best described as "inspirational" readings of these works. Mozart, above all, knew about the chaos underneath the world's shiny surfaces, but child in the eighteenth century as he was, he was reticent about his visions. Not so in these performances by Bernstein, who pushes hard on Mozart's intricate forms and then gets carried away on the torrents below.

Tchaikovsky seems always to provide splendid occasions for Bernstein displays. There is hardly a passion known to man which Bernstein does not tear to tatters in the last three of Tchaikovsky's symphonies, the more popular ones. That is not necessarily bad, for the composer himself makes a pretty good start on the shredding to begin with.

The Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 1, "Winter Dreams" (Columbia M 30482) is a more tightly controlled work emotionally, although it can hardly be said to be a prime example. Thomas, who came to the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a kind of object trouvee, shows what it is all about in his performance of the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 (DGG 2530078).

He adds little to the passion and outbursts that are not already there. If Bernstein can be accused of overstatement, Thomas is not guilty of the opposite. He is honest and just in a score which is not precisely either, but remains, nevertheless, effective in its own terms. All of which is to say that Tilson Thomas turns in an extraordinarily fine performance of the Tchaikovsky work. The Boston Smpphony outplays the Philharmonic by leagues, and the DGG sound is a blessing.

Coincidences. Bernstein got his start with the Boston Symphony at an age hardly older than Michael Tilson Thomas, and with something of the same excited public acclaim. Daniel Barenboim, erstwhile piano prodigy turned conductor, and still a very young man, has been guesting it with Bernstein's New York Philharmonic, has been taking over much of the Bernstein repertoire, and has been earning ecstatic praise from the Bernstein pub-

Boston S Orch.

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
THE GRAMOPHONE
379, KENTON ROAD,
KENTON,
MIDDLESEX
ISSUE DATED
APR 1971

DEBUSSY. Chamber Works. Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein, violin; Barton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ann Hobson, harp; Michael Tilson Thomas, piano). DGG 2530 049 (£2·40).

Sonata for violin and piano. Sonata for cello and piano. Sonata for flute, viola and harp. Syrinx for solo flute.

To listen to Debussy's three sonatas seriatim on this beautiful record, is to realise the loss twentieth-century music sustained when Debussy died leaving the three others he planned unwritten. How oboists, horn-players and harpsichordists must dream of the sonata that they missed, the unfulfilled promise . . . "la quatrième sera pour hautbois, cor et claveçin". But the past quarter-century has seen a new assessment of the three sonatas the ailing Debussy did live to write. Although both violinists and cellists have played their respective sonatas ever since they were written, and no ensemble including flute, viola and harp has ever neglected Debussy's wistful masterpiece for that combination, pundits persisted for two decades after the composer's death that Debussy's late works showed a falling-off of his musical powers. That even so erudite a Debussyan as Edward Lockspeiser shared this view in the first edition of his Debussy (in Dent's Master Musicians series) is not surprising for the Violin Sonata, Debussy's last work, failed at the time of its first performance not only with the critics but with Debussy's own close friends. Slight carping about the first movement apart, Lockspeiser's third edition tells a different story and shows much more respect for all three sonatas. And the enthusiasm shown by Pierre Boulez today has completed the rehabilitation of the musicien français of those last years and their precious legacy. As for the fill-up, Syrinx, it remains, after nearly sixty years, perhaps the most perfect solo wind piece ever written. So much for the music.

Turning to the performances, one realises the extent to which the Boston Symphony, of all American orchestras, has the greatest French affiliations. Pierre Monteux who became its conductor in 1919 reorganised the orchestra in 1920, and when Koussevitsky took over in 1924, its French personnel probably increased. Under his successor, Charles Munch, the tradition of a fair representation of the French repertoire and of French tonal ideals was maintained. And that is the background against which the six stars of this disc emerge triumphantly. To the two duo sonatas, the violinist and cellist each bring the subtle nuances of rhythm and tone-colour, of accent and dynamic that they require, and in this they are splendidly partnered by Michael Tilson Thomas's supple piano playing. He is evidently a musician of many parts, for by the time this appears in print he will have conducted the New Philharmonia Orchestra at the Royal Festival Hall in Mahler's Fifth Symphony.

There is beautiful playing, too, in the Trio Sonata, but here the over-reverberant acoustic coarsens the sound so that the lower notes of the harp have a plummy, lingering halo around them, and one is enveloped by the resonance of the bass register instead of always remaining at a discreet distance from music of such refinement. Debussy's harp chords were never meant to sound like held chords on a cathedral organ. (The cleaner, more astringent sound of the Melos Ensemble's Oiseau-Lyre version is, I am sure, closer to the composer's idea.) But the closeness of the microphone placing does nothing to enhance the intimacy of the music: on the contrary, it weights it. A pity, because the performances themselves deserve a more sensitive recording. F.A.

Boston Orch (2)

DURRANT'S
DURRANT HOUSE
HERBAL HILL
LONDON E.C.1
01-278 1733
THE GRAMOPHONE
379, KENTON ROAD,
KENTON,
MIDDLESEX
ISSUE DATED
MAY 1971

ORCHESTRAL CONCERT. Boston Pops Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. RCA LSB4017 (£1·49).

Gold: Boston Pops March. Gershwin-Bennett: Porgy and Bess—A Symphonic Picture. Glazunov: Carnaval Overture, Op. 45. Shostakovich: Hamlet—Incidental Music, Op. 32.

An attractive souvenir record for the latest visit to London of Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra (backbench Boston Symphony). It is doubly attractive for including the two Russian rarities, neither of which is otherwise available at the moment. The Shostakovich Hamlet music is a decided oddity. Written for an apparently unconventional production of Shakespeare's play in 1932, its general tone is anything but tragic, its idiom unmistakably Russian. I am not surprised to find that Arthur Fiedler selected it for this disc entitled "Fiedler's Choice" because of the music's "great charm, wit and diversity". I would agree on those qualities, and as long as I do not have to associate it with Hamlet I am prepared to revel in the oompah rhythms, the trombone glissandos and the other pantomime effects. Even the Funeral March strikes an extrovert rather than a tragic tone, though Ophelia's Song for muted strings brings nicely judged relief. Though some of this has the ring of Khatchaturian in unbuttoned mood, there are enough Shostakovich touches to carry the suite through, particularly when it is played as brilliantly as here.

Glazunov's Carnaval Overture is exactly what one would expect with brilliant orchestration including plenty of piccolo and triangle and a 'patriotic' second subject setting off the skipping main theme. Had Walton been a Russian living a generation earlier, he would have done something very like this, though he would probably have made it even more memorable.

Walton comes to mind too in the Boston Pops March by the film-music writer (husband of Marni Nixon, the soprano) Ernest Gold. Not so much in the main-theme jollification—which is rather like Americanised Merry Widow—as in the patriotic theme, which is the closest thing imaginable to the big tune in Walton's Orb and Sceptre. None the worse for that of course. Richard Russell Bennett's suite from Porgy and Bess needs no introduction at this stage, though Fiedler takes the trouble to point out in a remark quoted on the sleeve-note that Bennett "put the suite together without changing a note of Gershwin's score"—something which I had not realised from what sounds very slick indeed. Fine playing, superb recording though at times the highly reverberant Boston acoustic is distracting. E.G.

238

Sunday World-Herald Mag. Apr. 25, 1971

Sledgehammer Used to Kill Musical Gnat

By Vernon L. Hoyt

While the Tchaikovsky "1812 Overture" version put out by RCA (LSC 3204) is marvelous from a technical standpoint, what with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy, the Philadelphia Brass Bands, bells, electronic cannon and the Temple University Choirs, it seems something like slugging a gnat with a sledgehammer.

And with the "1812" is Beethoven's "Wellington's Victory," which is likewise melodramatic and potboiler material, the technically well-joined music of a genius who couldn't write anything without getting something into it but in this case did not get much.

Undoubtedly there are terrific effects, what with an exact balance and a neat blend of varied elements. Sometimes the action is even stirring.

Violin, Orchestra

William Schuman took three whacks at the thing before he got his "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra" into the shape he wanted and that is the version performed by Paul Zukofsky with the

Michael Tilson Thomas

Boston Symphony Orchestra under Michael Tilson Thomas for Deutsche Grammophon (2530 103).

Zukofsky infiltrates the lyric and virtuoso aspects of this very modern (latest revise 1959) concerto with a bucketful of color and a wealth of warmth. Thomas's precise beat and relaxed approach bathes the orchestral parts with an expansive light.

Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 2" has a limpid clarity and an engaging strength which recommend the piece highly. On the disc with the Schuman work it receives an uncomplicated playing. The record was made under a grant from Broadcast Music, Inc. It is a welcome addition to any collection of contemporary music.

In the Paderewski "Fantasie Polonaise, Op. 19" on the same record, Wild adds some fireworks of his own, lifting one arpeggio passage an octave higher, for instance, and doubling the orchestra in another passage. And the complete sound is well reproduced.

SAKO
Zeitungs-Ausschnittdienst / Wien
Ausschnitt aus:
Die Presse
Wien
17. April 1971

NEUE PLATTEN

Bostoner und Berliner Musiker

Das Boston Symphony Orchestra hat seit kurzer Zeit einen neuen Vertragspartner, was die Schallplatte angeht. Die Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft ist in dem Augenblick, in dem es auf dem amerikanischen Markt eine Flaute in E-Musik gab, angetreten und hat zu ihren europäischen Ensembles dieses vornehmste US-Orchester gekauft. Eine Freude und ein Stolz für den Katalog. Die ersten Früchte der Zusammenarbeit sind bereits zu haben — eine Platte unter Abbado wurde auch schon besprochen. Nun sind zwei weitere Langspielplatten im Handel.

Peter Tschaikowsky „Symphonie Nr. 1" Langspielplatte DGG 2530.078.

Michael Tilson Thomas ist ein junger Dirigent in Boston, dem man bereits das Prädikat „Bernstein der siebziger Jahre" verliehen hat. Ein gefährlicher Titel übrigens, denn niemand kann vorhersagen, ob es dann, wenn Thomas das Alter Bernsteins erreicht haben wird, noch die Dirigenten vom Schlage Bernsteins geben wird.

Mit den Bostonern, wie das Orchester sogar in Wien einfach genannt wird, hat Thomas die erste Symphonie von Tschaikowsky eingespielt, ein nicht eben populäres Werk, das aber bei einiger Bemühung auch jetzt noch Popularität erlangen könnte: Es hat einprägsame Themen, eine übersichtliche Gliederung und schon ganz die ökonomische Instrumentierung, die Tschaikowsky später auszeichnet. Man hört, was er geschrieben hat. Und man versteht, was er so, gerade so, sagen wollte. „Winterträume" — der Titel der Symphonie, der jedoch nicht weiter erklärt wird — werden von Thomas und den Bostonern sehr delikat, aber auch sehr brillant gespielt. Man hat, wahrscheinlich, die beste Aufnahme gleich als eine der ersten gemacht. Die Symphonie muß nun nicht zu oft nachproduziert werden.

Gustav Holst „Die Planeten" Langspielplatte DGG 2530.102.

Der Musikfreund, mit dem Werk im Grunde nur von einer beinahe vergessenen Aufführung in der Wiener Staatsoper her vertraut, fragt sich, warum es von dem Ballett „Die Planeten" so viele Aufnahmen gibt. William Steinberg gibt die Antwort. Die harmlose, aber effektvolle Partitur ist ein „gefundenes Fressen" für ein Ensemble, das seine Vorzüge an einem nicht zu schwierigen Werk präsentieren will. Die sieben Sätze sind ein eingängiges Kompendium dankbarer musikalischer Situationen. Nicht sehr viel mehr, aber das — dankbar — immerhin eindrucksvoll.

Steinberg, den wir auch in Wien an der Spitze des Orchesters erleben werden, läßt das Bostoner Orchester brillieren. Solch einen herrlichen Klang, solch eine durchschlagende Kraft, solch ein grundmusikalischer Impetus ist seit langem auf keiner Platte mehr festgehalten worden. Da könnte man von den herrlichen Bläsen schwärmen, von den satten Geigen, von den exzellent angeglichenen Bläsern und hätte auch Poetischeres nur mit Berechtigung geschrieben. Genug, vorläufig genug. Wer ein Orchester der Sonderklasse mit einem präzisen Dirigenten erleben will, erwerbe diese Platte.

Ludwig van Beethoven „Fidelio". 3 Langspielplatten EMI.

Die vor der Salzburger Aufführung produzierte Schallplattenaufnahme von Karajans „Fidelio" ist, einmal muß das vermerkt werden, keineswegs die „Platte zur Aufführung". In Besetzung wie in vielen musikalischen Details unterscheidet sie sich von der Darbietung bei den Osterfestspielen und ist selbst dort nicht als Dokumentation zu nehmen, wo man es immerhin erwartet: Die Bühnenbildskizzen sind in der Salzburger Realität nicht ausgeführt, geben ein falsches Bild und dürften nur für die Musikfreunde interessant sein, die nun Vergleiche zwischen Skizzen und der „Wahrheit" anstellen können. Daß dieser „Fidelio" zu spät kommt, nach dem Beethoven-Jahr, wäre nicht so schlimm, brächte er nun die bisher nicht eingespielte ideale Fassung. Daß er aber zu spät kommt und einige schwerwiegende Fehler aufweist, ist traurig. Als Schallplattenkäufer weiß man nämlich wirklich nicht, warum es diesen „Fidelio" nun eigentlich gibt.

Nicht zu ausführlich: Jon Vickers und Helga Dernesch sind keine idealen Interpreten für Florestan und Leonore, Frau Dernesch hat auch auf der Platte Schwierigkeiten mit der Höhe, und Herr Vickers übertreibt wieder einmal. Horst R. Laubenthal und Helen Donath als Jacquino und Marzelline sind in Ordnung, ganz wie Karl Ridderbusch, der auf der Platte auch die Gold-Arie des Rocco singen darf. Zoltan Kelemen aber kann auch auf der Platte als Pizarro nicht überzeugen.

Die Dialoge sind klug gestrafft, werden aber unnatürlich und in überraschender Manier wiedergegeben, man hat den Eindruck, vor den Arien, Duetten oder Ensembles käme jeder ganz nah an ein Mikrophon und flüstere seinen Text hinein. Und dies ist wahrscheinlich der richtige Eindruck und gewiß nicht der, den man bei einer „Fidelio"-Wiedergabe haben soll.

Die musikalische Leitung Karajans ist, immerhin, nicht ganz so spannungsgeladen und hinreißend, wie man das bei Beethoven erwarten dürfte. Es fehlen, Gott sei Dank, die Versuche, ins Extrem auszuweichen, es fehlen aber auch die Momente großer, natürlicher Anspannung — ruhig und ohne wirkliches Engagement ergibt diese Aufnahme nicht einmal ein besonders anfechtbares Beethoven-Bild. Sondern, insgesamt und auf vertrackte Weise, doch wieder ein Abbild der Salzburger Aufführung 1971.

f. e.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (t. Ts.): 59,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
General-Anzeiger für Bonn und Umgebung, Bonn
29. April 1971
vom

Rauschende Orchesterfeste

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BEI DER DEUTSCHEN GRAMMOPHON

Bonns Musikpublikum konnte leider von der Europatournee des Boston Symphony Orchestra dieser Tage sozusagen nur am Rande mitnippen und mußte sich — auf der Empore der Beethovenhalle — mit den „Boston Pops" begnügen, die bekanntlich dadurch entstehen, daß sich die Konzertmeister und ersten Solisten aus dem Orchester absentieren. Aber da die Tournee dieses jüngsten, aber keineswegs geringsten unter den amerikanischen Eliteorchestern nicht nur teilweise (wer die Prospekte, Programmzettel usw. mit ihren Luxusreklamen gesehen hat, würde jedenfalls überwiegend sagen) unter schallplattenökonomischen Aspekten stand, wird es sich kaum ganz übergangen fühlen dürfen. Tatsache ist ja, daß mit dem sensationellen „Einkauf" der Bostoner durch die Deutsche Grammophongesellschaft zwar auch einer deutschen Firma erstmals der Einbruch ins amerikanische Plattengeschäft gelungen ist, daß aber damit andererseits auch eines der typischen amerikanischen Spitzenorchester gleichsam näher und direkter dem hiesigen Musikleben verbunden wird.

Wie weit sich das als gesundes, korrektives Element auf hiesige Interpretationsgebräuche und Klanggeschmäcker auswirken mag, ist freilich schwer zu sagen. Die erste Serie der Grammophon-Aufnahmen mit der Boston Symphony kann davon höchstens eine erste Ahnung vermitteln. Als Beispiel sei auf die Einzelplatte mit Werken Debussys (Trois Nocturnes) und Ravels (Daphnis et Chloé II, Pavane) verwiesen, die sich als ein rauschendes, fast orgienhaftes Orchesterfest präsentiert, in dem das Orchester wie in legerem Übermut alle Register seiner legendären instrumentalen Präzisionskünste, seiner hochpolierten klanglichen Glanzeffekte und aber auch seiner Fähigkeit zu delikaten Farbbrechungen und feinstdifferenzierten klanglichen Zwischenwerten zieht. Es ist fast hörbar, mit welchem Gusto die Aufnahmetechniker der DGG solch hochbrillantes Klangbild auf ihre Bänder zu bannen versucht haben: an Transparenz und Tiefenwirkung ist ihnen selten solch ein Meisterstück gelungen.

Dazu kommt der Glücksfall der exakt werkangemessenen Interpretation, die Claudio Abbado mit feinem Gespür für die rechte Kombination der Klangschichten, deren dynamische Fächerung und rhythmisch aufgerauhte Gliederung anbietet. Mit scharf angezogenen Tempi und temperamentvoll bewegt, werden die Stücke unter seinen Händen doch nie zu purer, reißerischer Show hochgespielt, werden die präzis ausgefeilten Details überall sehr bewußt von der Großformklammer zusammengebunden. ür Claude Debussy'S trois Nocturnes; Maurice Ravel: Daphnis et Chloé (Suite Nr. 2), Pavane pour une Infante stra/New England Conservatory Cho- 2561 012, 20 DM.

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (t. Ts.): 5,7
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Nord-Stuttgarter-Rundschau,
Stuttgart-Zuffenhausen 1. Mai 197
vom

Gerillte Visitenkarten

Orchesterporträts aus Boston, London und Bamberg auf Schallplatten

Eine Nachlese zu den Stuttgarter Erfolgskonzerten der vergangenen Wochen bieten die Frühjahrsneuerscheinungen bei Decca. Drei bekannte Orchester, die unlängst ihre Visitenkarten abgegeben haben, lassen sich in repräsentativen Porträts an der häuslichen Stereoanlage überprüfen. Die Qualitätsmerkmale des Konzertsaals finden sich dabei weitgehend bestätigt.

Unter dem Titel „Boston Symphony in Europe" hat RCA schnell entschlossen die spektakuläre Tournee der Bostoner mit einer Kassette begleitet, deren Inhalt noch aus den Jahren stammt, da Erich Leinsdorf Chefdirigent des amerikanischen Superorchesters war. Den auf zwei Langspielplatten vorgestellten Aufnahmen aus den sechziger Jahren (Mozarts Sinfonien Nr. 36 C-Dur „Linzer" und Nr. 39 Es-Dur; Gustav Mahlers Symphonie Nr. 1 „Der Titan") ist vor allem zu entnehmen, daß die Klangtradition der Bostoner Symphoniker eine Konstante ist, die alle Orchesterchefs zur Arbeitsgrundlage machten, ob sie nun Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf oder William Steinberg heißen. Die Hochglanzpolitur des „Boston sound" steht Mahlers stürmisch bewegter erster Sinfonie etwas besser zur Partitur als den beiden Mozartsinfonien, deren schwelgerische Aufmachung den Europäer doch überrascht. (RK 11 507/1-2 Stereo)

Zwei neue Einspielungen von Neville Marriners „Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields" verdeutlichen, was den Rang dieses großartigen, in einem Blitzanlauf zur Weltspitze vorgestoßenen Londoner Ensembles ausmacht. Es ist das imponierende Vertrauen auf die Überzeugungskraft eines „Molto eleganto-Stiles", der dieses Kammerorchester wie englische Tanzpaare zu Turniersiegen beflügelt. Was sie anfassen, wird zu reinstem Golde. Die hochromantische Streicherserenade Dvoraks, gekoppelt mit Griegs populärer Suite „Aus Holbergs Zeit" ergibt eines der feinsinnigsten Dokumente für zeitgemäße Wahrheitsfindung im romantischen Bereich (SXL 21 221-B). Für Bartóks „Musik für Saiteninstrumente, Schlagzeug und Celesta" und das Divertimento für Streichorchester haben die Londoner zu Recht den Edison-Preis erhalten: Besser kann man nicht darlegen, daß Bartóks Werke bruchlos aus dem neunzehnten Jahrhundert in das zwanzigste führt. (SXL 21 216-B)

Vor wenigen Jahren, als die großen Schallplattengesellschaften noch nicht zum Wettstreit angetreten waren, in einer Art Bibliothek von Alexandria die gesamte musikalische Hinterlassenschaft der letzten Jahrhunderte zu sammeln, hätte man einen Auftrag für unmöglich gehalten, den die Philharmonia Hungarica in Marl unter der Leitung des Landsmannes Antal Dorati jetzt auszuführen hat: sämtliche einhundertundvier Sinfonien Joseph Haydns einzuspielen. Dorati sieht die Riesenaufgabe in rosigem Optimismus: „Alles sind Meisterwerke, und selbst die frühesten bieten wesentlich bessere Musik als beispielsweise die ersten Mozartsinfonien." Ob die klangliche Beweisführung diese These stützen wird, bleibt abzuwarten, denn uns liegen bis jetzt erst die Sinfonien Nr. 49 bis Nr. 64 in Kassette vor und damit eine Schaffensepoche Haydns, aus der gelegentlich auch im Konzertsaal ein Beispiel zu hören ist. Die Philharmonia Hungarica jedenfalls geht diesen mittleren Haydn bereits im Stile der großen klassischen Sinfonik an, mit breitem dynamischem Spektrum und bedeutungsstarken, fast beethovenschen Akzenten. Es ist zu spüren, daß hier an Haydns Größe bewußt gearbeitet wird. (Decca SHE 25 053-D/1-8)

Erwin Schwarz

240 le Nouveau Courrier de la Presse

LIT TOUT

LE NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR
24, rue Royale
PARIS

-7.JUIN1971

Trois disques

LES PERCUSSIONS DE L'ORCHESTRE DE PARIS

Nguyen Thien Dao : « Bat Khuat-1 » ; Marius Constant : « Equal » ; Jacques Delécluse : « Quintuple ». Percussions de l'Orchestre de Paris (J. Delécluse, A. Jacquet, J. Jacques, F. Grana, F. Dupin).

Exploitation virtuose et expressive d'une palette percussive de plus en plus étendue.

1×30 cm, gr. un., La Voix de son Maître, C 069-11326.

IVES-RUGGLES

Charles Ives : « Three places in New England » ; Carl Ruggles : « Sun-Treader », par le Boston Symphony Orchestra, dir. Michael Tilson Thomas.

Deux pionniers de la musique américaine, par le plus brillant des jeunes maîtres de la baguette.

1×30 cm gr. un. DGG. 2530 048.

MALON « REBELLION ».

El Malon, dans la langue indienne de l'ouest de l'Argentine et du Chili, c'est la charge inattendue, violente et rapide d'une horde d'Indiens, c'est aussi le nom choisi par un nouveau groupe de cinq musiciens et chanteurs de talent : Juan Carlos Caceres, Jean-Paul Proix, Daniel Leonard, Didier Gras et Alberto Canonico. Puissance et tendresse dans des rythmes qui évoquent de folles cavalcades.

Philips 6.397-032.

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
W. S. Sauer 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 – Tel. 93 88 172

Ausschnitt aus:
NEUE ILLUSTR. WOCHENSCHAU
9. Mai 1971
Wien Datum

DIE GUTE SCHALLPLATTE

Strawinskis Ballettmusik

Aus den frühen Balletten Igor Strawinskis spricht elementare Urkraft, und unverwelkt stellen vor allem „Der Feuervogel" und „Petruschka" Tänzern und Dirigenten immer wieder faszinierende Aufgaben. Auch die Stereoneuaufnahmen der beiden Werke auf der RCA-Langspielplatte LSC-3167 mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra zeigen, wieviel Farben und vitale Spannungen diese Partituren in sich tragen. Der junge japanische Dirigent Seiji Ozawa weiß sie aber auch zu differenzierter, ja virtuoser Entfaltung zu bringen, in den beiden Orchestersuiten setzt auch Michael Tilson Thomas am Pieno die richtigen Akzente. E. W.

MIDI-LIBRE
30 Mars 1971

★★★ CHARLES IVES CARL RUGGLES, par l'orch. symphonique de Boston, dir. M. T. Thomas, 1 × 30 cm. D.G.G. 2530-048 g. u.

L'œuvre du pionnier américain, si longtemps ignoré, a été enregistrée, depuis trois ans, avec une hâte qui marquait le souci de faire oublier l'injustice. Ses pages les plus célèbres, Three Places in New England, font l'objet de la 2e version diffusée en Europe. Bouffées de chansons populaires qui « nous viennent de loin », collages d'hymnes militaires, évocations d'images enregistrées au cours de promenades constituent la matière de ces trois places de Nouvelle-Angleterre auxquelles la direction du jeune Michael Tilson Thomas confère un éclairage féerique.

Le contemporain d'Ives, Carl Ruggles, fait son entrée dans la discothèque avec Sun-Treader (1932). A la différence de celle d'Ives, l'œuvre de Ruggles est de faible dimension, mais elle est dense et témoigne tout à la fois d'une spiritualité et d'une rigueur formelle auxquelles les pages d'Ives ne sauraient prétendre. Ce Sun-Treader (celui qui marche sur le soleil) est fait d'un tissu symphonique très serré et raffiné, d'une densité dissonante et d'un contrepoint formé de lignes ascendantes et descendantes. Que les éditeurs s'empressent de publier d'autre pages de Ruggles, surtout [illegible] elles doivent être servies d'aussi magistr[illegible]

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (l. Ts.): 164,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –
Ausschnitt aus:
Hannoversche Allgemeine Hannover
30. April 1971
vom

Das Schönste ist der Debussy

Boston Symphony Orchestra auf deutschen Schallplatten

Die Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft, die seit einem Jahr einen Exklusivvertrag mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra unterhält und die auch jene Europa-Tournee der Amerikaner mitgestartet hatte, die dieses Weltklasseorchester sogar nach Hannover führte, hat bisher vier Platten mit den „Bostonern" vorgelegt. Die schönste Orchesterplatte ist die von dem Italiener Claudio Abbado dirigierte. Er setzt sich für Debussys „Nocturnes" („Wolken", „Feste" und „Sirenen"), sowie für die zweite Ballettsuite „Daphnis und Chloe" und schließlich für die „Pavane auf den Tod einer Infantin" von Ravel (Stereo 2530038, 25 DM), ein.

Das Bostoner Symphony Orchestra und der Chor – in „Sirenen" die Frauenstimmen und in „Daphnis" der gemischte Chor des New England Conservatory – verbinden sich zu einer betörenden klanglichen Einheit, wie es auf der Schallplatte nur das Zeitalter der Stereotechnik heraufbeschwören kann. Man stellt fest, daß Claudio Abbado ein sehr sensibler Dirigent für die verschiedenen Impressionen dieser französischen Musik ist, dessen klangliches Gespür alle farbigen und rhythmischen Reize der Partituren verschwenderisch aufdeckt.

Der junge Michael Tilson Thomas, der das hannoversche Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra leitete, dirigiert auf einer weiteren Langspielplatte Tschaikowskijs 1. Sinfonie, „Winterträume" betitelt (Stereo 2530078, 25 DM), mit viel Schwung und Verve. Er geht mit einer Einfühlungssicherheit in die westöstliche Klangsphäre zu Werk, wie sie in dem gleichen Maße nicht einmal Lorin Maazel aufbrachte, der diesen selten zu hörenden sinfonischen Erstling Tschaikowskijs bereits früher eingespielt hat. Interessant zu hören ist auch das Eintreten des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Michael Tilson Thomas für neuere amerikanische Sinfonik bei der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft und zwar in Charles Ives' „Three Places in New England" und Carl Ruggles' „Sun-Treader" (Stereo 2530 048, 25 DM), Werken, die im Vorhof der modernen Musik angesiedelt und in Deutschland nahezu unbekannt geblieben sind.

Schließlich hat die Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft noch eine Kammermusik-Platte mit Werken Debussys herausgebracht, die die „Boston Symphony Chamber Players", die hervorragenden Solisten dieses Orchesters, eingespielt haben (Stereo 2530049, 25 DM). Hier ist Doriot Anthony Dwyer mit „Syrinx" für Flöte solo zu hören. In den Violin- und Cellosonaten, die der erste Konzertmeister der „Bostoner", Joseph Silverstein, und der Solocellist Jules Eskin mit geschliffener, feinnuancierter Tongebung vortragen, erweist sich der Dirigent Thomas als technisch versierter, stilsicherer Kammermusikpartner am Klavier. Die Krone dieser Platte aber ist Debussys Sonate für Flöte (Doriot Anthony Dwyer), Bratsche (Burton Fine) und Harfe (Ann Hobson), die man selten in so schwereloser Rhythmik und melodischer Schönheit gehört hat wie auf dieser Platte.

Erich Limmert

240 le Nouveau Courrier de la Presse

LIT TOUT

LE NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR
24, rue Royale
PARIS

-7.JUIN 1971

Trois disques

LES PERCUSSIONS DE L'ORCHESTRE DE PARIS

Nguyen Thien Dao : « Bat Khuat-1 » ; Marius Constant : « Equal » ; Jacques Delécluse : « Quintuple ». Percussions de l'Orchestre de Paris (J. Delécluse, A. Jacquet, J. Jacques, F. Grana, F. Dupin).

Exploitation virtuose et expressive d'une palette percussive de plus en plus étendue.

1×30 cm, gr. un., La Voix de son Maître, C 069-11326.

IVES-RUGGLES

Charles Ives : « Three places in New England » ; Carl Ruggles : « Sun-Treader », par le Boston Symphony Orchestra, dir. Michael Tilson Thomas.

Deux pionniers de la musique américaine, par le plus brillant des jeunes maîtres de la baguette.

1×30 cm gr. un. D.G.G. 2530 048.

MALON - REBELLION -

El Malon, dans la langue indienne de l'ouest de l'Argentine et du Chili, c'est la charge inattendue, violente et rapide d'une horde d'Indiens, c'est aussi le nom choisi par un nouveau groupe de cinq musiciens et chanteurs de talent : Iuan Carlos Caceres, Jean-Paul Proix, Daniel Leonard, Didier Gras et Alberto Canonico. Puissance et tendresse dans des rythmes qui évoquent de folles cavalcades.

Philips 6.397-032.

sako Zeitungsausschnitte
W. S. Sauer 1070 Wien
Neubaugasse 1 – Tel. 93 88 172

Ausschnitt aus:
NEUE ILLUSTR. WOCHENSCHAU

Wien Datum

DIE GUTE SCHALLPLATTE

Strawinskis Balletttmusik

Aus den frühen Balletten Igor Strawinskis spricht elementare Urkraft, unverwelkt stellen vor allem „Der Feuervogel" und „Petruschka" Tänzern und Dirigenten immer wieder faszinierende Aufgaben. Auch die Stereoneuaufnahmen der beiden Werke auf der RCA-Langspielplatte LSC-3167 mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra zeigen, wieviel Farben und Vitale Spannungen diese Partituren in sich tragen. Der junge japanische Dirigent Seiji Ozawa weiß sie aber auch zu differenzierter, ja virtuoser Entfaltung zu bringen, in den beiden Orchestersuiten setzt auch Michael Tilson Thomas am Piano die richtigen Akzente. E. W.

MIDI-LIBRE
30 Mars 1971

★★★ ●●● CHARLES IVES CARL RUGGLES, par l'orch. symphonique de Boston, dir. M. T. Thomas, 1 × 30 cm. D.G.G. 2.530-048 g. u.

L'œuvre du pionnier américain, si longtemps ignoré, a été enregistrée, depuis trois ans, avec une hâte qui marquait le souci de faire oublier l'injustice. Ses pages les plus célèbres, Three Places in New England, font l'objet de la 3e version diffusée en Europe. Bouffées de chansons populaires qui « nous viennent de loin », collages d'hymnes militaires, évocations d'images enregistrées au cours de promenades constituent la matière de ces trois places de Nouvelle-Angleterre auxquelles la direction du jeune Michael Tilson Thomas confère un éclairage féerique.

Le contemporain d'Ives Carl Ruggles, fait son entrée dans la discothèque avec Sun-Treader (1932). A la différence de celle d'Ives, l'œuvre de Ruggles est de faible dimension, mais elle est dense et témoigne tout à la fois d'une spiritualité et d'une rigueur formelle auxquelles les pages d'Ives ne sauraient prétendre. Ce Sun-Treader (celui qui marche sur le soleil) est fait d'un tissu symphonique très serré et raffiné, d'une densité dissonante et d'un contrepoint formé de lignes ascendantes et descendantes. Que les éditeurs s'empressent de publier d'autre pages de Ruggles, surtout [illegible] doivent être servies d'aussi magistr[illegible]

argus Seit 1887
Auflage (l. Ts.): 164,3
– lt. „Leitfaden 1971 –

Ausschnitt aus:
Hannoversche Allgemeine Hannover
vom 30. April 197[illegible]

Das Schönste ist der Debussy

Boston Symphony Orchestra auf deutschen Schallplatten

Die Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft, die seit einem Jahr einen Exklusivvertrag mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra unterhält und die auch jene Europa-Tournee der Amerikaner mitgestartet hatte, die dieses Weltklasseorchester sogar nach Hannover führte, hat bisher vier Platten mit den „Bostonern" vorgelegt. Die schönste Orchesterplatte ist die von dem Italiener Claudio Abbado dirigierte. Er setzt sich für Debussys „Nocturnes" („Wolken", „Feste" und „Sirenen"), sowie für die zweite Ballettsuite „Daphnis und Chloe" und schließlich für die „Pavane auf den Tod einer Infantin" von Ravel (Stereo 2530038, 25 DM), ein.

Das Bostoner Symphony Orchestra und der Chor – in „Sirenen" die Frauenstimmen und in „Daphnis" der gemischte Chor des New England Conservatory – verbinden sich zu einer betörenden klanglichen Einheit, wie es auf der Schallplatte nur das Zeitalter der Stereotechnik heraufbeschwören kann. Man stellt fest, daß Claudio Abbado ein sehr sensibler Dirigent für die verschiedenen Impressionen dieser französischen Musik ist, dessen klangliches Gespür alle farbigen und rhythmischen Reize der Partituren verschwenderisch aufdeckt.

Der junge Michael Tilson Thomas, der das hannoversche Gastspiel des Boston Symphony Orchestra leitete, dirigiert auf einer weiteren Langspielplatte Tschaikowskijs 1. Sinfonie, „Winterträume" betitelt (Stereo 2530078, 25 DM), mit viel Schwung und Verve. Er geht mit einer Einfühlungssicherheit in die westöstliche Klangsphäre zu Werk, wie sie in dem gleichen Maße nicht einmal Lorin Maazel aufbrachte, der diesen selten zu hörenden sinfonischen Erstling Tschaikowskijs bereits früher eingespielt hat. Interessant zu hören ist auch das Eintreten des Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Michael Tilson Thomas für neuere amerikanische [illegible]fonik bei der Deutschen Grammo[illegible] Gesellschaft und zwar in Char[illegible] Ives' „Three Places in New England" und Carl Ruggles' „Sun-Treader" (Stereo 2530 048, 25 DM), Werken, die im Vorhof der modernen Musik angesiedelt und in Deutschland nahezu unbekannt geblieben sind.

Schließlich hat die Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft noch eine Kammermusik-Platte mit Werken Debussys herausgebracht, die die „Boston Symphony Chamber Players", die hervorragenden Solisten dieses Orchesters, eingespielt haben (Stereo 2530049, 25 DM). Hier ist Doriot Anthony Dwyer mit „Syrinx" für Flöte solo zu hören. In den Violin- und Cellosonaten, die der erste Konzertmeister der „Bostoner", Joseph Silverstein, und der Solocellist Jules Eskin mit geschliffener, feinnuancierter Tongebung vortragen, erweist sich der Dirigent Thomas als technisch versierter, stilsicherer Kammermusikpartner am Klavier. Die Krone dieser Platte aber ist Debussys Sonate für Flöte (Doriot Anthony Dwyer), Bratsche (Burton Fine) und Harfe (Ann Hobson), die man selten in so schwereloser Rhythmik und melodischer Schönheit gehört hat wie auf dieser Platte.

Erich Limmert

DT

111 UP-33
DISQUES: L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON SERA A PARIS AU MOIS D'AVRIL 1971.

P A R I S, 27 DECEMBRE (UPI)--CE N'EST PEUT-ETRE QU'UNE COINCIDENCE, MAIS LA VENUE A PARIS DE L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON, ANNONCEE CES JOURS-CI, A CORRESPONDU A LA PARUTION DE DISQUES ENREGISTRES PAR CETTE PRESTIGIEUSE FORMATION, QUI VALENT VRAIMENT LA PEINE D'ETRE SOULIGNES.

C'EST AU COURS D'UNE TOURNEE EUROPEENNE, ET APRES AVOIR VISITE ENTRE AUTRES PAYS, L'ESPAGNE, L'ITALIE ET L'ALLEMAGNE QUE LE "BOSTON SYMPHONY" SERA ENTENDU DANS NOTRE CAPITALE.

IL Y PRESENTERA AU COURS DE SON PROGRAMME L'OEUVRE D'UN AMERICAIN ASSEZ PEU CONNU ENCORE, DES MELOMANES FRANCAIS. CHARLES IVES, NE EN 1874 A DANBURY (CONNECTICUT), MORT EN 1954. CETTE OEUVRE "THREE PLACES IN NEW ENGLAND" A ETE GRAVEE PAR D.D.G., AVEC, SUR L'AUTRE FACE "SUN TRADER" D'UN AUTRE COMPOSITEUR AMERICAIN, CARL RUGGLES. LA COMPARAISON DES DEUX AUTEURS EST INTERESSANTE, LE PREMIER ETANT OUVERT, CORDIAL, PLEIN D'ESPRIT ET D'IDEALISME, TANDIS QUE L'AUTRE EST MYSTIQUE EXIGEANT, PARFOIS SUBLIME.

PRISE DE SON SANS REPROCHE EXCELLENTES PERFORMANCES DE L'ORCHESTRE DE BOSTON, SOUS LA CONDUITE DE MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS, CELLES-CI PERMETTRONT DONC DE SE FAMILIARISER DES MAINTENANT AVEC DES COMPOSITIONS, QUI DEMANDENT A ETRE ECOUTEES PLUSIEURS FOIS POUR ETRE APPRECIEES A LEUR JUSTE VALEUR.

UN AUTRE DISQUE A ETE GRAVE PAR LES SOLISTES DU MEME ORCHESTRE, (CHEZ DDG EGALEMENT). ON Y TROUVE DES OEUVRES DE DDBUSSY.

(A SUIVRE) LFV1725

111 UP-34
2 - DISQUES (SUITE DU 33 ... DEBUSSY).

LA SONATE POUR PIANO ET VIOLON, LA SONATE POUR VIOLONCELLE ET PIANO, "SYRINX" POUR FLUTE SEULE, ET LA SONATE POUR FLUTE, ALTO ET HARPE. CET ENREGISTREMENT EST TOUT DE FINESSE, DE NUANCES, DE TRANSPARENCE. QUELLE CHOSE ETRANGE QUE DEBUSSY AIT SI PEU ECRIT DE MUSIQUE DE CHAMBRE, ALORS QUE CE GENRE CONVIENT SI BIEN A SON TEMPERAMENT ! RAISON DE PLUS POUR APPRECIER CE DON QUE VIENNENT DE NOUS FAIRE LES SOLISTES DE L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON.

NOUS VOUDRIONS ENFIN PARLER DE DEUX QUATUORS DE MENDELSOHN, ENREGISTRES PAR LE QUATUOR LASALLE. ON SE DEMANDE PARFOIS POURQUOI ON NE LES ENTEND PAS PLUS SOUVENT. C'EST UNE MUSIQUE FREMISSANTE, SENSIBLE, QUI "VIENT A VOUS". LORSQU'EN HIVER, ON A LA CHANCE D'AVOIR UN "COIN DU FEU", QUEL PLAISIR DE LA LAISSER COULER EN SOI ! (CHEZ DDG).

LFV1728

UNITED PRESS

"Records: The Boston Symphony will be in Paris during the month of April"

Paris, December 27 (UPI). It is perhaps only a coincidence, but the visit of the Boston Symphony in Paris, just recently announced, has been followed by the appearance of records recorded by this prestigious organization which are quite worthy of note.

It is during a European tour, and after having visited other countries (Spain, Italy and Germany among them) that the Boston Symphony will be heard in our capital.

During their concert we will hear the work of an American still very little known to French music lovers. Charles Ives, born in Danbury (Conn.) in 1874 and died in 1954. This work, "Three Places in New England" has been recorded by DGG, with, on the other side, "Sun Treader" by another American composer, Carl Ruggles. The comparison of the two composers is interesting, the first being open , cordial, full of spirit and idealism, while the other is an uncompromising mystic, capable of the sublime.

The sound is irreproachable and the performances of the Boston Symphony excellent under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas. We will henceforth be able to familiarize ourselves with these compositions which ought to be listened to more than once to appreciate their proper worth.

Another disc has been recorded by soloists from the same orchestra (also by DGG). Included are works by Debussy: the sonata for violin and piano, the sonata for cello and piano, the sonata for flute, viola and harp, and the "Syrinx" for flute solo. This recording is all finesse, nuances, transparence. How strange that Debussy wrote so little chamber music, since this medium suits his temperament so well! One more reason to appreciate the gift of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. . . .

DT

111 UP-33
DISQUES: L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON SERA A PARIS AU MOIS D'AVRIL 1971.

P A R I S, 27 DECEMBRE (UPI)--CE N'EST PEUT-ETRE QU'UNE COINCIDENCE, MAIS LA VENUE A PARIS DE L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON, ANNONCEE CES JOURS-CI, A CORRESPONDU A LA PARUTION DE DISQUES ENREGISTRES PAR CETTE PRESTIGIEUSE FORMATION, QUI VALENT VRAIMENT LA PEINE D'ETRE SOULIGNES.

C'EST AU COURS D'UNE TOURNEE EUROPEENNE, ET APRES AVOIR VISITE ENTRE AUTRES PAYS, L'ESPAGNE, L'ITALIE ET L'ALLEMAGNE QUE LE "BOSTON SYMPHONY" SERA ENTENDU DANS NOTRE CAPITALE.

IL Y PRESENTERA AU COURS DE SON PROGRAMME L'OEUVRE D'UN AMERICAIN ASSEZ PEU CONNU ENCORE, DES MELOMANES FRANCAIS. CHARLES IVES, NE EN 1874 A DANBURY (CONNECTICUT), MORT EN 1954. CETTE OEUVRE "THREE PLACES IN NEW ENGLAND" A ETE GRAVEE PAR D.D.G., AVEC, SUR L'AUTRE FACE "SUN TRADER" D'UN AUTRE COMPOSITEUR AMERICAIN, CARL RUGGLES. LA COMPARAISON DES DEUX AUTEURS EST INTERESSANTE, LE PREMIER ETANT OUVERT, CORDIAL, PLEIN D'ESPRIT ET D'IDEALISME, TANDIS QUE L'AUTRE EST MYSTIQUE EXIGEANT, PARFOIS SUBLIME.

PRISE DE SON SANS REPROCHE EXCELLENTES PERFORMANCES DE L'ORCHESTRE DE BOSTON, SOUS LA CONDUITE DE MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS, CELLES-CI PERMETTRONT DONC DE SE FAMILIARISER DES MAINTENANT AVEC DES COMPOSITIONS, QUI DEMANDENT A ETRE ECOUTEES PLUSIEURS FOIS POUR ETRE APPRECIEES A LEUR JUSTE VALEUR.

UN AUTRE DISQUE A ETE GRAVE PAR LES SOLISTES DU MEME ORCHESTRE, (CHEZ DDG EGALEMENT). ON Y TROUVE DES OEUVRES DE DDBUSSY.

(A SUIVRE) LFV1725

111 UP-34
2 - DISQUES (SUITE DU 33 ... DEBUSSY).

LA SONATE POUR PIANO ET VIOLON, LA SONATE POUR VIOLONCELLE ET PIANO, "SYRINX" POUR FLUTE SEULE, ET LA SONATE POUR FLUTE, ALTO ET HARPE. CET ENREGISTREMENT EST TOUT DE FINESSE, DE NUANCES, DE TRANSPARENCE. QUELLE CHOSE ETRANGE QUE DEBUSSY AIT SI PEU ECRIT DE MUSIQUE DE CHAMBRE, ALORS QUE CE GENRE CONVIENT SI BIEN A SON TEMPERAMENT ! RAISON DE PLUS POUR APPRECIER CE DON QUE VIENNENT DE NOUS FAIRE LES SOLISTES DE L'ORCHESTRE SYMPHONIQUE DE BOSTON.

NOUS VOUDRIONS ENFIN PARLER DE DEUX QUATUORS DE MENDELSOHN, ENREGISTRES PAR LE QUATUOR LASALLE. ON SE DEMANDE PARFOIS POURQUOI ON NE LES ENTEND PAS PLUS SOUVENT. C'EST UNE MUSIQUE FREMISSANTE, SENSIBLE, QUI "VIENT A VOUS". LORSQU'EN HIVER, ON A LA CHANCE D'AVOIR UN "COIN DU FEU", QUEL PLAISIR DE LA LAISSER COULER EN SOI ! (CHEZ DDG).

LFV1728

UNITED PRESS

"Records: The Boston Symphony will be in Paris during the month of April"

Paris, December 27 (UPI). It is perhaps only a coincidence, but the visit of the Boston Symphony in Paris, just recently announced, has been followed by the appearance of records recorded by this prestigious organization which are quite worthy of note.

It is during a European tour, and after having visited other countries (Spain, Italy and Germany among them) that the Boston Symphony will be heard in our capital.

During their concert we will hear the work of an American still very little known to French music lovers. Charles Ives, born in Danbury (Conn.) in 1874 and died in 1954. This work, "Three Places in New England" has been recorded by DGG, with, on the other side, "Sun Treader" by another American composer, Carl Ruggles. The comparison of the two composers is interesting, the first being open , cordial, full of spirit and idealism, while the other is an uncompromising mystic, capable of the sublime.

The sound is irreproachable and the performances of the Boston Symphony excellent under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas. We will henceforth be able to familiarize ourselves with these compositions which ought to be listened to more than once to appreciate their proper worth.

Another disc has been recorded by soloists from the same orchestra (also by DGG). Included are works by Debussy: the sonata for violin and piano, the sonata for cello and piano, the sonata for flute, viola and harp, and the "Syrinx" for flute solo. This recording is all finesse, nuances, transparence. How strange that Debussy wrote so little chamber music, since this medium suits his temperament so well! One more reason to appreciate the gift of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. . . .

BLANK PAGE

V771
USE 70 MANILA
REFILL
SAMUEL WARD - BOSTON

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND